Incidentally, of the four remaining pair of concerts in the subsidiary series, Georges Enesco will conduct one, Igor Stravinsky another, Koussevitzky the other two.

* * *

PIANIST Rudolph Serkin will make his first appearances with the Orchestra in the First Piano Concerto of Brahms in D minor at the regular pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Gardner Read's Suite for Strings. The closing work will be Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

Aaron Richmond announces an extraordinarily fine assortment of music events for the New Year.

Scheduled for Jordan Hall appearances on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 6 and 7, is Argentinita and her Spanish Ensemble; for Sunday afternoon, January 8, Richard Crooks, Metropolitan tenor in lieder program.

* * *

One of the most important concerts of the month is, of course, that to be given by Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra in their single Symphony Hall appearance of the season on Tuesday evening, January 10.

On the evening following, Leonard Shure, pianist, and Paul Tortellier, 'cellist, will appear in sonata recital in Jordan Hall.

Kirsten Flagstad will give a Symphony Hall recital on Sunday afternoon, January 15, Trudi Schoop to appear with her Comic allet on Friday evening, January 27.

And in Jordan Hall ursday evening, 19, Eugenia in piano re- nifred Chris- strating the ouble Key- no on Satur- rnoon, Jan-

112

MUSIC

Democratized Music And Its Challenge

B. Trans.

Dec. 24/38

Necessity for a Change in Attitude In the Wake of a Far Larger Public

By MOSES SMITH

A recent issue of Life called attention spectacularly to a phenomenon with which most of us have been familiar without quite clearly recognizing it—the enormous progress in the democratization of the art of music during the last 15 years. That process has been going on not only, as we have been glibly taking for granted, in the function of listening to music via the radio, but also in the study of music. The latter, which has been the more recent, has been presumably a result of the former. One of the implications has, I think, also been taken too readily for granted, namely that music is now mass entertainment (or anything else you want to call it) in the same way as baseball and football are, if perhaps not yet quite in the same degree. It is this new status and the effect it might reasonably have on our attitudes that I should like to examine here.

According to Life some 9,000,000 persons listen regularly on Sunday afternoon to the broadcast concerts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society. I am going to do a good deal of guessing in the course of this article, and I may as well begin now. I assume that that number should be greatly increased if we wish to arrive at the number of those who listen at frequent if not weekly intervals—say, every other week, or whenever they get the chance in a busy life. And I am sure that there are many millions who, hearing the Philharmonic programs only occasionally or in part, listen more frequently to programs of a lighter or more varied character but still containing much "good" music, like the Ford and Firestone hours, Magic Key and Radio City Music Hall. Then there are perhaps even greater millions whose principal preference is not orchestral music and who listen more gladly to the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts, vocal recitals and so forth.

* * *

I think I am not exaggerating the number of persons in this country who now listen to good music because they want to when I set it arbitrarily at 30,000,000. That is, one person in four likes to listen to music ranging, as the case may be, from Rachmaninov's C-sharp minor Prelude to the Bach B minor Mass of Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung," the music, in other words, that was the more or less exclusive possession of the audiences in concert-halls and opera houses a decade and a half ago. The phonograph in those days constituted, it is true, an additional medium. But most of the music then recorded, to say nothing about the overwhelming bulk of what was actually sold, would have difficulty in gaining admission to a serious concert.

Meanwhile what was the number of persons attending concerts or operatic performances at reasonably frequent intervals? Here my guess would have to be very wild, indeed. But it was a number measurable in thousands, at most in hundreds of thousands, certainly not in millions. To a certain extent the great difference is traceable to the inaccessibility of a large portion of the rural population to concert-hall and opera house. The radio performances, on the other hand, are got as easily in the fastness of the Rocky Mountains as at the corner of Seventh avenue and 57th street, New York city—more easily, as a matter of fact.

* * *

And so distance, more or less annihilated by the radio, does not begin to tell the whole tale. In order to "control" (as the scientists say) the problem, let us take an example more nearly approaching a constant—Boston, say. Forget relatively unimportant variations in population and set it roughly at 2,000,000 for the Metropolitan area. Of this number not more than 20,000 or 1 per cent, in my estimation, were or are anything like regular attendants in the concert-hall. For opera, such as we have, the percentage would have to be raised considerably but to nothing like the approximately 25 per cent at which I believe I conservatively estimate those in Metropolitan Boston who listen to the better music on the air.

Why don't these people inundate Symphony and Jordan Halls, overtaxing the capacities of such auditoriums so that concerts are given instead in the Arena and Boston Garden? Some of the reasons are easily given. It is more comfortable, less taxing to hear music in one's living-room than in a formal concert-hall. There is no effort or expense in getting there. Nor does it cost anything after you get it. You can get it any time, more or less; if not one program, then on another. You can come in late and leave early without disturbing anybody. You can smoke and, metaphorically or literally, take off your shoes. There are disadvantages, of course, such as are inescapable in connection with music reproduced by mechanical media. But they are evidently not sufficient (as yet, at least) to offset the obvious advantages, so far as most listeners are concerned.

* * *

I write "evidently," and there's the rub. Some of this huge, newly educated audience, we all know from personal experience, have found their way recently to the older temples of music-making. There would be untold thousands more, it seems to me, if music managers and promoters cultivated the new audience more intelligently. Instead they rely on tried and true methods of the old days, so that they are still "reaching" substantially the same small segment of the musical population, the 1 or 2 per cent instead of the 20 or 30 per cent. The concert is booked, then announced, then publicized through more or less dignified media, then the box-office waits for customers.

It was an effective procedure in the old days because it was based on a roughly homogeneous response from the new audience. Where it has been varied the new approach has not usually been part of a careful study of the changes demanded by the new society but a sort of frantic stop-gap to keep the concert audiences from falling in size; like the ever-increasing reliance on philanthropy as an excuse for getting people into the hall of music, a device which, however successful at the moment, is almost sure to be ruinous in the long run.

* * *

What have I to offer for a remedy? Nothing, because I am not in the concert business and because the function of the critic is not that of the physician. Besides, my own tribe and the newspaper profession generally have similar problems to solve, problems arising out of the same changes in society. I cannot pretend that we have solved them, and am even doubtful whether the existence of the problems is correctly appreciated. How many newspaper publishers and managing editors, for example, believe that one reader in four, is not only not frightened at the mention of "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky but is even likely to know how it sounds and enjoy it? How many music critics, even, realize that their potential public rivals that of the sporting editor in size and is not only a relative handful of persons who happen to have had cultural advantages that the critics themselves (let us hope!) enjoyed? How many are conscious of the fundamental difference, in thinking and values, that separates the generation that has grown up since 1920 from almost all the rest of us? How many correlate the fact that 20 years ago the American male who paid any attention whatever to symphonic music was essentially a freak, with the present condition when the craziest jitterbug is likely to spend much of his time and substance on phonograph records of the better music?

* * *

You may or may not like the democratization of music. It certainly has evil potentialities as well as good. On the whole, I am in favor of it. But like it or no, you can't stop it and you may as well decide to live with it sensibly. You must accept it as a fact just as our sensible fathers had to accept the industrial revolution as a fact.

Otherwise, you may as well agitate for the abolition of the belt system and the re-establishment of the home as a place where the family's clothing is made.

Ready and Willing

RUDOLF SERKIN (Photo, Leon Elzin)

Assisting pianist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Anja Ignatius to Play Sibelius Violin Concerto

Dec. 26/38

New Bedford Mercury

This evening, and Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 26 and 27, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second pair of concerts of the shorter series, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Anja Ignatius, the Finnish violinist making her first visit to this country, will be heard with the orchestra in the Concerto of Sibelius. Miss Ignatius, a pupil of Sevcik, comes with a wide and distinguished European reputation to commend her. The opening number on the program will be Paul Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, a recent score of the German composer which had its first performances hereabouts at the concerts of the past week. The concluding number will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Of the Monday evening series of six concerts and the paired Tuesday afternoons (known as the commuters' matinees and beginning at 3 p. m. rather than the customary Friday 2:30) the five remaining for monthly dates in December, January, February, March and April are still being offered at season rates.

PAGE EIGHT B

Serkin with Symphony; Argentin

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1938

Rudolf Serkin, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular Friday afternon and Saturday evening concerts at Symphony Hall this week. He will play the piano solo in the First Piano Concerto of Brahms.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 28 1938

Symphony Lecturer

—[Sage-Allen Photo.

HAROLD G. COLT JR.

The work of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be reviewed by Harold G. Colt Jr., at the fourth meeting of the symphony appreciation series conducted by the Music Lovers Club at the Hartford YMCA Thursday in Room 200 at 8 p. m. The Boston Symphony orchestra comes to the Bushnell Memorial the following week and much interest is being shown in this preliminary interpretative presentation by Mr. Holt, according to Secretary C. Donald McKelvie of the YMCA. In view of this interest, the Music Lovers Club is extending an invitation to young men and young women, who would like to enhance their enjoyment by a better understanding of symphonic principles, to be guests of the club.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Dec. 31/38

ORCHESTRAS AND CHORUSES

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY—Barbirolli conducting: Carnegie Hall, Thurs. Eve., Dec. 29, at 8:45; Fri. Aft., Dec. 30, at 2:30; Sat. Eve., Dec. 31, at 8:45; Sun. Aft., Jan. 1; Wed. Eve., Jan. 4, at 8:45; Fri. Aft., Jan. 6, at 2:30; Sat. Eve., Jan. 7, at 8:45. (Soloists: Rachmaninoff, Dec. 29-30; Piastro, Dec. 31-Jan. 1; Bustabo, Jan. 7.)

RUTH HILDE SOMER- Pianist, assisted by an orchestra made up of members of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Schwieger conducting: Carnegie Hall, Fri. Eve., Dec. 30.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA - Ormandy conducting: Carnegie Hall, Tues. Eve., Jan. 3. (Soloist: Mischa Levitzki.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting: Carnegie Hall, Thurs. Eve., Jan. 5, at 8:45; Brooklyn Academy of Music, Fri. Eve., Jan. 6; Carnegie Hall, Sat. Aft., Jan. 7, at 2:30.

WPA—At the Federal Music Theatre, 254 W. 54—New York Civic Orchestra, Gordon conducting: Sun. Aft., Jan. 1, at 1:30. . . . Beethoven Series, Federal Symphony, Fiedler conducting: Sun. Eve., Jan. 1, at 8:45. . . . Concerto Series, Greenwich Orchestra and soloists, Plotnikoff conducting: Thurs. Eve., Jan. 5, at 8:45.

MUSIC

Democratized Music And Its Challenge

B. Trans. Dec. 24/38

Necessity for a Change in Attitude In the Wake of a Far Larger Public

By MOSES SMITH

A recent issue of Life called attention spectacularly to a phenomenon with which most of us have been familiar without quite clearly recognizing it—the enormous progress in the democratization of the art of music during the last 15 years. That process has been going on not only, as we have been glibly taking for granted, in the function of listening to music via the radio, but also in the study of music. The latter, which has been the more recent, has been presumably a result of the former. One of the implications has, I think, also been taken too readily for granted, namely that music is now mass entertainment (or anything else you want to call it) in the same way as baseball and football are, if perhaps not yet quite in the same degree. It is this new status and the effect it might reasonably have on our attitudes that I should like to examine here.

According to Life some 9,000,000 persons listen regularly on Sunday afternoon to the broadcast concerts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society. I am going to do a good deal of guessing in the course of this article, and I may as well begin now. I assume that that number should be greatly increased if we wish to arrive at the number of those who listen at frequent if not weekly intervals—say, every other week, or whenever they get the chance in a busy life. And I am sure that there are many millions who, hearing the Philharmonic programs only occasionally or in part, listen more frequently to programs of a lighter or more varied character but still containing much "good" music, like the Ford and Firestone hours, Magic Key and Radio City Music Hall. Then there are perhaps even greater millions whose principal preference is not orchestral music and who listen more gladly to the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts, vocal recitals and so forth.

* * *

I think I am not exaggerating the number of persons in this country who now listen to good music because they want to when I set it arbitrarily at 30,000,000. That is, one person in four likes to listen to music ranging, as the case may be, from Rachmaninov's C-sharp minor Prelude to the Bach B minor Mass of Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung," the music, in other words, that was the more or less exclusive possession of the audiences in concert-halls and opera houses a decade and a half ago. The phonograph in those days constituted, it is true, an additional medium. But most of the music then recorded, to say nothing about the overwhelming bulk of what was actually sold, would have difficulty in gaining admission to a serious concert.

Meanwhile what was the number of persons attending concerts or operatic performances at reasonably frequent intervals? Here my guess would have to be very wild, indeed. But it was a number measurable in thousands, at most in hundreds of thousands, certainly not in millions. To a certain extent the great difference is traceable to the inaccessibility of a large portion of the rural population to concert-hall and opera house. The radio performances, on the other hand, are got as easily in the fastness of the Rocky Mountains as at the corner of Seventh avenue and 57th street, New York city—more easily, as a matter of fact.

* * *

And so distance, more or less annihilated by the radio, does not begin to tell the whole tale. In order to "control" (as the scientists say) the problem, let us take an example more nearly approaching a constant—Boston, say. Forget relatively unimportant variations in population and set it roughly at 2,000,000 for the Metropolitan area. Of this number not more than 20,000 or 1 per cent, in my estimation, were or are anything like regular attendants in the concert-hall. For opera, such as we have, the percentage would have to be raised considerably but to nothing like the approximately 25 per cent at which I believe I conservatively estimate those in Metropolitan Boston who listen to the better music on the air.

Why don't these people inundate Symphony and Jordan Halls, overtaxing the capacities of such auditoriums so that concerts are given instead in the Arena and Boston Garden? Some of the reasons are easily given. It is more comfortable, less taxing to hear music in one's living-room than in a formal concert-hall. There is no effort or expense in getting there. Nor does it cost anything after you get it. You can get it any time, more or less; if not one program, then on another. You can come in late and leave early without disturbing anybody. You can smoke and, metaphorically or literally, take off your shoes. There are disadvantages, of course, such as are inescapable in connection with music reproduced by mechanical media. But they are evidently not sufficient (as yet, at least) to offset the obvious advantages, so far as most listeners are concerned.

* * *

I write "evidently," and there's the rub. Some of this huge, newly educated audience, we all know from personal experience, have found their way recently to the older temples of music-making. There would be untold thousands more, it seems to me, if music managers and promoters cultivated the new audience more intelligently. Instead they rely on tried and true methods of the old days, so that they are still "reaching" substantially the same small segment of the musical population, the 1 or 2 per cent instead of the 20 or 30 per cent. The concert is booked, then announced, then publicized through more or less dignified media, then the box-office waits for customers.

It was an effective procedure in the old days because it was based on a roughly homogeneous response from the new audience. Where it has been varied the new approach has not usually been part of a careful study of the changes demanded by the new society but a sort of frantic stop-gap to keep the concert audiences from falling in size; like the ever-increasing reliance on philanthropy as an excuse for getting people into the hall of music, a device which, however successful at the moment, is almost sure to be ruinous in the long run.

* * *

What have I to offer for a remedy? Nothing, because I am not in the concert business and because the function of the critic is not that of the physician. Besides, my own tribe and the newspaper profession generally have similar problems to solve, problems arising out of the same changes in society. I cannot pretend that we have solved them, and am even doubtful whether the existence of the problems is correctly appreciated. How many newspaper publishers and managing editors, for example, believe that one reader in four, is not only not frightened at the mention of "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky but is even likely to know how it sounds and enjoy it? How many music critics, even, realize that their potential public rivals that of the sporting editor in size and is not only a relative handful of persons who happen to have had cultural advantages that the critics themselves (let us hope!) enjoyed? How many are conscious of the fundamental difference, in thinking and values, that separates the generation that has grown up since 1920 from almost all the rest of us? How many correlate the fact that 20 years ago the American male who paid any attention whatever to symphonic music was essentially a freak, with the present condition when the craziest jitterbug is likely to spend much of his time and substance on phonograph records of the better music?

* * *

You may or may not like the democratization of music. It certainly has evil potentialities as well as good. On the whole, I am in favor of it. But like it or no, you can't stop it and you may as well decide to live with it sensibly. You must accept it as a fact just as our sensible fathers had to accept the industrial revolution as a fact.

Otherwise, you may as well agitate for the abolition of the belt system and the re-establishment of the home as a place where the family's clothing is made.

New Bedford Mercury

Anja Ignatius to Play Sibelius Violin Concerto

This evening, and Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 26 and 27, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second pair of concerts of the shorter series, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Anja Ignatius, the Finnish violinist making her first visit to this country, will be heard with the orchestra in the Concerto of Sibelius. Miss Ignatius, a pupil of Sevcik, comes with a wide and distinguished European reputation to commend her. The opening number on the program will be Paul Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, a recent score of the German composer which had its first performances hereabouts at the concerts of the past week. The concluding number will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Of the Monday evening series of six concerts and the paired Tuesday afternoons (known as the commuters' matinees and beginning at 3 p. m. rather than the customary Friday 2:30) the five remaining for monthly dates in December, January, February, March and April are still being offered at season rates.

Ready and Willing

RUDOLF SERKIN (Photo, Leon Elsin)

Assisting pianist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

PAGE EIGHT B

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1938

Serkin with Symphony; Argentir

Rudolf Serkin, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular Friday afternon and Saturday evening concerts at Symphony Hall this week. He will play the piano solo in the First Piano Concerto of Brahms.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 28 1938

Symphony Lecturer

—[Sage-Allen Photo.

HAROLD G. COLT JR.

The work of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be reviewed by Harold G. Colt Jr., at the fourth meeting of the symphony appreciation series conducted by the Music Lovers Club at the Hartford YMCA Thursday in Room 200 at 8 p. m. The Boston Symphony orchestra comes [illegible] Bushnell Memorial the following week and much interest is being shown in this preliminary interpretative presentation by Mr. Holt, according to Secretary C. Donald McKelvie of the YMCA. In view of this interest, the Music Lovers Club is extending an invitation to young men and young women, who would like to enhance their enjoyment by a better understanding of symphonic principles, to be guests of the club.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Dec. 31/38

ORCHESTRAS AND CHORUSES

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY—Barbirolli conducting: Carnegie Hall, Thurs. Eve., Dec. 29, at 8:45; Fri. Aft., Dec. 30, at 2:30; Sat. Eve., Dec. 31, at 8:45; Sun. Aft., Jan. 1; Wed. Eve., Jan. 4, at 8:45; Fri. Aft., Jan. 6, at 2:30; Sat. Eve., Jan. 7, at 8:45. (Soloists: Rachmaninoff, Dec. 29-30; Piastro, Dec. 31-Jan. 1; Bustabo, Jan. 7.)

RUTH HILDE SOMER—Pianist, assisted by an orchestra made up of members of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Schwieger conducting: Carnegie Hall, Fri. Eve., Dec. 30.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA—Ormandy conducting: Carnegie Hall, Tues. Eve., Jan. 3. (Soloist: Mischa Levitzki.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting: Car[illegible]Hall, Thurs. Eve., Jan. 5, at 8:45; Brooklyn Academy of Music, Fri. Eve., Jan. 6; Carnegie Hall, Sat. Aft., Jan. 7, at 2:30.

WPA—At the Federal Music Theatre, 254 W. 54—New York Civic Orchestra, Gordon conducting: Sun. Aft., Jan. 1, at 1:30. . . . Beethoven Series, Federal Symphony, Fiedler conducting: Sun. Eve., Jan. 1, at 8:45. . . . Concerto Series, Greenwich Orchestra and soloists, Plotnikoff conducting; Thurs. Eve., Jan. 5, at 8:45.

Finnish Violinist Is Overjoyed She's to Play With Symphony

B. Globe ANJA IGNATIUS Dec. 26/38

She traveled 4000 miles to give two concerts here

Anja Ignatius, Finnish violinist, who came here from Finland—a distance of some 4000 miles—to play in two concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is greatly excited about her American debut with Boston's famous musical organization this evening and tomorrow afternoon. But she can't help regretting being away from her two little girls and her husband on Christmas—the most important day of the year for the Finnish people.

The fair-haired young woman, however, beamed with delight as she discussed her forthcoming appearances during an interview shortly after her arrival in Boston yesterday afternoon to play the seldom heard Jean Sibelius' "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D Minor." It was her performance of this work for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at a private audition last Fall, that brought her the invitation to play here.

Anja Ignatius, who in private life is the wife of Veikko Hirvensalo, box factory manager in Rauma—a community of 9000 people on the West Coast of Finland, speaks English well. She modestly answered questions about her musical career—a career which has taken her to Paris, to Pisek in pre-Munich Czechoslovakia, and to Berlin for her instruction, and to Prague, Berlin, Stockholm, Belfast and all the Scandinavian countries as a soloist.

She became radiant as she told how Christmas is celebrated at home, but her joy became tinged with sadness as she tried to explain how difficult it was for her to be away from home during this holiday season. "I cried and cried and cried until I cried myself out," she said. "I finally became reconciled to the situation and I don't feel so badly about it now."

Her admiration for the orchestra and for Dr. Koussevitzky is eloquent.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the most important one, isn't it?" she says, as though there was no room for doubt, and adds that the orchestra is the best liked in Finland and that its recordings of fine music are the most popular. Then too she saw Dr. Koussevitzky conduct when she was studying in Paris as a young girl.

She also heard Richard Burgin, now concert-master of the Boston organization, play in Finland when she was a child. It is an interesting coincidence that Burgin is one of the few artists who has played the seldom heard violin concerto by the famous Sibelius, every one of whose seven symphonies, on the other hand, are performed by the Boston Symphony.

The Finnish violinist, who met Sibelius several times, said he has so many visitors at his "cheerful" villa on Lake Tuusula at Jarvenpaa, that lately his own daughters have been having difficulty in seeing him. Most of his visitors, she commented, are Americans.

Miss Ignatius has been referred to by Sibelius himself, in a letter received at Symphony Hall, as follows: "My conviction is that through her playing, Miss Ignatius will gain for herself and for her country honor and fame."

Dressed in a two-piece, tailored blue suit, the blond-haired young woman wore a red hat and carried a pocketbook of matching color. She had with her the precious Stradivarius, made in 1701, which the Helsingfors Conservatory has loaned her for the Boston concerts.

She was met upon her arrival by John B. Mattson, Finnish consul in Boston.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

DEC 31 1938

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orches-

ETC

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 31 1938

Boston Orchestra to Present J. M. Sanroma as Soloist Friday

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Or-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 31 1938

Next Friday evening, January 6, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give its second concert of the season at the Academy. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be soloist in Ravel's concerto for piano and orchestra. The remainder of the program will be devoted to Haydn's Symphony No. 102, in B Flat and the Brahms Fourth Symphony.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 31 1938

CONCERT NEXT FRIDAY BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky to Present Second of Series at Academy—Sanroma Is Soloist

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Brooklyn concert of the current season next Friday evening, 8:30 o'clock, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear as guest soloist in Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra. The remainder of the program will be devoted to Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat and Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn Committee. The orchestra will play, in all, five concerts this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Monitor – Dec. 27/38

For the second concert in the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky arranged a program comprising the Hindemith Symphonic Dances and the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, in C minor, Op. 67 for the purely orchestral items. The Sibelius Concerto in D minor, Op. 47 for Violin and Orchestra, served to introduce to a Boston audience Miss Anja Ignatius-Hirvensalo, who is making her American debut at this pair of concerts.

The Hindemith dances have recently been reviewed in this page. A second hearing again impressed the listener. This performance also more fully revealed the adept use of contrapuntal figures to point up a dance form. We again wished for visual as well as oral presentation, since the music is definitely of the dance. Dr. Koussevitzky last night gave an illuminating performance.

The Beethoven Symphony also received a revealing performance, and while on occasion there may have been slight over-emphasis in nuance, the work as a whole was played with customary virtuosity.

Miss Ignatius comes to America with the endorsement of the man whose work she played, and with that of Bruno Walter. Their confidence in her ability is well founded She has excellent technical equipment and a warmth of temperament which serves her well on the interpretative side. The concerto (the only one which Sibelius has composed for the violin) is not simple. Written in 1903, it has been heard here a number of times. Singularly enough, it was a woman (Maud Powell) who introduced it to patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It presents enormous technical difficulties, calling for great strength of wrist, bow-arm, and fingers. Miss Ignatius seemingly has everything by way of technical proficiency. There is little opportunity for the display of the essentially romantic, yet during the Adagio di molto the violinist summoned a full, deep tone with a well rounded vibrato.

As a display piece for her talents, the concerto served Miss Ignatius well, and at its conclusion she received a deserved ovation. Her performance lacked but one thing . . . complete steadiness . . . but there doubtless were contributing factors which placed her at a slight disadvantage. The orchestral accompaniment bristles with difficulties; the support lent the soloist last night did not in every degree meet the requirements of the work, although the performance was a brilliant one.

G. M. S.

MUSIC

B. Globe Dec. 27/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Anja Ignatius, young Finnish violinist, made her American debut at the Boston Symphony concert last night, as soloist in the Sibelius Concerto. The program for the second pair of concerts in the Monday-Tuesday series otherwise consisted of Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," introduced to Boston by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra last week, and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

Possessor of a sound technic, Miss Ignatius gave a musicianly, clean-cut performance of a work heard all too rarely, though it is certainly the most treasurable violin concerto since that of Brahms. Like the violin concertos of Brahms and Beethoven, this by Sibelius is no virtuoso show-piece but a great masterwork. Apart from technical difficulties, it demands from a soloist uncommon discernment if its distinctive qualities are to be brought out.

Miss Ignatius, generally speaking, played it intimately and subtly rather than with fire and boldness. If one listener continues to prefer a more forceful interpretation, that must be regarded simply as a matter of individual taste. Miss Ignatius was deservedly acclaimed, both by the audience and the musicians upon the stage.

Hindemith's tart, bracing "Symphonic Dances" sound even finer than they had at last Thursday's concert. Here is music unquestionably Teutonic in its strength and solidity, full of passion, substantial and admirably written even if it does not go very deep.

Conductor and orchestra collaborated in a thrilling but not impeccable performance of Beethoven's most familiar symphony. The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.—C. W. D.

MUSIC

B. Her. Dec. 27/38

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert of the Monray-Tuesday subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Anja Ignatius, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphonic Dances. . . . . .Hindemith
Violin Concerto in D minor Op. 47 Sibelius
Symphony No. 5 in C minor Op. 67 Beethoven

Once again and for the third time freely confessed in these columns the new Hindemith score impressed as independent and remarkable music. The composer has ideas to express and a comprehensive knowledge of how to set them forth in the idiom of the modern orchestra. The result cannot help but be interesting no matter how strange the composer's individual style may appear to be. Hindemith is an intellectual composer and to some extent must be listened to from that point of view. But the vigor of his sense of rhythm has an immediate appeal as well. The Symphonic Dances have a right to be considered as Hindemith's finest orchestral work, and at that we may for the time being leave them.

We had some reason to expect a more arresting performance of the Sibelius Concerto than that which Miss Ignatius offered last night. That she would have the requisite technical proficiency could be taken for granted, since no violinist in his right senses would attempt the Sibelius Concerto without it. But Miss Ignatius, even though a young Finnish artist making her first appearance in America, cast no intimate or searching light on this admirable work of her great compatriot.

It was, to be frank, a rather tame performance. Miss Ignatius's tone is somewhat thin and, with an occasional insecurity of attack, did not succeed in bringing out to the best either the brilliant or the lyrical qualities of the Concerto. The orchestral support, by contrast, had that vitality which was needed in the soloist's interpretation. An energetic and at the same time sonorous and poetic performance of the Beethoven 5th Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership concluded the concert.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 o'clock. The next pair in the series will occur in Symphony Hall Jan. 16 and 17. Georges Enesco will be the guest conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

DEC 31 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitzky, conductor, will make its second visit of the season to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening, January 5, and Saturday afternoon, January 7.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program Thursday evening with Vivaldi's Concerto for orchestra and organ in D minor, as edited by Alexander Siloti, and will give the first New York performance of Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances." The Fourth Symphony of Brahms, in E minor, which was performed at the afternoon concert of the orchestra's first New York visit, will conclude the program.

The program for Saturday will consist of Haydn's Symphony of the London series, in B flat, No. 102; Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedicaces" and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor.

Symphony Orchestra To Play in Costume

Monitor Dec. 30/38

At the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the Pension Fund, in Symphony Hall Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony will be played in a special stage setting with the Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky in eighteenth century costume. Serge Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," in which the various characters of the story are depicted by different instruments in the orchestra, will be given with Richard Hale as narrator.

The second part of the program will present the development of the waltz from the early Viennese days of Joseph Lanner to its symphonic elaboration. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Lanner's Waltzes "Die Schönbrunner"; Johan Strauss' "Vienna Blood," and "Voices of Spring"; the "Valse Triste" by Sibelius; and Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

Finnish Violinist Solos With Boston Symphony

Dec. 29/38

For Tuesday's commuters' matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was the largest patronage noted since the days of building up the audiences after the depression falling off. There were very few vacant seats. Unfortunately, one of those vacancies did not occur immediately in front of this easily distracted listener who had anticipated the Symphonic Dances of Hindemith, an always eagerly heard composer, personally, among the moderns. Not every elderly head bobber relishes the atonal harmonies, the percussion clashes, and stimulating rhythms of this German composer now working in England. It was all clearly expressed,solid and exciting—played with the precision Dr. Koussevitzky secures from his band of the finest. There was thrilling stress of brass, the emphasis of percussion, shot through with the virtuoso vibrancy of the Boston orchestra's incomparable strings. Relief came with occasional melodies of clarinet and flute—a vital music that it appeared Dr. Koussevitzky enjoyed while giving the utmost urge to its accentuations.

In contrast, there followed the D minor warmth in subdued delicacy of Sibelius' violin concerto with Anja Ignatius, a slender, girlish Scandinavian as soloist. Miss Ignatius' tone is small but perfect, and she played unassumingly the difficult composition with taxing chromatics and a wildness of final vigor. Indeed there was something barbaric in the last allegro. For the Adagio this orchestra was kept to sympathetic balance.

A performance of the Beethoven Fifth, engrossing in its perfections of reading and execution, banished any disappointment at being unable to give close attention to the Hindemith, which we hope to enjoy in more receptive atmosphere soon. The double basses fairly strained to acclaim exultation, the violin section seemed never so vibrantly real nor the horns so quietly significant, the woodwinds so sublimely contributing. The long lead into the final proclamation was taken with infinite taste in treatment. We like to ascribe Dr. Koussevitzky's lightly indicated "fate knocking at the door" and his encouragement of the exuberance that swept through choir after choir, to the influence of "the joyous season." If, as they charge, his readings vary from presentation to presentation, why not be amenable to the spirit of the occasion. Many minds have found many different explanations of the changing moods in this work.

A. C. R.

MUSIC

B. Trans. Dec. 30/38

News of Music

A "concert extraordinaire" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky for the benefit of its Pension Fund on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1. The program will begin with Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, to be performed in costume by both conductor and orchestral musicians. Prokofiev's Fairy Tale, "Peter and the Wolf," which was so well liked when first presented here last season under the composer's direction, will be given with Richard Hale again as the narrator. The second half of the program will traverse Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" Waltz; Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" Waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse triste" and Ravel's "La valse"—a fairly varied examination, so to say, of a peristent phenomenon.

With the Symphony Orchestra out of town next week, the next concerts at home will be in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, and in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Jan. 13; Saturday evening, Jan. 14; Monday evening, Jan. 16 and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 17. The conductor for all five occasions will be Georges Enesco. For the first three concerts the program will consist of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major, some recent and otherwise unidentified Roumanian music, and his own Second Rhapsody in D minor and First Symphony in E-flat. The program for the Monday and Tuesday concerts will include the Mozart and Roumanian pieces as above, Enesco's Second Orchestral Suite and his First "Roumanian" Rhapsody.

RADIO GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y. 114

DEC 31 1938

The March of Music

Edited by LEONARD LIEBLING

> ". . . An ampler Ether, > a diviner Air . . ."—Wordsworth

Germaine Bruyere, soprano with the New York Philharmonic, Sun.

Christmas in Heaven

SCENE—Elysium

TIME—The Present

A group of Immortals

Beethoven—"Gentlemen, let us offer praise to radio for its splendid devotion to our cause."

Bach—"Broadcasting certainly has put me on the map with the public."

Wagner—"They still prefer my operas to your fugues."

Bach—"Well, my oratorios are—"

Liszt—"Oratorios are out of fashion."

Handel—"Zat 'so?"

Liszt—"Aw, you and your 'Messiah'!"

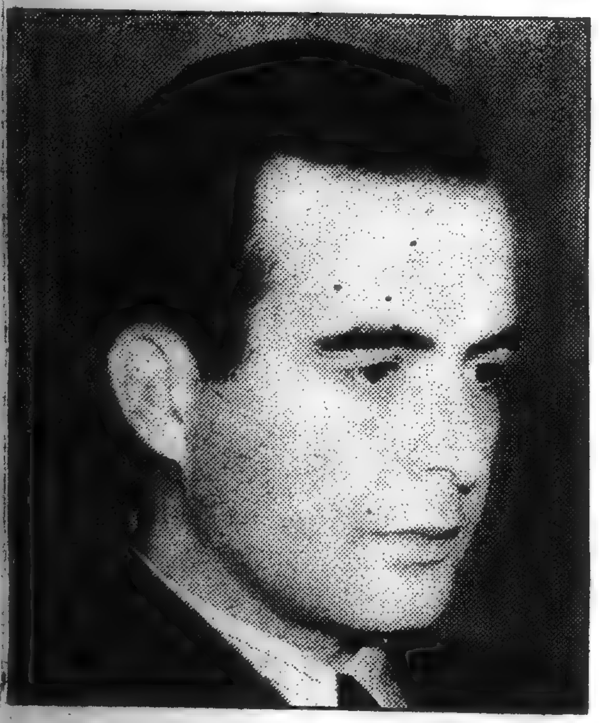
Handel—"Well, you and your 'Liebestraum'!"

Beethoven—"Friends, I beg you, peace and good-will here."

Brahms—"Radio made my symphonies familiar."

Mozart—"And it popularized my chamber music."

Tschaikowsky—"Yes, with Benny Goodman to help."



Samuel Barber, composer-baritone on Curtis Institute program, Mon.

Mozart—"It took you long enough to make Toscanini like your stuff."

Mendelssohn—"Everybody likes my 'Spring Song.'"

Schumann—"Hitler, please write."

Beethoven—"Gentlemen, I ask for silence. The Heavenly Choir is about to sing for us.

New Arrival—"Are they good?"

Beethoven (severely)—"Ha! A music critic!"

All—"Throw him out!"

Speaking Up

By V. V.

On the day after Christmas, the Metropolitan Opera House will be filled with stiffly starched little girls and freshly scrubbed little boys, sitting carefully on the edge of their seats, listening to their first opera, "Haensel and Gretel," the old Grimms' fairytale, with music by Humperdinck, of the sister and brother who get lost in the woods and are captured by the witch, serves many parents as their children's introduction to music. It is one of the few operas in which the characters don't all expire in a welter of blood at the end, and the music is light, melodious and easy to follow. Children love the second act scene when angels descend a golden staircase from Heaven; and the thrilling moment when Gretel rescues Haensel and pushes the witch into the roaring-hot oven.

Dorothee Manski's hair-raising performance of the big, bad witch draws shrieks of excitement from the young audience. Queena Mario, who recently announced her forthcoming retirement, plays Gretel, and Irene Jessner, Haensel.

Here it is Christmas, and we worrying about presents and the after-effects of too much turkey, and now, to add to our trials, comes the news that Samuel Barber, composer of the Adagio for Strings (premiered by Toscanini) is a baritone. What's more, he's prepared to prove it when he does a group of folk-songs and carols on the Curtis Institute program on Monday. Singing may be merely Mr. Barber's hobby, but it's our private suspicion that he yearns to star in an opera of his own composition. What with Toscanini turning composer and Barber involved with carols and Benny Goodman's adventures with the Budapest String Quartet, music certainly keeps us on the jump these days.

The next two excursions of the NBC Symphony Orchestra and Toscanini will be to Baltimore on December 27 and Boston on January 10.

Why is the Boston Symphony Orchestra the stepchild of radio? One of the best and oldest orchestras in the country, it is the least known on the air. Koussevitzky, its conductor, is rated by many as the equal of Toscanini.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 1 - 1939

Forum to Hear Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its annual appearance for the Philadelphia Forum on Wednesday evening in the Academy of Music.

The program will open with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ, as edited by Alexander Siloti. This will be followed by the Symphony No. 5 in E flat, Opus 82, by Jan Sibelius.

The second half of the program will be devoted to the Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67, of Beethoven.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 30 1938

Things we didn't know until this week department: Vladimir Dukelsky, whose "Dedicaces" was played earlier this month by Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra is none other than Vernon Duke, musical comedy composer. We don't know if the chicken or the egg came first but we're betting "agin" the "Duke."

Symphony Notes

The Middle West Offers A Composer New to Boston

Monitor

Gardner Read of Evanston comes to the symphony concerts with a suite for string orchestra

Dec. 29/38

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Gardner Read of Evanston, Ill., will be the companion of the Brahms of the D minor Piano Concerto and the Tchaikovsky of the Fourth Symphony at the symphony concerts of this week, when Dr. Koussevitzky introduces Read's Suite for string orchestra. A new composer to Boston, Mr. Read, born in 1913, has composed much music of both symphonic and chamber dimensions. His First Symphony, completed at the MacDowell Colony, Peterboro, N. H., in the summer of 1936, won first prize in a competition sponsored by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society. It was performed by that orchestra in 1937 and by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 1938.

Other performed works include a symphonic poem, "The Lotus Eaters," completed in 1932, and two symphonic suites, "Sketches of the City" and "The Painted Desert." The composer has written music for chamber orchestra, for harp, piano, and organ, as well as a Fantasy for viola and orchestra. He has studied at the National Music Camp at Interlochen, Mich., and at the Eastman School of Music, where he served as student conductor of the orchestra for three years, and learned much about the special technical possibilities of the instruments—a knowledge that is exhibited in the Suite for string orchestra.

Originally written in the form of a series of pieces for string quartet (Op. 33) the Suite was performed by the Gordon String Quartet at the Westminster Choir School on May 20, 1936. The first performance of the new version for string orchestra (Op. 33a)—which is changed only by the addition of doublebasses in reinforcement of the cellos, and the assignment of the solo parts to whole groups of instruments—was given by the Columbia Concert Orchestra in WABC Studios, New York, on Aug. 5, 1937. The work was also given during the music festival at Saratoga Springs in the same year.

The Suite falls into a four-movement scheme with a "Scherzetto," a Sarabande, and a Rondo succeeding the slow first movement, which bears the title of "Prelude." The movements are brief, lyric, and unburdened with development of the melodic ideas, which are allowed to stand forth in contrasted relief. Simple song forms suffice. The Prelude has a chromatic theme which constantly entangles and disentangles itself as the voices of the string choir toy with it. There is a climax in the middle section, and a return to the serenity of the opening. The "Scherzetto" is rhythmic and fanciful, with a contrasted section based on its principal motive. The Sarabande and the Rondo are brief, the former with but one theme, the latter with several that hardly are allowed time to state themselves before being tumbled over by the insistent main subject. The tempo indication contains the words "quasi burleska."

G. H. L. S.

Rudolf Serkin

Piano soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at the week-end concerts.

11

Symphony Concert

Serkin as a Remarkable Soloist, And a Surprise from Gardner Read

B. Trans — By MOSES SMITH — Dec. 29/38

Some generalizations come easy and die hard. The present fashion hereabouts, with which I have no wish to quarrel, is to the effect that soloists at a symphony concert are at best a necessary evil. Along comes a Jascha Heifetz and presents a masterpiece like the Beethoven Violin Concerto, as he did last week, in such a way as to remind you that great composers have often found it necessary to set a soloist against a group to achieve a particular kind of expression. Lest you think that the case is exceptional, along comes Rudolf Serkin for this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and reinforces the point with his overwhelming performance of the First Piano Concerto of Brahms, as he did yesterday afternoon before an engrossed audience in Symphony Hall.

Another easy generalization is that chamber music and orchestral music and virtuoso music are different kinds of art; and from this generalization comes the ready corrolary that a performer who is proficient in one type is insensitive to another. What we are likely to forget, here again, is that most of the greatest composers of the last three centuries have each sought utterance in varied media. And along comes a pianist like Serkin to show that performers, too, need not be limited to a single category in order to achieve characteristic expression.

* * *

In his only previous appearances in Boston Serkin last year traversed with Adolf Busch in superlative fashion the violin-piano sonatas of Beethoven, music predominatingly of an intimate cast, requiring the most fine-grained intensity, both intellectual and emotional, for best performance. Yesterday he played the exuberant, heroic sections of the Brahms Concerto with a gusto and propulsive ardor that one expects from no "mere" chamber-music-player; played it in the so-called grand tradition that only a rew remaining pianists are now supposed to possess. It goes almost without saying that in the intimate measures of the slow movement Serkin was very much at home.

Here was virtuoso playing of the first order. Serkin dominated the performance, as a great virtuoso should. But there was no suggestion of virtuosity for its own sake. It was a case of virtuosity as the very essence of the music; a case of the composer's setting a heroic individual protagonist against a forceful orchestra. At no stage did it occur to the listener to regard Serkin as a virtuoso in the commoner, baser meaning of that word. As in the case of the Beethoven sonatas last year, he was inside the music all the time, more inside it, one hazards, than any other pianist of our generation could be. He has an enormous technic and apparently an enormous knowledge of music. It would be a compliment, in the usual run of reporting such things, to write that Serkin uses them both merely as tools of expression. But it is rather the case with this extraordinary artist that the tools and the substance of expression are indistinguishable.

* * *

After such a performance, with the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky abetting wonderfully in the recreation of a difficult, puzzling work, even the most dramatic and characteristic Bostonian performance of the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky could not but be an anticlimax. Obviously, the conductor had made one of his rare miscalculations in program-building. It would have been better to follow the procedure of last week (rare in Boston, though not elsewhere) by ending with the Concerto; and to have set before the intermission a piece less taxing on the listener and shorter as well—since the program was too long anyhow.

* * *

There was a surprise at the beginning of the concert, too, in the shape of Gardner Read's Suite for string orchestra. It is a beautiful work by an American composer who was not more than twenty-three when he wrote it (and who is only now approaching his twenty-sixth birthday anniversary). Originally a string quartet, which has been substantially unchanged for the massed strings, it has four movements, labelled successively Prelude, Scherzetto, Sarabande and Rondo. Th

hibit, at least on the surface, a wide variety of expression, from a dream-world, Tristanish, Maeterlinckian kind of fantasy in the Prelude through a quasi-sardonic humor in the second movement and again a more lyrical note in the third to the nearest approach to contemporary utterance in the last.

For while I have written that this Suite is a beautiful work, indicating an exceptional talent among young American composers, I hope Mr. Read is not following it as a model for his later compositions. The Suite speaks an old language (perhaps several languages), good in its day but now, alas! outmoded. Being a composer of talent, Mr. Read did not repeat ideas literally along with the language. He traced in the Suite something of his own physiognomy—and clearly he has one. But he must have a good deal to say that he has not said in this Suite. For he grew up with the roar of airplane motors and propellers in his ears while Wagner and Debussy (to cite his two most obvious recollections here) heard only the more leisurely puffing of the steam-engine.

* * *

The performance of the Suite by the Bostonian strings was remarkably fine. And before signing off I must mention that in the other two numbers of the program the orchestra played not only with its familiar virtuosity and opulence of tone but also, as it seemed, with an unwonted definition among the separate instruments.

MUSIC AND

B. Globe Dec. 1938

Enesco Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony

Georges Enesco, the famous Rumanian violinist, composer and conductor, will again be guest leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will appear at the following concerts: Thursday evening, Jan. 12, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge; Friday and Saturday, Jan. 13 and 14, and Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 16 and 17, in Symphony Hall.

The program for the first three will assemble Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony; Mr. Enesco's own Second Rhapsody, in D minor, and his First Symphony, in E-flat, and other new Rumanian music which he has brought from Europe. For the Monday and Tuesday concerts, Mr. Enesco has scheduled the "Haffner" Symphony, new Rumanian pieces, and his Second Orchestral Suite and First Rumanian Rhapsody. The last two works were conducted here by Mr. Enesco last season.

There are no Symphony Hall concerts this week. The orchestra is making the second visit of the season to New York and other cities.

A "Concert Extraordinaire" for the benefit of the Boston Symphony pension fund for retired members of the orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall Wednesday, Feb. 1. The program will include Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, to be performed in costumes of Haydn's time, and Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale assuming the spoken part of the Narrator. The second half of the evening will be devoted to "The Waltz," as represented by Joseph Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes, the "Wiener Blut" and "Fruhlingstimmen" of Johann Strauss, Jr., "Valse Triste," by Sibelius, and Ravel's "La Valse."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. A somewhat similar concert was given by him and the orchestra, for charity, in April, 1934.

An admirable innovation has appeared in the Boston Symphony program books. Where formerly the roster of players was printed, there is now a diagram of the orchestra's seating plan, with the name of each artist, his instrument and his exact location neatly set forth.

SERKIN AS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Plays Brahms' Firs Concerto for Violin and Orchestra

Post Dec 31

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Ever since Rudolf Serkin made his Boston debut last winter, as pianist with Adolf Busch in a series of three concerts devoted to the violin sonatas of Beethoven, there had been a widespread desire to hear him both with orchestra and in solo recital. The first half of this wish was—and will be—granted yesterday afternoon and this evening at the 11th pair of symphony concerts. As was to be expected, on his first visit to Symphony Hall Mr. Serkin came and conquered.

HEARD IN BRAHMS

Already we of Boston had taken Mr. Serkin's measure as interpreter of the music of Beethoven and had found him nowhere wanting. Now, by token of his playing yesterday afternoon of the D minor Concerto, we realize that he can disclose no less completely that of Brahms. In a concert otherwise given over to an agreeable but inconsequential novelty, Gardner Read's Suite for String Orchestra, and an over-familiar symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth, this central item on the programme naturally took precedence over the rest. Indeed, when the remaining 13 pairs of concerts have passed into history the performance of this Concerto, on the part of Mr. Serkin, of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra is certain to stand out as a high light of this 58th season.

Were Mr. Serkin avid only of a popular success he could have achieved that desirable and also indispensable commodity more readily and easily with any one of a dozen other concertos. By choosing that which must be considered the most serious of them all he would have proved to us, had we not already known it, that he is a serious artist, a musician before he is a virtuoso; although in the latter role we have rarely encountered his equal.

In Strains of Sentiment

Every year, every day almost, it seems stranger that the music of Brahms could ever have invited the adjective "granitic" which Philip Hale so loved to bestow upon it. Even in this First Concerto, generally conceded to be the most hard-headed of his orchestral works, Brahms harps overmuch upon the "espressivo" string. Thus yesterday's audience had abundant opportunity to hear Mr. Serkin in music of sentiment, if the word is not too unkind. But there was also, in the first movement, demonic energy and force and in the last, with its rather labored gaiety, enough of brilliance to provoke the sort of furore that, after all, only brilliance can provoke.

Happily, we have not heard the last of Mr. Serkin, even for this season. He will return to Jordan Hall for another sonata recital with Father-in-law Busch and to Symphony Hall for a recital of his own. Concert-going is not so exciting an experience these days that a new pianistic sensation can be lightly regarded.

Gardner Read's Suite

To return to Mr. Read's Suite, yesterday's programme notes vouchsafed the information that the work was designed as a string quartet and first played in that form in the spring of 1936, when its composer had just turned 23.

It reveals him as more enamored of the gentler ways of Ravel and Debussy than of the asperities of Stravinsky, which so long have attracted our younger music makers. The first of the four movements has "mood," something rarely found in contemporary music. The second, called a Scherzetto, is the most original. The third, a Sarabande, leans most heavily upon the French impressionists afore mentioned. The fourth, and weakest, has, in point of fact, its passing reference to "Le Sacre." A pleasant, if highly unimportant composition, the Suite was liked by the audience.

MUSIC

B. Her. Dec. 31/38

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 11th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Suite for String Orchestra, Op. 33a...Read
Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15 Brahms
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 Tchaikovsky

Far and away the most important aspect of yesterday's concert was the performance of the Brahms Concerto. The First is certainly less popular than the Second Piano Concerto or the Violin Concerto. Doubtless this is due to the somber nature of the work, the tragic emotion aroused in the composer by the attempted suicide of Schumann. Some people are also put off by the seriousness and vastness of Brahms' design in concerto form. His concertos are the greatest since Beethoven and the only ones to follow his lead and not the slighter, though very attractive, form established by Mendelssohn. Brahms' concertos are quite as exalted music as his symphonies.

An audience is not always prepared for this and is perhaps inclined to regard all concertos as pieces for display. A great interpreter is need to steep himself in this music so thoroughly that its magnificent proportions may be made to emerge clearly in performance. We knew from the Beethoven Violin and Piano Sonata series here last season how fine an artist Mr. Serkin was. His splendid reading of the Brahms Concerto proved in addition that he could tackle even the largest and most difficult forms and maintain his integrity and sensitiveness as an artist.

His playing was marked by the greatest rhythmic vitality. The line never for an instant wavered. He had intensity without nervousness, brilliance without theatricality. It would not, of course, have been a great performance had not the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky balanced the soloist in every way. As it was, we have good reason to remember this concert for a long time to come.

Gardner Read appears to be a young composer of promise. He won the Philharmonic prize for his first symphony, and this was also played last February in Chicago. This Suite for Strings did not seem, however, to be a very promising work. Mr. Read had most to say in the Prelude, though even here the composer did not take a firm line about saying it. The scherzetto wobbled without wit, and neither sarabande nor rondo achieved at any time the best level of the prelude. The Suite might easily have at first consisted of a few good jottings of ideas and then worked out willy-nilly with the result that there was more cement than bricks.

The Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony contains all the elements which those who don't like Tchaikovsky dislike in him most. It may have been this symphony (though not the scherzo) that made the English novelist, J. B. Priestey, want to "knock him over the head with a stout fugue." After the Brahms, the Symphony seemed more superficial, more vulgar and more hackneyed than ever. It charms are all on the surface and nowadays can be appreciated by anyone the first time he hears it. At the 20th or 40th time...well, after a glorious performance such carrying is very like biting the hand that feeds one. Orchestral virtuosity can be just as exciting as any other kind. It is only that there are moods when it is welcome and moods, particularly when one has just been impressed by a work like the Brahms First Concerto, when it emphatically is not!

The concert will be reported tonight. The orchestra will visit Philadelphia and New York next week. The concerts of Jan. 13 and 14 will be conducted by Georges Enesco, distinguished Roumanian composer and violinist.

MUSIC

B. Globe Dec. 31/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Rudolf Serkin played for the first time as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, in an extraordinarily fine performance of Brahms' D minor Piano Concerto. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began the program with music new to Boston, the Suite for String Orchestra, Op. 33a, by the young American composer, Gardner Read, and ended it with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

By virtue of his Beethoven sonata recitals with Adolf Busch here last Winter Mr. Serkin's technical virtuosity and his re-creative artistry were already known to Bostonians. Yet his interpretation of Brahms' mighty concerto—surely one of the grandest works ever conceived—was a revelation. Perhaps no piano can speak loudly enough to make the main theme of the first movement as majestic as Brahms likely intended it to sound. Therefore most pianists crack down upon a keyboard with all the force they can muster. Sometimes that serves well enough. More often it seems just what it is—old-fashioned pounding.

Not so Mr. Serkin. An artist of the highest rank, he has obviously planned his interpretation upon a different scale, one that never for a moment attempts to force the piano into a dynamic competition with the orchestra. For him the inward character of the music is most important. Grandeur, majesty, passion and fire are all to be found at one time or another, but expressed within the capabilities of the instrument.

Mr. Serkin's individual treatment, accompanied by irreproachable style, rightfully emphasizes the romantic side of the concerto. Incidentally he has assisted in the ultimate demolition of an old belief, persisting in some quarters, that early Brahms is solid rock.

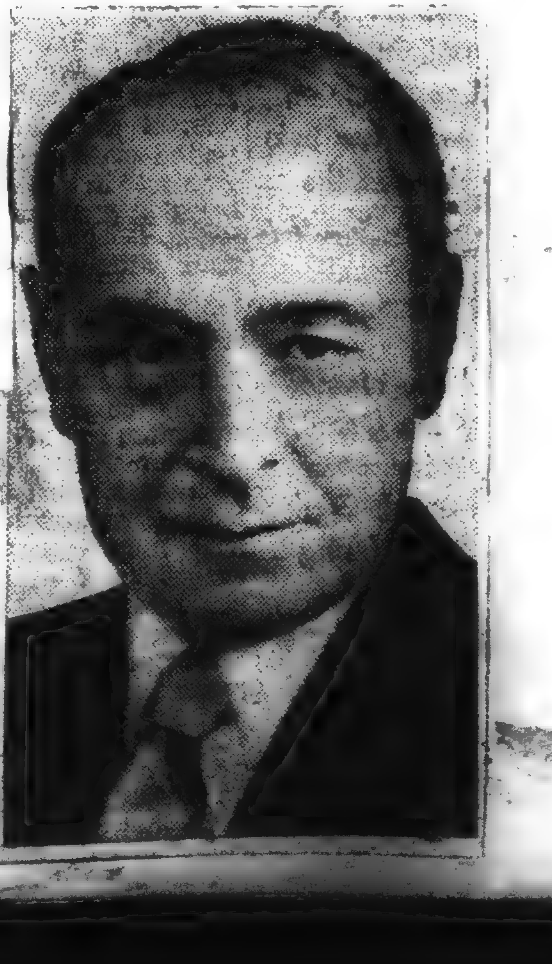
Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were excellent collaborators in a performance of unflawed beauty. While the soloist achieved a personal triumph, as the unusually warm applause of the Friday audience showed, conductor and players were duly included in the reception.

Mr. Read's Suite is expansive in mood and agreeable to hear. Written first as a string quartet, it was put to the uses of massed strings, according to the program book, without change in the notation except that the cellos have been reinforced at certain points by the heavier-toned double-basses. This testifies to Mr. Read's clever scoring, since music for small ensembles cannot always be played by larger groups without a thickening of the texture. Otherwise, the Suite is not remarkable. Its ideas are not distinctive, and they are expressed in a derivative style.

C. W. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

DEC 31 1938



Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and the following Saturday afternoon.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American

JAN 1 - 1939

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening, performing a program of pieces by Haydn, Brahms and Ravel.

Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the solo pianist in the Ravel Concerto.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 1 - 1939

Thursday

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ....Vivaldi
Symphonic Dances....Hindemith
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 28. Brahms

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony to Give Second Concert on Friday

Society to Occupy Boxes at Orchestra's Second Appearance in Brooklyn This Season—Program Promises to Be Interesting and Varied One

Society will occupy the boxes Friday evening at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music. Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson of Fort Hamilton and their party will be in the Army-Navy box. Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Adelphi Academy and the Brooklyn Woman's Club are those who have the other boxes and will entertain guests. The Brooklyn Committee's box is being used this season for students who are leaders and players in high school orchestras in Brooklyn and Queens.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra which is appearing for its 53d season in Brooklyn, will offer as the program: Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat, Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor Opus 98 and the Ravel Concerto.

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

DEC 29 1938

Finnish Violinist Solos With Boston Symphony

For Tuesday's commuters' matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was the largest patronage noted since the days of building up the audiences after the depression falling off. There were very few vacant seats. Unfortunately, one of those vacancies did not occur immediately in front of this easily distracted listener who had anticipated the Symphonic Dances of Hindemith, an always eagerly heard composer, personally, among the moderns. Not every elderly head bobber relishes the atonal harmonies, the percussion clashes, and stimulating rhythms of this German composer now working in England. It was all clearly expressed,solid and exciting—played with the precision Dr. Koussevitzky secures from his band of the finest. There was thrilling stress of brass, the emphasis of percussion, shot through with the virtuoso vibrancy of the Boston orchestra's incomparable strings. Relief came with occasional melodies of clarinet and flute—a vital music that it appeared Dr. Koussevitzky enjoyed while giving the utmost urge to its accentuations.

In contrast, there followed the D minor warmth in subdued delicacy of Sibelius' violin concerto with Anja Ignatius, a slender, girlish Scandinavian as soloist. Miss Ignatius' tone is small but perfect, and she played unassumingly the difficult composition with taxing chromatics and a wildness of final vigor. Indeed there was something barbaric in the last allegro. For the Adagio this orchestra was kept to sympathetic balance.

A performance of the Beethoven Fifth, engrossing in its perfections of reading and execution, banished any disappointment at being unable to give close attention to the Hindemith, which we hope to enjoy in more receptive atmosphere soon. The double basses fairly strained to acclaim exultation, the violin section seemed never so vibrantly real nor the horns so quietly significant, the woodwinds so sublimely contributing. The long lead into the final proclamation was taken with infinite taste in treatment. We like to ascribe Dr. Koussevitzky's lightly indicated "fate knocking at the door" and his encouragement of the exuberance that swept through choir after choir, to the influence of "the joyous season." If, as they charge, his readings vary from presentation to presentation, why not be amenable to the spirit of the occasion. Many minds have found many different explanations of the changing moods in this work.

A. C. R.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 1 - 1939

Introducing La Argentinita

Program of Songs and Dances of Her Native Spain at the Academy of Music Tuesday—Boston Symphony to Give Second Brooklyn Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Brooklyn concert of the current season next Friday evening, Jan. 6, at 8:30 o'clock, at the Academy of Music.

Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear as guest soloist in Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra. The remainder of the program will be devoted to Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat and Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 5 - 1939

WORDS AND MUSIC

All-Schubert Program Given by Philharmonic

But Mr. Barbirolli Omits the 'Unfinished' —Frank Sheridan Plays Series' Finale

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Mr. Barbirolli devoted last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert to the works of Schubert, playing the five German dances for strings and the fourth and seventh symphonies of that master. Since Schubert was born on January 31 and died November 19, the program had no sentimental implications except those which bind us at any time to the works of the great melodist.

The absence of the "Unfinished" symphony from Mr. Barbirolli's list left out the most original of Schubert's instrumental works. The B minor symphony owes nothing to Schubert's predecessors and contemporaries which is more than can be said of the great C major symphony. However, Mr. Barbirolli's choice of music was a pretty illuminating selection. The C major symphony, though less original than the B minor, gives us the full-throated Schubert, who spills music, as Shelley spilled poetry in "Prometheus Unbound," like wine.

I wonder if anybody still thinks that the C major symphony is overlong. Beethoven was undoubtedly less prodigal with his material than Schubert. Yet isn't there something in the material Schubert chose which is the foe of economy? Beethoven's themes are mere suggestions, while Schubert's are full-blown and self-sufficient. Schubert proves that one cannot have too much of a really good thing, and the C-major symphony could have been twice as long without exhausting the surprise and pleasure of the listener. Whenever the symphony does seem long, it is only because its interpreter clamps down the breaks on the natural flow of the music.

The Philharmonic's Thursday subscribers (who become Wednesday subscribers when the Boston Symphony is in town) seemed delighted with an all-Schubert program and with Mr. Barbirolli's interpretation of the two symphonies and the charming German dances.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 31 1938

Festival Was

Opening of Music "Shed" Attracted Large Audience

Other Outstanding Events Included 20th Anniversary Chamber Music Festival on South Mountain

Once again the Berkshire Symphonic Festiva ered by many to be the most important cultural de in Berkshire County's recent history, heads the county looks back on its cultural program of 1938

38,000 at Festival

The opening of the Festival's impressive new home, a high-vaulted outdoor auditorium modestly dubbed a "shed," drew 38,000 music lovers from all parts of the country for the six concerts by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The success, both architecturally and acoustically, of the shed; the large attendance and the excellence of the music, combined to add luster to the Festival's already international reputation. Hence, quantitatively and qualitatively, the five-year-old Festival outstripped all comers, young and old, as 1938's most significant event in the cultural field.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

DEC 29 1938

A SNAPP of MUSIQUE

Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, Op. 82, in E-flat Major, has been recorded for Victor (album 474) by the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting; so, if you like Sibelius, or want to know more about his music, this is the album for you. No as been neglected. No ment of the scoring has ored. Great orchestras, at conductors, play fine way it should be played. rding will rid you of the you have it, that Sibelius astringent and incompre-

Boston "Pops" Orchestra, iedler conducting, plays the Three Cornered Hat" suite Falla's ballet (Victor album id plays it with spirit and a Harris plays the Busoni iption of the Bach violin ne (Victor album 506), but tretches of the playing are nd the result isn't what one ds from this composition.

Berlin Philharmonic, under uidance of Wilhelm Furtwan- plays Beethoven's Fifth Sym- y (Victor album 426) in just way to make you forget that maybe you have had enough of the Fifth for a while.

It is Casals (of all musicians) who will disturb you. He has recorded Boccherini's B-flat Major Cello Concerto with the London Symphony, Sid Landon Ronald conducting, and, if Casals can be said to play badly, he does so here. Anyway, it is too great a lessening of a high standard (Victor album 381).

As for single records, all from Victor: Toscanini and the B. B. C. Symphony Orchestra record the Overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the recording is extra-special (15190). Yella Pessl, the harpsichordist, plays a George Bohm Partita, based on an area, "Jesu, du bist allzu schoene," and plays "handsomely" (1938). And Marian Anderson, who is coming to town shortly, sings Bach's "Come, Sweet Dea[illegible]," and a Handel Siciliana with that perfection which is hers (1939).

W. W.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 1 - 1939

THE ORCHESTRAS

JOHN BARBIROLLI will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in its first 1939 concert this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, where the latter part of the program will be devoted to music of Johann Strauss. Mishel Piastro, concertmaster of the orchestra, will again be heard in Glazounoff's violin concerto in A minor, and the overture to Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra" and Schubert's fifth symphony, in B flat, will also precede the intermission.

Mr. Barbirolli's program for next Wednesday night (instead of Thursday) and Friday afternoon will consist entirely of Schubert's music, including five German Dances for strings, the "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4, and the last symphony, in C, which is the seventh in order of publication, although not in the order of composition. The "Tragic" symphony was last played by this orchestra on February 7 and 8, 1935, with Werner Janssen conducting. The German Dances, which, according to their title in the Breitkopf and Haertel edition, include a coda and seven trios, were played by the Symphony Society of New York under Otto Klemperer on March 4, 1927.

Guila Bustabo, young American violinist, who made her first tour of Australia last summer, will be the soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, January 7 and 8, playing the Sibelius concerto. The preludes and entr'actes from Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande," which Mr. Barbirolli introduced to the Philharmonic repertoire on December 8 and 9, will be repeated by request in these two concerts.

Bostonians Play Novelties

In its second evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall next Thursday the Boston Symphony Orchestra, und[illegible]ussevitzky's direction, will give the first performance here of Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances" for full orchestra. The program also includes Vivaldi's organ concerto in D minor, as edited by Alexander Siloti, and Brahms's fourth symphony. "Dédicaces," by Vladimir Dukelsky, for piano and orchestra with soprano obligato, will have its New York premiere on Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Saturday afternoon in a program completed by Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony. Jesus Maria Sanroma, who will be the [illegible] the Dukelsky work, will also appear with the Boston Symphony in its concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday night, playing the Ravel concerto. Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Haydn's 102d and Brahms's fourth symphonies.

Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," according to John N. Burk's Boston Symphony program notes, were composed in 1937. The work was originally planned as a ballet for Leonide Massine, but, after it had been decided that the subject of the ballet should be St. Francis of Assisi, Hindemith converted his sketches into a symphonic work, completing the score, in four movements, in the autumn. He conducted the first performance in London on December 3, 1937, and also the American premiere by the Chicago Symphony on March 3, 1938. Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the first performances in Boston on December 22, 23 and 26. Meanwhile Hindemith wrote a new score for the ballet which, known abroad as "Nobilissima Visione" and here as "St. Francis," was presented here by the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe last October.

Dukelsky's work, based on a text by Guillaume Apollinaire, was first performed in Boston on December 16 and 17. The composer, according to Mr. Burke, has likened the work to "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph" and added that it is "in no way descriptive. Apollinaire breathlessly describes those features of his existence in the city, the country, and on the water that startled or touched him most. Thus the soprano becomes the narrator, while the solo pianist could perhaps be likened (this time literally) to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra."

There are four movements: "L'Envoi," in which the soprano (Marguerite Porter) sings the full text to a light orchestral accompaniment; "To the City," "To the Country" and "To the Sea," an epilogue in which the last few lines of the verse are sung softly at the close.

Eugene Ormandy will conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra in a special concert in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday night, with Mischa Levitzki as soloist in Saint-Saens's second piano concerto in G minor. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony are the other announced numbers. This concert is a part of S. Hurok's [illegible] subscription series. The next concert in the orchestra's regular series will be held at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night, January 24.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

DEC 31 1938

In Phila. Concert

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Plays for Forum

Koussevitzky Will Present Program at Academy Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its annual Philadelphia appearance for the Philadelphia Forum on Wednesday evening, January 4.

Mr. Koussevitzky is universally regarded as one of the foremost interpreters of Sibelius and Beethoven.

The program will be:

Vivaldi—
Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ
(Edited by Alexander Siloti)
- I. Maestoso
- II. Largo
- III. Allegro

Sibelius—
Symphony No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 82
- I. Tempo molto moderato; Allegro moderato
- II. Andante Mosso, quassi allegretto
- III. Allegro molto; Un pochettino largamento

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, Opus 67
- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Allegro; Trio
- IV. Allegro

DETROIT, MICH.
Jan NEWS 1/39

'Just as a Matter of Records'

LOOKING back over a portion of the year, this department is pleased to note that a lot of good things went in one ear and remained as permanent delights. It was a year of firsts. Toscanini made his record debut and Benny Goodman, famed in another field, tootled his clarinet in the classical manner and earned a fine feather for his cap. It was a year of opera. Two full-length music dramas, both uncut, were recorded for fireside listening.

So, being pleased with the past and anticipating what may come, one sets down somewhat haphazardly that which has been of special moment. Let this be a reminder to listen, if you haven't, to: Victor's album of Strauss waltzes by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.

Decca's album of Strauss waltzes played for dancing.

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, by Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic, and the Fifth by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Prokofieff's Violin Concerto in G Minor, played by Jascha Heifetz with the assistance of the Boston Symphony.

Beethoven's Triple Concerto with Felix Weingartner conducting the Vienna Philharmonic.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 1 - 1939

116

Boston Symphony to Give Second Concert on Friday

Society to Occupy Boxes at Orchestra's Second Appearance in Brooklyn This Season—Program Promises to Be Interesting and Varied One

Society will occupy the boxes Friday evening at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music. Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson of Fort Hamilton and their party will be in the Army-Navy box. Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Adelphi Academy and the Brooklyn Woman's Club are those who have the other boxes and will entertain guests. The Brooklyn Committee's box is being used this season for students who are leaders and players in high school orchestras in Brooklyn and Queens.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra which is appearing for its 53d season in Brooklyn, will offer as the program: Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat, Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor Opus 98 and the Ravel Concerto.

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 1 - 1939

Introducing La Argentinita

Program of Songs and Dances of Her Native Spain at the Academy of Music Tuesday—Boston Symphony to Give Second Brooklyn Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Brooklyn concert of the current season next Friday evening, Jan. 6, at 8:30 o'clock, at the Academy of Music.

Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear as guest soloist in Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra. The remainder of the program will be devoted to Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat and Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
JAN 5 - 1939

WORDS AND MUSIC

All-Schubert Program Given by Philharmonic

But Mr. Barbirolli Omits the 'Unfinished' —Frank Sheridan Plays Series' Finale

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Mr. Barbirolli devoted last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert to the works of Schubert, playing the five German dances for strings and the fourth and seventh symphonies of that master. Since Schubert was born on January 31 and died November 19, the program had no sentimental implications except those which bind us at any time to the works of the great melodist.

The absence of the "Unfinished" symphony from Mr. Barbirolli's list left out the most original of Schubert's instrumental works. The B-minor symphony owes nothing to Schubert's predecessors and contemporaries which is more than can be said of the great C major symphony. However, Mr. Barbirolli's choice of music was a pretty illuminating selection. The C major symphony, though less original than the B minor, gives us the full-throated Schubert, who spills music, as Shelley spilled poetry in "Prometheus Unbound," like wine.

I wonder if anybody still thinks that the C major symphony is overlong. Beethoven was undoubtedly less prodigal with his material than Schubert. Yet isn't there something in the material Schubert chose which is the foe of economy? Beethoven's themes are mere suggestions, while Schubert's are full-blown and self-sufficient. Schubert proves that one cannot have too much of a really good thing, and the C-major symphony could have been twice as long without exhausting the surprise and pleasure of the listener. Whenever the symphony does seem long, it is only because its interpreter clamps down the breaks on the natural flow of the music.

The Philharmonic's Thursday subscribers (who become Wednesday subscribers when the Boston Symphony is in town) seemed delighted with an all-Schubert program and with Mr. Barbirolli's interpretation of the two symphonies and the charming German dances.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
DEC 29 1938

Finnish Violinist Solos With Boston Symphony

For Tuesday's commuters' matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was the largest patronage noted since the days of building up the audiences after the depression falling off. There were very few vacant seats. Unfortunately, one of those vacancies did not occur immediately in front of this easily distracted listener who had anticipated the Symphonic Dances of Hindemith, an always eagerly heard composer, personally, among the moderns. Not every elderly head bobber relishes the atonal harmonies, the percussion clashes, and stimulating rhythms of this German composer now working in England. It was all clearly expressed, solid and exciting—played with the precision Dr. Koussevitzky secures from his band of the finest. There was thrilling stress of brass, the emphasis of percussion, shot through with the virtuoso vibrancy of the Boston orchestra's incomparable strings. Relief came with occasional melodies of clarinet and flute—a vital music that it appeared Dr. Koussevitzky enjoyed while giving the utmost urge to its accentuations.

In contrast, there followed the D minor warmth in subdued delicacy of Sibelius' violin concerto with Anja Ignatius, a slender, girlish Scandinavian as soloist. Miss Ignatius' tone is small but perfect, and she played unassumingly the difficult composition with taxing chromatics and a wildness of final vigor. Indeed there was something barbaric in the last allegro. For the Adagio this orchestra was kept to sympathetic balance.

A performance of the Beethoven Fifth, engrossing in its perfections of reading and execution, banished any disappointment at being unable to give close attention to the Hindemith, which we hope to enjoy in more receptive atmosphere soon. The double basses fairly strained to acclaim exultation, the violin section seemed never so vibrantly real nor the horns so quietly significant, the woodwinds so sublimely contributing. The long lead into the final proclamation was taken with infinite taste in treatment. We like to ascribe Dr. Koussevitzky's lightly indicated "fate knocking at the door" and his encouragement of the exuberance that swept through choir after choir, to the influence of "the joyous season." If, as they charge, his readings vary from presentation to presentation, why not be amenable to the spirit of the occasion. Many minds have found many different explanations of the changing moods in this work.

A. C. R.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 31 1938

Festival

Opening of Music Attracted Large Au

Other Outstanding Event 20th Anniversary Chamb Festival on South Mount

Once again the Berkshire Sympho ered by many to be the most important in Berkshire County's recent history, h county looks back on its cultural progra

38,000 at Festival

The opening of the Festival's impressive new home, a high-vaulted outdoor auditorium modestly dubbed a "shed," drew 38,000 music lovers from all parts of the country for the six concerts by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The success, both architecturally and acoustically, of the shed; the large attendance and the excellence of the music, combined to add luster to the Festival's already international reputation. Hence, quantitatively and qualitatively, the five-year-old Festival outstripped all comers, young and old, as 1938's most significant event in the cultural field.

nc

Are

Clu

Club

onal

anter

Wi

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
DEC 29 1938

A SNAPP of MUSIQUE

Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, Op. 82, in E-flat Major, has been recorded for Victor (album 474) by the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting; so, if you like Sibelius, or want to know more about his music, this is the album for you. No nuance has been neglected. No single fragment of the scoring has been ignored. Great orchestras, under great conductors, play fine music the way it should be played. This recording will rid you of the notion, if you have it, that Sibelius is stark, astringent and incomprehensible.

The Boston "Pops" Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, plays the lively "Three Cornered Hat" suite from de Falla's ballet (Victor album 505), and plays it with spirit and humor.

Johana Harris plays the Busoni transcription of the Bach violin Chaconne (Victor album 506), but long stretches of the playing are arid, and the result isn't what one demands from this composition.

The Berlin Philharmonic, under the guidance of Wilhelm Furtwangler, plays Beethoven's Fifth Symphony (Victor album 426) in just the way to make you forget that maybe you have had enough of the Fifth for a while.

It is Casals (of all musicians) who will disturb you. He has recorded Boccherini's B-flat Major Cello Concerto with the London Symphony, Sid Landon Ronald conducting, and, if Casals can be said to play badly, he does so here. Anyway, it is too great a lessening of a high standard (Victor album 381).

As for single records, all from Victor: Toscanini and the B. B. C. Symphony Orchestra record the Overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the recording is extra-special (15190). Yella Pessl, the harpsichordist, plays a George Bohm Partita, based on an area, "Jesu, du bist allzu schoene," and plays "handsomely" (1938). And Marian Anderson, who is coming to town shortly, sings Bach's "Come, Sweet Death," and a Handel Siciliana with that perfection which is hers (1939).

W. W.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 1 - 1939

THE ORCHESTRAS

JOHN BARBIROLLI will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in its first 1939 concert this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, where the latter part of the program will be devoted to music of Johann Strauss. Mishel Piastro, concertmaster of the orchestra, will again be heard in Glazounoff's violin concerto in A minor, and the overture to Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra" and Schubert's fifth symphony, in B flat, will also precede the intermission.

Mr. Barbirolli's program for next Wednesday night (instead of Thursday) and Friday afternoon will consist entirely of Schubert's music, including five German Dances for strings, the "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4, and the last symphony, in C, which is the seventh in order of publication, although not in the order of composition. The "Tragic" symphony was last played by this orchestra on February 7 and 8, 1935, with Werner Janssen conducting. The German Dances, which, according to their title in the Breitkopf and Haertel edition, include a coda and seven trios, were played by the Symphony Society of New York under Otto Klemperer on March 4, 1927.

Guila Bustabo, young American violinist, who made her first tour of Australia last summer, will be the soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, January 7 and 8, playing the Sibelius concerto. The preludes and entr'actes from Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande," which Mr. Barbirolli introduced to the Philharmonic repertoire on December 8 and 9, will be repeated by request in these two concerts.

Bostonians Play Novelties

In its second evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall next Thursday the Boston Symphony Orchestra, und[redacted]ussevitzky's direction, will give the first performance here of Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances" for full orchestra. The program also includes Vivaldi's organ concerto in D minor, as edited by Alexander Siloti, and Brahms's fourth symphony. "Dédicaces," by Vladimir Dukelsky, for piano and orchestra with soprano obligato, will have its New York premiere on Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Saturday afternoon in a program completed by Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony. Jesus Maria Sanroma, who will be the [redacted] in the Dukelsky work, will also appear with the Boston Symphony in its concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday night, playing the Ravel concerto. Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Haydn's 102d and Brahms's fourth symphonies.

Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," according to John N. Burk's Boston Symphony program notes, were composed in 1937. The work was originally planned as a ballet for Leonide Massine, but, after it had been decided that the subject of the ballet should be St. Francis of Assisi, Hindemith converted his sketches into a symphonic work, completing the score, in four movements, in the autumn. He conducted the first performance in London on December 3, 1937, and also the American premiere by the Chicago Symphony on March 3, 1938. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first performances in Boston on December 22, 23 and 26. Meanwhile Hindemith wrote a new score for the ballet which, known abroad as "Nobilissima Visione" and here as "St. Francis," was presented here by the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe last October.

Dukelsky's work, based on a text by Guillaume Apollinaire, was first performed in Boston on December 16 and 17. The composer, according to Mr. Burke, has likened the work to "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph" and added that it is "in no way descriptive. Apollinaire breathlessly describes those features of his existence in the city, the country, and on the water that startled or touched him most. Thus the soprano becomes the narrator, while the solo pianist could perhaps be likened (this time literally) to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra."

There are four movements: "L'Envoi," in which the soprano (Marguerite Porter) sings the full text to a light orchestral accompaniment; "To the City," "To the Country" and "To the Sea," an epilogue in which the last few lines of the verse are sung softly at the close.

Eugene Ormandy will conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra in a special concert in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday night, with Mischa Levitzki as soloist in Saint-Saens's second piano concerto in G minor. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony are the other announced numbers. This concert is a part of S. Hurok's [illegible] subscription series. The next concert in the orchestra's regular series will be held at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night, January 24.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
DEC 31 1938

In Phila. Concert

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Plays for Forum

Koussevitzky Will Present Program at Academy Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its annual Philadelphia appearance for the Philadelphia Forum on Wednesday evening, January 4.

Mr. Koussevitzky is universally regarded as one of the foremost interpreters of Sibelius and Beethoven.

The program will be:

Vivaldi—
Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ
(Edited by Alexander Siloti)
- I. Maestoso
- II. Largo
- III. Allegro

Sibelius—
Symphony No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 82
- I. Tempo molto moderato; Allegro moderato
- II. Andante Mosso, quassi allegretto
- III. Allegro molto; Un pochettino largamento

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, Opus 67
- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Allegro; Trio
- IV. Allegro

DETROIT, MICH.
Jan NEWS 1/39

'Just as a Matter of Records

LOOKING back over a portion of the year, this department is pleased to note that a lot of good things went in one ear and remained as permanent delights. It was a year of firsts. Toscanini made his record debut and Benny Goodman, famed in another field, tootled his clarinet in the classical manner and earned a fine feather for his cap. It was a year of opera. Two full-length music dramas, both uncut, were recorded for fireside listening.

So, being pleased with the past and anticipating what may come, one sets down somewhat haphazardly that which has been of special moment. Let this be a reminder to listen, if you haven't, to: Victor's album of Strauss waltzes by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.

Decca's album of Strauss waltzes played for dancing.

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, by Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic, and the Fifth by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Prokofieff's Violin Concerto in G Minor, played by Jascha Heifetz with the assistance of the Boston Symphony.

Beethoven's Triple Concerto with Felix Weingarther conducting the Vienna Philharmonic.

The Old Year in Music

ra and Concert Highlights of the City in 1938—Death's Heavy Toll.

N.Y. Sun By OSCAR THOMPSON. Dec. 1938

Musicians and music lovers ordinarily think in terms of seasons, not years. Many an error has found its way into print because of a confusion of the two designations. The Metropolitan's revival of Strauss's "Elektra" with Rose Pauly in the title role belonged to last season, though given in 1938. Next week's "Don Giovanni" belongs to this season, though not to this year.

And since today ends not a season but a year, the backward vista that presents itself with the passing of 1938 includes parts of two seasons. The year began at the Metropolitan with "Don Giovanni" in the afternoon and "Il Trovatore" at night. It ends today witn the performances of "Fidelio" and "Otello" and with orchestral concerts by both Philharmonic and the NBC Symphony.

Early last January came the London Intimate Opera Company, a two-man and one-woman troupe that gave interesting performances of works by Dibkin, Carey, Dr. Arne, Purcell and others. During the first week of the year the Metropolitan staged its "Elektra" revival and Miss Pauly had her triumph. Other operatic events of the month included the debut of the vest-pocket tenor, Bruno Landi, in "Rigoletto." Shortly thereafter Grace Moore returned to the fold to sing Mimi in "La Boheme," with "Manon" following almost immediately. Erich Leinsdorf made his debut as a conductor with "Walkuere" on January 21. On the next day came the revival of Rossini's "Barber of Seville," with John Charles Thomas shaving the mordente. The Juilliard School was the scene of the premiere (January 19) of the Erskine-Rubinstein opera, "The Sleeping Beauty," a work which quite justified its title.

Some Choral Novelties.

In the symphonic sphere, Georges Enesco took over the leadership of the Philharmonic Symphony while John Barbirolli enjoyed a holiday. Toscanini added the Sibelius Second Symphony to his repertory. Benny Goodman invaded Carnegie Hall. Jussi Bjoerling was a song recitalist and Gertrude Pitzinger challenged attention as something new among contraltos. The year had a stanch beginning chorally. The Helsinki University choir, conducted by Martti Turunen, introduced Sibelius's "Origin of Fire." The Schola Cantorum, conducted by Hugh Ross, gave on January 12 the American premiere of Delius's "Mass of Life" and the world premiere of Dukelsky's "The End of St. Petersburg." The pianist Brailowsky began a series of six Chopin recitals at which he played all of that composer's 169 compositions for the keyboard.

Many columns would be required to list, month by month, the important musical events of the year. For February it is enough to note that the Metropolitan revived "Salome" with Marjorie Lawrence in the title role; that Jan Kiepura made his debut at the opera in "La Boheme" and Enid Szantho hers in "Walkuere;" that Toscanini conducted the NBC Orchestra and the Schola chorus in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, given in Carnegie Hall; and that Margaret Matxenauer, long absent from New York's concert halls, sang a recital; also, that the Philadelphia orchestra gave Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," with Szantho and Kullman as soloists; that Emanuel Feuermann began a series of cello concerto programs in conjunction with the National Orchestral Association. On February 11 the Boston Symphony honored the memory of Maurice Ravel.

March brought with it the Toscanini performance of Verdi's Manzoni Requiem in Carnegie Hall. The first week of the month saw the first Metropolitan performance of Menotti's opera, "Amelia Goes to the Ball." On March 20, Giovanni Mattinelli celebrated his silver jubilee as a tenor of the Metropolitan, with seventeen of his fellow singers and five conductors sharing a gala program. Debussy was honored by the Beethoven Association at a concert eleven days in advance of the twentieth anniversary of his death. Phillip James's prize work, "Song of the Night," was performed by the Women's Symphony under Antonia Brico. The Schola Cantorum, under Ross, presented the "St. John Passion" of Bach. The final days of the month brought a string of orchestra novelties—Hanson's Third Symphony, given by the NBC under the composer's leadership; Walton's "Facade," in its extended form conducted by Barbirolli; Samuel Barber's "School for Scandal" Overture, also given by Barbirolli; and, at the hands of Koussevitzky's Bostonians, the second suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet."

In the first week of April, Quincy Porter conducted his own first symphony at a Philharmonic-Symphony concert. Abram Chasins played his remodeled second piano concerto with the same orchestra. Ireland's "London" Overture and Malipiero's "Elegiaca" Symphony were other Philharmonic novelties. Delius's "Appalachia" was introduced by the Schola Cantorum.

In May, Sir Adrian Boult and Dimitri Mitropoulis made guest appearances with the NBC Symphony. Albert Stoessel conducted a performance of the "St. Matthew Passion" in the Cathedral of St. John. Fortune Gallo's San Carlo Company gave thirteen performances of opera at the Center Theater.

Notable Ballet by Hindemith.

An early event of the new season was the first American performance by the Ballet Russe of the new Hindemith ballet, "St. Francis" (October 14), which musically may be considered the most important disclosure of 1938. Gluck's historic "Don Juan" and Mozart's recently recovered "L'Epreuve d'Amour" were also of musical interest in the ballet's many changes of program.

Toscanini and the NBC Symphony began the New York orchestral season on October 15, the ensemble presenting no less than twenty changes of personnel. The Philadelphians under Ormandy followed with their first New York concert on the 18th and the Philharmonic, conducted by Barbirolli, opened its ninety-seventh year on the 20th. An all-Bach program on the 23d launched the orchestra of the New Friends of Music, with Fritz Stiedry conducting. John Powell marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of his American debut with a recital in Carnegie Hall.

On November 5, Toscanini gave the first performances at an NBC Symphony concert of Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings and Essay for Orchestra. On the 3d, Robert Virovai, seventeen-year-old Hungarian violinist, made a sensational American debut with the Philharmonic. On the 17th the Boston Symphony began its fifty-third season in New York. Four days earlier, Moriz Rosenthal celebrated his golden jubilee as an artist in America by a recital in Carnegie Hall. The Metropolitan opened its season on November 21 with "Otello," the cast including Martinelli, Tibbett and Maria Caniglia, who made her debut as Desdemona. Other debuts of the first week of opera included Hans Hermann Nissen as Wotan in "Die Walkuere" and Jussi Bjoerling, Mafalda Favero and Marisa Morel, all in "La Boheme." The first revival was that of Gluck's "Orfeo" on November 26, with Kerstin Thorborg in the name part.

An early event of December was the recital of Beniamimo Gigli on the 6th, his first in New York in six years. Galliano Masini made his Metropolitan debut as Edgardo in "Lucia" on the 14th, thereafter appearing as Cavarodossi and Radames. Rise Stevens, American contralto, made her entry as Mignon on December 17 and two nights later sang Octavian in the season's first "Rosenkavalier." "Tosca" was returned to the repertoire on December 22, with Caniglia, Tibbett and Masini in the chief roles. The first appearance of the Trapp Family on December 10 and the first recital by Virovai on the 17th merit particular mention. Not to be outdone by Benny Goodman, Paul Whiteman conducted a "swing" program in Carnegie Hall on Christmas Day.

Toscanini an

Georges Enesco, Rumanian composer and violinist, who will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Thursday evening concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, and at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts, January 16 and 17, at Symphony Hall,

PHILADELPHIA EVENING BULLETIN - January 5, '39

112

MUSICIANS

B. Trans. Dec 31/38

GEORGES ENESCO

r in Boston for the first times in Jordan Hall next
minent Rumanian musician will be guest con-
gh five concerts on Jan. 12, 13, 14, 16 and 17.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Play Sibelius' No. 5

BY HENRY PLEASANTS

AN exceptionally large audience was on hand at the Academy of Music, last night, to welcome Serge Koussevitzky and the splendid Boston Symphony Orchestra in their only local appearance of the season. The concert was under the auspices of The Forum.

The program was a formidable one, devoted principally to the fifth symphonies of Sibelius and Beethoven. Interest centered naturally in the Sibelius work which, for all the attention it has received in the last 20 years, is not yet a matter to be taken so much for granted as the fifth symphony of Beethoven. A hundred years from now the difference of a century in the ages of the two works may not seem so considerable, and Sibelius may be regarded as no less established a master than Beethoven. For the time being, the status of the celebrated Finn is still open to discussion. Sibelius is much in favor at the moment and Mr. Koussevitzky is considered an authoritative dispenser of his doctrine. The temper of last night's audience reflected the general trend and there was generous applause both for the music and for the conductor.

If, however, a minority opinion is not out of the way, it might be observed that this symphony is something less than its admirers make it out to be, and that Mr. Koussevitzky's reading tends to emphasize its less agreeable features. Those detached, colorless, reticent phrases of which the commentators make so much remind this reviewer of certain taciturn individuals who give an impression of great wisdom by saying little or nothing. And when Sibelius lets go, as he does in the last movement, the repetitious banal utterance that follows confirms the wisdom of the more frequent passages which look solemn and say nothing. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading seemed to strengthen the argument. The most tenuous passage was approached as something Significant, and the last movement was a gaudy "triumph" for the orchestra's excellent brass section.

Certain characteristics of Mr. Koussevitzky's approach to Sibelius were reflected also in his approach to Beethoven, with singularly unhappy results. There was again a tendency to over-dramatize and over-emphasize. This was not so damaging, however, as the free hand the conductor gave his brasses with disastrous consequences to the third and final movements. Quite the most agreeable music of the evening was Siloti's transcription of Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, Opus 3, No. 1, one of the 12 which made up the composer's celebrated "L'Estro-armonico." The tone of the orchestra throughout this work was something to remember and the slow movement was played with an exemplary nobility.

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER
JAN 1 - 1939

Right Off the Records

By Stewart Matter

Two Outstanding Contributions

It had long been a puzzle to those of us who are interested in the American composer that Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," had never been recorded. For its educational value alone it is priceless, and from a listener's standpoint it is music as fine as we have ever had from the pen of any American. But now that Columbia records have been absorbed by the Columbia Broadcasting Co., there seems every indication that the

ETC.

Highbrows need not curl up their noses when I heartily indorse the new Tschaikowsky "1812 Overture" played by the Boston Pops Orchestra under Fiedler. No matter how trite anyone may consider this music, they will be overwhelmed with the magnificent recording standard and the spirit of the performance. Victor 515. $3.50.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD
January 5, 1939
PHILADELPHI

Music

Koussevitzky and Bostonians Brilliant

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Director Serge Koussevitzky, made its annual pilgrimage to Philadelphia last night, to play at the Academy of Music under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

Koussevitzky, in his 15 years of conductorship, has made the Bostonians into a virtuoso instrument. The orchestra is respendent in tone quality, its sections beautifully balanced, a shimmering string section set off against a brilliant brass choir, the whole a lustrous assemblage.

Last night's concert gave this gifted group fine opportunity to display its distinctiveness. The program was "pure" music—a Vivaldi D minor Concerto for orchestra with organ, the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, and Beethoven's Fifth.

Showed Off Strings.

The Vivaldi was means to show off the orchestra's strings, restrained yet clear-cut in its attack.

The Beethoven is thrice familiar stuff. But under its Bostonian gloss it shone fresh and full again. Its pace may have been too slow and scholarly. But its effect was overpowering in the sharp and incisive way with which it was set forth, the soft passages ingeniously delicate, the climaxes lush and brilliant.

The Sibelius Fifth is less famil- was heard here last the terse, strained iter symphonies, yet ody and substance composer's Fourth. iovements have dis- now pastoral, now epic and mysterious, that wind their way into a more melodious and connected pattern in the third (and last). movement.

Vivid Reading.

Koussevitzky gave the symphony the vivid reading one would expect of this prime Sibelius interpreter. The scattered threads of the first movement were gathered together into a brilliant brass exchange at the close, that was controlled power instead of blare. The Andante sang in lyric quality under the soft ministrations of the strings. The austere passages in the last movement led up to a powerful climax, stern and somber at one moment, beating in barbaric fury at the next, to end on a heroic note.

The Bostonians' visit has become a part of the city's music life and a distinguished event. It certainly was that last night. A. B.

The Old Year in Music

ra and Concert Highlights of the City in 1938—Death's Heavy Toll.

N.Y. Sun By OSCAR THOMPSON. Dec. 1938

Musicians and music lovers ordinarily think in terms of seasons, not years. Many an error has found its way into print because of a confusion of the two designations. The Metropolitan's revival of Strauss's "Elektra" with Rose Pauly in the title role belonged to last season, though given in 1938. Next week's "Don Giovanni" belongs to this season, though not to this year.

And since today ends not a season but a year, the backward vista that presents itself with the passing of 1938 includes parts of two seasons. The year began at the Metropolitan with "Don Giovanni" in the afternoon and "Il Trovatore" at night. It ends today witn the performances of "Fidelio" and "Otello" and with orchestral concerts by both Philharmonic and the NBC Symphony.

Early last January came the London Intimate Opera Company, a two-man and one-woman troupe that gave interesting performances of works by Dibkin, Carey, Dr. Arne, Purcell and others. During the first week of the year the Metropolitan staged its "Elektra" revival and Miss Pauly had her triumph. Other operatic events of the month included the debut of the vest-pocket tenor, Bruno Landi, in "Rigoletto." Shortly thereafter Grace Moore returned to the fold to sing Mimi in "La Boheme," with "Manon" following almost immediately. Erich Leinsdorf made his debut as a conductor with "Walkuere" on January 21. On the next day came the revival of Rossini's "Barber of Seville," with John Charles Thomas shaving the mordente. The Juilliard School was the scene of the premiere (January 19) of the Erskine-Rubinstein opera, "The Sleeping Beauty," a work which quite justified its title.

Some Choral Novelties.

In the symphonic sphere, Georges Enesco took over the leadership of the Philharmonic Symphony while John Barbirolli enjoyed a holiday. Toscanini added the Sibelius Second Symphony to his repertory. Benny Goodman invaded Carnegie Hall. Jussi Bjoerling was a song recitalist and Gertrude Pitzinger challenged attention as something new among contraltos. The year had a stanch beginning chorally. The Helsinki University choir, conducted by Martti Turunen, introduced Sibelius's "Origin of Fire." The Schola Cantorum, conducted by Hugh Ross, gave on January 12 the American premiere of Delius's "Mass of Life" and the world premiere of Dukelsky's "The End of St. Petersburg." The pianist Brailowsky began a series of six Chopin recitals at which he played all of that composer's 169 compositions for the keyboard.

Many columns would be required to list, month by month, the important musical events of the year. For February it is enough to note that the Metropolitan revived "Salome" with Marjorie Lawrence in the title role; that Jan Kiepura made his debut at the opera in "La Boheme" and Enid Szantho hers in "Walkuere;" that Toscanini conducted the NBC Orchestra and the Schola chorus in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, given in Carnegie Hall; and that Margaret Matxenauer, long absent from New York's concert halls, sang a recital; also, that the Philadelphia orchestra gave Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," with Szantho and Kullman as soloists; that Emanuel Feuermann began a series of cello concerto programs in conjunction with the National Orchestral Association. On February 11 the Boston Symphony honored the memory of Maurice Ravel.

March brought with it the Toscanini performance of Verdi's Manzoni Requiem in Carnegie Hall. The first week of the month saw the first Metropolitan performance of Menotti's opera, "Amelia Goes to the Ball." On March 20, Giovanni Mattinelli celebrated his silver jubilee as a tenor of the Metropolitan, with seventeen of his fellow singers and five conductors sharing a gala program. Debussy was honored by the Beethoven Association at a concert eleven days in advance of the twentieth anniversary of his death. Phillip James's prize work, "Song of the Night," was performed by the Women's Symphony under Antonia Brico. The Schola Cantorum, under Ross, presented the "St. John Passion" of Bach. The final days of the month brought a string of orchestra novelties—Hanson's Third Symphony, given by the NBC under the composer's leadership; Walton's "Facade," in its extended form, conducted by Barbirolli; Samuel Barber's "School for Scandal" Overture, also given by Barbirolli; and, at the hands of Koussevitzky's Bostonians, the second suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet."

In the first week of April, Quincy Porter conducted his own first symphony at a Philharmonic-Symphony concert. Abram Chasins played his remodeled second piano concerto with the same orchestra. Ireland's "London" Overture and Malipiero's "Elegiaca" Symphony were other Philharmonic novelties. Delius's "Appalachia" was introduced by the Schola Cantorum.

In May, Sir Adrian Boult and Dimitri Mitropoulis made guest appearances with the NBC Symphony. Albert Stoessel conducted a performance of the "St. Matthew Passion" in the Cathedral of St. John. Fortune Gallo's San Carlo Company gave thirteen performances of opera at the Center Theater.

Notable Ballet by Hindemith.

An early event of the new season was the first American performance by the Ballet Russe of the new Hindemith ballet, "St. Francis" (October 14), which musically may be considered the most important disclosure of 1938. Gluck's historic "Don Juan" and Mozart's recently recovered "L'Epreuve d'Amour" were also of musical interest in the ballet's many changes of program.

Toscanini and the NBC Symphony began the New York orchestral season on October 15, the ensemble presenting no less than twenty changes of personnel. The Philadelphians under Ormandy followed with their first New York concert on the 18th and the Philharmonic, conducted by Barbirolli, opened its ninety-seventh year on the 20th. An all-Bach program on the 23d launched the orchestra of the New Friends of Music, with Fritz Stiedry conducting. John Powell marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of his American debut with a recital in Carnegie Hall.

On November 5, Toscanini gave the first performances at an NBC Symphony concert of Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings and Essay for Orchestra. On the 3d, Robert Virovai, seventeen-year-old Hungarian violinist, made a sensational American debut with the Philharmonic. On the 17th the Boston Symphony began its fifty-third season in New York. Four days earlier, Moriz Rosenthal celebrated his golden jubilee as an artist in America by a recital in Carnegie Hall. The Metropolitan opened its season on November 21 with "Otello," the cast including Martinelli, Tibbett and Maria Caniglia, who made her debut as Desdemona. Other debuts of the first week of opera included Hans Hermann Nissen as Wotan in "Die Walkuere" and Jussi Bjoerling, Mafalda Favero and Marisa Morel, all in "La Boheme." The first revival was that of Gluck's "Orfeo" on November 26, with Kerstin Thorborg in the name part.

An early event of December was the recital of Beniamimo Gigli on the 6th, his first in New York in six years. Galliano Masini made his Metropolitan debut as Edgardo in "Lucia" on the 14th, thereafter appearing as Cavarodossi and Radames. Rise Stevens, American contralto, made her entry as Mignon on December 17 and two nights later sang Octavian in the season's first "Rosenkavalier." "Tosca" was returned to the repertoire on December 22, with Caniglia, Tibbett and Masini in the chief roles. The first appearance of the Trapp Family on December 10 and the first recital by Virovai on the 17th merit particular mention. Not to be outdone by Benny Goodman, Paul Whiteman conducted a "swing" program in Carnegie Hall on Christmas Day.

Toscanini an

Georges Enesco, Rumanian composer and violinist, who will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Thursday evening concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, and at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts, January 16 and 17, at Symphony Hall.

PHILADELPHIA EVENING BULLETIN - January 5, '39

---

24 T

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Play Sibelius' No. 5

BY HENRY PLEASANTS

AN exceptionally large audience was on hand at the Academy of Music, last night, to welcome Serge Koussevitzky and the splendid Boston Symphony Orchestra in their only local appearance of the season. The concert was under the auspices of The Forum.

The program was a formidable one, devoted principally to the fifth symphonies of Sibelius and Beethoven. Interest centered naturally in the Sibelius work which, for all the attention it has received in the last 20 years, is not yet a matter to be taken so much for granted as the fifth symphony of Beethoven. A hundred years from now the difference of a century in the ages of the two works may not seem so considerable, and Sibelius may be regarded as no less established a master than Beethoven. For the time being, the status of the celebrated Finn is still open to discussion. Sibelius is much in favor at the moment and Mr. Koussevitzky is considered an authoritative dispenser of his doctrine. The temper of last night's audience reflected the general trend and there was generous applause both for the music and for the conductor.

If, however, a minority opinion is not out of the way, it might be observed that this symphony is something less than its admirers make it out to be, and that Mr. Koussevitzky's reading tends to emphasize its less agreeable features. Those detached, colorless, reticent phrases of which the commentators make so much remind this reviewer of certain taciturn individuals who give an impression of great wisdom by saying little or nothing. And when Sibelius lets go, as he does in the last movement, the repetitious banal utterance that follows confirms the wisdom of the more frequent passages which look solemn and say nothing. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading seemed to strengthen the argument. The most tenuous passage was approached as something Significant, and the last movement was a gaudy "triumph" for the orchestra's excellent brass section.

Certain characteristics of Mr. Koussevitzky's approach to Sibelius were reflected also in his approach to Beethoven, with singularly unhappy results. There was again a tendency to over-dramatize and over-emphasize. This was not so damaging, however, as the free hand the conductor gave his brasses with disastrous consequences to the third and final movements. Quite the most agreeable music of the evening was Siloti's transcription of Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, Opus 3, No. 1, one of the 12 which made up the composer's celebrated "L'Estro armonico." The tone of the orchestra throughout this work was something to remember and the slow movement was played with an exemplary nobility.

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER
JAN 1 - 1939

Right

TODAY ONLY
REVOR, WAYNE
Y OF THE GIA
JOH
LITE

Two Outstanding Contributions

It had long been a puzzle to those of us who are interested in the American composer that Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," had never been recorded. For its educational value alone it is priceless, and from a listener's standpoint it is music as fine as we have ever had from the pen of any American. But now that Columbia records have been absorbed by the Columbia Broadcasting Co., there seems every indication that the

Etc.

Highbrows need not curl up their noses when I heartily indorse the new Tschaikowsky "1812 Overture" played by the Boston Pops Orchestra under Fiedler. No matter how trite anyone may consider this music, they will be overwhelmed with the magnificent recording standard and the spirit of the performance. Victor 515. $3.50.

112

MUSICIANS

Bo. Tran. Dec 31/38

GEORGES ENESCO

r in Boston for the first times in Jordan Hall next
minent Rumanian musician will be guest con-
gh five concerts on Jan. 12, 13, 14, 16 and 17.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD
January 5, 1939
PHILADELPHI

Music

Koussevitzky and Bostonians Brilliant

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Director Serge Koussevitzky, made its annual pilgrimage to Philadelphia last night, to play at the Academy of Music under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

Koussevitzky, in his 15 years of conductorship, has made the Bostonians into a virtuoso instrument. The orchestra is respendent in tone quality, its sections beautifully balanced, a shimmering string section set off against a brilliant brass choir, the whole a lustrous assemblage.

Last night's concert gave this gifted group fine opportunity to display its distinctiveness. The program was "pure" music—a Vivaldi D minor Concerto for orchestra with organ, the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, and Beethoven's Fifth.

Showed Off Strings.

The Vivaldi was means to show off the orchestra's strings, restrained yet clear-cut in its attack.

The Beethoven is thrice familiar stuff. But under its Bostonian gloss it shone fresh and full again. Its pace may have been too slow and scholarly. But its effect was overpowering in the sharp and incisive way with which it was set forth, the soft passages ingeniously delicate, the climaxes lush and brilliant.

The Sibelius Fifth is less familiar—although it was heard here last season. It has the terse, strained quality of the later symphonies, yet with a fuller body and substance than, say, the composer's Fourth. The first two movements have disjointed motifs, now pastoral, now epic and mysterious, that wind their way into a more melodious and connected pattern in the third (and last). movement.

Vivid Reading.

Koussevitzky gave the symphony the vivid reading one would expect of this prime Sibelius interpreter. The scattered threads of the first movement were gathered together into a brilliant brass exchange at the close, that was controlled power instead of blare. The Andante sang in lyric quality under the soft ministrations of the strings. The austere passages in the last movement led up to a powerful climax, stern and somber at one moment, beating in barbaric fury at the next, to end on a heroic note.

The Bostonians' visit has become a part of the city's music life and a distinguished event. It certainly was that last night. A. B.

PHILADELPHIA PUBLIC LEDGER
January 5, 1939

118

E

MUSIC—Boston Symphony Orchestra

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, made its annual Philadelphia appearance in the Academy of Music last evening under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum and was heard by a capacity audience.

Last evening again demonstrated that the Boston Symphony is one of the greatest orchestras of the United States, which today means the world. The tone of the string section is of especial beauty and in perfect balance, while the ensemble is likewise something at which to marvel. These qualities were especially shown in the opening number, the famous D minor orchestral concerto of Vivaldi, in a transcription by Alexander Siloti for stringed orchestra and organ. The latter, however, is used as a purely ensemble instrument, having no solo work but supporting the strings, especially the contrabasses, and in places giving the effect of wood-wind accompaniment. The concerto was superbly played by the orchestra and finely interpreted by Mr. Koussevitzky, but it was the most insignificant piece of music of the evening despite its many beauties.

Of especial interest was the E-flat symphony (No. 5) of Jean Sibelius. Mr. Koussevitzky has long been known as one of the best living interpreters of the great Finnish composer, and last evening he gave a masterly reading of what is generally esteemed as one of the most significant symphonies of this master and one of which the composer thought highly enough of to give it two thorough revisions.

Mr. Koussevitzky has very apparently made special study of the peculiar and individualistic style of Sibelius and last evening made clear many things which have heretofore been sadly puzzling to at least one member of the audience, among these being the form employed in this and other symphonic works, which was shown to be very definite. The triumphant close of the symphony was especially impressive and the conductor was repeatedly recalled to the stage, an ovation which he shared with the members of the orchestra.

The concert closed with another "fifth symphony" and one which has no competitors—that of Beethoven, perhaps the greatest of all works in the symphonic form. Mr. Koussevitzky again gave a masterly interpretation, although he introduced some interesting details. In the first movement he made the "repeat" which is rarely heard, although the brevity of the movement warranted this. His tempi were convincing throughout, although occasionally inclining toward the deliberate, especially in the beginning of the finale, this giving an effect rather of dignity than the triumph which the music indicates.

The slow movement was beautifully interpreted, as was also the scherzo, although a little more mysticism such as Karl Muck, with the same organization, always used in the section leading into the finale would have been effective. Mr. Koussevitzky also allowed the French horns a very liberal amount of tone sometimes in passages where they were apparently used for orchestral color, as the counterpoint had little to do with the main themes and was sometimes not even melodic. However, it was, on the whole, a most artistic performance and interpretation, and conductor and orchestra received a mighty ovation at the close.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 6 - 1939

MUSIC NOTES

Today's events: Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.; Marian Anderson, contralto, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.; Frieda Hempel, soprano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, Brooklyn, 8:30 P. M.

The first of a series of three chamber music concerts sponsored by the Friends of the Dalcroze School for the benefit of the Dalcroze School of Music will be given tonight at 8:30 o'clock at the school, when a program will be presented by Karl Ulrich Schnabel, piano; David Weber, clarinet; Arlie Furman, viola; Sterling Hunkins, 'cello, and Martimer Rapfogel, flute.

PHILADELPHIA
INQUIRER
January 5, 1939

1

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SUPERBLY

Koussevitzky Given Great Ovation In Forum Concert

By LINTON MARTIN

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the command of Generalissimo Serge Koussevitzky comes to town these days it's an Event. And the brilliant Boston band emphatically did "come to town," in every sense of that expression, in a special concert for the Forum in the Academy last night, earning an ovation, if ever an ovation was earned and in order, for a superb performance of a richly rewarding program.

Philadelphia is deeply indebted to the Forum for this annual concert by Dr. Koussevitzky's virtuoso organization. There was something breathtaking about the brilliance and beauty with which they played last night, and played, too, with a fullness and fire and finish of tone, an accuracy of execution plus excitement of inspiration, which showed what thrills a great symphonic conductor can command and communicate.

DOUBLE-BARRELED BILL

As in the three previous seasons since the Boston Symphony returned to Philadelphia for an annual appearance under Forum auspices, Dr. Koussevitzky provided a double-barreled symphonic bill, with a third number for good measure. He achieved capital contrast in the two Fifth Symphonies presented—the Fifth of Sibelius and the Fifth of Beethoven. And by gracious and ingratiating introduction, he opened the concert with a charming and antique Vivaldi Concerto in D minor for Orchestra and Organ, arranged by Alexander Siloti.

It was exhilarating proof of Dr. Koussevitzky's catholicity of equipment as a conductor, his remarkable range of symphonic sympathies and style, that the Sibelius Fifth Symphony held its own, and stood up sturdily beside the eternal, elemental might of the Beethoven Fifth.

COMMANDING CLIMAX

This Sibelius symphony, which Leopold Stokowski introduced in this country at a Philadelphia Orchestra concert in the fall of 1921, has been called "dour," "gray," "acrid," "astringent" and other musically repellant things. But none of these adjectives was remotely in order last night, after the buoyant, brilliant, beautiful reading by Dr. Koussevitzky of a work that holds fascinating musical mysteries, especially that strange and surging coda of the finale, with its song of exaltation and heroism that could so easily become bombast under hands less expert, understanding and artistic than Dr. Koussevitzky's.

The Beethoven C minor Symphony provided a commanding climax to a quite uncommon occasion, showing how vital and new a familiar work can be made by the renewing approach of fine interpretive intellect and emotion.

Boston Symphony.

Jan 6/39

Before a large audience in Carnegie Hall last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky appeared in its second evening concert of this season's series in that auditorium.

The program featured a novelty—at least locally—Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances." The other works listed were the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, op. 3, No. 11, as edited by Alexander Siloti, and the fourth symphony of Brahms.

The Hindemith piece was originally intended as part of the music for a ballet to be devised by Leonide Massine in 1937. When the subject decided upon, St. Francis of Assisi, was made known to Hindemith he converted his musical sketches into the present composition and wrote an entirely new score for the ballet.

The music is dissonant, of course, though less so than Hindemith has shown on occasion. Oddly enough, it is the kind of dissonance with which the "St. Francis" score is replete. And it serves a purpose. For one thing certain cantilena passages, lovely though the melody, are coated with a thin acidity with surprisingly bearable results. And point superpoint is given to sonorous climaxes through its employment, besides.

Sonorous, by the way, describes aptly most of the tonal effect. The work begins with a startling double-forte phrase, shimmering down to a softer mood. And the rest of it is in like nature, contrast after contrast unreeling in a sympathetic linkage of strongly vivid and colorful speech.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the evening's music with all the mastery he is capable of and the orchestra played superbly.

R. C. B.

BOSTONIANS PLAY HINDEMITH SCORE

Koussevitzky Leads Dances in Carnegie Hall

N.Y. Jan. 1939

By IRVING KOLODIN.

For the third time in as many days, Carnegie Hall was host to an orchestra last night, the gentlemen of Boston appearing for their second visit of the season. There was a time when Serge Koussevitzky felt almost obligated to play new music when he led his orchestra here, to recapture some of the attention that the organization had sacrificed in its low period after the war. Now however, merely the promise of playing of the quality this group is qualified to offer causes the legions of listeners to gather. Certainly the earlier events of this week have not caused such sounds to course through the auditorium, either from the players or, in response, from the audience.

Nevertheless, Mr. Koussevitzky presented his listeners with an unfamiliar score last night, a quartet of symphonic dances which Paul Hindemith completed in 1937. The work has an interesting history, for it was begun when the possibility of a collaboration with Leonide Massine was originally presented to him. However, when the subject of "St. Francis" (seen here last fall) was decided upon, Hindemith elected to use other material for the ballet, and completed his first sketches merely as a series of orchestral dances.

Together the four pieces are as long as the average symphony (a total of slightly more than thirty minutes) and they follow the usual plan of such works, save that the scherzo precedes the slow section. As examples of the working skill of Hindemith, the increased clarity and directness that have characterized his recent writing, the dances have a consistent place in the pattern of his development. By other standards, however, the material is pallid and disaffecting, with little of the rhythmic momentum and vitality that one associates with the dance idea. There is the most satisfying formal pattern in the first section (perhaps, as Hindemith acknowledges, because it is the "most tuneful of the four") and the scherzo has a good deal of robustness. However, the slow movement and the finale were interesting principally for the individuality of Hindemith's orchestration with its curious balancing of brass and strings. The score provided the opportunity for a sumptuous tonal display by the musicians, of which Mr. Koussevitzky took full advantage.

The lasting impressions of the evening came at the beginning and the end, the material of these being the D minor concerto of Vivaldi (in the Siloti edition) and the fourth symphony of Brahms. Such prismatic string tone, definition of choirs, and superb correlation between conductor and men has not been heard in a concert hall here since the last time this orchestra performed. The Vivaldi was played with fine spaciousness and breadth, and the Brahms symphony (aside from some overstress in the scherzo) was another evidence of Mr. Koussevitzky's steady growth as an interpreter of the standard reperto

---

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

HINDEMITH WORK IN PREMIERE HERE

'Symphonic Dances' Is Given by the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall

DIVERTED FROM A BALLET

N.Y. Times

Vivaldi's D Minor Concerto and Fourth Symphony of Brahms on Program

Jan. 7/39

By OLIN DOWNES

A new work by Paul Hindemith, played for the first time in New York, was the novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. The score bears the title "Symphonic Dances." It is in truth a symphonic structure in which dance rhythms, remarkably treated and developed, predominate.

The sketches for this symphonic composition were conceived originally as material for a ballet intended for Léonide Massine. But when Massine decided upon St. Francis of Assisi for the theme of "Nobilissima Visione," performed last Fall by the Ballet Russe in the Metropolitan Opera House, the composer, in the words of the Boston Symphony program, "diverted his musical sketches to symphonic uses, and completed the present score in the Autumn" (of 1937). The first American performance of this music was given by Frederick Stock and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra March 3 of last year. The composer conducted the world premiere on the same day of December, 1938, in London.

Glowing Reports Received

Glowing reports of these "Symphonic Dances" preceded them here. The score is considered by certain authoritative persons one of Hindemith's greatest compositions. It would ill become a mere commentator, in the face of all this, and after a first hearing to give an opinion conclusively worded, of a new composition by such a brilliant composer and technical master as Hindemith has long since proved himself to be. It is true that we ourselves have admired other scores by Hindemith, on first acquaintance, more than we admired his music last night. But this is not a work to pigeonhole on such brief notice.

It is obvious, and of interest, that Hindemith in this late work follows less rather than more the atonal ideas which at an early date he lavishly employed. Not only is there here the feeling of definite key-relationships, on rather traditional lines; there is frequent strong, simple affirmation of classic tonality. One could even find suggestions of the manner of well-known composers of the nineteenth century, and also definite mood-romantic moods, if you like, in spite of the talk by Hindemith's European contemporaries and confrères of music that is to be a matter of design, rhythm, structure, and not of emotional indication. "Symphonic Dances" is undeniably music of moods, now dark, powerful, sullen, now gay, or victorious.

There are odd harmonizations of melodic ideas which sounded as though, under normal circumstances, they would justify quite an accustomed manner of harmonization. The work is written with Hindemith's accustomed mastery and it is well known how quickly, confidently and often arrestingly, he composed. The performance was another triumph for the orchestra. If there was no overwhelming demonstration at the close it could nevertheless be said that the music was well received.

Also on the Program

The other compositions of the evening were Vivaldi's D minor concerto for organ and orchestra in Siloti's version, which is so scored as to bring the burden of expression upon the Boston Symphony's superb string choir, which did full justice to its opportunity; and Brahms's Fourth symphony. The latter work has been played by Mr. Koussevitzky on recent occasions here. His interpretation of it becomes the more classic, firm-knit, poetical but also nobly austere, as he repeats it.

Vivaldi's concerto was technically and tonally a tour de force, though the slow movement was exaggeratedly slow in its tempo. It may be added that such virtuoso playing, such luminousness and color of tone, and technical finish, could make much poorer music than any that was heard last night remarkable. The audience, and the Boston Symphony audience is today the most distinguished audience that listens to music in New York, was quick to show its admiration and enjoyment of the incomparable band.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 29 1938

MUSIC

DEMOCRATIZED MUSIC

"Democratized Music and It's Challege" is the caption that appeared in the Boston Evening Transcript of Dec. 24, over the article by Moses Smith. The sub-title reads "Necessity for a Change in Attitude in the Wake of a Far Larger Public."

Mr. Smith's story begins with reference to the recent issue of Life which called attention "spectularly to a phenomenon with which most of us have been familiar without quite clearly recognizing it—the enormous progress in the democratization of the art of music during the past 15 years," he stated.

The increased number of listeners to music via radio resulting in an increased number studying music, the taking for granted that "music is now mass entertainment," this "new status and the effect it might reasonably have in our attitudes" have been examined by Mr. Smith in his usual interesting and informative style. Extracts from Mr. Smith's article follow:

"I think I am not exaggerating the number of persons in this country who now listen to good music because they want to when. I set it arbitrarily at 30,000,000. That is one person in four likes to listen to music ranging, as the case may be, from Rachmaninov's C-sharp minor prelude to the Bach B minor Mass or Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung," the music in other words that was more or less exclusive possession of the audiences in concert halls and opera houses a decade and a half ago."

Mr. Smith then considers the effect of this on concert and opera attendance, taking Metropolitan Boston for the scene, as follows: "Why don't these people inundate Symphony and Jordan halls, overtaxing the capacities of such auditoriums so that concerts are given instead in the Arena or Boston Garden?

"Some of the reasons are easily given. It is more comfortable, less taxing to hear music in one's living room than in a formal concert hall. There is no effort or expense in getting there. For does it cost anything after you get it."

The inescapable disadvantages of mechanical reproduction of music are ctied by Mr. Smith, who finds them apparently offset (to date at least) by the advantages so far as a vast number of listeners are concerned. While some of this "huge newly educated audience" has found its way to the "older temples of music making," Mr. Smith thinks "there would be untold thousands more, if music managers and promoters cultivated the new audience more intelligently."

By methods of the "old days" he declares they are reaching "the one or two per cent (of the musical population) instead of the 20 to 30 per cent." Booking a concert, then announcing it and publicizing it "through more or less dignified media" and waiting for customers at the box office window are not sufficient for this day, according to Mr. Smith, who offers no remedy because he states, "I am not in the concert business and because the function of a critic is not that of the physician."

He asked,, "How many correlate the fact that 20 years ago the American male who paid any attention whatever to symphonic music was essentially a freak, with the present condition when the craziest jitter-bug is likely to spend much of his time and substance on phonograph records of the better music?"

In conclusion Mr. Smith said: "You may or may not like the democratization of music. It has evil potentialities as well as good. On the whole I am in favor of it. But like it or no, you can't stop it and you may as well decide to live with it sensibly. You must accept it as fact just as our sensible fathers had to accept the undustrial revolution as a fact."

HERE AND THERE

Fritz Kreisler is the owner of the original manuscript of Brahms's violin concerto. This was purchased by Kriesler in Vienna 11 years ago for seevral thousand dollars.

Soviet Russia has a recently organized state jazz orchestra of 50 pieces. Victor Knushevitsky, young composer, is the conductor. Twelve vocalists are an adjunct of the ensemble. Folk instruments of various Soviet nationalities are included with the more familiar sax trumpet and others. M. Blanter is "artistic director." He is a composer and has said "the State Jazz orchestra has for its aim the creation of true Soviet jazz."

NEWS NOTES

Nadia Boulanger, eminent French musician and teacher, will conduct an orchestra of 55 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in her annual memorial concert for her sister Lili Boulanger, pianist and composer, March 7, in Boston's Symphony hall. The Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs and several soloists will participate in the program. G. Wallace Woodworth will conduct the first half of the concert and Mlle. Boulanger will lead the orchestra in four works by her sis-

N. Y. Tribune Jan. 7/39

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Plays a New Work by Herr Hindemith

Second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Vivaldi....Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ (Edited by A. Siloti)
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Allegro
Hindemith ....Symphonic Dances
I. Langsam—Maessig bewegte ganze Takte
II. Lebhaft
III. Sehr langsam
IV. Maessig bewegt, mit Kraft
(First performance in New York)
Intermission
Brahms.....Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante moderato
III. Allegro giocoso
IV. Allegro energico e passionato

Paul Hindemith

Composer of new work on Boston Symphony program

IT WAS not until Mr. Koussevitzky had dispatched the opening number by Vivaldi (a brilliant display piece for his remarkable band) that Thursday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall began to make local history.

The history in the case was made not so much by the fact that the second number on Mr. Koussevitzky's program was the New York première of a new work by Herr Paul Hindemith, late of the country that once was Germany. A much more noteworthy fact was that Herr Hindemith had accomplished an unexpected musical feat: he had proved to us that he was able to keep an orchestra busy for almost an hour at the task of assuring us that he had nothing, after all, to say to us.

* * *

Now this may not seem, at first blush, an especially memorable feat. Other composers have accomplished it at even greater length. But they have not, as a rule, been composers of our own concise, laconic day. They have been ancient and long-winded bores of a discredited past—old fogies of a moribund romantic age.

Herr Hindemith's achievement was of a far more dazzling kind. For what have our masters of the New Music been telling us for several decades except that they had learned the secret of a novel art which could say all that it had to say with a previously unimaginable brevity and terseness and compactness? How often some of them have proved to us in recent years that exquisite musical boredom could be achieved in an unbelievable minimum of time, with an incredible economy of means!

* * *

And now Herr Hindemith has spoiled it all. He has been untrue to his clan and his period, has violated a noble and heartening principal. He has revived our old suspicion that boredom in excelsis requires time; that it cannot be accomplished on the run.

* * *

As one listened Thursday evening to Herr Hindemith's monumental feat in the achievement of consummate and unmitigated boredom—as these "Symphonic Dances" trailed their saurian length and their seemingly innumerable movements across an orchestral cosmos of measureless vacuity, with a brass choir achieving an apotheosis of the infinitely trite—a kind of sacred awe descended on the listener. One recalled a line from "Zarathustra," and would fain have altered it to read, concerning the victorious Herr Hindemith: "He hath made Boredom holy."

* * *

Years ago, Herr Hindemith was made famous by a question. The question was addressed to him by that sardonic old fogy, Richard Strauss, in the days when Hindemith was attracting the attention of the musical world by his caperings in a keyless world of tones. "But why do you write atonally," Strauss is said to have asked him, "when you have talent?"

That was witty, but it rather missed the point. The point is not, and never has been, of course, whether Herr Hindemith writes atonally or tonally or polytonally; the point is whether, given the structural frame in which his music moves, it can speak to us with power and salience and expressiveness. Herr Hindemith is a man of talent. Sometimes he can hold and stir us, as in a later work than the "Symphonic Dances," the singular "Nobilissima Visione." Richard Strauss's question should have been, "But why do you resort to lifeless clichés and desiccated formulas instead of using the vital shapes of a living and personal creative speech?"

*

It remains, for the present, only to say further that Mr. Koussevitzky and his lordly orchestra immolated themselves most nobly and devotedly upon the pyre of a music that was only, after all, a stifling and gigantic smudge.

Happily, they had other and greater music to discourse, and they discoursed it greatly.

MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, JANUARY 6, 1939

Films, Radio Prospects,

Serge Kousse
In the costume and which, as Josef Hay direct the "Farewell at the Boston Orches
Fund concert on

Georges Enesco
Who will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of next week in Cambridge and Boston.

Musical Courier - Jan. 1/39

Annual Messiah and Premiere Of Dukelsky Score in Boston

Handel and Haydn Society in Oratorio Hearing—Koussevitzky Leads Concerto Inspired by Apollinaire Verses—Recitals by Flagstad, Anderson and Menuhin

BOSTON.—Another Christmas season has arrived and with it performances of Messiah by the Handel and Haydn Society at Symphony Hall, December 18, and, as a benefit for Faulkner Hospital, on the following Monday evening.

Dr. Thompson Stone conducted. The soloists were Rose Dirman, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Harold Haugh, tenor, and Walter Kidder, bass. The orchestra consisted of about fifty-five Boston Symphony Orchestra men. The organist was William B. Burbank.

The choral singing, under Dr. Stone's authoritative direction, was notably clear, plastic and vital.

The work of all the soloists was likewise pleasurable. Mr. Haugh, who made his Boston debut on the first occasion, impressed by the sonority of his voice and the sound competence of his musicianship.

DUKELSKY SCORE PREMIERED

Returned from their annual visit to mid-western cities, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave first performances, on December 16 and 17, to the Dedicaces by Vladimir Dukelsky. A species of piano concerto, inspired by verses of Guillaume Apollinaire, Dedicaces was written between 1934 and last spring. It is cast in the traditional three main movements, titled, respectively To the City, To the Country and To the Sea. But there are, in addition, two shorter sections, each involving a soprano obbligato. No reference is made to the sea, incidentally, in M. Apollinaire's verse as translated in the Boston Symphony program books. And the composer, in his analytical note, disclaims any descriptive intent.

The work begins with the complete verse sung by soprano against a light orchestral background, and ends with a few lines of the text repeated. This part, seemingly difficult of intervals, was ably sung by Marguerite Porter, Boston soprano. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Orchestra, performed with the utmost bravura a solo part full of technical difficulties.

The orchestral texture, especially of the City and Sea movements is complicated, and the trombones and some other instruments are faced with formidable rapid passages. In contrast to the prevailing dissonance and rhythmic exuberance of these movements, is the pastoral quality of To the Country. The composer was present and acknowledged applause from the stage.

The high point of this program was, however, the second symphony of Sibelius, which, at the first of the two concerts, was given the finest performance I have ever heard of this work. For opening number, Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston virtuosi gave a superb account of Haydn's B flat symphony (No. 102).

RECITALS

Marian Anderson's contralto voice and impeccable musicianship furnished a memorable afternoon at Symphony Hall December 4, in the course of which she sang, to the skillful accompaniments of Kosti Vehanen, old music by Purcell, Veracini and Carissimi; three numbers by J. S. Bach, a Schubert group, miscellaneous items from Bantock, Vehanen and Ravel, and four Negro Spirituals.

At the season's third Boston Morning Musicale at Hotel Statler, December 14, Kirsten Flagstad offered a similarly notable forenoon of song. Her list began with Agathe's Leise, leise from Der Freischutz, by Weber, and included Lieder by Beethoven, Robert Franz, and Strauss, Isolde's Liebestod and the singer's now customary group of songs by Grieg. Edwin McArthur was, as usual, an expert collaborator at the piano.

The past two weeks have also included a violin recital by Yehudi Menuhin, whose powers continue to increase; a program by the Gordon String Quartet—this in a series sponsored by the Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy; appearance of those accomplished duo-pianists, Bartlett and Robertson; the Boston debut of Giorgio Ciompi, promising young Italian violinist, and the last of the three Youth Concerts ably conducted by Wheeler Beckett. C. W. D.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 1 - 1939

Hindemith Work To Be Introduced Here On Tuesday

Boston Orchestra Will Play 'Symphonic Dances' at Bushnell

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra in its second concert of the season in Hartford, to be given in the Bushnell Memorial, on Tuesday evening of this week at 8:15, will introduce here a notable new work of the German composer, Paul Hindemith. The work is entitled "Symphonic Dances," and taking the general form of a symphony in four movements for full orchestra, this may be said to be the first symphony which the noted modern composer has written. It was composed in 1937 and intended in the earliest sketches for a ballet, but diverted to symphonic purposes. The "Symphonic Dances" had their first public performances in London in the following spring, and have been performed in this country in Chicago, Los Angeles, and Boston. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will also introduce the work in New York.

The opening number will be Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra," in D minor. Op. 6. No. 10. Dr. Koussevitzky, who has not for a considerable period performed a symphony of Brahms in Hartford, has put the Fourth in E minor of that master upon the coming program.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
DEC 30 1938

Boston Symphony Plays for Forum

Koussevitzky Will Present Program at Academy Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its annual Philadelphia appearance for the Philadelphia Forum on Wednesday evening, January 4.

Mr. Koussevitzky is universally regarded as one of the foremost interpreters of Sibelius and Beethoven.

The program will be:

Vivaldi—
Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ
(Edited by Alexander Siloti)
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Allegro
Sibelius—
Symphony No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 82
I. Tempo molto moderato; Allegro moderato
II. Andante Mosso, quasi allegretto
III. Allegro molto; Un pochettino largamento
Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, Opus 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

In Phila. Concert

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY

N. Y. Tribune Jan. 7/39

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Plays a New Work by Herr Hindemith

Second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Vivaldi....Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ (Edited by A. Siloti)
- I. Maestoso
- II. Largo
- III. Allegro

Hindemith ....Symphonic Dances
- I. Langsam—Maessig bewegte ganze Takte
- II. Lebhaft
- III. Sehr langsam
- IV. Maessig bewegt, mit Kraft

(First performance in New York)

Intermission

Brahms.....Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Andante moderato
- III. Allegro giocoso
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato

IT WAS not until Mr. Koussevitzky had dispatched the opening number by Vivaldi (a brilliant display piece for his remarkable band) that Thursday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall began to make local history.

The history in the case was made not so much by the fact that the second number on Mr. Koussevitzky's program was the New York première of a new work by Herr Paul Hindemith, late of the country that once was Germany. A much more noteworthy fact was that Herr Hindemith had accomplished an unexpected musical feat: he had proved to us that he was able to keep an orchestra busy for almost an hour at the task of assuring us that he had nothing, after all, to say to us.

* * *

Now this may not seem, at first blush, an especially memorable feat. Other composers have accomplished it at even greater length. But they have not, as a rule, been composers of our own concise, laconic day. They have been ancient and long-winded bores of a discredited past—old fogies of a moribund romantic age.

Herr Hindemith's achievement was of a far more dazzling kind. For what have our masters of the New Music been telling us for several decades except that they had learned the secret of a novel art which could say all that it had to say with a previously unimaginable brevity and terseness and compactness? How often some of them have proved to us in recent years that exquisite musical boredom could be achieved in an unbelievable minimum of time, with an incredible economy of means!

* * *

And now Herr Hindemith has spoiled it all. He has been untrue to his clan and his period, has violated a noble and heartening principal. He has revived our old suspicion that boredom in excelsis requires time: that it cannot be accomplished on the run.

* * *

As one listened Thursday evening to Herr Hindemith's monumental feat in the achievement of consummate and unmitigated boredom—as these "Symphonic Dances" trailed their saurian length and their seemingly innumerable movements across an orchestral cosmos of measureless vacuity, with a brass choir achieving an apotheosis of the infinitely trite—a kind of sacred awe descended on the listener. One recalled a line from "Zarathustra," and would fain have altered it to read, concerning the victorious Herr Hindemith: "He hath made Boredom holy."

* * *

Years ago, Herr Hindemith was made famous by a question. The question was addressed to him by that sardonic old fogy, Richard Strauss, in the days when Hindemith was attracting the attention of the musical world by his caperings in a keyless world of tones. "But why do you write atonally," Strauss is said to have asked him, "when you have talent?"

That was witty, but it rather missed the point. The point is not, and never has been, of course, whether Herr Hindemith writes atonally or tonally or polytonally; the point is whether, given the structural frame in which his music moves, it can speak to us with power and salience and expressiveness. Herr Hindemith is a man of talent. Sometimes he can hold and stir us, as in a later work than the "Symphonic Dances," the singular "Nobilissima Visione." Richard Strauss's question should have been, "But why do you resort to lifeless clichés and desiccated formulas instead of using the vital shapes of a living and personal creative speech?"

* * *

It remains, for the present, only to say further that Mr. Koussevitzky and his lordly orchestra immolated themselves most nobly and devotedly upon the pyre of a music that was only, after all, a stifling and gigantic smudge.

Happily, they had other and greater music to discourse, and they discoursed it greatly.

Paul Hindemith

Composer of new work on Boston Symphony program

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 1 - 1939

Hindemith Work To Be Introduced Here On Tuesday

Boston Orchestra Will Play 'Symphonic Dances' at Bushnell

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra in its second concert of the season in Hartford, to be given in the Bushnell Memorial, on Tuesday evening of this week at 8:15, will introduce here a notable new work of the German composer, Paul Hindemith. The work is entitled "Symphonic Dances," and taking the general form of a symphony in four movements for full orchestra, this may be said to be the first symphony which the noted modern composer has written. It was composed in 1937 and intended in the earliest sketches for a ballet, but diverted to symphonic purposes. The "Symphonic Dances" had their first public performances in London in the following spring, and have been performed in this country in Chicago, Los Angeles, and Boston. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will also introduce the work in New York.

The opening number will be Handel's Concerto Grossp for String Orchestra," in D minor. Op. 6. No. 10. Dr. Koussevitzky, who has not for a considerable period performed a symphony of Brahms in Hartford, has put the Fourth in E minor of that master upon the coming program.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

DEC 30 1938

Boston Symphony Plays for Forum

Koussevitzky Will Present Program at Academy Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its annual Philadelphia appearance for the Philadelphia Forum on Wednesday evening, January 4.

Mr. Koussevitzky is universally regarded as one of the foremost interpreters of Sibelius and Beethoven.

The program will be:

Vivaldi—
Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ
(Edited by Alexander Siloti)
- I. Maestoso
- II. Largo
- III. Allegro

Sibelius—
Symphony No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 82
- I. Tempo molto moderato; Allegro moderato
- II. Andante Mosso, quassi allegretto
- III. Allegro molto; Un pochettino largamento

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, Opus 67
- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Allegro; Trio
- IV. Allegro

In Phila. Concert

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY

MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, JANUARY 6, 1939

119

Films, Radio Prospects,

Serge Koussevitzky

In the costume and make-up in which, as Josef Haydn, he will direct the "Farewell" Symphony at the Boston Orchestra's Pension Fund concert on Feb. 1.

Georges Enesco

Who will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of next week in Cambridge and Boston.

AP
f the American its version of f Composprotec-
rights.
d of
a

Musical Courier - Jan. 1/39

iah and Premiere Of Dukelsky Score in Boston

ociety in Oratorio Hearing—Koussevitzky Leads ired by Apollinaire Verses—Recitals by stad, Anderson and Menuhin

mas season has arrived and with it performances of Messiah by the Handel and Haydn Society at Symphony Hall, December 18, and, as a benefit for Faulkner Hospital, on the following Monday evening.

Dr. Thompson Stone conducted. The soloists were Rose Dirman, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Harold Haugh, tenor, and Walter Kidder, bass. The orchestra consisted of about fifty-five Boston Symphony Orchestra men. The organist was William B. Burbank.

The choral singing, under Dr. Stone's authoritative direction, was notably clear, plastic and vital.

The work of all the soloists was likewise pleasurable. Mr. Haugh, who made his Boston debut on the first occasion, impressed by the sonority of his voice and the sound competence of his musicianship.

DUKELSKY SCORE PREMIERED

Returned from their annual visit to mid-western cities, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave first performances, on December 16 and 17, to the Dedicaces by Vladimir Dukelsky. A species of piano concerto, inspired by verses of Guillaume Apollinaire, Dedicaces was written between 1934 and last spring. It is cast in the traditional three main movements, titled, respectively To the City, To the Country and To the Sea. But there are, in addition, two shorter sections, each involving a soprano obbligato. No reference is made to the sea, incidentally, in M. Apollinaire's verse as translated in the Boston Symphony program books. And the composer, in his analytical note, disclaims any descriptive intent.

The work begins with the complete verse sung by soprano against a light orchestral background, and ends with a few lines of the text repeated. This part, seemingly difficult of intervals, was ably sung by Marguerite Porter, Boston soprano. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Orchestra, performed with the utmost bravura a solo part full of technical difficulties.

The orchestral texture, especially of the City and Sea movements is complicated, and the trombones and some other instruments are faced with formidable rapid passages. In contrast to the prevailing dissonance and rhythmic exuberance of these movements, is the pastoral quality of To the Country. The composer was present and acknowledged applause from the stage.

The high point of this program was, however, the second symphony of Sibelius, which, at the first of the two concerts, was given the finest performance I have ever heard of this work. For opening number, Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston virtuosi gave a superb account of Haydn's B flat symphony (No. 102).

RECITALS

Marian Anderson's contralto voice and impeccable musicianship furnished a memorable afternoon at Symphony Hall December 4, in the course of which she sang, to the skillful accompaniments of Kosti Vehanen, old music by Purcell, Veracini and Carissimi; three numbers by J. S. Bach, a Schubert group, miscellaneous items from Bantock, Vehanen and Ravel, and four Negro Spirituals.

At the season's third Boston Morning Musicale at Hotel Statler, December 14, Kirsten Flagstad offered a similarly notable forenoon of song. Her list began with Agathe's Leise, leise from Der Freischutz, by Weber, and included Lieder by Beethoven, Robert Franz, and Strauss, Isolde's Liebestod and the singer's now customary group of songs by Grieg. Edwin McArthur was, as usual, an expert collaborator at the piano.

The past two weeks have also included a violin recital by Yehudi Menuhin, whose powers continue to increase; a program by the Gordon String Quartet this in a series sponsored by the Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy; appearance of those accomplished duo-pianists, Bartlett and Robertson; the Boston debut of Giorgio Ciompi, promising young Italian violinist, and the last of the three Youth Concerts ably conducted by Wheeler Beckett.

C. W. D.

120

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

JAN 1 - 1939

Koussevitzky Told His Rich Bride 'Give Me an Orchestra'... She Did!

Serge Koussevitzky leads his Bostonians into the Academy of Music Wednesday night to play in concert under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

The opportunity is a grand one to compare our own first-rate orchestra with another such superb instrument. And another to meet in Koussevitzky a bull fiddler turned batonist, a patrician turned democrat, a man with a musical mission and a gentleman who's still a prime sartorialist.

For elegant tailoring Serge Koussevitzky has no peer among orchestral chiefs, except, perhaps, Leopold Stokowski. It's a tossup between the two. Both are as sleek as chromium statues. Stokowski, slim, lithe, romantic in a virile way, looks as a poet should look, but never does. Koussevitzky, broad-shouldered, narrow-waisted, extremely military and virile in a dramatic way, looks as a captain of dragoons in civvies should have looked, but never did.

Long 'Wing Spread.'

Koussevitzky's conductorial gestures are literally high, wide and handsome. His wing spread, so to speak, is much larger than that of either Stokowski or Toscanini, and he has a greater repertoire of unpredictable motions than both of them put together. Time cannot wither, nor custom stale, the infinite variety of his shadow boxing.

Those who know his history look upon Koussevitzky's joyous, unrestrained gymnastics with tolerant eyes. They realize that, for years, he was forced to hide his fine figure and athletic prowess from thousands of potential admirers.

For Koussevitzky, before he became a conductor, was a world-famous performer on the double bass, that big growling brute of an instrument popularly known as the bull fiddle. In those days all that was visible of his impressive person was his head, one of his shoulders and his arms.

Made Self Learn.

He didn't want to be a bull fiddler any more than you or you or you, and it's greatly to his credit and indicative of his iron will, consuming ambition and extraordinary musicianship that he developed, according to authoritative opinion, into the best bull fiddler of his time.

Here's what happened:

Serge was the son of a violinist who scratched away for a meager living in a third-rate theater orchestra. The boy, intensely musical, wished to be a fiddler like his father. When he was 14, his family gave him their blessing, which was all they had to give, and sent him to Moscow to try for a scholarship at the Philharmonic School.

He arrived with three rubles in his pocket. At the school he was told that the only available scholarship was one in bull fiddling. Serge tried for it and won. He was, so far as is known, the first musician to make the barking monster into a solo instrument.

An overburdened troubadour, he dragged the cumbersome thing all over Russia and played it in recitals with amazing success. In 1903, when Koussevitzky was 29 (he's 64 now, but looks a mettlesome 50), the Czar decorated him—the only instance in history of a decoration bestowed for bull fiddling.

His Wife in Front Row!

That same year, while giving a concert in Moscow, the virtuoso happened to look into the audience and his eyes met those of a stunning brunette in the front row. The owner of the lovely eyes, Natalya Konstantinova Ushkova, became his wife two years later.

Natalya, the daughter of a wealthy merchant and a rich girl in her own right, promised him anything he wanted for a wedding gift. "Give me a symphony orchestra," was Koussevitzky's startling request. The bride was taken aback, for it was with the bull fiddle that he had wooed her and she hated to see him give it up, but she kept her word.

A year or so later Natalya hired 85 of the best musicians in Moscow. After a season of rehearsals Koussevitzky took his band on tour aboard a steamer—a little gift from his father-in-law.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
. . . his tailoring is elegant.

They rode up and down the Volga. Every evening the vessel—a sort of musical showboat—tied up at a different city, town or village and the orchestra gave a concert, often before peasants and small-town folk who had never heard symphony music before. In seven years Koussevitzky and his men traveled some 3000 miles.

Came the revolution. Kerensky ordered Koussevitzky and his men: "Keep up with your music." They did, but it wasn't easy. It was a terribly severe winter; the country was in the killing grip of cold and famine.

Artists in Mittens.

Koussevitzky and his players starved for weeks on end. The boss conducted in mittens. The men wore mittens, too, but they had holes in them, so they could finger the strings and keys of their instruments.

The Bolsheviks made Koussevitzky director of the State orchestras which, in those early Soviet days, were at low musical ebb. He labored in that job for three years, from 1917 to 1920, but he was out of sympathy with the Lenin-Trotzky regime and asked permission to leave the country. It was refused because, officials said, "Russia needs your music."

The fiery Koussevitzky told the Government that, unless he were allowed to travel abroad, he'd never play or conduct another note in Russia. They let him go.

Cost Him a Million.

Koussevitzky says that the Bolsheviks deprived him of about a million in money, land and other property. In illustration of the state of things that impelled him to leave his native land, he likes to tell this story:

A minor Bolshevik official came in one day to check up on the affairs of the orchestra. "Who are those people?" he asked, pointing to a group of players at the conductor's left. "Those," said Koussevitzky, "are the first violins."

"And those over there?" asked the inspector, indicating a group at the conductor's right. "The second violins," was the reply.

"What!" yelled the official. "Second violins in a Soviet State orchestra? Clear them out!"

NOT a Modernist.

Well, Koussevitzky cleared out, too, went to Paris, where he conducted, ran a music publishing house (he still does there) and came to Boston in 1924. He built that orchestra up to a first-ranking band again, something Boston hadn't had since the days of Karl Muck.

Because he has done so much, both as conductor and publisher, for living composers (he is the high priest of the Sibelius cult), Koussevitzky has been called a modernist. The label infuriates him.

"Nonsense!" he snarls. "I'm not a modernist and I'm not a classicist. I'm a musician! The first movement of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven is the greatest music ever written and George Gershwin's 'Rhapsody in Blue' is a masterpiece.

HARTFORD, CONN.
Jan. 2 TIMES 1939

One New Work, Two Beautiful Classics, Set by Koussevitzky

An important new work and two beautiful classics have been included by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the program which the Boston will play at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow evening in the third event of the Bushnell Concert Series.

The concert, which is scheduled to start at 8:15 o'clock includes Handel's "Concerto Grosso, No. 10." Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances" and the fourth symphony of Brahms.

Of the second number, the Boston Transcript recently noted.

"Gratitude for the opportunity of hearing again the Hindemith dances, easily the most interesting new work which has been offered thus far this season, might well obscure other sentiments on the occasion.

"For, omitting for the moment their more technical aspects, the dances are, above all, eminently agreeable to listen to; there is nothing of the abstruse and purely intellectual in them to frighten away the lay listener. The themes are melodic and easily remembered, and the form, while original, is simple, logical and not dificult to follow.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
Jan. 3, 1939

Boston Symphony In Second Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play its second Hartford concert of the season tonight at Bushnell Memorial.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct a program which comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, Symphonic Dances of Hindemith and Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor.

The concert, which begins at 8:15, is the third in the Bushnell Series.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

JAN 5 - 1939

Boston Symphony In New York Concert

Special to The News.

NEW YORK, Jan. 4.—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at Carnegie Hall Thursday night with the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor as the major work. The Vivaldi Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ will open the program and Hindemith's Symphonic Dances will strike a modern note.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 5 - 1939

Dr. Koussevitzky Favors Repetition Of Brahms Fourth

"By all means play the Fourth Brahms next Tuesday evening! You must play it . . . when the Hartford Symphony plays it, it will be better understood, better appreciated, than it was tonight" said Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Tuesday evening in his dressingroom to Francis Goodwin, president of the Symphony Society of Connecticut.

Due to a misunderstanding the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, which was some time ago announced on the program of the Hartford Symphony Orchestra for its concert of Tuesday evening, Jan. 10, appeared on the program of the Boston orchestra.

'Fortunate to Hear It Twice'

"It is the most difficult of all Brahams' symphonies to understand," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "the deepest and most profound music. Audiences never understand it at one hearing, no matter how well performed. Hartford is fortunate in being able to hear it twice, especially under your very fine conductor. Barzin has a very special talent for conducting. I know his Brahms Fourth will be very fine indeed. And the audience will understand it much better, having heard my performance tonight."

Far from deploring the misunderstanding which gave rise to two performances of the Brahms Fourth in Hartford so near to one another, Dr. Koussevitzky was enthusiastic over what he considered a very happy coincidence for Hartford concert goers.

"How many times has this work been given in Hartford?" he asked. "Surely not more than two or three times in recent years? That is nothing . . . not nearly enough for such a symphony. Even my Boston audiences would not understand it at one hearing."

Conference in Boston

Mr. Goodwin made a special trip to Boston a few days ago to confer with Dr. Koussevitzky and George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony, on the duplication of programs.

"At first I was very much distressed over what seemed like an unfortunate circumstance," Mr. Goodwin said. "My talk with Dr. Koussevitzky, however, has made me much happier about the whole thing."

In addition to the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, the Hartford Symphony's program will include Mozart's overture "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," Wagner's prelude of "Lohengrin," three songs, and the Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." Lotte Lehmann will be the guest soloist.

Exhibition to Aid Esplanade Concerts

During the week of Jan. 16, the public will have opportunity of seeing at 11 Newbury Street, nine miniature period rooms completely equipped with tiny antique furniture. All these objects were collected during 35 years by Mme Helena Rubenstein, and the showing is to be held for benefit of the Esplanade Concert Fund, which has offices in Symphony Hall.

A particular attraction of the rooms and contents to be exhibited, is that the objects are themselves antique, although the structures that surround them were built lately, so far as possible of material contemporary with the style . . . such as the moire silk wall covering in one case.

How small the objects are is suggested by a few Georgian dining room items. The sideboard is three inches high, and dining chairs are a little less. Silver goblets stand seven eighths of an inch, and plates measure one inch, yet have decorated borders. These are part of an eighty-piece set of solid silver.

For the exhibition Madame Rubenstein has loaned the following from her total of 25 arrangements, covering 15th to 19th centuries: Spanish dining hall, Versailles ball room, Queen Anne dining room, Georgian dining room, Louis XV drawing room, mid-Victorian parlor, Austrian kitchen, "Old Curiosity Shop," and Montmartre attic studio.

An invitation preview, with supper, will be held on Jan. 15. The following days of the week the showing is to be public, with admission charge of 50 cents for adults and 25 for children.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS
JAN 5 - 1939

Boston Symphony Wins High Acclaim In Forum Concert

By PHILIP KLEIN

From the town of baked beans and brown bread treked Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra to display their art and talents for the members of the Philadelphia Forum, in the Academy of Music, last night. And this annual visit which the Bostonians make is an event that is eagerly anticipated and willingly attended by local concert-goers.

Tall, gaunt Koussevitsky has been traditional in his unswerving demands for fine reproduction by his musicians. He spares none of them in his never-ending search for better music, and he rules his troupe with the appreciated thoughtfulness of an artist. The violin section draws its bow in unison, giving the impression of automation. The cellos answer every nod or wince of the mestro with immediate music. There is not a motion lost nor an intimation dissolved in the amazing oneness of this symphonic group.

The concert opened with the rendition of the Siloti edition of the Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ by the red monk, Vivaldi. Here is music of another day that was skillfully and carefully blended. Next came the modern Fifth Symphony, by Jean Sibelius. Koussevitsky, whose efforts to present the works of this great Finn composer have become history, creates an aura of old-world gentleness when he plays this work that is languidly lovely.

It was not until the orchestra swung into the melodic tones of the Fifth Beethoven Symphony that Koussevitsky struck his high level for the evening. The music of the Titan, played by a titanic band, whose music is possibly only excelled by our own Philadelphia orchestra, was electrifying. The second movement, commanding and yet subtle, was tremendous. A great ovation was the reward for these Back Bay musickeers who should come back before many months have passed.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 3 - 1939

Boston Symphony To Be Heard At Bushnell Tonight

Work by Handel, Hindemith and Brahms on Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will present the third event of the Bushnell Concert Series in its program at the Bushnell Memorial this evening, starting at 8:15 o'clock.

For tonight's concert Dr. Koussevitzky has selected the following interesting list: "Concerto Grosso, No. 10," by Handel; "Symphonic Dances," by Hindemith and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Bushnell patrons will learn with much interest that the music of "Symphonic Dances" is the score originally intended by Hindemith for his ballet, "St. Francis," which the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo performed here in November. When the subject of the ballet was finally decided upon, however, Hindemith diverted his musical sketches to symphonic uses, and then conceived and carried out a quite different music for the ballet.

According to John N. Burk, program commentator for the Boston Symphony, "the early growth of Hindemith as a composer was inevitably affected by the reaction from Wagnerian romanticism, and by the disillution resulting from the World War, and coinciding with his young manhood.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
JAN 2 - 1939

Music Conclave Being Arranged

Complimentary Rehearsal Of Boston Symphony To Be Feature

Preparations are well advanced for the National Music Conference which is to be held in Boston, March 14 to 17, and which will bring music educators from all parts of the country. Miss Margaret Virgin of Fairhaven, assistant supervisor of music in the Boston schools, is a member of the associate membership committee.

Four days packed with musical events have been arranged by the program committee, and considerable interest centers in the complimentary rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday, March 16, with the great Stravinsky conducting.

The program will include events planned by various member organizations, such as the New England Music Festival Association, which will organize a festival band, orchestra and chorus and the Massachusetts State Department of Education, will hold the Massachusetts Rural School Music Festival on the afternoon of March 17. The convention banquet will be March 16.

Rehearsals for the various festival groups will start on the 14th, and each day a music clinic will be held, affording a group opportunity to rehearse under the same conductor for three consecutive days.

Convention headquarters will be at the Statler Hotel and the Harvard and Radcliffe glee clubs will sing at the banquet. Other events include a concert by the Port Washington, N. Y. Band, a program by music pupils of Perkins Institute for the Blind, and one day during the convention, the bands of the various Boston Schools will entertain for whoever wishes to hear them, in their school buildings.

The festival chorus will rehearse at the Boston University, while the festival orchestra is to be accommodated at the New England Conservatory of Music. Band headquarters have not yet been announced. Attendance at all rehearsals is absolutely necessary.

Associate memberships may be secured for a nominal fee which will admit them to any or all of the festival events, including the Stravinsky rehearsal.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
JAN 6 - 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CARNEGIE HALL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town this week. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first program, actually the Second Evening Concert of the New York series, in Carnegie Hall last night before a large audience.

The opening number on the program was the Concerto in D minor for Orchestra With Organ by Vivaldi, edited by Alexander Siloti. The choice of the Vivaldi as an opener was a happy one, for the audience, which had spent the interim since the last concert attending two or three other Symphonies, was immediately struck by the individuality of the Boston strings, and sat back comfortably, expecting future oral delights.

For these, however, the audience had to wait till the final number on the program, the Brahms E minor Symphony. In the meantime, "Four Symphonic Dances," by Hindemith, were given their first New York performance and, it is tempting to add, their last.

With a hair-raising cymbal crash and a frenzied flourish in the strings Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were off in the Dances. The initial spasm seemed ill-spent, however, since they had a long and arduous musical path to travel before they reached the end. It proved more tiring for the audience than the orchestra, however.

All of which proved that the audience had uncommon good taste. Allowing an orchestral dexterity and a practiced contrapuntal pen, Hindemith has little to offer musically and manages to put together pieces of greater length and dullness than any two other composers, living or dead, who enjoy a comparable fame.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the men gave their best to the score, but they did the same for the Vivaldi and Brahms and these last two numbers were performed so excellently that the audience, even resenting the Hindemith, could consider its admission fee nothing if not well spent. O'G.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 6 - 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD IN PHILA.

Koussevitzky's Orchestra Gives Memorable Concert for Forum

Philadelphia was treated to one of those rare concerts which become future standards of comparison. It was by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing in the Academy of Music for the Philadelphia Forum.

The two great "Fifths" of musical literature—Beethoven's and Sibelius' symphonies of that number—made a robust program satisfying to ears prepared for their elemental timelessness by the graceful virtuosity of Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for Orchestra and Organ. In this, the electrical organ used was far from effective, but that was incidental, because the number again established the pre-eminence of the Boston's strings—although perhaps the home-town pride of Philadelphians precludes the possibility of such concession from most of those in attendance.

Pre-eminent, too, is Koussevitzky as a conductor of Sibelius. From the stark grandeur of the composer's blue-print he erected a tonal structure as devoid of sentimentality as the framework of a skyscraper—and as overpoweringly impressive as steel stabbing the sky. Sparse in the sense of being devoid of orchestral bric-a-brac, the symphony ranks with the greatest of all time—when the conductor extracts its austere eloquence as does Koussevitzky: by simply hoisting the beams and driving the rivets and not trying to obscure them with "interpretative" terra-cotta.

No man today can give a better reading of Beethoven than the Boston's conductor. The Fifth, as he does it, is the familiar one that the listener's memory has strained from countless hearings—"old stuff," some might say. Which is as it should be, because the Fifth is old, both in age and in the sense that earth and fire and water and mountains are old—we feel that they always have been and always must be. No conductor has ever lived who could improve on Beethoven's own conception; all he has to do is to follow its perfection faithfully and extract the utmost of tone from his men. Worthy of note in this respect was the velvet fury of Koussevitzky's bass-fiddles in the third movement.

The concert was received with exceptional enthusiasm and the conductor was recalled five times at the close.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
JAN 6 - 1939

Boston Symphony.

Before a large audience in Carnegie Hall last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky appeared in its second evening concert of this season's series in that auditorium.

The program featured a novelty—at least locally—Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances." The other works listed were the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, op. 3, No. 11, as edited by Alexander Siloti, and the fourth symphony of Brahms.

The Hindemith piece was originally intended as part of the music for a ballet to be devised by Leonide Massine in 1937. When the subject decided upon, St. Francis of Assisi, was made known to Hindemith he converted his musical sketches into the present composition and wrote an entirely new score for the ballet.

The music is dissonant, of course, though less so than Hindemith has shown on occasion. Oddly enough, it is the kind of dissonance with which the "St. Francis" score is replete. And it serves a purpose. For one thing certain cantilena passages, lovely though the melody, are coated with a thin acidity with surprisingly bearable results. And point superpoint is given to sonorous climaxes through its employment, besides.

Sonorous, by the way, describes aptly most of the tonal effect. The work begins with a startling double-forte phrase, shimmering down to a softer mood. And the rest of it is in like nature, contrast after contrast unreeling in a sympathetic linkage of strongly vivid and colorful speech.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the evening's music with all the mastery he is capable of and the orchestra played superbly. R. C. B.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 6 - 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitsky Introduces New Hindemith 'Symphonic Dances' to New York in Second Visit of Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall

Ever the champion of the new, Serge Koussevitzky came to town last night with a new Hindemith work for New York to hear for the first time. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play it, the "Symphonic Dances" of Germany's only ranking composer probably had the most advantageous hearing that it could receive, for the playing of the musicians was magnificent. The audience was generous with applause, but it is a moot question whether the acclaim was not less for the composer than for the performance.

Though there was no symphonic jazz in these "Symphonic Dances," there was enough scoring for the horns to suggest an influence in clever orchestration. It helped considerably in conveying the idea that perhaps the whole work was just so much brass. Such an interpretation is not an idle one either, for the music is empty in substance and even in several of its climaxes while being a fine example of craftsmanship. It is neatly made but what the super-structure incloses suggests more frequently a vacuum that anything else. Yet Hindemith is a child of the times and in his realism may be doing a great deal more in conveying the moods of this day than one would at first credit him. If the times are empty, it is not strange that his music should be, too.

But we cannot rely on technique alone, no matter how clever. The work is divided into four movements, symphonic in outline with a slow, fast, slow, fast plan. It is too long chiefly because within each movement there are pauses that almost sever the connections of the sections following with those preceding. From a startling beginning which certainly claims attention, the music works into march rhythms carried out into some arid territory. It is the second movement that is the core of interest where thoughts of Stravinsky and Ravel circulate while the rhythmic orchestration asserts itself. The brass choirs do wonders here as again in the finale. Hindemith sounds better in motion than "sehr langsam."

This music came in direct contrast to the broad sweeping melodies of Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for orchestra and organ in which the Largo movement is a gem. After the intermission, the Brahms Fourth Symphony presented another contrast. It sounded strangely tame and well-bred in comparison. Perhaps because the orchestra outdid itself in playing the Hindemith, the Brahms did not attain the highest level of performance, but it still had an excellence peculiar to Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 7 - 1939

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

HINDEMITH WORK IN PREMIERE HERE

'Symphonic Dances' Is Given by the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall

DIVERTED FROM A BALLET

Vivaldi's D Minor Concerto and Fourth Symphony of Brahms on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

A new work by Paul Hindemith, played for the first time in New York, was the novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. The score bears the title "Symphonic Dances." It is in truth a symphonic structure in which dance rhythms, remarkably treated and developed, predominate.

The sketches for this symphonic composition were conceived originally as material for a ballet intended for Léonide Massine. But when Massine decided upon St. Francis of Assisi for the theme of "Nobilissima Visione," performed last Fall by the Ballet Russe in the Metropolitan Opera House, the composer, in the words of the Boston Symphony program, "diverted his musical sketches to symphonic uses, and completed the present score in the Autumn" (of 1937). The first American performance of this music was given by Frederick Stock and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra March 3 of last year. The composer conducted the world premiere on the same day of December, 1938, in London.

Glowing Reports Received

Glowing reports of these "Symphonic Dances" preceded them here. The score is considered by certain authoritative persons one of Hindemith's greatest compositions. It would ill become a mere commentator, in the face of all this, and after a first hearing to give an opinion conclusively worded, of a new composition by such a brilliant composer and technical master as Hindemith has long since proved himself to be. It is true that we ourselves have admired other scores by Hindemith, on first acquaintance, more than we admired his music last night. But this is not a work to pigeonhole on such brief notice.

Cont. above right

It is obvious, and of interest, that Hindemith in this late work follows less rather than more the atonal ideas which at an early date he lavishly employed. Not only is there here the feeling of definite key-relationships, on rather traditional lines; there is frequent strong, simple affirmation of classic tonality. One could even find suggestions of the manner of well-known composers of the nineteenth century, and also definite mood-romantic moods, if you like, in spite of the talk by Hindemith's European contemporaries and confrères of music that is to be a matter of design, rhythm, structure, and not of emotional indication. "Symphonic Dances" is undeniably music of moods, now dark, powerful, sullen, now gay, or victorious.

There are odd harmonizations of melodic ideas which sounded as though, under normal circumstances, they would justify quite an accustomed manner of harmonization. The work is written with Hindemith's accustomed mastery and it is well known how quickly, confidently and often arrestingly, he composed. The performance was another triumph for the orchestra. If there was no overwhelming demonstration at the close it could nevertheless be said that the music was well received.

Also on the Program

The other compositions of the evening were Vivaldi's D minor concerto for organ and orchestra in Siloti's version, which is so scored as to bring the burden of expression upon the Boston Symphony's superb string choir, which did full justice to its opportunity; and Brahms's Fourth symphony. The latter work has been played by Mr. Koussevitzky on recent occasions here. His interpretation of it becomes the more classic, firm-knit, poetical but also nobly austere, as he repeats it.

Vivaldi's concerto was technically and tonally a tour de force, though the slow movement was exaggeratedly slow in its tempo. It may be added that such virtuoso playing, such luminousness and color of tone, and technical finish, could make much poorer music than any that was heard last night remarkable. The audience, and the Boston Symphony audience is today the most distinguished audience that listens to music in New York, was guick to show its admiration and enjoyment of the incomparable band.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 6 - 1939

BOSTONIANS PLAY HINDEMITH SCORE

Koussevitzky Leads Dances in Carnegie Hall.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

For the third time in as many days, Carnegie Hall was host to an orchestra last night, the gentlemen of Boston appearing for their second visit of the season. There was a time when Serge Koussevitzky felt almost obligated to play new music when he led his orchestra here, to recapture some of the attention that the organization had sacrificed in its low period after the war. Now however, merely the promise of playing of the quality this group is qualified to offer causes the legions of listeners to gather. Certainly the earlier events of this week have not caused such sounds to course through the auditorium, either from the players or, in response, from the audience.

Nevertheless, Mr. Koussevitzky presented his listeners with an unfamiliar score last night, a quartet of symphonic dances which Paul Hindemith completed in 1937. The work has an interesting history, for it was begun when the possibility of a collaboration with Leonide Massine was originally presented to him. However, when the subject of "St. Francis" (seen here last fall) was decided upon, Hindemith elected to use other material for the ballet, and completed his first sketches merely as a series of orchestral dances.

Together the four pieces are as long as the average symphony (a total of slightly more than thirty minutes) and they follow the usual plan of such works, save that the scherzo precedes the slow section. As examples of the working skill of Hindemith, the increased clarity and directness that have characterized his recent writing, the dances have a consistent place in the pattern of his development. By other standards, however, the material is pallid and disaffecting, with little of the rhythmic momentum and vitality that one associates with the dance idea. There is the most satisfying formal pattern in the first section (perhaps, as Hindemith acknowledges, because it is the "most tuneful of the four") and the scherzo has a good deal of robustness. However, the slow movement and the finale were interesting principally for the individuality of Hindemith's orchestration with its curious balancing of brass and strings. The score provided the opportunity for a sumptuous tonal display by the musicians, of which Mr. Koussevitzky took full advantage.

The lasting impressions of the evening came at the beginning and the end, the material of these being the D minor concerto of Vivaldi (in the Siloti edition) and the fourth symphony of Brahms. Such prismatic string tone, definition of choirs, and superb correlation between conductor and men has not been heard in a concert hall here since the last time this orchestra performed. The Vivaldi was played with fine spaciousness and breadth, and the Brahms symphony (aside from some overstress in the scherzo) was another evidence of Mr. Koussevitzky's steady growth as an interpreter of the standard repertory.

NEW YORK, N. Y. R.K.
SUN

122

JAN 7 - 1939

The New Records

Taylor on Carroll—The Iturbis Play Gershwin—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

The first fruits of the alliance of the Columbia Broadcasting System and the Columbia Phonograph Company are at hand, and promise well for the future of this new arrangement. For one thing, the work is Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," which has long been deserving of recording, and for another it introduces to disks the efficient orchestra of the Columbia Broadcasting System under the direction of Howard Barlow.

However, the most encouraging element is the quality of the recording, which was made in the CBS studio at Liederkranz Hall, and is vastly superior to anything that the company has previously produced domestically. This, fortuitously, solves Columbia's problem of a place in which to record orchestral music, and should mean a steady flow of such recordings on their future lists.

Barlow's thoroughly understanding performance of Taylor's score (plus the fact that the composer was present to supervise the recording) gives us an estimate of the work rather higher than we have had from concert hall performances. This is particularly true of the Jabberwocky and White Knight sections, in which Taylor has been highly successful in his musical imagery. Elsewhere there are some too-fragrant reminiscences of Puccini and Stravinsky, but certainly there is a higher degree of skill in this writing than in any but a handful of American scores. Some of the recording is deficiently balanced, giving an undue prominence to such instruments as the oboe and bassoon, but this will no doubt be overcome in future recordings.

Iturbis and Gershwin.

Add to the mysteries of the phonograph literature the reason why Victor decided there was need for a new version of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, when it already has the overpoweringly brilliant one of Jesus Maria Sanroma and the Boston "Pops" orchestra in its own catalogue. To be sure, one could understand the issuance of a performance more in the jazz manner, with the original instrumentation, but the current one has neither virtue, for it is a two-piano version, played by Jose and Amparo Iturbi.

Merely as technical piano playing, it is well-enough executed and the recording is acceptable (though by no means exceptional). However there is little approach to the true flavor of Gershwin, mathematical ritards and accelerandos being substituted for the easy-going freedom of tempos that the work requires. Since this will add glory neither to the Iturbis nor to Gershwin, the purpose of the issue remains rather obscure.

What They're Selling.

Center—
	"My Heart Belongs to Daddy"	V
	"September Song"	B
Gimbel—
	"My Revery"	V
	"Hold Tight"	D
Rabson—
	"My Heart Belongs to Daddy"	V
	"Begin the Beguine"	BB
Sultan—
	"Shadrack"	D
	"My Revery"	V

The records reviewed in this column were played on an RCO-Victor R-99, and a Walco Sapphire needle was used. Queries on records, needles, machines, &c., are invited.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 7 - 1939

Orchestra Gives Second Concert

Box Guests Entertained at Boston Symphony Program Presented Last Evening

The Academy of Music was the scene last evening of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series this season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, presented Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat; Brahams' Symphony No. 4 in E minor and the Ravel Concerto. In the latter number Jesus Maria Sanroma was the guest soloist at the piano.

Col. and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson of Fort Hamilton entertained as their guests in the Army-Navy box Col. and Mrs. John Rhett, Col. and Mrs. Bradfield Smock and Major and Mrs. Edward Upson.

Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock and Mrs. George Hills Iler were cohostesses in the Brooklyn Woman's Club box, which was occupied by Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Frederic M. Davidson, Mrs. Edwin G. Martin, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. McClintock and Mrs. Iler.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr. had as their box guests Mr. and Mrs. Henry Mannix, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. McDermott, Miss Marie Murray and Thomas E. Murray 3d. The Murrays gave a dinner party at home for their guests before the concert.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince entertained as her box guests Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mr. and Mrs. Meredith Langstaff and Leslie Hodgson. Mr. Mikhalenkoff is director of the Brooklyn Music School Settlement.

Box guests of Mrs. Dean C. Osborne were Col. Joseph Colyer, Supreme Court Justice Lewis L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett, Mrs. Theodore Frohne and Mr. and Mrs. Carl Weiler.

The Adelphi Academy Alumnae box was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart, Miss Jessie Ogg and Miss Emily H. Bow. Robert Alfred Shaw, chairman of the governing committee of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences had as his guest Miss Harriet Cohen of London, the well known pianist.

The Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman, has turned over its box this season for the use of students who are leaders or players in the high school orchestras of Brooklyn and Queens. Dr. George H. Gartlan, director of music in New York City schools, invites different members of the All-City High School Orchestra to occupy the box for the Boston Symphony appearances in Brooklyn.

The 53d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn committee.

RECORD

Butler, Pa
12/8/38

Boston Symphony to Give Two Concerts at Syria Mosque

The high-light of the musical season is the visit of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all roads within a radius of 75 miles of Pittsburgh will lead to Syria Mosque next Saturday evening, December 10th, and Sunday afternoon, December 11th. The Sunday afternoon concert has special appeal to out-of-town music lovers. The concert starts at 3 o'clock, which makes possible an early return home. A young pianist will be featured as soloist at the Saturday evening concert. His name is Jesus Maria Sanroma, and he will play the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Sanroma has toured with great success in both Europe and America. Other works on the evening program are the Bethoven Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The Sunday afternoon program will also feature two great symphonies. They are the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4. Three orchestral sketches, entitled "La Mer" by Debussy will also be included in the afternoon program. The orchestra for both concerts is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and comes to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, Manager.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American

JAN 8 - 1939

Plan Music Festival For 'Fair'

By GRENA BENNETT

A movement is on foot to raise $1,200,000 for an international music festival to be given during the New York World's Fair.

The program for this all-embracing series was outlined at a recent conference at which Mayor La Guardia presided and collaborated with Grover A. Whalen, president of the exposition. It was suggested that a six months' season of music be planned and that musical groups and renowned artists from every country be invited to participate in what was described as a festival "the like of which has never been presented."

Many to Be Invited

In describing the character of the programs to be offered it was stated that opera, symphony, ballet, choral and folk music, soloists comprising entire foreign organizations in the various classes of musical endeavor, would be invited to the New York celebration.

It was decided that the sum mentioned above would be required to defray the expenses of such a tremendous plan and that some of the fund would be expended in air-conditioning both the Metropolitan Opera House and Carnegie Hall in which auditoriums a number of the programs would be given.

At the opera house a Wagner cycle would be sung by leading members of the Metropolitan, the casts led by Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior, and the orchestra directed by Artur Bodanzky. The cycle would comprise the "Ring" music-dramas, "Parsifal," "Meistersinger" and "Tristan und Isolde."

U. S. on Program

The speakers proposed bringing to this country the complete company from the Paris Opera; Glyndebourne Opera; and a group from Hungary. It was also suggested that place on the programs could be accorded American opera. The ballet from Leningrad and a dance group from Poland were also mentioned as possibilities.

It was stated among the probabilities were recitals by Fritz Kreisler, Lawrence Tibbett, Mme. Flagstad, Jascha Heifetz, Yehudi Menuhin and Josef Hofmann. Among the symphonic organizations to be invited are the New York Philharmonic, with John Barbirolli and guest conductors; Philadelphia Orchestra, to be directed by Leopold Stokowski, Georges Enesco and Eugene Ormandy; Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky; Minneapolis Orchestra and other representative symphonic organizations in this country.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 9 - 1939

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in addition to the remaining concerts of its regular series in Carnegie Hall, will give a special concert there for the benefit of its pension fund on Wednesday night, Feb. 8, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Haydn's "Farewell" symphony will be presented in eighteenth century costume, with Dr. Koussevitzky as Haydn. Other numbers will be Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" with Richard Hale as narrator, and a waltz group including Viennese dances by Lanner and Johann Strauss, Sibelius's "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 8 - 1939

Dukelsky Work Introduced by Koussevitsky

'Dedicaces' Given First New York Performance at Carnegie Hall Concert

By Francis D. Perkins

As in the case of their evening concert two days before, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday played a recently composed work not previously heard here, sandwiched between music of the eighteenth century and a familiar symphony of the nineteenth, in their second afternoon program of the season in Carnegie Hall.

The novelty, prefaced by Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, and followed by Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, was "Dedicaces," a work of unusual form by the Russian-American composer Vladimir Dukelsky, scored, according to the official designation, for piano, orchestra and woman's voice obbligato. The assisting artists, who also took part in the first public performance of this composition in Boston on Dec 16, were Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and Marguerite Porter, soprano.

Mr. Dukelsky, who has been living in this country for the last ten years, has composed extensively for the concert field and also, under the pseudonym of Vernon Duke, for that of musical comedy and motion pictures. In the former category, he has previously been represented in New York by two major works, his first symphony, played by the National Orchestral Association under Leon Barzin in April, 1933, and his "The End of St. Petersburg" for chorus and orchestra, performed by the Schola Cantorum under Hugh Ross last [illegible].

"Dedicaces," begun in 1934 and completed last spring, has as its point of departure and return a ten-line French text by Guillaume Apollinaire in which he, to quote the composer's description, "breathlessly describes those features of his existence in the city, the country and on the water that startled or touched him most." The text is sung in the introductory movement, "L'Envoi"; two instrumental movements, "To the City" and "To the Country," follow. The last section, "To the Sea," closes with an epilogue in which the last few lines of the text are softly sung.

The composer has described his work as "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph"—which, on the whole, aptly summarizes its nature—and added that it is "in no way descriptive." He has added that the solo soprano becomes the narrator, while the solo pianist could perhaps be likened "to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra." There seemed, indeed, to be a certain combative quality in the first extensive percussive piano solo in the second section, and in the treatment of the instrument throughout this movement, in which an incisive rhythm, offering one or two occasional hints of jazz, but not characterized by it, is the most apparent element in the music.

The energy of the movement, which could be taken as the reflection of impressions made by urban existence, was effective, but as it progressed the relentlessness of the rhythmic emphasis, in which the strings, as well as the piano, were sometimes made to play a percussive role, began to verge on monotony.

The ably wrought second movement provided a relieving contract with considerable lyricism, and the third, whose beginning seemed considerably milder than the "bomb-like explosion" cited in the note condensed from the composer's own analysis, offered a variety of sonorities, but none likely to prove vexatious even to conservative ears. Mr. Sanroma played with requisite vigor and laudable technical deftness and fluency in the not particularly grateful piano part, and Miss Porter gave a very commendable exposition of the text, which is set forth mainly in a manner which might be styled lyric recitative.

On the whole, "Dedicaces" did not impress as music of lasting consequence. It was ingenious and well scored, apart from excessive dependence on little-garnished rhythm in the second movement; the musical ideas of the next two parts were often pleasing, but did not present a clearly defined idea of the composer's creative individuality, and there seemed to be more skill in craftsmanship than over-evidence. There was a lone hiss punctuating the brief silence after the first movement, but at the close the applause was very cordial.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

JAN 9 - 1939

2 Symphonies Given by Boston Orchestra

Superb Playing Marks Performance of the Program at Matinee Under Direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Superb orchestral playing distinguished the performance of two symphonies under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee in Carnegie Hall on Saturday. The symphonies were Haydn's in B flat, No. 103, the ninth of the London series, and Tschaikowsky's fourth.

The other number on the program was "Dedicaces," for piano and orchestra with soprano obbligato, by Vladimir Dukelsky, also known as Vernon Duke, a "first performance in New York." Mr. Dukelsky was present and took a bow. The assisting artists were Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and Marguerite Porter, soprano.

A short poem by Guillaume Apollinaire is sung by the soprano as introduction to the three dedications—"To the City," "To the Country," "To the Sea." Then, by way of epilogue, the soprano again intones the last lines of the poem.

Probably there was more bewilderment than anything else on the part of the audience in the presence of Mr. Dukelsky's curious and enigmatic work. However, no one could well question the composer's ingenuity and his skill in instrumentation.

In the evening Arturo Toscanini resumed the conductorship of the broadcasts of the NBC Symphony Orchestra, signalizing his return by leading magnificent performances of Mozart's "Haffner" symphony and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. Also on his program were an orchestral version by Edmund Rubbra of the Brahms Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Handel and C. M. Loeffler's "Memories of My Childhood."

The Haydn symphony, the ninth of those composed for performance in London, had an interpretation revealing both the perennial quality of this music and the high standard of this orchestra, and the Tchaikovsky work received a vividly hued and impressive performance, fully revealing the expressive content of the music without any interpretative exaggerations. After the enlivening playing of the finale, there were cheers for this laudable orchestra and its notable conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 7 - 1939

Albert W. Snow Dies; In Boston Symphony

Emmanuel Church Organist Taught at Conservatory

Special to the Herald Tribune

BANGOR, Me., Jan. 6.—Albert W. Snow, of Boston, organist at Emmanuel Church, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and an instructor at the New England Conservatory of Music, died today after a long illness. He was sixty years old.

Mr. Snow was born in Melrose, Mass., the son of Mr. and Mrs. George A. Snow. He was educated in the public schools of Melrose, and was a choir boy at the Church of the Advent in Boston.

From 1901 to 1905 he studied at the New England Conservatory under Wallace Goodrich. He became assistant to S. P. Whitney, organist at the Church of the Advent, and succeeded Mr. Whitney about 1908.

In 1918, he was appointed organist at Emmanuel Church, and he served there until his death. He was appointed instructor in organ music and choir training at the Conservatory in 1925.

Mr. Snow was organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty years. He composed church and organ music, gave many organ recitals and also taught privately for many years. He was a member of the St. Botolph Club, the Harvard Musical Society and the American Guild of Organists.

He was taken ill a year ago last summer and underwent a serious operation. Last May he took a leave of absence from his work and came to his summer home in Maine. Surviving are his wife, the former Eleanor Clulen, three sisters and a brother.

123

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1939

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS 'DEDICACES'

Dukelsky Composition Offered With Marguerite Porter and Jesus Sanroma Soloists

PREMIERE FOR WORK HERE

Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony and Music by Haydn Also on Carnegie Hall Bill

The special feature of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was the "Dèdicaces" of Vladimir Dukelsky, for piano, orchestra and soprano obbligato. Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, and the Fourth symphony by Tchaikovsky completed the program.

Mr. Dukelsky's recently written composition, which received its première in Boston last month by the same forces, was heard here yesterday for the first time, with Jesus Maria Sanroma at the keyboard and Marguerite Porter as the vocal soloist. This work, based on a French poem by Guillaume Apollinaire, is in three movements in which the piano plays as important a part as in a concerto for the instrument. The ten-line poem is sung in its entirety as an introduction and a short quotation from it is allotted the soprano by way of epilogue.

This poem itself is strangely conceived and the music founded on it proved even stranger and decidedly more cryptic, if it had anything definite at all to impart. Mr. Dukelsky, who spends his time writing scores for musical comedies and the movies when not engaged on works in the serious vein, has admitted that there is nothing descriptive about the content of this latest novelty, despite the fact that the three movements bear seemingly programmatic titles, being named respectively, "To the City," "To the Country" and "To the Sea."

"To the Sea" Baffling

Since these "dedications" also failed to create any definite atmosphere or sustained mood of one sort or another, the relation of the music to the verses and the intentions of the whole opus, with the fuming and fury of its two chief divisions and the rather sentimental touches of its contrasted slow movement "To the Country," remained a dark secret.

Perhaps the hurly-burly of the city was the real inspiration of the opening movement. At least, this section was violently energetic and terrifyingly dissonant. Upon its conclusion, the staid audience was startled by an equally energetic hiss from one of the boxes. "To the Sea" was just as baffling but failed to bring on a recurrence of any such sign of disapprobation. In fact, there was prolonged applause after the splendid presentation of the work and the composer, who was present, was forced to come on stage to take his bow.

Although the composition did not seem destined for posterity, it displayed Mr. Dukelsky's sure command of orchestral writing and his considerable, if misdirected, talents as a creator.

Work of the Soloists

Mr. Sanroma gave a brilliant reading of the frantically difficult piano part, which reached its climax in a vehement cadenza at the start of "To the Sea," asking the utmost technical skill of the performer. Miss Potter undoubtedly sang her music correctly, but it was so discordantly written, against a thin, bizarre accompaniment, that the true pitch was a matter of conjecture.

In the two symphonies Mr. Koussevitsky and his men made the afternoon memorable by the splendor of the interpretations. The Haydn masterpiece, written in 1795 for the Salomon concerts in London, is one of his last and greatest attempts in the form. Mr. Koussevitzky employed the full quota of strings for it, and with good reason, since the symphony is almost Beethovenish in its vigor of statement. It was played with notable rhythmic allure, exuberance and finish.

But the Tchaikovsky Fourth was the great achievement of the afternoon. A more superb treatment of its familiar measures could not easily be conceived. Never before has this reviewer heard the first movement delivered with such munificence of tone, the brasses being incomparably rich and sonorous in their proclamations. There was gigantic power, intense vitality, gorgeous coloring and no end of imagination in this virtuoso rendition that never once was guilty of exaggeration or overstatement.

N. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 9 - 1939

Dukelsky Work Introduced by Koussevitsky

'Dedicaces' Given First New York Performance at Carnegie Hall Concert

By Francis D. Perkins

As in the case of their evening concert two days before, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday played a recently composed work not previously heard here, sandwiched between music of the eighteenth century and a familiar symphony of the nineteenth, in their second afternoon program of the season in Carnegie Hall.

The novelty, prefaced by Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, and followed by Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, was "Dedicaces," a work of unusual form by the Russian-American composer Vladimir Dukelsky, scored, according to the official designation, for piano, orchestra and woman's voice obbligato. The assisting artists, who also took part in the first public performance of this composition in Boston on Dec. 16, were Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and Marguerite Porter, soprano.

Mr. Dukelsky, who has been living in this country for the last ten years, has composed extensively for the concert field and also, under the pseudonym of Vernon Duke, for that of musical comedy and motion pictures. In the former category, he has previously been represented in New York by two major works, his first symphony, played by the National Orchestral Association under Leon Barzin in April, 1933, and his "The End of St. Petersburg" for chorus and orchestra, performed by the Schola Cantorum under Hugh Ross last January.

"Dedicaces," begun in 1934 and completed last spring, has as its point of departure and return a ten-line French text by Guillaume Apollinaire in which he, to quote the composer's description, "breathlessly describes those features of his existence in the city, the country and on the water that startled or touched him most." The text is sung in the introductory movement, "L'Envoi"; two instrumental movements, "To the City" and "To the Country," follow. The last section, "To the Sea," closes with an epilogue in which the last few lines of the text are softly sung.

The composer has described his work as "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph"—which, on the whole, aptly summarizes its nature—and added that it is "in no way descriptive." He has added that the solo soprano becomes the narrator, while the solo pianist could perhaps be likened "to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra." There seemed, indeed, to be a certain combative quality in the first extensive percussive piano solo in the second section, and in the treatment of the instrument throughout this movement, in which an incisive rhythm, offering one or two occasional hints of jazz, but not characterized by it, is the most apparent element in the music.

The energy of the movement, which could be taken as the reflection of impressions made by urban existence, was effective, but as it progressed the relentlessness of the rhythmic emphasis, in which the strings, as well as the piano, were sometimes made to play a percussive role, began to verge on monotony.

The ably wrought second movement provided a relieving contract with considerable lyricism, and the third, whose beginning seemed considerably milder than the "bomb-like explosion" cited in the note condensed from the composer's own analysis, offered a variety of sonorities, but none likely to prove vexatious even to conservative ears. Mr. Sanroma played with requisite vigor and laudable technical deftness and fluency in the not particularly grateful piano part, and Miss Porter gave a very commendable exposition of the text, which is set forth mainly in a manner which might be styled lyric recitative.

On the whole, "Dedicaces" did not impress as music of lasting consequence. It was ingenious and well scored, apart from excessive dependence on little-garnished rhythm in the second movement; the musical ideas of the next two parts were often pleasing, but did not present a clearly defined idea of the composer's creative individuality, and there seemed to be more skill in craftsmanship than over-evidence. There was a lone hiss punctuating the brief silence after the first movement, but at the close the applause was very cordial.

The Haydn symphony, the ninth of those composed for performance in London, had an interpretation revealing both the perennial quality of this music and the high standard of this orchestra, and the Tchaikovsky work received a vividly hued and impressive performance, fully revealing the expressive content of the music without any interpretative exaggerations. After the enlivening playing of the finale, there were cheers for this laudable orchestra and its notable conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
JAN 9 - 1939

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky and Bostonians Introduce Dukelsky's Latest

Toscanini Resumes N. B. C. Broadcasts With Mozart, Wagner, Brahms Pieces

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

At Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra permitted New Yorkers to hear Mr. Vladimir Dukelsky's latest work in a serious vein—a piece called "Dedicaces" for piano, orchestra and soprano obligato. Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma saw to the piano part of Mr. Dukelsky's curious music and Miss Marguerite Porter was the soprano. The three movements of "Dedicaces" are entitled "To the City," "To the Country" and "To the Sea." At the beginning Miss Porter sang a ten-line poem by the French poet Guillaume Apollinaire, and she also sang part of the lines at the finish.

The Boston subscribers are used to novelties, for Dr. Koussevitzky, though advancing in years, remains sympathetic to contemporary musical thought. But in Mr. Dukelsky's latest they found a harder musical nut to crack than they had been offered in some time. The trouble with the novelty was that its music failed to illuminate the poem and the titles of the movements, and the poem and the titles of the movements failed to illuminate the music. But perhaps the whole thing was meant as a joke and we shall find the new piece in the role of a "number" in Mr. Dukelsky's next musical show. For Mr. Dukelsky, under the name of Vernon Duke, is one of our best composers of musical comedy scores.

Dr. Koussevitzky also cruised around in the safer waters of a Haydn symphony (B flat No. 102) and in Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. These were especially relished by the large audience and the Dr. and the superb Bostonians were the recipients of clamorous applause.

In the evening Mr. Toscanini resumed his broadcasts with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra in Studio 8-H. The program consisted of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, Loeffler's symphonic piece, "Memories of My Childhood," the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and an orchestral version of the Brahms-Handel variations for piano by an English musician, Edmund Rubra.

Mr. Toscanini has often played the "Haffner" Symphony, but on Saturday night one was aware of some subtle differences in tempi, notably in the pace of the slow movement, which seemed a shade faster than usual. The Italian conductor manages to establish a masculine approach to the music of Mozart without disturbing the composer's sublime refinement.

The Brahms-Handel variations are more suited to orchestral translation than the same composer's G minor piano quartet which Schoenberg has turned into an orchestral piece. Yet some of the variations resisted their new and supposedly flattering clothes. At the end one was left with the feeling that Brahms knew better than Mr. Rubra.

The N. B. C. Orchestra was in wonderful form and Mr. Toscanini finished up in a blaze of glory with the Wagner Prelude. Enthusiasm was riotous.

At Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon Miss Guillia Bustabo was the soloist of the Philharmonic-Symphony concert, playing Sibelius' Violin Concerto with a great deal of vulgar and much technical facility and not a little imagination. Mr. Barbiroli performed excerpts from Debussy's "Pelleas" and Schubert's German Dances.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 9 - 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Toscanini Returns, Bustabo Is Soloist With Philharmonic, Friends of Music Resume Concerts, Brooklyn Dancer Scores in Recital

Boston Symphony

Carnegie Hall's Saturday afternoon audience witnessed another first performance by the Boston Symphony of a work not previously heard in New York. Dr. Koussevitzky is to be congratulated for the progressive spirit which prompts him to search for new material to widen the scope of orchestral repertoire. As an outstanding exponent of modern music he has acquainted his audience with many important works. Vladimir Dukelsky, who writes musical comedy music as Vernon Duke, was represented on Dr. Koussevitzky's Saturday program by a four movement work written for piano and orchestra with a soprano singing Guillaume Appolinaire's text as prologue and epilogue. The piece is called "Dedicaces," was brilliantly played, is highly sensational, cleverly scored, unconvincing and superficial. Jesus Sanroma, pianist, and Margerite Porter, soprano, were the assisting artists.

R. O. W.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 9 - 1939

Concerts of the Week End

Toscanini Returns — Orchestral Novelties and a Soloist—Other Events.

The return of Arturo Toscanini, novelties by the N. B. C. and the Boston Symphony orchestras, and two performances of the Sibelius violin concerto by Guila Bustabo as soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony, were highlights of the week end for patrons of orchestral concerts.

Mr. Toscanini introduced one of the novelties at Saturday night's broadcast concert of the N. B. C. ensemble in Studio 8-H, Radio City. The composition itself was a familiar one, being none other than the Brahms variations on a theme by Handel, which the hardiest of pianists occasionally include in their recital programs. But in the orchestral dress devised for it by Edmund Rubbra, a thirty-seven-year-old English composer of growing reputation in his own country, it represented a first New York performance.

Mr. Rubbra's transcription should prove popular with conductors and audiences alike. As published in Mr. Toscanini's fastidious performance, it is a brilliant and sympathetic achievement. One suspects that Brahms himself would have scored some parts of it more thickly and with darker coloring. But the essentials of the original are never lost and the instrumentation presents its own delightful and adroit details.

The evening was one of superb performances, beginning with Mozart's exquisite "Haffner" symphony and embracing further Loeffler's symphonic poem, "Memories of My Childhood," and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger." It was good to hear the Loeffler work again, for America has produced relatively few works of its quality. But needless to report, it was the "Meistersinger" music which had the most stirring effect on the audience. Shouts were mingled in the applause—an old story for Toscanini readings of this endlessly vital exordium.

Dukelsky's 'Dedicaces' Played.

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony, in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky introduced to his Manhattan subscribers Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedicaces" some six weeks after conducting its world premiere at one of his orchestra's home concerts. The composer was present to bow from the platform.

The work is described as "a three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph." It makes use of a ten-line French poem by Guillaume Apollinaire, the complete text being sung in the introductory movement, "L'Envoi" and a portion of it repeated at the close of last section, "To the Sea." Intervening are two purely instrumental movements styled "To the City" and "To the Country." The composer is authority for the statement that the music is in no way descriptive; as also for the further information that the solo soprano serves as narrator, whereas the solo pianist is to be likened "to a man pitched against the universe of the orchestra."

A zealous and spirited performance failed to make clear the logic of the composition. There were ingenious details in the scoring and some highly dissonant writing which may or may not have had an emotional purpose. But for this reviewer, the work simply did not "come off." Some one hissed at the end of the first movement. At the close the reaction of the audience as a whole was cordial. Jesus Maria Sanroma did his utmost for the piano part and Marguerite Porter floated the nebulous vocal line on what were assumed to be the intended pitches.

The other music of the afternoon was Haydn's noble symphony in B flat major, No. 9 of the London series, and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, both accorded performances to be remembered as among the most searching and eloquent that Dr. Koussevitzky has given us.

Girl Violinist With Barbirolli.

With the exception of the Sibelius violin concerto, John Barbirolli's program for the Philharmonic-Symphony's concerts Saturday night and yesterday afternoon were compounded of music heard at earlier concerts. There were repetitions of the Schubert "Deustche" for strings and Mr. Barbirolli's own arrangement of preludes and entr'actes from Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande," with the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser" to supply a rousing conclusion. All were accorded expert performances, in which the playing was of good quality. Miss Bustabo made a brave essayal of the concerto, bringing to it much of youthful fervor and charm as well as a considerable command of technical resource. But it could not be said that her intonation was unblemished or that her tone and style were large enough to give a really adequate delineation of this essentially masculine work. Nor was the orchestral accompaniment of the surety, the firmness and the quality of the other playing at yesterday afternoon's concert, some of the tempi suggesting special consideration for the soloist.

OSCAR THOMPSON.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS NOVELTIES

Hindemith's Symphonic Dances and Gardner Read's Suite Enliven Quiet Period

BOSTON, Jan. 5.—Boston has been exceptionally quiet, musically, this holiday season. Concert halls have been dark, with the exception of Symphony Hall, which has housed the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony, including the second in the Monday-Tuesday series. By exception, the programs immediately preceding Dec. 25 fell on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Dec. 22 and 23, and for this brace of concerts Dr. Koussevitzky arranged the following program:

Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Op. 6. No. 10 ....Handel
Symphonic Dances ....Hindemith
(First performances at these concerts)
Concerto in D, Op. 61, for Violin and Orchestra ....Beethoven
Soloist, Jascha Heifetz

The revivals this year of works by Handel are revealing some interesting items of little heard music for small groups of strings. The orchestra utilized by Dr. Koussevitzky for the Concerto No. 10 was a far cry numerically from that for which Handel wrote the work yet such was the flexibility of performance that even the composer himself must have approved, had he been present.

Among musicians in the audience, interest was about evenly divided between the performance of Mr. Heifetz and the presentation of the new Hindemith work. Mr. Heifetz gave a superb performance, and while there were occasional faults of intonation, the breadth of interpretation which he brought to the familiar measures of Beethoven and the beauty and suavity of tone which he evoked amply recompensed the listener. Mr. Heifetz received an ovation.

Work Planned as a Ballet

The Hindemith work was originally intended as a ballet, but was finally completed as a piece of purely symphonic writing. There is, however, a lingering of the composer's original ideas for depicting definite dance portraits which stimulate the listener's imagination. The work is in four parts . . . Langsam—Mässig bewegte ganz Takte, Lebhaft, Sehr Langsam and Mässig bewegt, mit Kraft. These Symphonic Dances betray the familiar Hindemith characteristics. The movements have spontaneity. The least interesting measures are those in which the composer lags in the invention of arresting thematic material and seems unable to cover the lack with sufficiently piquant orchestration. This does not at all mean that the work is dull; quite the contrary, yet one listener wished that the entire work might be maintained upon the same level as its finest measures. Needless to say, the performance was excellent.

Gardner Read

A first performance at these concerts of Gardner Read's Suite for String Orchestra was a feature of the eleventh brace of Friday-Saturday programs immediately after the holiday. The program:

Suite for String Orchestra, Op. 33a ....Gardner Read
(First performances at these concerts)
Concerto in D Minor, Op. 15, for Piano and Orchestra......................Brahms
Rudolf Serkin, soloist
Symphony No. 4, in F Minor....Tchaikovsky

The most striking aspect of this program was the performance of the Brahms Concerto by Mr. Serkin. His performance confirmed our earlier impression of him. The Brahms Concerto, as most people know, is a heroic piece, but it is too often treated as such to the exclusion of other and equally important qualities. Mr. Serkin is one of the best grounded pianists we have welcomed here in a long time. His unerring rhythmic sense, plus an unusually discerning insight made for a performance which will remain one of the high lights of the present season.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Superbly Played

Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony at this concert appeared to be an occasion for rejoicing. Granted that it frequently becomes melodramatic, there is nevertheless an eloquence about it which should be heard in a detached frame of mind. If the listener can acquire that, he is likely to come to the fullest enjoyment of the work. Certainly Dr. Koussevitzky spared no effort to make the performance under discussion a noteworthy one.

Gardner Read's Suite was first written as a string quartet. According to a program note, "the composer has retained the identical notation of the quartet, adding the basses in occasional reinforcement of the 'cellos." It must be admitted that the work has merit. It reveals a certain facility in writing, but it contains too little of actual meat. Mr. Read's musical ideas are not entirely original, unfortunately, and his humor is at present a bit forced and heavy footed. Dr. Koussevitzky apparently gave the score all that he and his orchestra could summon by way of performance, but even that combined artistry was insufficient to make the work anything more than a well written exercise such as might be turned in by almost any student in composition.

The second program of the Monday-Tuesday series of concerts by the orchestra brought Anja Ignatius as violin soloist in the Sibelius Concerto in D Minor, Op. 47. Other items on the program were Hindemith's Symphonic Dances and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5. Miss Ignatius made her American debut at this concert and showed herself a violinist of excellent calibre. She has good technique and sufficient musicality to allow her considerable freedom in interpretation. She was well received at the close of her performance.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

Progress of Boston Symphony

Monitor Jan. 14/39

By L. A. Sloper

A glance back at the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-eighth season recalls many magnificent performances and a few interesting novelties. There have been so far two guest conductors, Eugene Goossens and Georges Enesco. Richard Burgin conducted one pair of concerts, and Dr. Koussevitzky presided as usual over the others.

The most impressive novelties of a season are not always the most recently composed. Thus Mozart's Divertimento in B flat, for strings and two horns (K. 287) delighted the listeners at the second pair of concerts. Almost every measure of the six movements reflects the composer's inexhaustible melodic inspiration and inventive genius.

In contrast, Aaron Copland's "El Salón México," which immediately followed on the same program, came off badly. The composer has here attempted to reflect the atmosphere of a Mexico City dance hall, employing several Mexican folk songs, Spanish in character, and treating them with his usual orchestral skill. But the work is superficial and unimportant, worthy perhaps of a place on the programs of the Symphony Hall Pop concerts.

* * *

Odd instrumental combinations have appealed of late to some of the Russo-American composers. Nicolai Berezowsky contributed to the third program of the season a Toccata, Variations and Finale for orchestra and string quartet. It is not clear just why the composer used this combination, which is not very practicable; but in any event it enabled him to contribute to the performance, since he is a member of the Coolidge Quartet, which played the part of soloist. The work itself exhibits again its author's liking for astringency and his poverty of melodic invention.

This reviewer unfortunately missed hearing Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedicaces," for piano and orchestra with soprano obbligato, another unusual combination; and Hindemith's Symphonic dances. Gardner Read's Suite for string orchestra made little impression.

Edward Burlingame Hill's Violin Concerto, from which much had been expected, in view of the success of the composer's Third Symphony, was disappointing. The work was written in 1933 and twice revised, and the composer had the help of Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concertmaster of the orchestra, in writing a cadenza. The slow movement sings charmingly, and has a nostalgic atmosphere and piquant harmonies, but the opening movement is unviolinistic and choppy, and the Finale, reminiscent of older composers and of the modern dance hall. The efficient soloist was Ruth Posselt.

* * *

Most interesting of the new works heard by this listener was Ernst Krenek's Piano Concerto No. 2. Here the 12-tone technique is adapted to classical forms, just as Berg adapted it in "Wozzeck." The result is a scholarly and integrated work, consistent in style and fascinating in structure. It is unfortunate that the composer's ideas do not match the brilliance of his composition.

Visiting conductor-composers always introduce works of their own devising. Mr. Goossens fulfilled this duty by presenting his "Two Nature Poems," Mr. Enesco by offering his Roumanian Rhapsody No. 2 and his First Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitsky has maintained the standards of the orchestra in respect not only of interesting programs but of brilliance of performance. Besides repertory works by Beethoven, Brahms, Haydn, Sibelius, Handel and Tchaikovsky, he has repeated, from a Pension Fund concert of last spring, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and distinguished soloists; resubmitted Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" in memoriam, and revived the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz and the Dvorák "New World."

Notable soloists have been Heifetz in the Beethoven Concerto and Rudolf Serkin in the Brahms D minor. The orchestra continues at the top of its form, which is unsurpassed and in all probability unequalled today.

ENESCO AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

B. Post

He Plays Own Pieces While Koussevitzky Takes Vacation

Jan. 13/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At this time of year it is Dr. Koussevitzky's wont to take a brief and always well-earned vacation. Filling his place at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was Georges Enesco, who had been guest-conductor no longer ago than last March. Next week the Orchestra will be led by Mr. Burgin.

PLAYS OWN MUSIC

There are conductors who can change an orchestra over night. In the case of the Boston Symphony, as it now stands, any change would hardly be a change for the better. Happily, Mr. Enesco gives us the impression that tonally everything is in order. We are made aware of his presence chiefly by his programmes and by his physical aspect, both individual. But strings, woodwind and brass give forth their familiar sound.

Since he is composer before he is conductor, for all his skill and experience in the latter field, Mr. Enesco is likely to favor us with some of his own music. And not yet has the experience been unwelcome. He is somewhat less fortunate when he appears as ambassador for musical Rumani at large. Last year in this capacity he gave us Alessandresco's tedious "Actaeon," and yesterday we were vouchsafed a diverting trifle by Dinu Lipatti, "Chef cu lautrai" ("Merrymaking with Fiddlers"), perhaps better suited to the Pops. To those who caught it, the piece yielded an amusing resemblance to Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President."

His Second Rhapsody

To return to the pleasanter issue of Mr. Enesco's own compositions, there were two on yesterday's programme, one of them a novelty, so far as Symphony Hall is concerned, the other a well-justified revival. The deserved success of Mr. Enesco's First Rumanian Rhapsody has put its successor far in the background. This Second Rhapsody, in D minor, came to a previous Bostonian performance at the hands of the People's Symphony Orchestra several years ago. In common with its predecessor, it offers engaging folk-tunes set off by opulent orchestration. Those for whom a hearing of the Second Rhapsody yesterday brought renewed desire for the First may gratify that longing at the concerts of next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, when Mr. Enesco takes his present leave of us.

Of far more interest than this Rhapsody was the Symphony in E-flat major, which like so many works not of the first magnitude, had enjoyed a brief celebrity and then dropped from sight. (Mr. Burk's notes reminded us that this Symphony was played here in 1915 and again in 1920.) Composed in 1905, it may now be said to hold a promise which was not fulfilled, since no other symphony has come from Mr. Enesco's pen.

Richly Treated

As the product of a gifted, receptive and rarely accomplished young musician, the Symphony recalls what were the obvious influences of the year 1905. In the slow movement we are reminded of "Parsifal"; and in the third of D'Indy ("The Symphony on a Mountain Air"). There are hints of Debussyan impressionism and of Straussian "Sturm und Drang." But the piece as a whole, for all its lack of the highest originality, stands up well. The themes are strong, the facture solid. There is a richness of treatment all the more pleasing to hear in these ascetic days.

As preface to this Rumanian afternoon the distinguished visitor offered a performance of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, one calculated to please those who feel that Mozart's music should not be prettified. There was no suggestion of Dresden China in this D major Symphony, as Mr. Enesco and the orchestra presented it yesterday.

Enesco Guest Conductor Of Symphony

B. Trans.

Begins Series of Five Appearances At Sanders Theater

Jan. 13/39

Georges Enesco, one of the greatest musicians of our time, appeared as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening. The concert was the first of five in six days during which the Rumanian musician is presiding over the Boston Orchestra. He was cordially greeted by the audience of last evening; and by the time the concert had run its course the demonstrations of applause had surpassed anything the present writer can recall within the hallowed walls of Sanders Theater.

There were reasons aplenty for the good-will and enthusiasm of the audience. A man of singular charm, which is enhanced by his retiring manner on the stage, Enesco captured the affection of last night's onlookers the more he obviously tried to avoid it. The orchestral playing had exceptional beauty, and Enesco persistently directed the voluminous applause toward the musicians, who were themselves applauding the conductor as enthusiastically as the audience was doing.

In a concert which began with a remarkably sensitive presentation of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, Enesco appeared as composer as well as conductor. Two of the four numbers were his Second "Rumanian" Rhapsody and his First Symphony. The latter has not been played by the Orchestra since 1920, while the former, though produced at the same time as the familiar First Rhapsody, has evidently never appeared on a Boston Symphony program.

The only other number on the program was new to America—the movement, "Chef du lautari," from the Suite, "Satrarli," by the young Rumanian composer, Dinu Lipatti. Neither this relatively brief excerpt nor the music of Enesco was particularly difficult to grasp at first hearing. But since the same program was to be repeated in Symphony Hall this afternoon (as well as tomorrow evening) detailed discussion may thus be postponed to a more leisurely time and place.

M. S.

B. Trans.: Jan. 14/39

New Shostakovich Item

The Fifth Symphony of Dimitri Shostakovich will be the principal item of the Boston Symphony program for next Friday and Saturday. This is the work which restored the composer to favor in Soviet Russia. The new symphony has been played in Paris, and over the NBC network, but this will be its first hearing hereabouts.

Richard Burgin will conduct this pair of concerts, which will present another novelty, a suite, "Improvisations," by Jacobus Langendoen, of the second desk of the orchestra's cello section.

The other numbers of the program will be Tansman's orchestration of Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, and Liszt's "Les Préludes."

Notes on Conc

B. Trans - Jan. 13/39

Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The principal number of the program will be the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, written last year and first performed in connection with the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Union. The first American performance of the four-movement symphony was at an N. B. C. Symphony radio concert last April.

The rest of the program will include Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, orchestrated by Tansman; a Suite, "Improvisations," by Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist in the Boston Orchestra, and "Les Preludes" by Liszt.

Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz" for tenor and chamber orchestra has been added to the program of the "Concert Extraordinaire" for the benefit of the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund, Wednesday evening, Feb. 1.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

B. Trans. Jan. 16/39

The new Fifth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch will have its first performance hereabouts at the next pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Jan 20 and 21. Richard Burgin, as conductor of this pair of concerts will then introduce the Symphony, which the Russian composer wrote in 1937 and which was performed as part of the celebration of the 20th anniversary of the Soviet Republic. The Fifth Symphony, which is still in manuscript, has had a few performances outside of Russia, notably in Paris last summer and at an NBC radio concert on April 9.

The program will otherwise consist of Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor (known as the Dorian) as orchestrated by Alexander Tansman, also Jacobus Langendoen's Improvisations, which will have its first American performance. Mr. Langendoen is a member of the orchestra's 'cello section. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," will compete the programme.

PENSION FUND PRO

An additional number nounced for the "Concert dinaire," the program wh Boston Symphony Orchestra a Serge Koussevitzky will give for the benefit of the pension fund in Symphony hall on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1. This will be Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a musical setting for tenor and chamber orchestra of Vachel Lindsay's poem. The soloist will be Colin O'More.

A rare evening of diversion and musical delight is promised for this event, which will open with a performance of Haydn's Farewell Symphony in 18th century setting and costume. Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," will be performed, with Richard Hale as narrator, and a succession of waltzes, early and late, will include Lanner's Schoenbrunner, Johann Strauss' Vienna Blood and Voices of Spring, Sibelius' Valse Triste and Ravel's La Valse.

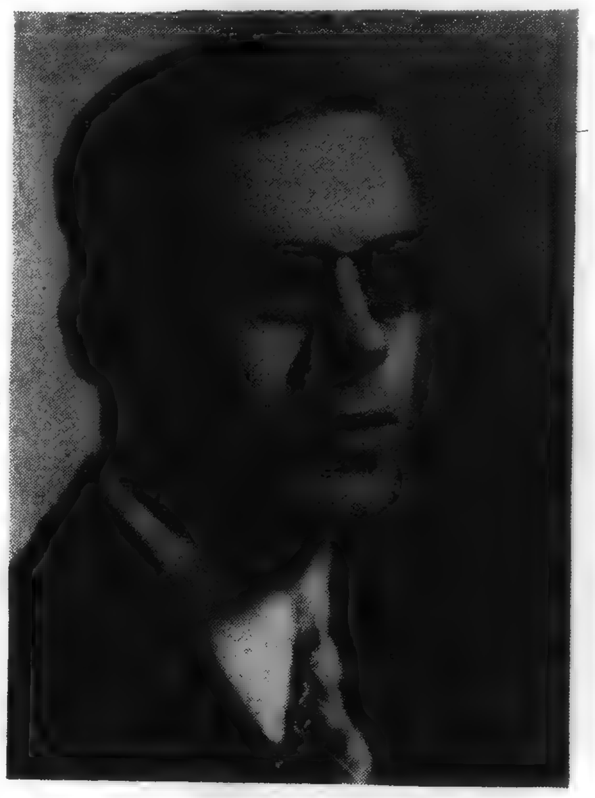
D24

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS NOVELTIES

Hindemith's Symphonic Dances and Gardner Read's Suite Enliven Quiet Period

BOSTON, Jan. 5.—Boston has been exceptionally quiet, musically, this holiday season. Concert halls have been dark, with the exception of Symphony Hall, which has housed the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony, including the second in the Monday-Tuesday series. By exception, the programs immediately preceding Dec. 25 fell on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Dec. 22 and 23, and for this brace of concerts Dr. Koussevitzky arranged the following program:

Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Op. 6. No. 10 ... Handel
Symphonic Dances .... Hindemith
(First performances at these concerts)
Concerto in D, Op. 61, for Violin and Orchestra .... Beethoven
Soloist, Jascha Heifetz



Gardner Read

The revivals this year of works by Handel are revealing some interesting items of little heard music for small groups of strings. The orchestra utilized by Dr. Koussevitzky for the Concerto No. 10 was a far cry numerically from that for which Handel wrote the work yet such was the flexibility of performance that even the composer himself must have approved, had he been present.

Among musicians in the audience, interest was about evenly divided between the performance of Mr. Heifetz and the presentation of the new Hindemith work. Mr. Heifetz gave a superb performance, and while there were occasional faults of intonation, the breadth of interpretation which he brought to the familiar measures of Beethoven and the beauty and suavity of tone which he evoked amply recompensed the listener. Mr. Heifetz received an ovation.

Work Planned as a Ballet

The Hindemith work was originally intended as a ballet, but was finally completed as a piece of purely symphonic writing. There is, however, a lingering of the composer's original ideas for depicting definite dance portraits which stimulate the listener's imagination. The work is in four parts . . . Langsam—Mässig bewegte ganz Takte, Lebhaft, Sehr Langsam and Mässig bewegt, mit Kraft. These Symphonic Dances betray the familiar Hindemith characteristics. The movements have spontaneity. The least interesting measures are those in which the composer lags in the invention of arresting thematic material and seems unable to cover the lack with sufficiently piquant orchestration. This does not at all mean that the work is dull; quite the contrary, yet one listener wished that the entire work might be maintained upon the same level as its finest measures. Needless to say, the performance was excellent.

A first performance at these concerts of Gardner Read's Suite for String Orchestra was a feature of the eleventh brace of Friday-Saturday programs immediately after the holiday. The program:

Suite for String Orchestra, Op. 33a ... Gardner Read
(First performances at these concerts)
Concerto in D Minor, Op. 15, for Piano and Orchestra .... Brahms
Rudolf Serkin, soloist
Symphony No. 4, in F Minor.... Tchaikovsky

The most striking aspect of this program was the performance of the Brahms Concerto by Mr. Serkin. His performance confirmed our earlier impression of him. The Brahms Concerto, as most people know, is a heroic piece, but it is too often treated as such to the exclusion of other and equally important qualities. Mr. Serkin is one of the best grounded pianists we have welcomed here in a long time. His unerring rhythmic sense, plus an unusually discerning insight made for a performance which will remain one of the high lights of the present season.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Superbly Played

Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony at this concert appeared to be an occasion for rejoicing. Granted that it frequently becomes melodramatic, there is nevertheless an eloquence about it which should be heard in a detached frame of mind. If the listener can acquire that, he is likely to come to the fullest enjoyment of the work. Certainly Dr. Koussevitzky spared no effort to make the performance under discussion a noteworthy one.

Gardner Read's Suite was first written as a string quartet. According to a program note, "the composer has retained the identical notation of the quartet, adding the basses in occasional reinforcement of the 'cellos." It must be admitted that the work has merit. It reveals a certain facility in writing, but it contains too little of actual meat. Mr. Read's musical ideas are not entirely original, unfortunately, and his humor is at present a bit forced and heavy footed. Dr. Koussevitzky apparently gave the score all that he and his orchestra could summon by way of performance, but even that combined artistry was insufficient to make the work anything more than a well written exercise such as might be turned in by almost any student in composition.

The second program of the Monday-Tuesday series of concerts by the orchestra brought Anja Ignatius as violin soloist in the Sibelius Concerto in D Minor, Op. 47. Other items on the program were Hindemith's Symphonic Dances and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5. Miss Ignatius made her American debut at this concert and showed herself a violinist of excellent calibre. She has good technique and sufficient musicality to allow her considerable freedom in interpretation. She was well received at the close of her performance.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

Progress of Boston Symphony

Monitor Jan. 14/39

By L. A. Sloper

A glance back at the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-eighth season recalls many magnificent performances and a few interesting novelties. There have been so far two guest conductors, Eugene Goossens and Georges Enesco. Richard Burgin conducted one pair of concerts, and Dr. Koussevitzky presided as usual over the others.

The most impressive novelties of a season are not always the most recently composed. Thus Mozart's Divertimento in B flat, for strings and two horns (K. 287) delighted the listeners at the second pair of concerts. Almost every measure of the six movements reflects the composer's inexhaustible melodic inspiration and inventive genius.

In contrast, Aaron Copland's "El Salón México," which immediately followed on the same program, came off badly. The composer has here attempted to reflect the atmosphere of a Mexico City dance hall, employing several Mexican folk songs, Spanish in character, and treating them with his usual orchestral skill. But the work is superficial and unimportant, worthy perhaps of a place on the programs of the Symphony Hall Pop concerts.

* * *

Odd instrumental combinations have appealed of late to some of the Russo-American composers. Nicolai Berezowsky contributed to the third program of the season a Toccata, Variations and Finale for orchestra and string quartet. It is not clear just why the composer used this combination, which is not very practicable; but in any event it enabled him to contribute to the performance, since he is a member of the Coolidge Quartet, which played the part of soloist. The work itself exhibits again its author's liking for astringency and his poverty of melodic invention.

This reviewer unfortunately missed hearing Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dedicaces," for piano and orchestra with soprano obbligato, another unusual combination; and Hindemith's Symphonic dances. Gardner Read's Suite for string orchestra made little impression.

Edward Burlingame Hill's Violin Concerto, from which much had been expected, in view of the success of the composer's Third Symphony, was disappointing. The work was written in 1933 and twice revised, and the composer had the help of Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concertmaster of the orchestra, in writing a cadenza. The slow movement sings charmingly, and has a nostalgic atmosphere and piquant harmonies, but the opening movement is unviolinistic and choppy, and the Finale, reminiscent of older composers and of the modern dance hall. The efficient soloist was Ruth Posselt.

* * *

Most interesting of the new works heard by this listener was Ernst Krenek's Piano Concerto No. 2. Here the 12-tone technique is adapted to classical forms, just as Berg adapted it in "Wozzeck." The result is a scholarly and integrated work, consistent in style and fascinating in structure. It is unfortunate that the composer's ideas do not match the brilliance of his composition.

Visiting conductor-composers [illegible]ways introduce works of their own devising. Mr. Goossens fulfilled this duty by presenting his "Two Nature Poems," Mr. Enesco by offering his Roumanian Rhapsody No. 2 and his First Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky has maintained the standards of the orchestra in respect not only of interesting programs but of brilliance of performance. Besides repertory works by Beethoven, Brahms, Haydn, Sibelius, Handel and Tchaikovsky, he has repeated, from a Pension Fund concert of last spring, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and distinguished soloists; resubmitted Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" in memoriam, and revived the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz and the Dvořák "New World."

Notable soloists have been Heifetz in the Beethoven Concerto and Rudolf Serkin in the Brahms D minor. The orchestra continues at the top of its form, which is unsurpassed and in all probability unequalled today.

ENESCO AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

B. Post

He Plays Own Pieces While Koussevitzky Takes Vacation

Jan. 13/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At this time of year it is Dr. Koussevitzky's wont to take a brief and always well-earned vacation. Filling his place at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was Georges Enesco, who had been guest-conductor no longer ago than last March. Next week the Orchestra will be led by Mr. Burgin.

PLAYS OWN MUSIC

There are conductors who can change an orchestra over night. In the case of the Boston Symphony, as it now stands, any change would hardly be a change for the better. Happily, Mr. Enesco gives us the impression that tonally everything is in order. We are made aware of his presence chiefly by his programmes and by his physical aspect, both individual. But strings, woodwind and brass give forth their familiar sound.

Since he is composer before he is conductor, for all his skill and experience in the latter field, Mr. Enesco is likely to favor us with some of his own music. And not yet has the experience been unwelcome. He is somewhat less fortunate when he appears as ambassador for musical Rumani at large. Last year in this capacity he gave us Ales[illegible]escu's tedious "Actaeon," and yesterday we were vouchsafed a diverting suite by Dinu Lipatti, "Chef cu lautari" (Merrymaking with Fiddlers"), [illegible] better suited to the Pops. To those who caught it, the piece yielded an amusing resemblance to Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President."

His Second Rhapsody

To return to the pleasanter issue of Mr. Enesco's own compositions, there were two on yesterday's programme, one of them a novelty, so far as Symphony Hall is concerned, the other a well-justified revival. The deserved success of Mr. Enesco's First Rumanian Rhapsody has put its successor far in the background. This Second Rhapsody, in D minor, came to a previous Bostonian performance at the hands of the People's Symphony Orchestra several years ago. In common with its predecessor, it offers engaging folk-tunes set off by opulent orchestration. Those for whom a hearing of the Second Rhapsody yesterday brought renewed desire for the First may gratify that longing at the concerts of next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, when Mr. Enesco takes his present leave of us.

Of far more interest than this Rhapsody was the Symphony in E-flat major, which like so many works not of the first magnitude, had enjoyed a brief celebrity and then dropped from sight. (Mr. Burk's notes reminded us that this Symphony was played here in 1915 and again in 1920.) Composed in 1905, it may now be said to hold a promise which was not fulfilled, since no other symphony has come from Mr. Enesco's pen.

Richly Treated

As the product of a gifted, receptive and rarely accomplished young musician, the Symphony recalls what were the obvious influences of the year 1905. In the slow movement we are reminded of "Parsifal"; and in the third of D'Indy ("The Symphony on a Mountain Air"). There are hints of Debussyan impressionism and of Straussian "Sturm und Drang." But the piece as a whole, for all its lack of the highest originality, stands up well. The themes are strong, the facture solid. There is a richness of treatment all the more pleasing to hear in these ascetic days.

As preface to this Rumanian afternoon the distinguished visitor offered a performance of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, one calculated to please those who feel that Mozart's music should not be prettified. There was no suggestion of Dresden China in this D major Symphony, as Mr. Enesco and the orchestra presented it yesterday.

Enesco Guest Conductor Of Symphony

B. Trans.

Begins Series of Five Appearances At Sanders Theater

Jan. 13/39

Georges Enesco, one of the greatest musicians of our time, appeared as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening. The concert was the first of five in six days during which the Rumanian musician is presiding over the Boston Orchestra. He was cordially greeted by the audience of last evening; and by the time the concert had run its course the demonstrations of applause had surpassed anything the present writer can recall within the hallowed walls of Sanders Theater.

There were reasons aplenty for the good-will and enthusiasm of the audience. A man of singular charm, which is enhanced by his retiring manner on the stage, Enesco captured the affection of last night's onlookers the more he obviously tried to avoid it. The orchestral playing had exceptional beauty, and Enesco persistently directed the voluminous applause toward the musicians, who were themselves applauding the conductor as enthusiastically as the audience was doing.

In a concert which began with a remarkably sensitive presentation of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, Enesco appeared as composer as well as conductor. Two of the four numbers were his Second "Rumanian" Rhapsody and his First Symphony. The latter has not been played by the Orchestra since 1920, while the former, though produced at the same time as the familiar First Rhapsody, has evidently never appeared on a Boston Symphony program.

The only other number on the program was new to America—the movement, "Chef du lautari," from the Suite, "Satrarii," by the young Rumanian composer, Dinu Lipatti. Neither this relatively brief excerpt nor the music of Enesco was particularly difficult to grasp at first hearing. But since the same program was to be repeated in Symphony Hall this afternoon (as well as tomorrow evening) detailed discussion may thus be postponed to a more leisurely time and place.

M. S.

B. Trans. Jan. 14/39

New Shostakovich Item

The Fifth Symphony of Dimitri Shostakovich will be the principal item of the Boston Symphony program for next Friday and Saturday. This is the work which restored the composer to favor in Soviet Russia. The new symphony has been played in Paris, and over the NBC network, but this will be its first hearing hereabouts.

Richard Burgin will conduct this pair of concerts, which will present another novelty, a suite, "Improvisations," by Jacobus Langendoen, of the second desk of the orchestra's cello section.

The other numbers of the program will be Tansman's orchestration of Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, and Liszt's "Les Préludes."

Notes on Conc

B. Trans. Jan. 13/39

Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The principal number of the program will be the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, written last year and first performed in connection with the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Union. The first American performance of the four-movement symphony was at an N. B. C. Symphony radio concert last April.

The rest of the program will include Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, orchestrated by Tansman; a Suite, "Improvisations," by Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist in the Boston Orchestra, and "Les Preludes" by Liszt.

Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz" for tenor and chamber orchestra has been added to the program of the "Concert Extraordinaire" for the benefit of the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund, Wednesday evening, Feb. 1.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

B. Post Jan. 16/39

The new Fifth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch will have its first performance hereabouts at the next pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Jan 20 and 21. Richard Burgin, as conductor of this pair of concerts will then introduce the Symphony, which the Russian composer wrote in 1937 and which was performed as part of the celebration of the 20th anniversary of the Soviet Republic. The Fifth Symphony, which is still in manuscript, has had a few performances outside of Russia, notably in Paris last summer and at an NBC radio concert on April 9.

The program will otherwise consist of Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor (known as the Dorian) as orchestrated by Alexander Tansman, also Jacobus Langendoen's Improvisations, which will have its first American performance. Mr. Langendoen is a member of the orchestra's cello section. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," will compete the programme.

PENSION FUND PROG

An additional number nounced for the "Concert dinaire," the program wh Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Koussevitzky will give for the benefit of the pension fund in Symphony hall on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1. This will be Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a musical setting for tenor and chamber orchestra of Vachel Lindsay's poem. The soloist will be Colin O'More.

A rare evening of diversion and musical delight is promised for this event, which will open with a performance of Haydn's Farewell Symphony in 18th century setting and costume. Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," will be performed, with Richard Hale as narrator, and a succession of waltzes, early and late, will include Lanner's Schoenbrunner, Johann Strauss' Vienna Blood and Voices of Spring, Sibelius' Valse Triste and Ravel's La Valse.

124

Enesco Returns

B. Trans Monitor Jan. 14/39

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Georges Enesco, distinguished composer, conductor and violinist, assumes charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the regular week-end concerts as well as those of Monday and Tuesday. With the single exception of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, his programs will traverse more or less unfamiliar Rumanian music from his own hand and from that of a student and colleague, Dinu Lipatti. Enesco's extraordinary success at the symphony concerts of last season was more than sufficient recommendation for a return visit to Boston, which is gradually beginning to realize the individuality of this eminent musician's gifts.

Some years ago in Paris, Enesco made the following illuminating statements about his career as a Rumanian artist—a career which could hardly be said to follow the traditional channels of growth, for Rumania has contributed little more than folk music to the development of the art, and the composer has had to blaze his own trails:

"People have been puzzled and annoyed," he said, "because they have been unable to catalogue and classify me in the usual way. They could not decide exactly what type of music mine was. It was French after the manner of Debussy, it was not exactly German, they declared. In short, while it did not sound outlandish, it did not closely resemble anything familiar, and people are annoyed when they cannot readily classify one.

* * *

"That, I feel sure, comes from the fact that my musical education was not confined to one locality. I was born in Rumania (and I return there for a while every summer), but when I was 7 years old [Enesco was born in Cordaremi, Rumania, Aug. 7, 1881] I was studying in Vienna, and incidentally, composing sonatas, rondos and a good many other things. I became violinist in one of the large orchestras in Vienna, and when Hellmesberger conducted a large choral society which sang all the great masses, I used to sing in the chorus, studying the scores.

"In those days I became deeply imbued with Wagner and Brahms, and it seems to me that even today my works show a combination of their influence. No, there is nothing so strange about that. Wagner and Brahms were not as antithetical as people have made them out to be. They were opposed to each other much more by reason of policy than musically. Musically they have many things in common. You can even find in Brahms themes strongly suggestive of Wagner's. In Brahms' Horn Trio you hear the 'Walküre'; in the Third Symphony, 'Tannhäuser.' The aim of both was for the highest and noblest. The main difference between the two consists in the fact that Brahms lacked the sensuous element which one finds in the music of Wagner.

"I have written relatively little (naturally I am not taking into account student compositions, with which you can see my shelves piled four rows high), because my duties as soloist and conductor have not granted me the leisure. It goes without saying that I prefer composition to interpretation. But the main reason, after all, for my being a violin virtuoso is that I wish to make enough to support myself and not to have to depend on others."

* * *

The Second Rumanian Rhapsody, an apt successor to the more familiar First in A major, is built entirely upon folk material, and contents itself with a brilliant, rapid statement of the exuberant themes the composer has chosen to treat. There is little development. D major is the predominating key throughout, and a certain subtle monotony rather contributes to the effect than weakens it, as in the case of the first Rhapsody.

The Symphony in E flat major, introduced as long ago as 1906 at a concert of the Colonne Orchestra at the Châtelet, Paris, and dedicated to Alfredo Casella, is not a stranger to Boston. It was first performed in Symphony Hall in 1915, and was given a second hearing in 1920. The work is in three movements instead of the customary four, the scherzo being omitted.

Lipatti, composer of the mysterious "Chef cu lautari," is a young Rumanian born in Bucharest, March 19, 1917. He is already known as a pianist of exceptional merit, and his audiences comment on the remarkable expression of his playing. He has given sonata recitals with Enesco, playing his own Sonatina for violin and piano. Other works include a Piano Concerto which he has played with orchestras in Paris and other cities. The name "Dinu" is a diminutive of Constantine.

The work by Lipatti on the current programs is the third movement from a suite known as "Satrarii" or the "Tent Dwellers," referring to the great bands of Hungarian gypsies. "Chef cu lautari" is translated by the French word "Ivresse" upon the cover of the score. Enesco suggests the possible American word "whoopee," and a usable title is "Merrymaking of the Gypsies." There is a fast first section with a rhythmic background of strings, a lyric middle part, and a reutrn to the music of exuberant opening. The characteristic gypsy scale is employed.

G. H. L. S.

MUSIC

B. Globe Jan. 14/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

During the first week of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's annual vacation of a fortnight, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is host to one of the most gifted and versatile among living musicians—Georges Enesco. When the Rumanian composer, violinist and conductor directed the Boston orchestra last year, his visit proved a feature of the season. Now he returns to as cordial a welcome as before. His present stay includes not only the Symphony Hall concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight, but that at Sanders Theatre last Thursday, and another pair at Symphony Hall next Monday and Tuesday.

His program for the first three begins with the "Haffner" Symphony of Mozart, and includes two of Mr. Enesco's compositions—the Second Rumanian Rhapsody and the First Symphony. For music new to America there is the symphonic movement "Chef cu lautari" by the conductor's fellow-Rumanian, Dinu Lipatti.

Sometime the scholars will knuckle down to the job of telling us which Mr. Enesco is the greatest, the violinist, the composer or the conductor. That will be difficult and baffling, since he is a virtuoso violinist, an extraordinarily fine conductor, and his own music reflects lively invention, a gift for melody, discriminating intellect and complete technical mastery.

His two Rumanian rhapsodies are gems of their sort in which length and form are perfectly mated to what the composer has to say. This music seems to come directly from the Rumanian soil, with a warm, bucolic mood generated by skillful use of a wealth of popular melody. Needless to add, the rhapsodies, like the First Symphony, are written for orchestra in a most colorful fashion. Incredible, by the way, is the fact that not until this week has the Second Rhapsody figured on a Boston Symphony program.

The First Symphony is an early work, written when Enesco was 24, and therefore but partially indicative of the originality he was later to reveal. The orchestration, especially in the first two of the three movements, owes a good deal to Wagner's "Ring" and "The Mastersingers"; the third movement starts off with a strong suggestion of Brahms. Yet a good many pages herald the mature Enesco.

His technical prowess in 1906 was, however, extremely remarkable. The First Symphony is a "big," involved contrapuntal score, full of carefully planned effects of instrumental color. Additional evidence of talent may be found in the abundance of really songful melody.

Dinu Lipatti is a younger Rumanian musician, now nearly 22 and reportedly a pianist of considerable attainment. "Chef cu lautari," dating from 1934, is not a recipe for a Rumanian dish but a title meaning "merrymaking with fiddlers." A symphonic movement constituting the finale of a suite called "Satrarii" ("Gypsies"), "Chef cu lautari" is exuberantly good-natured, a little noisy, and calls upon the resources of a large orchestra. Perhaps it is superficial, but no estimate of a man's ability could be formed on so small a sample of his work. Until such time as the whole suite is played here, let the matter rest.

Mr. Enesco conducted his own music with the authority of a composer who is also a practical master of the orchestra and who can obtain from a large body of men just what he wants. His reading of the "Haffner" Symphony was among the best Mozart performances one has ever heard. True to the Mozart style and temper, it was also rhymically vigorous yet neat and precise.

That Mr. Enesco most favorably impressed the Friday audience was proved by hearty applause and numerous recalls to the stage.

C. W. D.

Georges Enesco Conducts Boston Symphony

MUSIC

B. Her. Jan. 14 1939

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 12th regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georges Enesco conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major, "Haffner," K. 385 . . . Mozart
Rumanian Rhapsody No. 2 Op. 11 . . . Enesco
"Chef cu lautari" . . . Lipatti
Symphony No. 1 in E flat major Op. 13 . . . Enesco

Mr. Enesco's visit this year has been fully as enjoyable and rewarding as it was last season, which is to say that Boston has been honored to have this distinguished musician as guest-conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Enesco showed the most musicianly qualities as conductor in his interpretation of Mozart's Haffner Symphony. The performance was one of the most admirable precision, the keenest rhythmic vitality.

The full orchestra was employed, and the robustness of this music fully justified not cutting the strings down. In many ways this is the most "modernistic" of Mozart's symphonies and shows very well why conductors and builders of chamber music programs so frequently balance ultra-modern music with Mozart. There is a formal severity and, in the first and last movements, a certain cold brilliance which calls to mind a good deal of contemporary music. The latter characteristic is contrasted with a slow movement of the loveliest texture and the most graceful ornamentation. This symphony is, in truth, an undiluted joy.

Mr. Enesco's own talents as a composer seem to be best exemplified by relatively short flights of the imagination. The Second Rumanian Rhapsody, for example, is music that is exactly right for what it sets out to be, but the more pretentious First Symphony, in spite of many beautiful moments, is a bore. Both works were written before the war; and another way of putting this criticism would be to say that the symphony dates, whereas the rhapsody does not.

The Second Russian Rhapsody, which was heard yesterday for the first time at a Boston Symphony concert, is a very different work from the much more familiar First. The latter is sprightly and entertaining, the former is more truly rhapsodic. This is charming, romantic music with a particularly effective conclusion. The orchestra played it with the finest sonority of tone and smoothness of execution.

Dinu Lipatti is a young Rumanian composer who, if this piece is a good sample of his work, is by no means prematurely solemn. "Chef cu lautari" must be some sort of a portmanteau expression, which would have won the heart of Lewis Carroll, for it means both "to get drunk" and "to rejoice." Oh happy land that is candid enough to lump these terms together!

What sort of a merry-making has Mr. Lipatti taken us on? Well, it is as cheerful as Mr. Pickwick was before he fell asleep in the barrow and was wheeled away to the pound by Capt. Boldwig's men. There is no horrid after-effect, nothing for any one to hold his head over and murmur, like Mr. Snodgrass, "It was the salmon." In short, it is engaging music, somewhat obvious, perhaps, but always successfully genial.

Mr. Enesco's early Symphony came as rather a heavy anti-climax after the varied delights of the first part of the program. There is not much, after such a reaction, that one can say about it. What Mr. Enesco said so perfectly in the rhapsody he overstated in the symphony. One would certainly allow that a fine musician had written it, but not, as in the rhapsody, a composer of unusual talent and vivid imagination.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Mr. Enesco will also conduct the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts next week. He will then repeat some of this program, omit the symphony and offer instead the First Rumanian Rhapsody and his Second Suite. Next week Richard Burgin will conduct

THEATERS AND CONCERTS

SHUBERT—"Victoria Regina," Laurence Housman's biographical drama in a return engagement, with Helen Hayes in the title role, supported by Werner Bateman, Abraham Sofaer and many more; 8:30 P. M.

SYMPHONY HALL—The 12th regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georges Enesco, guest conductor, in Mozart's Haffner Symphony (K 385); Dinu Lipatti "La Chef"; Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody No. 2 and Symphony No. 1 in E flat; 8:30 P. M.

SANDERS THEATER—In Cambridge, Russell Ames Cook will direct the Symphonic ensemble in the second of the junior morning concerts, assisted by Jesus Maria Sanroma and Mrs. Sanroma, pianists; 10:30 A. M.

January Busy Month for Concerts

B. Advertiser Jan. 15/39

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

JANUARY continues to present a full calendar of music events, —Kirsten Flagstad's appearance in Symphony Hall this afternoon heading the "musts" for the week.

Arias from "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser," Schubert and Brahms lieder, a collection of Norwegian songs, finally a group of Strauss—the program might have been devised from special requests.

The Boston Morning Musicales always manage to be a highlight in whatever week they occur. Violinist Nathan Milstein is to be guest artist next Wednesday morning. If you are on the subscription list you know about it anyway.

Then there is Rachmaninoff, whose single Symphony Hall program of the season next Sunday afternoon consists of music by Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Rachmaninoff, Chopin, Liszt.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will manage to keep busy this week with concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon under the direction of Guest Conductor Georges Enesco, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening under the surveillance of Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor to Koussevitzky.

Enesco's programs will include Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major, Enesco's own Suite No. 2, and First Roumanian Rhapsody. In addition, Enesco will give the first performance hereabouts of Dinu Lipatti's "Chef cu lautari," which means "merry-making with fiddlers," and is the finale of a symphonic suite entitled "Satfarki," translated gypsies.

It again falls to Burgin's lot to present to Boston audiences a Shostakovitch work—in this case the Fifth Symphony. Otherwise next week-end's program will include Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and a new piece by Boston Symphony Orchestra 'Cellist Langendoen, called "Improvisations."

Jordan Hall concerts this week include a program by the Coolidge Quartette on Tuesday evening, the second in the series of chamber music concerts conducted by Bernard Zighera on Wednesday evening, a piano recital by Eugenia Buxton on Thursday evening.

The Diapason Chicago-Ill

JAN 1 - 1939

BEETHOVEN MASS IN BOSTON; E. POWER BIGGS AT ORGAN

E. Power Biggs was the organ soloist for the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in D major by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky and the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, directed by G. Wallace Woodworth, Dec. 2 and 3. This was the eighth program of the symphony season. The RCA Manufacturing Company made records of the performance, so that it will be available to music-lovers everywhere.

The Beethoven work, his second mass, is a favorite with those who attend concerts in Boston. The first performance in Boston was by the Cecilia Society, B. J. Lang, conductor, March 12, 1897. The mass was performed at the dedication of Symphony Hall, Oct. 15, 1900, Wilhelm Gericke conducting, and the Cecilia Society appearing with the orchestra. There was a performance at the opening of the Beethoven centenary festival by this orchestra March 22, 1927, under the direction of Koussevitzky. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisted. The second performance by this orchestra was at a pension fund concert April 26, 1938, again with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe.

RARE MAHLER WORKS TO BE DONE

Chamber Orchestra to Play Them at Jordan Hall

B. Post Jan 16/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

RARE Mahler will be heard at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, at the second of the season's concerts of the Zighera Chamber Orchestra, hitherto known as the Boston Chamber Orchestra. With Cleora Wood, soprano, as the singer Mr. Zighera will present, for the first time here, since Paul Draper sang them at a pair of Symphony Concerts in the season of 1914-15, Mahler's "Lieder Eines Fahrenden Gesellen," or "Songs of a Travelling Journeyman." Aside from the music itself, simple, direct and appealing, in pseudo-folksong style, there is much of interest in this song-cycle, composed midway in Mahler's 24th year. The inspiration for the poems, which were Mahler's own, was his short-lived passion for Johanne Richter, one of the singers in the Opera House at Kassel, where he was then conducting. "In these poems," to quote the composer's biographer, Gabriel Engel, "he himself, is the one 'driven forth by the blue-eyes of his love'; and he departs broken-hearted to find his only consolation in the unchanging beauty and friendliness of nature."

Themes from this song-cycle found their way into Mahler's First Symphony, so eloquently disclosed to us by Mr. Mitropolis when he appeared as guest conductor at the Symphony Concerts two seasons ago. One of these is the opening phrase of the second song, "O'er the Fields I Went This Morn"; and the other occurs in the midst of the fourth, "The Two Blue Eyes." Like the song-cycle, the Symphony, which we of Boston should not be allowed to forget, is a personal document.

Speaking of both Mahler and Mr. Mitropolis, we read in the January issue of "Chord and Discord," the official organ of the Bruckner Society of America, that the Athenian conductor has recently been made an honorary member of the society (which labors also in Mahler's behalf), because of his past and prospective assiduity with Mahler's symphonies in Minneapolis. Last year Mr. Mitropolis gave the Minneapolitans not only the First Symphony but also the Fourth, which Boston has yet to hear; and this year he plans to introduce to the Twin Cities the Fifth and Ninth. It was Dr. Koussevitzky who made the Ninth known to Boston, and we are told that he will conduct it again sometime during the present season.

Of special interest in this issue of "Chord and Discord" are an article by Gabriel Engel dealing with the first four Bruckner Symphonies and one by William Parks Grant on "Mahler's Use of the Orchestra," a fertile field for discussion. Incidentally, Bruckner's Third Symphony which evoked warm praise from Richard Wagner, to whom it was dedicated, has not been played here since its single performance in 1901. Would it not bear reviving? According to Mr. Engel, it marks as great an advance over the Second, which has never been heard in Boston, as does Beethoven's "Eroica" over his Symphony in D major.

* * * *

Georges Enesco will conduct the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon and Richard Burgin, those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Besides Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and Lipatti's "Chef cu lautari" which he conducted here last week, Mr. Enesco will present his own Second Suite and First Roumanian Rhapsody. As for Mr. Burgin, he will introduce to Boston three works, the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, Alexander Tansman's orchestration of Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, and a Suite, "Improvisations" by Jacobus Langendoen, of the Orchestra's 'cello section, and conclude his programme with Liszt's "Les Preludes."

B. Monitor Jan. 14/39

Enesco Returns

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Georges Enesco, distinguished composer, conductor and violinist, assumes charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the regular week-end concerts as well as those of Monday and Tuesday. With the single exception of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, his programs will traverse more or less unfamiliar Rumanian music from his own hand and from that of a student and colleague, Dinu Lipatti. Enesco's extraordinary success at the symphony concerts of last season was more than sufficient recommendation for a return visit to Boston, which is gradually beginning to realize the individuality of this eminent musician's gifts.

Some years ago in Paris, Enesco made the following illuminating statements about his career as a Rumanian artist—a career which could hardly be said to follow the traditional channels of growth, for Rumania has contributed little more than folk music to the development of the art, and the composer has had to blaze his own trails:

"People have been puzzled and annoyed," he said, "because they have been unable to catalogue and classify me in the usual way. They could not decide exactly what type of music mine was. It was French after the manner of Debussy, it was not exactly German, they declared. In short, while it did not sound outlandish, it did not closely resemble anything familiar, and people are annoyed when they cannot readily classify one.

* * *

"That, I feel sure, comes from the fact that my musical education was not confined to one locality. I was born in Rumania (and I return there for a while every summer), but when I was 7 years old [Enesco was born in Cordaremi, Rumania, Aug. 7, 1881] I was studying in Vienna, and incidentally, composing sonatas, rondos and a good many other things. I became violinist in one of the large orchestras in Vienna, and when Hellmesberger conducted a large choral society which sang all the great masses, I used to sing in the chorus, studying the scores.

"In those days I became deeply imbued with Wagner and Brahms, and it seems to me that even today my works show a combination of their influence. No, there is nothing so strange about that. Wagner and Brahms were not as antithetical as people have made them out to be. They were opposed to each other much more by reason of policy than musically. Musically they have many things in common. You can even find in Brahms themes strongly suggestive of Wagner's. In Brahms' Horn Trio you hear the 'Walküre'; in the Third Symphony, 'Tannhäuser.' The aim of both was for the highest and noblest. The main difference between the two consists in the fact that Brahms lacked the sensuous element which one finds in the music of Wagner.

"I have written relatively little (naturally I am not taking into account student compositions, with which you can see my shelves piled four rows high), because my duties as soloist and conductor have not granted me the leisure. It goes without saying that I prefer composition to interpretation. But the main reason, after all, for my being a violin virtuoso is that I wish to make enough to support myself and not to have to depend on others."

* * *

The Second Rumanian Rhapsody, an apt successor to the more familiar First in A major, is built entirely upon folk material and contents itself with a brilliant, rapid statement of the exuberant themes the composer has chosen to treat. There is little development. D major is the predominating key throughout, and a certain subtle monotony rather contributes to the effect than weakens it, as in the case of the first Rhapsody.

The Symphony in E flat major, introduced as long ago as 1906 at a concert of the Colonne Orchestra at the Châtelet, Paris, and dedicated to Alfredo Casella, is not a stranger to Boston. It was first performed in Symphony Hall in 1915, and was given a second hearing in 1920. The work is in three movements instead of the customary four, the scherzo being omitted.

Lipatti, composer of the mysterious "Chef cu lautari," is a young Rumanian born in Bucharest, March 19, 1917. He is already known as a pianist of exceptional merit, and his audiences comment on the remarkable expression of his playing. He has given sonata recitals with Enesco, playing his own Sonatina for violin and piano. Other works include a Piano Concerto which he has played with orchestras in Paris and other cities. The name "Dinu" is a diminutive of Constantine.

The work by Lipatti on the current programs is the third movement from a suite known as "Satrarii" or the "Tent Dwellers," referring to the great bands of Hungarian gypsies. "Chef cu lautari" is translated by the French word "Ivresse" upon the cover of the score. Enesco suggests the possible American word "whoopee," and a usable title is "Merrymaking of the Gypsies." There is a fast first section with a rhythmic background of strings, a lyric middle part, and a reutrn to the music of exuberant opening. The characteristic gypsy scale is employed.

G. H. L. S.

B. Globe Jan. 14/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

During the first week of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's annual vacation of a fortnight, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is host to one of the most gifted and versatile among living musicians—Georges Enesco. When the Rumanian composer, violinist and conductor directed the Boston orchestra last year, his visit proved a feature of the season. Now he returns to as cordial a welcome as before. His present stay includes not only the Symphony Hall concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight, but that at Sanders Theatre last Thursday, and another pair at Symphony Hall next Monday and Tuesday.

His program for the first three begins with the "Haffner" Symphony of Mozart, and includes two of Mr. Enesco's compositions—the Second Rumanian Rhapsody and the First Symphony. For music new to America there is the symphonic movement "Chef cu lautari" by the conductor's fellow-Rumanian, Dinu Lipatti.

Sometime the scholars will knuckle down to the job of telling us which Mr. Enesco is the greatest; the violinist, the composer or the conductor. That will be difficult and baffling, since he is a virtuoso violinist, an extraordinarily fine conductor, and his own music reflects lively invention, a gift for melody, discriminating intellect and complete technical mastery.

His two Rumanian rhapsodies are gems of their sort in which length and form are perfectly mated to what the composer has to say. This music seems to come directly from the Rumanian soil, with a warm, bucolic mood generated by skillful use of a wealth of popular melody. Needless to add, the rhapsodies, like the First Symphony, are written for orchestra in a most colorful fashion. Incredible, by the way, is the fact that not until this week has the Second Rhapsody figured on a Boston Symphony program.

The First Symphony is an early work, written when Enesco was 24, and therefore but partially indicative of the originality he was later to reveal. The orchestration, especially in the first two of the three movements, owes a good deal to Wagner's "Ring" and "The Mastersingers"; the third movement starts off with a strong suggestion of Brahms. Yet a good many pages herald the mature Enesco.

His technical prowess in 1906 was, however, extremely remarkable. The First Symphony is a "big," involved contrapuntal score, full of carefully planned effects of instrumental color. Additional evidence of talent may be found in the abundance of really songful melody.

Dinu Lipatti is a younger Rumanian musician, now nearly 22 and reportedly a pianist of considerable attainment. "Chef cu lautari," dating from 1934, is not a recipe for a Rumanian dish but a title meaning "merrymaking with fiddlers." A symphonic movement constituting the finale of a suite called "Satrarii" ("Gypsies"), "Chef cu lautari" is exuberantly good-natured, a little noisy, and calls upon the resources of a large orchestra. Perhaps it is superficial, but no estimate of a man's ability could be formed on so small a sample of his work. Until such time as the whole suite is played here, let the matter rest.

Mr. Enesco conducted his own music with the authority of a composer who is also a practical master of the orchestra and who can obtain from a large body of men just what he wants. His reading of the "Haffner" Symphony was among the best Mozart performances one has ever heard. True to the Mozart style and temper, it was also rhymically vigorous yet neat and precise.

That Mr. Enesco most favorably impressed the Friday audience was proved by hearty applause and numerous recalls to the stage.

C. W. D.

Georges Enesco Conducts Boston Symphony

B. Her. Jan. 14 1939

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 12th regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georges Enesco conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major, "Haffner," K. 385	Mozart
Rumanian Rhapsody No. 2 Op. 11	Enesco
"Chef cu lautari"	Lipatti
Symphony No. 1 in E flat major Op. 13	Enesco

Mr. Enesco's visit this year has been fully as enjoyable and rewarding as it was last season, which is to say that Boston has been honored to have this distinguished musician as guest-conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Enesco showed the most musicianly qualities as conductor in his interpretation of Mozart's Haffner Symphony. The performance was one of the most admirable precision, the keenest rhythmic vitality.

The full orchestra was employed, and the robustness of this music fully justified not cutting the strings down. In many ways this is the most "modernistic" of Mozart's symphonies and shows very well why conductors and builders of chamber music programs so frequently balance ultra-modern music with Mozart. There is a formal severity and, in the first and last movements, a certain cold brilliance which calls to mind a good deal of contemporary music. The latter characteristic is contrasted with a slow movement of the loveliest texture and the most graceful ornamentation. This symphony is, in truth, an undiluted joy.

Mr. Enesco's own talents as a composer seem to be best exemplified by relatively short flights of the imagination. The Second Rumanian Rhapsody, for example, is music that is exactly right for what it sets out to be, but the more pretentious First Symphony, in spite of many beautiful moments, is a bore. Both works were written before the war; and another way of putting this criticism would be to say that the symphony dates, whereas the rhapsody does not.

The Second Russian Rhapsody, which was heard yesterday for the first time at a Boston Symphony concert, is a very different work from the much more familiar First. The latter is sprightly and entertaining, the former is more truly rhapsodic. This is charming, romantic music with a particularly effective conclusion. The orchestra played it with the finest sonority of tone and smoothness of execution.

Dinu Lipatti is a young Rumanian composer who, if this piece is a good sample of his work, is by no means prematurely solemn. "Chef cu lautari" must be some sort of a portmanteau expression, which would have won the heart of Lewis Carroll, for it means both "to get drunk" and "to rejoice." Oh happy land that is candid enough to lump these terms together!

What sort of a merry-making has Mr. Lipatti taken us on? Well, it is as cheerful as Mr. Pickwick was before he fell asleep in the barrow and was wheeled away to the pound by Capt. Boldwig's men. There is no horrid after-effect, nothing for any one to hold his head over and murmur, like Mr. Snodgrass, "It was the salmon." In short, it is engaging music, somewhat obvious, perhaps, but always successfully genial.

Mr. Enesco's early Symphony came as rather a heavy anti-climax after the varied delights of the first part of the program. There is not much, after such a reaction, that one can say about it. What Mr. Enesco said so perfectly in the rhapsody he overstated in the symphony. One would certainly allow that a fine musician had written it, but not, as in the rhapsody, a composer of unusual talent and vivid imagination.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Mr. Enesco will also conduct the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts next week. He will then repeat some of this program, omit the symphony and offer instead the First Rumanian Rhapsody and his Second Suite. Next week Richard Burgin will conduct

---

THEATERS AND CONCERTS

SHUBERT—"Victoria Regina," Laurence Housman's biographical drama in a return engagement, with Helen Hayes in the title role, supported by Werner Bateman, Abraham Sofaer and many more; 8:30 P. M.

SYMPHONY HALL—The 12th regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georges Enesco, guest conductor, in Mozart's Haffner Symphony (K. 385); Dinu Lipatti "La Chef"; Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody No. 2 and Symphony No. 1 in E flat; 8:30 P. M.

SANDERS THEATER—In Cambridge, Russell Ames Cook will direct the Symphonic ensemble in the second of the junior morning concerts, assisted by Jesus Maria Sanroma and Mrs. Sanroma, pianists; 10:30 A. M.

January Busy Month for Concerts

B. Advertiser Jan. 15/39

By Ruth Masters
Music Editor

JANUARY continues to present a full calendar of music events,—Kirsten Flagstad's appearance in Symphony Hall this afternoon heading the "musts" for the week.

Arias from "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser," Schubert and Brahms lieder, a collection of Norwegian songs, finally a group of Strauss—the program might have been devised from special requests.

The Boston Morning Musicales always manage to be a highlight in whatever week they occur. Violinist Nathan Milstein is to be guest artist next Wednesday morning. If you are on the subscription list you know about it anyway.

Then there is Rachmaninoff, whose single Symphony Hall program of the season next Sunday afternoon consists of music by Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Rachmaninoff, Chopin, Liszt.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will manage to keep busy this week with concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon under the direction of Guest Conductor Georges Enesco, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening under the surveillance of Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor to Koussevitzky.

Enesco's programs will include Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major, Enesco's own Suite No. 2, and First Roumanian Rhapsody. In addition, Enesco will give the first performance hereabouts of Dinu Lipatti's "Chef cu lautari," which means "merry-making with fiddlers," and is the finale of a symphonic suite entitled "Satfarki," translated gypsies.

It again falls to Burgin's lot to present to Boston audiences a Shostakovitch work—in this case the Fifth Symphony. Otherwise next week-end's program will include Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and a new piece by Boston Symphony Orchestra 'Cellist Langendoen, called "Improvisations."

Jordan Hall concerts this week include a program by the Coolidge Quartette on Tuesday evening, the second in the series of chamber music concerts conducted by Bernard Zighera on Wednesday evening, a piano recital by Eugenia Buxton on Thursday evening.

The Diapason
Chicago-Ill

JAN 1 - 1939

BEETHOVEN MASS IN BOSTON; E. POWER BIGGS AT ORGAN

E. Power Biggs was the organ soloist for the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in D major by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky and the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, directed by G. Wallace Woodworth, Dec. 2 and 3. This was the eighth program of the symphony season. The RCA Manufacturing Company made records of the performance, so that it will be available to music-lovers everywhere.

The Beethoven work, his second mass, is a favorite with those who attend concerts in Boston. The first performance in Boston was by the Cecilia Society, B. J. Lang, conductor, March 12, 1897. The mass was performed at the dedication of Symphony Hall, Oct. 15, 1900, Wilhelm Gericke conducting, and the Cecilia Society appearing with the orchestra. There was a performance at the opening of the Beethoven centenary festival by this orchestra March 22, 1927, under the direction of Koussevitzky. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisted. The second performance by this orchestra was at a pension fund concert April 26, 1938, again with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe.

RARE MAHLER WORKS TO BE DONE

Chamber Orchestra to Play Them at Jordan Hall

B. Post Jan 16/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

RARE Mahler will be heard at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, at the second of the season's concerts of the Zighera Chamber Orchestra, hitherto known as the Boston Chamber Orchestra. With Cleora Wood, soprano, as the singer Mr. Zighera will present, for the first time here, since Paul Draper sang them at a pair of Symphony Concerts in the season of 1914-15, Mahler's "Lieder Eines Fahrenden Gesellen," or "Songs of a Travelling Journeyman." Aside from the music itself, simple, direct and appealing, in pseudo-folksong style, there is much of interest in this song-cycle, composed midway in Mahler's 24th year. The inspiration for the poems, which were Mahler's own, was his short-lived passion for Johanne Richter, one of the singers in the Opera House at Kassel, where he was then conducting. "In these poems," to quote the composer's biographer, Gabriel Engel, "he himself, is the one 'driven forth by the blue-eyes of his love'; and he departs broken-hearted to find his only consolation in the unchanging beauty and friendliness of nature."

Themes from this song-cycle found their way into Mahler's First Symphony, so eloquently disclosed to us by Mr. Mitropolis when he appeared as guest conductor at the Symphony Concerts two seasons ago. One of these is the opening phrase of the second song, "O'er the Fields I Went This Morn"; and the other occurs in the midst of the fourth, "The Two Blue Eyes." Like the song-cycle, the Symphony, which we of Boston should not be allowed to forget, is a personal document.

Speaking of both Mahler and Mr. Mitropolis, we read in the January issue of "Chord and Discord," the official organ of the Bruckner Society of America, that the Athenian conductor has recently been made an honorary member of the society (which labors also in Mahler's behalf), because of his past and prospective assiduity with Mahler's symphonies in Minneapolis. Last year Mr. Mitropolis gave the Minneapolitans not only the First Symphony but also the Fourth, which Boston has yet to hear; and this year he plans to introduce to the Twin Cities the Fifth and Ninth. It was Dr. Koussevitzky who made the Ninth known to Boston, and we are told that he will conduct it again sometime during the present season.

Of special interest in this issue of "Chord and Discord" are an article by Gabriel Engel dealing with the first four Bruckner Symphonies and one by William Parks Grant on "Mahler's Use of the Orchestra," a fertile field for discussion. Incidentally, Bruckner's Third Symphony which evoked warm praise from Richard Wagner, to whom it was dedicated, has not been played here since its single performance in 1901. Would it not bear reviving? According to Mr. Engel, it marks as great an advance over the Second, which has never been heard in Boston, as does Beethoven's "Eroica" over his Symphony in D major.

* * * *

Georges Enesco will conduct the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon and Richard Burgin, those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Besides Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and Lipatti's "Chef cu lautari" which he conducted here last week, Mr. Enesco will present his own Second Suite and First Roumanian Rhapsody. As for Mr. Burgin, he will introduce to Boston three works, the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, Alexander Tansman's orchestration of Bach's Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, and a Suite, "Improvisations" by Jacobus Langendoen, of the Orchestra's 'cello section, and conclude his programme with Liszt's "Les Preludes."

B. Globe Jan. 15/39

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

KIRSTEN FLAGSTAD, the great Wagnerian soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, at 3:30 this afternoon in a song recital. She will be accompanied by Edwin McArthur in the following program:

Aria, Elsa's Traum (Lohengrin), aria, Euch Luften die mein Klagen balcony scene, Act 11, from Lohengrin), aria, Dich theure Halle (Tannhauser), Wagner; An die Musik, Die Forelle, Ave Maria, Liebestreu, An Ein Veilchen, Wei froh und frisch, Brahms; sung in Norwegian: Fra Monte Pincio (Mount Pincio), Med en vandlilje (A Waterlily), Grieg; Det var en deilig hane (There was a lovely rooster), Hurum; Lykken mellem to mennesker (Our Happiness), Variengsler (Spring yearnings), Alnaes; Befreit, Du meines Harzens Kronelein, Wie sollten wir geheim sie halter, Strauss.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Georges Enesco guest conductor, at 8:15 tomorrow and 3 Tuesday afternoon. Third program of Monday-Tuesday series. Mr. Enesco will perform his own Second Suite and First Rumanian Rhapsody, the "Haffner" Symphony by Mozart, and the "Chef cu lautari" of his fellow-Rumanian, Dinu Lipatti. This piece is the finale of a symphonic suite, "Satrarii" ("Gypsies"), and the title means "merry-making with fiddlers."

The concerts Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 will be conducted by Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. The Fifth Symphony by the Soviet Russian composer, Dmitri Shostakovitch, will be given first local performances. Shostakovitch wrote his Fifth Symphony in 1937, in which year it was performed as part of a celebration of the 20th anniversary of the Soviet Republic, restoring the composer to the artistic favor from which he had fallen. The work, still in manuscript, has been performed in Paris and at an N. B. C. radio concert last April. The program otherwise includes the Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor (the so-called "Dorian"), by Bach, as orchestrated by Alexander Tansman; "Improvisations," a suite in four movements by Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony (the work will be given first American performances), and the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," by Liszt.

be piano soloist in the Quintet by her husband, Roy Harris. The two remaining numbers will be the Second Quartet, by Hummel, and Schubert's posthumous Quartet in G minor.

ZIGHERA CHAMBER ORCHESTRA, Bernard Zighera conductor, Wednesday evening. Cleora Wood, soprano, will be soloist in two groups of songs with small orchestra—the "Songs of a Wayfarer," by Gustav Mahler, and five numbers by Hugo Wolf. She will also be heard in Beethoven's "scena," "Ah! Perfido." The purely orchestral pieces will be a sinfonia by Boccherini (first time in Boston), and Jean Francaix' Serenade, also new to this city.

ENESCO GIVES EXTRA CONCERT

Takes Symphony Through Monday Series

B. Post Jan. 17/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The programme which Georges Enesco prepared for the Symphony Concerts of last evening and this afternoon, with which he concluded his present visit to Boston, is drawn in part from the list offered by him at the regular concerts of last week and from the one that he presented here last March. With Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony for beginning it proceeded through Lipatti's "Chef cu lautari," or "Merrymaking with Fiddlers," and Mr. Enesco's own Second Suite, to his two Rumanian Rhapsodies, the first of which brought the end.

Once more Mr. Enesco conducted a sound performance of Mozart's Symphony, a work heard less often than it deserves. Once more Lipatti's strongly rhythmed, not too subtle composition, greatly pleased an audience, as did the composer-conductor's Rhapsodies and Suite. The Second Rhapsody, introduced to Boston at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday, was added as an afterthought and, truth to tell, the First would would have made a stronger impression had it been heard uncompanioned by its less interesting successor.

As for the Suite, which Mr. Enesco made known to us last spring, though it has effective moments, it can hardly be said to improve greatly on further acquaintance. We have here another instance of new wine in old bottles, the sort of thing attempted, and to happier result, in Ravel's "The Tomb of Couperin." The difference between the two works is, indeed, the difference between talent and genius.

B. Her. Jan. 17/39

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The third concert of the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georges Enesco conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major, "Haffner," K. 385 . . . Mozart
"Chef cu lautari" . . . Lipatti
Suite for Orchestra No. 2 . . . Enesco
Rumanian Rhapsody No. 2 Op 11 . . Enesco
Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1 in A major, Op. 11 . . . Enesco

Mr. Enesco has had rather a full program of work during his current visit to Boston as guest-conductor of the orchestra. His programs at the Cambridge concert, the regular pair in Symphony Hall and the Monday-Tuesday series have, however, been much the same, with the exception that in last night's and this afternoon's concerts his Second Suite and First Rumanian Rhapsody have been substituted for his symphony. The change will not be regretted by those who heard the symphony, for Mr. Enesco's intensely romantic inspiration is better exemplified in a smaller form than a symphony, where his gifts tended to run to seed.

The suite, for example, which was heard here last year, may be cast in a classical, 18th century form; but its emotional content is remote from a set of stylized dances. Mr. Enesco has simply used a handy, ready-made form and poured into it his own, more exotic thought. The Second Rumanian Rhapsody again impressed us as music of remarkably poetic feeling. The rhythmic verve and popular brilliance of the familiar First Rhapsody is perhaps less typical of the pre-war period in music than its more nostalgic and romantic companion, though we must remember that this was a time when such composers as Stravinsky and Prokofieff were setting forth a newer and more incisive style. As a composer Mr. Enesco could not be considered a pioneer, though he has a right in view of the works played last night to be regarded as a creator of real talent.

Mr. Enesco's visit last year was so successful and the sincerity of his conducting so apparent, that it was only natural that he should have been asked to repeat it. With this afternoon's concert he brings that all too short visit to a close. He is also richly entitled to the evident spirit of cordiality that his audiences have clearly meant to express.

A. W. W.

B. Globe Jan. 17/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Subscribers to the Monday and Tuesday series of Boston Symphony concerts, as well as those who attend on Fridays and Saturdays, are privileged to hear Georges Enesco as guest conductor during his present visit to Boston. For the third program of the shorter series at Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Enesco began with two works from his concerts of last week—Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, and the "Chef cu Lautari" by the young Rumanian Dinu Lipatti. These he followed with his own Second Suite for Orchestra and, according to a late revision of the list, his two Rumanian Rhapsodies.

Both as composer and as an exceptionally modest and gifted conductor, Mr. Enesco again triumphed. The Monday audience, no less than those last week, accorded him gratifyingly warm applause. No doubt it is reasonable to claim that his rhapsodies, fascinating and altogether charming music, made a deeper popular impression than his Suite.

If the rhapsodies are less pretentious they are also, to one listener, fresher and more inspired than the Suite. The latter continues to interest because of its basic principle: Dissonant modern music cast in old forms. Yet it seems planned where the rhapsodies are a pure flow of melody, and abstractly intellectual while the evocations of the Rumanian folk spirit shed a friendly warmth.

Mr. Enesco will end his visit with this afternoon's program. The fourth concerts of the series, Feb. 20 and 21, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Myra Hess, pianist, will be soloist.—C. W. D.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

JAN 20 1939

CIVIC SYMPHONY

Arthur Fiedler, widely known as conductor of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra "pop" concerts, as well as through his recordings and radio broadcasts, and Louis Kazze, prominent Philadelphia pianist and composer, will be featured on a Philadelphia Civic Symphony orchestra concert program in Irvine auditorium, 34th and Spruce sts., tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 o'clock.

COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

JAN 12 1939

'CELLIST INSPIRED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

No less a giant in the musical world than Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, started the Russian-born 'cellist, Raya Garbousova, on her career.

As a girl of seven, Miss Garbousova heard Koussevitzky, one of the few virtuosi of the string bass, give a recital on his great instrument. Fascinated beyond measure, little Raya pleaded with her father, a professor in the conservatory of her native Tiflis, to buy her a similar instrument.

At first Father Garbousova laughed down his daughter's request, but, after three years, yielded to her insistent desire. Raya entered the conservatory and at 14 graduated and began appearing as a precocious 'cellist in the musical capitals of Europe.

Monday and Tuesday evenings, Jan. 16 and 17, Miss Garbousova presents a pair of recitals in Capital University's Mees Hall as items on the university's concert course. Tickets for each recital are on sale at Heaton's, Long's book store (Bibliophile), and the Capital box office.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 15 1939

THE ORCH

E RNEST SCHELLING will r

Boston Symphony in Benefit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will begin its next New York visit with a special concert in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night, February 8, for the benefit of its pension fund. The regular subscription concerts will be held in Carnegie Hall on Friday night (instead of the usual Thursday), February 10, and Saturday afternoon, February 11.

In the pension fund concert Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will wear eighteenth century costumes for Haydn's Farewell Symphony, in which Dr. Koussevitzky will impersonate the composer. The other numbers are Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" for the first time here, with Richard Hale as narrator, Viennese waltzes by Lanner and Johann Strauss, Sibelius's "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse." The Boston Symphony's next concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be Thursday night, February 9.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 11 1939

TOSCANINI DRAWS CHEERS IN BOSTON

Conservative Audience Breaks Out with Whistles After He Plays Brahms Third.

LEADS N. B. C. ORCHESTRA

Maestro of the Radio Will Play in Providence on February 7; Hall in Hub Is Packed

By G. Y. Loveridge

Boston, Jan. 10.—Arturo Toscanini descended from his Radio City Olympus to preside tonight at a concert with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall.

He will make only one other appearance in New England this season—in Providence the night of Feb. 7.

When Mr. Toscanini was here two years ago, he was the guest of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, which has Symphony ~~Hall as its~~ home grounds. Dr. Koussevitzky was on vacation in the South tonight, but there was no lack of welcome for the maestro of the air. Every seat in the auditorium was taken, at prices up to $10.

At first the conservative Bostonians were not overwhelming in their greeting, although they were sincere and cordial. But at the intermission, after the Brahms third, they called back the genius of the baton again and again, with handclapping, stamping and even whistling. He received the ovation with a dignified smile, and lifted his men to their feet twice to share the approval.

There to See the Man

There is little doubt that the audience was there more for the man than for the music, to see at work an almost legendary personage, in whose mind are stored millions of sounds and signs, all mysteriously in order, all waiting to be drawn forth and woven into significant patterns. Through Scarlatti, Brahms, Wagner el he moved, never referring ore—indeed, having no score to refer to—and yet always f his way.

A rather short man he is, aging and yet vigorous. A wreath of silver hair encircles his head. His intense eyes peer out from under dark brows. He stands facing the audience for a moment, bowing to applause, then turns and raises the baton in his right hand, gives the signal for the orchestra to play. The baton rises and falls vehemently, sometimes straight up and down, sometimes in an ellipse, sometimes sweeping back and forth in front of him, while his left hand molds the plastic sound. Now the index finger brings in a bassoon, or lingers in front of his lips to signify pianissimo, or the sensitive hand smooths the violins into a whisper. He does not seem excited himself, but he makes the music exciting.

Plays Scarlatti Sonata

Mr. Toscanini began his program with one of those early suites, arranged for orchestra, which he has shown liking for in his radio programs. This one was four sonatas by Domenico Scarlatti, orchestrated by Vincenzo Tommasini. A harpsichord and small orchestra were required. The suite was performed with great clarity and delicacy.

The full orchestra then took its place for the Brahms symphony in F-major, opus 90. This beautiful work, with its many lyrical utterances and its fine coloring, was brilliantly played. The woodwinds were notable in the andante, and throughout the symphony there was much to admire in the evenness and flexibility of tone. After this work, Mr. Toscanini and the orchestra were mightily applauded.

The second part of the concert brought two excerpts from Wagner—the "Waldweben," from Act II of "Siegfried," and Siegfried's death and funeral march, from Act III of "Die Gotterdammerung"—and the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel.

Mr. Toscanini now let the orchestra out in earnest. The death and funeral march music, with its portentous drums and its stirring climaxes, and the delicate string murmurings of the "Waldweben" were marvellously done. The Ravel suite, one of the special wonders of the Boston Symphony, showed that the N. B. C. Symphony likewise has its magnificent solo voices, and that it can storm forth with a climax that rolls almost visible waves of sound down the auditorium.

This is an orchestra of which the leader is an acknowledged genius and each man a virtuoso, marvellous to hear. And yet, in our opinion, it is not the peer of the Boston Symphony. To reach that standard takes more than men and money. It also takes time.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 14 1939

Koussevitzky in Costume.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special concert for the benefit of its pension fund in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, February 8, it was announced today. A most unusual program has been prepared for the occasion, not the least feature of which will be the appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men in eighteenth century costumes while they are playing Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony.

Other works scheduled are Louis Gruenberg's setting of Vachel Lindsay's "The Daniel of Jazz," and the first New York performance of Prokofieff's orchestral fairy-tale, "Peter and the Wolf." The second half of the program will be devoted to tracing the waltz from its early Viennese development to works in that form by Ravel and Sibelius.

New Bedford Mercury Jan 18/39

Georges Enesco Returns In Stimulating Nobility

After the fifth appearance in five days of Georges Enesco as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in programs nearly identical it seems superfluous for an outlander to offer remarks on the commuters' matinee which yesterday made the third of its series. But returning with one of those magic, salmon covered booklets (that even Mr. Chippendale would consider a dignified badge of Boston culture) scrawled all over with fresh impressions and a first experience of the admirable Roumanian composer, violinist and conductor, we feel we have something to contribute in praise of as stimulating a symphony concert as years of their following have offered.

It was only last March that Enesco was guest conductor with the orchestra in Symphony Hall. His return in less than a year and the cheers that it is said greeted his conducting in Cambridge last week are understood by evidence of the quickened response we joyously gave to all he offered. The man gets into one's affections the moment he takes the stage by his attractive face coupled with a slight suggestion of physical disability, but vigor for conducting he has without stint. For the Mozart (Haffner) symphony there was a lift of both hands in ever higher horizontal planes; an infinite descriptiveness of hands and fingers for shading; great arcs for sweeps of sound; a punch of decision and force. All was clear, and followed by the orchestra in general intent, but one felt that in the mind of the director there was more of subtlety than he received.

However, this rather sturdily classic exposition served as contrast—bringing out the magnificent romanticism, fire, folk beauty and originality of musical thought inherent in all three programed works of the composer-conductor. The addition of the Roumanian Rhapsody No. 2 in D major No. 11 to that in A major, No. 1 with his Suite for Orchestra No. 2 in C major, Op .20 gave comprehensively of his style—the flavorsome but discreetly used instrumentation, the freshness of themes; the compactly treated score, solidified with brass never stridently used, turning its corners with kettledrum accent that never encroached on the beauties of kindlier instruments. Perhaps it was the conductor's personal control of cymbals, triangles and drums that kept them in a felicitous balance quite unusual.

The Suite was, in this reviewer's opinion, the most exciting experience. Cast in the old dance form style, it had a novelty and fertility of musical expression that should shame the poverty of some of our modernists. The Sarabande went briefly like a waft from the rose fields of Central Europe; the Gigue, strange and stimulating in its content; the Menuet, opening majestically, had a percussion gravity of emphasis beyond mere social stateliness; the air, in andante mood of woodwinds carried with mournful, deep poeticism; while the Bourree, unusually long, frequent of pause, was unfailing of variations in its repetitive rhythms.

In the Rhapsody No. 2 there was employment of the warmer strings—the viola solo on a dance tune followed by the lament of the English horn. The more familiar No. 1 was recreated. In these as in the movement from the Gypsy suite of the younger Roumanian, Lipatti, which came in sustained orchestral flicker like some cocktail of novel ingredients, the players of the Boston Symphony gave virtuoso response and concluded smiling, with eager applause for the conductor.

A. C. R.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Globe

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Jan. 15/39

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

KIRSTEN FLAGSTAD, the great Wagnerian soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, at 3:30 this afternoon in a song recital. She will be accompanied by Edwin McArthur in the following program:

Aria, Elsa's Traum (Lohengrin), aria, Euch Luften die mein Klagen balcony scene, Act 11, from Lohengrin), aria, Dich theure Halle (Tannhauser), Wagner; An die Musik, Die Forelle, Ave Maria, Liebestreu, An Ein Veilchen, Wei froh und frisch, Brahms; sung in Norwegian: Fra Monte Pincio (Mount Pincio), Med en vandlilje (A Waterlily), Grieg; Det var en deilig hane (There was a lovely rooster), Hurum; Lykken mellem to mennesker (Our Happiness), Variengsler (Spring yearnings), Alnaes; Befreit, Du meines Harzens Kronelein, Wie sollten wir geheim sie halter, Strauss.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Georges Enesco guest conductor, at 8:15 tomorrow and 3 Tuesday afternoon. Third program of Monday-Tuesday series. Mr. Enesco will perform his own Second Suite and First Rumanian Rhapsody, the "Haffner" Symphony by Mozart, and the "Chef cu lautari" of his fellow-Rumanian, Dinu Lipatti. This piece is the finale of a symphonic suite, "Satrarii" ("Gypsies"), and the title means "merry-making with fiddlers."

The concerts Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 will be conducted by Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. The Fifth Symphony by the Soviet Russian composer, Dmitri Shostakovitch, will be given first local performances. Shostakovitch wrote his Fifth Symphony in 1937, in which year it was performed as part of a celebration of the 20th anniversary of the Soviet Republic, restoring the composer to the artistic favor from which he had fallen. The work, still in manuscript, has been performed in Paris and at an N. B. C. radio concert last April. The program otherwise includes the Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor (the so-called "Dorian"), by Bach, as orchestrated by Alexander Tansman; "Improvisations," a suite in four movements by Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony (the work will be given first American performances), and the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," by Liszt.

be piano soloist in the Quintet by her husband, Roy Harris. The two remaining numbers will be the Second Quartet, by Hummel, and Schubert's posthumous Quartet in G minor.

ZIGHERA CHAMBER ORCHESTRA, Bernard Zighera conductor, Wednesday evening. Cleora Wood, soprano, will be soloist in two groups of songs with small orchestra—the "Songs of a Wayfarer," by Gustav Mahler, and five numbers by Hugo Wolf. She will also be heard in Beethoven's "scena," "Ah! Perfido." The purely orchestral pieces will be a sinfonia by Boccherini (first time in Boston), and Jean Francaix' Serenade, also new to this city.

ENESCO GIVES EXTRA CONCERT

Takes Symphony Through Monday Series

B. Post Jan. 17/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The programme which Georges Enesco prepared for the Symphony Concerts of last evening and this afternoon, with which he concluded his present visit to Boston, is drawn in part from the list offered by him at the regular concerts of last week and from the one that he presented here last March. With Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony for beginning it proceeded through Lipatti's "Chef cu lautari," or "Merry-making with Fiddlers," and Mr. Enesco's own Second Suite, to his two Rumanian Rhapsodies, the first of which brought the end.

Once more Mr. Enesco conducted a sound performance of Mozart's Symphony, a work heard less often than it deserves. Once more Lipatti's strongly rhythmed, not too subtle composition, greatly pleased an audience, as did the composer-conductor's Rhapsodies and Suite. The Second Rhapsody, introduced to Boston at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday, was added as an afterthought and, truth to tell, the First would would have made a stronger impression had it been heard uncompanioned by its less interesting successor.

As for the Suite, which Mr. Enesco made known to us last spring, though it has effective moments, it can hardly be said to improve greatly on further acquaintance. We have here another instance of new wine in old bottles, the sort of thing attempted, and to happier result, in Ravel's "The Tomb of Couperin." The difference between the two works is, indeed, the difference between talent and genius.

COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

JAN 12 1939

'CELLIST INSPIRED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

No less a giant in the musical world than Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, started the Russian-born 'cellist, Raya Garbousova, on her career.

As a girl of seven, Miss Garbousova heard Koussevitzky, one of the few virtuosi of the string bass, give a recital on his great instrument. Fascinated beyond measure, little Raya pleaded with her father, a professor in the conservatory of her native Tiflis, to buy her a similar instrument.

At first Father Garbousova laughed down his daughter's request, but, after three years, yielded to her insistent desire. Raya entered the conservatory and at 14 graduated and began appearing as a precocious 'cellist in the musical capitals of Europe.

Monday and Tuesday evenings, Jan. 16 and 17, Miss Garbousova presents a pair of recitals in Capital University's Mees Hall as items on the university's concert course. Tickets for each recital are on sale at Heaton's, Long's book store (Bibliophile), and the Capital box office.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 15 1939

THE OR

ERNEST SCHELLING will r

Boston Symphony in Benefit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will begin its next New York visit with a special concert in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night, February 8, for the benefit of its pension fund. The regular subscription concerts will be held in Carnegie Hall on Friday night (instead of the usual Thursday), February 10, and Saturday afternoon, February 11.

In the pension fund concert Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will wear eighteenth century costumes for Haydn's Farewell Symphony, in which Dr. Koussevitzky will impersonate the composer. The other numbers are Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" for the first time here, with Richard Hale as narrator, Viennese waltzes by Lanner and Johann Strauss, Sibelius's "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse." The Boston Symphony's next concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be Thursday night, February 9.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 11 1939

TOSCANINI DRAWS CHEERS IN BOSTON

Conservative Audience Breaks Out with Whistles After He Plays Brahms Third.

LEADS N. B. C. ORCHESTRA

Maestro of the Radio Will Play in Providence on February 7; Hall in Hub Is Packed

By G. Y. Loveridge

Boston, Jan. 10.—Arturo Toscanini descended from his Radio City Olympus to preside tonight at a concert with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall.

He will make only one other appearance in New England this season—in Providence the night of Feb. 7.

When Mr. Toscanini was here two years ago, he was the guest of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, which has Symphony ~~Hall as its~~ home grounds. Dr. Koussevitzky was on vacation in the South tonight, but there was no lack of welcome for the maestro of the air. Every seat in the auditorium was taken, at prices up to $10.

At first the conservative Bostonians were not overwhelming in their greeting, although they were sincere and cordial. But at the intermission, after the Brahms third, they called back the genius of the baton again and again, with handclapping, stamping and even whistling. He received the ovation with a dignified smile, and lifted his men to their feet twice to share the approval.

There to See the Man

There is little doubt that the audience was there more for the man than for the music, to see at work an almost legendary personage, in whose mind are stored millions of sounds and signs, all mysteriously in order, all waiting to be drawn forth and woven into significant patterns. [illegible] Scarlatti, Brahms, Wagner [illegible]d Ravel he moved, never referring [illegible] a score—indeed, having no score [illegible] hand to refer to—and yet always [illegible] of his way.

A rather short man he is, aging and yet vigorous. A wreath of silver hair encircles his head. His intense eyes peer out from under dark brows. He stands facing the audience for a moment, bowing to applause, then turns and raises the baton in his right hand, gives the signal for the orchestra to play. The baton rises and falls vehemently, sometimes straight up and down, sometimes in an ellipse, sometimes sweeping back and forth in front of him, while his left hand molds the plastic sound. Now the index finger brings in a bassoon, or lingers in front of his lips to signify pianissimo, or the sensitive hand smooths the violins into a whisper. He does not seem excited himself, but he makes the music exciting.

Plays Scarlatti Sonata

Mr. Toscanini began his program with one of those early suites, arranged for orchestra, which he has shown liking for in his radio programs. This one was four sonatas by Domenico Scarlatti, orchestrated by Vincenzo Tommasini. A harpsichord and small orchestra were required. The suite was performed with great clarity and delicacy.

The full orchestra then took its place for the Brahms symphony in F-major, opus 90. This beautiful work, with its many lyrical utterances and its fine coloring, was brilliantly played. The woodwinds were notable in the andante, and throughout the symphony there was much to admire in the evenness and flexibility of tone. After this work, Mr. Toscanini and the orchestra were mightily applauded.

The second part of the concert brought two excerpts from Wagner—the "Waldweben," from Act II of "Siegfried," and Siegfried's death and funeral march, from Act III of "Die Gotterdammerung"—and the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel.

Mr. Toscanini now let the orchestra out in earnest. The death and funeral march music, with its portentous drums and its stirring climaxes, and the delicate string murmurings of the "Waldweben" were marvellously done. The Ravel suite, one of the special wonders of the Boston Symphony, showed that the N. B. C. Symphony likewise has its magnificent solo voices, and that it can storm forth with a climax that rolls almost visible waves of sound down the auditorium.

This is an orchestra of which the leader is an acknowledged genius and each man a virtuoso, marvellous to hear. And yet, in our opinion, it is not the peer of the Boston Symphony. To reach that standard takes more than men and money. It also takes time.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 14 1939

Koussevitzky in Costume.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special concert for the benefit of its pension fund in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, February 8, it was announced today. A most unusual program has been prepared for the occasion, not the least feature of which will be the appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men in eighteenth century costumes while they are playing Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony.

Other works scheduled are Louis Gruenberg's setting of Vachel Lindsay's "The Daniel of Jazz," and the first New York performance of Prokofieff's orchestral fairy-tale, "Peter and the Wolf." The second half of the program will be devoted to tracing the waltz from its early Viennese development to works in that form by Ravel and Sibelius.

Georges Enesco Returns In Stimulating Nobility

New Bedford Mercury Jan 18/39

After the fifth appearance in five days of Georges Enesco as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in programs nearly identical, it seems superfluous for an outlander to offer remarks on the commuters' matinee which yesterday made the third of its series. But returning with one of those magic, salmon covered booklets (that even Mr. Chippendale would consider a dignified badge of Boston culture) scrawled all over with fresh impressions and a first experience of the admirable Roumanian composer, violinist and conductor, we feel we have something to contribute in praise of as stimulating a symphony concert as years of their following have offered.

It was only last March that Enesco was guest conductor with the orchestra in Symphony Hall. His return in less than a year and the cheers that it is said greeted his conducting in Cambridge last week are understood by evidence of the quickened response we joyously gave to all he offered. The man gets into one's affections the moment he takes the stage by his attractive face coupled with a slight suggestion of physical disability, but vigor for conducting he has without stint. For the Mozart (Haffner) symphony there was a lift of both hands in ever higher horizontal planes; an infinite descriptiveness of hands and fingers for shading; great arcs for sweeps of sound; a punch of decision and force. All was clear, and followed by the orchestra in general intent, but one felt that in the mind of the director there was more of subtlety than he received.

However, this rather sturdily classic exposition served as contrast—bringing out the magnificent romanticism, fire, folk beauty and originality of musical thought inherent in all three programed works of the composer-conductor. The addition of the Roumanian Rhapsody No. 2 in D major No. 11 to that in A major, No. 1 with his Suite for Orchestra No. 2 in C major, Op .20 gave comprehensively of his style—the flavorsome but discreetly used instrumentation, the freshness of themes; the compactly treated score, solidified with brass never stridently used, turning its corners with kettledrum accent that never encroached on the beauties of kindlier instruments. Perhaps it was the conductor's personal control of cymbals, triangles and drums that kept them in a felicitous balance quite unusual.

The Suite was, in this reviewer's opinion, the most exciting experience. Cast in the old dance form style, it had a novelty and fertility of musical expression that should shame the poverty of some of our modernists. The Sarabande went briefly like a waft from the rose fields of Central Europe; the Gigue, strange and stimulating in its content; the Menuet, opening majestically, had a percussion gravity of emphasis beyond mere social stateliness; the air, in andante mood of woodwinds carried with mournful, deep poeticism; while the Bourree, unusually long, frequent of pause, was unfailing of variations in its repetitive rhythms.

In the Rhapsody No. 2 there was employment of the warmer strings—the viola solo on a dance tune followed by the lament of the English horn. The more familiar No. 1 was recreated. In these as in the movement from the Gypsy suite of the younger Roumanian, Lipatti, which came in sustained orchestral flicker like some cocktail of novel ingredients, the players of the Boston Symphony gave virtuoso response and concluded smiling, with eager applause for the conductor.

A. C. R.

B. Her.

MUSIC

Jan. 17/39

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The third concert of the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georges Enesco conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major, "Haffner," K. 385	Mozart
"Chef cu lautari"	Lipatti
Suite for Orchestra No. 2	Enesco
Rumanian Rhapsody No. 2 Op 11	Enesco
Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1 in A major, Op. 11	Enesco

Mr. Enesco has had rather a full program of work during his current visit to Boston as guest-conductor of the orchestra. His programs at the Cambridge concert, the regular pair in Symphony Hall and the Monday-Tuesday series have, however, been much the same, with the exception that in last night's and this afternoon's concerts his Second Suite and First Rumanian Rhapsody have been substituted for his symphony. The change will not be regretted by those who heard the symphony, for Mr. Enesco's intensely romantic inspiration is better exemplified in a smaller form than a symphony, where his gifts tended to run to seed.

The suite, for example, which was heard here last year, may be cast in a classical, 18th century form; but its emotional content is remote from a set of stylized dances. Mr. Enesco has simply used a handy, ready-made form and poured into it his own, more exotic thought. The Second Rumanian Rhapsody again impressed us as music of remarkably poetic feeling. The rhythmic verve and popular brilliance of the familiar First Rhapsody is perhaps less typical of the pre-war period in music than its more nostalgic and romantic companion, though we must remember that this was a time when such composers as Stravinsky and Prokofieff were setting forth a newer and more incisive style. As a composer Mr. Enesco could not be considered a pioneer, though he has a right in view of the works played last night to be regarded as a creator of real talent.

Mr. Enesco's visit last year was so successful and the sincerity of his conducting so apparent, that it was only natural that he should have been asked to repeat it. With this afternoon's concert he brings that all too short visit to a close. He is also richly entitled to the evident spirit of cordiality that his audiences have clearly meant to express.

A. W. W.

B. Globe

MUSIC

Jan. 17/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Subscribers to the Monday and Tuesday series of Boston Symphony concerts, as well as those who attend on Fridays and Saturdays, are privileged to hear Georges Enesco as guest conductor during his present visit to Boston. For the third program of the shorter series at Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Enesco began with two works from his concerts of last week—Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, and the "Chef cu Lautari" by the young Rumanian Dinu Lipatti. These he followed with his own Second Suite for Orchestra and, according to a late revision of the list, his two Rumanian Rhapsodies.

Both as composer and as an exceptionally modest and gifted conductor, Mr. Enesco again triumphed. The Monday audience, no less than those last week, accorded him gratifyingly warm applause. No doubt it is reasonable to claim that his rhapsodies, fascinating and altogether charming music, made a deeper popular impression than his Suite.

If the rhapsodies are less pretentious they are also, to one listener, fresher and more inspired than the Suite. The latter continues to interest because of its basic principle: Dissonant modern music cast in old forms. Yet it seems planned where the rhapsodies are a pure flow of melody, and abstractly intellectual while the evocations of the Rumanian folk spirit shed a friendly warmth.

Mr. Enesco will end his visit with this afternoon's program. The fourth concerts of the series, Feb. 20 and 21, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Myra Hess, pianist, will be soloist.—C. W. D.

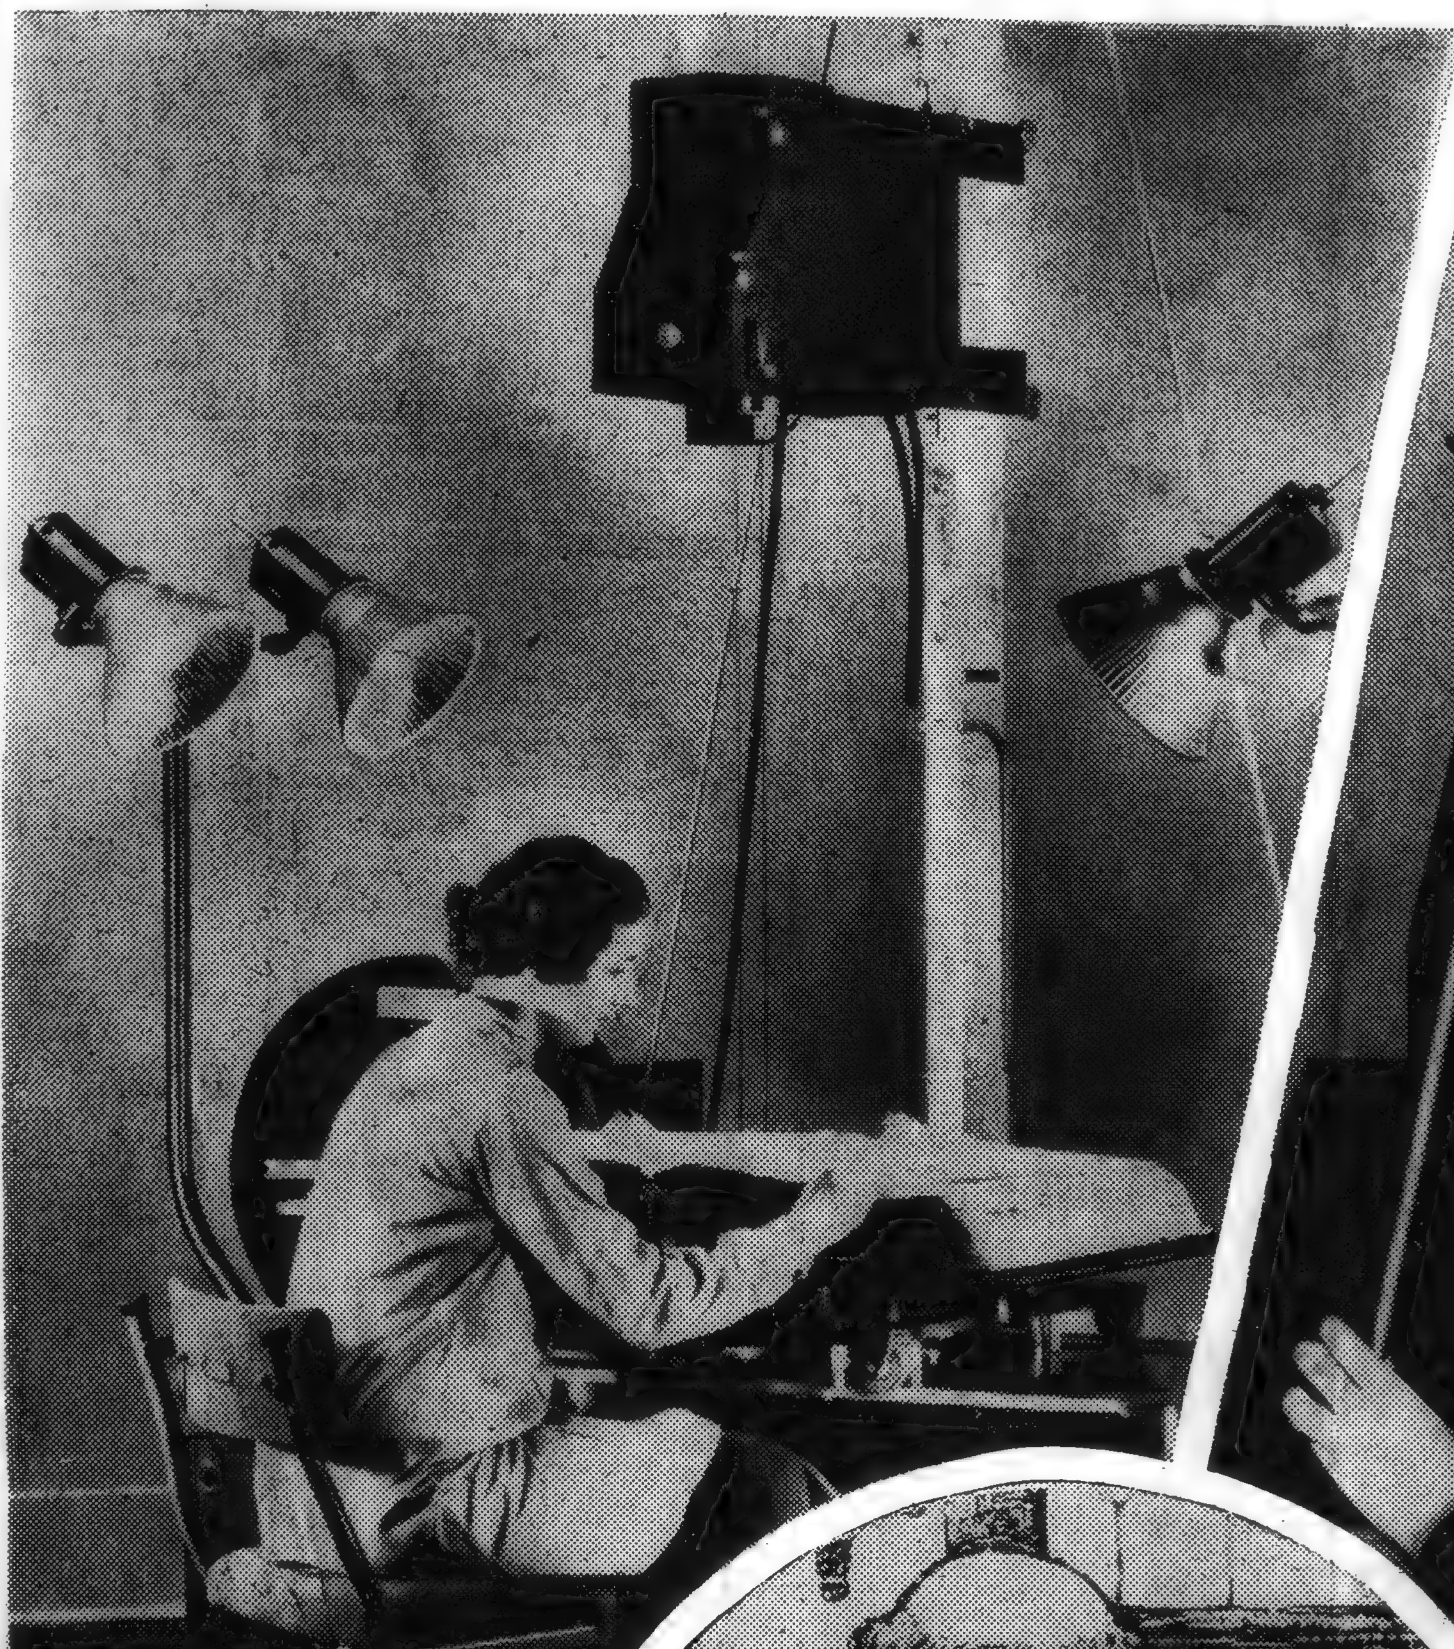
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

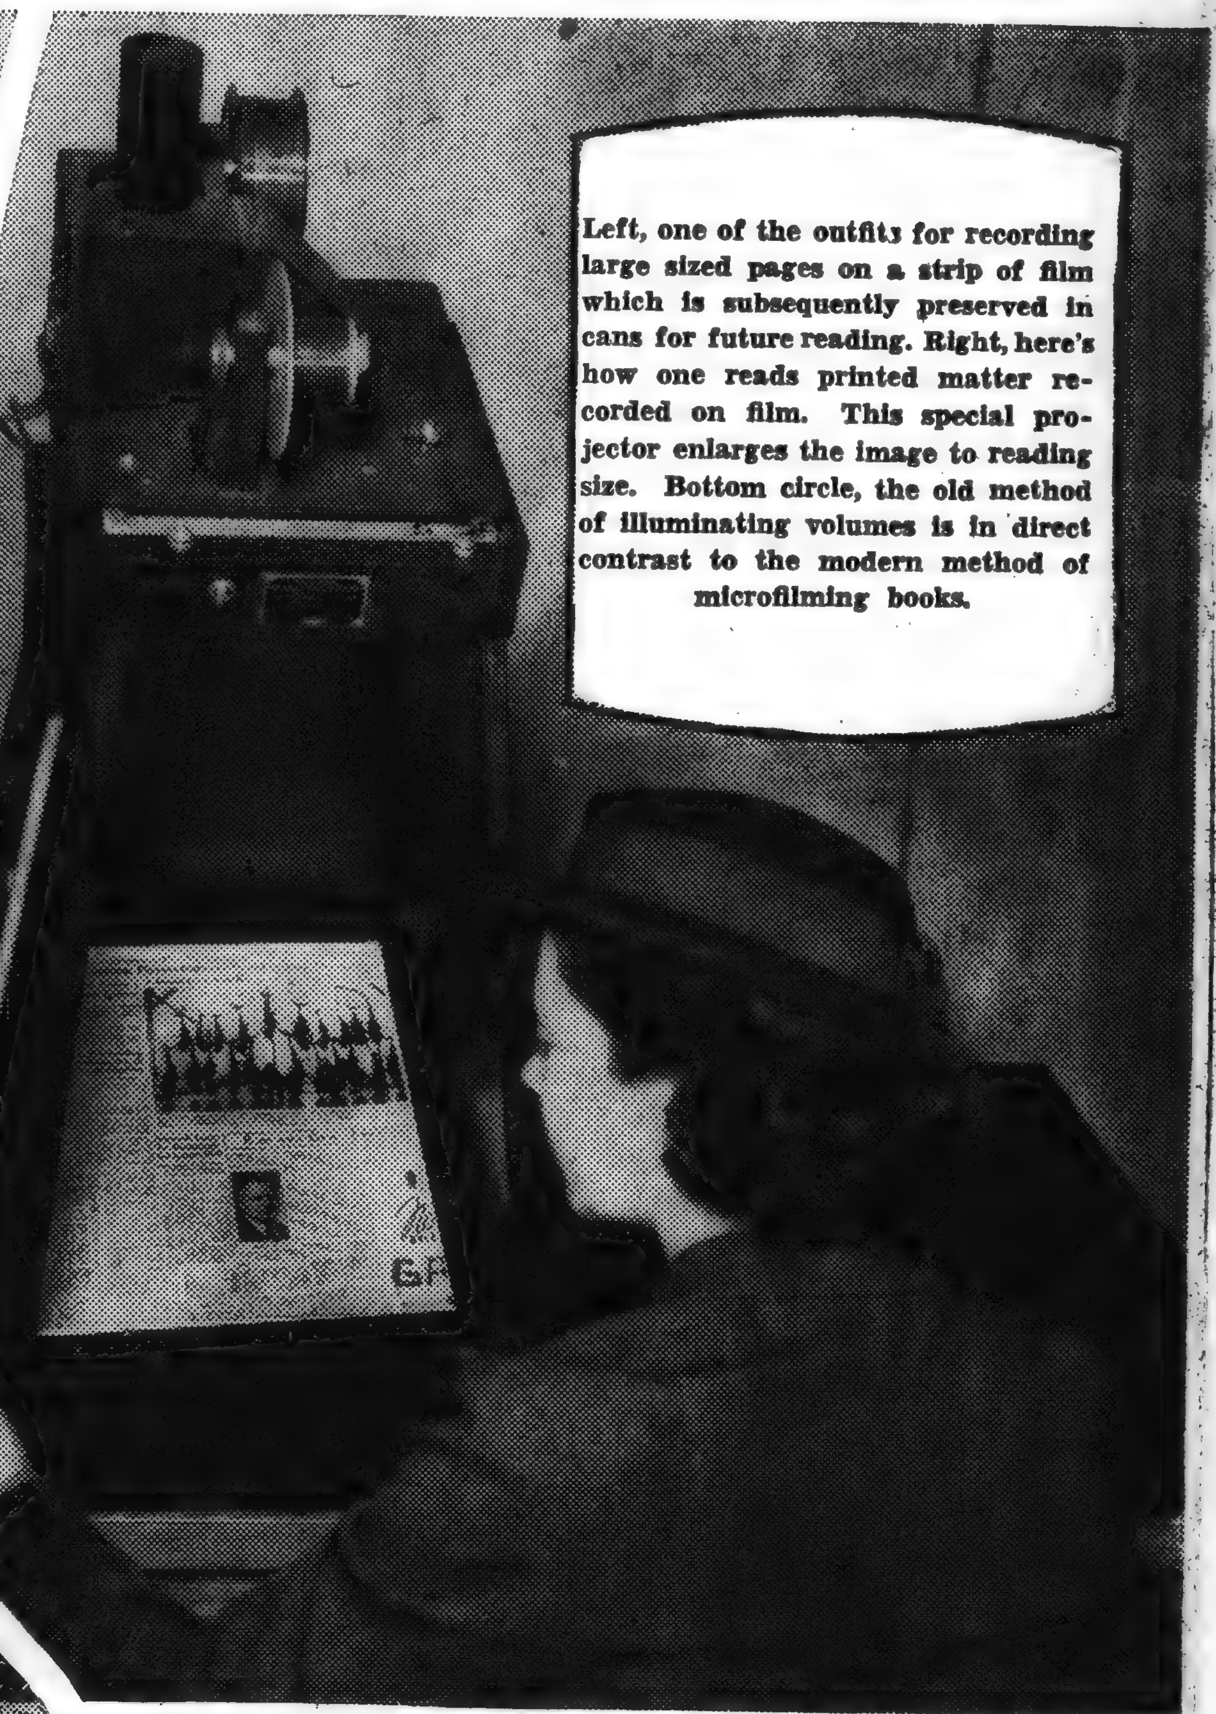
JAN 20 1939

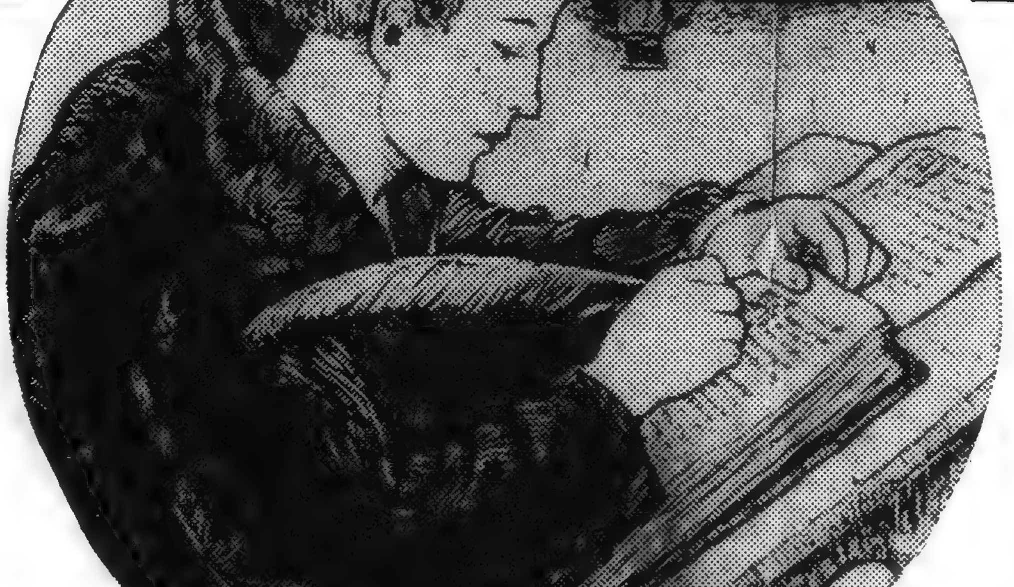
CIVIC SYMPHONY

Arthur Fiedler, widely known as conductor of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra "pop" concerts, as well as through his recordings and radio broadcasts, and Louis Kazze, prominent Philadelphia pianist and composer, will be featured on a Philadelphia Civic Symphony orchestra concert program in Irvine auditorium, 34th and Spruce sts., tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 o'clock.

Canned Reading







Left, one of the outfits for recording large sized pages on a strip of film which is subsequently preserved in cans for future reading. Right, here's how one reads printed matter recorded on film. This special projector enlarges the image to reading size. Bottom circle, the old method of illuminating volumes is in direct contrast to the modern method of microfilming books.

Microfilm Is The Latest In Library Aids

Complete Book Preserved In Tins on Tiny Film For Future Perusal by Special Projector

By A. M. HALPERN

In the space no larger than that occupied by a postage stamp the page of the future dictionary, telephone book, popular magazine, newspaper page or best seller will be compressed without the loss of a letter or the blurring of a single detail!

Newspaper files, out-of-print and rare books, permanent records and documents are regularly being reduced to miniature proportions for storage and preservation by libraries and government agencies.

Microfilm, the medium of the microscopic page, announces the dawn of a new era in the publication field. Hailed by educators as the vehicle for a "democracy of brains," this new style of presenting and preserving the printed word is expected to have as far-reaching significance in spreading thought and knowledge as the invention in 1450 of movable type by Gutenberg, the father of modern printing.

Here in Massachusetts the Boston Public and the Harvard University libraries have already adopted this new form, and both institutions possess library projectors by which the miniature pages are magnified to readable dimensions. Both at Harvard and the Boston Public Library, filmbooks are replacing the old style bound newspaper files.

Of 30-odd newspapers being regularly microfilmed by libraries in 1937, Boston accounted for 13. The library was among the first in the world to adopt this form for preserving newspaper files, starting the project two years ago.

At Harvard a project photographing 35 foreign newspapers is in process. Rare and valuable books from the treasure rooms of the Boston Public and Widener libraries—not available to readers in the original—are being copied and made available for use. The Bay Psalm book (1640), first book printed in America, is being put on film at the Boston library.

TAKES SMALL SPACE

Over 12,000 volumes of bound newspapers, including a rare collection of colonial and early American newspapers, are housed in the main building of the Boston Public Library. The Copley square structure, one of the finest in the nation, was built in 1895 and has had one addition since. Storage space is coming of increasing premium with the room demanded for preservation and storage of newspaper files requiring immediate attention.

Bound newspaper volumes—the continuing record of a city, state, nation, world held in trust for future historians and contemporary reference—give these custodians of the world's diary no end of worry.

In the customary form they are heavy, awkward to handle, the paper is of wood pulp and perishable, occupies too much valuable space when not in use, pages are easily torn, mutilated or removed. The application of microphotography to this department solved both problems: storage and preservation.

In the space that two bound volumes of a daily paper covering a six months period requires, it is possible to get between 45 and 50 years of the same paper in film cartridges. A library of 1,000,000 volumes—the strength of the Boston public—is estimated to weigh about 750 tons and take a four-story building to house the collection. The same on microfilm would demand only a fraction of the room and weigh about one-hundredth of the original. By this process the capacity of libraries is infinitely increased.

LITTLE PHOTOSTATS

W. Llewelyn Raney, director of the libraries of the University of Chicago, in discussing "Microphotography for Libraries" pointed out its effect on education. He said in part:

"The application of the camera to the production of literature ranks next to that of the printing press.

"Here is the cure for the newspaper's crumbling, and the substitute for its bulk or any bulk. Your future dictionary and telephone directory may be read on film. Here is the way to get cheaply—and keep—the distant periodical article or chapter in a book, without robbing the distant reader. A rarity in possession can thus be spared much handling.

"Here is the way the scientist can command the whole journal output of his specialty—he can maintain his mastery wherever he lives.

"For a cent a page you will be able to have miniature photostats you can read comfortably with a hand or desk lens. Thus a late-born institution can bring the out-of-print to life again and gather localized source material without change of ownership. Here is the opportunity for even the smallest libraries, by copied page and scene, to record the community's life of today for the reader of tomorrow. Here's the way you get what you want when you want it without first demonstrating that others want it, too—the edition of one is yours for the price of a type-set copy.

DEVELOPMENT

"The young impecunious doctor of philosophy may find here the way to present his dissertation, and the specialist in general has thus a medium for his message to the smallest circle. The reader, whether general or particular, has in this process an invaluable ally.

"This is the democracy of brains."

Microphotography has had an interesting development. It was first put to use during the siege of Paris in 1870, when the first city of France, hungry for news and food, cut off from the outside by the enemy, sent aloft two balloons carrying photographers and carrier pigeons. One of the bird messengers reached Mont St. Sulpice, where Photographer Dagron was concealed to effect a linking of the beleagued city with the outside.

He was successful in getting many thousand film messages of official and news significance through by carrier pigeons during the siege. In this book, "The Post by Travelling Pigeons," he retells his experiences.

It was not until 52 years later, in 1932, that microfilm was to become important. The Empire Trust Company of New York at that time started to photograph checks and bank records for permanent files to determine the practicability of microfilm. In the decade before, however, private scholars going to foreign museums and libraries for research and study copied rare material with the camera for re-examination and close study on return home.

The candid camera was not practical and too expensive for large scale microfilming. The ideal of microfilming scholarly material was born. With the perfection of special lens and developers and projectors capable of returning the miniature film to the original size without loss of any of its readability, the libraries went into the field.

Early in 1930 two camera companies applied themselves to perfecting machines to microfilm and project film. Now banks, department stores, government bureaus and libraries have found increasing use for this new industry. New inventions are constantly increasing the application and uses of microfilm. Firms are currently working on machines that will be available for home use and in the popular price range.

The principle on which this new conception rests is summed up in the slogan, "When not in use, reduce."

Books, documents, in fact any pages that have been or can be printed, are squeezed down to microscopic size for storage and transportation with the original, full-sized pages reduced in area from 150 to 400 times by the most accurate kind of microphotography, recorded imperishably on especially treated film, then housed in sealed cartridges, ready for reading.

The reading is accomplished by returning these tiny pages to normal or larger size on reading devices. By inserting a filmbook in the projector, turning on light source, the chosen lines or page appear full size on a reading screen. Pressing a button or turning a selector handle is, in this method, the equivalent of "turning the page" in the old manner.

MUSIC

Globe B. Jan 21/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the second half of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's midseason vacation, yesterday gave the first Boston performance of the Fifth Symphony by Dmitri Shostakovitch. For the remainder of a program which, it must be confessed, was distinctly on the dullish side, Mr. Burgin assembled the orchestral transcription by Alexander Tansman of Bach's D minor Organ Toccata and its accompanying "Dorian" Fugue; Liszt's "Les Preludes," and a work new to this country, the "Improvisations for Orchestra" by Jakobus Langendoen, cellist of the Boston Symphony.

A few years ago Dmitri Shostakovitch was much in the public eye, because the young composer of Soviet Russia had written a First Symphony that augured a brilliant future. Later he created that controversial opera "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." And then, reportedly because his music had ceased to express the esthetic ideology of the Soviet state, Shostakovitch fell from public approval.

The Fifth Symphony, first performed in Russian during the festivities of 1937, commemorating the establishment of the Bolshevik Government, proved the means of returning him to favor. Whether a composer ought to write music as he feels it inwardly, or whether the tonal art may be used to express political and other ideas, is a long and not very profitable argument. John N. Burk, in his truly admirable note on the Fifth Symphony in the program book, has written shrewd words on the subject.

Purely as music, the Fifth Symphony turned out a sad disappointment, agreeable in some pages—notably the slow movement—but prevailingly unoriginal, longwinded and banal. Though written for orchestra with obvious technical skill, the work served only to exemplify the axiom that no amount of technic can make up for lack of genuine inspiration.

Mr. Langendcen was called from his seat in the cello section to respond to the hearty applause bestowed upon his "Improvisations." His music, falling in four sections, may not be highly individual, but it is imaginative and full of substance. Mr. Gillet was likewise singled out for fine playing of his exacting part for oboe.

Tansman's version of the Bach Toccata and Fugue is a musicianly job that has provided a brilliant orchestral dress without unduly inflating the original. Nor did Tansman seek out spurious "organ effects." This transcription ought to be heard again. Liszt's grand old tone poem, however pompous is may seem in this casual age, is exciting music. Once again, because of sheer gusto, it brought evident pleasure to an audience.

That the conducting of Mr. Burgin was of high order hardly needs to be said. Upon each occasion that he occupies the conductor's stand, the versatility of his musicianship is emphasized anew. C. W. D.

Costume by Jones

Monitor Jan 20/39

In preparation for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's "Concert Extraordinaire," to be given in Boston Feb. 1, and in New York, Feb. 8, for the benefit of the Pension Fund. Robert Edmond Jones is designing for Dr. Koussevitzky a costume in the period of Josef Haydn to be worn when he leads the orchestra through that composer's "Farewell" Symphony. The costume is being executed by Eaves, and the wig is being made by Barris. Costumes for the remainder of the orchestra are being prepared by Hayden, of Boston, and supervised by Jack Munro, director and playwright of New York.

"The Daniel Jazz" comes second on the program. It is a modern piece by Gruenberg based on the poem written by Vachel Lindsay about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More.

The next piece is a Russian nursery tale. "Peter and the Wolf," as conceived by Serge Prokofieff. Each character in the story has a theme and a special instrument to play it; while the whole story is told against the background of the music by a narrator, Richard Hale.

Dr. Koussevitzky has planned a group of waltzes for the second half of the program.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 21 1939

Orchestras

Boston Symphony, Carnegie—A first performance of Dedicaces, by the erstwhile Vernon Duke; a sort of tone poem set to a brief text by Guillaume Apollinaire. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Marguerite Porter, soprano. Some banal dissonance, a great deal of rhythmic fuss, and no particular inspiration. The orchestra will give a Pension Fund Concert in Carnegie Hall on Feb. 8.

RUSSIAN PIECE BY SYMPHONY

New Shostakovitch Work Played Here

B. Post Jan. 21/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Richard Burgin now replacing the still vacationing Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Concerts entered yesterday upon the second half of the current season. The principal item on Mr. Burgin's list was the new Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch. Other Bostonian "first performances" were of Jakobus Langendoen's Improvisations for Orchestra and Bach's D minor Organ Toccata and Fugue (the Dorian) as transcribed by Alexander Tansman. Liszt's "Les Preludes" brought the end.

The best thing about Shostakovitch's Symphony yesterday was the programme note which Mr. Burk was inspired to write contrasting the status of the Totalitarian with that of the Capitalist composer. To repeat what for some may be a familiar tale, this Fifth Symphony, which had its Leningrad premiere a little more than a year ago, served to restore Shostakovitch to the good graces of Russian officialdom, which had decried the "bourgeois" tendencies in such works as the opera "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk" and the much later ballet, "Limpid Stream." Whether the almost arrogant simplicity of this Symphony was dictated by contrition or conformity will probably never be known. In any event, the piece was widely hailed in Russia, and it seemed to please the audience of yesterday. When so much modern music is harsh, arbitrarily complex and anything but melodious, it is almost ungrateful to suggest that the new Shostakovitch work — a few spirited pages and affecting episodes aside—is vapid and wishy-washy . . . Some critics are never satisfied.

Mr. Langendoen, who has been a member of the orchestra's 'cello section since 1920, made yesterday his second appearance as composer at the regular Symphony concerts. His four Improvisations, which had been played in the composer's native Holland, but never before in the United States, were composed in 1932. The first is entirely in unison, a procedure attempted some years ago by our recent visitor, Georges Enesco in his First Suite for Orchestra. The second, a Capriccio, is waywardness itself, a sort of play of extremes. The third, Pastorale and Procession in Oriental, probably Javanese; also dramatic and pictorial. The fourth, "Burleska," is a short and violent orchestral hurly-burly. Orchestral stunts. these Improvisations, but the work of a resourceful musician, none the less. And after Shostakovitch's tepidities, the third and fourth had a welcome robustness.

As for the rest, Mr. Tansman has done a scholarly job on one of Bach's more sombre works; and "Les Preludes" is "Les Preludes." Did Liszt, one wonders, write no other symphonic poems?

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 15 1939

The Carnegie Hall Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 8 will be given with unusual high-jinks. The program will begin with the Haydn "Farewell" Symphony, which—here is where the high-jinks come in—will be given in "eighteenth century setting," with Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians in appropriate costume!

The rest of the program promises equally diverting entertainment. It lists Louis Gruenberg's setting of Vachel Lindsay's "The Daniel Jazz," the first New York performance of Prokofieff's orchestra fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," and, after the intermission, a sort of musical survey of the waltz from its Viennese to its Parisian manifestations, that is, Lanner's "Schoenbrunner," Strauss's "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," Sibelius's "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR

JAN 15 1939

Georges Enesco, Rumanian composer, was invited to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at five concerts this month.

Enesco introduced his January 12, 13 and 14 concerts with Mozart's "Haffner" symphony in D major, and also played new Rumanian pieces which he brought from Europe. He performed his seldom heard Second Rhapsody in D minor and his First Symphony in D minor.

The program for next Monday and Tuesday will include Mozart's "Haffner" symphony, new Rumanian pieces, Enesco's Second Orchestral Suite and his First Rumanian Rhapsody. The latter two works were performed by him at concerts in Boston last season.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives Concert at Metropolitan Theatre

Prov. Journal Jan. 25/39

By G. Y. Loveridge

Winds and tides of music swept through the Metropolitan Theatre last night, powered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and directed in their going and coming by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It was the kind of musical weather that everybody talks about and nobody even wants to do anything about, except have more of it.

The evening began with playful and well-mannered breezes fashioned by Haydn, proceeded to the mystic seas and skies of Debussy, and ended with thunderbolts from the hands of Sibelius. A magnificent climate it was that Dr. Koussevitzky contrived.

The Londoners were rightly fond of Haydn, when he wrote such symphonies as that in B-flat, No. 102, for them. The formal grace and effervescent humor of it survive the fashions and the wear of decades, as the applause of the audience last night made evident. Dr. Kussevitzky gave it muscles, especially in the minuet, which seemed a dance of giants at times; and in the first and last movements old Papa Haydn made some vigorous bounds. Whether he intended his symphony to go like that, nobody knows. If he did, it is 10 to one he couldn't have found an orchestra to play it that way in his time. The largo introduction and the slow second movement were in strong and effective contrast to the display of physical vitality that characterized the performance.

Then, to "La Mer." Men and women who go down to the sea in music, like particularly to have Dr. Koussevitzky at the helm; these orchestral sketches are among the finest of his revelations. Whether, as some say, this music is meant to represent the actual sea in various humors, or, as others say, it reflects the mysterious voyaging of the mind, matters not. One may find herein cold mists and vapors rising from fiddles and tympani, waves in the violins and brasses, even strange flute, oboe and English horn creatures swimming about among the cold shadows of the lower strings; or one may find no namable thing at all, but only that potent mood and magic of the sea that bewitched Melville and Conrad, and, through them, the rest of us.

The orchestra discoursed these mysteries oracularly, which is to say that everybody could understand them in his own way and everybody could be both right and different. Dr. Koussevitzky called forth all the colors and powers of the ensemble; he guided the "dialogue du vent et de la mere" into a brilliant turmoil.

The Sibelius symphony in E-flat, No. 5, came after intermission. Through the smoke that gets in your eyes, ears and lungs, one could perceive Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, like the fiery Frank and furious Hun of the poem, charging the music. Slowly the symphony got into motion, with horns and tympani, with flutes, oboes, clarinets voicing a motive. It is a curious but irresistible symphony, at times seeming likely to become a Strauss waltz, at other times depicting a giant tossing motive-pebbles into the air, but gradually builds up to a compelling conclusion.

The tone of the orchestra was magnificent, and the persuasiveness of the reading such that one was transported beyond notes and sounds to those rugged and yet romantic heights that Sibelius inhabits. The reiterated fff chords that end the story came all too soon.

If we had been a fiddler with the orchestra we should have gone home, chucked the Guarnerius under the sofa and said to our wife. "Ma, I'm dog-tired."

But as a listener, we should have been glad to hear the program over again then and there.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 19 1939

Briefs

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky, are spending a few days in Summerville, S. C.

Symphony Concert

Engrossing Novelties from Soviet Union and Boston, Mass., U. S. A.

B. Trans. Jan. 23/39

By MOSES SMITH

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, assembled by Richard Burgin for two of his occasional trips to the conductor's stand, looks on the face like an unpromising venture. It resembles some of his past programs, as if it had been made up of odds and ends crowded out of the usual run but necessary, for one reason or another, to present before another season has gone. If, in spite of these speculations, the present program, again like others Mr. Burgin has conducted, turns out to be an agreeable affair, perhaps we ought to revaluate periodically our accepted notion about the necessity of care in constructing a program.

The current list begins with the fifth and latest symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, who is too important a composer to be ignored even though, from our point of view, he resides in the Soviet Union, or though, from the point of view of his compatriots, he has not always successfully adhered to the strict party (Communist) line. The first half over, the program runs through Alexander Tansman's transcription of the "Dorian" Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor by Bach; "Improvisations" by Jakcbus Langendoen, for almost twenty years a member of the 'cello section of the Boston Orchestra, and, finally, Liszt's "Les Preludes," which has been awaiting a decent burial for more than 20 years.

Largely because of this Symphony, which was composed to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Republic, Shostakovitch is said to have returned to the grace from which he had fallen a few years ago in connection with the opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." It was easy, listening to yesterday's performance, to see why. The music has a new simplicity. It has tunes you can hum and metres to which you can march. Perhaps the Communists can even spell out a relation between the music and the Marxian ideology. But in any event the Symphony is made of the stuff to which millions can listen without wrinkling their brows.

But the Symphony is no mere waste of time for those who have gone through the mill of classical, Romantic, modern and neoclassical repertory of the conventional concert-hall. The tunes are simple, but they are not stupid. They are frequently fresh, original creations. Even when they say something you think you have heard before, they have a twist that lends distinction. The harmony is basically our good and trusted friend, tonic-and-dominant. But here again the distortions, which never seem merely arbitrary, stimulate the listening appetite. Furthermore—and this, I suppose, is basic—the prevalent scale patterns are not our major and minor modes; they are much more varied and much richer.

Hearing the work for the first time and assuming that the performance was as good as it seemed to be, I had the feeling that the last movement did not belong to the other three. It seemed banal. The excitement seemed false. Further acquaintance tonight, however, may tell a different story.

* * *

The other novelty was a distinct surprise. By calling his work "Improvisations" Mr. Langendoen could disarm the critic who insists on certain standards of form. Actually the composer here had no need of such a precaution. Each of the four movements is a complete formal entity, and in none does there seem to be any wasted motion. The first, "Unisono," is an impressive and somewhat impassioned long melodic line, almost entirely for the strings. The second, "Capriccio," is capricious in formal outline as well as in the character of the musical material. The third, "Pastorale and Procession," is a remarkable piece worked out of nothing more than a drone of a few percussion instruments. By dint of constant repetition plus cumulative power as instruments and parts are added the music attains great excitement, which in turn dies out into nothingness. Even as a tour de force the movement is exceptional; it seemed yesterday also to possess a more lasting logic. The last movement, "Burlesca," loses no time in generating excitement, which is maintained at a high pitch through its brief run.

"Improvisations," brilliantly as well as subtly scored, demands a virtuoso orchestra like the Boston Symphony for effective performance. So, at least, it seemed yesterday, with the composer taking part, at his customary stand, in a presentation that seemed to do complete justice to his work. At any rate he gave the appearance of satisfaction as he was called from his place by Mr. Burgin to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause of the matinee audience.

* * *

Tansman's transcription was a workmanlike job, a suitable "vehicle" for displaying orchestral virtuosity. It takes a Busoni or a Schoenberg, however really to say something in a transcription, when the original is as likely as not to be heard nowadays out of any loud-speaker. The performance of both the transcription and the composition of Liszt realized the best implications of the music. The concert as a whole, indeed, was one more reminder of the wonderful instrument that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, and of Mr. Burgin's executant and interpretive power and insight.

Music as It Is Here, Afield a

The department of public relations of Symphony Hall confesses that in planning the "concert extraordinaire" in Boston on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, and a week later in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra "has abandoned stiff-collar-symphony tradition and gone theatrical to provide a good show." For the performance of one number on the program, Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, extra-musical talents from the world of the stage will be enlisted. Robert Edmond Jones is designing for Serge Koussevitzky a costume in the period of Haydn; and "to insure complete theatrical illusion during the piece" the design is being executed by Eaves, the New York costumer. Further credits, in the theatrical manner, go to Harris for Dr. Koussevitzky's wig; Hayder of Boston for costumes of the musicians in the orchestra and to Jock Munro for supervision of the costuming.

nd

Globe Jan 21/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the second half of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's midseason vacation, yesterday gave the first Boston performance of the Fifth Symphony by Dmitri Shostakovitch. For the remainder of a program which, it must be confessed, was distinctly on the dullish side, Mr. Burgin assembled the orchestral transcription by Alexander Tansman of Bach's D minor Organ Toccata and its accompanying "Dorian" Fugue; Liszt's "Les Preludes," and a work new to this country, the "Improvisations for Orchestra" by Jakobus Langendoen, cellist of the Boston Symphony.

A few years ago Dmitri Shostakovitch was much in the public eye, because the young composer of Soviet Russia had written a First Symphony that augured a brilliant future. Later he created that controversial opera "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." And then, reportedly because his music had ceased to express the esthetic ideology of the Soviet state, Shostakovitch fell from public approval.

The Fifth Symphony, first performed in Russian during the festivities of 1937, commemorating the establishment of the Bolshevik Government, proved the means of returning him to favor. Whether a composer ought to write music as he feels it inwardly, or whether the tonal art may be used to express political and other ideas, is a long and not very profitable argument. John N. Burk, in his truly admirable note on the Fifth Symphony in the program book, has written shrewd words on the subject.

Purely as music, the Fifth Symphony turned out a sad disappointment, agreeable in some pages—notably the slow movement—but prevailingly unoriginal, long-winded and banal. Though written for orchestra with obvious technical skill, the work served only to exemplify the axiom that no amount of technic can make up for lack of genuine inspiration.

Mr. Langendoen was called from his seat in the cello section to respond to the hearty applause bestowed upon his "Improvisations." His music, falling in four sections, may not be highly individual, but it is imaginative and full of substance. Mr. Gillet was likewise singled out for fine playing of his exacting part for oboe.

Tansman's version of the Bach Toccata and Fugue is a musicianly job that has provided a brilliant orchestral dress without unduly inflating the original. Nor did Tansman seek out spurious "organ effects." This transcription ought to be heard again. Liszt's grand old tone poem, however pompous is may seem in this casual age, is exciting music. Once again, because of sheer gusto, it brought evident pleasure to an audience.

That the conducting of Mr. Burgin was of high order hardly needs to be said. Upon each occasion that he occupies the conductor's stand, the versatility of his musicianship is emphasized anew. C. W. D.

Costume by Jones

Monitor Jan 20/39

In preparation for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's "Concert Extraordinaire," to be given in Boston Feb. 1, and in New York, Feb. 8, for the benefit of the Pension Fund. Robert Edmond Jones is designing for Dr. Koussevitzky a costume in the period of Josef Haydn to be worn when he leads the orchestra through that composer's "Farewell" Symphony. The costume is being executed by Eaves, and the wig is being made by Barris. Costumes for the remainder of the orchestra are being prepared by Hayden, of Boston, and supervised by Jack Munro, director and playwright of New York.

"The Daniel Jazz" comes second on the program. It is a modern piece by Gruenberg based on the poem written by Vachel Lindsay about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More.

The next piece is a Russian nursery tale, "Peter and the Wolf," as conceived by Serge Prokofieff. Each character in the story has a theme and a special instrument to play it; while the whole story is told against the background of the music by a narrator, Richard Hale.

Dr. Koussevitzky has planned a group of waltzes for the second half of the program.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 21 1939

Orchestras

Boston Symphony, Carnegie—A first performance of Dedicaces, by the erstwhile Vernon Duke; a sort of tone poem set to a brief text by Guillaume Apollinaire. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Marguerite Porter, soprano. Some banal dissonance, a great deal of rhythmic fuss, and no particular inspiration. The orchestra will give a Pension Fund Concert in Carnegie Hall on Feb. 8.

RUSSIAN PIECE BY SYMPHONY

New Shostakovitch Work Played Here

B. Post Jan. 21/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Richard Burgin now replacing the still vacationing Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Concerts entered yesterday upon the second half of the current season. The principal item on Mr. Burgin's list was the new Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch. Other Bostonian "first performances" were of Jakobus Langendoen's Improvisations for Orchestra and Bach's D minor Organ Toccata and Fugue (the Dorian) as transcribed by Alexander Tansman. Liszt's "Les Preludes" brought the end.

The best thing about Shostakovitch's Symphony yesterday was the programme note which Mr. Burk was inspired to write contrasting the status of the Totalitarian with that of the Capitalist composer. To repeat what for some may be a familiar tale, this Fifth Symphony, which had its Leningrad premiere a little more than a year ago, served to restore Shostakovitch to the good graces of Russian officialdom, which had decried the "bourgeois" tendencies in such works as the opera "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk" and the much later ballet, "Limpid Stream." Whether the almost arrogant simplicity of this Symphony was dictated by contrition or conformity will probably never be known. In any event, the piece was widely hailed in Russia, and it seemed to please the audience of yesterday. When so much modern music is harsh, arbitrarily complex and anything but melodious, it is almost ungrateful to suggest that the new Shostakovitch work — a few spirited pages and affecting episodes aside—is vapid and wishy-washy . . . . Some critics are never satisfied.

Mr. Langendoen, who has been a member of the orchestra's 'cello section since 1920, made yesterday his second appearance as composer at the regular Symphony concerts. His four Improvisations, which had been played in the composer's native Holland, but never before in the United States, were composed in 1932. The first is entirely in unison, a procedure attempted some years ago by our recent visitor, Georges Enesco in his First Suite for Orchestra. The second, a Capriccio, is waywardness itself, a sort of play of extremes. The third, Pastorale and Procession in Oriental, probably Javanese; also dramatic and pictorial. The fourth, "Burleska," is a short and violent orchestral hurly-burly. Orchestral stunts, these Improvisations, but the work of a resourceful musician, none the less. And after Shostakovitch's tepidities, the third and fourth had a welcome robustness.

As for the rest, Mr. Tansman has done a scholarly job on one of Bach's more sombre works; and "Les Preludes" is "Les Preludes." Did Liszt, one wonders, write no other symphonic poems?

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 15 1939

The Carnegie Hall Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 8 will be given with unusual high-jinks. The program will begin with the Haydn "Farewell" Symphony, which—here is where the high-jinks come in—will be given in "eighteenth century setting," with Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians in appropriate costume!

The rest of the program promises equally diverting entertainment. It lists Louis Gruenberg's setting of Vachel Lindsay's "The Daniel Jazz," the first New York performance of Prokofieff's orchestra fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," and, after the intermission, a sort of musical survey of the waltz from its Viennese to its Parisian manifestations, that is, Lanner's "Schoenbrunner," Strauss's "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," Sibelius's "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR

JAN 15 1939

Georges Enesco, Rumanian composer, was invited to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at five concerts this month.

Enesco introduced his January 12, 13 and 14 concerts with Mozart's "Haffner" symphony in D major, and also played new Rumanian pieces which he brought from Europe. He performed his seldom heard Second Rhapsody in D minor and his First Symphony in D minor.

The program for next Monday and Tuesday will include Mozart's "Haffner" symphony, new Rumanian pieces, Enesco's Second Orchestral Suite and his First Rumanian Rhapsody. The latter two works were performed by him at concerts in Boston last season.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives Concert at Metropolitan Theatre

Prov. Journal Jan. 25/39

By G. Y. Loveridge

Winds and tides of music swept through the Metropolitan Theatre last night, powered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and directed in their going and coming by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It was the kind of musical weather that everybody talks about and nobody even wants to do anything about, except have more of it.

The evening began with playful and well-mannered breezes fashioned by Haydn, proceeded to the mystic seas and skies of Debussy, and ended with thunderbolts from the hands of Sibelius. A magnificent climate it was that Dr. Koussevitzky contrived.

The Londoners were rightly fond of Haydn, when he wrote such symphonies as that in B-flat, No. 102, for them. The formal grace and effervescent humor of it survive the fashions and the wear of decades, as the applause of the audience last night made evident. Dr. Kussevitzky gave it muscles, especially in the minuet, which seemed a dance of giants at times; and in the first and last movements old Papa Haydn made some vigorous bounds. Whether he intended his symphony to go like that, nobody knows. If he did, it is 10 to one he couldn't have found an orchestra to play it that way in his time. The largo introduction and the slow second movement were in strong and effective contrast to the display of physical vitality that characterized the performance.

Then, to "La Mer." Men and women who go down to the sea in music, like particularly to have Dr. Koussevitzky at the helm; these orchestral sketches are among the finest of his revelations. Whether, as some say, this music is meant to represent the actual sea in various humors, or, as others say, it reflects the mysterious voyaging of the mind, matters not. One may find herein cold mists and vapors rising from fiddles and tympani, waves in the violins and brasses, even strange flute, oboe and English horn creatures swimming about among the cold shadows of the lower strings; or one may find no namable thing at all, but only that potent mood and magic of the sea that bewitched Melville and Conrad, and, through them, the rest of us.

The orchestra discoursed these mysteries oracularly, which is to say that everybody could understand them in his own way and everybody could be both right and different. Dr. Koussevitzky called forth all the colors and powers of the ensemble; he guided the "dialogue du vent et de la mere" into a brilliant turmoil.

The Sibelius symphony in E-flat, No. 5, came after intermission. Through the smoke that gets in your eyes, ears and lungs, one could perceive Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, like the fiery Frank and furious Hun of the poem, charging the music. Slowly the symphony got into motion, with horns and tympani, with flutes, oboes, clarinets voicing a motive. It is a curious but irresistible symphony, at times seeming likely to become a Strauss waltz, at other times depicting a giant tossing motive-pebbles into the air, but gradually builds up to a compelling conclusion.

The tone of the orchestra was magnificent, and the persuasiveness of the reading such that one was transported beyond notes and sounds to those rugged and, yet romantic heights that Sibelius inhabits. The reiterated fff chords that end the story came all too soon.

If we had been a fiddler with the orchestra we should have gone home, chucked the Guarnerius under the sofa and said to our wife, "Ma, I'm dog-tired."

But as a listener, we should have been glad to hear the program over again then and there.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 19 1939

Briefs

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky, are spending a few days in Summerville, S. C.

Symphony Concert

Engrossing Novelties from Soviet Union and Boston, Mass., U. S. A.

B. Trans. Jan. 23/39

By MOSES SMITH

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, assembled by Richard Burgin for two of his occasional trips to the conductor's stand, looks on the face like an unpromising venture. It resembles some of his past programs, as if it had been made up of odds and ends crowded out of the usual run but necessary, for one reason or another, to present before another season has gone. If, in spite of these speculations, the present program, again like others Mr. Burgin has conducted, turns out to be an agreeable affair, perhaps we ought to revaluate periodically our accepted notion about the necessity of care in constructing a program.

The current list begins with the fifth and latest symphony of Dimitri Shostakovitch, who is too important a composer to be ignored even though, from our point of view, he resides in the Soviet Union, or though, from the point of view of his compatriots, he has not always successfully adhered to the strict party (Communist) line. The first half over, the program runs through Alexander Tansman's transcription of the "Dorian" Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor by Bach; "Improvisations" by Jakobus Langendoen, for almost twenty years a member of the 'cello section of the Boston Orchestra, and, finally, Liszt's "Les Preludes," which has been awaiting a decent burial for more than 20 years.

Largely because of this Symphony, which was composed to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Republic, Shostakovitch is said to have returned to the grace from which he had fallen a few years ago in connection with the opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." It was easy, listening to yesterday's performance, to see why. The music has a new simplicity. It has tunes you can hum and metres to which you can march. Perhaps the Communists can even spell out a relation between the music and the Marxian ideology. But in any event the Symphony is made of the stuff to which millions can listen without wrinkling their brows.

But the Symphony is no mere waste of time for those who have gone through the mill of classical, Romantic, modern and neoclassical repertory of the conventional concert-hall. The tunes are simple, but they are not stupid. They are frequently fresh, original creations. Even when they say something you think you have heard before, they have a twist that lends distinction. The harmony is basically our good and trusted friend, tonic-and-dominant. But here again the distortions, which never seem merely arbitrary, stimulate the listening appetite. Furthermore—and this, I suppose, is basic—the prevalent scale patterns are not our major and minor modes; they are much more varied and much richer.

Hearing the work for the first time and assuming that the performance was as good as it seemed to be, I had the feeling that the last movement did not belong to the other three. It seemed banal. The excitement seemed false. Further acquaintance tonight, however, may tell a different story.

* * *

The other novelty was a distinct surprise. By calling his work "Improvisations" Mr. Langendoen could disarm the critic who insists on certain standards of form. Actually the composer here had no need of such a precaution. Each of the four movements is a complete formal entity, and in none does there seem to be any wasted motion. The first, "Unisono," is an impressive and somewhat impassioned long melodic line, almost entirely for the strings. The second, "Capriccio," is capricious in formal outline as well as in the character of the musical material. The third, "Pastorale and Procession," is a remarkable piece worked out of nothing more than a drone of a few percussion instruments. By dint of constant repetition plus cumulative power as instruments and parts are added the music attains great excitement, which in turn dies out into nothingness. Even as a tour de force the movement is exceptional; it seemed yesterday also to possess a more lasting logic. The last movement, "Burlesca," loses no time in generating excitement, which is maintained at a high pitch through its brief run.

"Improvisations," brilliantly as well as subtly scored, demands a virtuoso orchestra like the Boston Symphony for effective performance. So, at least, it seemed yesterday, with the composer taking part, at his customary stand, in a presentation that seemed to do complete justice to his work. At any rate he gave the appearance of satisfaction as he was called from his place by Mr. Burgin to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause of the matinee audience.

* * *

Tansman's transcription was a workmanlike job, a suitable "vehicle" for displaying orchestral virtuosity. It takes a Busoni or a Schoenberg, however really to say something in a transcription, when the original is as likely as not to be heard nowadays out of any loud-speaker. The performance of both the transcription and the composition of Liszt realized the best implications of the music. The concert as a whole, indeed, was one more reminder of the wonderful instrument that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, and of Mr. Burgin's executant and interpretive power and insight.

Music as It Is Here, Afield a

The department of public rela tions of Symphony Hall confesses that in planning the "concer extraordinaire" in Boston on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, and a week later in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra "has abandoned stiff-collar-symphony tradition and gone theatrical to provide a good show." For the performance of one number on the program, Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, extra-musical talents from the world of the stage will be enlisted. Robert Edmond Jones is designing for Serge Koussevitzky a costume in the period of Haydn; and "to insure complete theatrical illusion during the piece" the design is being executed by Eaves, the New York costumer. Further credits, in the theatrical manner, go to Harris for Dr. Koussevitzky's wig; Hayder of Boston for costumes of the musicians in the orchestra and to Jock Munro for supervision of the costuming.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MONDAY, JANUARY 23/39

Boston Amusements — Symphony Concert,

About Music and Politics; Novelties From Mr. Burgin

By L. A. Sloper

It is unfortunate that the music of Dmitri Shostakovitch must be discussed in terms of political economy. The man has so much talent that it ought to be possible to consider his scores as music. Yet how can we, in view of his alternate elevation and disgrace at the hands of the Soviet Government?

Much of the debate over Soviet music is misdirected. It is impossible for a man to write music without reflecting his background and environment. There is nothing inherently wrong, or inimical to international morality, in the writing by Shostakovitch of music representative of Soviet Russia any more than there was in the writing by Elgar of music representative of Tory England. You may say that you do not approve of the Communist Party. A Russian may retort that he does not approve of the British Conservative Party. You are both within your rights, but your disagreement is on extra-musical grounds.

Nevertheless, there is a difference. Elgar spoke for Tory England because he belonged to Tory England. The Government of his day did not order him to write Tory music, and reprimand him publicly if he did not do so. The Soviet Government does just that with Shostakovitch and Marxist music. Elgar could have written music exalting communism if he had wanted to. But under the Soviet Government, or any other totalitarian government, a composer writes as he is told to write. What a pity that a composer of Shostakovitch's talent could not have been brought up in a country where freedom is granted to artists.

* * *

Both his talent and the effect of governmental restriction on it are evident in his Fifth Symphony, which Richard Burgin, substituting for Dr. Koussevitzky, introduced at the season's thirteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last week in Symphony Hall. In this score pages of great beauty stand side by side with pages of rubbish. It is as if Shostakovitch had written for a time under the guidance of his own imagination, then suddenly had remembered that if he was going to write at all, or at least if his music was to be heard at all, he must celebrate the virtues of communism; whereupon he put in a cheap military march, or a bombastic coda in the manner of Liszt. And he had his reward in the form of official approbation.

It is possible, of course, that he would have done no better if he had been let alone, but it does not seem likely. The good parts are too good, and the bad parts too bad; there is too obvious a gulf between them. The first movement on a first hearing seemed sterile. Its melodic material had more length than shape, and its development sounded cerebral. But the second movement, which is a Scherzo, has humor and even some wit, rather in the Prokofieff manner, and the Largo which follows sets a real atmosphere worthy of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which is unhappily dissipated by an incursion of Puccini-esque stuff evidently designed for consumption by the commissars. The Finale pretty well sells out to them. It's too bad. Shostakovitch has an individual talent good enough to be given its head. The symphony was applauded cordially by the Friday afternoon audience.

* * *

Mr. Burgin included two other novelties in his program: the Tansman orchestration of the Bach Toccata and Fugue in D minor (Dorian) and Jakobus Langendoen's "Improvisations for Orchestra." The Bach is a little on the austere side, far less showy than the early piece in the same key. Nevertheless, from the musical viewpoint, it is fascinating in structure, particularly the fugue. Tansman's orchestration made no attempt to render the composition effective in a popular sense. It was as austere as the original, and more turgid. The work was coolly received by the Friday audience.

Mr. Langendoen has been a member of the orchestra for 19 years. He sits at the second desk of the cello section. His "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius," played at these concerts in 1927, was well received, and other works of his have been heard at the Pop Concerts. The new contribution is a suite of four movements, well described by the composer's title. He seems to have set down themes, and then toyed with them. The result shows his great familiarity with the modern orchestra and with the tricks of the modern composer. The most effective movement is the third, marked Pastorale and Procession. Some very clever effects are produced with drums, gongs, tam-tams and other percussion, and the conventional crescendo-diminuendo procession is made attractive by a distinctive theme. Mr. Langendoen was applauded warmly.

The final item of the printed program was Liszt's "Les Préludes," included probably because it seemed necessary to have something familiar. The assistant conductor deserves our thanks for the opportunity of hearing the Shostakovitch symphony, and commendation for the general interest of his program and for its performance.

Symphony Program

Symphony No. 5, Op. 47 Shostakovitch
Toccata and Fuge in D minor (Dorian) for Organ, transcribed for orchestra by Alexander Tansman Bach
Improvisations for Orchestra Langendoen
"Les Préludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine) Liszt

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 11 1939

Haydn in Costume at Boston Feb. 1

Symphony Orchestra To Present Unique Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give special concerts at Symphony Hall in Boston Feb. 1 and Carnegie Hall, New York, Feb. 8 for the benefit of the pension fund, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

A feature of the program will be the presentation of Hadyn's "Farewell" symphony in 18th century costume. Dr. Koussevitzky will be attired as "Papa" Haydn.

Other numbers will be Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" with Richard Hale, for many years with the Berkshire Playhouse Company, as narrator, and a waltz group including Viennese dances by Lanner and Johann Strauss, Sibelius's "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

Settings are being built under the direction of Jock Monroe of the Berkshire Playhouse staff.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle
JAN 15 1939

STRAVINSKY IN BOSTON

Igor Stravinsky is scheduled to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks this season. He will appear also as piano soloist with the orchestra. Stravinsky will appear during the weeks of March 12 and 19.

American Mercury
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN - - 1939

Recorded MUSIC

* indicate an outstanding performance,  a competent performance, * an acceptable performance. ‡‡‡ denote exceptional recording, ‡‡ efficient recording, ‡ poor recording.*

ORCHESTRAL

‡‡‡ Suite from le Coq d'Or, Rimsky-Korsakow: (Victor, three 12-inch disks, $5.00). This is realistic orchestral reproduction at its best. Brilliance is often obtained, phonographically, by distortion of the relative emphasis of the various choirs; not so here. Detail is crisp and clean, but the great virtue of these disks is the truly astonishing maintenance of proper proportion among the groups of instruments. The resulting brilliance is Rimsky-Korsakow's and the London Symphony Orchestra's, not the recording engineer's, who deserves formal recognition for his integrity. Eugene Goossens conducts the decorative score with sensitive devotion to its values.

‡‡‡ Symphony No. 5, in E Flat, and Pohjola's Daughter, Sibelius: (Victor, five 12-inch disks, $10.00). The strings throughout the Symphony are a revelation in recording; and the brass at the climax in Pohjola's Daughter is plainly magnificent in its disciplined, mellow unity. There is some improbable dominance by the woodwind at the start of the Symphony; but these performances by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra easily supersede the earlier versions by Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony, and will not themselves easily be superseded.

‡‡‡ Prince Igor: Polovetzki Dances, Borodin: (Victor, two 12-inch disks, $4.50). Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra are not easily excelled in a work of pronounced emphasis on rhythm and color. The brilliant orchestration by Stokowski himself is dazzlingly translated into superb records.

‡‡ Pictures at an Exhibition, Moussorgsky: (Victor, four 12-inch disks, $8.00). Lucien Cailliet of the Philadelphia Orchestra, obviously possessed of considerable technical ability, has sought to improve upon Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's best-known piano work with an arrangement of his own. This was brave; and the new transcriber's cinematic insistence upon underlining the patent and magnifying the obvious leaves the engaging ghost of Ravel still master of the field. Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra reproduce their confrère's work with their usual splendor; but those who possess the fine records of the Ravel orchestration (also on Victor), played by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not willingly exchange them for this.

*‡‡ Trois Nocturnes pour orchestre, Debussy: (Columbia, four 12-inch disks, $6.00). A delicately conceived, but badly-played and indifferently-recorded addition to an old phonographic hazard. D. E. Inghelbrecht and the Orchestre des Festivals Debussy (quand?) are the executants.

‡‡ Magic Flute Overture, Mozart: (Victor, one 12-inch disk, $2.00). A sound performance of a great overture. Indeed, now the standard for records of this work, because of the superior recording of a good orchestra (BBC Symphony) under Arturo Toscanini. Richard Strauss's interpretation, whose nervous intensity was so exciting, was handicapped by the band, and by the recording.

*‡‡ Invitation to the Dance, Weber: (Victor, one 12-inch disk, $2.00). Greater distinctness in the upper frequencies is the point of superiority of this re-recording of a famous disk of a decade ago. The Philadelphia Orchestra of the present record has not the engaging suavity of its predecessor, nor has Dr. Stokowski won reticence with the years. The old record (Victor) is a good record, and preferable to the new.

CHAMBER-MUSIC

‡‡ Quartet in D, Op. 45, Roussel: (Columbia, three 12-inch disks, $5.00). A fine display of the ability of the Roth Quartet emphasizes the tedium of this music.

—C. G. B.

DEC - - 1938

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

This picture of Elford Caughey is inadequate because he should have a harp under one arm, a sheaf of manuscripts under the other, a Harvard green baize bag dangling from a little finger and behind him on a leash the most beautiful Russian wolf hound in Boston — named Chinx. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its fifty-eighth season this fall young Mr. Caughey was seated beside his harp and patrons of Dr. Koussevitzky's programs were pleased. After having sat in the northeast corner of the platform for ten years Mr. Caughey last year abandoned it, took Chinx and the manuscripts to Cambridge and enrolled as a freshman at Harvard. This year he is carrying his Harvard courses as well as his harp. His poems appear in all the leading magazines which print poems — under the nom de plume of Tristram Livingston. Livingston is a family name but the choice of Tristram is shrouded in mystery. Among his enthusiasms (aside from Chinx) are Bach, Schumann, Strauss, the moderns, medieval legends, twentieth century poetry and Bass ale. His favorite spot is not the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues nor Harvard Yard — it is Monhegan Island, Maine. He says when small he was just an ornery brat (not poetic) and that one of the other freshmen last year told him he was well preserved.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 14 1939

THE Boston Symphony, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has been at Carnegie Hall again, turning in some of the best orchestral playing that one gets to hear nowadays. For its Saturday-matinée novelty, the Boston band, with the aid of Miss Marguerite Porter, an able young soprano, and Jesús María Sanromá, the brilliant pianist who is part of the organization, offered Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dédicaces," a sort of piano concerto with prologue and epilogue for soprano. It's clever music by an unusually gifted composer, and it proved provocative enough to draw a hiss from one customer—which is almost big news in this era of mannerly audiences.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JAN 20 1939

On the question of platform manners, Tito Schipa braved an old Italian custom just before Christmas at the Royal Opera house in Rome in ignoring a noisy and persistent audience request for an encore after Frederico's lamentation in the second act of Francesco Cilea's "Arlesiana." He received further applause from the Rome papers which took up a campaign against encores which interrupt the artistic continuity of the opera.

* * *

Now on his fifth American tour is Robert Casadesus, French pianist, with an itinerary ranging from coast to coast, from Canada to Cuba.

* * *

That other great pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, will make a single visit to Boston this year. On Sunday afternoon, he will play at Symphony hall.

* * *

From Boston comes word of a "Concert Extraordinaire" with a program light in character but of great musical interest, announced by Serge Koussevitszky to be given in Symphony hall February 1 for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. It will include Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, to be performed—and here is the surprise—in eighteenth century costume; Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as narrator; and a selection of numbers showing the development of the waltz through the century past, from Lanner to Ravel. These highjinks will be repeated at New York on February 8 for the benefit of the Carnegie Hall Pension fund.

ALEXANDRIA, VA.
GAZETTE
JAN 20 1939

MUSIC NOTES

William Robert Adam

For a special benefit concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, New York City early in February, Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony will don colonial costumes for a performance of the "Farewell" Symphony of Haydn. This is the first time that the distinguished organization has ever dressed for effect. Nevertheless the showing will probably be very impressive and a fitting tribute to "Papa" Haydn's music. However for the latter half, the orchestra and its conductor will come back to the present century and garb themselves in clothing more in keeping with 1939. Yes, the remainder of the concert is also modern . . . Further news concerning the "father of the symphony" comes from New York. Alfred Einstein, refugee musician and authority on the music of Haydn recently unearthed new symphonies of the composer and plans to conduct their first public performances anywhere in New York on February 26. These symphonies date from the latter half of the eighteenth century or the Esterhazy period of Haydn's musical activities . . . When Kirsten Flagstad sings with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Washington on January 31, she will perform Beethoven's "Ah, Perfido!" the Dream aria from "Lohengrin", and the Libestod from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." The orchestra includes the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" . . . Mrs. Francis Wadleigh has inaugurated a delightful series of Sunday afternoon's of cultural enlightenment. These interesting discussion are planned as a memorial to Mrs. Wadleigh's late uncle Dr. Fredrick Charles Hahr and also her late husband. Dr. Hahr and a brother Major Franz Hahr were pioneers in the development of music in Alexandria. Dr. Hahr is also known as one of Virginia's foremost musical personalities, having composed numerous vocal and instrumental masterpieces in addition to teaching and fostering music for the state. In her wide experience and supreme artistry, Mrs. Wadleigh is unparalleled in the ability to organize a social group for the advancement of artistic thought and cooperation among talented art groups.

The second in the series conducted by Mrs. Wadleigh, will take place on Sunday afternoon at historic Gadsby's Tavern. Those interested are invited to become a part of this intriguing activity.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MONDAY, JANUARY 23/39 29

Boston Amusements—Symphony Concert,

About Music and Politics; Novelties From Mr. Burgin

By L. A. Sloper

It is unfortunate that the music of Dmitri Shostakovitch must be discussed in terms of political economy. The man has so much talent that it ought to be possible to consider his scores as music. Yet how can we, in view of his alternate elevation and disgrace at the hands of the Soviet Government?

Much of the debate over Soviet music is misdirected. It is impossible for a man to write music without reflecting his background and environment. There is nothing inherently wrong, or inimical to international morality, in the writing by Shostakovitch of music representative of Soviet Russia any more than there was in the writing by Elgar of music representative of Tory England. You may say that you do not approve of the Communist Party. A Russian may retort that he does not approve of the British Conservative Party. You are both within your rights, but your disagreement is on extra-musical grounds.

Nevertheless, there is a difference. Elgar spoke for Tory England because he belonged to Tory England. The Government of his day did not order him to write Tory music, and reprimand him publicly if he did not do so. The Soviet Government does just that with Shostakovitch and Marxist music. Elgar could have written music exalting communism if he had wanted to. But under the Soviet Government, or any other totalitarian government, a composer writes as he is told to write. What a pity that a composer of Shostakovitch's talent could not have been brought up in a country where freedom is granted to artists.

* * *

Both his talent and the effect of governmental restriction on it are evident in his Fifth Symphony, which Richard Burgin, substituting for Dr. Koussevitzky, introduced at the season's thirteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last week in Symphony Hall. In this score pages of great beauty stand side by side with pages of rubbish. It is as if Shostakovitch had written for a time under the guidance of his own imagination, then suddenly had remembered that if he was going to write at all, or at least if his music was to be heard at all, he must celebrate the virtues of communism; whereupon he put in a cheap military march, or a bombastic coda in the manner of Liszt. And he had his reward in the form of official approbation.

It is possible, of course, that he would have done no better if he had been let alone, but it does not seem likely. The good parts are too good, and the bad parts too bad; there is too obvious a gulf between them. The first movement on a first hearing seemed sterile. Its melodic material had more length than shape, and its development sounded cerebral. But the second movement, which is a Scherzo, has humor and even some wit, rather in the Prokofieff manner, and the Largo which follows sets a real atmosphere worthy of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which is unhappily dissipated by an incursion of Puccini-esque stuff evidently designed for consumption by the commissars. The Finale pretty well sells out to them. It's too bad. Shostakovitch has an individual talent good enough to be given its head. The symphony was applauded cordially by the Friday afternoon audience.

* * *

Mr. Burgin included two other novelties in his program: the Tansman orchestration of the Bach Toccata and Fugue in D minor (Dorian) and Jakobus Langendoen's "Improvisations for Orchestra." The Bach is a little on the austere side, far less showy than the early piece in the same key. Nevertheless, from the musical viewpoint, it is fascinating in structure, particularly the fugue. Tansman's orchestration made no attempt to render the composition effective in a popular sense. It was as austere as the original, and more turgid. The work was coolly received by the Friday audience.

Mr. Langendoen has been a member of the orchestra for 19 years. He sits at the second desk of the cello section. His "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius," played at these concerts in 1927, was well received, and other works of his have been heard at the Pop Concerts. The new contribution is a suite of four movements, well described by the composer's title. He seems to have set down themes, and then toyed with them. The result shows his great familiarity with the modern orchestra and with the tricks of the modern composer. The most effective movement is the third, marked Pastorale and Procession. Some very clever effects are produced with drums, gongs, tam-tams and other percussion, and the conventional crescendo-diminuendo procession is made attractive by a distinctive theme. Mr. Langendoen was applauded warmly.

The final item of the printed program was Liszt's "Les Préludes," included probably because it seemed necessary to have something familiar. The assistant conductor deserves our thanks for the opportunity of hearing the Shostakovitch symphony, and commendation for the general interest of his program and for its performance.

Symphony Program

Symphony No. 5, Op. 47 — Shostakovitch

Toccata and Fuge in D minor (Dorian) for Organ, transcribed for orchestra by Alexander Tansman — Bach

Improvisations for Orchestra — Langendoen

"Les Préludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine) — Liszt

---

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 11 1939

Haydn in Costume at Boston Feb. 1

Symphony Orchestra To Present Unique Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give special concerts at Symphony Hall in Boston Feb. 1 and Carnegie Hall, New York, Feb. 8 for the benefit of the pension fund, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

A feature of the program will be the presentation of Hadyn's "Farewell" symphony in 18th century costume. Dr. Koussevitzky will be attired as "Papa" Haydn.

Other numbers will be Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" with Richard Hale, for many years with the Berkshire Playhouse Company, as narrator, and a waltz group including Viennese dances by Lanner and Johann Strauss, Sibelius's "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

Settings are being built under the direction of Jock Monroe of the Berkshire Playhouse staff.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle
JAN 15 1939

STRAVINSKY IN BOSTON

Igor Stravinsky is scheduled to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for [illegible] weeks this season. He will appear also as piano soloist with the orchestra. Stravinsky will appear during the weeks of March 12 and 19.

American Mercury
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN - - 1939

M

Recorded MUSIC

* indicate an outstanding performance,  a competent performance, * an acceptable performance. ‡‡‡ denote exceptional recording, ‡‡ efficient recording, ‡ poor recording.*

ORCHESTRAL

‡‡‡ Suite from le Coq d'Or, Rimsky-Korsakow: (Victor, three 12-inch disks, $5.00). This is realistic orchestral reproduction at its best. Brilliance is often obtained, phonographically, by distortion of the relative emphasis of the various choirs; not so here. Detail is crisp and clean, but the great virtue of these disks is the truly astonishing maintenance of proper proportion among the groups of instruments. The resulting brilliance is Rimsky-Korsakow's and the London Symphony Orchestra's, not the recording engineer's, who deserves formal recognition for his integrity. Eugene Goossens conducts the decorative score with sensitive devotion to its values.

‡‡‡ Symphony No. 5, in E Flat, and Pohjola's Daughter, Sibelius: (Victor, five 12-inch disks, $10.00). The strings throughout the Symphony are a revelation in recording; and the brass at the climax in Pohjola's Daughter is plainly magnificent in its disciplined, mellow unity. There is some improbable dominance by the woodwind at the start of the Symphony; but these performances by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra easily supersede the earlier versions by Robert Kajanus and the London Symphony, and will not themselves easily be superseded.

‡‡‡ Prince Igor: Polovetzki Dances, Borodin: (Victor, two 12-inch disks, $4.50). Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra are not easily excelled in a work of pronounced emphasis on rhythm and color. The brilliant orchestration by Stokowski himself is dazzlingly translated into superb records.

‡‡ Pictures at an Exhibition, Moussorgsky: (Victor, four 12-inch disks, $8.00). Lucien Cailliet of the Philadelphia Orchestra, obviously possessed of considerable technical ability, has sought to improve upon Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's best-known piano work with an arrangement of his own. This was brave; and the new transcriber's cinematic insistence upon underlining the patent and magnifying the obvious leaves the engaging ghost of Ravel still master of the field. Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra reproduce their confrère's work with their usual splendor; but those who possess the fine records of the Ravel orchestration (also on Victor), played by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not willingly exchange them for this.

*‡‡ Trois Nocturnes pour orchestre, Debussy: (Columbia, four 12-inch disks, $6.00). A delicately conceived, but badly-played and indifferently-recorded addition to an old phonographic hazard. D. E. Inghelbrecht and the Orchestre des Festivals Debussy (quand?) are the executants.

‡‡ Magic Flute Overture, Mozart: (Victor, one 12-inch disk, $2.00). A sound performance of a great overture. Indeed, now the standard for records of this work, because of the superior recording of a good orchestra (BBC Symphony) under Arturo Toscanini. Richard Strauss's interpretation, whose nervous intensity was so exciting, was handicapped by the band, and by the recording.

*‡‡ Invitation to the Dance, Weber: (Victor, one 12-inch disk, $2.00). Greater distinctness in the upper frequencies is the point of superiority of this re-recording of a famous disk of a decade ago. The Philadelphia Orchestra of the present record has not the engaging suavity of its predecessor, nor has Dr. Stokowski won reticence with the years. The old record (Victor) is a good record, and preferable to the new.

CHAMBER-MUSIC

‡‡ Quartet in D, Op. 45, Roussel: (Columbia, three 12-inch disks, $5.00). A fine display of the ability of the Roth Quartet emphasizes the tedium of this music.

—C. G. B.

Yankee
Dublin-N.H.
DEC - - 1938

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

This picture of Elford Caughey is inadequate because he should have a harp under one arm, a sheaf of manuscripts under the other, a Harvard green baize bag dangling from a little finger and behind him on a leash the most beautiful Russian wolf hound in Boston—named Chinx. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its fifty-eighth season this fall young Mr. Caughey was seated beside his harp and patrons of Dr. Koussevitzky's programs were pleased. After having sat in the northeast corner of the platform for ten years Mr. Caughey last year abandoned it, took Chinx and the manuscripts to Cambridge and enrolled as a freshman at Harvard. This year he is carrying his Harvard courses as well as his harp. His poems appear in all the leading magazines which print poems—under the nom de plume of Tristram Livingston. Livingston is a family name but the choice of Tristram is shrouded in mystery. Among his enthusiasms (aside from Chinx) are Bach, Schumann, Strauss, the moderns, medieval legends, twentieth century poetry and Bass ale. His favorite spot is not the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues nor Harvard Yard—it is Monhegan Island, Maine. He says when small he was just an ornery brat (not poetic) and that one of the other freshmen last year told him he was well preserved.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 14 1939

THE Boston Symphony, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has been at Carnegie Hall again, turning in some of the best orchestral playing that one gets to hear nowadays. For its Saturday-matinée novelty, the Boston band, with the aid of Miss Marguerite Porter, an able young soprano, and Jesús María Sanromá, the brilliant pianist who is part of the organization, offered Vladimir Dukelsky's "Dédicaces," a sort of piano concerto with prologue and epilogue for soprano. It's clever music by an unusually gifted composer, and it proved provocative enough to draw a hiss from one customer—which is almost big news in this era of mannerly audiences.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JAN 20 1939

On the question of platform manners, Tito Schipa braved an old Italian custom just before Christmas at the Royal Opera house in Rome in ignoring a noisy and persistent audience request for an encore after Frederico's lamentation in the second act of Francesco Cilea's "Arlesiana." He received further applause from the Rome papers which took up a campaign against encores which interrupt the artistic continuity of the opera.

* * *

Now on his fifth American tour is Robert Casadesus, French pianist, with an itinerary ranging from coast to coast, from Canada to Cuba.

* * *

That other great pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, will make a single visit to Boston this year. On Sunday afternoon, he will play at Symphony hall.

* * *

From Boston comes word of a "Concert Extraordinaire" with a program light in character but of great musical interest, announced by Serge Koussevitszky to be given in Symphony hall February 1 for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. It will include Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, to be performed—and here is the surprise—in eighteenth century costume; Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as narrator; and a selection of numbers showing the development of the waltz through the century past, from Lanner to Ravel. These high-jinks will be repeated at New York on February 8 for the benefit of the Carnegie Hall Pension fund.

ALEXANDRIA, VA.
GAZETTE
JAN 20 1939

MUSIC NOTES

WILLIAM ROBERT ADAM

For a special benefit concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, New York City early in February, Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony will don colonial costumes for a performance of the "Farewell" Symphony of Haydn. This is the first time that the distinguished organization has ever dressed for effect. Nevertheless the showing will probably be very impressive and a fitting tribute to "Papa" Haydn's music. However for the latter half, the orchestra and its conductor will come back to the present century and garb themselves in clothing more in keeping with 1939. Yes, the remainder of the concert is also modern . . . Further news concerning the "father of the symphony" comes from New York. Alfred Einstein, refugee musician and authority on the music of Haydn recently unearthed new symphonies of the composer and plans to conduct their first public performances anywhere in New York on February 26. These symphonies date from the latter half of the eighteenth century or the Esterhazy period of Haydn's musical activities . . . When Kirsten Flagstad sings with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Washington on January 31, she will perform Beethoven's "Ah, Perfido!" the Dream aria from "Lohengrin", and the Libestod from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." The orchestra includes the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" . . . Mrs. Francis Wadleigh has inaugurated a delightful series of Sunday afternoon's of cultural enlightenment. These interesting discussion are planned as a memorial to Mrs. Wadleigh's late uncle Dr. Fredrick Charles Hahr and also her late husband. Dr. Hahr and a brother Major Franz Hahr were pioneers in the development of music in Alexandria. Dr. Hahr is also known as one of Virginia's foremost musical personalities, having composed numerous vocal and instrumental masterpieces in addition to teaching and fostering music for the state. In her wide experience and supreme artistry, Mrs. Wadleigh is unparalleled in the ability to organize a social group for the advancement of artistic thought and cooperation among talented art groups.

The second in the series conducted by Mrs. Wadleigh, will take place on Sunday afternoon at historic Gadsby's Tavern. Those interested [illegible] in hearing a [illegible]

AUSTIN, TEXAS
TEXAN

JAN 15 1939

130

❖ Recent Records ❖

Jean Sibelius, though he is still very much alive and hard at work somewhere in Finland on his eighth symphony, has already found a place in concert repertoires practically as stable as Beethoven, Grahms, and other important Nineteenth Century composers.

Concert-goers in the large musical centers have even become nearly as weary of some of the works of this 78-year-old Finn as they have of the war-horses like the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique." Radio broadcasts and phonograph records are allowing us of the hinterland to become thoroughly familiar with Sibelius, too.

And nothing could be better to in or extend this acquaintance the "Symphony No. 5 in E Major, Op. 82," which Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently recorded. This work is grand music; compacted into three movements, it represents a condensation by Sibelius of the longer original with something important happening every minute and no loose ends left hanging. Worthwhile, too, are the three record faces in the album devoted to the moody tone poem, "Pojhola's Daughter."

Koussevitzsky and his men have been responsible for introducing much of Sibelius to America, and they continue to do excellent "missionary work" on discs which can be called superlatively played and finely recorded.

Marian Anderson, phenomenal contralto, turns to the classics for her latest record. Without tricks she sings Bach's "Come, Sweet Death" and Handel's "Siciliana" as they should be sung. The great control which she has over a flawless voice makes all her singing an awe-inspiring experience.

In the "sweetness and light" classification is the recording of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," played with grace and spirit by Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Ballet lovers should go for this.—J. OLCUTT SANDERS.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 21 1939

Records: News and Reviews

A Ten-Inch Recording Holds Its Own Among Weighty Albums—Ballet Music

Elizabeth Schumann, so the story goes, so cleverly imitated the voice of the absent Lotte Lehmann during a recording of a scene from "Rosenkavalier" that the result fooled even the Marschallin herself. Mme. Schumann owns up to a more recent vocal deception. In a slight recording (Victor) of three pieces from "Hansel and Gretel" she sings not only Hansel and Gretel in a duet but the Sandman as well. This is only a ten-inch record, with piano accompaniment, including the "Evening Prayer" duet, (turn) the Folk Song, (breath) and the Sandman's Song, but it is so charmingly and artistically done that it holds its own among anything records have to offer.

• • •

Speaking of Women in Music, Myra Hess makes her Victor debut playing the Schumann A minor Piano Concerto with an orchestra conducted by Walter Goehe. The nameless "orchestra" conducted by Mr. Goehe has a chilly sound on the label but the accompaniment is handled adequately, which is a lot to say about anybody's accompaniment. As far as tempi go, Mme Hess takes charge.

She plays this concerto with the delicacy and finesse which are her trademarks and the engineers have captured them with the accuracy which is theirs.

• • •

A really domestic recording this month is the five-record album of Strauss' "Domestic Symphony." For this orchestral tour-de-force Victor has commandeered the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Eugene Ormandy conducting. Among orchestra nuts this is a comparatively hard one to crack, but it seems that orchestra and conductor gave the piece more than half a chance in the rehearsal hall.

From the opening oboe solo to the Falstaffian double-fugue the orchestra and composer prove that they are worthy of each other's steel. The unbelievably expert blowing of the taxing horn parts suggests that they were "berved."

• • •

If the Ballet Russe has had no other effect on music, it has at least pushed part of the Tchaikovsky "Fifth," Schumann's "Carnival" and some Chopin pieces into the ballet section of the catalogue. Four definitely black-seal records from Victor have corralled these and about a dozen other ballet tidbits into an album. The eight sides include tuneful Rossini, Respighi, Ravel, Strauss (Johann, of course), Scarlatti, Delibes, Weber, Borodin, Stravinsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Victor atones for the routine lack of flavor in this one with a first-class recording of Delibes' "Coppelia" Ballet Suite by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler puts his finger down on the only tempo in every instance and the orchestra responds to what must have been spirited and accurate stick-waving.

Antal Dorati and the London Philharmonic grip the balletomane's attention with the first groove of Chabrier's "Cotillon" and continue to do so for the complete four sides. Columbia is responsible for this recording and also for the four-record album of excerpts from Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake," played by the same conductor and orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 22 1939

Boston Symphony Program

At the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works of Haydn, Debussy and Sibelius arranged in the following sequence:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 102 ...... Haydn
I. Largo: Allegro vivace
II. Adagio
III. Menuetto: Allegro: Trio
IV. Finale: Presto
"La Mer," Three Symphonic Sketches............................... Debussy
I. "De l'aube a midi sur la mer"
II. "Jeux de vagues"
III. "Dialogue du vent et de la mer"
Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, opus 83.............................. Sibelius
I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato, ma pocco a poco stretto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JAN 22 1939

The BOSTON SYMPHONY

. . . is planning its annual benefit concert for its pension fund. The members of the orchestra will appear in 18th century costumes for Haydn's Farewell Symphony in which Serge Koussevitsky will impersonate the composer. Koussevitsky has planned several novelty numbers, including Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" for the first time with Richard Hale as narrator.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 22 1939

Today—Public lecture, Mr. John B. Archer on Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, Providence Public Library, 4. Meeting and musicale, Shepherdess Association, Catholic Training School on Eaton street, 3. Reception, Blackfriars Guild, Guildhall.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 22 1939

AUDIENCE CALLED AID TO ORCHESTRA

Reviews of Symphony Concerts in 1890's Show Success Depends on Auditors.

ATTENDANCE GROWS HERE

Celebrated Boston Organization Largely Supported by Gifts from Friends

By G. Y. Loveridge

Among other essentials, an orchestra must have an audience. Providence generally has responded to Boston Symphony concerts by sending appropriate numbers of listeners, although the graph has had its valleys.

In the Providence Journal of Jan. 22, 1891, the day after the fourth concert of the 1890-1891 series, it is reported: "Of the present actuality of that 'musical growth' which has so long elusively twinkled like a will-of-the-wisp in the dream of the music cult of this city, there is a most trustworthy indication in the great increase in patronage given the Symphony concerts, which is double that of any other winter. Last night in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to its largest, and the most enraptured, Providence audience. There were elements of distinction, too, which marked it above any previous Symphony assembly. The applause was unconfined."

Attendance Drops

A few years later, on Dec. 29, 1898, the Evening Bulletin told of a different situation.

"In spite of the attractive programme and the superb playing," the reviewer said, "the audience was the smallest one that has been seen in years at a symphony concert.

"There are unmistakable signs that musical entertainments of a high class are not wanted in Providence. ". . . It is to be feared that Conductor Gericke does not know how to cater to our taste. . . . What is needed to arouse our enthusiasm is six trombones in a row blowing 'Comrades' or 'After the Ball' for all they are worth. It is a mistake, too, that the programmes are so arranged that encores cannot be given. Room for at least three after each number should be provided. For there is no use going to a concert unless you can get your money's worth."

Largest Audience Cited

However, attendance at the concerts nowadays has been increasing steadily. As has been mentioned, the largest audience ever attracted by the orchestra here was that attending the last concert, in Metropolitan Theatre. Under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, which has been of longer continuous duration than that of any other conductor of the orchestra, the Boston Symphony has come to be acknowledged one of the best in the world. Its concerts are heard here and in Boston, but in Hartford, New Haven, Brooklyn, New York, Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Cambridge, Philadelphia, New Brunswick and Northampton. Also, there is the summer festival in Stockbridge, which is attended by persons from all over the country.

Never Makes Expenses

In spite of all this activity and the crowds of persons who go to the concerts, the Boston Symphony, like all other big orchestras, never makes expenses; but so great is the interest in it and so affectionately is it regarded throughout New England and elsewhere, that an organization called Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been formed to help overcome the deficits.

At the last meeting of the Friends, Edward A. Taft, chairman, reported an enrollment of 1319. Although a gift of $100 was formerly required for membership in the Friends, a gift of any amount now is welcomed.

The cost of supporting such an orchestra is more than $600,000 a year, Mr. Taft said. Of this amount, all but 15 per cent. is received in operating revenues, a larger percentage than any other orchestra receives. He estimated that more than 200,000 persons every season attend one or more concerts sponsored by the orchestra each of these persons a potential Friend.

Activities Expanded

Bentley W. Warren, treasurer of the Board of Trustees, said at the same meeting: "The orchestra has expanded its activities a good deal in recent years. This year (1938) we have taken over the management and responsibility of the Esplanade concerts. These concerts cost about $14,000. And $5000, fellow members, was contributed by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. That, I think, is recognition of the importance of this orchestra."

The Berkshire festival last summer was attended by 36,000 persons, he announced.

It had been the intention of Col. Higginson, who founded the orchestra, to establish a million-dollar fund to insure the continued life of the organization. Because of the large amounts he had to provide every year for the orchestra and because of the unstable condition of his own affairs during the early years of the war, he was unable to accumulate the fund.

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this State and elsewhere, carry on the work for music to which the founder devoted himself.

(This is the last of three articles on that phase of the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerning Providence.)

Quincy Patriot Ledger

Symphony to Give Pension Fund Concert

Jan. 25/39

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Hadyn symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galzxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius' best known work, "Valse Triste."

Great care is being taken with the settings and costumes which some of the numbers call for. Dr. Koussevitzky's costume as Papa Haydn has been designed by Robert Edmond Jones, who is known for his pioneering with color movies in Hollywood as well as for his work in the New York theater.

Decorations of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

The complete program is as follows:

Haydn .... Farewell Symphony
(Performed in costume)
Gruenberg .... The Daniel Jazz
(After the poem by Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'More)
Prokofeiff .... Peter and the Wolf
(Narrator: Richard Hale)
THE WALTZ
Lanner .... Die Schonbrunner
Strauss .... Vienna Blood
Voices of Spring
Sibelius .... Valse Triste
Ravel .... La Valse

Gregor Piatigersky, cellist, who will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week. He will play in the Saint-Saens Concerto and Bloch's "Solomon."

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, JANUARY 26/39

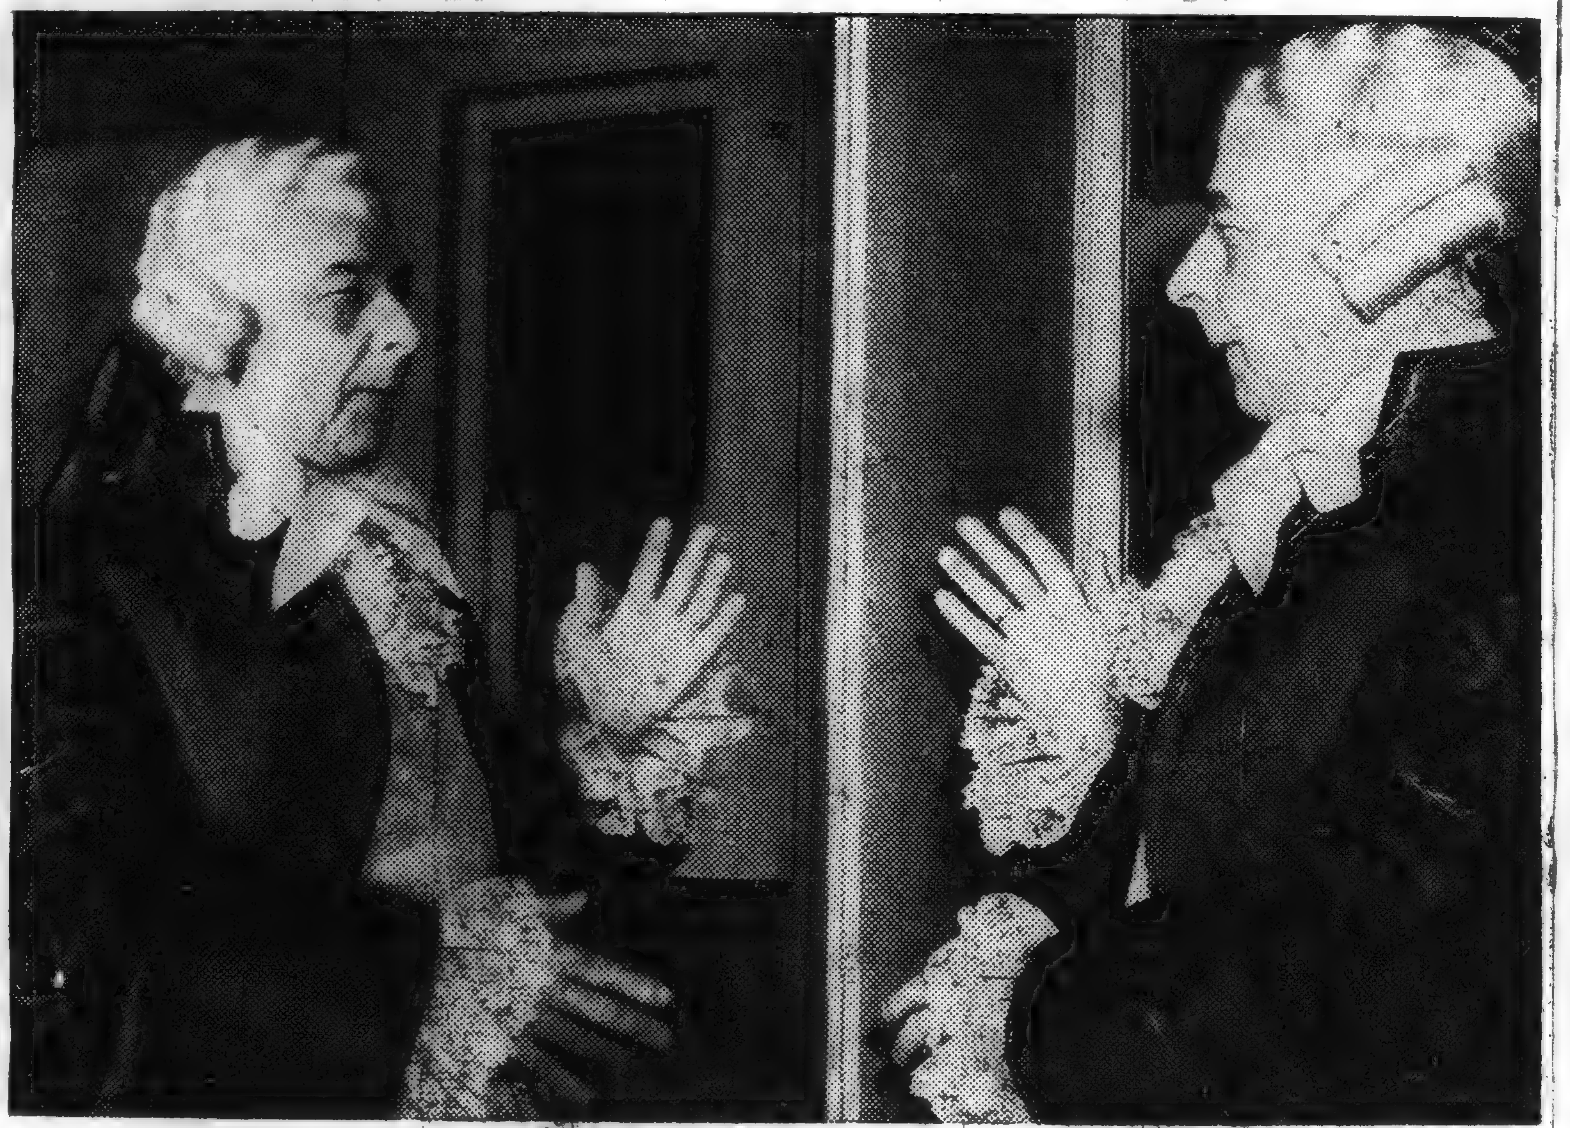
SYMPHONY LEADER IN 18TH CENTURY COSTUME

(AP Photo)

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, and members of the orchestra will take to 18th century finery in a "concert extraordinaire" Feb. 1. Here Conductor Koussevitzky, dressed as the composer, Haydn, to whom experts say he bears a remarkable likeness, tries a few conducting movements before a mirror—at the same time concentrating on holding his mouth in the Haydn fashion.

Jan. 26/39 THE EVENING BULLETIN, PROVIDENCE.

Koussevitzky Dresses as Haydn



—Associated Press photo

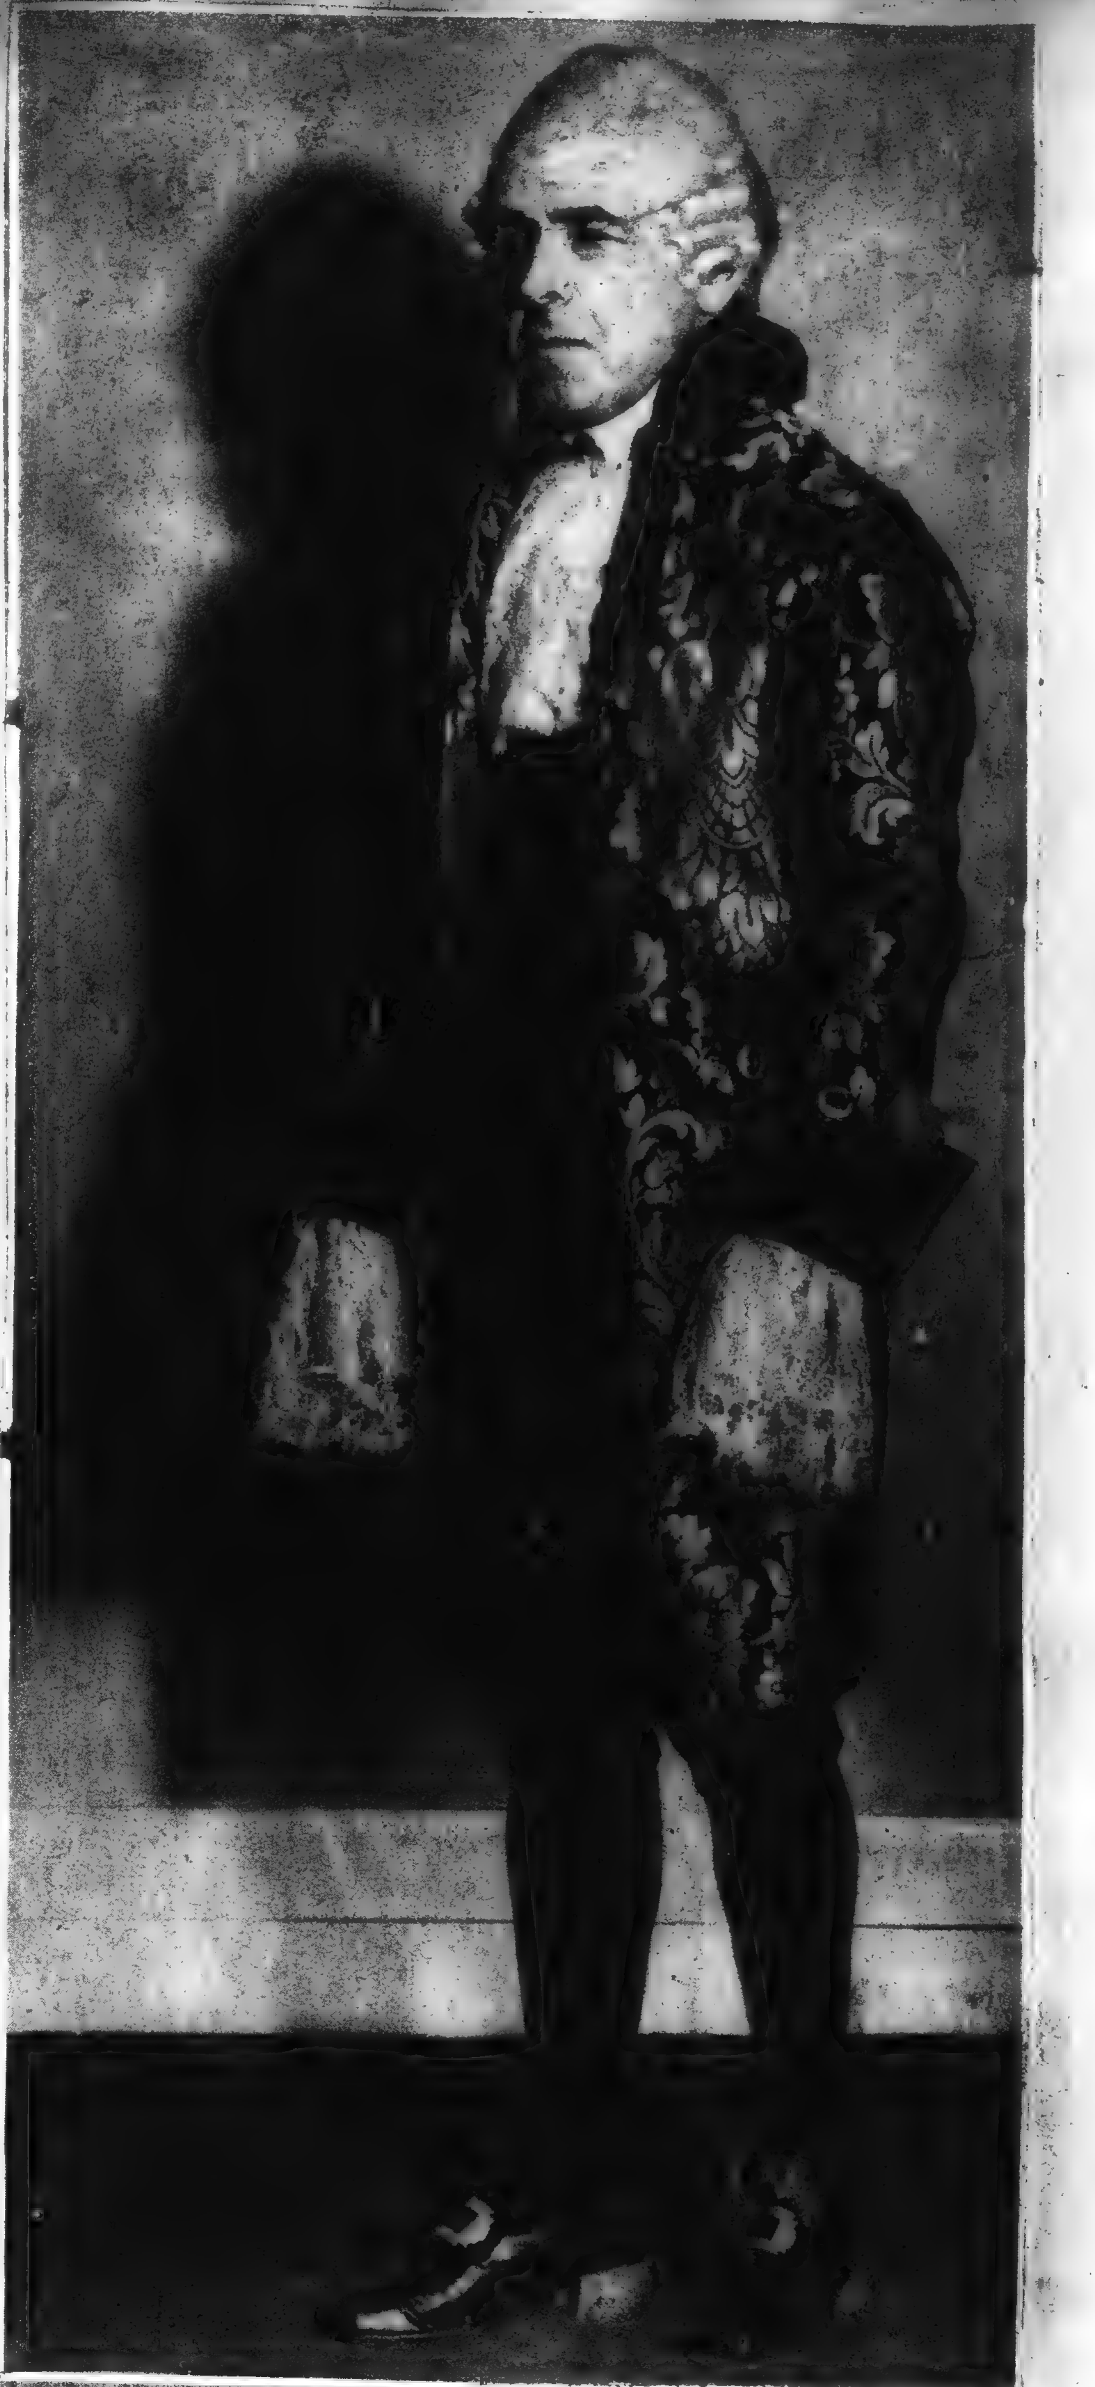
Something new in concerts will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when they dress in 18th century finery for their next appearance, in Boston, Feb. 1. Here the noted conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, dresses as the composer Haydn, to whom experts say he bears a remarkable resemblance and tries a few movements before the mirror, holding his mouth in typical Haydn fashion.

B. Protagonist for 'Schelomo'

Jan. 24/39

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

Solo 'cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.



HAYDN IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky as he will appear in the guise of Joseph Haydn, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra—its members also in 18th century costume—in Haydn's "Farewell Symphony." The performance will be on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, as a "Concert Extraordinaire" for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

Symphonic Activity During the Week; Pension Fund

The arts, visual, dramatic and poetic, will be combined with music at the Concert Extraordinaire to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, for the benefit of its pension fund, in Symphony hall, next Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, at 8:30. Stage settings and costumes are under preparation for the first two numbers—Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony and Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a setting for small orchestra, with tenor (Colin O'More) of Vachel Lindsay's poem. Robert Edmond Jones has designed a new 18th century costume for Dr. Koussevitzky based upon existing pictures of Joseph Haydn. Richard Hale will narrate the misfortunes and ultimate triumph of Peter in his encounter with the wolf, in the Russian fairy tale which Serge Prokofieff has set for speaker and orchestra. Prokofieff's score is notable for the identification of each character with a separate instrument and motif.

A procession of waltzes from early Vienna to late Paris will constitute the second part of the program, which will be as follows: Lanner's "Die Schonbrunner," Waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blut," Waltzes and "Fruhlingstimmen" Waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste"; and Ravel's "La Valse."

Two numbers will constitute the 15th program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its longer series to be performed in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will present the Eighth Symphony of Anton Bruckner in the first part of the program. It will be followed by Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition." Bruckner's symphony was last performed at these concerts in April, 1937, and Moussorgsky's score in 1934. The "Pictures at an Exhibition" will be played in the orchestration which Maurice Ravel made at the suggestion of Koussevitzky. There have been three other orchestrations: by Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi, and Lucien Cailliet.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, JANUARY 26/39

SYMPHONY LEADER IN 18TH CENTURY COSTUME

(AP Photo)

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, and members of the orchestra will take to 18th century finery in a "concert extraordinaire" Feb. 1. Here Conductor Koussevitzky, dressed as the composer, Haydn, to whom experts say he bears a remarkable likeness, tries a few conducting movements before a mirror—at the same time concentrating on holding his mouth in the Haydn fashion.

Jan. 26/39 THE EVENING BULLETIN, PROVIDENCE.

Koussevitzky Dresses as Haydn

—Associated Press photo

Something new in concerts will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when they dress in 18th century finery for their next appearance, in Boston, Feb. 1. Here the noted conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, dresses as the composer Haydn, to whom experts say he bears a remarkable resemblance and tries a few movements before the mirror, holding his mouth in typical Haydn fashion.

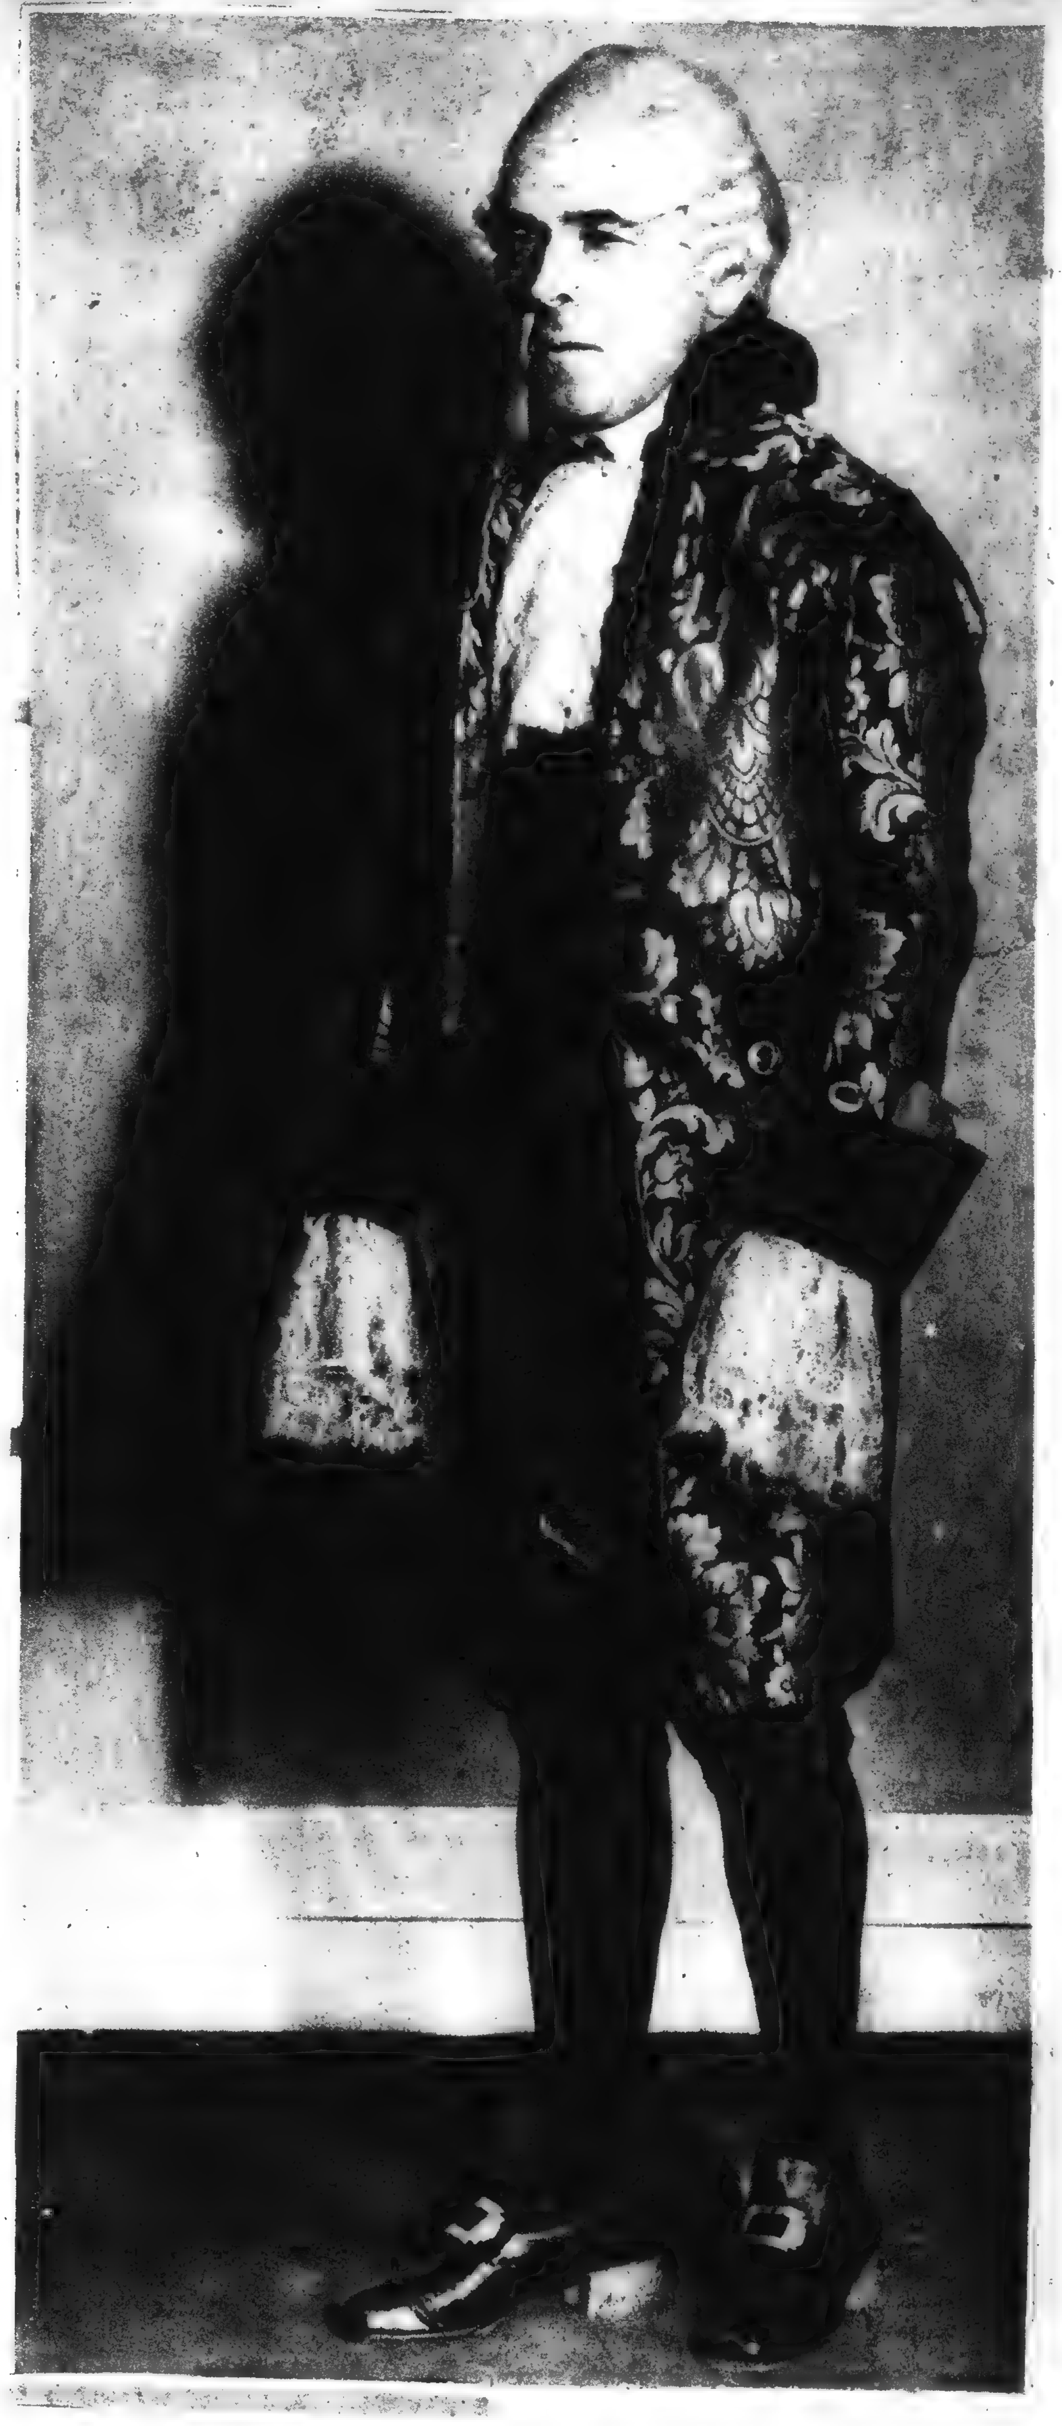
B. Trave

Protagonist for 'Schelomo'

Jan 24/39

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

Solo 'cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.



HAYDN IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky as he will appear in the guise of Joseph Haydn, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra—its members also in 18th century costume—in Haydn's "Farewell Symphony." The performance will be on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, as a "Concert Extraordinaire" for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

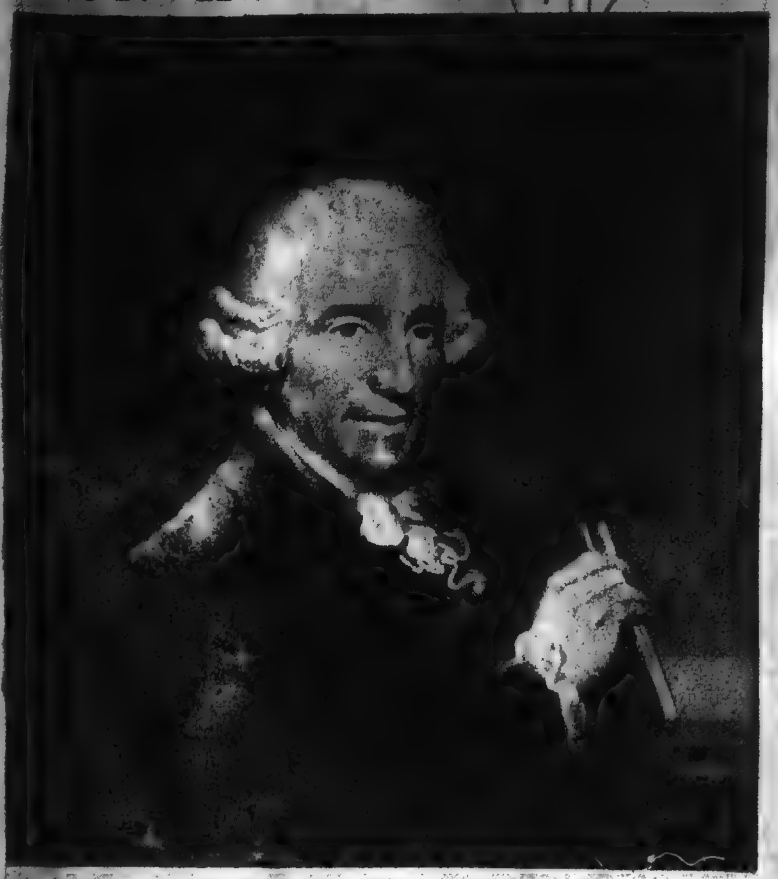
Symphonic Activity During the Week; Pension Fund

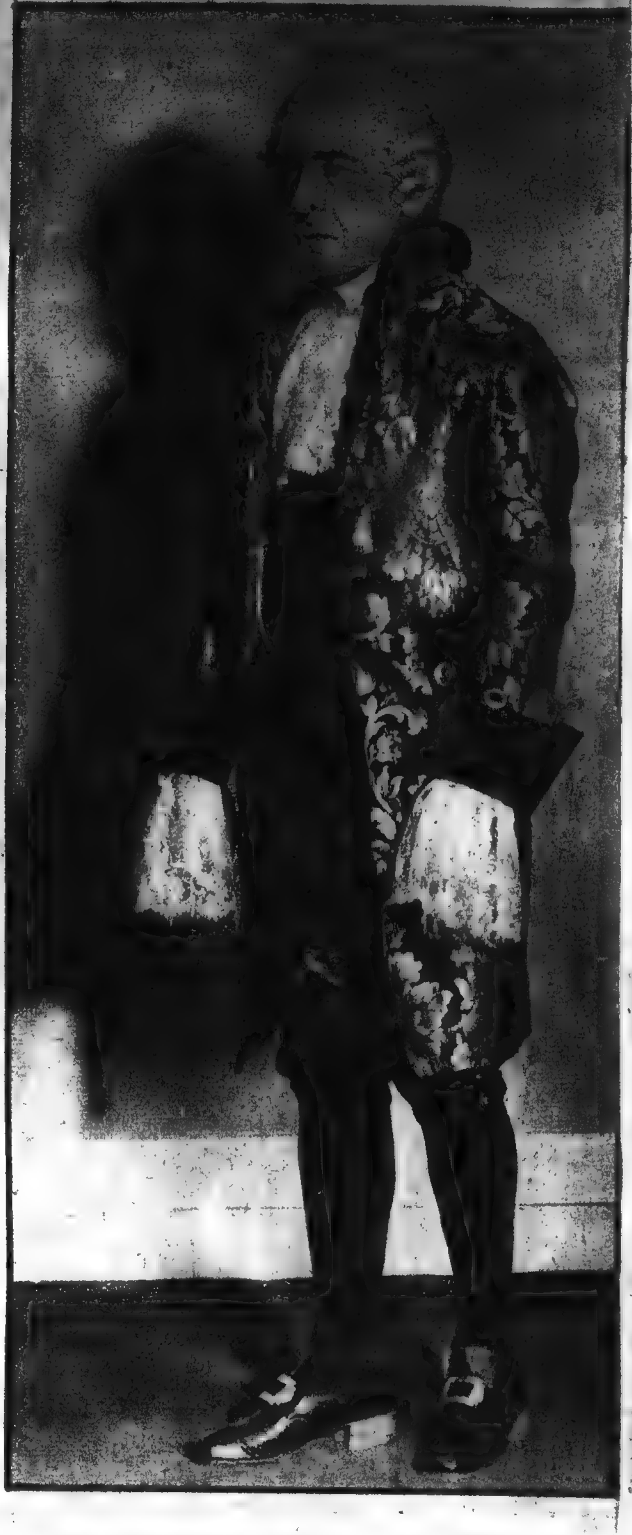
The arts, visual, dramatic and poetic, will be combined with music at the Concert Extraordinaire to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, for the benefit of its pension fund, in Symphony hall, next Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, at 8:30. Stage settings and costumes are under preparation for the first two numbers—Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony and Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a setting for small orchestra, with tenor (Colin O'More) of Vachel Lindsay's poem. Robert Edmond Jones has designed a new 18th century costume for Dr. Koussevitzky based upon existing pictures of Joseph Haydn. Richard Hale will narrate the misfortunes and ultimate triumph of Peter in his encounter with the wolf, in the Russian fairy tale which Serge Prokofieff has set for speaker and orchestra. Prokofieff's score is notable for the identification of each character with a separate instrument and motif.

A procession of waltzes from early Vienna to late Paris will constitute the second part of the program, which will be as follows: Lanner's "Die Schonbrunner," Waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blut," Waltzes and "Fruhlingstimmen" Waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste"; and Ravel's "La Valse."

Two numbers will constitute the 15th program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its longer series to be performed in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will present the Eighth Symphony of Anton Bruckner in the first part of the program. It will be followed by Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition." Bruckner's symphony was last performed at these concerts in April, 1937, and Moussorgsky's score in 1934. The "Pictures at an Exhibition" will be played in the orchestration which Maurice Ravel made at the suggestion of Koussevitzky. There have been three other orchestrations: by Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi, and Lucien Cailliet.

TON HERALD





THIS REALISTIC representation of Josef Haydn, "Father of the Symphony," at the right, is actually Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In a special program on Wednesday evening, February 1st, at Symphony Hall, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, Koussevitzky and his musicians will don such costumes to recreate the atmosphere of the original performance of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. The music stands will be lighted by candles. In the final movement of the symphony, the musicians, a few at a time, will blow out their candles and leave the stage while the others continue playing, until at last everyone has stopped playing and quit the stage. The real Josef Haydn is shown in the above photo of a contemporary portrait.

BOSTON TRAVELER, FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, 1939

DOES THE WIG FOOL YOU?

(AP Photo)

Don't be fooled by the wig, this is a picture of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, leaders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductor donned this 18th century finery to show cameramen how he will look when he conducts a series of concerts "extraordinaire" at Boston, Feb. 1, and in New York Feb. 8. He will impersonate the Composer Haydn, to whom he hears a remarkable resemblance.

Orchestra to Be Costumed for Program

Boston Symphony Members to Wear Eighteenth Century Finery for Playing of Haydn Piece Feb. 1.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening of the concert the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle-lighted music racks before them.

Koussevitzky at Spinet.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

Russian Novelty.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes, "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius's best known work, "Valse Triste."

Decorations of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

MUSIC AND

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at 8:30 Wednesday evening in an "Extraordinary Concert" for the benefit of the pension fund. A calculated departure from conventionality lends to this concert promise of an unusual evening. To begin, Dr. Koussevitzky will lead a portion of the orchestra in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, during which conductor and players will be dressed in 18th Century costume. Special stage settings are being prepared for this number, and for Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz." Gruenberg's music is a setting for small orchestra and tenor voice, of Vachel Lindsay's poem. Colin O'More will be the soloist. Richard Hale will have the spoken role of the Narrator in Prokofieff's charming musical version of a Russian fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf." The second half of the program will consist of waltzes from early Vienna to modern Paris, as follows: "Die Schoenbrunner," Lanner; "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," Strauss; "Valse Triste," Sibelius, and "La Valse," Ravel.

There will be but two numbers—Bruckner's Eighth Symphony and the Ravel-Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition"—on the program for the "regular" concerts Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15. Dr. Koussevitzky last presented the Bruckner work at the Boston Symphony concerts in April, 1937. Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's piano pieces—undertaken at the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky—has not been heard here since 1934.

Boston Symphony Benefit

Serge Koussevitzky and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will wear eighteenth century costumes and the players will sit on eighteenth century chairs before candle-lighted music racks for Haydn's Farewell Symphony, which opens the program of a "concert extraordinaire" for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night, Feb. 8. Dr. Koussevitzky will represent the composer. Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," which follows, with Colin O'More as tenor soloist, also is to have a special stage setting, the details of which have not been disclosed. Richard Hale will be the narrator in the first New York performance of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." Five waltzes, including Lanner's "Die Schönbrunner," Johann Strauss's "Wiener Blut" and "Frühlingsstimmen," Sibelius's "Valse Triste," and Ravel's "La Valse" will follow.

Robert Edmond Jones has designed Dr. Koussevitzky's Haydnesque costume, and Jock Monroe is supervising the stage preparations for this concert. The Boston Symphony's next regular subscription concerts here will be on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 10 and 11, in Carnegie Hall, and Thursday night, Feb. 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Friday program consists of Bruckner's eighth symphony and Ravel's "Pictures at an Exhibition." For the Saturday matinee he will conduct Mozart's symphony in A (K. 201), Sibeliu's seventh symphony, Bloch's "Schelomo" with Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, as the soloist, and Scriabin's "Poeme de l' Extase." Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster, will conduct the Brooklyn program, with Mr. Bedetti as soloist in the Saint-Saens A minor concerto. The Mozart symphony in A and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony will be the other numbers.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THEATRICAL EVENT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in planning a Concert Extraordinaire to be given in Boston Feb. 1, and in New York Feb. 8, for the benefit of the pension fund, has abandoned stiff collar symphony tradition and gone theatrical to provide a good show.

Robert Edmond Jones, famous for his work in the New York theater and with color movies in Hollywood, is designing for Dr. Koussevitzky a costume in the period of Josef Haydn to be worn when he leads the orchestra through that composer's Farewell Symphony. To insure complete theatrical illusion during the piece, the costume is being executed by Eaves, famous costumer to the New York theater at large, while Dr. Koussevitzky's wig is being made by Barris. Costumes for the remainder of the orchestra are being prepared by Hayden of Boston and supervised by Jock Munro, director and playwright of New York.

"The Daniel Jazz" comes second on the program. It is a modern piece by Gruenberg based on the poem written by Vachel Lindsay about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'Moore. The next piece is a Russian nursery tale, "Peter and the Wolf," as conceived by Serge Prokofieff, the eminent composer. Each character in the story has a theme and a special instrument to play it; while the whole story is told against the background of the music by a narrator, Richard Hale.

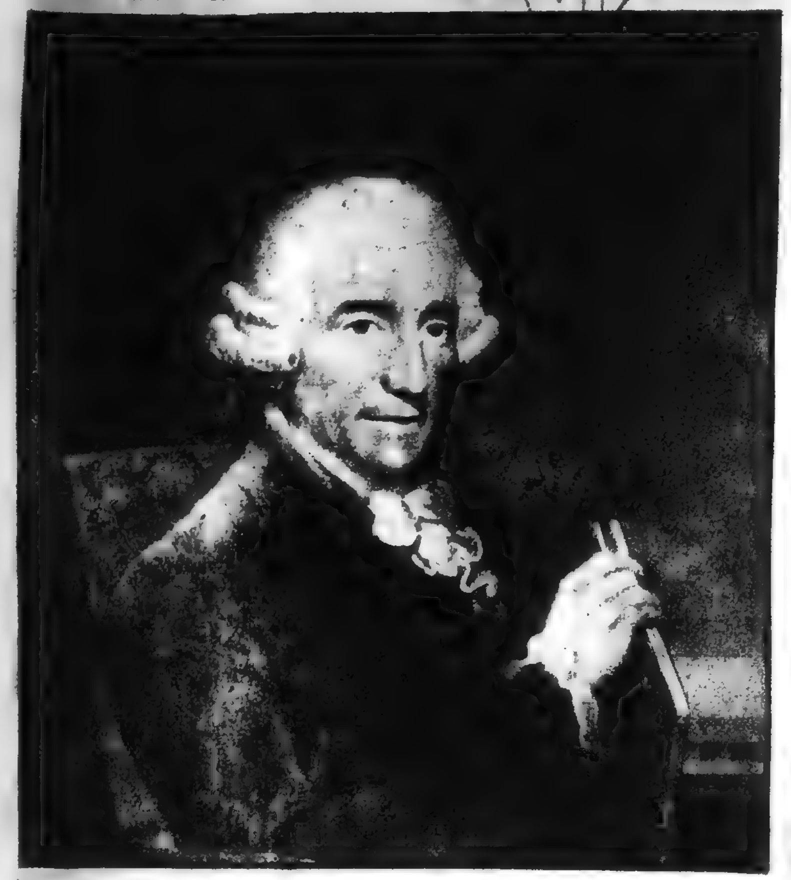
The theatrical side of the program lessens after "Peter and the Wolf." Dr. Koussevitzky has planned a group of well-known waltzes for the second half of the program. They will include Strauss' Vienna Blood, Voices of Spring, Ravel's La Valse, Lanner's Schonbrunner and Sibelius' Valse Triste.

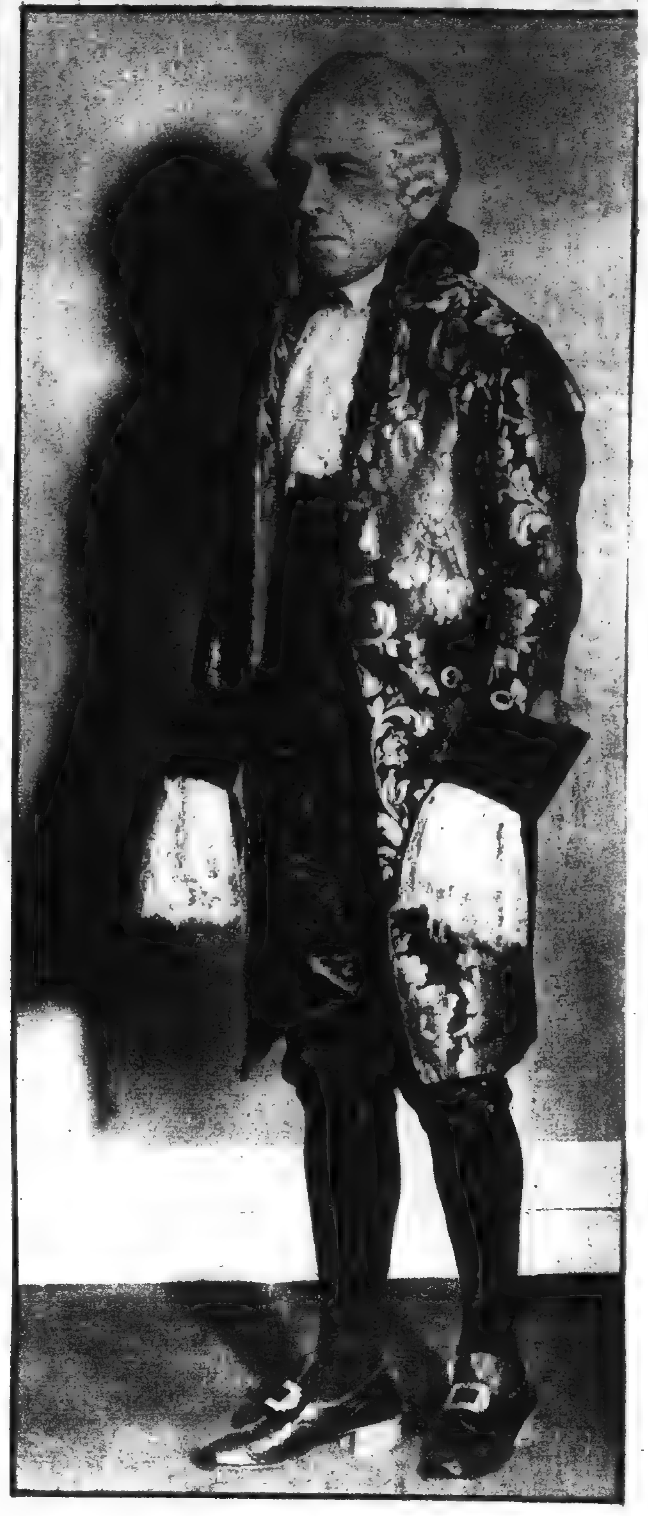
MEMORIAL CONCERT FOR ALBERT SNOW

The New England Conservatory orchestra, conducted by Wallace Goodrich, director, will give a concert Wednesday evening, Jan. 25, in Jordan hall at 8:15. The Adagio from Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor, No. 3, for orchestra and organ, will be played in memory of Albert W. Snow, a member of the faculty from 1924 to 1939. Carl McKinley of the faculty will be the organist. The orchestra concerts at the New England Conservatory are open to the public without charge, tickets obtainable at the conservatory. The program is as follows:

Adagio from Symphony in C minor No. 3 for orchestra and organ.. Saint-Saens
Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra (soloist, Elizabeth Crouse)..Lalo
Two entr'actes from "Pelleas et Melisande" ....Debussy
Overture and Baacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" ....Wagner

TON HERALD 31

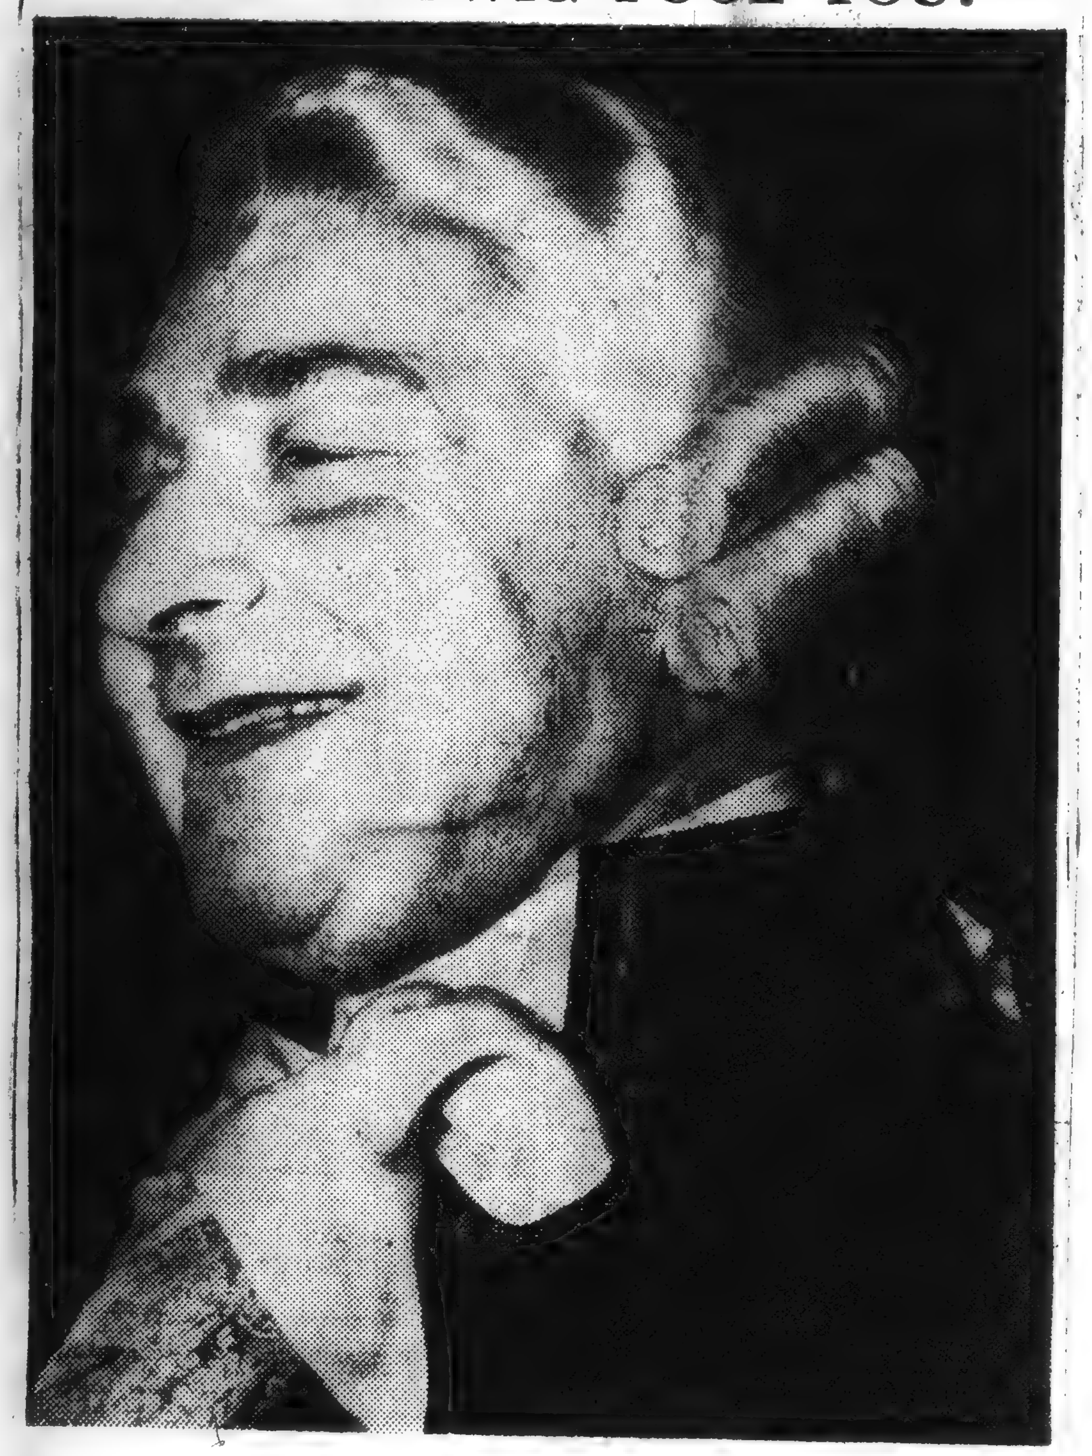




THIS REALISTIC representation of Josef Haydn, "Father of the Symphony," at the right, is actually Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In a special program on Wednesday evening, February 1st, at Symphony Hall, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, Koussevitzky and his musicians will don such costumes to recreate the atmosphere of the original performance of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. The music stands will be lighted by candles. In the final movement of the symphony, the musicians, a few at a time, will blow out their candles and leave the stage while the others continue playing, until at last everyone has stopped playing and quit the stage. The real Josef Haydn is shown in the above photo of a contemporary portrait.

BOSTON TRAVELER, FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, 1939

DOES THE WIG FOOL YOU?



(AP Photo)

Don't be fooled by the wig, this is a picture of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, leaders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductor donned this 18th century finery to show cameramen how he will look when he conducts a series of concerts "extraordinaire" at Boston, Feb. 1, and in New York Feb. 8. He will impersonate the Composer Haydn, to whom he hears a remarkable resemblance.

Orchestra to Be Costumed for Program

Boston Symphony Members to Wear Eighteenth Century Finery for Playing of Haydn Piece Feb. 1.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening of the concert the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle-lighted music racks before them.

Koussevitzky at Spinet.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

Russian Novelty.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes, "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius's best known work, "Valse Triste."

Decorations of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

MUSIC AND

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at 8:30 Wednesday evening in an "Extraordinary Concert" for the benefit of the pension fund. A calculated departure from conventionality lends to this concert promise of an unusual evening. To begin, Dr. Koussevitzky will lead a portion of the orchestra in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, during which conductor and players will be dressed in 18th Century costume. Special stage settings are being prepared for this number, and for Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz." Gruenberg's music is a setting for small orchestra and tenor voice, of Vachel Lindsay's poem. Colin O'More will be the soloist. Richard Hale will have the spoken role of the Narrator in Prokofieff's charming musical version of a Russian fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf." The second half of the program will consist of waltzes from early Vienna to modern Paris, as follows: "Die Schoenbrunner," Lanner; "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," Strauss; "Valse Triste," Sibelius, and "La Valse," Ravel.

There will be but two numbers—Bruckner's Eighth Symphony and the Ravel-Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition"—on the program for the "regular" concerts Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15. Dr. Koussevitzky last presented the Bruckner work at the Boston Symphony concerts in April, 1937. Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's piano pieces—undertaken at the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky—has not been heard here since 1934.

Boston Symphony Benefit

Serge Koussevitzky and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will wear eighteenth century costumes and the players will sit on eighteenth century chairs before candle-lighted music racks for Haydn's Farewell Symphony, which opens the program of a "concert extraordinaire" for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night, Feb. 8. Dr. Koussevitzky will represent the composer. Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," which follows, with Colin O'More as tenor soloist, also is to have a special stage setting, the details of which have not been disclosed. Richard Hale will be the narrator in the first New York performance of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." Five waltzes, including Lanner's "Die Schönbrunner," Johann Strauss's "Wiener Blut" and "Frühlingsstimmen," Sibelius's "Valse Triste," and Ravel's "La Valse" will follow.

Robert Edmond Jones has designed Dr. Koussevitzky's Haydnesque costume, and Jock Monroe is supervising the stage preparations for this concert. The Boston Symphony's next regular subscription concerts here will be on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 10 and 11, in Carnegie Hall, and Thursday night, Feb. 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Friday program consists of Bruckner's eighth symphony and Ravel's "Pictures at an Exhibition." For the Saturday matinee he will conduct Mozart's symphony in A (K. 201), Sibeliu's seventh symphony, Bloch's "Schelomo" with Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, as the soloist, and Scriabin's "Poeme de l' Extase." Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster, will conduct the Brooklyn program, with Mr. Bedetti as soloist in the Saint-Saens A minor concerto. The Mozart symphony in A and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony will be the other numbers.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THEATRICAL EVENT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in planning a Concert Extraordinaire to be given in Boston Feb. 1, and in New York Feb. 8, for the benefit of the pension fund, has abandoned stiff collar symphony tradition and gone theatrical to provide a good show.

Robert Edmond Jones, famous for his work in the New York theater and with color movies in Hollywood, is designing for Dr. Koussevitzky a costume in the period of Josef Haydn to be worn when he leads the orchestra through that composer's Farewell Symphony. To insure complete theatrical illusion during the piece, the costume is being executed by Eaves, famous costumer to the New York theater at large, while Dr. Koussevitzky's wig is being made by Barris. Costumes for the remainder of the orchestra are being prepared by Hayden of Boston and supervised by Jock Munro, director and playwright of New York.

"The Daniel Jazz" comes second on the program. It is a modern piece by Gruenberg based on the poem written by Vachel Lindsay about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'Moore. The next piece is a Russian nursery tale, "Peter and the Wolf," as conceived by Serge Prokofieff, the eminent composer. Each character in the story has a theme and a special instrument to play it; while the whole story is told against the background of the music by a narrator, Richard Hale.

The theatrical side of the program lessens after "Peter and the Wolf." Dr. Koussevitzky has planned a group of well-known waltzes for the second half of the program. They will include Strauss' Vienna Blood, Voices of Spring, Ravel's La Valse, Lanner's Schonbrunner and Sibelius' Valse Triste.

MEMORIAL CONCERT FOR ALBERT SNOW

The New England Conservatory orchestra, conducted by Wallace Goodrich, director, will give a concert Wednesday evening, Jan. 25, in Jordan hall at 8:15. The Adagio from Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor, No. 3, for orchestra and organ, will be played in memory of Albert W. Snow, a member of the faculty from 1924 to 1939. Carl McKinley of the faculty will be the organist. The orchestra concerts at the New England Conservatory are open to the public without charge, tickets obtainable at the conservatory. The program is as follows:

Adagio from Symphony in C minor No. 3 for orchestra and organ.. Saint-Saens
Symphonic Espagnole for violin and orchestra (soloist, Elizabeth Crouse)..Lalo
Two entr'actes from "Pelleas et Melisande" .... Debussy
Overture and Baacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" .... Wagner

THE BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, JANUARY

28/39

Today IN SOCIETY

Ovations Punctuate Symphony Program

Familiar Friday Audience Enthralled at Music

Ovation after ovation punctuated yesterday's symphony program—a rising one for Dr. Koussevitzky, returned from a brief visit to New York, another for the appearance of the distinguished Russian soloist of the afternoon, Gregor Piatigorsky, and yet another for his notable performance in the Saint-Saens Concerto, and still more beating storms of applause after both the Bloch, for which Mr. Piatigorsky was again the soloist, and the concluding Scriabin.

In that vast familiar Friday audience, many of whom have listened together for more than a quarter of a century of Friday afternoons—Mrs. Richard Sears, white orchids on her green and yellow tailleure; Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller and her daughter Mary, a spray of tiny exquisite yellow orchids on Mary's mink coat; Mrs. Richard King Thorndike in becoming steel blue; Mrs. Augustus Rantoul and her daughter Charlotte, both with wine red dresses under their furs.

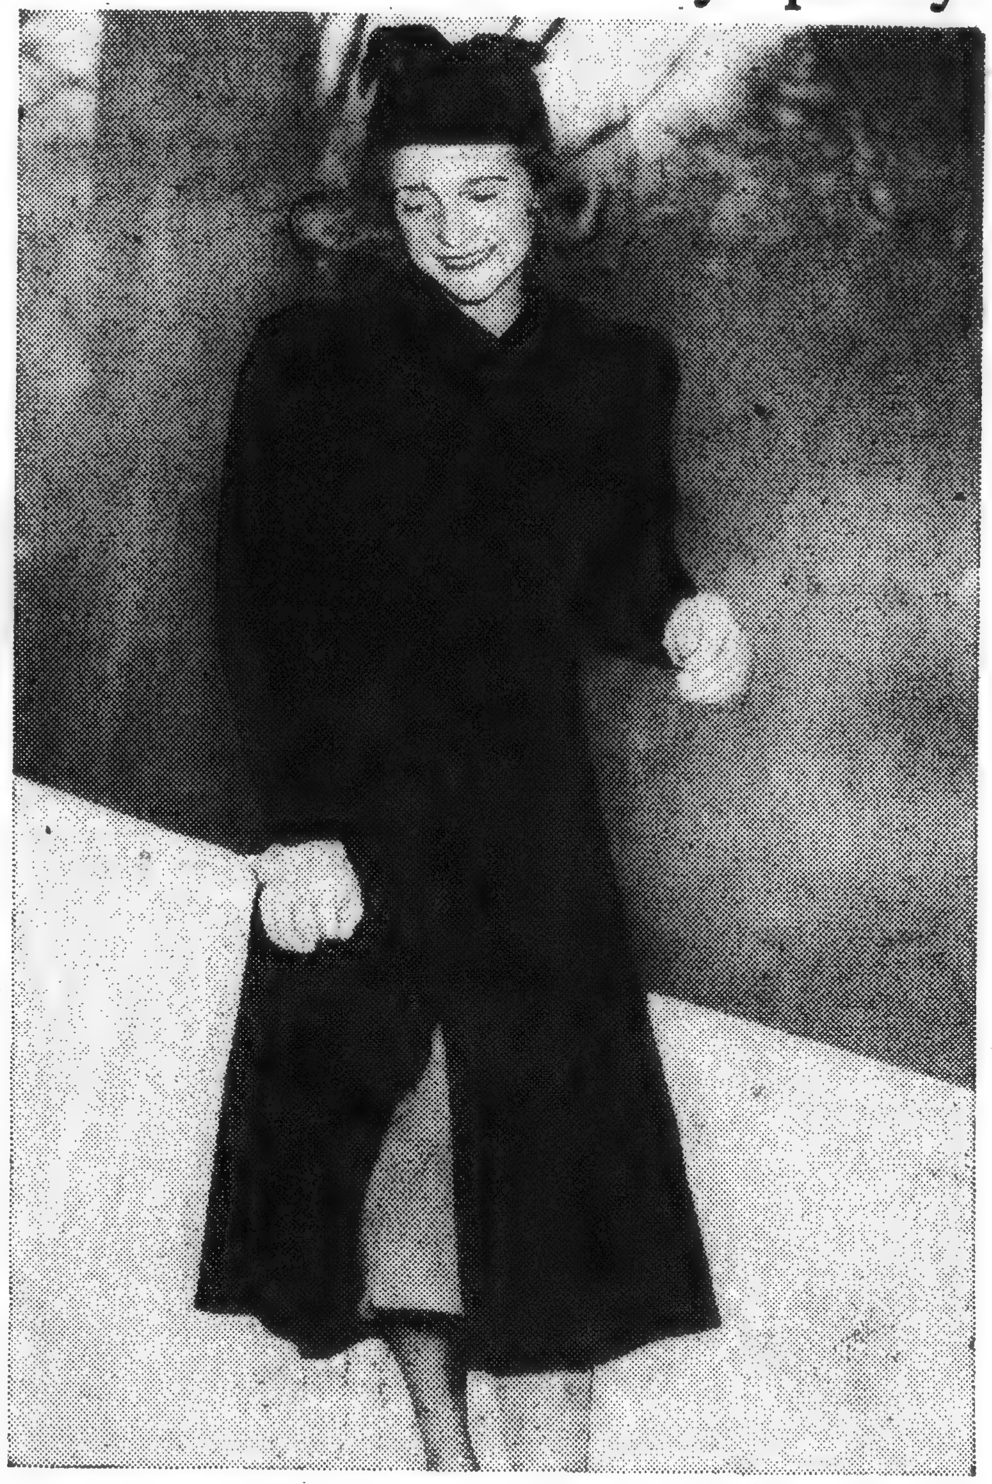
Dark-haired Diana Bird, pretty as a picture in her dark furs and little veiled hat, attended with her father, Charles Sumner Bird, and strolling with them at intermission was Diana's aunt, Mrs. Oliver Wolcott. Mr. and Mrs. Roger Wolcott were also in yesterday's fortunate audience, touches of American beauty on her smart little black hat, and also strolling together were Mrs. Russell Burrage and Mrs. Albert Cameron Burrage Jr., Mrs. Russell in suave simple black and silver foxes, Mrs. "A. C." in decorative plum color, a little circlet of diamonds sparkling at her throat.

Mrs. James Dean, who yesterday announced the engagement of her daughter, Dorothea, to Robert Parkinson of Dover, was in her usual seat, accompanied by Dorothea, whose fetching checked tweeds had a matching cap. Mrs. Dean's good-looking suit was made of the new English violet tweed and her cavalier hat of bright rose had a wide violet band to match.

Others of the many there, Mrs. Francis P. Sears, a little ostrich-feathered toque setting off the severe simplicity of her hem-length black broadtail cape; Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, lovely in her soft grays; Mrs. C. Bertram Currier and her sister, Peggy Blake, Peggy's fair hair shining above a wine-color frock; Mrs. John Lavalle, a little chic toque of black perched above her beaver coat, and Mrs. Roger Merriman, white flowers pinned to the collar of her mink coat.

Mrs. Charles F. Ayer wore a flat Parisian sailor of fuchsia velvet and ribbon tipped above her mink coat, and Mrs. Philip Stockton also topped her mink with a small gray hat. Mrs. Harrison Reynolds was also among the mink-wrapped audience yesterday, and others glimpsed were Mrs. Allan Forbes, silver foxes over her black, accompanied by her daughter, Phyllis, whose beautifully tailored dress was of gray tweed; Mrs. Irvin Garfield (Elinor Fay), Mrs. John Bishop, a striped suede cap gay above her black frock; Mrs. Fuller Halsey and her debutante daughter, Hope, the latter's fetching emerald-color pillbox with its little snood very becoming; Gerry Field, taking time off from her many Junior League activities for the symphony, her simple blue-green very smart; Barbara Bremer, Frances Hovey, debutantes Katharine Ladd, Alice Jaques and Nancy Blumer; Mary West with a mink coat over her saffron wool; Josephine Murray, her English tweeds mink-trimmed; Mrs Frederic C. Church Jr., with a luxurious square mink muff to match her short jacket, spending intermission with Mrs. Wallace Goodrich; Lucy Pope and Dorothy Wightman, both with braids wound round their heads; Mrs. Herbert Jaques Jr., Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs and many more.

Debutante Attends Symphony



Attractive Katharine Ladd was among yesterday's capacity audience at Symphony Hall for the memorable 14th program of this season. A member of the Junior League and the Vincent Club, Katharine is the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. William E. Ladd of Milton and a debutante of the season.

Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Resumes Direction, With Piatigorsky Doubly as Soloist

B. Trans BY MOSES SMITH Jan. 28/39

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's assistant conductors, a fairly numerous and voluble brood who function in the lobby just before the beginning and during the intermission of the concerts, had their inning again yesterday. With the concerts returned more or less to normal, that is, with Serge Koussevitzky again in his familiar place after an absence of three weeks, the assistant conductors nevertheless found opportunity for indulging their talents by adversely criticizing the choice and assembly of the program-numbers.

As usual, the criticism was a personal affair. If you don't like Sibelius, whose Seventh Symphony began the program, you probably like him less when he compresses an entire symphony into a single long movement. If you reason by categories you automatically damn Saint-Saens as old-fashioned, and pay scant attention to his A minor Concerto, even with an eminent 'cellist like Gregor Piatigorsky to play the solo part. Nor is Bloch a fashionable composer at the moment. Besides, "Schelomo," the third number on the program, with Piatigorsky again for protagonist of the rhapsodic solo part, was written almost 23 years ago; and matter of such vintage is in far poorer repute than something written two hundred years ago. As to the final number, "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, the accepted verdict is that no good could come out of a composer obsessed with a religious mania.

The difficulty in meeting these objections is that, from this look-out, they seem to be partly sound and thus more readily conceal vulnerability. One may dispose most quickly of Sibelius because, as you find in a perpetual round of concerts, the discussion almost invariably comes down to personal taste. How impulsive is the basis of opinions on the subject may be realized from the behavior of one of the afore-mentioned assistant conductors. Before the concert began he found this Seventh Symphony unworthy serious attention, the themes insignificant, and so forth. During the intermission he had a different story to tell. Very likely, as he himself said, the splendid performance had changed his mind.

After the performance of the Concerto I could almost agree with all its detractors. But the performance had really not been fair. Saint-Saens was not all bad. He had something of the Gallic refinement that was his birthright, as might have been noted in the second section of the Concerto if it had been played with a less heavy hand than Piatigorsky set to it. In the first movement, particularly, there is a good deal of sound that signifies little. The thing to do is to get over it as gracefully as possible, not bear down, in Piatigorsky's manner, as if ultimate verities were being expounded. Much of the sentiment, if not explicitly false, is at least by implication feeble.

The Concerto, in short, will not bear too close inspection, and that is exactly what Piatigorsky brought to it, as he seized every legitimate—and many an illegitimate—opportunity for broadening out a phrase, adding excitement and over-refining delicacy of statement. Here was a superb virtuoso in command, but scarcely a discerning musician. The pity was that Dr. Koussevitzky, instead of directing a neat accompaniment, did not take matters into his own hands.

"Schelomo" was another affair, lending itself more to Piatigorsky's expansive style. Furthermore, the conductor's duty loomed more largely here; and Dr. Koussevitzky clearly has the warmth and understanding for Bloch's Hebraic, passionate score. The result was the unfolding, once more, of a profoundly moving, beautiful work; music of an infinite variety of colors and an infinite variety of emotions. It has now been played on only four programs here since it was introduced in 1923—an average of about once in five years. It can stand more frequent revival.

* * *

The "Poem of Ecstasy," completed in 1907, had been presented here at only three pairs of concerts until Dr. Koussevitzky took over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It appeared on his first program on Oct. 10, 1924; and yesterday's was his seventh presentation at a Friday matinee concert. It is a work with which he clearly has sympathy. And listening to such an eloquent performance as yesterday's one could be, at least for the moment, convinced. Not by the puerile, adolescent sighs and agonies or by the rank and decadent voluptuousness, but by the sheer sensuous beauty of the orchestral sounds, the original (if limited and monotonous) harmonic palette, by the evidence of the presence of a genuine though diseased creative spirit.

We are used to being reminded that Scriabin owed much to Chopin and Wagner, as if that told the whole story. It does not. Listen to the "Poem of Ecstasy" and you will observe that Stravinsky probably listened to it before he wrote such a work as "Fire-Bird." Scriabin had something to give him as he still has to give us. He would have given more effectively if. . . But the speculation is fruitless.

B. Globe Jan 28/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Gregor Piatigorsky, Russian cellist whose artistry matches his virtuosity, is soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts this week in the A minor Concerto of Saint-Saens and the Hebrew Rhapsody, "Solomon," by Ernest Bloch. For the remainder of a longish and somewhat curious program, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Returning from his annual mid-season respite, Dr. Koussevitzky was cordially greeted yesterday afternoon by orchestra and audience. The concert was, in general, one of orchestral magnificence that, for the thousandth time, revealed players and leader at their best.

If, for a single exception, there was some unevenness between soloist and orchestra in the course of Saint-Saens' work, the performance was nevertheless brilliant and proved again how technical skill and sensitive interpretation can restore lustre to music hackneyed or second rate. This Concerto has suffered from both complaints. What is essentially a showpiece, cleverly written for the solo instrument, emerged under Mr. Piatigorsky's fingers as seemingly vital and striking.

Throughout the music of Bloch—who, by the way, is announced in the program book as guest conductor of five Boston Symphony concerts in March—Mr. Piatigorsky, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra collaborated upon an irresistibly emotional performance. "Solomon," with its broad sweep of melody, its vivid colors and dramatic mood, offers a technical and interpretative tour de force to imaginative musicians. All concerned yesterday made the most of this opportunity.

Yet despite the manifold beauties of performance in Saint-Saens, Bloch, and Scriabin's rather banal flights of poetry, the high point of the afternoon was, to one listener, the last Symphony that Jean Sibelius has thus far given us. The Seventh Symphony is still new enough to present at each repetition vistas that one has overlooked before. It is also sufficiently young to arouse disparate opinions. Some consider it a masterpiece, others do not.

This reviewer commits himself to the first point of view. The remarkably elegiac work might, without making too fine a point, be termed a summation of Sibelius' career as a symphonist; his ultimate achievement in the development of one of the most individual styles of expression known to music; perfection in that process of condensing form, orchestration and material which began as far back as his Second Symphony.

The Seventh is an amazing compression into a single movement of characteristic Sibelian devices. The Seventh also reveals that the composer's melodic and harmonic individuality has remained constant; the man who wrote the First Symphony is recognizably he who penned the Seventh, except that passing years have trimmed away the romantic decoration of his early music, leaving what might be called Sibelius' fundamental classicism.

Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Bruckner's Eighth Symphony and the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel. C. W. D.

PIATIGORSKY PLAYS AT BEST

Solo 'Cellist in "Schelomo" at Symphony

B. Post Jan 28/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

By an interesting coincidence, the announcement that Ernest Bloch would appear as guest-conductor of the Symphony Orchestra in March accompanied the superb performance yesterday of his "Schelomo" ("Solomon") with Gregor Piatigorsky as the solo 'cellist. Mr. Piatigorsky also lent his phenomenal abilities to the A minor Concerto of Saint-Saens; while the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" made the two extremes of one of the season's most rewarding symphony concerts.

Admittedly, music cannot be better than it sounds—as Artemus Ward said of Wagner—but it is not altogether certain that music cannot be made to sound better than it is. The performance of Saint-Saens' Concerto yesterday made that somewhat specious work almost engrossing. And whether it was a matter of transfiguration or merely of revelation in the case of the other numbers on the programme, a ticklish point to discuss, the resulting eloquence was incontestable. Evidently, Dr. Koussevitzky's brief winter vacation has left him in the best of health and spirits; the orchestra, apparently revelled in the varying opportunities offered it by Sibelius, Bloch and Scriabin; and to say that Mr. Piatigorsky was at his best is merely to say that nothing in the way of 'cello playing could possibly have been better.

With performances every two years since 1931, the Sibelius Seventh has become a common experience at Symphony Hall, while the "Poem of Ecstacy" and "Schelomo" had gone respectively (and roughly) three and five years without a hearing there. Both were welcome: the "Schelomo" for its passionate earnestness, its frequent magnificence, its imaginative re-creation of a great figure and a vanished day; and "The Poem of Ecstacy" for its agreeable voluptuousness, its febrile excitements and its overpoweringly sonorous close. Of late, Dr. Koussevitzky's inclinations in programme-making have leaned a bit in the direction of asceticism. The more to be enjoyed then, was the chance to revel with Scriabin in sound for its own sake. Surely an occasional musical debauch does us no harm.

Even with such frequent hearings, the Sibelius Seventh remains a baffling work. Somehow its impressiveness, which is undeniable, seems to lie not so much in the musical ideas as in their orchestral presentation and in the general texture of the music. Motives as salient and gripping as those in the first five Symphonies are not to be met with. And from the expression of the first two to the conscious repression of the Sixth and Seventh is a long step. Fortunately, it is not for us to decide whether the earlier or the later Sibelius possesses the greater vitality. We can take our pleasure in both. Also, while on the subject of Sibelius, it is pertinent to suggest that the relatively neglected Third, Fourth and Sixth Symphonies are about due for a reappearance on Dr. Koussevitzky's programmes.

139

Water Colors at Symphony

By Dorothy Adlow

In the first balcony foyer of Symphony Hall there will be on view this week and next a generous selection of pictures by a young Boston water colorist, C. Crawford Livingston.

Aquarelle has been emphatically in the foreground this season, and the gallery trotter may be growing a bit restive in encountering repetitions of washes ably and stenographically swept upon white backgrounds. We have a well-rooted tradition, some excellent prototypes, and our water colorists today are enjoying their fling of the paint pot. After seeing dozens and dozens of water colors in the galleries, we yearn for certain qualities which bear up under repetition. Such characteristics are discerned in many of the pictures by Mr. Livingston at Symphony Hall.

He divides his attention between portraiture, landscapes and genre themes. The portraits aim for individual traits in the models and they do not hold to a single pose, or color scheme, or formula, as is so common in water color likenesses. We are thinking of the direct characterizations of "Chick Marston" and "Sir Cedric Hardwicke." In some there could be further condensation of details, with stress of the more salient.

Mr. Livingston finds pictorial material wherever he turns and that is an excellent faculty. He can paint winding streams and the hills of New Hampshire, or lumbermen in Waterville, Maine; but he can also move along Back Bay streets of Boston and discover a most engaging composition which includes the New England Conservatory, or the railroad station. The design of the Bach organ in the Germanic Museum proved a tantalizing subject, while he sought the same vertical motives while watching the roof tops of Back Bay apartment houses.

The painting is not uniform. Sometimes it is executed in an impetuous manner, with a slightly scrambled result; but at other times with impact and clarity which delight the eye. Many of the landscapes find him at his best in technical skill and articulation of feeling. And yet there are other engaging features which attract us to themes such as the dramatic "Hurricane" and "Deserted Mill."

Music Notes

At next week's pair of Boston Symphony subscription concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Eighth Symphony of Anton Bruckner and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel. Bruckner's symphony was last performed at these concerts in April, 1937, and Moussorgsky's score in 1934.

* * *

More Youth Concerts

A second series of three Youth Symphony Concerts will be given in Symphony Hall, with Wheeler Beckett again conducting 70 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As before, 3:30 o'clock on Wednesday afternoons has been chosen for the hour. The dates being Feb. 15, March 29 and April 12. The concerts are not open to the general public. Adults (with the exception of sustaining members of the Association) may attend only if accompanying young people, and those young people are to be of junior high and high school age.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Lowell Telegram Jan 29/39

Two numbers will constitute the fifteenth programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra in its longer series to be performed in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzzky will present the Eighth Symphony of Anton Bruckner in the first part of the programme. It will be followed by Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Bruckner's Symphony was last performed at these concerts in April, 1937, and Moussorgsky's score in 1934. The "Pictures at an Exhibition" will be played in the orchestration which Maurice Ravel made at the suggestion of Koussevitzky. There have been three other orchestrations: by Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi and Lucien Cailiet.

Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert Wednesday, February 1

Lowell Sun. Telegram - January 29/39

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in eighteenth century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, on February 1, and in Carnegie hall, New York, on February 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done.

"Daniel Jazz", the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contract to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it.

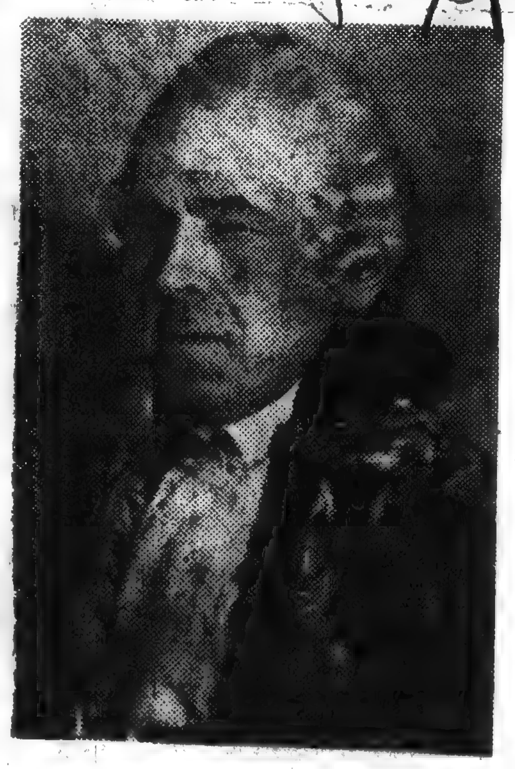
There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

The complete program is as follows:

Haydn....... Farewell Symphony
(performed in costume)
Gruenberg ....The Daniel Jazz
(after the poem by Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'More)
Prokofieff....Peter and the Wolf
(Narrator: Richard Hale)

THE WALTZ

Lanner ....Die Schonbrunner
Strauss ....Vienna Blood
Voices of Sprinf
Sibelius .... Valse Triste
Ravel .. .. La Valse



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1939

Gregor Piatigorsky Is Soloist with Symphony

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 14th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 7, Op. 105........Sibelius
'Cello Concerto No. 1 in A minor, Op. 33..................Saint-Saens
Schelomo (Solomon), Hebrew rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra...........Bloch
The Poem of Ecstasy, Op. 54......Scriabin

For the most part this was a concert of singularly voluptuous music. This was certainly true of the exotic and somewhat bloated tone poem of Scriabin, true to some extent of the quite differently exotic rhapsody of Bloch and not inappropriate to passages of the Saint-Saens concerto. Emphatically it was not applicable to Sibelius' remarkable symphony.

In the 7th Symphony, as has frequently been pointed out, Sibelius carried to the most successful extreme his method of creating a world of musical art out of shreds and wisps of melody to begin with and doing all this with extraordinary conciseness. The 7th Symphony is a work that grows on you. Its depths are imponderable; it expands in a miraculous fashion, like Japanese paper flowers in water. Dr. Koussevitzky has played it here enough, happily, so that its perfection and beauty may be recognized without strain. The performance, which brought Dr. Koussevitzky back to Symphony Hall after his winter vacation, was admirably achieved.

Mr. Piatigorsky is, of course, a 'cellist so expert technically that he can toss off a couple of pieces like these yesterday without apparent effort beyond the mannerism of rhythmic exertion. He was in capital form at this concert, and his playing in both the Saint-Saens and the Bloch was nothing short of marvellous. Sometimes the emotional violence of his temperament has in the past marred the performance of a work that stood in no need of too much stimulation. But the Bloch Solomon is exactly suited to him, and the Concerto can stand a little "gingering up" to make it more effective.

It is not unjust to regard the Saint-Saens Concerto as music that distinctly dates, and the second movement is tiresomely sugary into the bargain. We concentrate, then, on the skill of the performer and get what pleasure we can out of virtuosity. There are alarmingly few really fine works for 'cello and orchestra, and Saint-Saens' is by no means the poorest. No one would dream of saying that it was great music or even, after the lapse of years, interesting. It is, plainly, a suitable vehicle whereby to hear an unusually expert musician display his art.

Bloch's Rhapsody does not date, however, though it must have been tempting when it was first played to predict such a fate for it. Its strength lies in the originality of its thought, in the naturalness of the composer's imagination when grappling with this essentially Jewish material. The result is magnificence without tawdriness and a lament that is not bathos. Mr. Piatigorsky was cordially received after both his appearances and especially so, to the credit of the audience, after the Bloch. There was also applause for the excellent orchestral playing under Dr. Koussevitzky.

Scriabin's music is not everybody's dish, with a reservation as far as his piano music is concerned. The orchestral works are to some listeners too repetitious and too overblown. Others find in them splendid emotional power. It is obviously a matter of personal opinion, on which everyone is competent to judge for himself. And at that we may leave it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Bruckner's 8th Symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," in Ravel's orchestration, will be heard.

Symphony Hall

THE BOSTON HERALD,

Crowded with

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1939

Members of Greater Boston Society

Many Debutantes in Audience At Regular Friday Symphony

Miss Katharine Ladd and Miss Nancy Blumer Arrive Together—Miss Nancy Meyer and Miss Rhoda Belknap Also Noted

By ALISON ARNOLD

As usual on Friday afternoons during the winter season, Boston society attended the Symphony concert. Luncheon is planned a bit earlier on Fridays and tea is at a slightly later hour in order not to interfere with this important red letter event, and no hostess would be so thoughtless as ever to think of entertaining at a time that would coincide with the Symphony. Even the youngsters are brought up with the thought that Friday afternoons are sacred to these concerts and occasionally, as a very special treat, they are permitted to attend. By the time they are debutantes they join their parents at Symphony Hall and allow nothing less than week-ends of skiing to keep them from being present.

Yesterday, there was quite a representation of debutantes in the audience. Miss Katharine Ladd and Miss Nancy Blumer, her green hat and coat trimmed with mink, arrived together, and Miss Nancy Meyer wore a mink coat. Miss Rhoda Belknap, in a gay frock of plaid wool and a jaunty Scotch cap, was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Robert E. Belknap, who wore a cape of silky black caracul with her black gown and carried a matching muff. Miss Hope Halsey was very pretty in a black wool frock that had a bodice of emerald green, and her tiny green pill-box hat was held to her blonde hair by a black mesh snood Stopping to greet her was her cousin, Miss Mary Fuller, a cluster of yellow orchids adorning her mink coat.

Chatting together in the lobby during the intermission were Mrs. Russell Burrage, who wore twin silver foxes with her smart black ensemble, and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Albert Cameron Burrage, Jr., who topped her plum-colored frock with a mink coat. Mrs. Francis P. Sears wore a fetching little hat trimmed with a green and violet ostrich plume with her long black caracul cape.

With Mrs. Allan Forbes, in black with a silver fox scarf, was her daughter, Miss Phyllis Forbes, in a good-looking beige tweed frock, and with Mrs. Augustus N. Rantoul, in wine red, was her daughter, Miss Charlotte Rantoul, who wore a slim black coat with her frock of dusty rose which exactly matched the bow on the chic little hat perched atop her upswept locks. Sitting just in front of them was Miss Josephine Murray, sub-debutante daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Murray.

Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears, who was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Roland Nickerson, was discussing with Mrs. William Dana Orcutt the marvelous playing of Gregor Piatigorsky, who was the guest artist yesterday. Also enthusing over the concert were Mrs. Theodore L. Eliot, in all-black, and Mrs. J. Brooks Fenno, Jr., who wore a mink coat. Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike's teal blue crepe frock had a finely pleated skirt and sleeves, and also in teal blue was Mrs. Robert Cushman.

With Mrs. Howard Turner was her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Jackson Turner (Mary Pentecost), in black brightened by the scarlet wings on her hat. Miss Jane Megrew's black frock was belted with red and her hat was trimmed with two small black ostrich tips. In gun metal gray were Miss Aimee Lamb and Miss Anne Peabody, and Miss Barbara Bremer's raspberry red suit had a Peter Pan collar of Persian lamb.

Arriving a bit late were Miss Mary Elizabeth Sears, in a leopard coat with which she carried a muff of the same fur, and Mrs. Harris J. Nelson in a gray astrakhan coat and turban. Still others we noted in the large audience were Mrs. Channing Cox, Mrs. Richard Sears, Miss Lucy Pope, Mr. Augustus P. Loring, Miss Dorothy West, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, Miss Joan Dick, Mrs. Frank H. Stewart, Mrs. Roswell Parish, Miss Amy Sacker, Mrs. John Scott, Mrs. Edwin D. Brooks, Miss Jeannie Robinson, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Mrs. Adolph Leeds, Mrs. George Talbot, Miss Elizabeth C. Leland, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Mrs. James J. Phelan and Mrs. Frederick Blodgett.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
JAN 21 1939

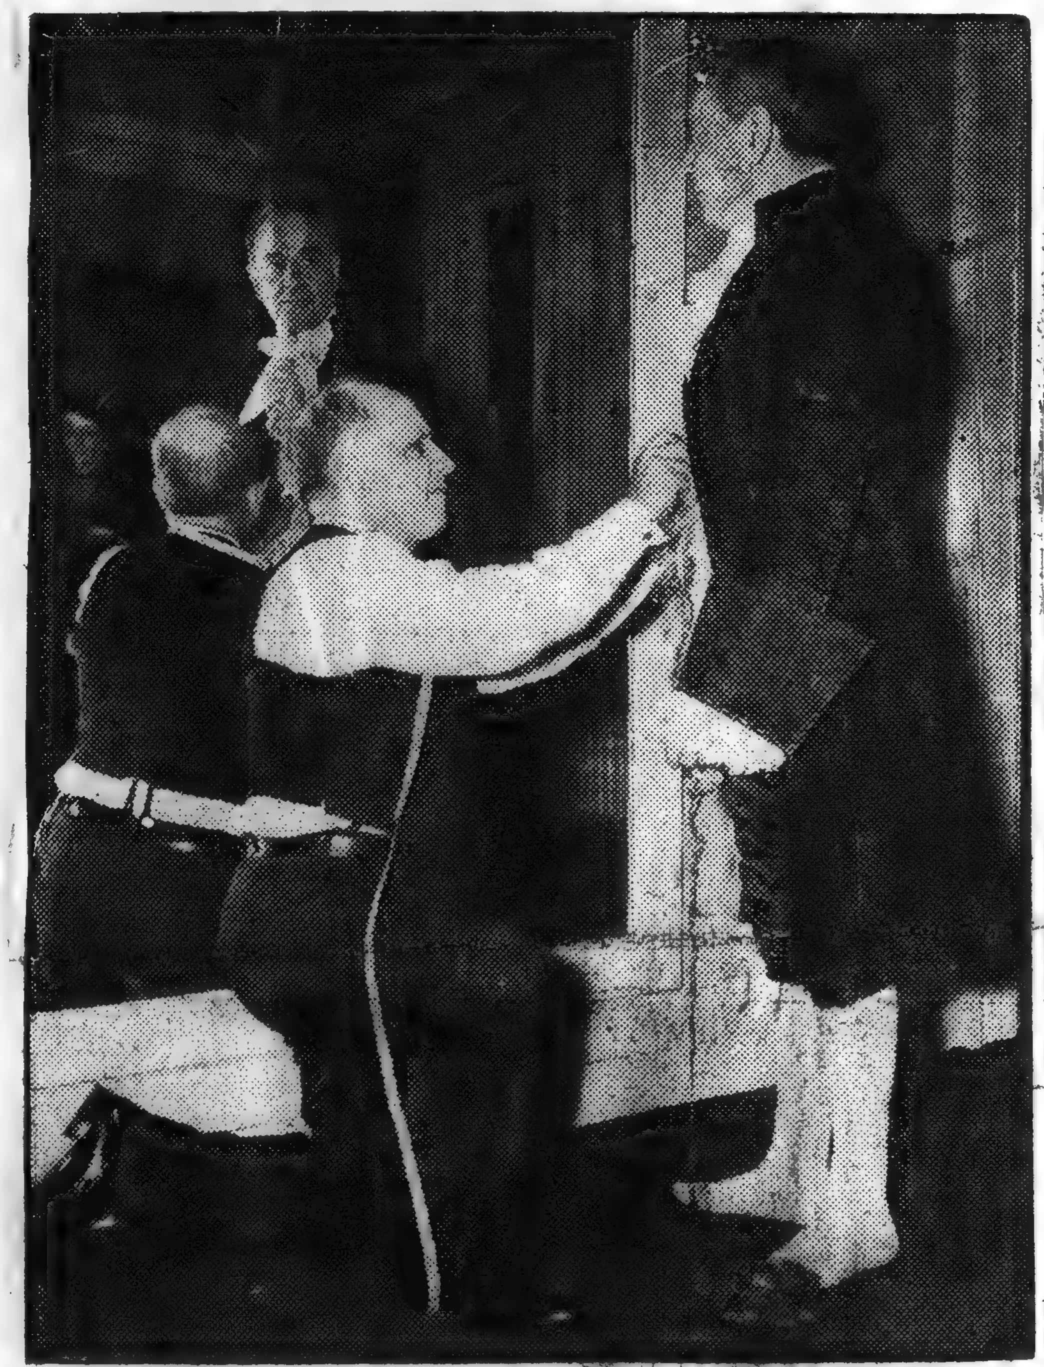
* * *

SCHEDULED for February 8 is a concert by the Boston Symphony which will be held in New York and will introduce its dignified conductor in costume! The unusual event is to take place at a concert for the benefit fund of the orchestra. The entire organization, led by Dr. Koussevitsky, will wear eighteenth century costumes while playing Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony.

Koussevitzky 'Out of Character'

N. Bedford Times - Jan. 29/39

Serge Koussevitzky, powdered and be-wigged, will impersonate the composer Haydn when he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts "extraordinaire" at Boston Feb. 1 and in New York Feb. 8. He is shown here getting a laugh from his outfit.



—Associated Press Photos

A tailor busily takes the measure of Koussevitzky for the 18th Century outfit he will wear at the Feb. 1 and 8 concerts to benefit the Boston Symphony's pension fund.

* * *

POWDERED WIGS FOR ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony to Don 18th Century Garb For Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th Century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience two hundred years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story o this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has his own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius' best known work, "Valse Triste."

PAGE SIXTEEN B. Her. Jan. 29/39 THE

Pension Fund Concert

(Photo by John B. Sahroma)

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the guise of Papa Haydn, whose "Farewell Symphony" will be a feature of the "Concert Extraordinaire," which will be given for the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 29, 1939. = N.Y. Times

NOTES HERE AND AFIELD

'Concert Extraordinaire' by the Boston Symphony, Playing Haydn in Costume

AT the "concert extraordinaire" to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Feb. 8, at Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of its Pension Fund, a most extraordinary feature will be the background and costumes provided for the Haydn "Farewell" symphony. Against a special stage set now being prepared, the members of the orchestra will be seen in eighteenth-century garb, with Dr. Koussevitzky at their head resplendent in a new costume of that period designed by Robert Edmond Jones after existing portraits of Haydn.

On the program also will figure Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

The second half of the schedule will be given over to waltzes of varied provenance. These comprise Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner"; Strauss's "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring"; Sibelius's "Valse Triste," and Ravel's "La Valse."

A CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

N.Y. Times

Dr. Koussevitzky in Unusual Musical Performance

Jan. 29/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ANOTHER number, Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," has been added to the programme of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund Concert which befalls Wednesday evening and to which Symphony Hall quaintly lends the name "Concert Extraordinaire." As in a previous performance here the voice part in this colorful setting of the poem of Vachel Lindsay will be sung by Colin O'More. And we have recently been assured that no less distinguished a hand than that of Robert Edmond Jones has designed the costume which Dr. Koussevitzky will wear in his impersonification of Josef Haydn, when the composer's "Farewell" Symphony is played in the dress of the period.

The rest of a concert, which will unite the various arts, will offer Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale returning as the Narrator, and a galaxy of waltzes, from Lanner ("Die Schoenbrunner"), Johann Strauss ("Wiener Blut" and "Freuhlingstimmen"), Sibelius ("Valse Triste") and Ravel ("La Valse").

Three performers recently heard by this reviewer, one in the concert hall and two over the air, have inspired him to protest again that (musically speaking) this town is suffering from the disease known as repertrophy or drying up of the repertoire. To have access to an incomparable orchestra and a first rate opera company and to hear, in a manner of speaking, only the same old pieces is a bit like owning a new Hispano-Suiza and merely driving it around the block.

The performances just referred to were those of Mahler's "Songs of a the con-

Chamber
the NBC
Berlioz's
r. Tosca-
"Simon
fternoon.
Mahler's
acteristic
he desire
s of that unknown

to Boston and another (the second) which has long been neglected. The surprising revelation of the charms and excitements of Berlioz's symphony, last heard here in 1919, suggested that the imaginative and prophetic work might occasionally serve as a substitute for the "Symphonie Fantastique," which Dr. Koussevitzky periodically removes from its case in the musical museum.

It could not fail to please even those for whom "Aida" is the climax of esthetic enjoyment. It is too late for "Simon Boccanegra" this year, but there are other seasons in the offing.

In fairness to Dr. Koussevitzky, it should be said that at Symphony Hall, if not at the Boston Opera House, we receive plenty of contemporary novelties, most of them, however, ephemeral. And adding to a pyramid at the top is quite different from extending it proportionately at the bottom. On the other hand, in his first years here Dr. Koussevitzky did make substantial additions to the regular repertory. To it he restored the Fourth, Seventh and Eighth Symphonies of Bruckner with particular emphasis on the latter two. (No. 8 will be heard at the concerts of this week.) But, as suggested in this place not long ago, there are other symphonies of Bruckner which have gone from 25 to 38 years without a Boston hearing, and No. 6, which no less a critic than Donald Tovey has praised highly, is as yet a stranger to us. Finally, lest these complainings be attributed to the satiety which naturally accompanies the office of critic, it may be said that similar repinings may easily be heard from the lips of many concert and opera-goers. Perhaps the worm is beginning to turn.

• • • •

Besides Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, the programmes of this week's regular Symphony concerts lists Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel.

On Thursday evening at Jordan Hall the Roth Quartet gives the fourth and last of the series of concerts sponsored by the Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy. Dr. Albert Sprague Coolidge will play the second viola part in a Quintet for Strings by Martinu. The rest of the programme will consist of Mozart's Quartet in A major (K. 464) and Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, Opus 132.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 29 1939

NOTES HERE AND AFIELD

'Concert Extraordinaire' by the Boston Symphony, Playing Haydn in Costume

AT the "concert extraordinaire" to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Feb. 8, at Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of its Pension Fund, a most extraordinary feature will be the background and costumes provided for the Haydn "Farewell" symphony. Against a special stage set now being prepared, the members of the orchestra will be seen in eighteenth-century garb, with Dr. Koussevitzky at their head resplendent in a new costume of that period designed by Robert Edmond Jones after existing portraits of Haydn.

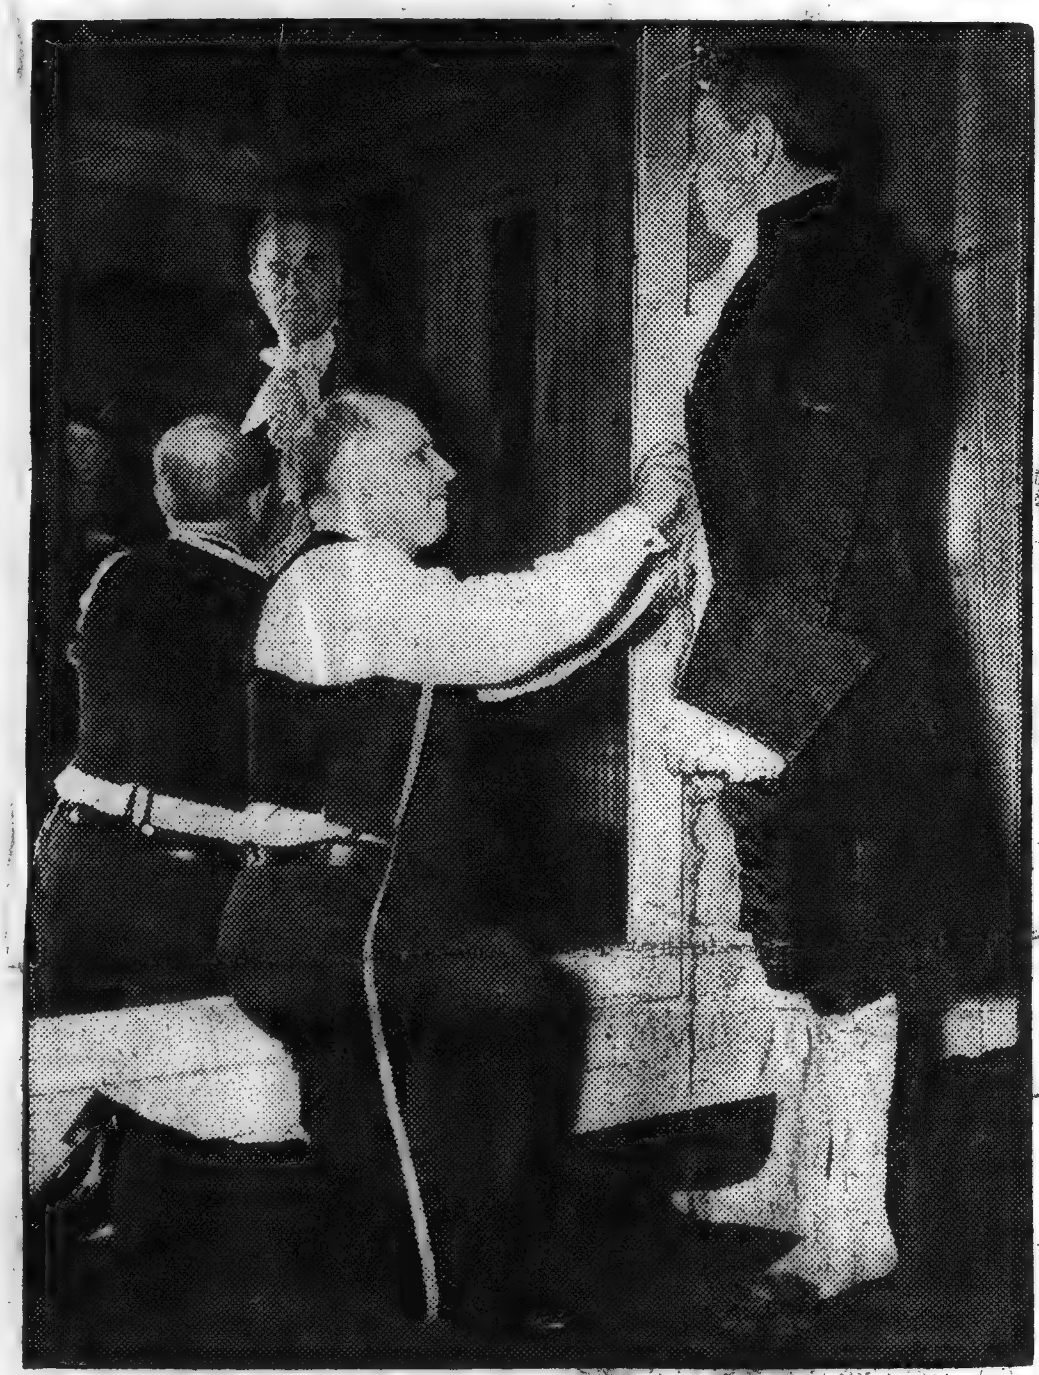
On the program also will figure Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

The second half of the schedule will be given over to waltzes of varied provenance. These comprise Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner"; Strauss's "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring"; Sibelius's "Valse Triste," and Ravel's "La Valse."

Koussevitzky 'Out of Character'

N. Bedford Times - Jan. 29/39

Serge Koussevitzky, powdered and be-wigged, will impersonate the composer Haydn when he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts "extraordinaire" at Boston Feb. 1 and in New York Feb. 8. He is shown here getting a laugh from his outfit.



—Associated Press Photos

A tailor busily takes the measure of Koussevitzky for the 18th Century outfit he will wear at the Feb. 1 and 8 concerts to benefit the Boston Symphony's pension fund.

* * *

POWDERED WIGS FOR ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony to Don 18th Century Garb For Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th Century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience two hundred years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story o this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has his own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius' best known work, "Valse Triste."

PAGE SIXTEEN B. Her. Jan. 29/39 THE

Pension Fund Concert

(Photo by John B. Sanroma)

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the guise of Papa Haydn, whose "Farewell Symphony" will be a feature of the "Concert Extraordinaire," which will be given for the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 29, 1939.= N.Y. Times

NOTES HERE AND AFIELD

'Concert Extraordinaire' by the Boston Symphony, Playing Haydn in Costume

AT the "concert extraordinaire" to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Feb. 8, at Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of its Pension Fund, a most extraordinary feature will be the background and costumes provided for the Haydn "Farewell" symphony. Against a special stage set now being prepared, the members of the orchestra will be seen in eighteenth-century garb, with Dr. Koussevitzky at their head resplendent in a new costume of that period designed by Robert Edmond Jones after existing portraits of Haydn.

On the program also will figure Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

The second half of the schedule will be given over to waltzes of varied provenance. These comprise Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner"; Strauss's "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring"; Sibelius's "Valse Triste," and Ravel's "La Valse."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 29 1939

E TIME

[redacted]

AT the "concert extraordinaire" to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Feb. 8, at Carnegie Hall, [illegible] the benefit of its Pension Fund, a mo[illegible]traordinary feature will be the background and costumes provided for the Haydn "Farewell" symphony. Against a special stage set now being prepared, the members of the orchestra will be seen in eighteenth-century garb, with Dr. Koussevitzky at their head resplendent in a new costume of that period designed by Robert Edmond Jones after existing portraits of Haydn.

On the program also will figure Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

The second half of the schedule will be given over to waltzes of varied provenance. These comprise Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner"; Strauss's "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring"; Sibelius's "Valse Triste," and Ravel's "La Valse."

A CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

N.Y. Times

Dr. Koussevitzky in Unusual Musical Performance

Jan. 29/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ANOTHER number, Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," has been added to the programme of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund Concert which befalls Wednesday evening and to which Symphony Hall quaintly lends the name "Concert Extraordinaire." As in a previous performance here the voice part in this colorful setting of the poem of Vachel Lindsay will be sung by Colin O'More. And we have recently been assured that no less distinguished a hand than that of Robert Edmond Jones has designed the costume which Dr. Koussevitzky will wear in his impersonification of Josef Haydn, when the composer's "Farewell" Symphony is played in the dress of the period.

The rest of a concert, which will unite the various arts, will offer Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale returning as the Narrator, and a galaxy of waltzes, from Lanner ("Die Schoenbrunner"), Johann Strauss ("Wiener Blut" and "Freuhlingstimmen"), Sibelius ("Valse Triste") and Ravel ("La Valse").

Three performers recently heard by this reviewer, one in the concert hall and two over the air, have inspired him to protest again that (musically speaking) this town is suffering from the disease known as repertrophy or drying up of the repertoire. To have access to an incomparable orchestra and a first rate opera company and to hear, in a manner of speaking, only the same old pieces is a bit like owning a new Hispano-Suiza and merely driving it around the block.

The performances just referred to were those of Mahler's "Songs of a Travelling Journeyman," at the concert of Bernard Zighera's Chamber Orchestra at Jordan Hall; the NBC Orchestra's performance of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," under Mr. Toscanini, and the Metropolitan's "Simon Boccanegra" of the other afternoon. The sensational success of Mahler's youthful, yet fully characteristic work, once more prompted the desire to hear the five symphonies of that master which are absolutely unknown to Boston and another (the second) which has long been neglected. The surprising revelation of the charms and excitements of Berlioz's symphony, last heard here in 1919, suggested that the imaginative and prophetic work might occasionally serve as a substitute for the "Symphonie Fantastique," which Dr. Koussevitzky periodically removes from its case in the musical museum.

It could not fail to please even those for whom "Aida" is the climax of esthetic enjoyment. It is too late for "Simon Boccanegra" this year, but there are other seasons in the offing.

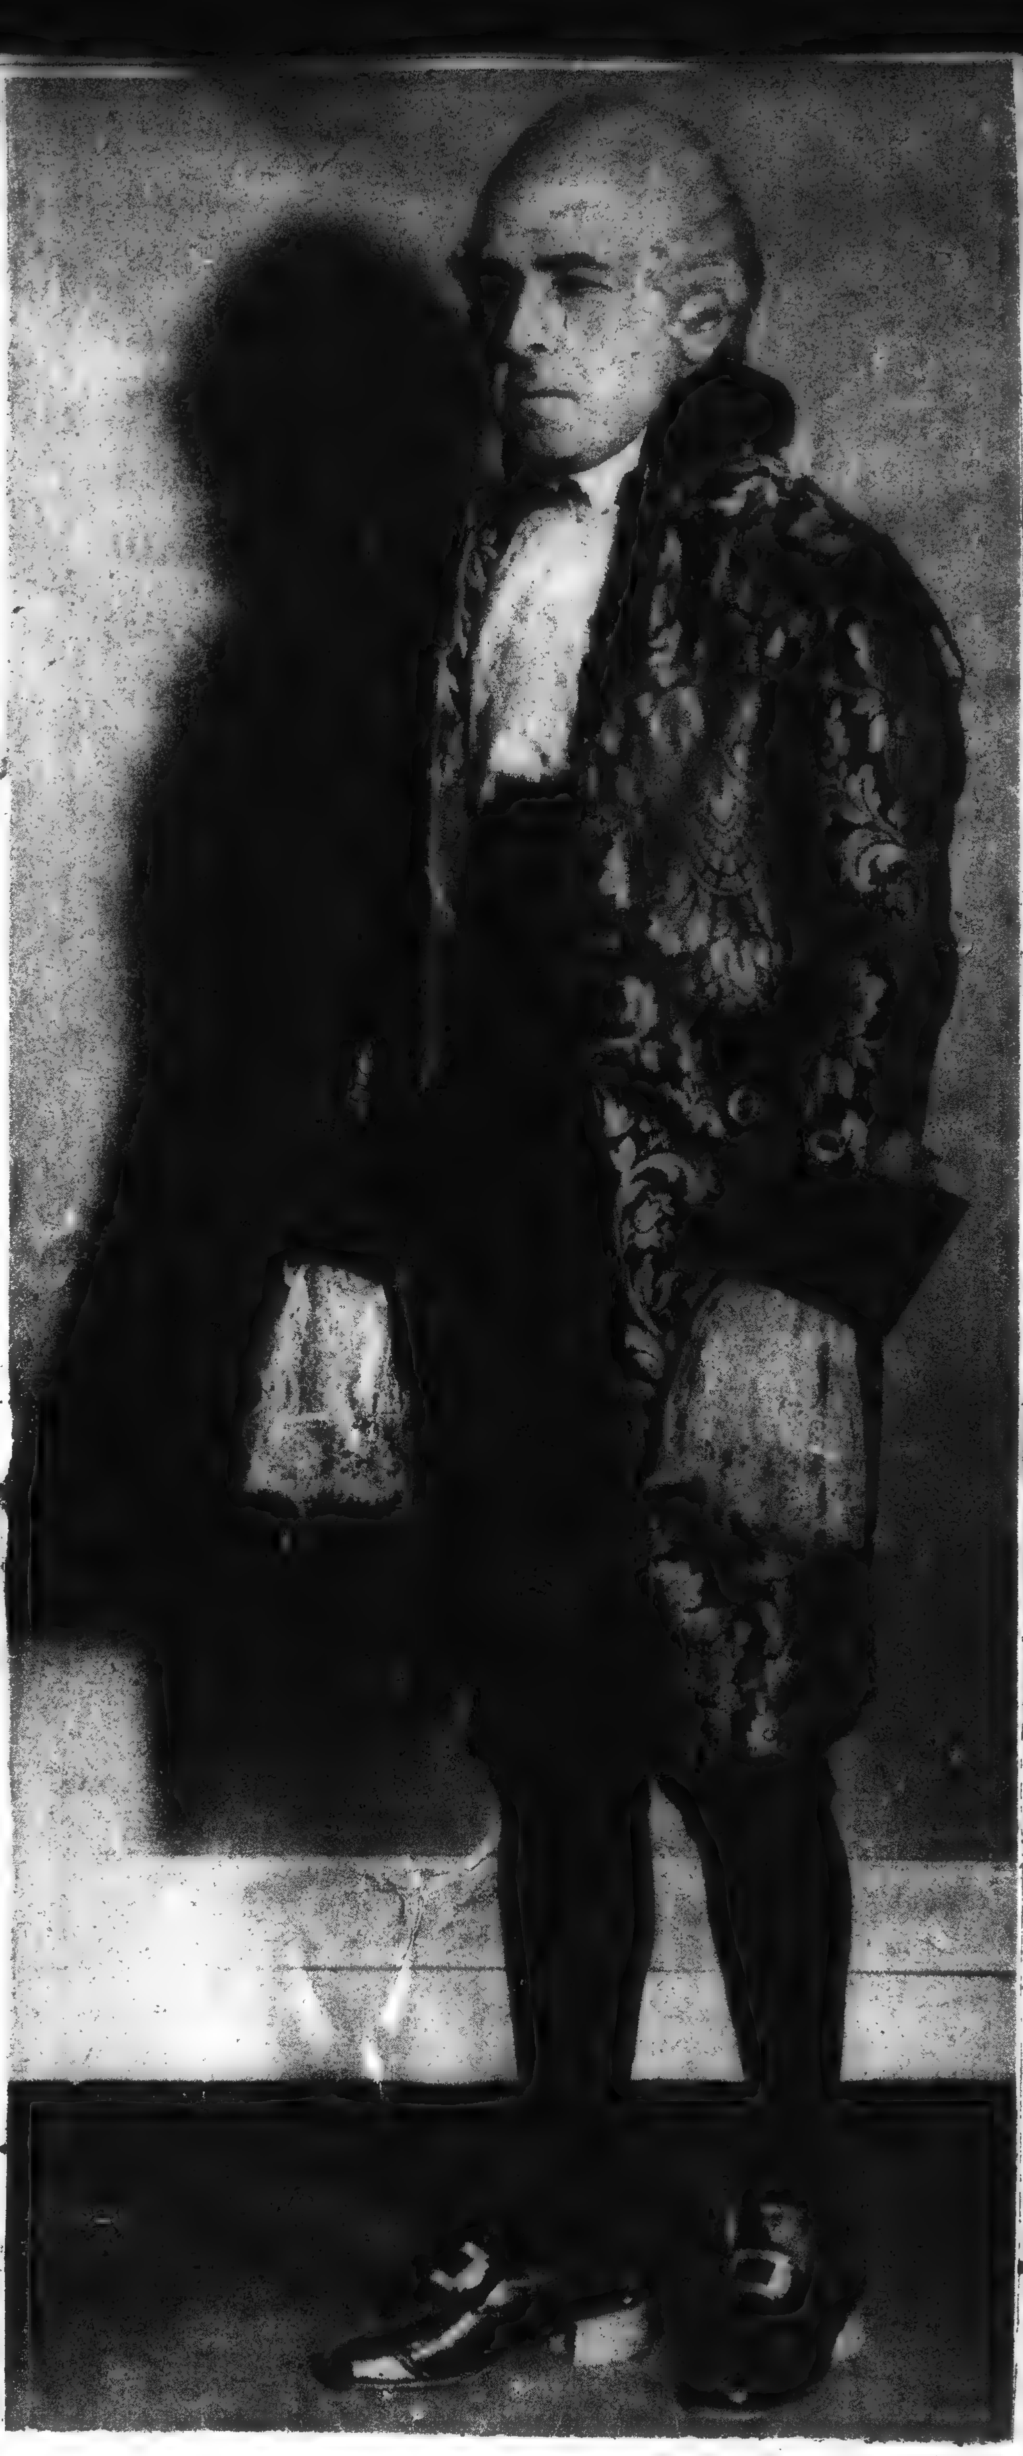
In fairness to Dr. Koussevitzky, it should be said that at Symphony Hall, if not at the Boston Opera House, we receive plenty of contemporary novelties, most of them, however, ephemeral. And adding to a pyramid at the top is quite different from extending it proportionately at the bottom. On the other hand, in his first years here Dr. Koussevitzky did make substantial additions to the regular repertory. To it he restored the Fourth, Seventh and Eighth Symphonies of Bruckner with particular emphasis on the latter two. (No. 8 will be heard at the concerts of this week.) But, as suggested in this place not long ago, there are other symphonies of Bruckner which have gone from 25 to 38 years without a Boston hearing, and No. 6, which no less a critic than Donald Tovey has praised highly, is as yet a stranger to us. Finally, lest these complainings be attributed to the satiety which naturally accompanies the office of critic, it may be said that similar repinings may easily be heard from the lips of many concert and opera-goers. Perhaps the worm is beginning to turn.

• • • •

Besides Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, the programmes of this week's regular Symphony concerts lists Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel.

On Thursday evening at Jordan Hall the Roth Quartet gives the fourth and last of the series of concerts sponsored by the Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy. Dr. Albert Sprague Coolidge will play the second viola part in a Quintet for Strings by Martinu. The rest of the programme will consist of Mozart's Quartet in A major (K. 464) and Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, Opus 132.

136



HAYDN IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky as he will appear in the guise of Joseph Haydn, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra—its members also in 18th century costume—in Haydn's "Farewell Symphony." The performance will be on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, as a "Concert Extraordinaire" for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

Feb 2/39

Koussevitzky In Gay Mood

By RUTH MARSTERS
Music Editor

White wigs shimmering in candlelight, lace ruffles cuffing hands about to devote themselves to Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky (alias Haydn) ready at the spinet—such the scene presented last evening in Symphony Hall when the curtains parted for the opening of the "Concert Extraordinaire."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra hasn't been so frolicksome in years and years—ever since the "Farewell" Symphony was performed for the benefit of the Pension Fund that other time when Dr. Koussevitzky joined the double bass section, and that was a long time ago.

Last evening Haydn, the prankster, was again most effectively exhumed when each instrumentalist as his part was completed blew out the candle lighting his music stand and sauntered out. As was inevitable, it remained in the end for the conductor to blow out his candle and depart likewise.

Eighteenth century comedy completed, the curtains parted for the second time to allow a sliding stage to come forward carrying a band wearing red carnations in white Eton jackets, the music stands bearing in this instance satin shields inscribed with a glittering B. S. O.

The backdrop, designed and painted by John Holabird, most skillfully depicted the legend set forth by Gruenberg in "The Daniel Jazz," a musical setting of Vachel Lindsay's poem. (It goes, "Then he showed them Daniel in a cage, Daniel standing still, the lions in a rage.")

Richard Burgin conducted, and the orchestra responded in a manner which proved everybody concerned the reverse of being averse to the performance of jazz while Colin O'More recounted the tale in a manner which makes him our favorite comedian of the year.

There followed Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," Nathan Hale doing a customarily good job as narrator.

Dr. Koussevitzky reappeared after the intermission (in plain clothes) to conduct a sequence of waltzes from Lanner's "Die Schonbrunner" waltzes through Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruhlingstimmen" waltzes, Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and finally Ravel's "La Valse."

This he did with esprit, and everyone was delighted.

Her. Feb 2/39

MUSIC

PENSION FUND CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a concert last night in Symphony hall for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Colin O'More, tenor, was a soloist; and Richard Hale, narrator, assisted. The program was as follows:

Haydn—"Farewell" Symphony No. 45.
Gruenberg—"The Daniel Jazz" from a poem of Vachel Lindsay.
Prokofieff—"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale.
Lanner—'Die Schoenbrunner," Waltzes.
J. Strauss—"Wiener Blu," Waltzes; "Fruehlingstimmen," Waltzes.
Sibelius—Valse Trieste.
Ravel—"La Valse," Choreographic Poem.

In the interests of its Pension Fund the Boston Symphony performed some unheard-of high jinks last night. Not only was 18th century dress, complete with bag wig, de rigeur for the Haydn Symphony, but also Gruenberg's "Daniel Jaz" was played on a movable platform in mess jackets and carnations by Richard Burgin and his merry men. There was also a mildly surrealist backdrop and, for the Haydn, more credits in the program than would serve a high school performance of "The Merchant of Venice." Like all good times, this one may have been more enjoyable in anticipation than in the actual event; but there could be no denying the spirit and good will that went into all the varied proceedings.

The 18th century atmosphere was most agreeably contrived, and Haydn was no less and no more Haydn because of it. It made a charming picture that did not err in the matter of taste. Dr. Koussevitzky was a much more authentic figure than he was when he appeared in this garb some years ago; and the orchestra has certainly not deteriorated in the meanwhile! The Gruenberg dates a bit, since we have met with and endured far stranger horrors of jazz since its period. Mr. O'More sang with a will, even if the effect was not as amusing as it was obviously intended to be.

The most interesting part of this concert was to observe what Dr. Koussevitzky did with "Peter and the Wolf." It was a much sprucer performance than that which Prokofieff, himself, conducted last year. The tempo was quicker, there were no drags, and the whole piece was enormously improved by being coordinated in this alert fashion. It was also apparent that Dr. Koussevitzky had had something to do with simplifying Mr. Richard Hale's narration of the story. At least that is a fair assumption, for great slices of affectation have been carved off of this aspect of the performance. A certain irreverent joy has gone from our appreciation of Prokofieff's delightful work, as of the time we first heard it; but undoubtedly the work itself is the gainer.

The "waltz," from the rather humdrum Lanner to the subtle and complex Ravel, engrossed the attention of the audience from this point forward. It may have been an embarrassment of riches, but the voice of Johann Strauss through a full symphony orchestra for once failed to allure us. Some more casual hearing, a beer garden, say, evokes without a thought the charm of these waltzes. Somehow the virtuoso orchestra steamrollers them. After the orchestration of the Prokofieff, and with the knowledge of the Ravel to come, they sounded prosy. And surely they are not that.

We shall venture to say that there were as many opinions of this concert as there were pairs of ears to listen, for there was nothing on the program that could bewilder or confuse anybody. There may have been those who suffered the Prokofieff for the sake of the waltzes. At least they had their reward. For us the high point of this ingenious concert came with "Peter and the Wolf," whence the spirit departed only to discover that it could not postpone a newspaper deadline to wait for re-awakening with the Ravel!

All Ages Represented as Society Turns Out for Symphony Benefit

B. Her. Feb 2/39

When the red curtains parted on the stage of Symphony hall last evening to reveal Dr. Serge Koussevitzky costumed as the composer, Haydn, powdered wig, knee breeches, lace frills and all, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra clad likewise, it seemed as if time were turned back about two centuries while Haydn himself conducted his "Farewell" Symphony seated in a lyre-back chair at a quaint spinet in the light of a glittering chandelier and flickering candles. As a complete contrast, "The Daniel Jazz" by Gruenberg followed, conducted by Richard Burgin against a lurid background picturing Daniel in the lion's den, with Colin O'More singing the tenor solo. Then, to add still further variety came the delightful orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, followed by a group of waltzes by Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel. If variety is the spice of life, that was it! And the occasion of all this was the 83d concert in aid of the orchestra's Pension Fund.

Society turned out in its best bib and tucker for this affair, and all ages were represented. With Mrs. William C. Cox, who wore a gown of magenta chiffon, was her small daughter, Jane, in a brown velvet princess frock, listening intently to the fairy tale as interpreted by Richard Hale. Another wide-eyed youngster who was allowed to attend with her mother, Mrs. James B. Patterson, as a very special treat was Margherita Patterson, very dressed up in shell pink crepe with which she wore white socks and patent leather slippers.

Among the debutantes we noted Miss Diana Bird, in becoming royal purple crepe, who was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., her black gown topped by a crimson jacket. Another debutante present was Miss Nancy Burrage, in a simple frock of black velvet, and still another was Miss Mary West. Miss Betty Albers, who looked enchantingly pretty in a black velvet frock with a bodice of palest pink and silver lame belted with silver, was escorted by her fiance, Mr. John Sabine.

Listening from balcony seats, the favorite of many Symphony-goers, were Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr. Sitting in the very front row was Mrs. Jaffray de Hauteville Bell, wearing her sparkling tiara and a gown fashioned from a blue and white fringed shawl. Nearby were Mrs. Henry Tudor and Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and her daughter, Miss Jane Bancroft.

Mrs. Whitney Hale, her hair swept high and a white bolero glittering with sequins contrasting with her black frock, was thoroughly enjoying the waltzes, and we heard one older member of the audience say to another, "That's REAL swing, Benny Goodman notwithstanding!" With Mr. Bartlett Harwood was Mrs. Harwood, bands of black jet paillettes glistening on her black gown.

Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., topped her filmy black frock with a mink coat, and Miss Ellen Bottomley's wrap was fashioned of ruby velvet that was a perfect foil for her dark coloring. Mrs. Chatfield Whitman wore a gold link necklace with her black gown and garnet red bolero, and Miss Anne Peabody wore a white angora bolero with her frock of sapphire velvet.

With Mrs. William B. Long, in a long-sleeved frock of silver lame, was her daughter, Miss Polly Long, in sheer net of palest blue. Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Roland Nickerson, and another mother and daughter attending together were Mrs. Alexander Steinert and Mrs. Samuel J. Newman. Still others we glimpsed in the throng were Mr. and Mrs. Sargent Collier, Mrs. Wallace McI. Scudder, Jr., Mrs. Frank Sawtell, Miss Barbara Bremer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus and Miss Gertrude Sands.

136

HAYDN IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky as he will appear in the guise of Joseph Haydn, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra—its members also in 18th century costume—in Haydn's "Farewell Symphony." The performance will be on Wednesday evening, Feb. 1, as a "Concert Extraordinaire" for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

Page 24—BOSTON EVENING AMERICAN

1-Feb 2/39

Koussevitzky In Gay Mood

By RUTH MARSTERS
Music Editor

White wigs shimmering in candlelight, lace ruffles cuffing hands about to devote themselves to Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky (alias Haydn) ready at the spinet—such the scene presented last evening in Symphony Hall when the curtains parted for the opening of the "Concert Extraordinaire."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra hasn't been so frolicksome in years and years—ever since the "Farewell" Symphony was performed for the benefit of the Pension Fund that other time when Dr. Koussevitzky joined the double bass section, and that was a long time ago.

Last evening Haydn, the prankster, was again most effectively exhumed when each instrumentalist as his part was completed blew out the candle lighting his music stand and sauntered out. As was inevitable, it remained in the end for the conductor to blow out his candle and depart likewise.

Eighteenth century comedy completed, the curtains parted for the second time to allow a sliding stage to come forward carrying a band wearing red carnations in white Eton jackets, the music stands bearing in this instance satin shields inscribed with a glittering B. S. O.

The backdrop, designed and painted by John Holabird, most skillfully depicted the legend set forth by Gruenberg in "The Daniel Jazz," a musical setting of Vachel Lindsay's poem. (It goes, "Then he showed them Daniel in a cage, Daniel standing still, the lions in a rage.")

Richard Burgin conducted, and the orchestra responded in a manner which proved everybody concerned the reverse of being averse to the performance of jazz while Colin O'More recounted the tale in a manner which makes him our favorite comedian of the year.

There followed Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," Nathan Hale doing a customarily good job as narrator.

Dr. Koussevitzky reappeared after the intermission (in plain clothes) to conduct a sequence of waltzes from Lanner's "Die Schonbrunner" waltzes through Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruhlingstimmen" waltzes, Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and finally Ravel's "La Valse."

This he did with esprit, and everyone was delighted.

Her. Feb. 2/39

MUSIC

PENSION FUND CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a concert last night in Symphony hall for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Colin O'More, tenor, was a soloist; and Richard Hale, narrator, assisted. The program was as follows:

Haydn—"Farewell" Symphony No. 45.
Gruenberg—"The Daniel Jazz" from a poem of Vachel Lindsay.
Prokofieff—"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale.
Lanner—'Die Schoenbrunner," Waltzes.
J. Strauss—"Wiener Blu," Waltzes; "Fruehlingstimmen," Waltzes.
Sibelius—Valse Trieste.
Ravel—"La Valse," Choreographic Poem.

In the interests of its Pension Fund the Boston Symphony performed some unheard-of high jinks last night. Not only was 18th century dress, complete with bag wig, de rigeur for the Haydn Symphony, but also Gruenberg's "Daniel Jaz" was played on a movable platform in mess jackets and carnations by Richard Burgin and his merry men. There was also a mildly surrealist backdrop and, for the Haydn, more credits in the program than would serve a high school performance of "The Merchant of Venice." Like all good times, this one may have been more enjoyable in anticipation than in the actual event; but there could be no denying the spirit and good will that went into all the varied proceedings.

The 18th century atmosphere was most agreeably contrived, and Haydn was no less and no more Haydn because of it. It made a charming picture that did not err in the matter of taste. Dr. Koussevitzky was a much more authentic figure than he was when he appeared in this garb some years ago; and the orchestra has certainly not deteriorated in the meanwhile! The Gruenberg dates a bit, since we have met with and endured far stranger horrors of jazz since its period. Mr. O'More sang with a will, even if the effect was not as amusing as it was obviously intended to be.

The most interesting part of this concert was to observe what Dr. Koussevitzky did with "Peter and the Wolf." It was a much sprucer performance than that which Prokofieff, himself, conducted last year. The tempo was quicker, there were no drags, and the whole piece was enormously improved by being coordinated in this alert fashion. It was also apparent that Dr. Koussevitzky had had something to do with simplifying Mr. Richard Hale's narration of the story. At least that is a fair assumption, for great slices of affectation have been carved off of this aspect of the performance. A certain irreverent joy has gone from our appreciation of Prokofieff's delightful work, as of the time we first heard it; but undoubtedly the work itself is the gainer.

The "waltz," from the rather humdrum Lanner to the subtle and complex Ravel, engrossed the attention of the audience from this point forward. It may have been an embarrassment of riches, but the voice of Johann Strauss through a full symphony orchestra for once failed to allure us. Some more casual hearing, a beer garden, say, evokes without a thought the charm of these waltzes. Somehow the virtuoso orchestra steamrollers them. After the orchestration of the Prokofieff, and with the knowledge of the Ravel to come, they sounded prosy. And surely they are not that.

We shall venture to say that there were as many opinions of this concert as there were pairs of ears to listen, for there was nothing on the program that could bewilder or confuse anybody. There may have been those who suffered the Prokofieff for the sake of the waltzes. At least they had their reward. For us the high point of this ingenious concert came with "Peter and the Wolf." whence the spirit departed only to discover that it could not postpone a newspaper deadline to wait for re-awakening with the Ravel!

All Ages Represented as Society Turns Out for Symphony Benefit

B. Her. Feb. 2/39

When the red curtains parted on the stage of Symphony hall last evening to reveal Dr. Serge Koussevitzky costumed as the composer, Haydn, powdered wig, knee breeches, lace frills and all, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra clad likewise, it seemed as if time were turned back about two centuries while Haydn himself conducted his "Farewell" Symphony seated in a lyre-back chair at a quaint spinet in the light of a glittering chandelier and flickering candles. As a complete contrast, "The Daniel Jazz" by Gruenberg followed, conducted by Richard Burgin against a lurid background picturing Daniel in the lion's den, with Colin O'More singing the tenor solo. Then, to add still further variety, came the delightful orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, followed by a group of waltzes by Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel. If variety is the spice of life, that was it! And the occasion of all this was the 83d concert in aid of the orchestra's Pension Fund.

Society turned out in its best bib and tucker for this affair, and all ages were represented. With Mrs. William C. Cox, who wore a gown of magenta chiffon, was her small daughter, Jane, in a brown velvet princess frock, listening intently to the fairy tale as interpreted by Richard Hale. Another wide-eyed youngster who was allowed to attend with her mother, Mrs. James B. Patterson, as a very special treat was Margherita Patterson, very dressed up in shell pink crepe with which she wore white socks and patent leather slippers.

Among the debutantes we noted Miss Diana Bird, in becoming royal purple crepe, who was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., her black gown topped by a crimson jacket. Another debutante present was Miss Nancy Burrage, in a simple frock of black velvet, and still another was Miss Mary West. Miss Betty Albers, who looked enchantingly pretty in a black velvet frock with a bodice of palest pink and silver lame belted with silver, was escorted by her fiance, Mr. John Sabine.

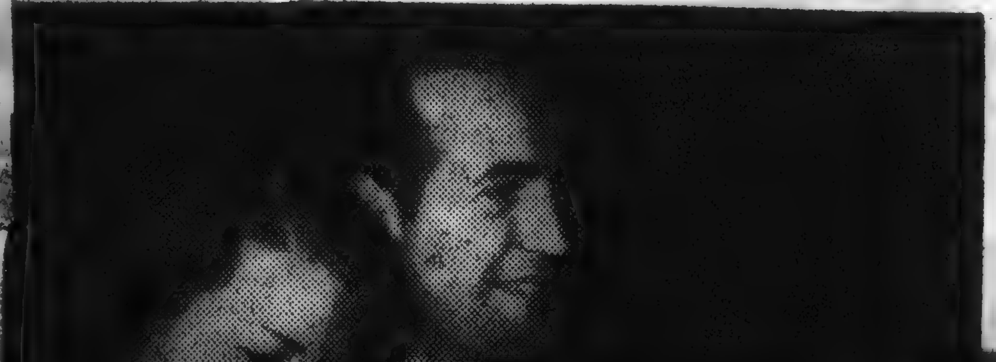
Listening from balcony seats, the favorite of many Symphony-goers, were Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr. Sitting in the very front row was Mrs. Jaffray de Hauteville Bell, wearing her sparkling tiara and a gown fashioned from a blue and white fringed shawl. Nearby were Mrs. Henry Tudor and Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and her daughter, Miss Jane Bancroft.

Mrs. Whitney Hale, her hair swept high and a white bolero glittering with sequins contrasting with her black frock, was thoroughly enjoying the waltzes, and we heard one older member of the audience say to another, "That's REAL swing, Benny Goodman notwithstanding!" With Mr. Bartlett Harwood was Mrs. Harwood, bands of black jet paillettes glistening on her black gown.

Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., topped her filmy black frock with a mink coat, and Miss Ellen Bottomley's wrap was fashioned of ruby velvet that was a perfect foil for her dark coloring. Mrs. Chatfield Whitman wore a gold link necklace with her black gown and garnet red bolero, and Miss Anne Peabody wore a white angora bolero with her frock of sapphire velvet.

With Mrs. William B. Long, in a long-sleeved frock of silver lame, was her daughter, Miss Polly Long, in sheer net of palest blue. Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Roland Nickerson, and another mother and daughter attending together were Mrs. Alexander Steinert and Mrs. Samuel J. Newman. Still others we glimpsed in the throng were Mr. and Mrs. Sargent Collier, Mrs. Wallace McI. Scudder, Jr., Mrs. Frank Sawtell, Miss Barbara Bremer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus and Miss Gertrude Sands.

WATERBURY REPUBLICAN'S
PICTURE NEWS



KING'S ENGLISH is being mastered by Russian-born Mrs. Bryan Grover (above), now a student in a London night school. Mrs. Grover recently came from Russia after English engineer-husband had braved Soviet wrath to rejoin her.

BOOK LEARNIN' for congressmen has its own special arrangement in Washington, D. C., where a tunnel such as this in which H. S. Lincoln of the congressional library stands, speeds books and papers to the offices of waiting legislators. A carrier takes the books along a trolley rail in this tunnel, which is one-fourth of a mile long and 40 feet underground.

learns some of his own friends are thus trying to bring pressure on him.

Papa certainly won't like it.

CAN NEVER NG THOSE
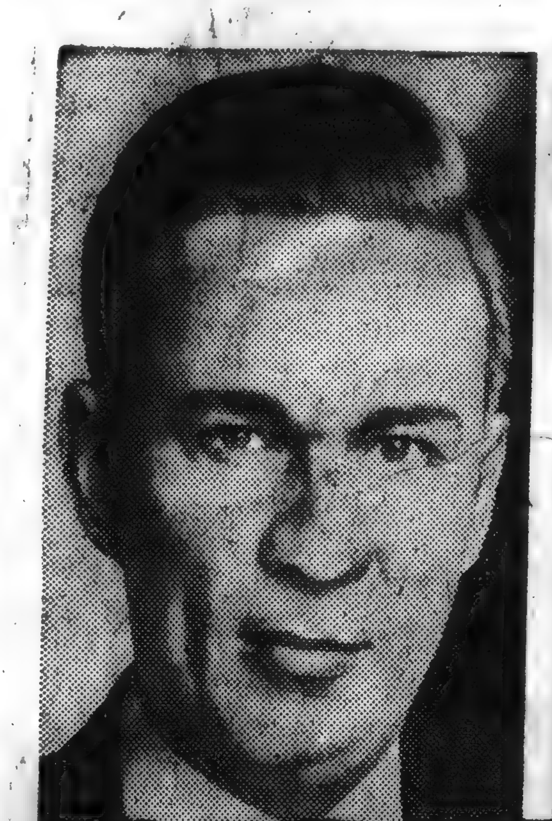
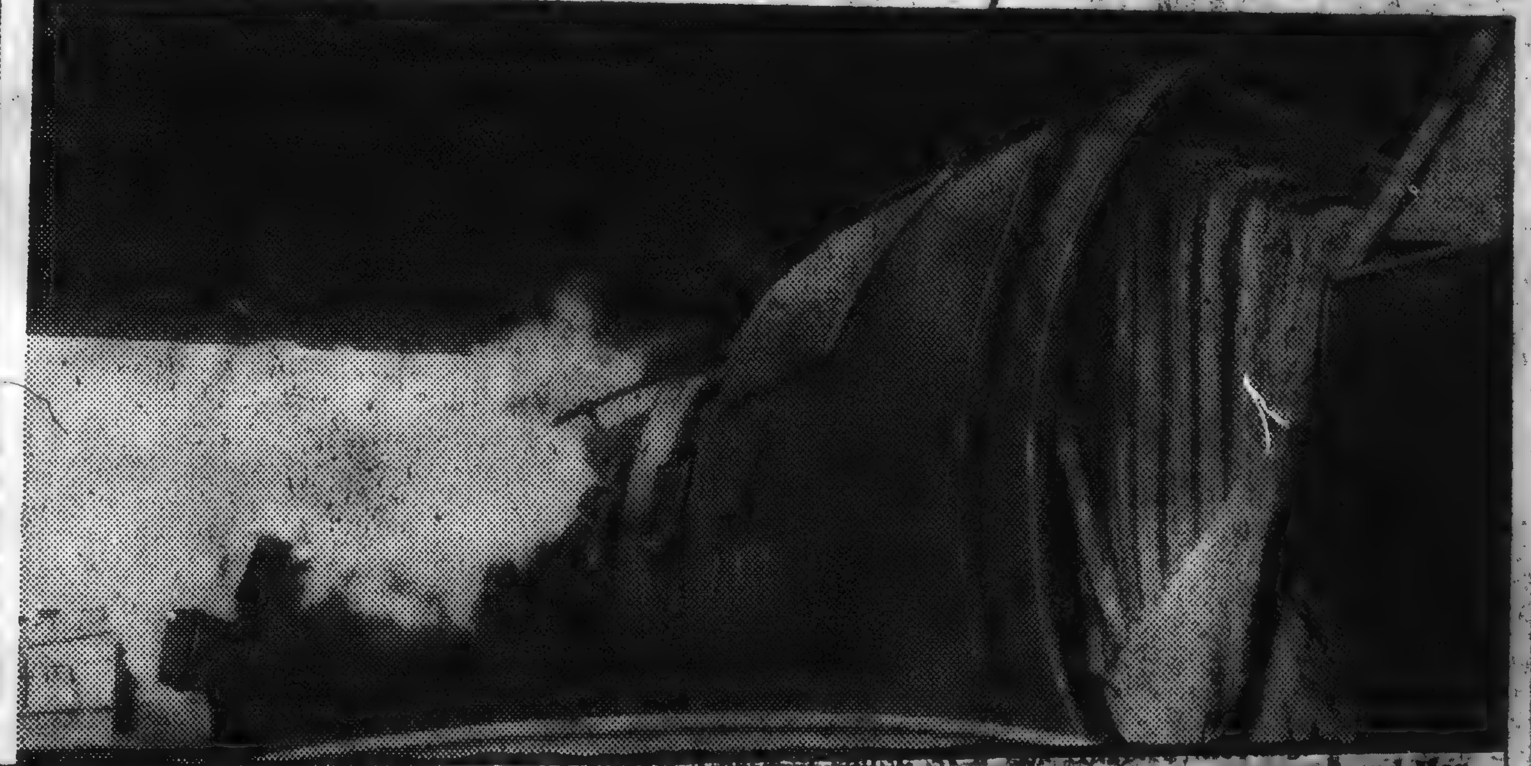
D SIGNS TO

BRITONS SAY that this is Premier Neville Chamberlain's "smile of satisfaction"—presumably over his peace plans.



march toward their planes for a cross-country flight, wearing the parachutes that serve as cushions during flights. Most cadets are college graduates from 20 to 27 years old. Sixty-four instructors conduct the training period which is in three 4-month stages.



described the group as a defender of "true democracy," and Herman Schwinn (left), Pacific coast bund leader, charged a "bunch of aliens in Hollywood" with persecuting the bund in Los Angeles.

HANDS ACROSS THE BORDER were clasped by Gov. Robert T. Jones (left) of Arizona and Gov. Roman Yocupicio of Sonora, Mexico, shown at international border at Nogales, Ariz., and Nogales, Sonora. They exchanged expressions of good will and discussed plans for a highway as well as the 400th observance of the first trip into Arizona by a white man.

WITH A HEIGH-DI HAYDN, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the Composer Haydn manner, preparatory to a concert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky will impersonate Haydn—to whom he is said to bear a resemblance—and orchestra members will appear in 18th century finery.

Berkshire Festival Plans Announced

Conservative programs will again mark the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is indicated by the preliminary announcement of the 1939 season. Six concerts will be given in the "shed" at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, the first series on Aug. 3, 5, and 6, the second on Aug. 10, 12, and 13.

Dr. Koussevitsky will make the programs from the following list of works: the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tchaikovsky, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's Concerto for Orchestra, and others to be announced.

The Festival trustees will prepare for next summer's concerts to making need improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads; and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

While directing their immediate attention to the program for 1939 they have not forgotten the objective of a musical center for 1940. The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are giving thought to the development of the physical plant at Tanglewood in anticipation of the next step in expansion.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2,000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., at Stockbridge, Mass.

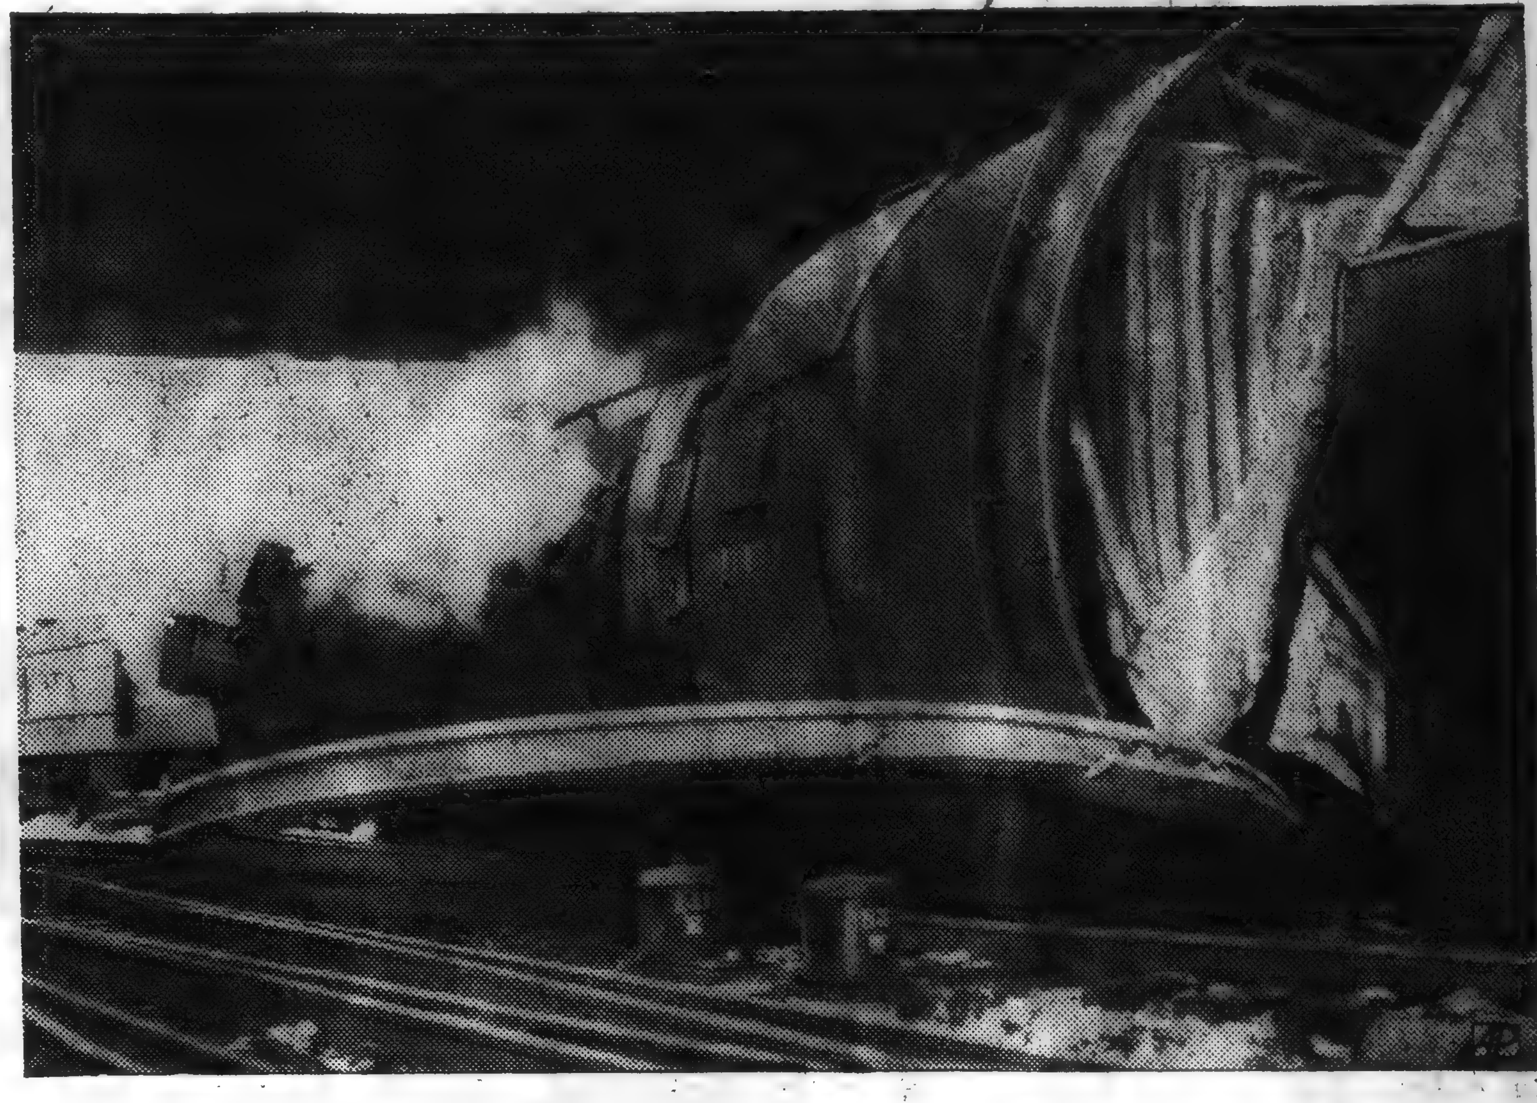
13

WATERBURY REPUBLICAN'S PICTURE NEWS

PEANUTS—POPCORN! Horace Lurd, Argentine sportsman, and Patricia Wilder, movie actress, had a circus in their own way, stringing peanuts at a Hollywood night club. Lurd is known among racing circles for his introduction of well known Argentine horses to American race tracks. One of these is "Ligaroti," owned by Bing Crosby and Lin Howard.

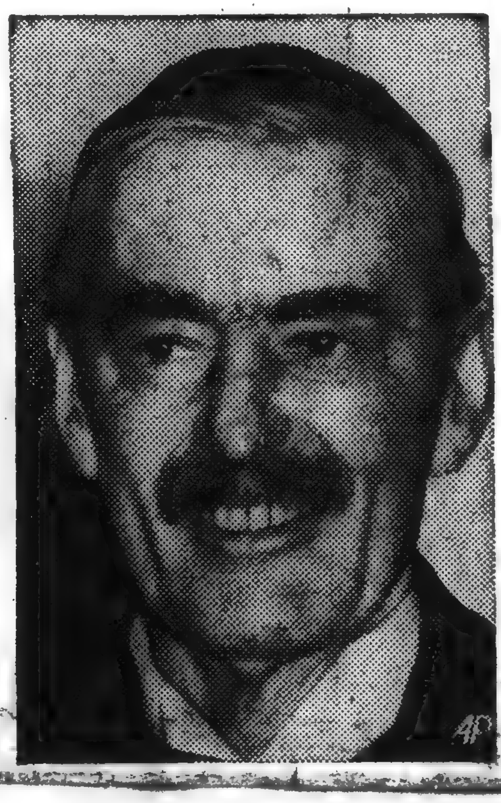
TOUCH OF A MASTER was needed to put Mrs. Vincent Astor's curls in place when this social leader of Manhattan prepared for her role in a costume dinner concert staged at the Waldorf for the benefit of the musicians emergency fund. Samuel L. M. Barlow, who also appeared in the east, watches appreciatively while Walter, Mrs. Astor's hairdresser, tends to her locks.

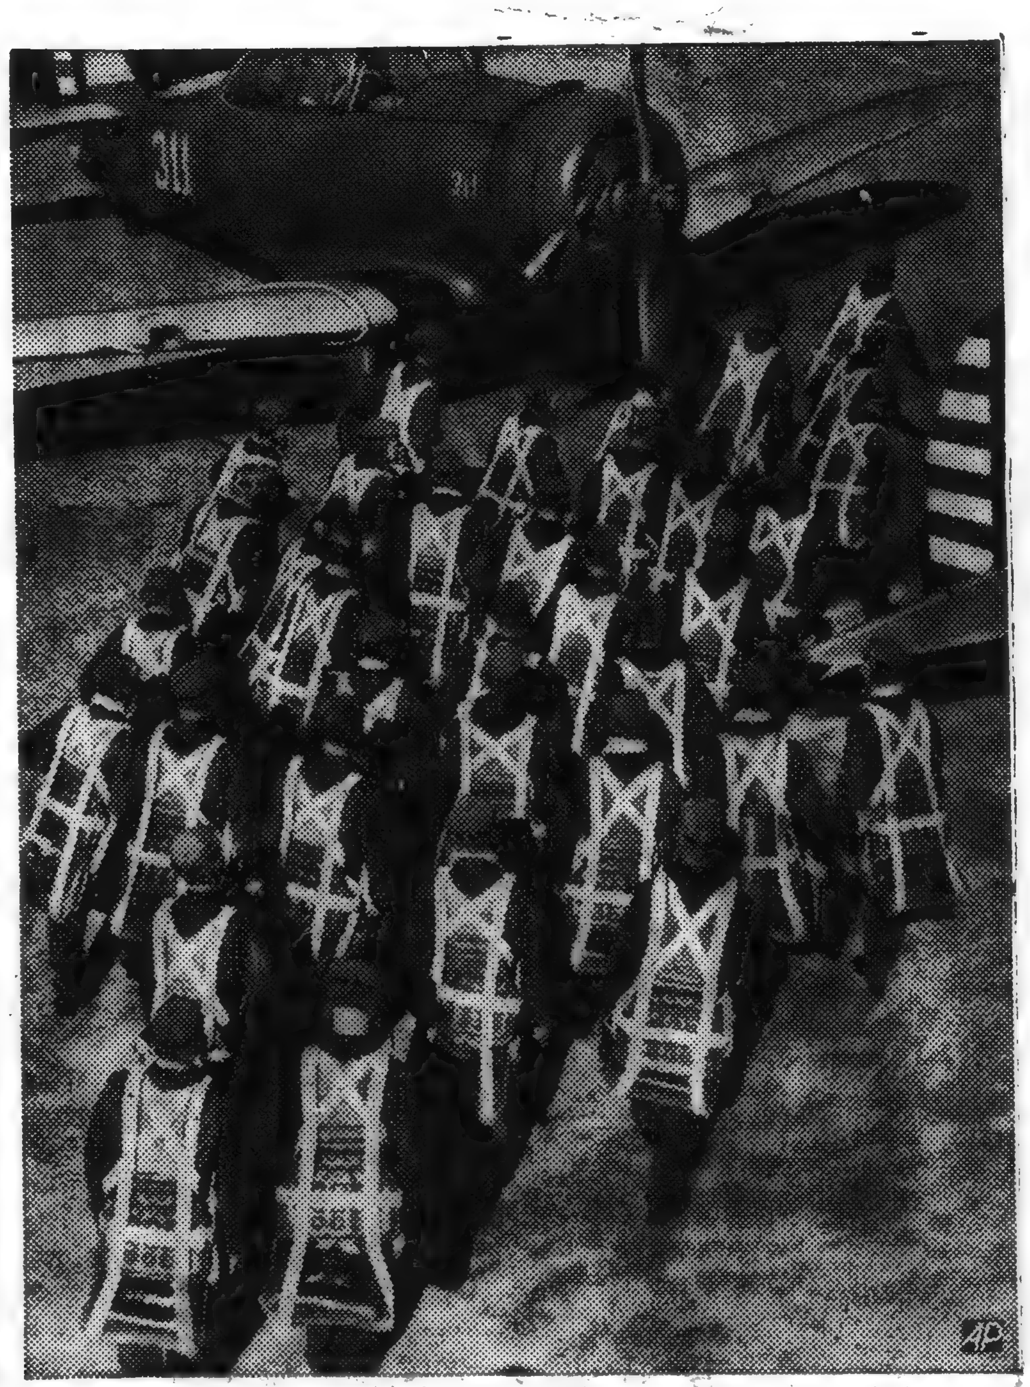
OPPOSITION to Thomas Amlie (above) as member of the interstate commerce commission is forecast in U. S. senate. After his name was offered by F.D.R., the Wisconsin legislature passed resolutions calling him unfit for the appointment.



AN ENGINE TOOK THE CURVE at Kansas City when a Kansas City-to-Denver passenger train rolled over in the yards and bent the rail in this fashion. No one was hurt.

Berkshire Festival





BACKBONE OF U. S. AIR FORCE, these cadets at [illegible] Randolph field, Texas, the "West Point of the air."

BUND DEFENDS CONSTITUTION' declared Wilhelm Kunze (right), national public relations director for the [illegible] Los Angeles meeting. He further

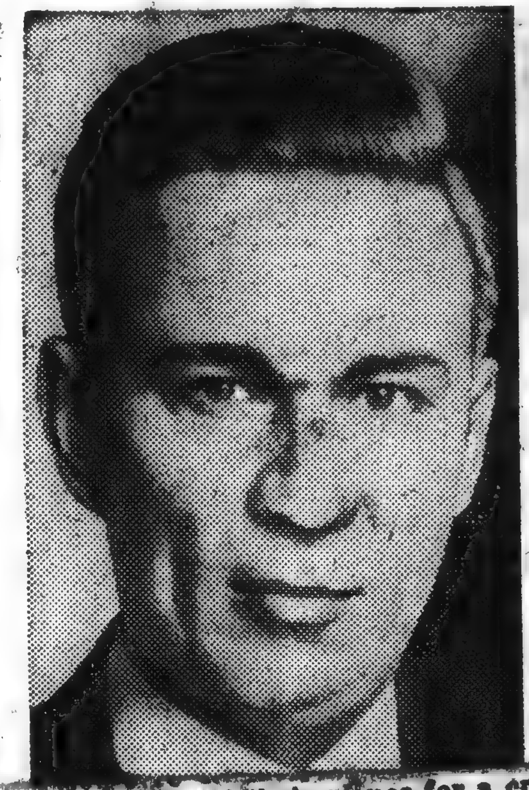
INFORMATION OBSCURED

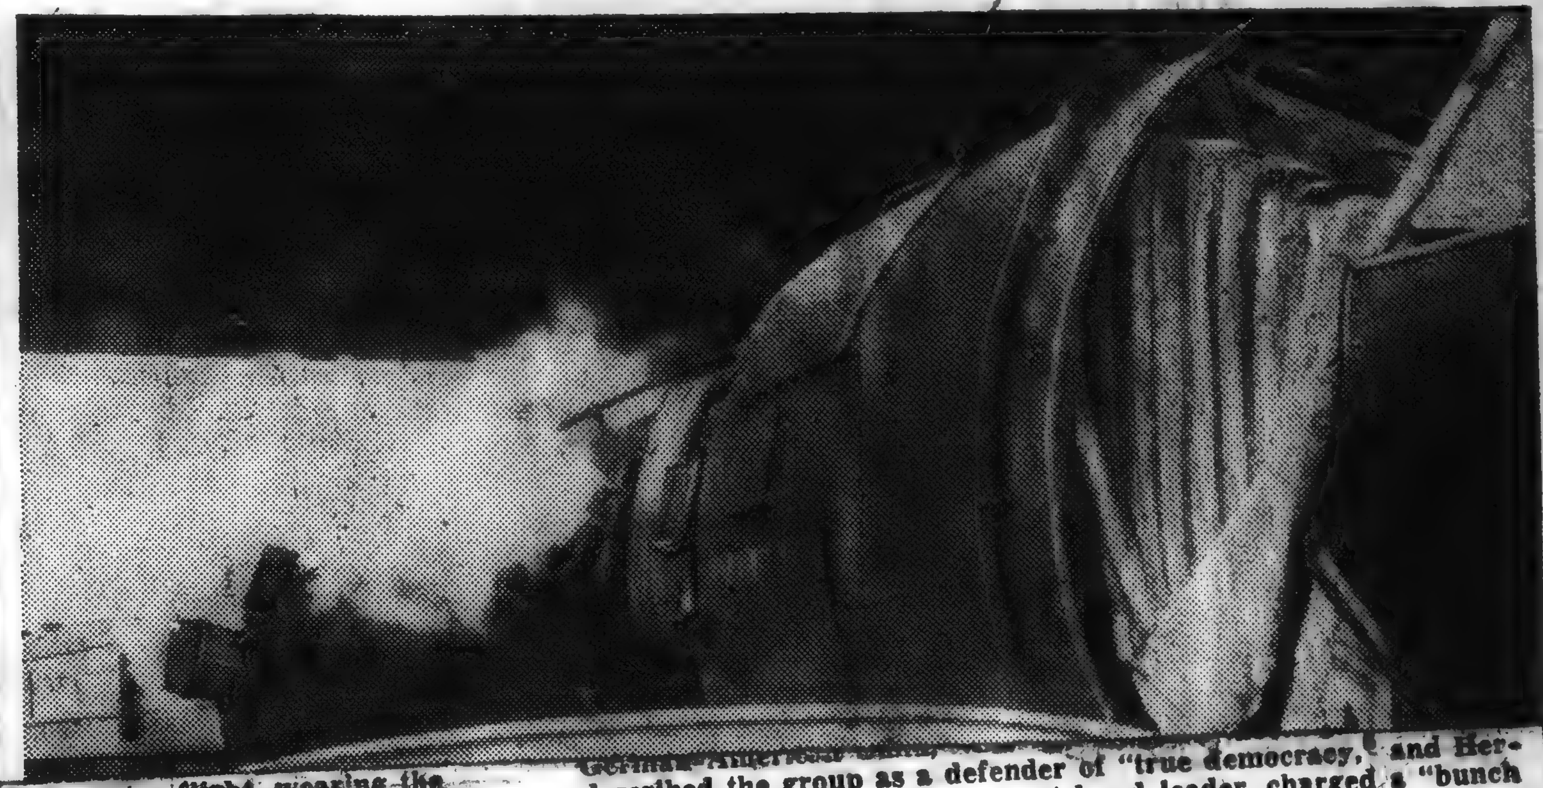
WATERBURY REPUBLICAN'S PICTURE NEWS

KING'S ENGLISH is being mastered by Russian-born Mrs. Bryan Grover (above), now a student in a London night school. Mrs. Grover recently came from Russia after English engineer-husband had braved Soviet wrath to rejoin her.

BOOK LEARNIN' for congressmen has its own special arrangement in Washington, D. C., where a tunnel such as this in which H. S. Lincoln of the congressional library stands, speeds books and papers to the offices of waiting legislators. A carrier takes the books along a trolley rail in this tunnel, which is one-fourth of a mile long and 40 feet underground.

BRITONS SAY that this is Premier Neville Chamberlain's "smile of satisfaction"—presumably over his peace plans.





march toward their planes for a cross-country flight, wearing the parachutes that serve as cushions during flights. Most cadets are college graduates from 20 to 27 years old. Sixty-four instructors conduct the training period which is in three 4-month stages.

described the group as a defender of "true democracy," and Herman Schwinn (left), Pacific coast bund leader, charged a "bunch of aliens in Hollywood" with persecuting the bund in Los Angeles.

HANDS ACROSS THE BORDER were clasped by Gov. Robert T. Jones (left) of Arizona and Gov. Roman Yocupicio of Sonora, Mexico, shown at international border at Nogales, Ariz., and Nogales, Sonora. They exchanged expressions of good will and discussed plans for a highway as well as the 400th observance of the first trip into Arizona by a white man.

WITH A HEIGH-DI HAYDN, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the Composer Haydn manner, preparatory to a concert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky will impersonate Haydn—to whom he is said to bear a resemblance—and orchestra members will appear in 18th century finery.

Berkshire Festival Plans Announced

Conservative programs will again mark the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is indicated by the preliminary announcement of the 1939 season. Six concerts will be given in the "shed" at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, the first series on Aug. 3, 5, and 6, the second on Aug. 10, 12, and 13.

Dr. Koussevitsky will make the programs from the following list of works: the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tchaikovsky, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's Concerto for Orchestra, and others to be announced.

The Festival trustees will prepare for next summer's concerts to making need improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads; and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

While directing their immediate attention to the program for 1939 they have not forgotten the objective of a musical center for 1940. The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are giving thought to the development of the physical plant at Tanglewood in anticipation of the next step in expansion.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2,000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., at Stockbridge, Mass.

versy.

Post Feb 2

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In aid of its pension fund the Boston Symphony Orchestra staged a show in Symphony Hall last evening, which the advance notices and the programme described as a "Concert Extraordinaire." The resulting entertainment might be said to have been half extraordinaire" and half concert.

The "show" part, a sort of symphonic vaudeville, came first and consisted of three numbers. For beginning Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were discovered on a candle-lit stage, in the costume of the period and in imitation of Haydn and his musicians at Esterhaz, they played that composer's "Farewell" Symphony. The candles, gradually extinguished in the final movement, were real candles, not the candle-like electric lights that we have seen when this particular performance was staged under other auspices.

After Haydn and, in sharpest possible contrast, came Eugene Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," after Vachél Lindsay, with Colin O'More as the tenor soloist and Richard Burgin, conducting a company of white-coated, black-trousered musicians who, but for their somewhat staid appearance, might have been a modern dance band. For this set there was an impressionistic backdrop depicting Daniel, the lions, Darius and the Angel Gabriel; and the orchestra, seated on a platform, was impressively wheeled to the front of the stage. Mr. O'More, who had sung this music here before, knows how it should be done, but his voice was occasionally too light and not all the words came over, in this case, a distinct handicap. Moreover, neither the poem nor Gruenberg's adroit score are quite as amusing as they once were.

To conclude the 'extraordinaire" portion of the evening came a repetition from last season of Prokofieff's somewhat labored "orchestral fairy tale for children," "Peter and the Wolf." The narrator was again Richard Hale and again, he filled the bill to perfection.

And then for the benefit of those who prefer to hear the Symphony Orchestra as, for, and by itself, there followed, after the intermission, a delightful programme of waltz-music, played as it might not be played anywhere else in the world today. In the order of their occurrence these waltzes were Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner," Johann Strauss' "Weiner Blut" and "Fluehlingstimmen," Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse." Although the hour was very late, the large and brilliant audience stayed to the end and stayed some more, to heap applause upon conductor and band.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 15 1939

Musical Fair

The New York World's Fair expects to spend $1,200,000 on music alone this summer—so runs the decision of New York's business men, fair officials and Mayor La Guardia. Olin Downes, music critic, will be in charge of the general program, and the various events will take place in the Metropolitan Opera house and Carnegie hall, both of which are to be air conditioned, and in a specially constructed music hall on the fair grounds.

To open this music festival the Metropolitan Opera company will offer a Wagnerian cycle with Artur Bodanzky and Erich Leinsdorf conducting, and Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior heading the casts. Besides the New York organization, entire companies from the Paris Opera, the Glyndebourne Opera, and the Budapest Opera, and the Leningrad Ballet, the Polish Ballet and the Ballet Russe will all be brought to this country for performances.

Although the "official" orchestra of the Fair will be the New York Philharmonic-Symphony with its regular conductor, John Barbirolli, in charge, several other prominent groups will participate, including the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra [Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor], the Boston Symphony orchestra [Serge Koussevitzky, conductor], and the Philadelphia orchestra with Leopold Stokowski, Eugene Ormandy, and Georges Enesco as its leaders.

During the six months' duration of this affair choral groups, folk dancers, choreographic ensembles and soloists from all over the United States and Europe will be presented, Mr. Downes having made an extensive tour last year to recruit the best of such organizations. Some of the individual artists already named for recital appearances are Mme. Flagstad, Lawrence Tibbett, Jascha Heifetz, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Yehudi Menuhin, Fritz Kreisler, and Josef Hofmann.

138

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 21 1939

The "unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra," so termed by no less a critic than Olin Downes, of the New York Times, in his review of their concert published last November 19th, will give the third of their Providence concerts at Metropolitan Theatre on next Tuesday evening at 8:15. Serge Koussevitsky returns to the conductors stand after a brief winter vacation. A week ago the Boston concerts were conducted by Georges Enesco, the famous Rumanian conductor of the orchestra. Koussevitsky has planned one of his choicest programs for his Providence visit.

Haydn's Symphony No. 102, in B flat opens the program. This we heard on Dec. 16th in Boston. Next comes "La Mer," Three Symphonic Sketches, by Debussy. This we heard last August in the Berkshire symphonic festival at the second program in the new music shed. And last comes the feature of this season's work by the orchestra, the Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 83 by Sibelius. A magnificent performance of this was given in Boston on Nov. 11th, which we were fortunate to hear. Is it any wonder that superlative phrases begin to assemble at the thought of hearing all these compositions again? Koussevitsky and his men are at the peak of their careers, in this their fifteenth year of work together. There is an indefinable quality about a concert under Koussevitsky's baton. It is enough to say that one would not willingly miss the rare musical experience.

The Haydn Symphony is one of six which were written for the composer's second visit to London in 1794 and 1795. In all, Haydn wrote 12 symphonies for performance by Salomon's orchestra in London. He had an agreement with the impressario to write something new for every concert in the subscription series. He kept his word. Haydn detracted considerably from the attention which London had given to Handel's Oratorios and Choruses. Everyone was very much interested in this new form of composition, the symphony. Haydn's second visit to London was a great success and it is said that from lessons, concerts and symphonies, as well as other compositions he realized the sum of £1200. This symphony is in four movements, 1—Largo; Allegro vivace; 2—Adagio; 3—Menuetto; Allegro; Trio and 4—Finale: Presto. It is considered to be some of Haydn's best writing.

Debussy's Symphonic Sketches are considered to be the outstanding orchestral work of the impressionistic school of writing. They are wonderful pictures. The first paints the sea from dawn to noon. The second describes the play of the waves and the third is a dialogue between the wind and the sea. This remarkable score was completed on March 5, 1905. It had its first performance (from manuscript) at the Concerts Lamoureux in Paris on October 15, 1905. Last season we called attention to a program which was given in Moscow, Dec. 10, 1913, by Koussevitsky's orchestra there, at which Debussy conducted. On this occasion an all-Debussy program was presented. La Mer was included as were the Nocturnes which were heard here last season. Koussevitsky is thought by some critics to present the finest interpretation of this Debussy, in this era.

Sibelius, the great Finnish composer, visited America in 1914 and conducted the 28th meeting and concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union at Norfolk, Conn., in June of that year. His Fifth Symphony is of heroic proportions. It was given its first performance at Helsingfors, on Dec. 15, 1915, on the occasion of the composer's 50th birthday. It was first performed in Boston on April 7, 1922. The four movements are marked, I, Tempo molto moderato; II, Allegro moderato; III, Andante mosso, quasi allegretto; IV, Allegro molto.

◆ ◆ ◆

Mr. John B. Archer will lecture on the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Providence public Library Sunday at 4 o'clock. These lectures, an annual contribution of the Monday Morning Musical Club, are free to the public. Musical illustrations will be played by Beatrice Warden Roberts, Mrs. Roberts and Mrs. Ross V. Hersey will act as ushers.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

JAN 23 1939

Music

Fiedler Conducts Civic Symphony in Irvine Auditorium

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra "Pop" concerts, and Louis Kazze, Philadelphia pianist and director of music at Overbrook High School, appeared with the Philadelphia Civic Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Irvine Auditorium, University of Pennsylvania. The concert, heard by a large audience, was one in a series presented by the local Federal Music Project of the Works Progress Administration under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania School of Fine Arts.

As on previous occasions when he has been guest-conductor of the W. P. A. symphony here, Fiedler proved an efficient leader with a forthright approach to the music and aptitude for obtaining the requisite tonal and instrumental co-operation of the musicians.

Orchestra Curtailed.

This time Fiedler faced a smaller organization than on previous visits, recent cuts in W. P. A. here having brought a reduction of the local project's personnel, with consequent curtailment of the orchestra, particularly in the string choirs. More musicians would enhance the tonal powers and resources of the ensemble.

The orchestral feature of yesterday's program was Beethoven's symphony No. 3, in E flat, known as the "Eroica." Fiedler's reading was just to structural contours and details, and signified appreciation of the content of each of the four movements and their relation to one another in the scheme of this great work.

Orchestra Praised.

W. P. A. instrumentalists rendered fine service to the music, achieving a satisfying exposition of Beethoven's great score, the performance being rewarded with hearty applause. Fiedler and his colleagues also collaborated agreeably in three excerpts from the third act of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"—the beautiful introduction, the "Dance of the Apprentices," and the finale.

Kazze, heard with highly commendable orchestra accompaniment as soloist in Mendelssohn's G minor concerto, fulfilled the executive, tonal and interpretative requirements of his assignment in gratifying fashion. His pianism revealed an assured and facile technique, a pleasing sense of rhythmic and dynamic values, and tasteful feeling for neat articulation and phrasing, both in fast passage playing and passages calling for the legato style.

Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso" was an encore, brilliantly played. W. S.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 23 1939

WPA Concert Hears Fiedler

A large and appreciative audience yesterday gave approval to a concert of the local Federal Music Project of the Works Progress Administration, under the auspices of the School of Fine Arts of the University of Pennsylvania, in Irvine Auditorium, on the campus.

The concert was presented by the Philadelphia Civic Symphony Orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, as guest leader. Louis Kazze, Philadelphia pianist, was the soloist.

For its opening number the orchestra offered Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. It followed with Mendelssohn's "Concerto in G Minor" and "Rondo Capriccioso." The concert was concluded with three excerpts from the third act of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"—the introduction, the dance of the apprentices and the finale.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

JAN 25 1939

Symphony to Give Pension Fund Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Hadyn symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galzxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius' best known work, "Valse Triste."

Great care is being taken with the settings and costumes which some of the numbers call for. Dr. Koussevitzky's costume as Papa Haydn has been designed by Robert Edmond Jones, who is known for his pioneering with color movies in Hollywood as well as for his work in the New York theater.

Decorations of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

The complete program is as follows:

Haydn .... Farewell Symphony
(Performed in costume)
Gruenberg .... The Daniel Jazz
(After the poem by Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'More)
Prokofeiff .... Peter and the Wolf
(Narrator: Richard Hale)
THE WALTZ
Lanner .... Die Schonbrunner
Strauss .... Vienna Blood
Voices of Spring
Sibelius .... Valse Triste
Ravel .... La Valse

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 28 1939

On Wednesday evening in Symphony Hall, Boston, a "concert extraordinaire" is announced. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play its annual concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and this season the affair takes on a festive mood. Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" will open the program and will be done in costume. From the appearance of the Conductor Serge Koussevitsky as he is pictured in costume as Haydn, the "set" will be authentic as to appearance. A page from the reference book would not speak more eloquently of the dignity and austerity of the director. It promises to be an occasion.

Other numbers on the program are "The Daniel Jazz" (poem by Vachel Lindsay) by Gruenberg, a composition written for eight instruments and tenor. Colin O'More will appear in the role of soloist. Gruenberg, a Russian-born composer, was brought to America when he was a year old. He is best known for his opera "Emperor Jones," written to a libretto from Eugene O'Neil's play. He has also set Anatole France to music in "The Dumb Wife" as well as John Erskine in "Jack and the Beanstalk." An orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, will be presented with Richard Hale as narrator.

The last group on the program is titled "The Waltz" and includes "Die Schronbrunner" waltzes by Lanner, "Wiener Blut" and "Fruhlingstimmen" by Strauss, "Valse Triste" by Sibelius and "La Valse" by Ravel—truly a "concert extraordinaire."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 26 1939

Boston Symphony To Turn Clock Back

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, Feb. 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wiggerd orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitsky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitsky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JAN 27 1939

Boston Symphony Benefit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the concert extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and bewigged orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience two hundred years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composed. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Famous Waltzes

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius' best known work, "Valse Triste."

Great care is being taken with the settings and costumes which some of the numbers call for. Dr. Koussevitzky's costume as Papa Haydn has been designed by Robert Edmond Jones, who is known for his pioneering with color movies in Hollywood as well as for his work in the New York theater.

Decorations of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

139

ORCHESTRAS: Boston Symphony Visits—Toscanini Returns

SOLOISTS and premieres varied orchestral programs of recent weeks. Arturo Toscanini returned to conduct two more of his series of N.B.C. Symphony concerts. John Barbirolli conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in an all-Schubert program. Guila Bustabo was soloist under his baton in the Sibelius Violin Concerto, also appearing at a Children's Concert in the second and third movements of the Mendelssohn Concerto. Ernest Schelling was the piano soloist at two concerts, playing the Chopin F Minor Concerto and sharing the podium with Mr. Barbirolli at one of them to conduct his Suite Variée and playing the Paderewski Polish Fantasia at the other. Serge Koussevitzky returned with the Boston Symphony, offering the New York premiere of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances and at a second concert that of Dukelsky's 'Dedicaces', with J. M. Sanroma as the pianist and Marguerite Porter as soprano soloist. Joseph Schuster played the Boccherini B Flat Major Concerto at a Philharmonic-Symphony League concert conducted by Mr. Barbirolli. Jettie T. Denmark conducted a Phil Sym String Orchestra concert with Joseph Emonts as 'cello soloist.

An All-Schubert Program

New York Philharmonic Symphony, John Barbirolli, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 4, evening.

Five 'Deutsche', with Coda and Seven Trios; Symphony No. 4 in C Minor (Tragic); Symphony No. 7 in C Major............Schubert

Mr. Barbirolli and his players were particularly happy in this program, representative of both the young Schubert and the mature Schubert. The German dances were composed at 16, the 'Tragic' at 19 and the great C Major symphony at 31, in the last year of Schubert's life.

The Philharmonic strings gave the dances a buoyant and affectionate performance, with an enchanting diminuendo that was shaded down to a wisp of tone at the close of the coda. The early symphony was warmly and lyrically played, its famous andante shining forth with the most tender glow. Of high quality also was the performance of the C Major symphony, the tempi of which were well considered, the structure clear and firm, and the tonal quality rich and full. O.

Bustabo Plays with Philharmonic

New York Philharmonic-Symphony, John Barbirolli, conductor; Guila Bustabo, violinist, assisting artist. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 8, afternoon:

Dances for Strings...................Schubert
Preludes and Entr'actes from 'Pelléas et Mélisande'............................Debussy
Concerto in D Minor, Op. 47...........Sibelius
Miss Bustabo
Overture to 'Tannhäuser'.............Wagner

The Schubert Dances, excerpts from 'Pelléas' and 'Tannhäuser' Overture were repetitions from a previous concert. The novelty was Miss Bustabo's performance of the Sibelius Concerto. Ease, assurance and praiseworthy poise marked her appearance upon the platform, and poise her performance of the Concerto.

Miss Bustabo immediately set her audience at ease with the surety with which she attacked the opening measures and in subsequent movements proved able, technically, to encompass the dangers with which the music bristles. In fact she overcame the technical dragon that guards the last movement with so swift and sure a thrust, that it elicited bravos from the men of the orchestra as well as the audience. Her tone was often poetic, and in the Adagio there were many telling moments. Throughout, the warmth and spirit of the reading was entirely commendable.

Mr. Barbirolli gave excellent support in the Concerto and conducted the Schubert and Wagner with rare discernment. The audience, unfortunately, was unappreciative of the Debussy, and though Mr. Barbirolli set forth its measures with a superb regard for nuance and detail, the tonal miracle that was achieved by the "Musicien Français" went, for the most part, unheeded. W.

Boston Symphony Returns for Another Visit

Boston Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 5, evening:

Concerto in D Minor (arr. by Siloti)..Vivaldi
Symphonic Dances ....Hindemith
Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98..Brahms

Guila Bustabo

The ever cherishable Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky enlivened this concert with a first New York performance of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, originally conceived as a ballet, but carried out in their present form as a concert piece. They proved something of a disappointment; for despite the brilliant scoring and well-integrated design of the music, it lacks both thematic freshness and development. The composer repeats himself, in masterly fashion it is true, but with the result that the work loses its bite long before it is ended. From the scintillant opening to the blazing panoply of the close, the orchestra lavished its full virtuosity on the score. A major role was taken by the brasses and wood winds which were held in the foreground.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Vivaldi concerto (familiar through Bach's superb arrangement of it for organ) with an aristocratic nobility of style which is becoming all too rare these days. The strings were proud and vibrant in tone, yet never too emphatic or over-luscious, and in tempo and clarity the interpretation was a model of classical dignity. There is no need to point out the details of Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, or to reiterate the enthusiasm which always greets the superb performances of the Boston Symphony. It was not merely the beauty of sound but the majesty and structural power which this performance revealed that moved the audience to a demonstration which left no doubt of the special nature of the occasion. As often as this splendid orchestra can come, it will find an eager audience of listeners, as upon this occasion, to enjoy the high integrity and artistry of its performances. S.

Dukelsky Novelty on Second Program of Boston Symphony

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Soloists: Jesus Maria Sanromá, pianist; Marguerite Porter, soprano. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 7, afternoon:

Symphony in B Flat, No. 102......Haydn
'Dédicaces', for piano and orchestra, with soprano obbligato................Dukelsky
Symphony, No. 4, in F Minor, Op. 36
Tchaikovsky

The novelty of the program, the 'Dédicaces' by Vladimir Dukelsky, the Vernon Duke of musical comedy and movie music, which had its première in Boston last month with the same performers, proved to be a peculiarly conceived setting of the implications of a poem by the French Guillaume Apollinaire.

Described by the composer as a sort of three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph, with a soprano as narrator and a solo pianist "pitched against the universe of the orchestra," the work is really in five sections, the text being intoned by the singer in its entirety in the 'L'envoi' and again in part in the Epilogue, in a series of strange intervals whose logic is not readily apparent. Nor is it easy to perceive the intentions of the instrumental score, which, according to the composer, is "in no way descriptive." The three middle sections, however, have concretely descriptive titles, 'To the City', 'To the Country', and 'To the Sea'.

The first of these was such a riot of crackling dissonance, startling even to those whose ears are supposedly hardened to modernistic excesses, that a loud and penetrating "hiss" was heard at the close of the movement. 'To the Sea' seemed almost equally chaotic, on a first hearing, at any rate, while a not very convincing sop to Cerberus was offered by the more suave measures of 'To the Country'.

The work presents the most formidable hazards for orchestra, pianist and singer alike, and it is greatly to the credit of the open-minded Mr. Koussevitzky and his admirable band, the accomplished Mr. Sanromá and Miss Porter, that it was projected with such unflagging spirit, assurance and aplomb. The appallingly difficult piano cadenza in the 'To the Sea' section was negotiated by Mr. Sanromá in brilliant fashion. At the close the composer was brought to the stage to share in the audience's tribute of applause.

The main musical fare of the afternoon, the Haydn and Tchaikovsky symphonies, was dispensed in a manner that will not soon be forgotten by the fortunate recipients. The Haydn was imbued with compelling vitality and grace, while Tchaikovsky's Fourth was played with that combination of poignant emotional eloquence, structural integrity and tonal splendor for which Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of it remains almost unique. No wonder the audience indulged in prolonged demonstrations of applause. C.

WOBURN, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 26 1939

Boston Symphony in Unusual Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in eighteenth century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on February 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on February 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and bewigged orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience two hundred years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character, The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic peom "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius's best known work, "Valse Triste."

Great care is being taken with the settings and costumes which some of the numbers call for. Dr. Koussevitzky's costume as Papa Haydn has been designed by Robert Edmond Jones, who is known for his pioneering with color movies in Hollywood as well as for his work in the New York theatre.

Decoration of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has some to Boston from New York for the purpose.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

JAN 29 1939

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Two numbers will constitute the fifteenth programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra in its longer series to be performed in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will present the Eighth Symphony of Anton Bruckner in the first part of the programme. It will be followed by Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Bruckner's Symphony was last performed at these concerts in April, 1937, and Moussorgsky's score in 1934. The "Pictures at an Exhibition" will be played in the orchestration which Maurice Ravel made at the suggestion of Koussevitzky. There have been three other orchestrations: by Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi and Lucien Cailliet.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

JAN 28 1939

Symphony Concert Monday.

PETERBOROUGH, Jan. 27.—Announcement was made yesterday of the program for the symphony concert to be given in the Town House Monday night at 8 o'clock under the sponsorship of the Progressive and Rotary clubs. It will be given by the State Symphony orchestra of the New Hampshire Federal music project, a unit of the WPA. The director is Earl Clay, a talented young leader who has played in the Boston Symphony orchestra and is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music. A special feature will be selections by Milo Goldstein, a leading 'cellist.

Girl About Town

B. American - Feb. 1/39

WE MAY HAVE TO LOOK to New York for a Statue of Liberty and a World's Fair, but Boston can still boast a local Johnny Morris.

He's Robert Hickman, age 18, four feet and a half in height with a call capable of rousing any of the Statler's snoozing salesmen. His yodel, the envy of many a hog-caller, was developed selling newspapers at the Cottage Farm bridge over a number of years.

According to Bobby, it rates most favorable response between four and seven and it's usually the women patrons who are most impressed by the page boy's disarming manner.

To most Statler patrons he's known as Johnny, although his family calls him Bib. In the immediate group of four, two brothers, John and Harold, are former captains of Brighton High School's football squads. They not only hit the six-foot mark, but have won many a scholastic athletic honor. What is worrying them at present is how they can work out some trick family play with brother Bib carrying the ball.

VIENNA-BORN MEMBERS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra say we should be grateful to Joseph Lanner for the Strauss waltzes. It was Lanner who first recognized genius in the person of his viola player, Strauss, Sr. International acclaim followed and thus was set in motion a train of circumstances which resulted in the creation of the world's greatest waltzes.

Vienna recognized Lanner's contribution by incorporating him into a bas-relief monument. Koussevitzky hopes to make amends to his memory by playing his "Shoenbrunner" at Symphony's special program tonight in aid of the pension fund.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 28 1939

The Boston Symphony Orchestra proposes to give a Concert Extraordinaire in Symphony Hall Wednesday night. The orchestra will dress in 18th century style, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, will be costumed as Haydn to direct the "Farewell Symphony."

It is a pension fund concert. It will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8.

The program:

Haydn .... Farewell Symphony
(Performed in costume)
Gruenberg..........The Daniel Jazz
(After the poem by Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'More)
Prokofeiff ..... Peter and the Wolf
(Narrator: Richard Hale)
The Waltz
Lanner...........Die Schonbrunner
Strauss..................Vienna Blood
Voices of Spring
Sibelius ....Valse Triste
Ravel.............................La Valse

* * *

The annual young organists' contest sponsored by the American Guild of Organists, Rhode Island Chapter, will take place on April 22 at 3 p. m. in St. Mary's Episcopal Church, East Providence. All persons living inside or outside the State who have not reached the age of 26 by that day are eligible. There will be three judges, all chosen from outside the State. Frederick Very, of this city, is contest chairman.

The "little" prelude and fugue in G major by Bach is required, and one of the following: Edward Bairstow, Evensong; Garth Edmundsen, Easter Spring Song; Hensel, Ave Maria; Karg-Elert, Chair de Lune; J. S. Matthews, Cotswold Air; McKinley, Cantilena; Noble, Choral Prelude on "St. Anne;" Purcell, Trumpet Voluntary; Russell, Song of the Basket Weaver; Stebbins, The Swan.

139

ORCHESTRAS: Boston Symphony Visits—Toscanini Returns

SOLOISTS and premieres varied orchestral programs of recent weeks. Arturo Toscanini returned to conduct two more of his series of N.B.C. Symphony concerts. John Barbirolli conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in an all-Schubert program. Guila Bustabo was soloist under his baton in the Sibelius Violin Concerto, also appearing at a Children's Concert in the second and third movements of the Mendelssohn Concerto. Ernest Schelling was the piano soloist at two concerts, playing the Chopin F Minor Concerto and sharing the podium with Mr. Barbirolli at one of them to conduct his Suite Variée and playing the Paderewski Polish Fantasia at the other. Serge Koussevitzky returned with the Boston Symphony, offering the New York premiere of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances and at a second concert that of Dukelsky's 'Dedicaces', with J. M. Sanroma as the pianist and Marguerite Porter as soprano soloist. Joseph Schuster played the Boccherini B Flat Major Concerto at a Philharmonic-Symphony League concert conducted by Mr. Barbirolli. Jettie T. Denmark conducted a Phil Sym String Orchestra concert with Joseph Emonts as 'cello soloist.

An All-Schubert Program

New York Philharmonic Symphony, John Barbirolli, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 4, evening.

Five 'Deutsche', with Coda and Seven Trios; Symphony No. 4 in C Minor (Tragic); Symphony No. 7 in C Major............Schubert

Mr. Barbirolli and his players were particularly happy in this program, representative of both the young Schubert and the mature Schubert. The German dances were composed at 16, the 'Tragic' at 19 and the great C Major symphony at 31, in the last year of Schubert's life.

The Philharmonic strings gave the dances a buoyant and affectionate performance, with an enchanting diminuendo that was shaded down to a wisp of tone at the close of the coda. The early symphony was warmly and lyrically played, its famous andante shining forth with the most tender glow. Of high quality also was the performance of the C Major symphony, the tempi of which were well considered, the structure clear and firm, and the tonal quality rich and full. O.

Bustabo Plays with Philharmonic

New York Philharmonic-Symphony, John Barbirolli, conductor; Guila Bustabo, violinist, assisting artist. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 8, afternoon:

Dances for Strings..................Schubert
Preludes and Entr'actes from 'Pelléas et Mélisande'.........................Debussy
Concerto in D Minor, Op. 47..........Sibelius
Miss Bustabo
Overture to 'Tannhäuser'.............Wagner

The Schubert Dances, excerpts from 'Pelléas' and 'Tannhäuser' Overture were repetitions from a previous concert. The novelty was Miss Bustabo's performance of the Sibelius Concerto. Ease, assurance and praiseworthy poise marked her appearance upon the platform, and poise her performance of the Concerto.

Miss Bustabo immediately set her audience at ease with the surety with which she attacked the opening measures and in subsequent movements proved able, technically, to encompass the dangers with which the music bristles. In fact she overcame the technical dragon that guards the last movement with so swift and sure a thrust, that it elicited bravos from the men of the orchestra as well as the audience. Her tone was often poetic, and in the Adagio there were many telling moments. Throughout, the warmth and spirit of the reading was entirely commendable.

Mr. Barbirolli gave excellent support in the Concerto and conducted the Schubert and Wagner with rare discernment. The audience, unfortunately, was unappreciative of the Debussy, and though Mr. Barbirolli set forth its measures with a superb regard for nuance and detail, the tonal miracle that was achieved by the "Musicien Français" went, for the most part, unheeded. W.

Boston Symphony Returns for Another Visit

Boston Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 5, evening:

Concerto in D Minor (arr. by Siloti)..Vivaldi
Symphonic Dances...................Hindemith
Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98..Brahms

Guila Bustabo

The ever cherishable Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky enlivened this concert with a first New York performance of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, originally conceived as a ballet, but carried out in their present form as a concert piece. They proved something of a disappointment; for despite the brilliant scoring and well-integrated design of the music, it lacks both thematic freshness and development. The composer repeats himself, in masterly fashion it is true, but with the result that the work loses its bite long before it is ended. From the scintillant opening to the blazing panoply of the close, the orchestra lavished its full virtuosity on the score. A major role was taken by the brasses and wood winds which were held in the foreground.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Vivaldi concerto (familiar through Bach's superb arrangement of it for organ) with an aristocratic nobility of style which is becoming all too rare these days. The strings were proud and vibrant in tone, yet never too emphatic or over-luscious, and in tempo and clarity the interpretation was a model of classical dignity. There is no need to point out the details of Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, or to reiterate the enthusiasm which always greets the superb performances of the Boston Symphony. It was not merely the beauty of sound but the majesty and structural power which this performance revealed that moved the audience to a demonstration which left no doubt of the special nature of the occasion. As often as this splendid orchestra can come, it will find an eager audience of listeners, as upon this occasion, to enjoy the high integrity and artistry of its performances. S.

Dukelsky Novelty on Second Program of Boston Symphony

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Soloists: Jesus Maria Sanromá, pianist; Marguerite Porter, soprano. Carnegie Hall, Jan. 7, afternoon:

Symphony in B Flat, No. 102......Haydn
'Dédicaces', for piano and orchestra, with soprano obbligato..............Dukelsky
Symphony, No. 4, in F Minor, Op. 36 Tchaikovsky

The novelty of the program, the 'Dédicaces' by Vladimir Dukelsky, the Vernon Duke of musical comedy and movie music, which had its première in Boston last month with the same performers, proved to be a peculiarly conceived setting of the implications of a poem by the French Guillaume Apollinaire.

Described by the composer as a sort of three-movement piano concerto with a vocal epigraph, with a soprano as narrator and a solo pianist "pitched against the universe of the orchestra," the work is really in five sections, the text being intoned by the singer in its entirety in the 'L'envoi' and again in part in the Epilogue, in a series of strange intervals whose logic is not readily apparent. Nor is it easy to perceive the intentions of the instrumental score, which, according to the composer, is "in no way descriptive." The three middle sections, however, have concretely descriptive titles, 'To the City', 'To the Country', and 'To the Sea'.

The first of these was such a riot of crackling dissonance, startling even to those whose ears are supposedly hardened to modernistic excesses, that a loud and penetrating "hiss" was heard at the close of the movement. 'To the Sea' seemed almost equally chaotic, on a first hearing, at any rate, while a not very convincing sop to Cerberus was offered by the more suave measures of 'To the Country'.

The work presents the most formidable hazards for orchestra, pianist and singer alike, and it is greatly to the credit of the open-minded Mr. Koussevitzky and his admirable band, the accomplished Mr. Sanromá and Miss Porter, that it was projected with such unflagging spirit, assurance and aplomb. The appallingly difficult piano cadenza in the 'To the Sea' section was negotiated by Mr. Sanromá in brilliant fashion. At the close the composer was brought to the stage to share in the audience's tribute of applause.

The main musical fare of the afternoon, the Haydn and Tchaikovsky symphonies, was dispensed in a manner that will not soon be forgotten by the fortunate recipients. The Haydn was imbued with compelling vitality and grace, while Tchaikovsky's Fourth was played with that combination of poignant emotional eloquence, structural integrity and tonal splendor for which Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of it remains almost unique. No wonder the audience indulged in prolonged demonstrations of applause. C.

WOBURN, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 26 1939

Boston Symphony in Unusual Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in eighteenth century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on February 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on February 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and bewigged orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience two hundred years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic peom "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius's best known work, "Valse Triste."

Great care is being taken with the settings and costumes which some of the numbers call for. Dr. Koussevitzky's costume as Papa Haydn has been designed by Robert Edmond Jones, who is known for his pioneering with color movies in Hollywood as well as for his work in the New York theatre.

Decoration of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jack Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

Girl About Town

B. American - 1-26-39

WE MAY HAVE TO LOOK to New York for a Statue of Liberty and a World's Fair, but Boston can still boast a local Johnny Morris.

He's Robert Hickman, age 18, four feet and a half in height with a call capable of rousing any of the Statler's snoozing salesmen. His yodel, the envy of many a hog-caller, was developed selling newspapers at the Cottage Farm bridge over a number of years.

According to Bobby, it rates most favorable response between four and seven and it's usually the women patrons who are most impressed by the page boy's disarming manner.

To most Statler patrons he's known as Johnny, although his family calls him Bib. In the immediate group of four, two brothers, John and Harold, are former captains of Brighton High School's football squads. They not only hit the six-foot mark, but have won many a scholastic athletic honor. What is worrying them at present is how they can work out some trick family play with brother Bib carrying the ball.

VIENNA-BORN MEMBERS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra say we should be grateful to Joseph Lanner for the Strauss waltzes. It was Lanner who first recognized genius in the person of his viola player, Strauss, Sr. International acclaim followed and thus was set in motion a train of circumstances which resulted in the creation of the world's greatest waltzes.

Vienna recognized Lanner's contribution by incorporating him into a bas-relief monument. Koussevitzky hopes to make amends to his memory by playing his "Shoenbrunner" at Symphony's special program tonight in aid of the pension fund.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

JAN 29 1939

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Two numbers will constitute the fifteenth programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra in its longer series to be performed in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will present the Eighth Symphony of Anton Bruckner in the first part of the programme. It will be followed by Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Bruckner's Symphony was last performed at these concerts in April, 1937, and Moussorgsky's score in 1934. The "Pictures at an Exhibition" will be played in the orchestration which Maurice Ravel made at the suggestion of Koussevitzky. There have been three other orchestrations: by Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi and Lucien Cailliet.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

JAN 28 1939

Symphony Concert Monday.

PETERBOROUGH, Jan. 27.—Announcement was made yesterday of the program for the symphony concert to be given in the Town House Monday night at 8 o'clock under the sponsorship of the Progressive and Rotary clubs. It will be given by the State Symphony orchestra of the New Hampshire Federal music project, a unit of the WPA. The director is Earl Clay, a talented young leader who has played in the Boston Symphony orchestra and is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music. A special feature will be selections by Milo Goldstein, a leading 'cellist.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 28 1939

The Boston Symphony Orchestra proposes to give a Concert Extraordinaire in Symphony Hall Wednesday night. The orchestra will dress in 18th century style, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, will be costumed as Haydn to direct the "Farewell Symphony."

It is a pension fund concert. It will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8.

The program:

Haydn ....Farewell Symphony
(Performed in costume)
Gruenberg ....The Daniel Jazz
(After the poem by Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'More)
Prokofeiff.....Peter and the Wolf
(Narrator: Richard Hale)
The Waltz
Lanner..........Die Schonbrunner
Strauss...................Vienna Blood
Voices of Spring
Sibelius ....Valse Triste
Ravel...............................La Valse

The annual young organists' contest sponsored by the American Guild of Organists, Rhode Island Chapter, will take place on April 22 at 3 p. m. in St. Mary's Episcopal Church, East Providence. All persons living inside or outside the State who have not reached the age of 26 by that day are eligible. There will be three judges, all chosen from outside the State. Frederick Very, of this city, is contest chairman.

The "little" prelude and fugue in G major by Bach is required, and one of the following: Edward Bairstow, Evensong; Garth Edmundsen, Easter Spring Song; Henselt, Ave Maria; Karg-Elert, Chair de Lune; J. S. Matthews, Cotswold Air; McKinley, Cantilena; Noble, Choral Prelude on "St. Anne;" Purcell, Trumpet Voluntary; Russell, Song of the Basket Weaver; Stebbins, The Swan.

140

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 26 1939

Koussevitzky Dresses as Haydn

—Associated Press photo

Something new in concerts will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when they dress in 18th century finery for their next appearance, in Boston, Feb. 1. Here the noted conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, dresses as the composer Haydn, to whom experts say he bears a remarkable resemblance and tries a few movements before the mirror, holding his mouth in typical Haydn fashion.

Worcester Gazette
Jan. 27/39

DRESSED FOR CONCERTS

Boston's widely known symphony orchestra leader, Serge Koussevitzky, outfitted in 18th Century finery in which he is to conduct the orchestra in concerts "extraordinaire" in Boston Feb. 1 and in New York Feb. 8. Powdered and wigged, he will impersonate the composer Haydn, to whom he bears a remarkable likeness. Photo shows him getting a laugh from his outfit. (Associated Press Photo.)

..Music and Other Notes..

Pawtucket Times - Jan. 28/39

Dates to remember:

Feb. 5—Providence Federal orchestra, Hope high school, 8:30 p. m.

Feb. 7—Arthur Carron, tenor, Attleboro Civic Music Association, 8:15 p. m.

Feb. 7—Arturo Toscanini and NBC orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

Feb. 8—Roth quartet and Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Plantations Club, 8 p. m.

~~Feb. 14—Eleanor [illegible] contralto, and [illegible] Churchill House~~

Feb. 28—Boston Symphony orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m. R. T.

On Wednesday evening in Symphony Hall, Boston, a "concert extraordinaire" is announced. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play its annual concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and this season the affair takes on a festive mood. Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" will open the program and will be done in costume. From the appearance of the Conductor Serge Koussevitsky as he is pictured in costume as Haydn, the "set" will be authentic as to appearance. A page from the reference book would not speak more eloquently of the dignity and austerity of the director. It promises to be an occasion.

Other numbers on the program are "The Daniel Jazz" (poem by Vachel Lindsay) by Gruenberg, a composition written for eight instruments and tenor. Colin O'More will appear in the role of soloist. Gruenberg, a Russian-born composer, was brought to America when he was a year old. He is best known for his opera "Emperor Jones," written to a libretto from Eugene O'Neil's play. He has also set Anatole France to music in "The Dumb Wife" as well as John Erskine in "Jack and the Beanstalk." An orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, will be presented with Richard Hale as narrator.

The last group on the program is titled "The Waltz" and includes "Die Schronbrunner" waltzes by Lanner, "Wiener Blut" and "Fruhlingstimmen" by Strauss, "Valse Triste" by Sibelius and "La Valse" by Ravel—truly a "concert extraordinaire."

Bewigged Pension Fund In Jazz, Review of Waltz

New Bedford Mercury
Jan 30/39

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the "Concert Extraordinaire," to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece by Gruenberg was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by the tenor Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number.

Another novelty on the program is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale, well known baritone and actor, will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program.

All Ages Represented as Society Turns Out for Symphony Benefit

B. Herald - Feb. 2, 1939

When the red curtains parted on the stage of Symphony hall last evening to reveal Dr. Serge Koussevitzky costumed as the composer, Haydn, powdered wig, knee breeches, lace frills and all, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra clad likewise, it seemed as if time were turned back about two centuries while Haydn himself conducted his "Farewell" Symphony seated in a lyre-back chair at a quaint spinet in the light of a glittering chandelier and flickering candles. As a complete contrast, "The Daniel Jazz" by Gruenberg followed, conducted by Richard Burgin against a lurid background picturing Daniel in the lion's den, with Colin O'More singing the tenor solo. Then, to add still further variety came the delightful orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, followed by a group of waltzes by Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel. If variety is the spice of life, that was it! And the occasion of all this was the 83d concert in aid of the orchestra's Pension Fund.

Society turned out in its best bib and tucker for this affair, and all ages were represented. With Mrs. William C. Cox, who wore a gown of magenta chiffon, was her small daughter, Jane, in a brown velvet princess frock, listening intently to the fairy tale as interpreted by Richard Hale. Another wide-eyed youngster who was allowed to attend with her mother, Mrs. James B. Patterson, as a very special treat was Margherita Patterson, very dressed up in shell pink crepe with which she wore white socks and patent leather slippers.

Among the debutantes we noted Miss Diana Bird, in becoming royal purple crepe, who was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., her black gown topped by a crimson jacket. Another debutante present was Miss Nancy Burrage, in a simple frock of black velvet, and still another was Miss Mary West. Miss Betty Albers, who looked enchantingly pretty in a black velvet frock with a bodice of palest pink and silver lame belted with silver, was escorted by her fiance, Mr. John Sabine.

Listening from balcony seats, the favorite of many Symphony-goers, were Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr. Sitting in the very front row was Mrs. Jaffray de Hauteville Bell, wearing her sparkling tiara and a gown fashioned from a blue and white fringed shawl. Nearby were Mrs. Henry Tudor and Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and her daughter, Miss Jane Bancroft.

Mrs. Whitney Hale, her hair swept high and a white bolero glittering with sequins contrasting with her black frock, was thoroughly enjoying the waltzes, and we heard one older member of the audience say to another, "That's REAL swing, Benny Goodman notwithstanding!" With Mr. Bartlett Harwood was Mrs. Harwood, bands of black jet paillettes glistening on her black gown.

Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., topped her filmy black frock with a mink coat, and Miss Ellen Bottomley's wrap was fashioned of ruby velvet that was a perfect foil for her dark coloring. Mrs. Chatfield Whitman wore a gold link necklace with her black gown and garnet red bolero, and Miss Anne Peabody wore a white angora bolero with her frock of sapphire velvet.

With Mrs. William B. Long, in a long-sleeved frock of silver lame, was her daughter, Miss Polly Long, in sheer net of palest blue. Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Roland Nickerson, and another mother and daughter attending together were Mrs. Alexander Steinert and Mrs. Samuel J. Newman. Still others we glimpsed in the throng were Mr. and Mrs. Sargent Collier, Mrs. Wallace McI. Scudder, Jr., Mrs. Frank Sawtell, Miss Barbara Bremer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus and Miss Gertrude Sands.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

JAN 27 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra in an Unusual Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Kouscsevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. At the opening, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and bewigged orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them. Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed by Gruenberg as a background for Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More, tenor, "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation. Another novelty on the program, Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," is an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy oof famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius's best known work, "Valse Triste."

B. Herald

MUSIC

Feb. 2/39

PENSION FUND CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a concert last night in Symphony hall for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Colin O'More, tenor, was a soloist; and Richard Hale, narrator, assisted. The program was as follows:

Haydn—"Farewell" Symphony No. 45.
Gruenberg—"The Daniel Jazz" from a poem of Vachel Lindsay.
Prokofieff—"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale.
Lanner—'Die Schoenbrunner," Waltzes.
J. Strauss—"Wiener Blu," Waltzes; "Fruehlingstimmen," Waltzes.
Sibelius—Valse Trieste.
Ravel—"La Valse," Choreographic Poem.

In the interests of its Pension Fund the Boston Symphony performed some unheard-of high jinks last night. Not only was 18th century dress, complete with bag wig, de rigeur for the Haydn Symphony, but also Gruenberg's "Daniel Jaz" was played on a movable platform in mess jackets and carnations by Richard Burgin and his merry men. There was also a mildly surrealist backdrop and, for the Haydn, more credits in the program than would serve a high school performance of "The Merchant of Venice." Like all good times, this one may have been more enjoyable in anticipation than in the actual event; but there could be no denying the spirit and good will that went into all the varied proceedings.

The 18th century atmosphere was most agreeably contrived, and Haydn was no less and no more Haydn because of it. It made a charming picture that did not err in the matter of taste. Dr. Koussevitzky was a much more authentic figure than he was when he appeared in this garb some years ago; and the orchestra has certainly not deteriorated in the meanwhile! The Gruenberg dates a bit, since we have met with and endured far stranger horrors of jazz since its period. Mr. O'More sang with a will, even if the effect was not as amusing as it was obviously intended to be.

The most interesting part of this concert was to observe what Dr. Koussevitzky did with "Peter and the Wolf." It was a much sprucer performance than that which Prokofieff, himself, conducted last year. The tempo was quicker, there were no drags, and the whole piece was enormously improved by being coordinated in this alert fashion. It was also apparent that Dr. Koussevitzky had had something to do with simplifying Mr. Richard Hale's narration of the story. At least that is a fair assumption, for great slices of affectation have been carved off of this aspect of the performance. A certain irreverent joy has gone from our appreciation of Prokofieff's delightful work, as of the time we first heard it; but undoubtedly the work itself is the gainer.

The "waltz," from the rather humdrum Lanner to the subtle and complex Ravel, engrossed the attention of the audience from this point forward. It may have been an embarrassment of riches, but the voice of Johann Strauss through a full symphony orchestra for once failed to allure us. Some more casual hearing, a beer garden, say, evokes without a thought the charm of these waltzes. Somehow the virtuoso orchestra steamrollers them. After the orchestration of the Prokofieff, and with the knowledge of the Ravel to come, they sounded prosy. And surely they are not that.

We shall venture to say that there were as many opinions of this concert as there were pairs of ears to listen, for there was nothing on the program that could bewilder or confuse anybody. There may have been those who suffered the Prokofieff for the sake of the waltzes. At least they had their reward. For us the high point of this ingenious concert came with "Peter and the Wolf," whence the spirit departed only to discover that it could not postpone a newspaper deadline to wait for re-awakening with the Ravel!

B. Trans

MUSIC

Feb. 2/39

Symphony Orchestra Does a Few Turns

Pension Fund Concert Employs A Few of the Theatrical Arts

By MOSES SMITH

The elaborate program presented in Symphony Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky was a sort of dignified high jinks, if such a contradiction in terms will be permitted. That is to say, the program was presented for the most part with the utmost seriousness and thereby achieved more humor, which was implicit in several numbers, than if the performers had attempted to clown them. Thus the joke in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, which consists in the fact that the members of the orchestra tip-toe off the stage one by one as the others go on playing, came off as well last night as if it had never been told before.

The presentation of the Symphony, with all the performers in costume, seated before candle-lit desks, and with a modest mise en scene to aid illusion, had rather more of the atmosphere of the theater than is customarily associated with either the Symphony Orchestra or Symphony Hall itself. In fact, the better part of a page of the printed program was consumed in listing the "credits" for this performance and for the subsequent performance of Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz."

If the latter, played before a surrealist colored curtain, did not fare so well as the Symphony it seemed partly because the little orchestra under the direction of Mr. Burgin was either too jazzy or not jazzy enough; partly because Gruenberg's musical setting, especially the earlier sections, is a little too strained for effectiveness either as theater or as concert-hall entertainment; and largely because the solo tenor, Colin O'More, who is an able singer did not convey the essential text of Vachel Lindsay clearly. The size of Symphony Hall and the competition of the orchestra being what they were, though, some of the difficulty might have been obviated if the programs had contained the sung text.

For the performance of Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," first heard here under the composer's direction last season, the musicians doffed the natty white night-club coats employed in "The Daniel Jazz," and the audience saw the familiar stage and familiar disposition of instrumentalists. With Richard Hale to serve as admirable narrator and the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky plying their ablest talents, the performance once more recreated the rich flavors of the piece. Mr. Hale's seriousness of utterance was exactly the right approach for the adult audience, who laughed in a way that is not seemly at the usual symphony concert. Such presentation would also be right for children, who would take the whole thing dreadfully seriously.

The program, which was long as well as richly varied, was made even longer by the necessary "scene-shifting" after the first and second numbers. As a result, the second half of the program, devoted to an exceptionally interesting summary of the waltz, began at a time after the average symphony concerts has been completed. The summary, following chronological order, began with "Die Schoenbrunner" by Lanner, proceeded to "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" by Strauss, paused for a sentimental note on "Valse triste" by Sibelius and ended with Ravel's massive "La valse," which is almost like a waltz to end all waltzes.

The Viennese waltzes and the Sibelius piece, stuff of the Pops repertory, were played with the consummate artistry and intensity of the musicians at their best. Anything less than their best, one may venture, would scarcely have kept the great majority of the large and fashionable audience in their seats to hear a characteristically brilliant performance of "La valse," beginning at about eleven o'clock.

Today

141

B. Globe Feb. 2/39

Notable Audience at Symphony Hall

Few Will Ever Forget the Pension Fund Concert

Few of the music lovers who filled Symphony Hall last night for the 83d concert in aid of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund will ever forget the Haydn "Farewell" Symphony, complete with 18th century costumes and wigs and played by candlelight beneath a great crystal chandelier. Applause parted the curtains a dozen times on the bowing "Haydn" (whom Dr. Koussevitzky resembled in remarkable degree), before the enthusiastic audience would allow the program to continue with amusing "Daniel Jazz."

Here also costumes added to the festive spirit of the Gruenberg, for which John Holabird's imaginative screen made a background, and thoroughly enjoying itself, the large audience applauded generously and settled back for the much anticipated "Peter and the Wolf" which, beautifully coordinated by Dr. Koussevitzky and narrator Richard Hale, more than came up to expectations.

Glimpsed in the notable attendance—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird and their debutante daughter, Diana, Mrs. Bird's slim black sheath topped by a scarlet wool jacket, Diana's dark beauty set off by a wrap of portrait red velvet; Mr. and Mrs. Albert Cameron Burrage and their debutante daughter, Nancy, Mrs. Burrage with diamonds sparkling above her lovely plum-colored gown; Daniel A. de Menocal and his debutante daughter Esmee, furs over her pleated wine color frock; Mrs. Chatfield Whitman, sables over her suave black and scarlet gown, arriving with the Harrison Reynolds; Mrs. William B. Long and her daughter, Polly, Mrs. Long's shimmering silver-blue lame most becoming, Polly's pale French blue worn with a little matching wing tucked in her dark hair; debutante Mary West, a fox coat to the hem of her simple wool dress, strolling in the lobby with Doris Foote, whose black velvet coat with its hood lined in pale pink taffeta covered a fascinating pale gray and jade color crepe; Mr. and Mrs. Gorham Brooks, Mr. and Mrs. George Rice, emerald touches on her svelte black, and Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Wheelers.

Others of the huge audience that stayed to make the hall ring with still more applause after the brilliant Ravel waltz brought the generous program to a close were Mrs. J. Gardner Coolidge and her debutante daughter, Natalie, in their favorite front row seats in the first balcony; Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and her two daughters, Jane with a checked top to her Parisian dinner dress, Mrs. William C. Cox, lovely in a square-necked fuchsia gown, her small daughter, Jane, gravely intent on each number, sure of just what was coming, her round brown velvet bonnet turned back from her charming small face above a matching brown velvet frock; Mrs. Richard Fay and her daughter, Mrs. Irving Garfield, Mrs. Fay wrapped in furs over a deep red gown, John Profit squiring Janet Simonds, bronze-color orchids on the white fur of her black velvet wrap; Betty Albers and tall fiance, John Sabine, her exquisite blonde head set off by a bodice of pale pink and silver topping slim black velvet.

And still others—Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, a cape of mink over her arm and a mink coat over her chic fringed black; Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane Jr., Charlotte Rantoul, Barbara Bremer, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace M. Scudder, Anne Motley, Rosamond Pier in a merry foursome, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Sears, her titian hair set off by a champagne-color dress; Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. Francis P. Sears with furs over a flower print; Dorothy Wightman, Lala Withington, Anne Peabody, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mrs. John Bottomley and daughter, Ellen, and many, many more.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 25 1939

Music

Koussevitzky Uses the Magnificent Boston Symphony to Create All Kinds of Musical Weather at the Metropolitan.—Haydn, Debussy and Sibelius Assist

By G. Y. Loveridge

Winds and tides of music swept through the Metropolitan Theatre last night, powered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and directed in their going and coming by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It was the kind of musical weather that everybody talks about and nobody even wants to do anything about, except have more of it.

The evening began with playful and well-mannered breezes fashioned by Haydn, proceeded to the mystic seas and skies of Debussy, and ended with thunderbolts from the hands of Sibelius. A magnificent climate it was that Dr. Koussevitzky contrived.

The Londoners were rightly fond of Haydn, when he wrote such symphonies as that in B-flat, No. 102, for them. The formal grace and effervescent humor of it survive the fashions and the wear of decades, as the applause of the audience last night made evident. Dr. Kussevitzky gave it muscles, especially in the minuet, which seemed a dance of giants at times; and in the first and last movements old Papa Haydn made some vigorous bounds. Whether he intended his symphony to go like that, nobody knows. If he did, it is 10 to one he couldn't have found an orchestra to play it that way in his time. The largo introduction and the slow second movement were in strong and effective contrast to the display of physical vitality that characterized the performance.

Then, to "La Mer." Men and women who go down to the sea in music, like particularly to have Dr. Koussevitzky at the helm; these orchestral sketches are among the finest of his revelations. Whether, as some say, this music is meant to represent the actual sea in various humors, or, as others say, it reflects the mysterious voyaging of the mind, matters not. One may find herein cold mists and vapors rising from fiddles and tympani, waves in the violins and brasses, even strange flute, oboe and English horn creatures swimming about among the cold shadows of the lower strings; or one may find no namable thing at all, but only that potent mood and magic of the sea that bewitched Melville and Conrad, and, through them, the rest of us.

The orchestra discoursed these mysteries oracularly, which is to say that everybody could understand them in his own way and everybody could be both right and different. Dr. Koussevitzky called forth all the colors and powers of the ensemble; he guided the "dialogue du vent et de la mere" into a brilliant turmoil.

The Sibelius symphony in E-flat, No. 5, came after intermission. Through the smoke that gets in your eyes, ears and lungs, one could perceive Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, like the fiery Frank and furious Hun of the poem, charging the music. Slowly the symphony got into motion, with horns and tympani, with flutes, oboes, clarinets voicing a motive. It is a curious but irresistible symphony, at times seeming likely to become a Strauss waltz, at other times depicting a giant tossing motive-pebbles into the air, but gradually builds up to a compelling conclusion.

The tone of the orchestra was magnificent, and the persuasiveness of the reading such that one was transported beyond notes and sounds to those rugged and yet romantic heights that Sibelius inhabits. The reiterated off chords that end the story came all too soon.

Miss Marjorie R. "Even" Stevens
Voted Most Popular of

Buffalo, N. Y.

B. Trans. Feb. 2/39

Large Audience At Symphony for Benefit Concert

The audience that filled Symphony Hall to the rafters last evening was treated to a varied program of musical entertainment. From the stately "Farewell" Symphony of Haydn, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky appeared costumed as the composer, through the colorful "Daniel Jazz" by Gruenberg, and on to the lilting waltzes of Strauss and Sibelius, it was carried through an interesting concert. Appropriately named a Concert Extraordinaire, its proceeds will aid the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund.

A very young member of the audience was Miss Jane Cox, who attended with her mother, Mrs. William C. Cox. Her grandmother and aunt, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and Miss Jane Bancroft were there, the latter in a shirtmaker style dinner gown with a black and white checked bodice.

Debutantes noted throughout the audience were Miss Diana Bird in deep purple, who attended with her mother, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., in a black gown brightened with a flame colored jacket; Miss Natalie Coolidge, Miss Nancy Burrage, in black, Miss Mary West, Miss Marietta Withington and Miss Margot Clark.

Professor and Mrs. Hamilton C. MacDougall came in from Wellesley for the evening. Miss Betty Albers, in a dinner gown of black velvet topped with a bodice of the palest pink, was seen chatting with two friends during intermission. Mrs. Whitney Hale wore one of the few upswept coiffures with her black gown and white bolero jacket.

Mrs. William B. Long and her daughter, Miss Polly Long, attended, the latter in pale blue, and a narrow band of mink edged the collar of Miss Ellen Bottomley's vivid flame colored velvet wrap. Sitting in a front seat was Mrs. Jaffray deHauteville Bell, who wore a sparkling tiara with her net gown of blue fringed shawl.

Neglected Music

To the Editor of The Herald:

After Toscanini's memorable performance of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," a number of us were constrained to inquire why this work should never have been offered, in our memory, to this generation of Boston audiences. For surely we do not lack a viola virtuoso comparable to Mr. Primrose, nor is it likely that the revelation of this symphony would require a Toscanini and no other.

For years our acquaintance with modern music has been cultivated sedulously with persistent patience on the part of the worthies responsible for our symphony programs. It has been something of a painful process, yet often we have been persuaded, reluctantly and in spite of ourselves. Could not the same technique be employed to the same effect in favor of great music of the past which has suffered neglect?

It has been suggested that Berlioz is not popular with Boston audiences, yet all that we have been permitted to hear of him have been "The Roman Carnival," the Symphonie Fantastique, and two performances of "Faust." Even with these works, a closer acquaintance might well prove rewarding; with "Harold in Italy" there would be no question at all.

ELAINE WESTALL GOULD.
Jamaica Plain.

Herald Feb 2

B. Herald

MUSIC

Feb. 2/39

PENSION FUND CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a concert last night in Symphony hall for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Colin O'More, tenor, was a soloist; and Richard Hale, narrator, assisted. The program was as follows:

Haydn—"Farewell" Symphony No. 45.
Gruenberg—"The Daniel Jazz" from a poem of Vachel Lindsay.
Prokofieff—"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale.
Lanner—"Die Schoenbrunner," Waltzes.
J. Strauss—"Wiener Blu," Waltzes; "Fruehlingstimmen," Waltzes.
Sibelius—Valse Trieste.
Ravel—"La Valse," Choreographic Poem.

In the interests of its Pension Fund the Boston Symphony performed some unheard-of high jinks last night. Not only was 18th century dress, complete with bag wig, de rigeur for the Haydn Symphony, but also Gruenberg's "Daniel Jaz" was played on a movable platform in mess jackets and carnations by Richard Burgin and his merry men. There was also a mildly surrealist backdrop and, for the Haydn, more credits in the program than would serve a high school performance of "The Merchant of Venice." Like all good times, this one may have been more enjoyable in anticipation than in the actual event; but there could be no denying the spirit and good will that went into all the varied proceedings.

The 18th century atmosphere was most agreeably contrived, and Haydn was no less and no more Haydn because of it. It made a charming picture that did not err in the matter of taste. Dr. Koussevitzky was a much more authentic figure than he was when he appeared in this garb some years ago; and the orchestra has certainly not deteriorated in the meanwhile! The Gruenberg dates a bit, since we have met with and endured far stranger horrors of jazz since its period. Mr. O'More sang with a will, even if the effect was not as amusing as it was obviously intended to be.

The most interesting part of this concert was to observe what Dr. Koussevitzky did with "Peter and the Wolf." It was a much sprucer performance than that which Prokofieff, himself, conducted last year. The tempo was quicker, there were no drags, and the whole piece was enormously improved by being coordinated in this alert fashion. It was also apparent that Dr. Koussevitzky had had something to do with simplifying Mr. Richard Hale's narration of the story. At least that is a fair assumption, for great slices of affectation have been carved off of this aspect of the performance. A certain irreverent joy has gone from our appreciation of Prokofieff's delightful work, as of the time we first heard it; but undoubtedly the work itself is the gainer.

The "waltz," from the rather humdrum Lanner to the subtle and complex Ravel, engrossed the attention of the audience from this point forward. It may have been an embarrassment of riches, but the voice of Johann Strauss through a full symphony orchestra for once failed to allure us. Some more casual hearing, a beer garden, say, evokes without a thought the charm of these waltzes. Somehow the virtuoso orchestra steamrollers them. After the orchestration of the Prokofieff, and with the knowledge of the Ravel to come, they sounded prosy. And surely they are not that.

We shall venture to say that there were as many opinions of this concert as there were pairs of ears to listen, for there was nothing on the program that could bewilder or confuse anybody. There may have been those who suffered the Prokofieff for the sake of the waltzes. At least they had their reward. For us the high point of this ingenious concert came with "Peter and the Wolf," whence the spirit departed only to discover that it could not postpone a newspaper deadline to wait for re-awakening with the Ravel!

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 25 1939

Music

Koussevitzky Uses the Magnificent Boston Symphony to Create All Kinds of Musical Weather at the Metropolitan.—Haydn, Debussy and Sibelius Assist

By G. Y. Loveridge

Winds and tides of music swept through the Metropolitan Theatre last night, powered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and directed in their going and coming by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It was the kind of musical weather that everybody talks about and nobody even wants to do anything about, except have more of it.

The evening began with playful and well-mannered breezes fashioned by Haydn, proceeded to the mystic seas and skies of Debussy, and ended with thunderbolts from the hands of Sibelius. A magnificent climate it was that Dr. Koussevitzky contrived.

The Londoners were rightly fond of Haydn, when he wrote such symphonies as that in B-flat, No. 102, for them. The formal grace and effervescent humor of it survive the fashions and the wear of decades, as the applause of the audience last night made evident. Dr. Kussevitzky gave it muscles, especially in the minuet, which seemed a dance of giants at times; and in the first and last movements old Papa Haydn made some vigorous bounds. Whether he intended his symphony to go like that, nobody knows. If he did, it is 10 to one he couldn't have found an orchestra to play it that way in his time. The largo introduction and the slow second movement were in strong and effective contrast to the display of physical vitality that characterized the performance.

Then, to "La Mer." Men and women who go down to the sea in music, like particularly to have Dr. Koussevitzky at the helm; these orchestral sketches are among the finest of his revelations. Whether, as some say, this music is meant to represent the actual sea in various humors, or, as others say, it reflects the mysterious voyaging of the mind, matters not. One may find herein cold mists and vapors rising from fiddles and tympani, waves in the violins and brasses, even strange flute, oboe and English horn creatures swimming about among the cold shadows of the lower strings; or one may find no namable thing at all, but only that potent mood and magic of the sea that bewitched Melville and Conrad, and, through them, the rest of us.

The orchestra discoursed these mysteries oracularly, which is to say that everybody could understand them in his own way and everybody could be both right and different. Dr. Koussevitzky called forth all the colors and powers of the ensemble; he guided the "dialogue du vent et de la mere" into a brilliant turmoil.

The Sibelius symphony in E-flat, No. 5, came after intermission. Through the smoke that gets in your eyes, ears and lungs, one could perceive Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, like the fiery Frank and furious Hun of the poem, charging the music. Slowly the symphony got into motion, with horns and tympani, with flutes, oboes, clarinets voicing a motive. It is a curious but irresistible symphony, at times seeming likely to become a Strauss waltz, at other times depicting a giant tossing motive-pebbles into the air, but gradually builds up to a compelling conclusion.

The tone of the orchestra was magnificent, and the persuasiveness of the reading such that one was transported beyond notes and sounds to those rugged and yet romantic heights that Sibelius inhabits. The reiterated off chords that end the story came all too soon.

If we had been a fiddler with the orchestra we should have gone home, chucked the Guarnerius under the sofa and said to our wife. "Ma, I'm dog-tired."

But as a listener, we should have been glad to hear the program over again then and there.

B. Trav

MUSIC

Feb. 2/39

Symphony Orchestra Does a Few Turns

Pension Fund Concert Employs A Few of the Theatrical Arts

By MOSES SMITH

The elaborate program presented in Symphony Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky was a sort of dignified high jinks, if such a contradiction in terms will be permitted. That is to say, the program was presented for the most part with the utmost seriousness and thereby achieved more humor, which was implicit in several numbers, than if the performers had attempted to clown them. Thus the joke in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, which consists in the fact that the members of the orchestra tip-toe off the stage one by one as the others go on playing, came off as well last night as if it had never been told before.

The presentation of the Symphony, with all the performers in costume, seated before candle-lit desks, and with a modest mise en scene to aid illusion, had rather more of the atmosphere of the theater than is customarily associated with either the Symphony Orchestra or Symphony Hall itself. In fact, the better part of a page of the printed program was consumed in listing the "credits" for this performance and for the subsequent performance of Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz."

If the latter, played before a surrealist colored curtain, did not fare so well as the Symphony it seemed partly because the little orchestra under the direction of Mr. Burgin was either too jazzy or not jazzy enough; partly because Gruenberg's musical setting, especially the earlier sections, is a little too strained for effectiveness either as theater or as concert-hall entertainment; and largely because the solo tenor, Colin O'More, who is an able singer did not convey the essential text of Vachel Lindsay clearly. The size of Symphony Hall and the competition of the orchestra being what they were, though some of the difficulty might have been obviated if the programs had contained the sung text.

For the performance of Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," first heard here under the composer's direction last season, the musicians doffed the natty white night-club coats employed in "The Daniel Jazz," and the audience saw the familiar stage and familiar disposition of instrumentalists. With Richard Hale to serve as admirable narrator and the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky plying their ablest talents, the performance once more recreated the rich flavors of the piece. Mr. Hale's seriousness of utterance was exactly the right approach for the adult audience, who laughed in a way that is not seemly at the usual symphony concert. Such presentation would also be right for children, who would take the whole thing dreadfully seriously.

The program, which was long as well as richly varied, was made even longer by the necessary "scene-shifting" after the first and second numbers. As a result, the second half of the program, devoted to an exceptionally interesting summary of the waltz, began at a time after the average symphony concerts has been completed. The summary, following chronological order, began with "Die Schoenbrunner" by Lanner, proceeded to "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" by Strauss, paused for a sentimental note on "Valse triste" by Sibelius and ended with Ravel's massive "La valse," which is almost like a waltz to end all waltzes.

The Viennese waltzes and the Sibelius piece, stuff of the Pops repertory, were played with the consummate artistry and intensity of the musicians at their best. Anything less than their best, one may venture, would scarcely have kept the great majority of the large and fashionable audience in their seats to hear a characteristically brilliant performance of "La valse," beginning at about eleven o'clock.

Buffalo, N. Y.

B. Trav Feb. 2/39

Large Audience At Symphony for Benefit Concert

The audience that filled Symphony Hall to the rafters last evening was treated to a varied program of musical entertainment. From the stately "Farewell" Symphony of Haydn, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky appeared costumed as the composer, through the colorful "Daniel Jazz" by Gruenberg, and on to the lilting waltzes of Strauss and Sibelius, it was carried through an interesting concert. Appropriately named a Concert Extraordinaire, its proceeds will aid the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund.

A very young member of the audience was Miss Jane Cox, who attended with her mother, Mrs. William C. Cox. Her grandmother and aunt, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and Miss Jane Bancroft were there, the latter in a shirtmaker style dinner gown with a black and white checked bodice.

Debutantes noted throughout the audience were Miss Diana Bird in deep purple, who attended with her mother, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., in a black gown brightened with a flame colored jacket; Miss Natalie Coolidge, Miss Nancy Burrage, in black, Miss Mary West, Miss Marietta Withington and Miss Margot Clark.

Professor and Mrs. Hamilton C. MacDougall came in from Wellesley for the evening. Miss Betty Albers, in a dinner gown of black velvet topped with a bodice of the palest pink, was seen chatting with two friends during intermission. Mrs. Whitney Hale wore one of the few upswept coiffures with her black gown and white bolero jacket.

Mrs. William B. Long and her daughter, Miss Polly Long, attended, the latter in pale blue, and a narrow band of mink edged the collar of Miss Ellen Bottomley's vivid flame colored velvet wrap. Sitting in a front seat was Mrs. Jaffray deHauteville Bell, who wore a sparkling tiara with her net gown of blue fringed shawl.

Neglected Music

To the Editor of The Herald:

After Toscanini's memorable performance of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," a number of us were constrained to inquire why this work should never have been offered, in our memory, to this generation of Boston audiences. For surely we do not lack a viola virtuoso comparable to Mr. Primrose, nor is it likely that the revelation of this symphony would require a Toscanini and no other.

For years our acquaintance with modern music has been cultivated sedulously with persistent patience on the part of the worthies responsible for our symphony programs. It has been something of a painful process, yet often we have been persuaded, reluctantly and in spite of ourselves. Could not the same technique be employed to the same effect in favor of great music of the past which has suffered neglect?

It has been suggested that Berlioz is not popular with Boston audiences, yet all that we have been permitted to hear of him have been "The Roman Carnival," the Symphonie Fantastique, and two performances of "Faust." Even with these works, a closer acquaintance might well prove rewarding; with "Harold in Italy" there would be no question at all.

ELAINE WESTALL GOULD.
Jamaica Plain.

Herald Feb 2

141

Today

B. Globe Feb. 2/39

Notable Audience at Symphony Hall

Few Will Ever Forget the Pension Fund Concert

Few of the music lovers who filled Symphony Hall last night for the 83d concert in aid of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund will ever forget the Haydn "Farewell" Symphony, complete with 18th century costumes and wigs and played by candlelight beneath a great crystal chandelier. Applause parted the curtains a dozen times on the bowing "Haydn" (whom Dr. Koussevitzky resembled in remarkable degree), before the enthusiastic audience would allow the program to continue with amusing "Daniel Jazz."

Here also costumes added to the festive spirit of the Gruenberg, for which John Holabird's imaginative screen made a background, and thoroughly enjoying itself, the large audience applauded generously and settled back for the much anticipated "Peter and the Wolf" which, beautifully coordinated by Dr. Koussevitzky and narrator Richard Hale, more than came up to expectations.

Glimpsed in the notable attendance—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird and their debutante daughter, Diana, Mrs. Bird's slim black sheath topped by a scarlet wool jacket, Diana's dark beauty set off by a wrap of portrait red velvet; Mr. and Mrs. Albert Cameron Burrage and their debutante daughter, Nancy, Mrs. Burrage with diamonds sparkling above her lovely plum-colored gown; Daniel A. de Menocal and his debutante daughter Esmee, furs over her pleated wine color frock; Mrs. Chatfield Whitman, sables over her suave black and scarlet gown, arriving with the Harrison Reynolds; Mrs. William B. Long and her daughter, Polly, Mrs. Long's shimmering silver-blue lame most becoming, Polly's pale French blue worn with a little matching wing tucked in her dark hair; debutante Mary West, a fox coat to the hem of her simple wool dress, strolling in the lobby with Doris Foote, whose black velvet coat with its hood lined in pale pink taffeta covered a fascinating pale gray and jade color crepe; Mr. and Mrs. Gorham Brooks, Mr. and Mrs. George Rice, emerald touches on her svelte black, and Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Wheelers.

Others of the huge audience that stayed to make the hall ring with still more applause after the brilliant Ravel waltz brought the generous program to a close were Mrs. J. Gardner Coolidge and her debutante daughter, Natalie, in their favorite front row seats in the first balcony; Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and her two daughters, Jane with a checked top to her Parisian dinner dress, Mrs. William C. Cox, lovely in a square-necked fuchsia gown, her small daughter, Jane, gravely intent on each number, sure of just what was coming, her round brown velvet bonnet turned back from her charming small face above a matching brown velvet frock; Mrs. Richard Fay and her daughter, Mrs. Irving Garfield, Mrs. Fay wrapped in furs over a deep red gown, John Profit squiring Janet Simonds, bronze-color orchids on the white fur of her black velvet wrap; Betty Albers and tall fiance, John Sabine, her exquisite blonde head set off by a bodice of pale pink and silver topping slim black velvet.

And still others—Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, a cape of mink over her arm and a mink coat over her chic fringed black; Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane Jr., Charlotte Rantoul, Barbara Bremer, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace M. Scudder, Anne Motley, Rosamond Pier in a merry foursome, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Sears, her titian hair set off by a champagne-color dress; Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. Francis P. Sears with furs over a flower print; Dorothy Wightman, Lala Withington, Anne Peabody, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mrs. John Bottomley and daughter, Ellen, and many, many more.

Symphony Pension Concert Gives Muse of Tragedy an Evening Off

B Globe "FAREWELL SYMPHONY" Feb. 2/39
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in costume as Joseph Haydn, conducting.

The Tragic Muse had an evening off and Austerity was carefully locked up in one of the storerooms at Symphony Hall last night as the Boston Symphony Orchestra cut loose in the diversion of an "Extraordinary Concert." The occasion was a benefit for the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra. Usually the pension fund concerts are large-scale affairs with orchestra and singers presenting some big choral score. But this one was intended to be different. And so it was.

In the first place, when the large and expensively attired audience that filled the hall reached their seats, there was no lighted stage with musicians tuning instruments. Instead, the big red curtains were drawn. These presently parted to reveal Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and a portion of the orchestra dressed in the elegance and white wigs of 18th Century costume. Or was it Joseph Haydn, the music master of Prince Esterhazy who stood there, ready to begin his "Farewell Symphony?"

Like First Performance

Amid a setting of wreathed columns, and gilt chairs gleaming faintly in the subdued light of candelabra, Haydn's familiar musical joke was played. Dr. Koussevitzky, resplendent in a costume especially designed for him by Robert Edmond Jones, conducted from his place at the spinet—the keys of which, however, he seldom touched.

As each player finished his part, he blew out the candle upon his music rack and left the stage. The "Farewell Symphony" was a musical joke although the score is sombre rather than gay. The point was that Haydn wanted a vacation. While others of his patron's staff were permitted leave, Haydn was kept busy at his duties. When the Prince saw the musicians leaving during the first performance of the work, he took the hint. Haydn got his vacation.

From the 18th Century the concert swung quickly down to the 20th and Louis Gruenberg's unbuttoned setting of Vachel Lindsay's poem "The Daniel Jazz." Richard Burgin conducted, with Colin O'More singing in spirited fashion the difficult tenor solo. Appropriately, the small orchestra concerned abandoned tail coats for white mess jackets, which fitted in nicely against the background of John Holabird's vividly modernistic screen, designed for the occasion. To lend a further modern touch, the orchestra was seated on a moving platform. It seemed that symphony had taken a lesson from Broadway revue.

"Peter and the Wolf"

Richard Hale spoke with relish the part of the Narrator in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," a setting of a Russian fairy tale about a big, bad wolf who eats a duck whole and lives to regret it after little Peter and the intrepid hunters have carted him off to the zoo. Each animal, and Peter, himself, is characterized by a theme played by a specific instrument. This is one of Prokofieff's best light pieces. The orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky and the audience all enjoyed it.

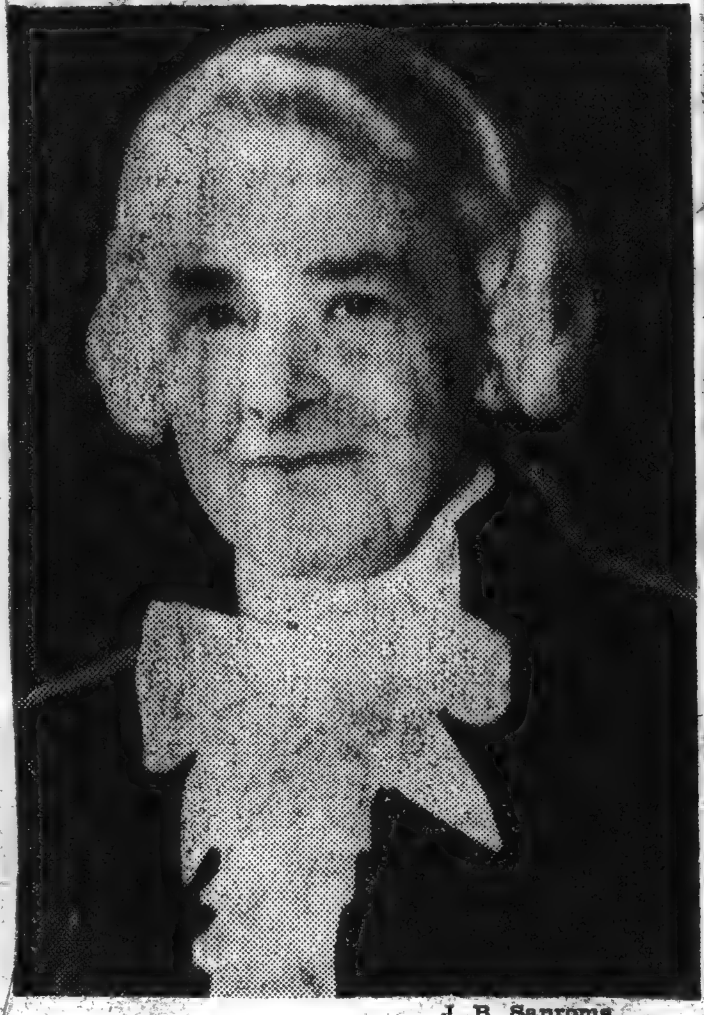
After intermission the program veered to a short history of the waltz, beginning with Lanner's Viennese "Schoenbrunner" waltzes, continuing with the "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring" by Johann Strauss, and ending with Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's sleekly orchestrated "La Valse."

The concert was extremely enjoyable, as the hearty and continuing applause proved. Incidentally, the same program will be heard, again to benefit the pension fund, at Carnegie Hall in New York city next week. C. W. D.

N.Y. Tribune

FEBRUARY 1939

s of This Week

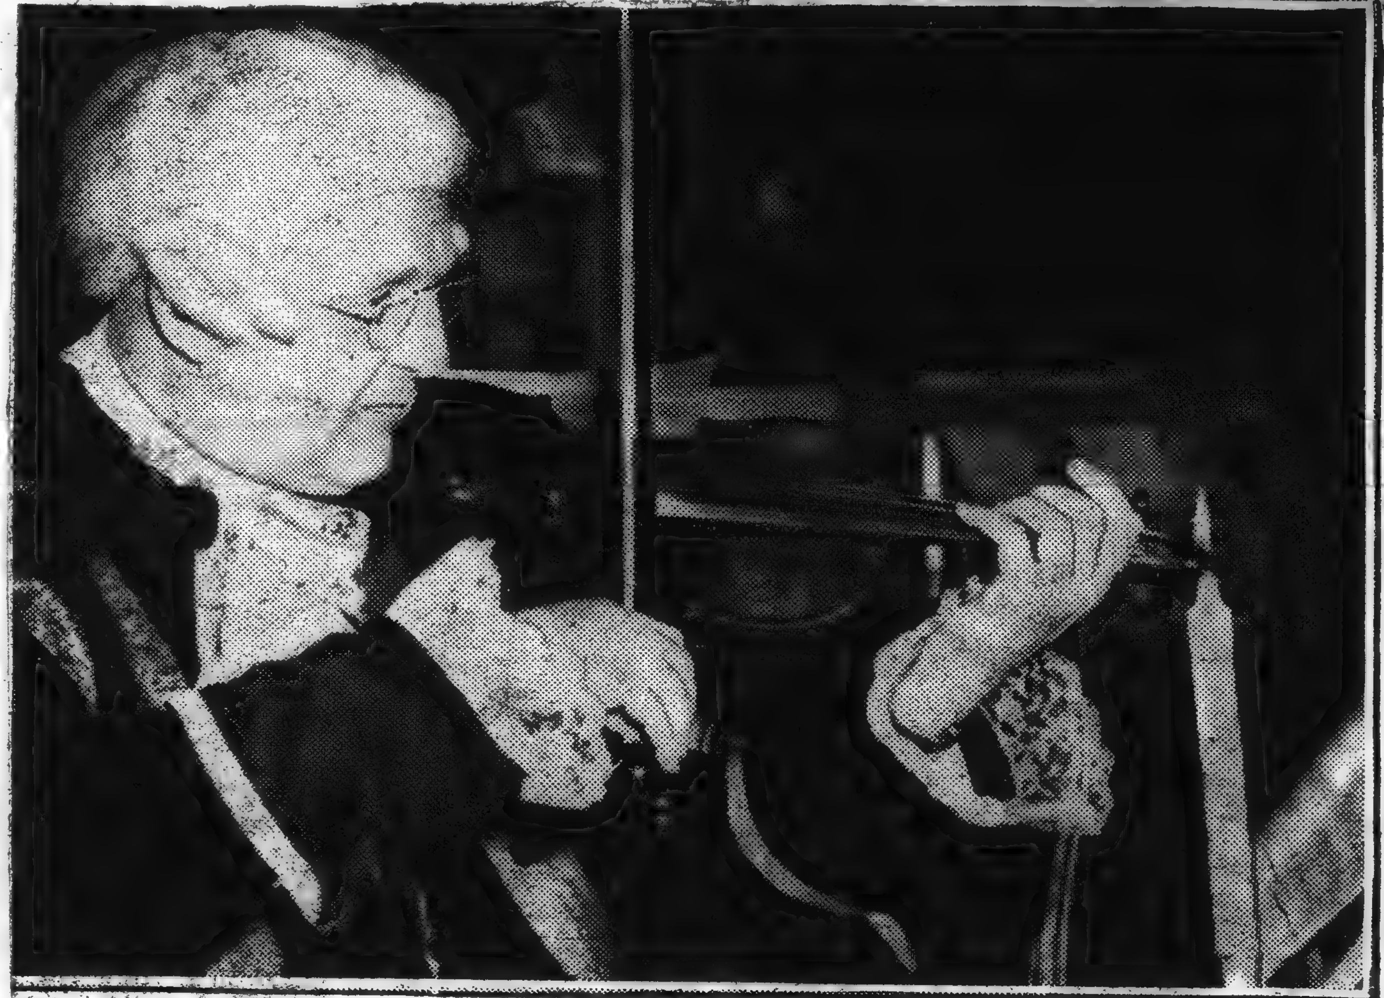


J. B. Sanroma

pson in the title role of "Thais" Friday night;

Symphony concert

Concert is Aid



(Daily Record Photo)

DIRECTS Serge Koussevitzky, top, taking stand before start of Haydn Farewell Symphony, in opening number of the Pension Fund concert in aid of retired musicians, at Symphony Hall last night. Left, Gaston Elcus, first violinist, plays in candlelight. All musicians were dressed in costumes of Haydn's period.

BERKSHIRE ACADEMY

N.Y. Times Feb. 5/39

The sixth Berkshire Symphony Festival to be held Aug. 3-13 at Tanglewood in Stockbridge, Mass., will consist of six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. These will be presented in two series. The first series is scheduled for Aug. 3, 5 and 6, and the second for Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

The programs for the festival will be arranged by Dr. Koussevitzky from the following list of compositions: the Second and Third symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third symphonies of Brahms, Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony, the Second and Fifth symphonies of Sibelius, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade," Debussy's" "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra" and others.

Although busied with its program for next Summer's festival, the festival authorities are deeply concerned with the objective of creating a musical center, which it hopes to inaugurate in 1940. The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., with this goal in view, are giving serious thought to the development of the buildings at Tanglewood in anticipation of this academy project.

The plans for an academy were outlined in the address made by Bentley W. Warren, on behalf of the trustees of the orchestra, at the dedicatory exercises for the festival shed last Summer. Mr. Bentley then remarked: "We all hope the annual festival may be supplemented by a school, or academy, holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players. Tanglewood is the ideal location for such a center.

"This fortunate combination of circumstances will provide an excellent beginning for the realization of Dr. Koussevitzky's program. Indeed, the greatest need will be for scholarships. No one can doubt that from some source the necessary funds will be forthcoming; and it is expected that the detailed arrangement for the school will be completed so that its first session may precede the Berkshire Festival of 1940."

In preparation for the festival this August the trustees are making such needed improvements as draining parking areas, installing lighting and laying out new roads. They also hope to provide the shed with an emergency enclosure, in case sufficient funds are raised.

According to the latest announcement, 90 per cent of the boxes have been subscribed for the forthcoming festival and at each of the six concerts audiences of more than 2,000 persons already are assured. Subscriptions are being received for both of the weekly series.

143

C.S. Monitor - Feb. 2/39

Symphony 'Goes to Town' for Pension Fund

By a Staff Photographer

Symphony, waltz, or jazz—All are easy for them

Left: Pierre Delescluse and Gaston Dufresne, bass viol players. Right: Lloyd Stonestreet and Henry Erkelens, violinists. Inset: E. Panenka (bassoon), and Willem Valkenier (French horn).

Whether in a Haydn symphony of the Eighteenth Century, a series of waltzes from the Nineteenth, or some jazz of the Twentieth—the Boston Symphony Orchestra "went to town" at Symphony Hall, last evening, for the Pension Fund. Appropriate to the event was the costume thereof. So it was not surprising to find Dr. Koussevitzky, as Papa Haydn, and his musicians looking as stiff and proper in their wigs and knee breeches as even an Eighteenth Century prince could have wished.

Exploring through the centuries backstage at Symphony Hall, a Monitor photographer snapped Pierre Delescluse and Gaston Dufresne studying a bass viol passage and looking as if wigs and lace ruffles were everyday affairs; E. Panenka (bassoon) and Willem Valkenier (French horn), also garbed for the Haydn symphony; and, finally, a pair of Richard Burgin's "swing cats," Henry Erkelens and Lloyd Stonestreet, preparing for some hot licks in Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz."

(The Pension Fund Concert, which will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, New York City, on Feb. 8, is reviewed on Page 10.)

C.S. Monitor Feb. 2/39

From Haydn to Jazz

By L. A. Sloper

Putting aside its dignity, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night went in for having fun. For the benefit of its Pension Fund, it offered in Symphony Hall a "Concert Extraordinaire" which traversed the years and styles from Haydn to Jazz, and from the waltz to modernist wit. In doing so, it went to the theater for costumes and scenery, and transformed the stage of Symphony Hall into an eighteenth-century salon and then a modern dance hall. A large audience was delighted with the show.

First the parting curtains revealed Dr. Koussevitzky and a small group of players gathered round a spinet. The musicians were dressed in eighteenth-century costume, and their desks were lighted by candles. Obviously, this was for the "Farewell" Symphony of Haydn.

After Dr. Koussevitzky, in the guise of the composer, had blown out the last candle, the stage was transformed into a likeness of a modern dance-hall platform, with a modernistic back screen representing Daniel in the lions' den. The players now were garbed in the white mess jackets of jazz players, with red roses in their buttonholes. Before them, in black dinner jackets, stood Mr. Burgin as conductor and Colin O'More as vocalist. The number was Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz," on the poem of Vachel Lindsay.

* * *

Thereafter, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra resumed their normal garb and the platform its usual aspect for Prokofieff's Fairy Tale, "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as narrator, and for waltzes by Lanner, Strauss, Sibelius ("Valse Triste") and Ravel ("La Valse") which were scheduled to follow the intermission.

The Haydn "Farewell" was played in costume several years ago at a "Surprise" concert for a benefit. Before last night's concert some rumblings were heard because this time Dr. Koussevitzky was representing Hadyn, in a costume designed for the occasion by Robert Edmond Jones; this has been regarded as disrespectful to the composer. But would not the only possible disrespect come from frivolous deportment or a bad performance?

There was nothing of the sort last night. Everybody behaved with exemplary formality, and the performance was excellent. Dr. Koussevitzky (no pianist) stood, except during the Adagio, before the spinet. Only at one point in the first movement did he lean over to pass his hands over the keyboard; but no sound could be heard from the instrument, and for the rest of the time he contented himself with conducting. At the end of the first movement the bewigged concertmaster neatly retrieved from the floor the conductor's lace handkerchief, which had fallen from his sleeve.

* * *

"The Daniel Jazz" was heard ten years ago in Jordan Hall from a small orchestra directed by Mr. Burgin, and with Mr. O'More for tenor soloist. Last night it seemed no less amusing than it had then. Mr. O'More as before reinforced his singing with bits of acting that seemed well suited to the music, and Mr. Burgin obtained a lively performance—remarkably lively for symphonists. The score is clever. The audience was particularly pleased with the roaring of the lions.

Prokofieff's Fairy Tale, repeated from a symphony concert of last season, also confirmed the good impression it had then made. If it is intended for children, then I am glad to enroll myself among them. The score is brilliant and the performance was delightful. Mr. Hale had exactly the right touch for the narrator.

The program is to be repeated in Carnegie Hall next Wednesday evening. New York is fortunate.

Bruckner and Brahms

By Alfred H. Meyer

The concerts of the week end bring to Symphony Hall a return of Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony. As all the world knows, it has been a commonplace these many years to speak and think of Bruckner as a "Wagner in symphony," to comment on his lengthy treatment of the classical forms, to recognize a new note in the "Brucknerian Adagio."

It is refreshing, then, to discover, in authoritative French sources, a different and rather novel treatment of the whole "cas Bruckner." M. Albert Bertelin, in his "Traité de Composition Musicale," a publication of the Schola Cantorum, begins his remarks about Bruckner and his Eighth Symphony by saying that "His artistic physiognomy approaches that of Brahms." Neither wrote for the theater. Both had the ideal of elaborating the modern symphony—but with opposing objectives.

Brahms studied folk song (continues M. Bertelin) and the old masters, avoided all "élan" and every species of vulgarity, wrote with masterful subtlety. Bruckner does homage to Wagner, deliberately seeks out brilliance (éclat), is prolix and writes in ample dimensions.

Less subtle than Brahms, Bruckner produces with the elements he uses a "more stable physiognomy" of the whole work. He gives to his developments an appearance of unity more forthright and unconstrained.

* * *

In Germany it is customary to place the names of Beethoven and Brahms side by side. But in at least one point Bruckner is nearer to Beethoven than is Brahms. Though Brahms is inspired by the architectural lines of Beethoven, he shows himself far more objective than the master of Bonn. One does not find in his work the qualities of high drama which characterize the symphonies of his great predecessor.

"Au contraire," Bruckner is essentially subjective. If Bruckner uses the ideas of Wagner, M. Bertelin states, he is actually influenced by him only very slightly; and supports his position by saying that while with Wagner harmony plays an "expressive role" of the first magnitude, with Bruckner harmony is secondary and it is his contrapuntal combinations that give the symphonies their essential character.

Turning to the Eighth Symphony, one finds the Brucknerian characteristics—rich, opulent, well-defined themes, which, however, are complete only when viewed as part of their context.

The first movement is in the traditional sonata form, the rhythmical (or first-theme) group in a mood of gloom or tragedy. The melodic (or second-theme) group is more cheerful, eventually turning toward solemnity. The development is complex. The recapitulation gives the thematic material new treatment, especially in the matter of instrumentation.

* * *

The prevailing dark character of the first movement makes it necessary (as in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony) that the Scherzo rather than the Adagio should follow. Its peasant-like character has won for it the appellation "Der deutsche Michel." In the Trio the awkward "Michel" (on the reputed authority of Bruckner himself) moons around in rustic surroundings.

The Adagio, the most extended and in some senses the most beautifully expressive in all the symphonies of Bruckner, proceeds in three huge, cumulative developments of its lavish thematic material. At the point of highest climax Bruckner pays homage to his master by quoting the Siegfried motive from Wagner's "Ring."

The Finale is true climax to the symphony as a whole. It is appropriate to its grandiose character that the second theme group should introduce chorale-like matter. The coda, goal of all that has gone before, recapitulates themes from all four movements.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 26 1939

Orchestra to Be Costumed for Program

Boston Symphony Members to Wear Eighteenth Century Finery for Playing of Haydn Piece Feb. 1.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening of the concert the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle-lighted music racks before them.

Koussevitzky at Spinet.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

Russian Novelty.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes, "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius's best known work, "Valse Triste."

Decorations of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 26 1939

Koussevitzky Plans Unusual Concert

Benefit for Pension Fund in Boston Feb. 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in eighteenth century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the concert extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Wednesday, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. A number of Berkshire music lovers will attend.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

To Conduct Like Haydn

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

Another Novelty

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

To Play Ravel's Waltz

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They range from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse." Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius's best known work, "Valse Triste."

Great care is being taken with the settings and costumes which some of the numbers call for. Dr. Koussevitzky's costume as Papa Haydn has been designed by Robert Edmond Jones, who is known for his pioneering with color movies in Hollywood as well as for his work in the New York theatre.

Decorations of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

The complete program is as follows:

Haydn .... Farewell Symphony
(performed in costume)
Gruenberg .... The Daniel Jazz
(after the poem by Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'More)
Prokofieff .... Peter and the Wolf
(Narrator: Richard Hale)

The Waltz

Lanner .... Die Schonbrunner
Strauss .. Vienna Blood, Voices of Spring
Sibelius .... Valse Triste
Ravel .... La Valse

144

HAYDN SYMPHONIES

Five Works That Have Been Restored by Alfred Einstein to Be Played

N.Y. Times: Feb. 5/39

By OLIN DOWNES

THE venerable Joseph Haydn, one of the boldest of musical innovators, who died in the year 1809, emerges today in the news. This is because of the original and energetic procedure of the New Friends of Music, who will inaugurate a series of orchestral concerts in Carnegie Hall, through a six-week period from Feb. 26 to April 2, when five Haydn symphonies (verified as the work of the Austrian master by Dr. Alfred Einstein, and by him restored to their original form) will be played, probably for the first time in public since the composer himself led their performances at the court of Esterhazy, approximately one hundred and fifty years ago.

This news, moreover, is calculated to be of vital importance to music, and not merely an adventure in the realm of the archaic. Haydn, accounted by many an impatient romantic of the nineteenth century as a conventional and well-behaved old gentleman who wrote pretty symphonies, was, as a matter of fact, an energetic and audacious experimentalist; therefore, a long time in arriving at maturity in his establishment for all time of the symphonic form.

* * *

If the five works soon to be heard represented the early years of Haydn's formative period as a symphonist, they might prove historical documents of importance, and little more. But these five come from Haydn's best period, after he had found himself as master of the symphonic form, and before the influence of Mozart had in some important respects modified, if it also had enriched, his style.

Of these five, one numbered 80, in D. minor, composed in 1783, when Haydn was 50, and not previously issued in score, was published by Dr. Alfred Einstein, the distinguished musicologist and critic, in the Universal Edition in 1937. The other symphonies are No. 67, composed about 1779 in Eisenstadt; No. 71, in B flat, composed before 1782 in the same place; No. 77, in the same key, composed in the same place within the next two years, and No. 87, in A major, composed in Eisenstadt, and known as the "Paris" symphony (No. 6), in 1786.

* * *

These symphonies, then, came in the period when Haydn was really the slave, though an honored and well-treated one, of the house of Esterhazy. It was a period of immense productiveness and fame that constantly spread beyond the confines of Haydn's place of service. The estate furnished ample facilities for the performance of all of Haydn's compositions. It also provided an orchestra of generous proportions for the period, with which Haydn could experiment daily and employ as the vehicle for his creative powers. His uniform was a handsome one. There were fishing and hunting on the estate, and such cooperation as Haydn needed from the other servants of his aristocratic master, and nothing to do but produce masterpieces. Haydn rebelled against certain of the actual facts of his servitude, but his master was a kind one, and also one who knew music. He fed and he guarded his composer more solicitously, if we may believe the record, than he did his butler, or even than rich folk of today guard their butlers. Under this treatment Haydn, as a composer, flourished like a bay tree, and eventually was graduated from his position out into a wider world. This was the situation in which Haydn composed the aforesaid five symphonies.

* * *

They have been assembled from many places, as the result of research by a great scholar in love with his task, who is now among us. And the task of certifying and restoring these symphonies is of peculiar difficulty. Haydn, too busy to catalogue fully and classify completely his own compositions, left his estate in a chaotic condition. In the eighteenth century, when the printing of music was still expensive and by no means pursued wholesale, neither publishers nor performers nor public were as solicitous as they are forced to be today of the respectful treatment of a master's scores and of the proper accrediting to him of the authorship of his compositions. Music was freely pirated, appropriated without an apology, changed in the scoring to meet the capacities of second-class orchestras and players. Pride of authorship was not as insistent upon recognition and royalties as today. All composers suffered from conditions that would produce a lawsuit an hour in our time, and they produced with a prodigality unknown to this age. If a symphony were needed, by Esterhazy or some one else, on short notice, the composer buckled to the job between rehearsals and other performances, because there was only a fortnight before the composition was required. These conditions developed the masters of the eighteenth century, and were to a large extent responsible for the confusion and inaccuracy of editions of their works, for the scores which they wrote without receiving recognition of authorship, whereas other scores which they did not write were peddled around bearing the names of great musicians as their authors.

We are indebted to Dr. Einstein for much valuable information that he has brought with him overseas, here paraphrased from his writings and conversations, concerning the sources and the authenticity of the scores which he has assembled and rehabilitated.

All these scores have been printed, some more than seventy or eighty years ago, some in versions that date back to the beginning of the nineteenth century and the peak of Haydn's fame. These scores, however, and the printed parts from which, for the most part, they were copied, are considered thoroughly unreliable.

Certain sources exist in which musical scientists are willing to place their faith. Among these are a number of old copies in parts, some printed by Haydn's Viennese publisher, Artaria, some copied by Haydn's own copyist and authenticated by the composer's own hand, which now repose in the British Museum. About twenty holographs of the 104 genuine Haydn symphonies are known.

For three of the restored symphonies, Nos. 80, 87 and 77, Dr. Einstein was able to find copies in parts in the British Museum. These Haydn had made by his copyist, Joseph Radnitzky, on the finest paper in the smallest size—to save postage—signed by his own hand "Sinfonia di me Giuseppe Haydn Manu propria," and added an occasional tempo indication or dynamic sign. He sent them to the London publisher, William Forster, in 1784.

For No. 67 Dr. Einstein used among other sources a London edition, probably the first, of about 1782. In the case of No. 71 he is still engaged in clarification.

* * *

In the British Museum, one of several Haydn treasuries (others are the Society of the Friends of Music in Vienna, the Esterhazy family collection in Budapest, and the library of the Reale Academia Luigi Cherubini in Florence), Dr. Einstein found a manuscript of Symphony No. 103, in E flat minor, the one beginning with a drum roll. To his amazement, examination proved the manuscript to be quite different from the printed score in current use. Either may be the correct version, but only months of research may succeed in determining which it is.

In rehabilitating No. 67, one of the newly restored works, Dr. Einstein found versions which completely omitted a curious and original movement, the bagpipe trio in the minuet for two solo violins with their G-strings tuned down to F—a device which is found nowhere else in Haydn. The minuet appears complete and incontrovertible in the edition printed in London, probably no later than 1782, and Dr. Einstein has included it in his score as unquestionably authentic.

We are in the habit of thinking of our musical heritage, the great body of creative work handed down to us by the past, as something complete, out of which we have chosen those works most deserving preservation and renewed performance. Dr. Einstein points out that after a century and a half of almost uninterrupted appreciation—for Haydn was not a neglected genius discovered generations after his death, but had already become a world-famous figure in the Seventeen Seventies in the prime of his creative life—we find ourselves in possession of only a comparatively few of his mature works, and even these cannot be positively ascertained as the finest products of his genius.

What is Haydn and what is not has become a kind of game among European researchers. Haydn has been credited with as many as 180 symphonies; a learned English article (Westminster Review, 1907, by W. Y. Heaton) grants him 118, another writer (John Lambkin, Dublin Review, 1932) claims 125. It was Mandyczewski who pared the number down to 104. Other Haydn symphonies may exist, but their genuineness has not been proved.

* * *

Human ambitions, sharp business practice, the cost of postage, international politics and even a spot of grave-robbing have had their share in bringing about this anomalous situation. The fact that Haydn was already a best-seller at the age of 40-odd, in demand "in America and the Indies," as one account relates, probably being played in fashionable houses even here in the New York of Revolutionary days, and even in public, makes the task of restoring herculean. Printing costs were high (unless a considerable number were ordered, it was cheaper to have copies made by hand), postage was expensive and orchestras, unlike the generous number of instruments supplied to Haydn by his princely patron, were generally small.

Publishers had no hesitation in taking a complete score of a Haydn symphony with all its rich instrumentation, tossing away the flutes, bassoons concertante, trumpets and tympani, and reproducing the score for eight parts, namely strings, two oboes and two horns. Sometimes Haydn himself may have been at fault: Franz Wuellner, considered by Dr. Einstein the best editor before Mandyzcewski, in his work of editing six symphonies from holographs only, found the holographs quite "sketchy," with the bass written only in one voice instead of being divided into 'cello and contra-bass.

Once a work was printed, if a particular conductor or music patron wanted a dozen or so copies made with certain corrections to suit his own ideas, the corrections were often made right on the copper plate and handed down for all time as part of the original. It has been suggested that this might have been the way in which the minuet was lost out of No. 67—perhaps a certain kappellmeister mistrusted his fiddlers' ability and thought it wise to avoid such perils!

The name of Haydn on a score almost guaranteed a sale. Obviously, for promotion purposes, nothing was simpler than to put the magic five-letter word where it could do so much good. Gyrowetz, a contemporary, found to his dismay that his publisher had labeled no less than six of his symphonies with Haydn's name. Thus "positively authentic" Haydn works have turned out to be creations of Hoffmeister, Wanhal, Van Swieten and Haydn's brother Michael.

The Haydn of this middle period, which chiefly concerns Dr. Einstein, knew such an existence as Aesop might have led. His prince, reasonable and generous in so many ways, for some reason would not give him leave to go for a day's visit to Vienna. He wrote to Frau von Genzinger in 1720, "I am doomed to stay at home. It is indeed sad to be always a slave, but Providence wills it so. I am a poor creature, plagued perpetually by hard work, and with few hours for recreation." "Here in Esteraz," he complains mildly, "no one asks me, 'Would you like some chocolate or

Continued on Following Page

ETC

Underneath the wig is Serge Koussevitzky. He will wear this costume as Josef Haydn in an eighteenth century dress performance of the "Farewell" Symphony. The men of the orchestra in costume, too. All at Carnegie Hall this Wednesday night.

C.S. Monitor

Bruckner to Ravel

Feb. 4/39

The Arts in Boston

Dr. Koussevitzky again demonstrated his gift for program making in arranging the list for this week's Boston Symphony concerts, the fifteenth pair of the season. It consists of two works, Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, in C minor, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano pieces entitled "Pictures at an Exhibition." Thus it sets the naïveté of Bruckner, the peasant, against the sophistication of Ravel, the product of the most civilized society in the world; with the genius of Moussorgsky, the cultivated musician of the people, to tie them together.

The combination proved very successful at yesterday's concert. Bruckner appears to be making his way with Boston audiences. No doubt the propaganda for him has had its effect; but without question his music has a strong direct appeal to many listeners. It is not difficult to understand why it should, especially at this period of enthusiasm for Wagner, who was Bruckner's chief admiration. Many of Bruckner's themes are salient, his writing is clear and his structure solid. In this Eighth Symphony there are some lovely pages, particularly in the Adagio.

To some of us it seems a pity that Bruckner did not add to his creative gift the capacity for self-criticism, which might have enabled him to make his works even more acceptable. With that capacity, he might have restrained his emotion, controlled his tendency to loquaciousness, tempered his climaxes, evaded the suspicion of banality and fustian.

The performance yesterday may well have made new converts to the Bruckner fold. It was magnificent in its sonority and its expressiveness. It is doubtful if anywhere else in the world so fine a report of Bruckner's symphony could be made today.

Ravel's wit, added to Moussorgsky's humor, makes the "Pictures" pleasant to listen to, especially after such a substantial number as the Bruckner. Moussorgsky of course was enjoying himself when he wrote these piano pieces, and Ravel could have found nothing here to become solemn over. But when was Ravel serious? At the opposite cultural extreme from Bruckner, he tended if anything to be superficial. His technique was brilliant, but his music is not profound.

It is interesting therefore to watch the building up of his climax for the Great Gate at Kiev. Whereas Bruckner in all sincerity allowed himself to be carried away by his emotion, Ravel devoted his technical powers to the construction of a crashing conclusion. In other words, he sacrificed Gallic restraint to make an effect.

L. A. S.

B. Trans. MUSIC Feb. 6 1939

Symphony Concert

Bruckner's Eighth Symphony Joined With Moussorgsky—Ravel 'Pictures'

By MOSES SMITH

The program for this week's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky has tautly drawn in construction as others of recent weeks were loose. There are only two numbers and both in their ways are masterpieces—Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C minor and the Ravel transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Neither has any longer even remote savor of novelty, and if there is anything new to be written about either work, it has probably been written before. The "Pictures" has been a repertory item in Symphony Hall since Dr. Koussevitzky presented it during his first season here in 1924, a year after he induced Maurice Ravel to make the transcription for him. Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, on the other hand, had to wait twenty-five years after its composition before the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts were vouchsafed an audition. And it was only when Dr. Koussevitzky revived it in 1929 that the Symphony may be said to have entered the active repertory hereabouts.

* * *

The Boston conductor has been one of the apostles of the Brucknerian (as of the Mahlerian) tradition, and both he and the music are beginning to reap just reward. At yesterday's concert the Symphony, which, even after liberal cutting, consumed more than an hour of exhausting attention, was followed by a long round of applause and even cheers—rare phenomenon from a matinee audience. Some of this excitement, no doubt, was tribute to the glowing performance by the magnificent orchestra, led by a man possessed of the music. But a good deal of it was unquestionably due to the sureness with which Bruckner's tonal language, coming, so to say, from his heart, found its way to the hearts of the listeners.

The Symphony is not only long. It is repetitive. Too frequently the composer attempted to convey emphasis by restatement. The procedure exemplified his naivete, the same naivete as is to be observed in Schubert. Much of Bruckner's expression, in the same way, would seem to have been too uncritically formed to belong to the category of great art.

These objections, like others, are familiar. In the end, perhaps it is the very quality of naivete that constituted the essence of Bruckner's genius. For it was accompanied, fortunately, by a grandeur of imagination rarely encountered in the history of music. A man with such an imagination had to work not only with big themes but also—as a corollary—with widespreading movements. Certainly the adagio, for example, has inordinate length. But if Bruckner had attempted to compress his ideas into a movement of more usual proportions he would have missed fire. Again it was possible to observe that length and huge orchestra and grandiose expression were the necessary implications of the man's thoughts.

* * *

If Dr. Koussevitzky attempted to point a sharp contrast by setting beside Bruckner's music the short-breathed utterance of Moussorgsky, he could hardly have chosen more happily. The contrast was not merely in such things as the brevity of Moussorgsky's phrases, the rapidity of development and the quickness with which unrelated ideas succeeded one another. It lay also in the concreteness of the Russian's images. Here was almost an object-lesson in the definitions of Romanticism and Realism (though one hesitates to stress the lesson).

Ravel was the ideal man to carry out the orchestral implications of Moussorgsky's piano sketches. His impersonalism, his wonderful capacity for examining and employing to best advantage the concepts of another creator or of another period were wanted here. Perhaps one is merely theorizing after the accomplishment, with the assurance that Ravel succeeded where others failed. So be it. In any event, it remains that the music played with telling effect by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky at yesterday's concert stood again revealed as a composite creation, in which it was possible to discern the character of each creator and almost impossible to separate one from the other.

To the Music Editor:

A great many of those who frequent symphony concerts in Boston must wonder what is the effect of audience response, or the lack of it, in the making up of these programs. We are continually being told, by implication at least, that we are being given what is good for us, and that our taste is being trained to appreciate the best in contemporary music as well as the great music of the past. And yet when large numbers of subscribers walk out on a Krenek or a Dukelsky work, our noses are held again and again to the same sort of dish, as if it were a foregone conclusion that eventually we must like it; but when an unfamiliar or neglected work of the past is received with only moderate applause, someone says, "Aha! They don't like Berlioz (or Pierne, or Elgar, as the case may be); we mustn't give them any more."

It would appear to this concertgoer that perhaps too much personal prejudice inspires such decisions, especially since one result of it must have been the withholding from Boston audiences Berlioz' magnificent "Harold in Italy," so memorably played by Toscanini and the N B C Orchestra recently. This work impressed some hearers as being far superior to "Roman Carnival" and "Symphonie Fantastique," both of which we were allowed to hear. And what an opportunity it would give to hear a viola virtuoso of our own, not less distinguished than Mr. Primrose!

By and large our programs are probably second to none elsewhere; most catholic by far, and we are grateful for that. But surely we can stand more variety in the yearly offering of the classicists, which could include works we do not all know by heart, and which have been neglected through no fault of their own.

ELAINE WESTALL GOULD
Jamaica Plain, Feb. 1.

CHELSEA, MASS.
EVE. RECORD

JAN 30 1939

Symphony In Unusual Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Wednesday, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Hayln's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Hadyn leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 27 1939

For our pains in printing [illegible] week the question put to us by a prominent local pianist as to why accompanists didn't learn the music by heart, another as equally talented a pianist and an even more stanch defender of all things pianistic buttonholed us this week and asked us another question. "Why don't soloists, particularly vocalists, learn their own music? Then maybe the accompanist would be willing to take a chance in memorizing." We'll have to admit that he has something there, although the critical remarks of commentators and audiences about vocalists who use word books has helped remedy this situation somewhat. A word book is a grand thing to hang onto, we'll admit, for people who don't know what to do with their hands, but the soloists who walk out onto the platform and thus choose to inform their audiences that they haven't been able to remember what they are to sing, start with two strikes on them, and it's not so easy making a hit with such a handicap.

* * *

Added details from Boston regarding that "Concert Extraordinaire" by Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall on February 1, and repeated February 8 at New York, indicate that it will be something to see as well as to hear. The orchestra, fully costumed and bewigged, will be seated in 18th century chairs with candle-lighted music racks before them. Koussevitzky, seated at a spinet, will direct the Haydn "Farewell Symphony." The marked facial resemblance between the conductor and "Papa" Haydn is expected to carry out the illusion. Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" and a waltz galaxy from Lanner, Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel will be given without benefit of 18th century finery.

DR SERGE KOU[illegible]ITZKY

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

JAN 30 1939

* * *

Among the committee members arranging a concert Monday evening, March 6 for the Lili Boulanger Memorial fund are, Mrs. Aretus O. Barker of Cohasset, Mrs. Ralph H. Doane, Mrs. Edmund J. B. Huntoon and Mrs. Frederic B. Robinson of Milton and Mrs. Foster Trainor of Hingham. Nadia Boulanger, sister of Lili Boulander, gifted composer who died at the age of 24, will again conduct Boston Symphony orchestra, and the Harv[illegible]club and Radcliffe Choral society, assisted by G. Wallace Woodworth.

CLINTON, MASS.
ITEM

JAN 25 1939

18TH CENTURY FINERY

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Unique Program, Feb. 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, February 1, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening, the stage will be hidden by red curtains which will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra, seated in 18th century chairs, with candle-lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in much the same way that the composer might have done.

The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed "Papa Haydn" leading his orchestra before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz,' 'the next number, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it.

This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More.

"Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

Another novelty on the program will be Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer.

Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program, ranging from Lanner's gay "Die Schonbrunner" to Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

Others to be played are the always popular Strauss waltzes, "Vienna Blood," and "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius' best known work, "Valse Triste."

Great care is being taken with the settings and costumes which some of the numbers call for. Dr. Koussevitzky's costume as Papa Haydn has been designed by Robert Edmond Jones, who is known for his pioneering with color movies, in Hollywood as well as for his work in the New York theater.

Decorations of the stage for the concerts are being supervised by Jock Munro, young playwright and director, who has come to Boston from New York for the purpose.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 25 1939

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives Concert at Metropolitan Theatre

By G. Y. Loveridge

Winds and tides of music swept through the Metropolitan Theatre last night, powered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and directed in their going and coming by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It was the kind of musical weather that everybody talks about and nobody even wants to do anything about, except have more of it.

The evening began with playful and well-mannered breezes fashioned by Haydn, proceeded to the mystic seas and skies of Debussy, and ended with thunderbolts from the hands of Sibelius. A magnificent climate it was that Dr. Koussevitzky contrived.

The Londoners were rightly fond of Haydn, when he wrote such symphonies as that in B-flat, No. 102, for them. The formal grace and effervescent humor of it survive the fashions and the wear of decades, as the applause of the audience last night made evident. Dr. Kussevitzky gave it muscles, especially in the minuet, which seemed a dance of giants at times; and in the first and last movements old Papa Haydn made some vigorous bounds. Whether he intended his symphony to go like that, nobody knows. If he did, it is 10 to one he couldn't have found an orchestra to play it that way in his time. The largo introduction and the slow second movement were in strong and effective contrast to the display of physical vitality that characterized the performance.

Then, to "La Mer." Men and women who go down to the sea in music, like particularly to have Dr. Koussevitzky at the helm; these orchestral sketches are among the finest of his revelations. Whether, as some say, this music is meant to represent the actual sea in various humors, or, as others say, it reflects the mysterious voyaging of the mind, matters not. One may find herein cold mists and vapors rising from fiddles and tympani, waves in the violins and brasses, even strange flute, oboe and English horn creatures swimming about among the cold shadows of the lower strings; or one may find no namable thing at all, but only that potent mood and magic of the sea that bewitched Melville and Conrad, and, through them, the rest of us.

The orchestra discoursed these mysteries oracularly, which is to say that everybody could understand them in his own way and everybody could be both right and different. Dr. Koussevitzky called forth all the colors and powers of the ensemble; he guided the "dialogue du vent et de la mere" into a brilliant turmoil.

The Sibelius symphony in E-flat, No. 5, came after intermission. Through the smoke that gets in your eyes, ears and lungs, one could perceive Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, like the fiery Frank and furious Hun of the poem, charging the music. Slowly the symphony got into motion, with horns and tympani, with flutes, oboes, clarinets voicing a motive. It is a curious but irresistible symphony, at times seeming likely to become a Strauss waltz, at other times depicting a giant tossing motive-pebbles into the air, but gradually builds up to a compelling conclusion.

The tone of the orchestra was magnificent, and the persuasiveness of the reading such that one was transported beyond notes and sounds to those rugged and yet romantic heights that Sibelius inhabits. The reiterated fff chords that end the story came all too soon.

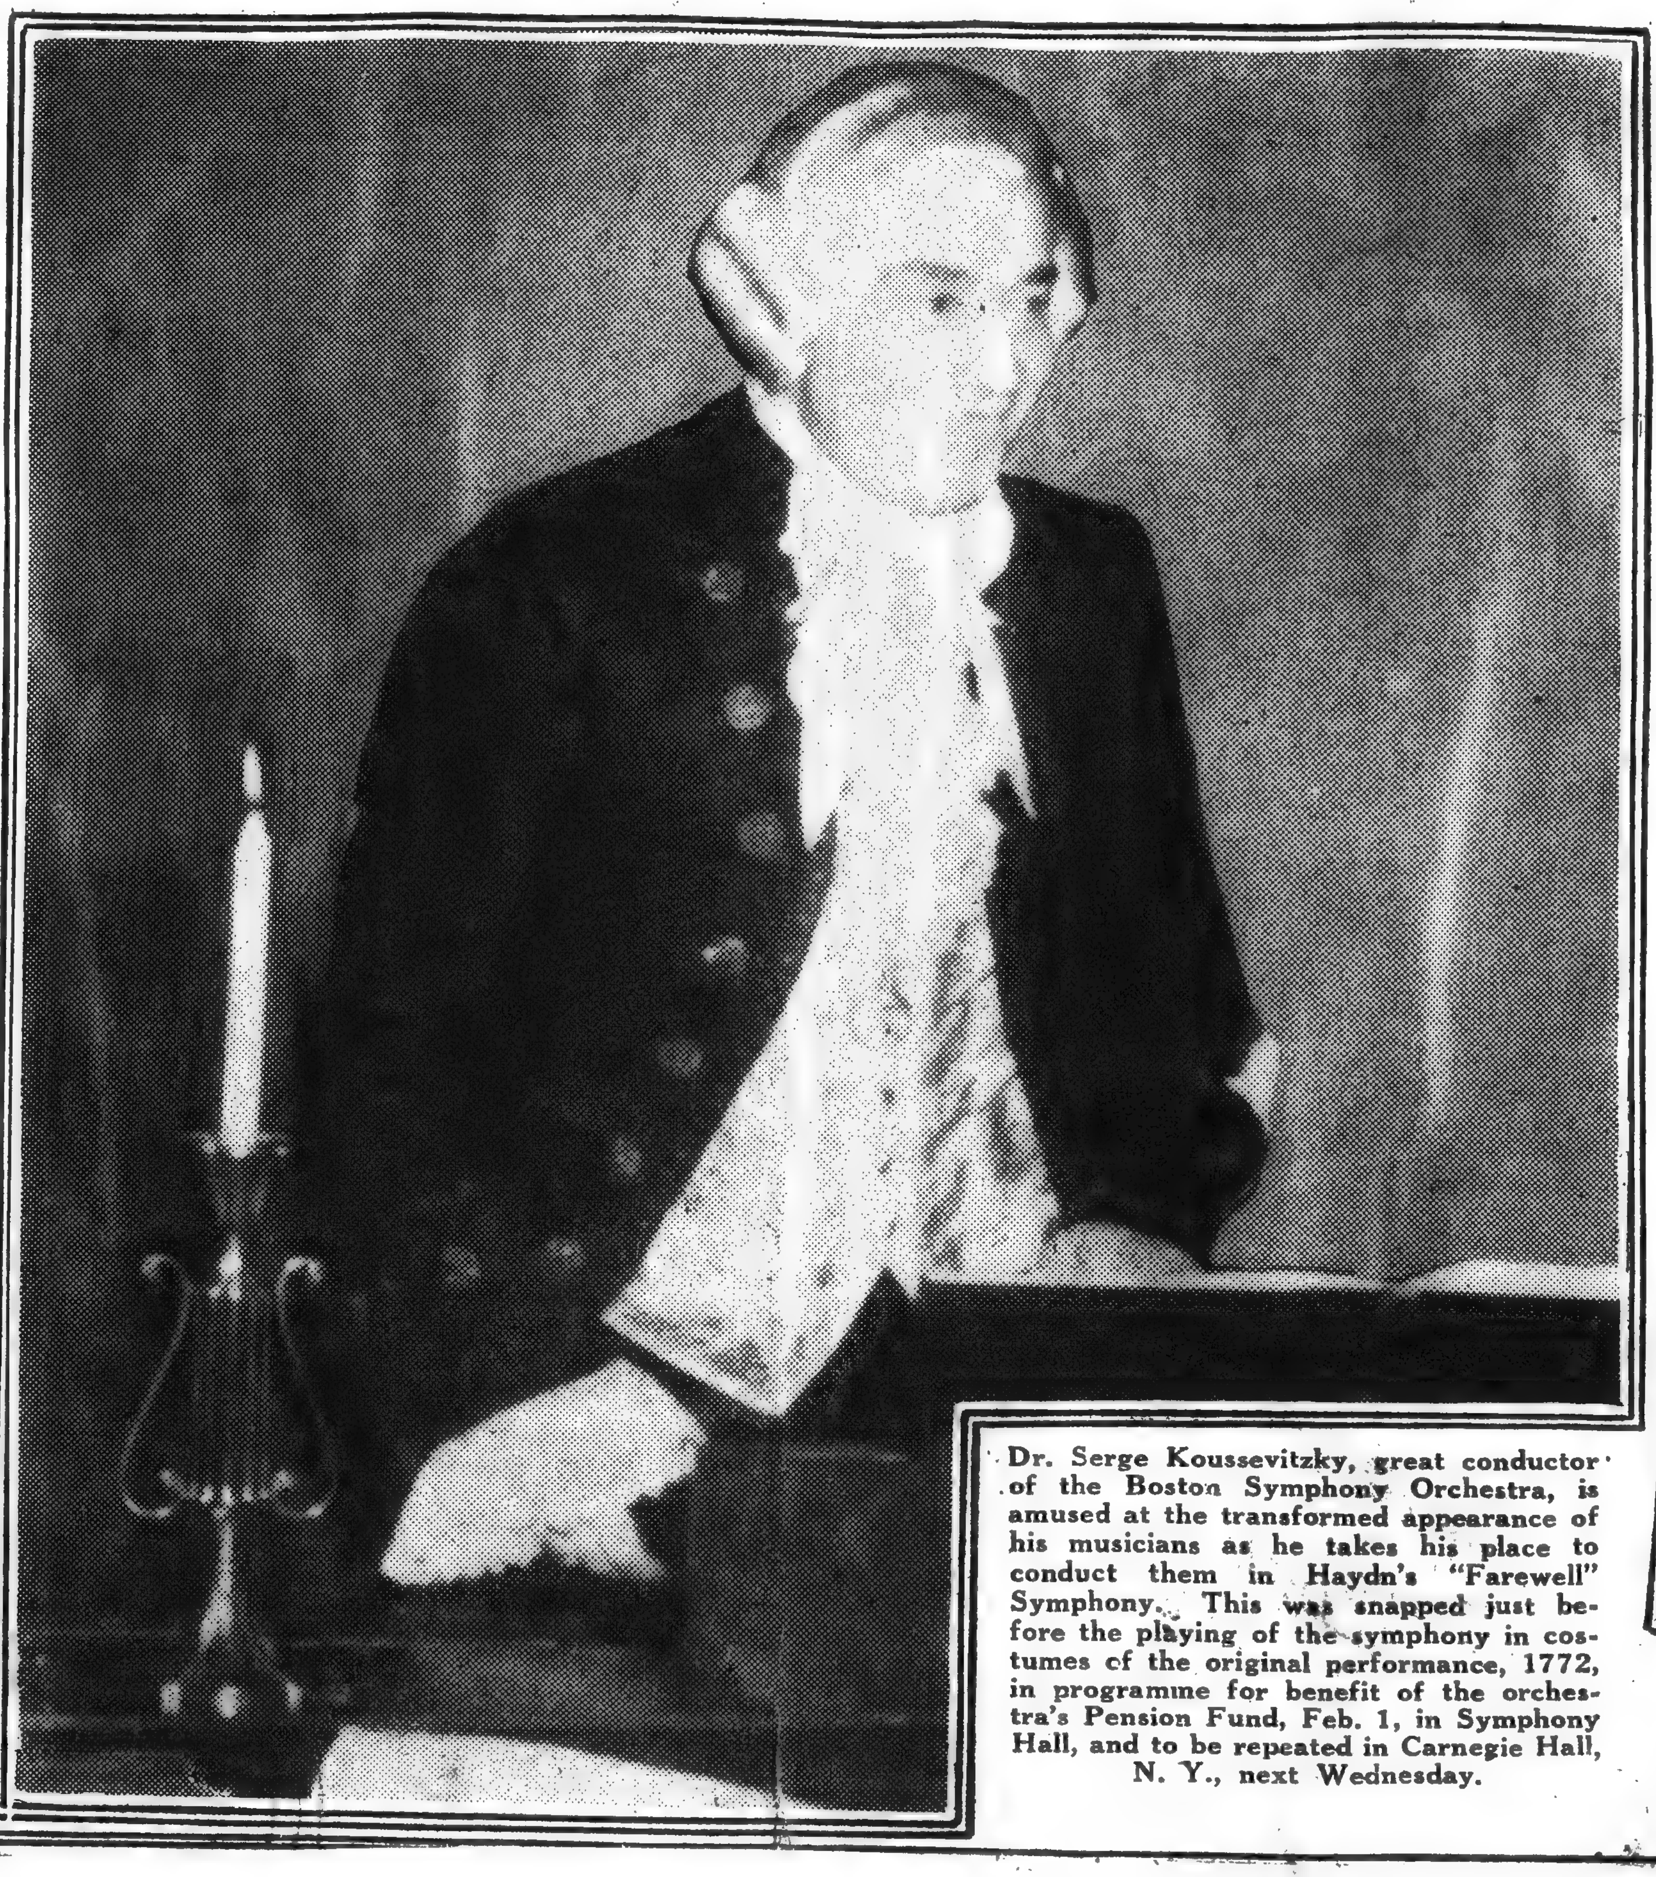
If we had been a fiddler with the orchestra we should have gone home, chucked the Guarnerius under the sofa and said to our wife. "Ma, I'm dog-tired."

But as a listener, we should have been glad to hear the program over again then and there.

Candid Dressing Room Shots of Symphony

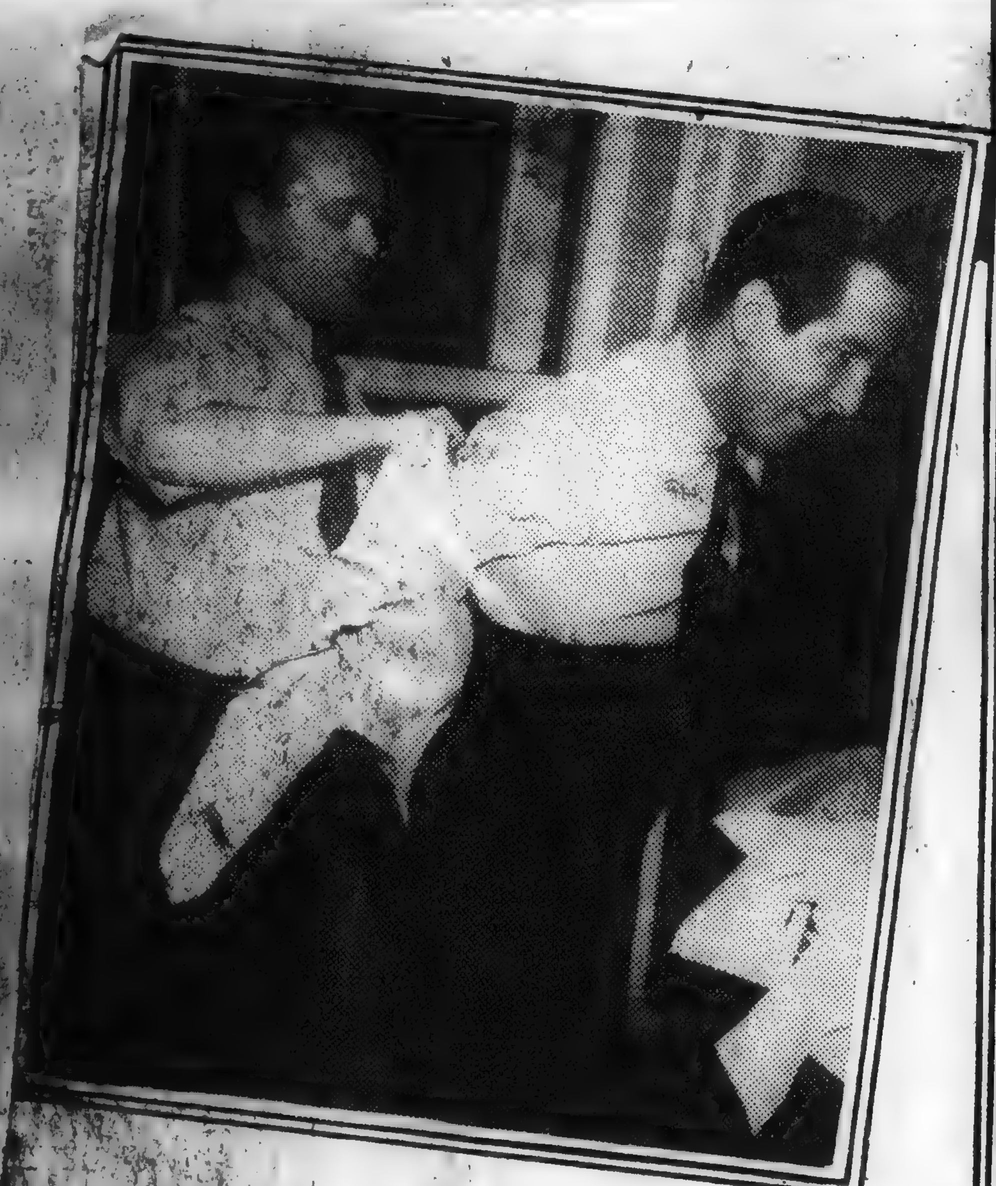
Exclusive Sunday Post Photographs of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and His Musicians in the White Wigs, Silk Pantaloons and Lace Ruffles of Haydn's Days—Pictures That Might Have Been Taken 200 Years Ago Become Fascinating Tableau on One of World's Greatest Concert Stages

Resplendent in 18th century costume, Ernst Panenka offsets the ungainly looks of the bullfrog-voiced bassoon.

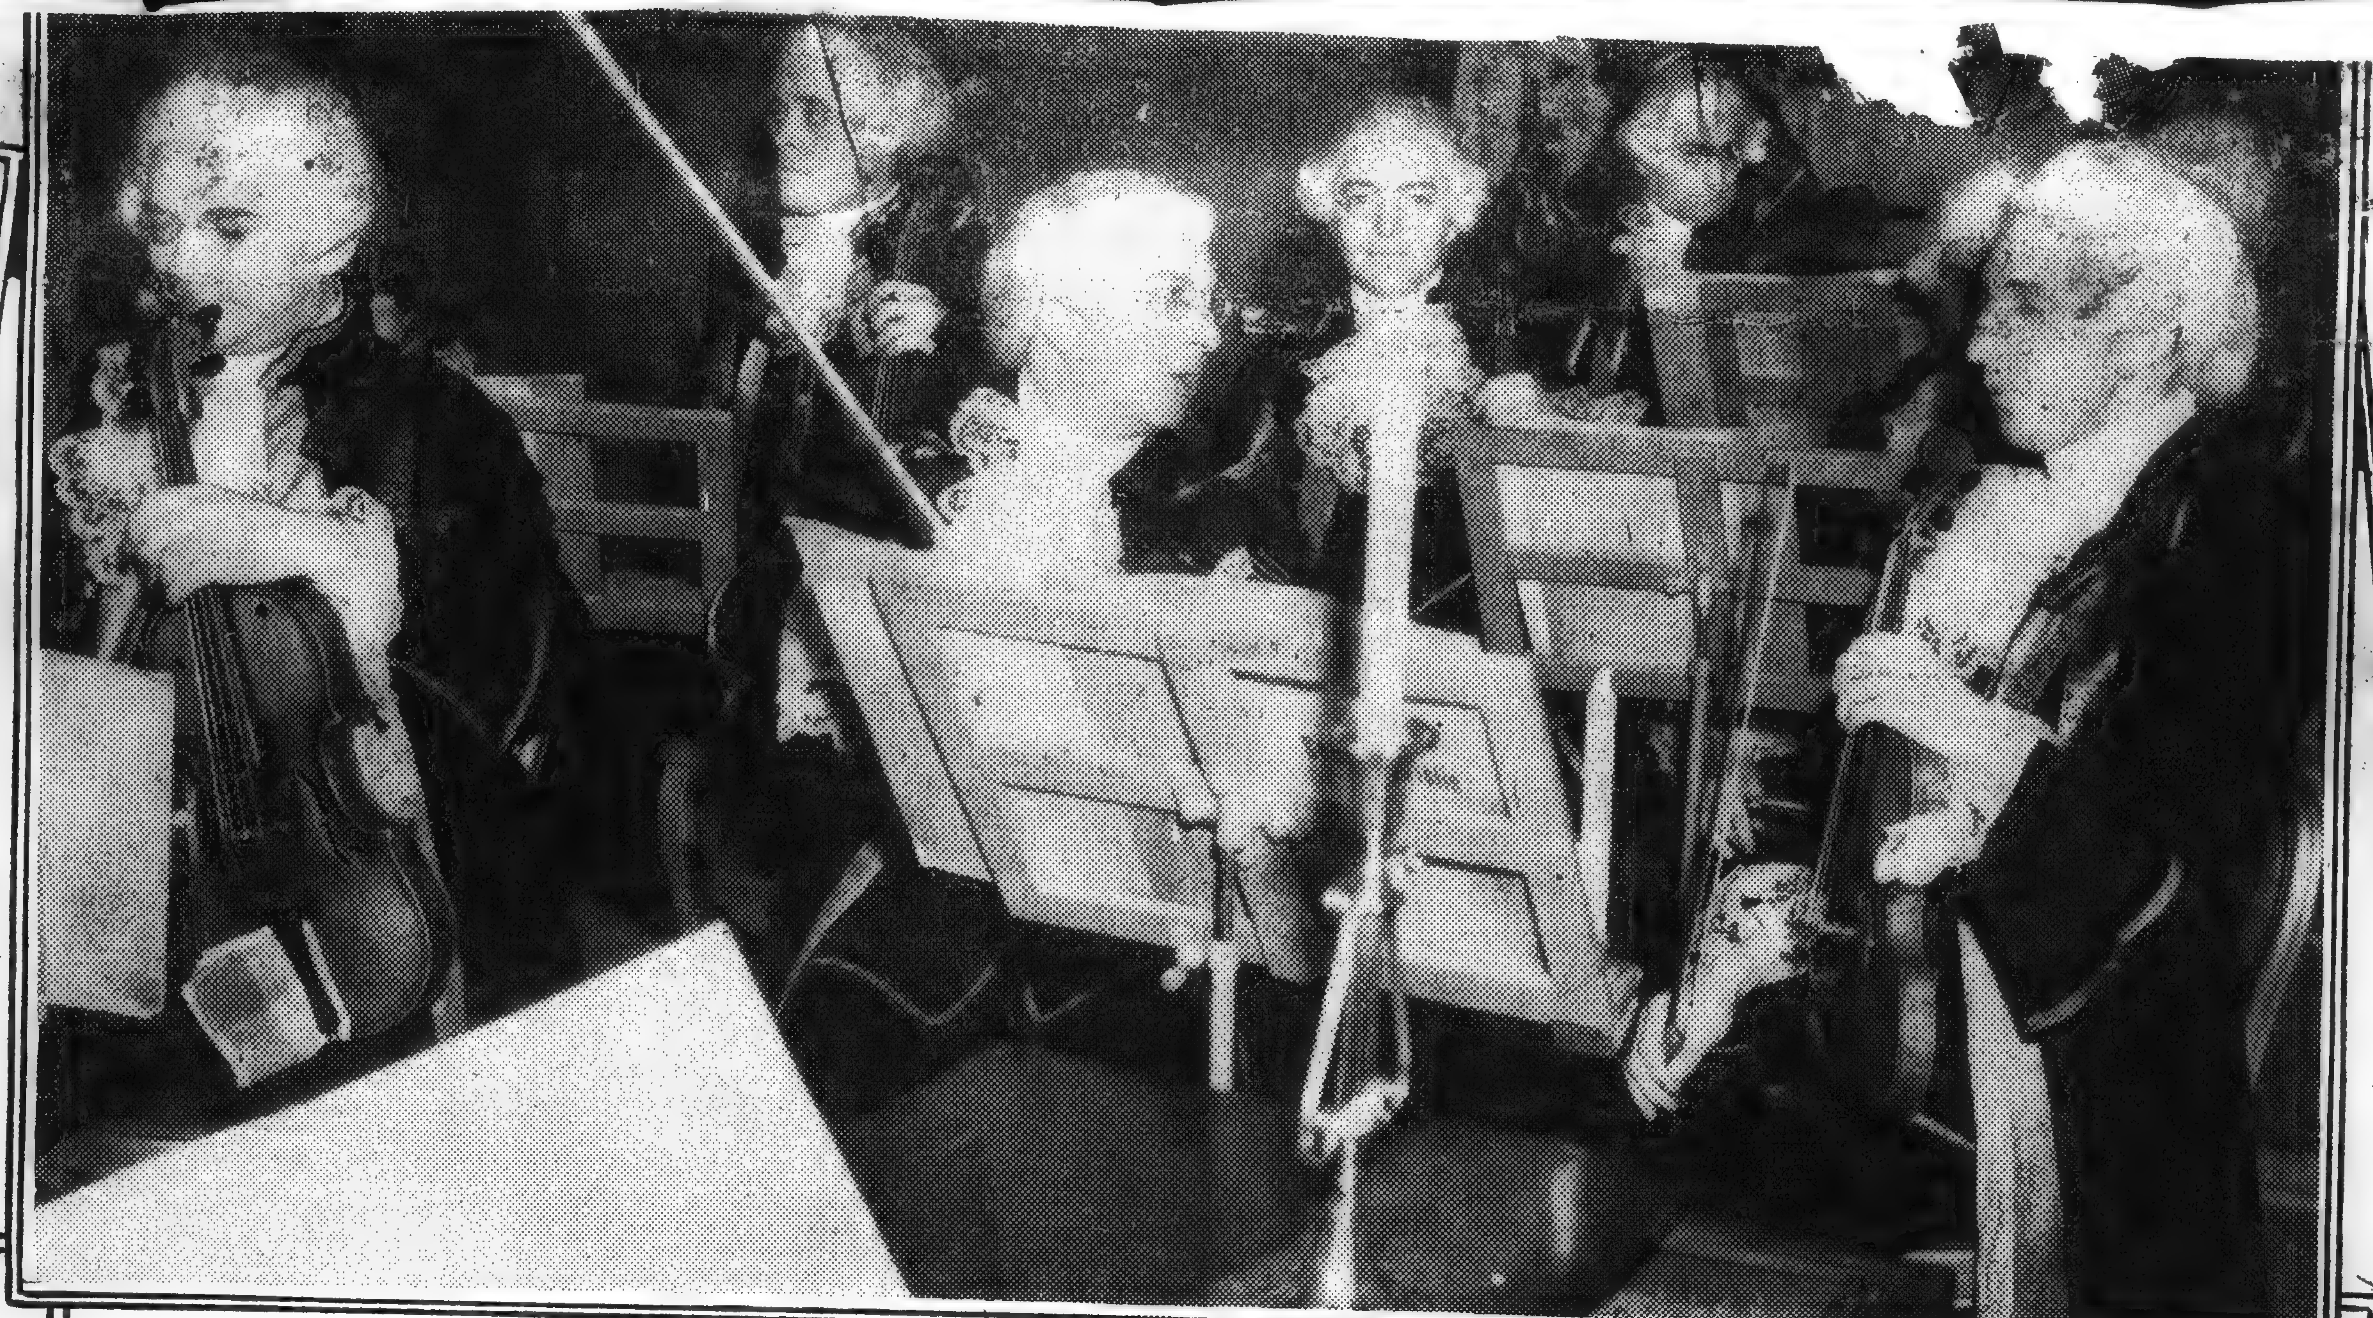


Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is amused at the transformed appearance of his musicians as he takes his place to conduct them in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. This was snapped just before the playing of the symphony in costumes of the original performance, 1772, in programme for benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, Feb. 1, in Symphony Hall, and to be repeated in Carnegie Hall, N. Y., next Wednesday.

Pierre Delescluse, contrabassist. In distance, are barely discernible the faces of Jean Devergie and Fernand Gillet, oboists, and Ernst Panenka, bassoonist. Observe candle o music stand, in keeping with costumes.



Costumer Murl Daniels, safety pin in mouth, tries mess jacket on Jesus Maria Sanroma, noted pianist, for Gruenberg's composition, "The Daniel Jazz."



A moment before the conductor appears. At left and right the music is read over by Carlos Pinfield and Clarence Knudsen. At rear, left, George Humphrey is in reverie, as is Melvin Bryant, across from him. Between them, Samuel Diamond tosses a word at Minott Beale. Just inside door, Harry Dickson warms up his violin. (All photographs by Frank G. Jason, Sunday Post Staff.)

Gaston Elcus, who was concertmaster in the "Farewell" Symphony, is fitted to 18th century breeches.

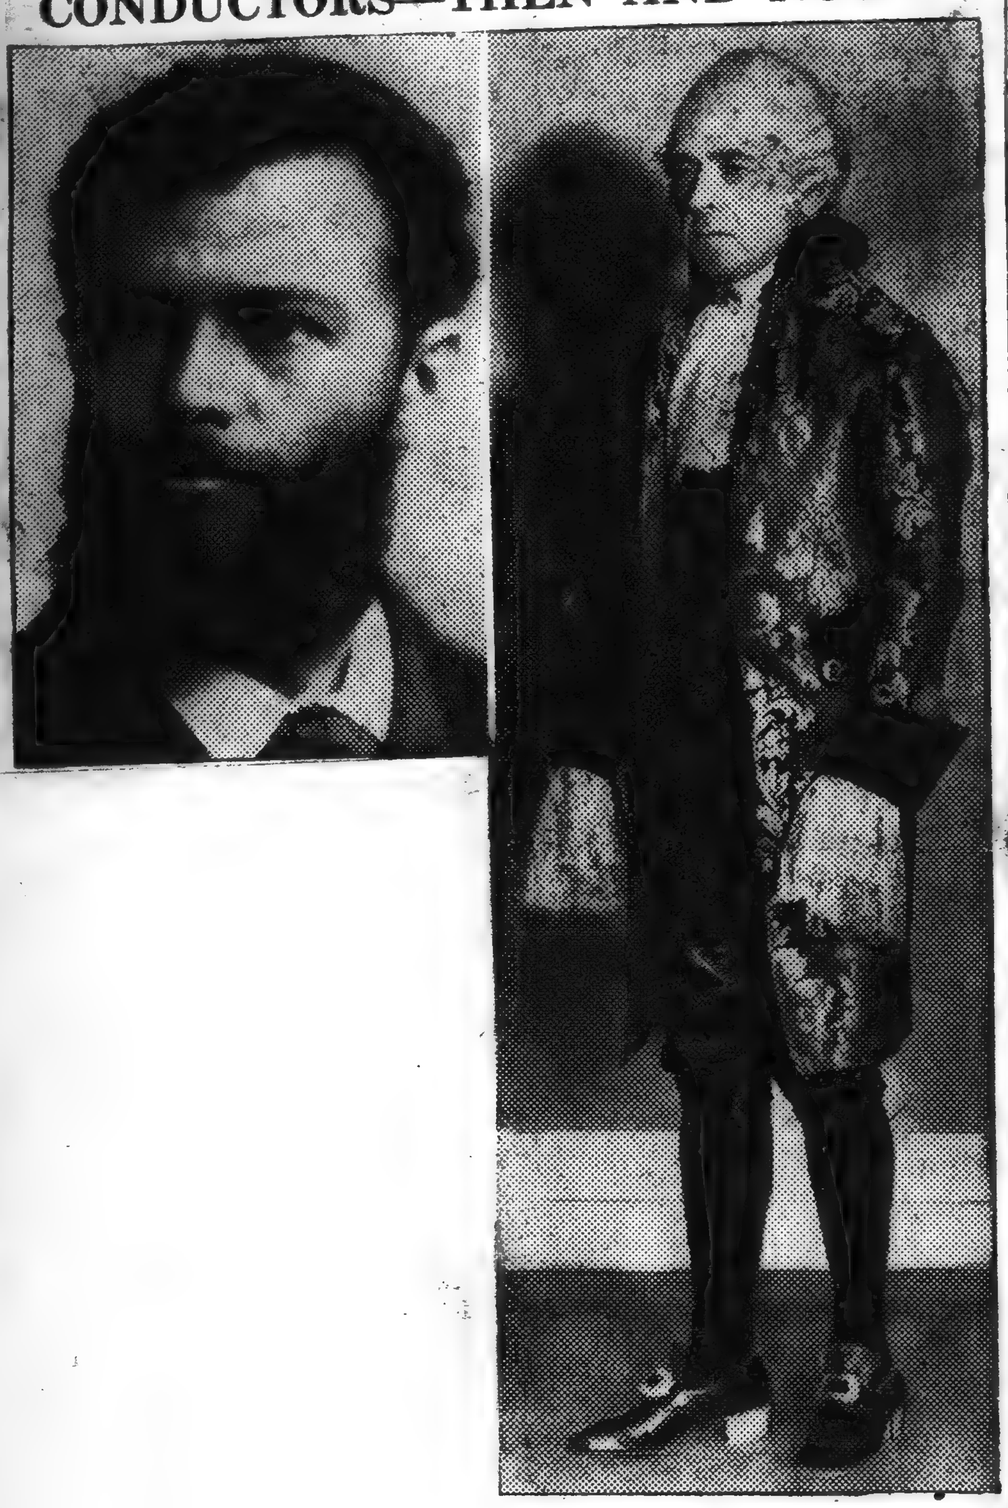
"Wastkit" is tried on George Humphrey, whom you will find complete-transformed (second figure from left), in the large photo above, on the right.

Jock Monroe, stage director, keeps a critical eye on the fittings. Awaiting their turns, right to left, are: Lloyd Stonestreet, violin; Paul Tortellier, 'cellist, (rear); John Murray, Melvin Bryant and Clarence Knudsen, all violinists; and Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist.

Violinist John Murray is interested in the arrangement for hitching the cuffs on his abbreviated Haydenesque pants.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
148 JAN 19 1939

CONDUCTORS—THEN AND NOW



At Left is Georg Henschel, the First Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Other Gentleman is Serge Koussevitzky, Present Conductor, Disguised as Haydn and Seeming Not Too Much Pleased About It. He Will Wear This Costume to Conduct a Part of a Pension Fund Concert in Symphony Hall on Feb. 1.

Boston Symphony Presented First Concert Here In '82

Orchestra Founded Year Before Gave Three Performances in Opening Season; Koussevitzky to Lead 248th Program in R. I. on Tuesday Night

By G. Y. Loveridge

For more than 56 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been making available in this city the world's finest music interpreted by some of the world's most renowned conductors.

It was on the night of Nov. 16, 1882—only one year after it had been founded—that the orchestra gave its first concert here, with Georg Henschel as the conductor. Next Tuesday night, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the orchestra will give its 249th program in Providence.

The orchestra began with a series of three concerts in this city. At one time the number was increased to eight. Now five are given. In earlier years a famous soloist was provided for almost every concert, but recent seasons have seen few soloists brought to Providence. As for the listeners, they have fluctuated considerably in numbers; the early days sometimes saw small audiences, but the last concert given here, on Election Night, is said to have been attended by the largest number ever to hear a Boston Symphony concert in this city.

Founded in 1881

The orchestra was founded by Col. Henry Lee Higginson, Civil War soldier, oil well promoter and member of the Boston banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. Ever since young manhood, when he studied in Germany and Austria, he had been interested in music. In 1881, having become wealthy through his business ventures, he gave superb expression to this interest by forming the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A modest statement in the press gave the city word of his intentions. The orchestra was to comprise "sixty selected musicians; their time, so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts, to be engaged in advance." There were to be 20 concerts on Saturday evenings from the middle of October to the middle of March. Single tickets, with reserved seats, were to be 75 cents or 25 cents.

"The intention is that this orchestra shall be made permanent here, and shall be called 'The Boston Symphony Orchestra,'" Col. Higginson said.

From the outset it had been proposed to confer the benefits of the orchestra upon communities other than Boston. Among the first of these was Providence. In the Evening Bulletin of Nov. 1, 1882, elbowed by page-one advertisements for running races, women's suffrage, roller skating, lectures by the traveller Stoddard and news items of Wall street uncertainty and the death in East Providence of a veteran of the Battle of Waterloo, appeared an advertisement concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of three concerts in Music Hall, Providence.

"The orchestra will number upwards of 50 musicians," the advertisement promised, "and the character of the programs will be the same as at the Boston concerts." Season tickets were $1.50 and $2.

Races Held in Cranston

Those were the days of the great Salvini, who was coming to the Opera House, with the "special support of Marie Prescott, Lewis Morrison, and a powerful dramatic company, in Soumet's great tragedy, 'The Gladiator,'" on Nov. 20; of Gen. Tom Thumb and wife, who were to arrive at Low's Grand Opera House, with trained canaries and Bingham, ventriloquist, also the 20th; of trotting races at Narragansett Park, in Cranston.

In the Providence Journal of Nov. 17, 1882, the day after the first concert, the story about it appeared on page eight, the last page. The first page carried accounts of a train derailment on the railroad at Naugatuck, Conn., caused by the locomotive striking a cow at Reynold's bridge; a man, woman and child murdered by a burglar in Fowler, Ind.; a gale in the British Isles that wrecked a brig and carried down all hands; a barge run down by a steamer in the East river; a steamer ashore in Hell Gate; a water tower falling and killing two men in New York; a boiler explosion in Cincinnati; counterfeiters arrested in Frederickstown, Mo.; an elevator falling and injuring several persons in Louisville, Ky.; the theft of election returns from the court house in Grimes County, Tex., and other items entrancing to editors and readers.

At the top of page eight, under the headline "Boston Symphony Orchestra," in small type, was the report on the concert.

"One of the most admirably balanced, harmonious and effective orchestral organizations that have ever appeared in this city is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave the first of a series of three concerts in Music Hall last evening," said the reviewer.

The program presented "a fine selection, the melodious grace of Mozart being contrasted with the dramatic force of Wagner, and the classicism relieved by the bizarre lightness of 'The Funeral March of a Marionette.'"

Vocalists Were Heard

Mr. Henschel not only conducted the orchestra but sang Pogner's address, from "The Mastersinger." Another vocal soloist was Miss Alice Constance Ward, who delivered an aria from the "Creation." Bernard Listemann, concertmaster, was soloist in 'Concert Pathetique," by Ernst.

The other works on the program were Mozart's symphony in C, No. 6, the overture to "Rienzi," and the overture to "Der Freischutz."

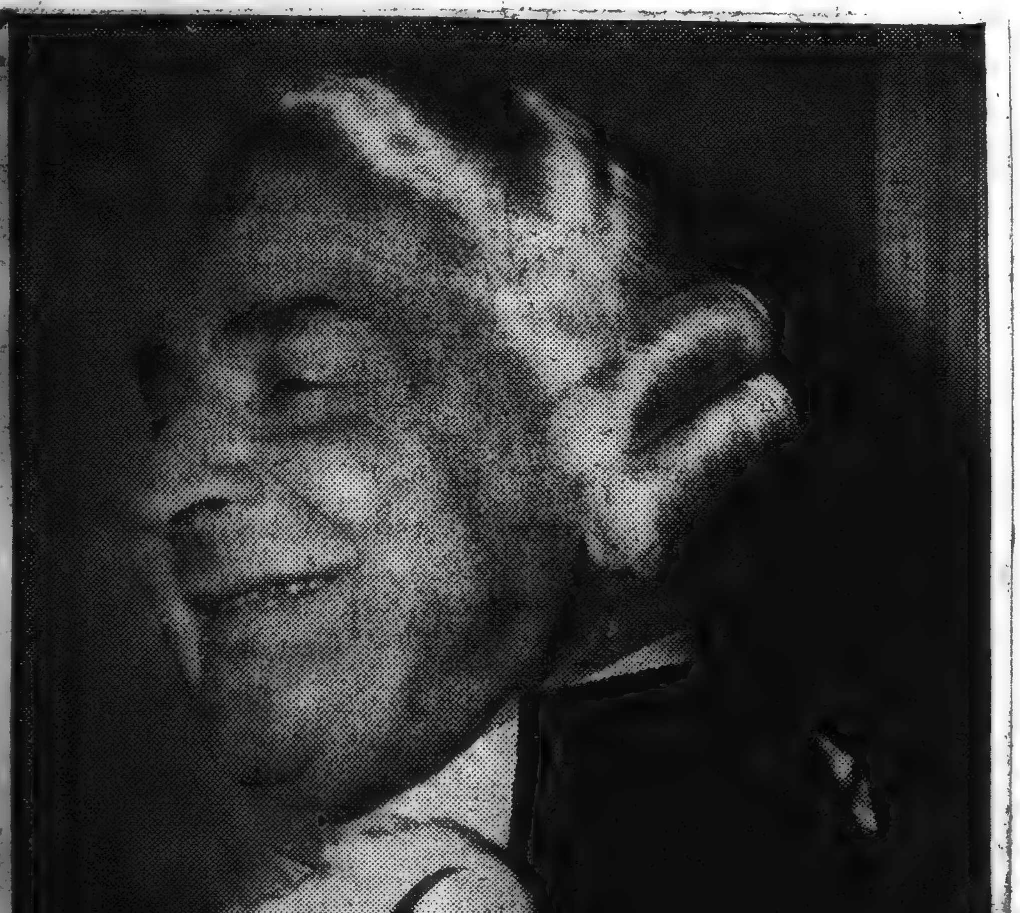
Praised as an admirable conductor, Mr. Henschel's singing also was "one of the gems of the evening."

"The music public of Providence are to be congratulated on such an excellent series of entertainments," the reviewer concluded—a remark that continues to be pertinent.

(This is the first of three articles on that phase of the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerning Providence.)

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 27 1939



DRESSED FOR CONCERTS

Boston's widely known symphony orchestra leader, Serge Koussevitzky, outfitted in 18th Century finery in which he is to conduct the orchestra in concerts "extraordinaire" in Boston Feb. 1 and in New York Feb. 8. Powdered and wigged, he will impersonate the composer Haydn, to whom he bears a remarkable likeness. Photo shows him getting a laugh from his outfit. (Associated Press Photo.)

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
JAN 29 1939

Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert Wednesday, February 1

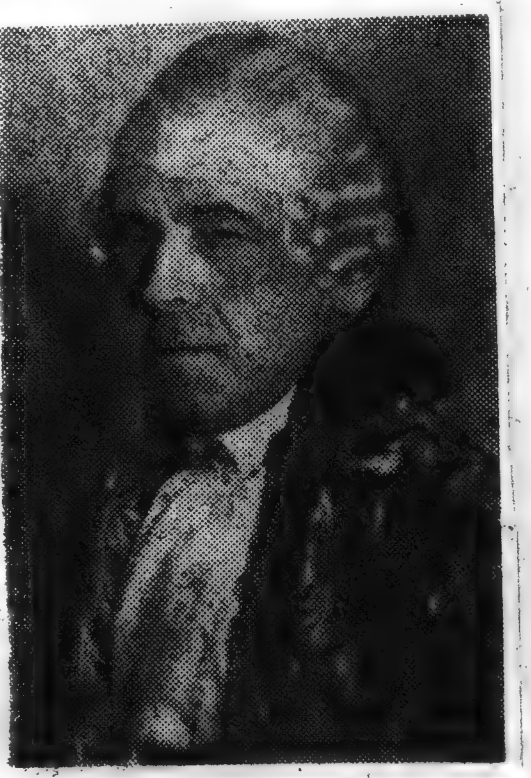
The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in eighteenth century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, on February 1, and in Carnegie hall, New York, on February 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done.

"Daniel Jazz", the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contract to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The complete program is as follows:

Haydn....... Farewell Symphony
(performed in costume)
Gruenberg ....The Daniel Jazz
(after the poem by Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'More)
Prokofieff....Peter and the Wolf
(Narrator: Richard Hale)

THE WALTZ

Lanner ....Die Schonbrunner
Strauss ....Vienna Blood
Voices of Sprinf
Sibelius .... Valse Triste
Ravel .. .. La Valse

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 2 - 1939

Concert at Rutgers By Boston Symphony

Works of Haydn, Debussy and Brahms will feature the fifth appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra on the Rutgers university concert series in the Rutgers gymnasium in New Brunswick next Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who received an honorary degree of doctor of music from Rutgers when he appeared in New Brunswick with the orchestra two years ago, will conduct. A capacity crowd is expected to hear the orchestra which is now regarded as a fixture on the annual concert series of the university. Rutgers is the only college or university regularly included on the annual winter tour of the Boston symphony.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

FEB 3 - 1939

56

AT THE CONCERT Extraordinaire, Haydin's Farewell Symphony is to be played and acted in Symphony Hall by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Koussevitzky himself impersonating Haydn. Against a special stage set now being prepared, the members of the orchestra will be seen in eighteenth century garb. To watch the costuming and lighting is to get a close up of Haydn's days which were the colonial days in America.

COMMERCE, TEX.
JOURNAL

JAN 31 1939

WORDS WITHOUT MUSIC

By LOUIS REID

(Music Features & Photo Syndicate, N. Y.)

Louis Reid

THE mecca of musical sightseers of Gotham at present is the weekly Saturday night concert of Arturo Toscanini and his NBC Symphony Orchestra . . . No musical figure of our times, operating in the more rarified areas and arias of music, is given such zealous, such almost incredible devotion. Even football fans are less enthusiastic in their hero-worship than the music lovers who weekly pay tribute to the maestro.

Hero Worship

Of course, there is no question of Toscanini's art of interpretation. . . . But watching and hearing his frenzied followers in action we wonder if the maestro is not at times resentful of the emphasis upon interpretation and the apparent subordination of the music's creators. . . . Has the idolization reached a point where the Toscanini fan is unable to see the forest for the trees? . . . Toscanini brings matchless skill to his understanding of Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner and the lesser composers of the Italian school, but long before Toscanini perfected his art and long after he has gone, the great creators stood and will stand supreme.

Only 50 Great Masters

We are too often prone to forget that all the great music of the world was and is being written by a small group of men. The masters themselves do not number over fifty. . . . Even in the popular field creation is confined, at least in America, according to the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, to some 125 persons. . . . In all the world there are not more than 1,000 men and women who are creating music that regularly gets a hearing. . . . But the interpreters of music are countless. Maestri and the musicians they lead number in the hundreds of thousands.

◆

Of classical maestri, no one is regarded today in a class with the venerable Italian. . . . And it was a master stroke of enterprise that NBC lured him from his comparative retirement in his native Italy to conduct a truly notable corral of musicians in an endeavor to build up and maintain radio's cultural traditions. . . . The man's energy is truly amazing. . . . Though he is in his seventies, he wields a baton, drives his musicians with a force that would send many an athlete panting to the showers.

Gets Down To Business

The men take their places on a semi-circular stage in Radio City's largest auditorium at about two minutes before the zero hour. . . . A bit of tuning-up, and Toscanini walks briskly from the wings, bows quite as briskly, though never brusquely, to his applauding audience, wheels around, lifts his baton —and the concert is on. . . . You note his white hair, his thin, nervous figure . . . You note, too, that he does not read from score. . . . He has memorized the music. . . . There are no lights on the music racks, the lighting for the musicians coming from powerful incandescents in the lofty ceiling. . . . The auditorium is dimmed. . . . A faint glow issues from a control room, indicating that an announcer is on the job for the invisible audience, but the spectators present do not hear his remarks.

Including an intermission, the program lasts an hour and a half. . . . At the end there is clamorous applause. . . . The audience, still under the spell of great music, superbly interpreted, is not in a hurry to reach the elevators. . . . It is discussing animatedly the playing of this symphony or that tone poem, and Toscanini's vitality. . . . Here and there one detects an approving voice of the maestro's plan of giving hearings to America's young and altogether too obscure composers.

Lamar Stringfield, A.S.C.A.P.
(American composer and conductor)

Hearing for Americans

American composers are also getting respectful hearing in other quarters. The Boston Symphony has made a place on its programs for a rhapsody called "El Salon Mexico," by Aaron Copland. The work is the result of a visit to Mexica City by the composer and is based on Mexican tunes heard in the cafes. Sir Adrian Boult, English conductor, directed a radio performance of the piece here last season.

CLAY CENTER, KANS.
DISPATCH

JAN 30 1939

WITH A HEIGH-DI HAYDN, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the Composer Haydn manner, preparatory to a concert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky will impersonate Haydn—to whom he is said to bear a resemblance—and orchestra members will appear in 18th century finery.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 7 - 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Garb of Haydn's Day

As Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his men will look garbed as composer Joseph Haydn and his orchestra in the performance of Haydn's "Farewell" symphony as part of the concert to be given in Carnegie Hall tomorrow evening for the orchestra's pension fund.

Koussevitzky to Conduct As Haydn in Benefit Here

18th Century Dress Will Be Worn by Orchestra Tomorrow

Serge Koussevitzky and the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will wear eighteenth century costumes when they appear at Carnegie Hall tomorrow night to begin a "Concert Extraordinaire" for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund with Joseph Haydn's "Farewell" symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky, whose costume has been designed by Robert Edmond Jones will represent Haydn, conducting Prince Anton Esterhazy's orchestra during his long term of musical service with that nobleman's family at Esterhaz, then a part of Hungary. The musicians' stands will be lighted with candles.

The symphony was originally designed as a protest against economies in the Prince's musical budget. In the finale, the musicians put out their candles and go out, one by one, during the music. Tomorrow night's program also includes the first local performance of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale, as narrator; Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," to be sung by Colin O'More, tenor; and an international group of waltzes.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 9 - 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Orchestra Stages Frolic In 'Concert Extraordinaire' at Carnegie Hall as Benefit for Pension Fund

Given to presenting novelties at its regular concerts, The Boston Symphony Orchestra went further (further perhaps than it has ever gone before) and staged a novel evening at Carnegie Hall last night in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. It was called a "concert extraordinaire," and unusual it was, for the orchestra was in holiday mood as well as being in costume. We were amused, but there were some who "were not amused." That was too bad. They missed the fun of being present when an orchestra lets down its hair or rather tucks it under a periwig.

This concert made history in that the orchestra played the Haydn "Farewell" Symphony according to how it might have been done on the day for which Haydn composed it. That was a special occasion, for Prince Esterhazy had not granted his chamber orchestra its promised vacation and Haydn saw fit to remind him by composing a symphony wherein toward the close of the last movement each player rose at the point where his music stopped, put out his candle, and tiptoed out of the room until only the composer himself was left to take his "farewell." The prince took the hint and the orchestra went on holiday.

In an effective mise en scene with the musicians in 18th Century costumes and Dr. Koussevitzky impersonating Haydn in a costume designed by Robert Edmund Jones and conducting from the spinet, the orchestra carried out this story to the final blowing out of the last candle. It was a charming performance recapturing the spirit of the story and providing a program note other than those unusually found on the printed page.

In absolute contrast, the orchestra passed from the sublime to the ridiculous by playing Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz." This was presented with the orchestra in monkey jackets seated before a backdrop sketched in the modern mood. Richard Burgin conducted and Colin O'More sang the poem of Vachel Lindsay on which the musical score was based. A comparison of this with what had gone before would be odious!

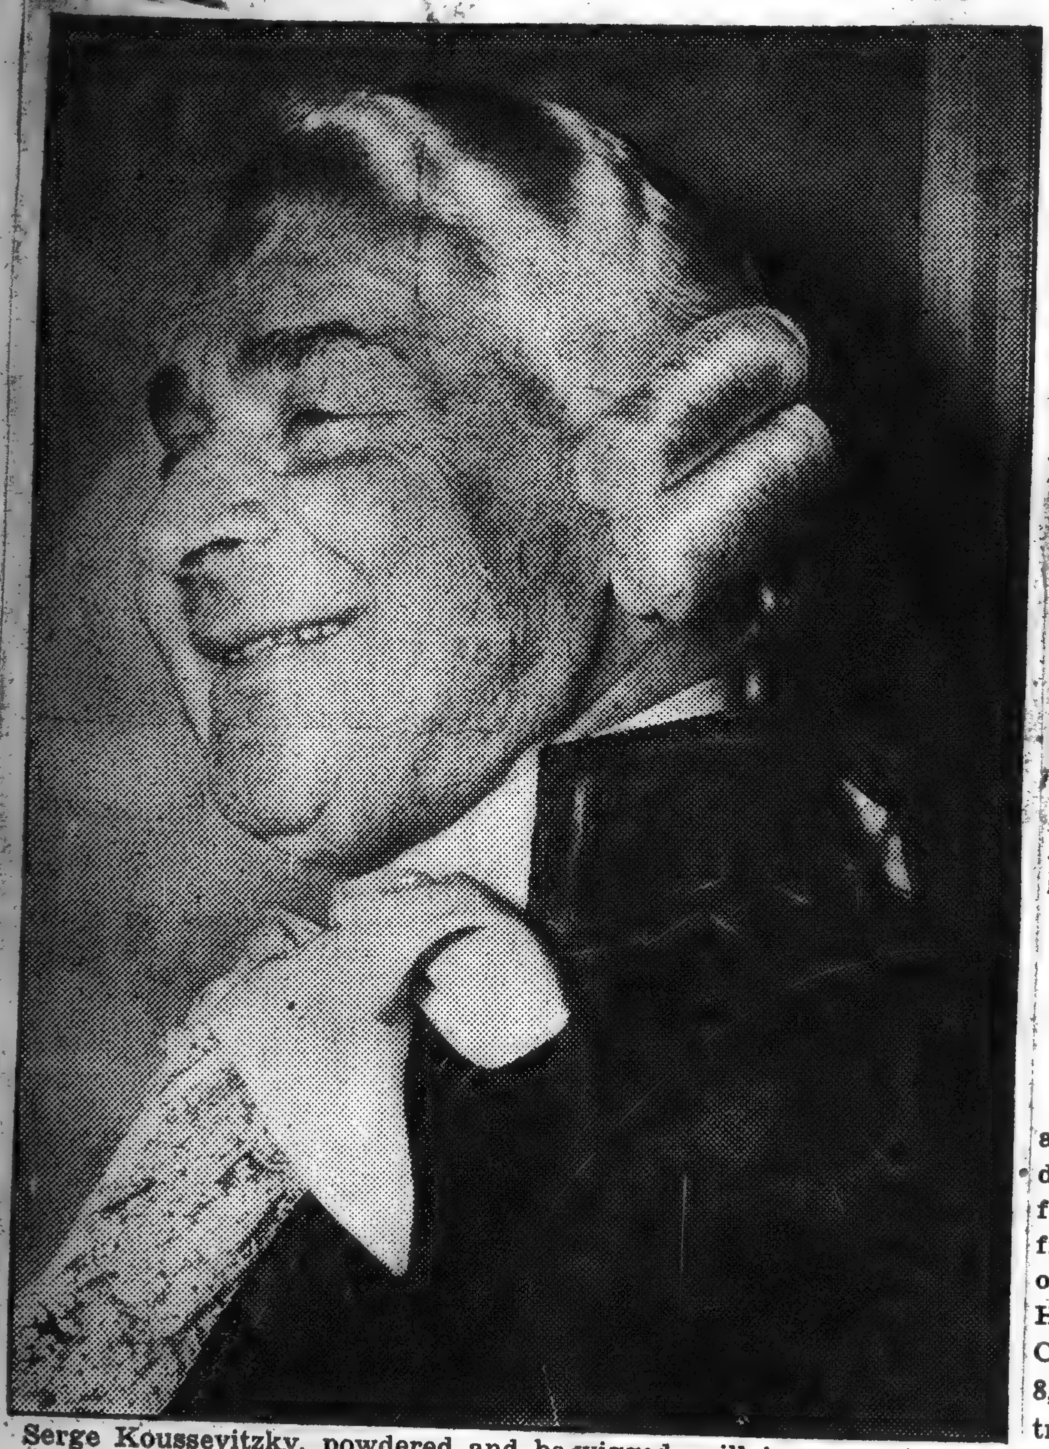
Still in the playful mood, Koussevitzky conducted Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," as orchestral fairy tale for children with Richard Hale as narrator. With the composer's excellent humor to give the right tonal background, this proved to be entertainment of still another kind.

The remainder of the concert was given over to an exposition of the waltz with the full orchestra performing Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and the "Fruhlingstimmen" Waltzes, Sibelius' Valse Triste and Ravel's "La Valse," Choreographic Poem. The playing ran true to form and brought the evening to a gay close. A large audience appeared to have a good time.

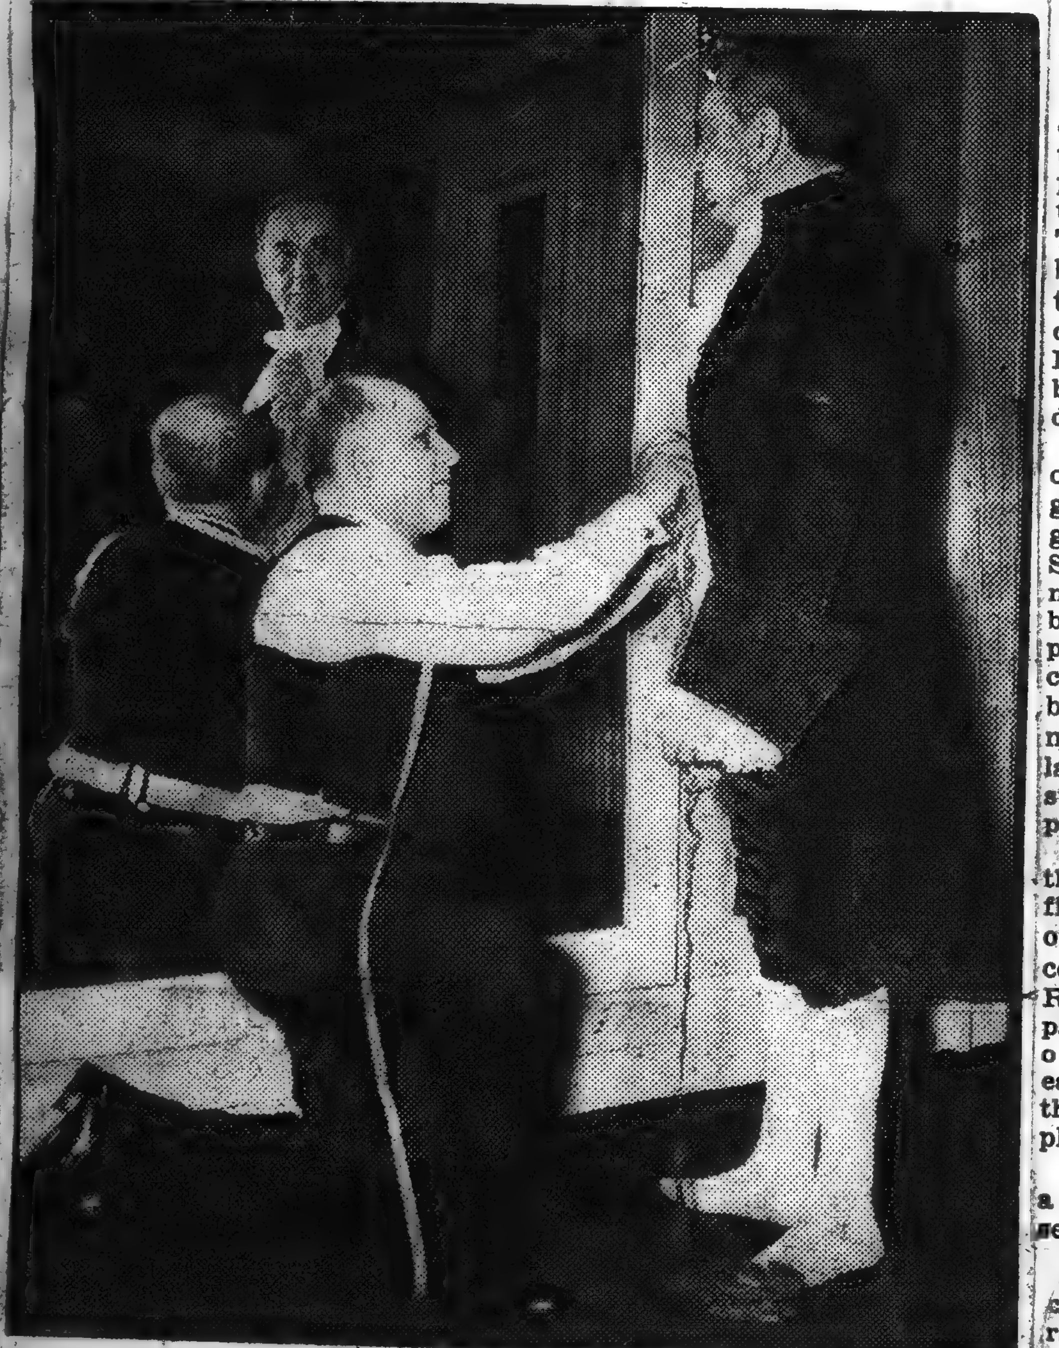
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JAN 29 1939

Koussevitzky 'Out of Character'



Serge Koussevitzky, powdered and be-wigged, will impersonate the composer Haydn when he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts "extraordinaire" at Boston Feb. 1 and in New York Feb. 8. He is shown here getting a laugh from his outfit.



—Associated Press Photos

A tailor busily takes the measure of Koussevitzky for the 18th Century outfit he will wear at the Feb. 1 and 8 concerts to benefit the Boston Symphony's pension fund.

* * *

POWDERED WIGS FOR ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony to Don 18th Century Garb For Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th Century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the Concert Extraordinaire, to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the fully costumed and be-wigged orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky bears marked facial resemblance to the composer will help to bear out the illusion that this is indeed Papa Haydn leading his orchestra before a court audience two hundred years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number, but complete secrecy surrounds the actual plans for its presentation.

There is still another novelty on the program, and that is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story o this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has his own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program. They nge from Lanner's gay "Die chonbrunner" to Ravel's choreoraphic poem "La Valse." Others o be played are the always popuar Strauss waltzes "Vienna Blood" nd "Voices of Spring," as well as Sibelius' best known work, "Valse Triste."

PRESS
Southbridge, Mass.
FEB 2 - 1939

Wells Glee Club Presents Operetta Tomorrow Night

Fine Cast Will Appear in "Harmony Hall"

In London it's the D'Oyly Carte. In New York it's the Metropolitan Opera. In Boston it's Koussevitzky and his Symphony, and in Southbridge, in its proper proportion, it's the Wells High School Glee Club and its annual operetta.

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

JAN 30 1939

ARTHUR FIEDLER, distinguished conductor of the Boston "Pops" and leading member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be guest conductor with the orchestra of Les Concerts Symphoniques in the Plateau Auditorium on Friday. This will be Mr. Fiedler's first appearance in Montreal.

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

FEB 1 - 1939

Conductor Says Music Is Art of Democracy

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston "Pops" which constitute the oldest series of popular concerts on this continent, and who is in Montreal to direct the orchestra of Les Concerts Symphoniques on Friday at the Plateau Auditorium, is a staunch believer in bringing good music to the masses. For Mr. Fiedler, music and democracy seem to be synomymous.

He also believes that American-born citizens of the United States should be given a better opportunity to take charge of ranking orchestras in their country. "It dawns upon me with amazement," said Mr. Fiedler, "that I am the only native musician directing a great orchestra. All the others either come directly from the other side of the Atlantic or have emigrated to this part of the world."

Conducting the famous "Pops," which Montrealers know either by visiting Boston during the summer or through the weekly broadcasts over CFCF through the network of the National Broadcasting Company, is no sinecure, according to Mr. Fiedler. Concerts are given every night during the summer, Sundays included. Consequently with the choosing and rehearsing of programmes, these months are among the busiest in the year.

The personnel of the "Pops" consists of the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra which Mr. Fiedler quietly and modestly claimed was the finest in America, less about ten of the leaders of various sections, chiefly strings. Mr. Fiedler, who has been the incumbent for many years, did not originate these summer concerts. Actually they are about 54 years old and were the invention of Major Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who instituted them after German models to give employment to the musicians during the summer.

Mr. Fiedler beleives that music should be popular but he is decisive as to where to draw the line. "Much of it is cheap trash," he claimed, "and too often it is tricked out by skilful arrangers so that it deludes the public into thinking it far better than it really is."

On the other hand much of it is good and some of it even better than that. "If Tschaikowsky had written 'Night and Day' we would bow to it as a classic," he said. And he mentioned that last summer he himself arranged and conducted a symphonic suite from the music to Walt Disney's "Snow White."

The Boston conductor is of the opinion that the classics are in great danger of suffering from being overplayed. "Twenty years ago we would walk miles to hear a performance of Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. Now, I am afraid, there are many of us who might want to run miles to get away from one."

[illegible]

works. The concerto introduces Bach chorale whose first notes the same as those upon which B [illegible]

Mr. Fiedler's programme on Friday will include a suite for strings by Corelli, Mozart's Symphony in G minor, the Brahms Violin Concerto and a novelty by Jacques Ibert. This will be his local debut as conductor.

CLEARWATER, FLA.
SUN

JAN 31 1939

ANNAPOLIS, MD.
CAPITAL

JAN 30 1939

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN

JAN 31 1939

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS

JAN 30 1939

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

FEB 1 - 1939

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES

JAN 31 1939

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 30 1939

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD

JAN 30 1939

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

FEB 1 - 1939

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

FEB 1 - 1939

IONIA, MICH.
SENTINEL STANDARD
JAN 31 1939

GREENVILLE, N. C.
REFLECTOR
FEB 1 - 1939

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.
RECORD
FEB 1 - 1939

WITH A HEIGH-DI HAYDN, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the Composer Haydn manner, preparatory to a concert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky will impersonate Haydn—to whom he is said to bear a resemblance—and orchestra members will appear in 18th century finery.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
JAN 30 1939

BELLEVILLE, ILL.
ADVOCATE
FEB 1 - 1939

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH
JAN 30 1939

EMPORIA, KAN.
GAZETTE
JAN 30 1939

BLACKWELL, OKLA.
JOURNAL
FEB 3 - 1939

STEUBENVILLE, O.
HERALD STAR
JAN 28 1939

WASHINGTON, IND.
HERALD
JAN 30 1939

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
JAN 30 1939

WILLIAMSPORT, PA.
GAZETTE-BULLETIN
JAN 30 1939

FAYETTEVILLE, N. C.
OBSERVER
JAN 30 1939

MARTINSBURG, W. VA.
JOURNAL
JAN 28 1939

GREENVILLE, TEX.
BANNER
JAN 31 1939

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS
JAN 29 1939

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS
JAN 29 1939

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
JAN 30 1939

FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL-GAZETTE
JAN 31 1939

LEBANON, PA.
NEWS
JAN 30 1939

JOPLIN, MO.
NEWS-HERALD
FEB 1 - 1939

WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER
FEB 1 - 1939

DEVILS LAKE, N. D.
JOURNAL
JAN 30 1939

LOCKPORT, N. Y.
UNION SUN JOURNAL
JAN 30 1939

SANDUSKY, O.
REGISTER
FEB 2 - 1939

YAKIMA, WASH.
REPUBLIC
FEB 2 - 1939

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN-RECORD
JAN 30 1939

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
JAN 29 1939

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
JAN 28 1939

MOUNT VERNON, ILL.
REGISTER NEWS
JAN 30 1939

LEWISTOWN, MONT.
DEMOCRAT-NEWS
FEB 2 - 1939

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER
JAN 28 1939

KEWANEE, ILL.
STAR COURIER
JAN 31 1939

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
JAN 28 1939

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD - DISPATCH
JAN 30 1939

LEXINGTON, KY.
HERALD
FEB 1 - 1939

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
Leader-Republican
JAN 28 1939

HAYS, KAN.
NEWS
FEB 1 - 1939

STERLING, COLO.
ADVOCATE
FEB 1 - 1939

McCOMB, ILL.
JOURNAL
FEB 1 - 1939

GETTYSBURG, PA.
TIMES
JAN 30 1939

SALAMANCA, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN PRESS
FEB 1 - 1939

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL
JAN 30 1939

WHEELING, W. VA.
INTELLIGENCER
JAN 31 1939

TEMPLE, TEX.
TELEGRAM
FEB 2 - 1939

GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 3 - 1939

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
JAN 31 1939

PALATKA, FLA.
NEWS
FEB 1 - 1939

ONEONTA, N. Y.
STAR
FEB 1 - 1939

HUTCHINSON, KAN.
NEWS
FEB 1 - 1939

ROSWELL, N. M.
DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1939

BRISTOL, VA.
NEWS BULLETIN
JAN 31 1939

FORT MEYERS, FLA.
NEWS PRESS
FEB 3 - 1939

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
JAN 30 1939

46

SANDPOINT, IDAHO
BULLETIN
JAN 31 1939

ALTON, ILL.
TELEGRAPH
JAN 30 1939

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR
JAN 28 1939

BATON ROUGE, LA.
STATE - TIMES
JAN 31 1939

INDEPENDENCE, KAN.
REPORTER
FEB 1 - 1939

MISSOULA, MONT.
SENTINEL
JAN 31 1939

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
JAN 30 1939

Bewigged Pension Fund In Jazz, Review of Waltz

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will dress in 18th century finery and powdered wigs for the first number of the "Concert Extraordinaire," to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 1, and in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the Orchestra's pension fund.

At the opening of the concert, the stage will be hidden by great red curtains. These will be drawn aside to reveal the orchestra seated in 18th Century chairs, with candle lighted music racks before them.

Dr. Koussevitzky, seated in front of a spinet, will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Farewell Symphony in very much the same way that the composer might have done before a court audience 200 years ago.

"Daniel Jazz," the next number on the program, will present the greatest possible contrast to the grace and courtliness of the Haydn Symphony which precedes it. This modern piece by Gruenberg was composed as a background for Vachel Lindsay's poem about the Old Testament character. The words will be sung by the tenor Colin O'More. "Jazz" is the keynote in the staging of this particular number.

Another novelty on the program is Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by the great contemporary Russian composer. Richard Hale, well known baritone and actor, will speak the accompanying words, which tell the story of this old Russian nursery tale, each character of which has its own theme and a special instrument to play it.

Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled a galaxy of famous waltzes for the second half of the program.

RECORD
Hackensack N.J.
FEB 2 - 1939

Advance On The Berkshire Music

~~Six~~ concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, Mass. The first series will be given August 3, 5 and 6, and the second, August 10, 12, and 13. Improvements at the site of the Shed will include draining of the parking areas, permanent lighting, laying out of roads, and perhaps an emergency enclosure for the Shed.

Trans

To the Music Editor:

I propose a hearty vote of thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky, and to all concerned, for a most entertaining and enlivening evening at the Pension "Fun" Concert. The music critics (I am tempted to call them "Gentlemen of De-Press"), seem to have taken it very seriously and reviewed it very solemnly, thereby missing the whole point. It wasn't a concert to be criticized, but rather to be enjoyed light-heartedly, and, judging from the laughter and applause, the audience appreciated this fact. The programme was clearly chosen and offered something for all tastes. Even those of us to whom jazz is what the proverbial red rag should have been to "Ferdinand," must have been diverted by the white-jacketed, red-carnationed group under Mr. Burgin's serio-comic direction. Again, our thanks to all concerned for a thoroughly enjoyable and entertaining evening.

WINIFRED H. JOHNSTONE
Boston, Feb. 2.

PENSACOLA, FLA.
JOURNAL
JAN 30 1939

TRENTON, MO.
REPUBLICAN - TIMES
FEB 1 - 1939

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

FEB 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony To Give Six Concerts at Festival

Next Momentous Step in Development of Tanglewood Is Opening of Academy in 1940

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3 5, and 6 and the second, Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

Acoustical Success of Shed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 5000 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the Festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood overlooking Lake Mahkeenac stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

Never before have so many music lovers heard symphonic programs in so unique a setting. The utilitarian simplicity of the shed only enhances its beauty. Festival trustees are confident that sufficient funds will be forthcoming for its early completion.

Programs for 1939

The Festival trustees, announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at Tanglewood, such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitsky will make the programs for the 1939 Festival from the following list of works; the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tchaikovsky, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "LaValse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra" and others to be announced.

The Project for an Academy

While directing their immediate attention to a program for 1939, that promises fully as much as in other years, the objective remains—a musical center for the year 1940. At the dedicatory exercises for the shed last summer, Bentley W. Warren, speaking for the trustees of the orchestra, made this announcement:

"We all hope the annual Festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players. Tanglewood is the ideal location for such a center.

"This fortunate combination of circumstances will provide an excellent beginning for the realization of Dr. Koussevitzky's program. Indeed the greatest need will be for scholarships. No one can doubt that from some source the necessary funds will be forthcoming; and it is expected that the detailed arrangements for the school will be completed so that its first session may precede the Berkshire Festival of 1940."

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are giving serious thought to the development of the physical plant at Tanglewood in anticipation of the next momentous step in expansion, scheduled for 1940.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc. at Stockbridge.

Deadline Today On Festival Memberships

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival office at Stockbridge announced today that this is the last day for payment on memberships taken in the Fall. The membership campaign was held several months earlier than usual. Subscriptions may be taken any time for the concerts to be given at Tanglewood this summer.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

FEB 2 - 1939

Boston Symphony to Play at Berkshire Festival This Year

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 2. (Special)—Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival here next summer. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second, Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium, which made it possible for an audience of more than 5,000 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood overlooking Lake Mahkeenac stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

The festival trustees will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2,000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, Mass.

COLUMBUS, GA.
LEDGER

FEB 3 - 1939

League.

AT THE CONCERT Extraordinaire, Haydin's Farewell Symphony is to be played and acted in Symphony Hall by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Koussevitzky himself impersonating Haydn. Against a special stage set now being prepared, the members of the orchestra will be seen in eighteenth century garb. To watch the costuming and lighting is to get a close up of Haydn's days which were the colonial days in America.

Musical Courier
Feb. 1/39

Boston Host to Toscanini At Head of NBC Orchestra

Enesco Assumes Baton of Home Symphonic Forces as Guest—Rumanian Novelties Heard—Flagstad, Crooks, Milstein Among Recitalists

BOSTON.—One of the most anticipated events of the season thus far was the first concert here by the NBC Orchestra conducted by Arturo Toscanini. Preceded by considerable fanfare, this august event took place in Symphony Hall on January 10.

Here was further testimony to the magic in the name of Toscanini, and to the enormous good work in spreading the gospel of symphonic music which radio has accomplished in the last decade or so. Mr. Toscanini's program, twice altered from the rather conservative list first announced, finally consisted of four of the Domenico Scarlatti sonatas arranged and orchestrated by Vincenzo Tommasini for the ballet The Good Humored Ladies; symphony (No. 3) in F major by Brahms, two Wagnerian excerpts—Forest Murmurs from Siegfried, and Siegfried's death music out of The Dusk of the Gods, and the Daphnis and Chloe suite (No. 2) by Ravel.

While the present reviewer is inclined to make certain reservations in details of Toscanini's reading of Brahms' third Symphony and the Ravel suite, such must be entered purely as a minority report, for the vast audience applauded with utmost warmth after each number and cheered conductor and orchestra to the echo when the concert was over. In the Wagner excerpts we heard great music magnificently performed. Indeed, I am led to assert that Toscanini's reading of the Siegfried death music is absolutely peerless. The NBC Orchestra impressed as a fine organization.

ENESCO LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Georges Enesco, whom musicians and public alike hail as a gifted and versatile musician, again made a personal triumph when he returned as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five concerts during the first half of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's annual respite of two weeks. For his first three concerts, January 12, 13 and 14, Mr. Enesco elected to play the Haffner Symphony of Mozart; the symphonic movement, Chef cu lautari (meaning Merrymaking with Fiddlers) by his fellow-Rumanian, Dinu Lipatti, and two of his own compositions, the second Rumanian Rhapsody and the first symphony. The list for his subsequent two appearances retained the music of Mozart and Lipatti, to which were added three works by Enesco, the two Rumanian Rhapsodies and the second suite for orchestra.

The musicianly qualities of Mr. Enesco's conducting won the immediate and plainly demonstrated favor of all the audiences before whom he appeared. His rhapsodies, seldom played here of late years, were enthusiastically received, and his intellectual suite and early first symphony met with general, though qualified, approval. Lipatti is a young composer, now almost twenty-two. His music is the finale of an orchestral suite titled Gypsies, and was written in 1934. Light, cleverly scored and exuberant music, it proved so small a sample as to make unfair any attempted estimate of his talent.

MAHLER'S SONGS OF A WAYFARER DONE

The cause of Gustav Mahler was nobly served when, on January 18 at Jordan Hall, the Songs of a Wayfarer were presented by Bernard Zighera and his chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony men. The soloist on this occasion was Cleora Wood, a soprano of clear, ample, subtly colored voice, and superb artistry, who sang Mahler's songs in beautiful fashion. She had not before been heard in Boston. The performance generally, under Mr. Zighera's sympathetic conducting, was admirable.

Miss Wood also offered Ah! Perfido! (Beethoven) and five songs of Hugo Wolf to orchestral accompaniment. The program contained two excellent works new to Boston—the Serenade (Jean Francaix) and Two Choric Dances, Op. 17a (Paul Creston).

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 2 - 1939

SIX CONCERTS WILL BE GIVEN

PITTSFIELD, Feb. 1—Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at "Tanglewood," in Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5, and 6 and the second, Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

The Festival trustees will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency inclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitsky will make the programs for the 1939 festival from the following list of works: the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tschaikovsky, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "LaValse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Pistons "Concerto for Orchestra" and others to be announced.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 2 - 1939

Providence Social Notes

Special to the Herald Tribune

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 1. — Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe will give a luncheon tomorrow for heads of Providence public schools to meet Mr. Wheeler Beckett, director of Young People's Concerts in Boston, who will discuss plans with the Parents' League of Providence, Mr. Hovey T. Freeman, president, for a concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March under the auspices of the Parents' League. Mrs. Arthur M. Allen is the artistic director.

Mr. Frank E. Richmond is cruising on his yacht from Boca Grande, Fla., with Mr. and Mrs. Rowland Hazard, Narragansett, and guests. Mrs. Richmond will go to Boca Grande later.

Mrs. Robinson Bull, who has been visiting Mrs. John B. Lewis sr., returned to New York today accompanied by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Pardon Miller.

Miss Elizabeth Wheeler Innis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, has returned from visiting Mr. and Mrs. John Owlsley and Miss Helen Owlsley, in New Haven, Conn.

BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

FEB 3 - 1939

THE Boston Symphony orchestra is giving what is described as a "concert extraordinaire" at Carnegie hall on February 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's penson fund. The program is made up of Haydn's Farewell" Symphony, performed in costume; Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," from the poem by Vachel Lindsay, with Colin O'More as tenor; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale with Richard Hale as narrator; Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blutt" and "Fruehlingstimmen" waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 2 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Present Three Popular Masterpieces

Three of the more popular masterpieces will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Tuesday night at the Rutgers gymnasium in the third presentation of the university's concert series.

Opening with Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, the artists will continue with Debussy's "La Mer" and conclude with the Symphony No. 4 in E minor of Brahms.

The symphony in B flat is probably the best-known of the 12 Salomon symphonies composed by the German musician during his stay in London about 1790. Dr. Koussevitzky has selected the number as one of the most representative of the prolific works of Haydn.

"La Mer"—The Sea—is the most renowned of all the works of Debussy. Koussevitzky has been hailed by critics as one of the most masterful interpreters of Debussy's compositions and the unique tone and artistry with which he has presented this number has thrilled music lovers again and again.

The noted French composer painted a rhythmic sketch of phases of the sea in his work. The first section deals with the serenity of the sea from dawn to noon; the second with the sport of the waves and the concluding one depicts the dialogue between the wind and the sea.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony will probably be most popular with listeners. Last year critics said the arrangement of the Boston Symphony of this selection would endure as one of the supreme movements in tonal art.

The local concert will be one of the last in the country this year for the Boston Orchestra. The unit of 120 men will leave shortly thereafter for a tour of Europe, where according to tentative plans, the orchestra will play 19 concerts.

SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL

FEB 3 - 1939

FESTIVAL IS PLANNED

Sixth Annual Orchestral Program Prepared For Stockbridge

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at 'Tanglewood,' at Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second, Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

Acoustical Success Of Shed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 500 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the Festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood overlooking Lake Mahkeenac stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

Never before have so many music lovers heard symphonic programs in so unique a setting. The utilitarian simplicity of the shed only enhances its beauty. Festival trustees are confident that sufficient funds will be forthcoming for its early completion.

Programs For 1939

The Festival trustees, announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitsky will make the programs for the 1939 Festival from the following list of works: the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tchaikovsky, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts. Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra" and others to be announced.

152

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

FEB 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony To Give Six Concerts at Festival

Next Momentous Step in Development of Tanglewood Is Opening of Academy in 1940

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3 5, and 6 and the second, Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

Acoustical Success of Shed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 5000 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the Festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood overlooking Lake Mahkeenac stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

Never before have so many music lovers heard symphonic programs in so unique a setting. The utilitarian simplicity of the shed only enhances its beauty. Festival trustees are confident that sufficient funds will be forthcoming for its early completion.

Programs for 1939

The Festival trustees, announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at Tanglewood, such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitzky will make the programs for the 1939 Festival from the following list of works: the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tchaikovsky, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "LaValse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra" and others to be announced.

The Project for an Academy

While directing their immediate attention to a program for 1939, that promises fully as much as in other years, the objective remains—a musical center for the year 1940. At the dedicatory exercises for the shed last summer, Bentley W. Warren, speaking for the trustees of the orchestra, made this announcement:

"We all hope the annual Festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players. Tanglewood is the ideal location for such a center.

"This fortunate combination of circumstances will provide an excellent beginning for the realization of Dr. Koussevitzky's program. Indeed the greatest need will be for scholarships. No one can doubt that from some source the necessary funds will be forthcoming; and it is expected that the detailed arrangements for the school will be completed so that its first session may precede the Berkshire Festival of 1940."

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are giving serious thought to the development of the physical plant at Tanglewood in anticipation of the next momentous step in expansion, scheduled for 1940.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc. at Stockbridge.

Deadline Today On Festival Memberships

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival office at Stockbridge announced today that this is the last day for payment on memberships taken in the Fall. The membership campaign was held several months earlier than usual. Subscriptions may be taken any time for the concerts to be given at Tanglewood this summer.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

FEB 2 - 1939

Boston Symphony to Play at Berkshire Festival This Year

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 2 (Special)—Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival here next summer. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second, Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 5,000 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood overlooking Lake Mahkeenac stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

The festival trustees will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2,000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, Mass.

COLUMBUS, GA.
LEDGER

FEB 3 - 1939

[illegible].

AT THE CONCERT Extraordinaire," Haydin's Farewell Symphony is to be played and acted in Symphony Hall by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, with [illegible] himself impersonating Haydn. Against a special stage set now being prepared, the members of the orchestra will be seen in eighteenth century garb. To watch the costuming and lighting is to get a close up of Haydn's days which were the colonial days in America.

Musical Courier
Feb. 1/39

Boston Host to Toscanini At Head of NBC Orchestra

Enesco Assumes Baton of Home Symphonic Forces as Guest—Rumanian Novelties Heard—Flagstad, Crooks, Milstein Among Recitalists

BOSTON.—One of the most anticipated events of the season thus far was the first concert here by the NBC Orchestra conducted by Arturo Toscanini. Preceded by considerable fanfare, this august event took place in Symphony Hall on January 10.

Here was further testimony to the magic in the name of Toscanini, and to the enormous good work in spreading the gospel of symphonic music which radio has accomplished in the last decade or so. Mr. Toscanini's program, twice altered from the rather conservative list first announced, finally consisted of four of the Domenico Scarlatti sonatas arranged and orchestrated by Vincenzo Tommasini for the ballet The Good Humored Ladies; symphony (No. 3) in F major by Brahms, two Wagnerian excerpts—Forest Murmurs from Siegfried, and Siegfried's death music out of The Dusk of the Gods, and the Daphnis and Chloe suite (No. 2) by Ravel.

While the present reviewer is inclined to make certain reservations in details of Toscanini's reading of Brahms' third Symphony and the Ravel suite, such must be entered purely as a minority report, for the vast audience applauded with utmost warmth after each number and cheered conductor and orchestra to the echo when the concert was over. In the Wagner excerpts we heard great music magnificently performed. Indeed, I am led to assert that Toscanini's reading of the Siegfried death music is absolutely peerless. The NBC Orchestra impressed as a fine organization.

Enesco Leads Boston Orchestra

Georges Enesco, whom musicians and public alike hail as a gifted and versatile musician, again made a personal triumph when he returned as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five concerts during the first half of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's annual respite of two weeks. For his first three concerts, January 12, 13 and 14, Mr. Enesco elected to play the Haffner Symphony of Mozart; the symphonic movement, Chef cu lautari (meaning Merrymaking with Fiddlers) by his fellow-Rumanian, Dinu Lipatti, and two of his own compositions, the second Rumanian Rhapsody and the first symphony. The list for his subsequent two appearances retained the music of Mozart and Lipatti, to which were added three works by Enesco, the two Rumanian Rhapsodies and the second suite for orchestra.

The musicianly qualities of Mr. Enesco's conducting won the immediate and plainly demonstrated favor of all the audiences before whom he appeared. His rhapsodies, seldom played here of late years, were enthusiastically received, and his intellectual suite and early first symphony met with general, though qualified, approval. Lipatti is a young composer, now almost twenty-two. His music is the finale of an orchestral suite titled Gypsies, and was written in 1934. Light, cleverly scored and exuberant music, it proved so small a sample as to make unfair any attempted estimate of his talent.

Mahler's Songs of a Wayfarer Done

The cause of Gustav Mahler was nobly served when, on January 18 at Jordan Hall, the Songs of a Wayfarer were presented by Bernard Zighera and his chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony men. The soloist on this occasion was Cleora Wood, a soprano of clear, ample, subtly colored voice, and superb artistry, who sang Mahler's songs in beautiful fashion. She had not before been heard in Boston. The performance generally, under Mr. Zighera's sympathetic conducting, was admirable.

Miss Wood also offered Ah! Perfido! (Beethoven) and five songs of Hugo Wolf to orchestral accompaniment. The program contained two excellent works new to Boston—the Serenade (Jean Francaix) and Two Choric Dances, Op. 17a (Paul Creston).

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 2 - 1939

SIX CONCERTS WILL BE GIVEN

PITTSFIELD, Feb. 1—Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at "Tanglewood," in Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5, and 6 and the second, Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

The Festival trustees will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency inclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitzky will make the programs for the 1939 festival from the following list of works: the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tschaikovsky, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "LaValse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Pistons "Concerto for Orchestra" and others to be announced.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 2 - 1939

Providence Social Notes

Special to the Herald Tribune

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 1.—Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe will give a luncheon tomorrow for heads of Providence public schools to meet Mr. Wheeler Beckett, director of Young People's Concerts in Boston, who will discuss plans with the Parents' League of Providence, Mr. Hovey T. Freeman, president, for a concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March under the auspices of the Parents' League. Mrs. Arthur M. Allen is the artistic director.

Mr. Frank E. Richmond is cruising on his yacht from Boca Grande, Fla., with Mr. and Mrs. Rowland Hazard, Narragansett, and guests. Mrs. Richmond will go to Boca Grande later.

Mrs. Robinson Bull, who has been visiting Mrs. John B. Lewis sr., returned to New York today accompanied by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Pardon Miller.

Miss Elizabeth Wheeler Innis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, has returned from visiting Mr. and Mrs. John Owlsley and Miss Helen Owlsley, in New Haven, Conn.

SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL

FEB 3 - 1939

FESTIVAL IS PLANNED

Sixth Annual Orchestral Program Prepared For Stockbridge

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at 'Tanglewood,' at Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second, Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

Acoustical Success Of Shed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dodication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 500 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the Festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood overlooking Lake Mahkeenac stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

Never before have so many music lovers heard symphonic programs in so unique a setting. The utilitarian simplicity of the shed only enhances its beauty. Festival trustees are confident that sufficient funds will be forthcoming for its early completion.

Programs For 1939

The Festival trustees, announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitzky will make the programs for the 1939 Festival from the following list of works: the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tchaikovsky, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra" and others to be announced.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 2 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Present Three Popular Masterpieces

Three of the more popular masterpieces will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Tuesday night at the Rutgers gymnasium in the third presentation of the university's concert series.

Opening with Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, the artists will continue with Debussy's "La Mer" and conclude with the Symphony No. 4 in E minor of Brahms.

The symphony in B flat is probably the best-known of the 12 Salomon symphonies composed by the German musician during his stay in London about 1790. Dr. Koussevitzky has selected the number as one of the most representative of the prolific works of Haydn.

"La Mer"—The Sea—is the most renowned of all the works of Debussy. Koussevitzky has been hailed by critics as one of the most masterful interpreters of Debussy's compositions and the unique tone and artistry with which he has presented this number has thrilled music lovers again and again.

The noted French composer painted a rhythmic sketch of phases of the sea in his work. The first section deals with the serenity of the sea from dawn to noon; the second with the sport of the waves and the concluding one depicts the dialogue between the wind and the sea.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony will probably be most popular with listeners. Last year critics said the arrangement of the Boston Symphony of this selection would endure as one of the supreme movements in tonal art.

The local concert will be one of the last in the country this year for the Boston Orchestra. The unit of 120 men will leave shortly thereafter for a tour of Europe, where according to tentative plans, the orchestra will play 19 concerts.

BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

FEB 3 - 1939

THE Boston Symphony orchestra is giving what is described as a "concert extraordinaire" at Carnegie hall on February 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's penson fund. The program is made up of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, performed in costume; Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," from the poem by Vachel Lindsay, with Colin O'More as tenor; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale with Richard Hale as narrator; Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blutt" and "Fruehlingstimmen" waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

OLD COSTUME. — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky donned wig and knee breeches to direct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 3 - 1939

Berkshire Festival Program

List Is Made Public From Which Koussevitzky Will Choose

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has announced that Serge Koussevitzky will choose the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in next summer's festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from a list including Beethoven's second and third symphonies, Brahms's first and third symphonies, Sibelius's second and fifth symphonies, Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, various symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Walter Piston's concerto for orchestra and excerpts from Wagner's operas. The six festival concerts will be held on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, August 3, 5, 6, 10, 12 and 13.

PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD - NEWS

FEB 3 - 1939

Students Hiss Conductor And He Merely Grins

BOSTON, (U.P.)—The "unheard of" has happened. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra conductor, has been hissed—by students. But it was all in fun.

Apparently disturbed by the presence of spectators at a rehearsal of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in which Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs were participating, the maestro let it ke known during intermission that friends of the singers would be barred from future rehearsals.

A wave of hisses greeted the announcement. But Koussevitzky grinned and the rehearsal was resumed.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Brooklyn Spectator

FEB 3 - 1939

Boston Symphony Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the third concert of its Brooklyn series on Thursday evening, Feb. 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

These concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn Committee

---

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

FEB 4 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Play at Rutgers Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its famous director, Serge Koussevitsky conducting for his 15th consecutive season, will come to New Brunswick, Tuesday evening for the fifth successive year. The annual concert by this superb organization of 100 instrumentalists will be presented as the third major event in this year's Rutgers University concert series and will commence at 8:30 o'clock in the college gymnasium.

Fifty-Eighth Year

More than ever before the worth of the Boston Symphony, with its 58 years of tradition behind it, is being realized throughout the United States. Rutgers is the only university regularly included in its winter tours. The New Brunswick concert audiences are always augmented by a large number of Plainfield subscribers and numerous music lovers from nearby communities, who appreciate having performances of such merit brought to New Jersey.

Program Announced

Dr. Koussevitsky is considered a genius at program-making, as well as a magnetic leader. On Tuesday evening he will use works of Haydn, Brahms, and Debussy as his vehicles for symphonic expression. He has picked from the great Franz Joseph's 125 symphonies, number 102 in B Flat major with its four impressive movements as the opening number. This will be followed by the entirely different type of orchestral-writing employed by Claude Debussy in his set of three symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." The orchestra will climax the evening's offerings with the magnificent E minor Symphony number four, by Johannes Brahms.

CANTON, ILL.
LEDGER

FEB 4 - 1939

The Boston Symphony orchestra is giving what is described as a "concert extraordinaire" at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The program is made up of Haydn's Farewell" Symphony, performed in costume; Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," from the poem by Vachel Lindsay, with Colin O'More as tenor; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale with Richard Hale as narrator; Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

COLUMBIA, PA.
NEWS

FEB 4 - 1939

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving what is described

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 5 -1939

ARRANGE CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe entertained at luncheon at her Prospect street residence Thursday for some of the officials of the public schools throughout the State to meet Mr. Wheeler Beckett, director of young people's concerts in Boston, and Mrs. Beckett. The topic discussed was organization work.

Among the group was Dr. James F. Rockett, Rhode Island Commissioner of Education; also Dr. James L. Hanley, superintendent of the Providence public schools, and Mr. Francis J. Brady, chairman of the school committee, and Mr. John H. Wells, a member of the school committee.

At the close of luncheon, Mr. Beckett met with the council and committee members of the Parents' League of Providence to further plans for the concert that group will sponsor at the Metropolitan Theatre for young people by 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Arthur M. Allen (Martha Baird), artist-director, Wednesday afternoon, March 15, at 4 o'clock.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

FEB 4 -1939

Concerts At Dell May Be Dropped

Men of Orchestra Say Some One Else Must Take Risk

Summer concerts in Robin Hood Dell must be abandoned unless someone other than the players is willing to bear the financial risk.

That was the decision of the men of the Philadelphia Orchestra last night, as contained in a formal announcement by the Committee for the Robin Hood Dell Concerts, Inc.

"The Committee has been instructed by the men to announce that the concerts will be abandoned if it is necessary for them to consider another co-operative season," the statement said.

Won't Take Risk.

"For eight years the men of the orchestra have operated the Dell themselves, employing a manager and sharing in net receipts. There has been no fixed salary guaranteed and no fund-raising mechanism to assist them. The men of the orchestra have agreed unanimously not to hazard another season on this basis."

The committee referred to last year's season, rendered almost disastrous by rain on 14 of the 35 concert nights—and the public's fear of rain on the others. The musicians, it was reported, averaged little better than $20 a week.

"I won't tell you the figure, because it is degrading," said one musical authority. "But it was less than half what the men in the New York Philharmonic got for their summer season." That season was underwritten by a citizens' committee, which raised $75,000. All other similar seasons —Boston, Detroit, Hollywood— likewise are underwritten.

Winter Season Endowed.

Here the men have been forced to take a chance on the receipts at 25 cents and 50 cents a seat. The summer season hasn't had any financing since the original "stake" of $125,000 eight years ago. In contrast, the winter season of the Philadelphia Orchestra is endowed. Recently the Orchestra Association raised a $100,000 maintenance fund.

The men of the orchestra offered no solution, simply describing the situation. A public campaign to underwrite possible losses has been suggested, but just what the amount might be is not known. Emma Feldman, veteran manager, hinted at $20,000 when the season ended last fall. All or none of that might be used, depending on the attendance at the concerts.

Conclusion.

The orchestra committee's statement concludes as follows:

"Across the country there is the spectacle of summer concerts operated by committees which guarantee salaries to the musicians of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and the Los Angles Philharmonic Orchestra, and yet the men of the Philadelphia Orchestra must worry along as best they can, operating their own concert series without support of any organized group of Philadelphians.

"This has been the case for eight years, and the men of the orchestra do not believe they can do justice either to themselves or to the Philadelphia Orchestra if they continue to operate the Dell.

Willing to Work.

"They have no proposal to make other than the fact that they are ready and willing to perform a season of summer concerts which will match in artistry the summer season of any symphony orchestra in the world.

Planning and guaranteeing of such a series, they feel, is not rightfully the province of the performers. Therefore, unless in some way or other Philadelphians can find a way of planning and guaranteeing a summer season of symphony concerts, the men of the Philadelphia Orchestra who normally would expect to play at Robin Hood Dell in Fairmount Park this summer will scatter and seek work or relaxation elsewhere.

The Committee of the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra stands ready to meet and co-operate with anyone who will assist in planning a guaranteed summer concert season and thereby save for Philadelphia one of its most attractive cultural attributes."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 4 -1939

Boston Symphony Cellist to Appear As Chorus Soloist

Louis Pellettieri, conductor of the Wethersfield Women's Chorus, which will present its eighth annual concert Feb. 21, announces that Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony, will be soloist this year.

Mr. Bedetti was born in Lyons, France, Dec. 18, 1883. He first studied cello with his father at the conservatory of his native city, making his first public appearance there at the age of 11. He continued his study at the Paris Conservatory with Jules Loeb and took first prize in 1902.

He became first cellist of the Opera Comique Orchestre in 1904 and of the Colonne Orchestra in 1908. These activities, with appearances in chamber music and reitals in many European cities, were interrupted by the war, which called him to service. In the autumn of 1919 he came to America to assume his present position.

The chorus will sing the Handel-Geer "May No Rash Intruder Disturb," the Durante-Braun "Virgin Full of Grace," the Donandy-Taylor "Fragrant Groves and Flowery Meadows," and the Purcell-Harris "Nymphs and Shepherds" for its first group.

The three remaining will include "The Foggy Dew," Irish folksong; "There Was a Pig Went Out to Dig," English folksong, arr. Grainger; "Gute Nacht," German folksong; "Grizzly, Grumpy Granny," Belgian folksong, arr. Taylor; "Zueignung," Strauss - Taylor; ''Impatience,'' Schubert; "Morgen," Strauss-Kramer; "He, Zigeuner," Brahms-Taylor; "The Perfect Hour," Poldowski-Harris; "Moon Marketing," Weaver; "Nobody Knows the Trouble I See," Negro melody; "Mia Carlotta," Dunn.

The concert will be given in the Wethersfield High School at 8:30 p. m.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker News

FEB 4 -1939

Six Concerts Planned at Festival

SIX concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at "Tanglewood," in Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5 and 6, and the second Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 5,000 to hear every detail.

The festival trustees, announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitsky will make the programs for the 1939 festival from the following list of works: Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Fourth of Tchaikovsky, Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra," and others to be announced.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are giving serious thought to the development of the physical plant at "Tanglewood" in anticipation of the next momentous step in expansion, scheduled for 1940.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1, with the result that audiences of more than 2,000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc. at Stockbridge, Mass.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 4 - 1939

"Papa" Koussevitzky

Haydn's Farewell Symphony performed in costume, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at Carnegie Hall, 7th Ave. at 57th St. Wed. eve. Feb. 8th, 8:45 p.m. Benefit for Boston Symphony Pension Fund. $1—$5. Tickets at Carnegie Hall box office. CIrcle 7-7460.

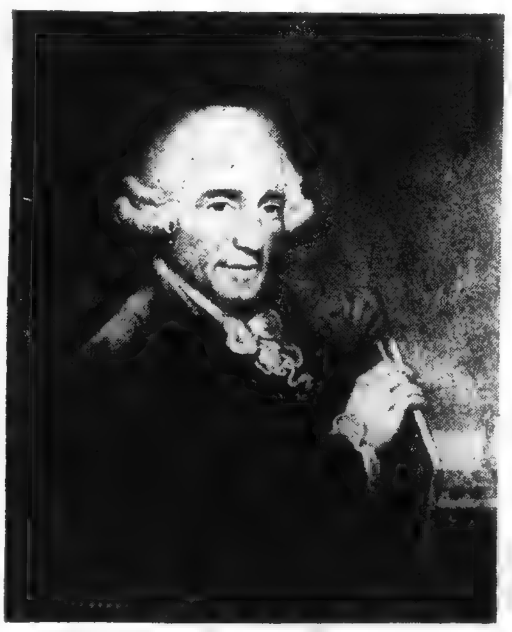
There'll be something new under the sun next Wednesday night when conductor Koussevitzky opens his Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert with old "Papa" Haydn's Farewell Symphony — with conductor and orchestra turned out, to a man, in costumes of the period.

If you've never heard the Farewell Symphony except over the radio, you may not know that the players are supposed to get up one by one, blow out the candle on the music stand, and steal away, finally leaving the conductor alone at his harpsichord, to finish the music and then depart.

Dr. Koussevitzky doesn't look very much like the great Franz Josef Haydn—he's got a much better figure, for one thing; but his costume, designed by Robert Edmond Jones, will be an authentic Haydn outfit. It's being put together now under the eagle eye of Mr. Dave, of the Eaves Costume Co., here in New York. The coat is black brocade, with genuine antique cut steel buttons. Under it is an elegant waistcoat of egg-shell faille trimmed with gold lace. Black satin knee breeches, silk stockings, and buckled pumps complete the dazzling ensemble.

Making such a costume for ordinary use is hard enough, but in this case, additional problems had to be met. The sleeves of the coat, for example, had to be cut on a ball-bearing principle, to allow Dr. Koussevitzky the necessary freedom for playing the harpsichord and conducting. Then, the breeches have to be equally comfortable—and trim—sitting or standing.

Mr. Dave, who's been putting his tape around waists for 28 years and should know something about figures, will testify to the excellence of the 20th Century "Papa" Haydn's. From a chest measuring a magnificent 41 inches, he tapers down to a 35½ inch waist, which is a pleasing improvement on the proportions of 18th Century predecessor.



PAPA HAYDN LOOKED LIKE THIS

OLD COSTUME. — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky donned wig and knee breeches to direct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 3 - 1939

Berkshire Festival Program

List Is Made Public From Which Koussevitzky Will Choose

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has announced that Serge Koussevitzky will choose the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in next summer's festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from a list including Beethoven's second and third symphonies, Brahms's first and third symphonies, Sibelius's second and fifth symphonies, Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, various symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Walter Piston's concerto for orchestra and excerpts from Wagner's operas. The six festival concerts will be held on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, August 3, 5, 6, 10, 12 and 13.

PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD - NEWS

FEB 3 - 1939

Students Hiss Conductor And He Merely Grins

BOSTON, (U.P.)—The "unheard of" has happened. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra conductor, has been hissed—by students. But it was all in fun.

Apparently disturbed by the presence of spectators at a rehearsal of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in which Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs were participating, the maestro let it be known during intermission that friends of the singers would be barred from future rehearsals.

A wave of hisses greeted the announcement. But Koussevitzky grinned and the rehearsal was resumed.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Brooklyn Spectator

FEB 3 - 1939

Boston Symphony Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the third concert of its Brooklyn series on Thursday evening, Feb. 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

These concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn Committee

---

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

FEB 4 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Play at Rutgers Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its famous director, Serge Koussevitzky conducting for his 15th consecutive season, will come to New Brunswick, Tuesday evening for the fifth successive year. The annual concert by this superb organization of 100 instrumentalists will be presented as the third major event in this year's Rutgers University concert series and will commence at 8:30 o'clock in the college gymnasium.

Fifty-Eighth Year

More than ever before the worth of the Boston Symphony, with its 58 years of tradition behind it, is being realized throughout the United States. Rutgers is the only university regularly included in its winter tours. The New Brunswick concert audiences are always augmented by a large number of Plainfield subscribers and numerous music lovers from nearby communities, who appreciate having performances of such merit brought to New Jersey.

Program Announced

Dr. Koussevitsky is considered a genius at program-making, as well as a magnetic leader. On Tuesday evening he will use works of Haydn, Brahms, and Debussy as his vehicles for symphonic expression. He has picked from the great Franz Joseph's 125 symphonies, number 102 in B Flat major with its four impressive movements as the opening number. This will be followed by the entirely different type of orchestral-writing employed by Claude Debussy in his set of three symphonic sketches entitled "The Sea." The orchestra will climax the evening's offerings with the magnificent E minor Symphony number four, by Johannes Brahms.

CANTON, ILL.
LEDGER

FEB 4 - 1939

The Boston Symphony orchestra is giving what is described as a "concert extraordinaire" at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The program is made up of Haydn's Farewell" Symphony, performed in costume; Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," from the poem by Vachel Lindsay, with Colin O'More as tenor; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale with Richard Hale as narrator; Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

COLUMBIA, PA.
NEWS

FEB 4 - 1939

THE [redacted] Symphony Orchestra is giving what is described

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 5 - 1939

ARRANGE CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe entertained at luncheon at her Prospect street residence Thursday for some of the officials of the public schools throughout the State to meet Mr. Wheeler Beckett, director of young people's concerts in Boston, and Mrs. Beckett. The topic discussed was organization work.

Among the group was Dr. James F. Rockett, Rhode Island Commissioner of Education; also Dr. James L. Hanley, superintendent of the Providence public schools, and Mr. Francis J. Brady, chairman of the school committee, and Mr. John H. Wells, a member of the school committee.

At the close of luncheon, Mr. Beckett met with the council and committee members of the Parents' League of Providence to further plans for the concert that group will sponsor at the Metropolitan Theatre for young people by 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. [redacted]len (Martha Baird), artist-director, Wednesday afternoon, March 15, at 4 o'clock.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

FEB 4 - 1939

Concerts At Dell May Be Dropped

Men of Orchestra Say Some One Else Must Take Risk

Summer concerts in Robin Hood Dell must be abandoned unless someone other than the players is willing to bear the financial risk.

That was the decision of the men of the Philadelphia Orchestra last night, as contained in a formal announcement by the Committee for the Robin Hood Dell Concerts, Inc.

"The Committee has been instructed by the men to announce that the concerts will be abandoned if it is necessary for them to consider another co-operative season," the statement said.

Won't Take Risk.

"For eight years the men of the orchestra have operated the Dell themselves, employing a manager and sharing in net receipts. There has been no fixed salary guaranteed and no fund-raising mechanism to assist them. The men of the orchestra have agreed unanimously not to hazard another season on this basis."

The committee referred to last year's season, rendered almost disastrous by rain on 14 of the 35 concert nights—and the public's fear of rain on the others. The musicians, it was reported, averaged little better than $20 a week.

"I won't tell you the figure, because it is degrading," said one musical authority. "But it was less than half what the men in the New York Philharmonic got for their summer season." That season was underwritten by a citizens' committee, which raised $75,000. All other similar seasons—Boston, Detroit, Hollywood—likewise are underwritten.

Winter Season Endowed.

Here the men have been forced to take a chance on the receipts at 25 cents and 50 cents a seat. The summer season hasn't had any financing since the original "stake" of $125,000 eight years ago. In contrast, the winter season of the Philadelphia Orchestra is endowed. Recently the Orchestra Association raised a $100,000 maintenance fund.

The men of the orchestra offered no solution, simply describing the situation. A public campaign to underwrite possible losses has been suggested, but just what the amount might be is not known. Emma Feldman, veteran manager, hinted at $20,000 when the season ended last fall. All or none of that might be used, depending on the attendance at the concerts.

Conclusion.

The orchestra committee's statement concludes as follows:

"Across the country there is the spectacle of summer concerts operated by committees which guarantee salaries to the musicians of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the [redacted]phony Orchestra and the Los Angles Philharmonic Orchestra, and yet the men of the Philadelphia Orchestra must worry along as best they can, operating their own concert series without support of any organized group of Philadelphians.

"This has been the case for eight years, and the men of the orchestra do not believe they can do justice either to themselves or to the Philadelphia Orchestra if they continue to operate the Dell.

Willing to Work.

"They have no proposal to make other than the fact that they are ready and willing to perform a season of summer concerts which will match in artistry the summer season of any symphony orchestra in the world.

Planning and guaranteeing of such a series, they feel, is not rightfully the province of the performers. Therefore, unless in some way or other Philadelphians can find a way of planning and guaranteeing a summer season of symphony concerts, the men of the Philadelphia Orchestra who normally would expect to play at Robin Hood Dell in Fairmount Park this summer will scatter and seek work or relaxation elsewhere.

The Committee of the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra stands ready to meet and co-operate with anyone who will assist in planning a guaranteed summer concert season and thereby save for Philadelphia one of its most attractive cultural attributes."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 4 - 1939

Boston Symphony Cellist to Appear As Chorus Soloist

Louis Pellettieri, conductor of the Wethersfield Women's Chorus, which will present its eighth annual concert Feb. 21, announces that Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony, will be soloist this year.

Mr. Bedetti was born in Lyons, France, Dec. 18, 1883. He first studied cello with his father at the conservatory of his native city, making his first public appearance there at the age of 11. He continued his study at the Paris Conservatory with Jules Loeb and took first prize in 1902.

He became first cellist of the Opera Comique Orchestre in 1904 and of the Colonne Orchestra in 1908. These activities, with appearances in chamber music and reitals in many European cities, were interrupted by the war, which called him to service. In the autumn of 1919 he came to America to assume his present position.

The chorus will sing the Handel-Geer "May No Rash Intruder Disturb," the Durante-Braun "Virgin Full of Grace," the Donandy-Taylor "Fragrant Groves and Flowery Meadows," and the Purcell-Harris "Nymphs and Shepherds" for its first group.

The three remaining will include "The Foggy Dew," Irish folksong; "There Was a Pig Went Out to Dig," English folksong, arr. Grainger; "Gute Nacht," German folksong; "Grizzly, Grumpy Granny," Belgian folksong, arr. Taylor; "Zueignung," Strauss - Taylor; "Impatience," Schubert; "Morgen," Strauss-Kramer; "He, Zigeuner," Brahms-Taylor; "The Perfect Hour," Poldowski-Harris; "Moon Marketing," Weaver; "Nobody Knows the Trouble I See," Negro melody; "Mia Carlotta," Dunn.

The concert will be given in the Wethersfield High School at 8:30 p. m.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker News

FEB 4 - 1939

Six Concerts Planned at Festival

SIX concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at "Tanglewood," in Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5 and 6, and the second Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 5,000 to hear every detail.

The festival trustees, announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitsky will make the programs for the 1939 festival from the following list of works: Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, First and Third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Fourth of Tchaikovsky, Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra," and others to be announced.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are giving serious thought to the development of the physical plant at "Tanglewood" in anticipation of the next momentous step in expansion, scheduled for 1940.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1, with the result that audiences of more than 2,000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being re-

---

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 4 - 1939

"Papa" Koussevitzky

Haydn's Farewell Symphony performed in costume, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at Carnegie Hall, 7th Ave. at 57th St. Wed. eve. Feb. 8th, 8:45 p.m. Benefit for Boston Symphony Pension Fund. $1—$5. Tickets at Carnegie Hall box office. CIrcle 7-7460.

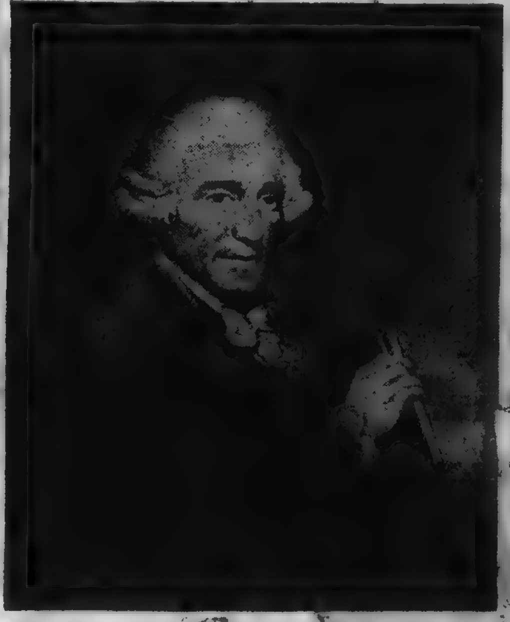
There'll be something new under the sun next Wednesday night when conductor Koussevitzky opens his Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert with old "Papa" Haydn's Farewell Symphony — with conductor and orchestra turned out, to a man, in costumes of the period.

If you've never heard the Farewell Symphony except over the radio, you may not know that the players are supposed to get up one by one, blow out the candle on the music stand, and steal away, finally leaving the conductor alone at his harpsichord, to finish the music and then depart.

Dr. Koussevitzky doesn't look very much like the great Franz Josef Haydn—he's got a much better figure, for one thing; but his costume, designed by Robert Edmond Jones, will be an authentic Haydn outfit. It's being put together now under the eagle eye of Mr. Dave, of the Eaves Costume Co., here in New York. The coat is black brocade, with genuine antique cut steel buttons. Under it is an elegant waistcoat of egg-shell faille trimmed with gold lace. Black satin knee breeches, silk stockings, and buckled pumps complete the dazzling ensemble.

Making such a costume for ordinary use is hard enough, but in this case, additional problems had to be met. The sleeves of the coat, for example, had to be cut on a ball-bearing principle, to allow Dr. Koussevitzky the necessary freedom for playing the harpsichord and conducting. Then, the breeches have to be equally comfortable—and trim—sitting or standing.

Mr. Dave, who's been putting his tape around waists for 28 years and should know something about figures, will testify to the excellence of the 20th Century "Papa" Haydn's. From a chest measuring a magnificent 41 inches, he tapers down to a 35½ inch waist, which is a pleasing improvement on the proportions of 18th Century predecessor.



PAPA HAYDN LOOKED LIKE THIS

154

MUSIC

Feb. 4/39

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 15th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 8 in C minor .... Bruckner
"Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel .... Moussorgsky

The Bruckner-Mahler controversy and all the ramifications which it implies are now far enough distant so that we ought to be able to listen to the symphonies of both—and positively of the former—without prejudice. It was a mistake, except in a very general way, to couple the names of these two composers together, for the differences of their art are as important as the analogies.

Bruckner unquestionably had the strongest of emotional inspiration in writing this symphony, with its long and moving adagio. That is the core and meaning of the piece, and the first movement, scherzo and grandiose finale do but surround and encase it. If the adagio, then, does not move you, be assured that the symphony as a whole does not contain much meaning for your ears.

With yesterday's splendid performance and Dr. Koussevitzky's persuasive interpretation one would have to be fantastically out of the mood not to sense the power of the 8th Symphony. Bruckner's faults are not inherent flaws, not abscesses of the soul; they lie on the surface and should not fend us off from the music.

The serious trouble with Bruckner is exemplified in this work in the finale. His scherzos, his lyric and elegiac pages are as a rule sincerely convincing. It is his perorations that sometimes ring hollow. As Mr. Neville Cardus once wrote in the Manchester Guardian: "With tremendous solemnity Bruckner tells us that every cloud has a silver lining. In portentous voice he reminds us that we are here today and gone tomorrow. He commands a terrible stillness, then, in an awful apocalyptic vision he sees that it is a long lane that has no turning."

This is unfair to the Bruckner of the 8th Symphony, even of its finale. There are other composers, considered greater by the world at large, who take a long time with the oratory of the close. Mr. Cardus expresses merely the point of view of the modern listener who at such times would like to cry out: "Another cadence and I fire!"

But the Bruckner of the 7th and 8th Symphonies, to name only two that have been recently heard here, is a welcome relief from a symphonic repertoire that is rapidly approaching the point of going stale. Conductors are well advised to turn up his works now and again. And when they sound as magnificently as the 8th did yesterday the audience is not going to, and emphatically did not, complain.

It is hard to imagine any other composer than Ravel doing justice with such taste and skill to Moussorgsky's charming piano pieces, the "Pictures at an Exhibition." Yet other conductors have commissioned other transcriptions. Out of curiosity it might be interesting to hear another version, but he is a bold spirit who would seek to better Ravel at orchestration.

The pieces themselves can sound effectively on the piano, though it is technically difficult to get the speed that the orchestra can manage out of the Baba-Yaga movement. The piano must also pound unmercifully for the climax of the Kiev Gate, whereas the orchestra can excite us with its tremendous sonority. Ravel has also been able to point up the lighter movements, such as the ballet of the Chicks in their Shells. Still, this transcription is by now so much more familiar to the public than the piano version that it is perhaps pointless to say more than that it made a good conclusion to a most successful concert.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be in New York. The concerts of the 17th and 18th offer Myra Hess as soloist in Beethoven's 3d piano concerto, Sibelius's 3d Symphony and the 2d Symphony of the contemporary William Schuman.

GOTHAM LIFE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 5 - 1939

Seeing New York

By Thetford LeViness

The Musical Art Quartet is booked for an evening of songs at Town Hall, 123 W. 43rd St., on Monday, Feb. 6th. On Wednesday evening, Feb. 6th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Carnegie Hall, and will give repeat performances on the following Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. On

---

BRUCKNER'S EIGHTH BY SYMPHONY

Austrian's Work Meets With Enthusiastic Reception

B. Post Feb. 4/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon for the fourth time since 1929 and for the second time in two years Dr. Koussevitzky led the Symphony Orchestra through the Eight Symphony of Bruckner. That the Boston public does not yet take this music as a matter of course was proved both by the answering enthusiasm and the animated discussion that afterwards filled the corridors. Like Mahler, Bruckner is still a "new" and somewhat troubling composer.

FIRST PLAYED IN 1909

If we go back to the days of Fiedler and Muck we will find Bruckner well established in Symphony Hall, and generally admired. This Eighth Symphony was first played here under Mr. Fiedler in March, 1909, and there was a requested repetition the following month. Already Dr. Koussevitzky has restored the Austrian symphonist to the place he once held. It is now his opportunity to make that position stronger even than before. By token of the aforementioned enthusiasm yesterday and of the applause that greeted the more easily assimilated Seventh Symphony, when it was last played under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, Boston is eager for the particular emotional, spiritual and musical experience that a Bruckner Symphony can provide.

With Bruckner there are three stumbling blocks: the Symphonies are long; they achieve real momentum only in the always masterly Scherzos, the greatest since those of Beethoven, and there is likely to be a want of continuity. Nevertheless, these objections do not seem to weigh very heavily with our audiences—even the chief objection, that of length.

Has Richness and Depth

Despite much-to-be-regretted cuts, particularly in the Adagio, the Eighth Symphony consumed yesterday over an hour. In this restless, nervous age we are supposedly impatient of operatic and symphonic longuers. But it does not seem to work that way. The public dotes on Wagner and, when given a chance, it rises to Mahler and Bruckner, as the audience rose yesterday to the latter's Eighth and last season to the former's Fifth.

And why? Because in these works there is a notable depth and richness, an earnestness and elevation, a wealth of moving melody, of satisfying harmony and of glowing, resplendent sonorities—things in which the music of our own day is, as a rule, sadly lacking.

Knows Use of Brass

If there ever was a time when the world needed art as a means of escape, that time is here and now. And escape is something which Hindemith and Stravinsky and their swarm of imitators hardly offer us. They give us, instead, what we already feel, not what we wish we felt.

Except for an occasional over-emphasis in the brass, which Bruckner employs in the Wagnerian manner, the performance yesterday was an admirable one, worthy of beauty and majesty of the music. By rights, the Bruckner Symphonies should be given alone and in their entirety. Yesterday the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" made the postscript that custom decrees.

Globe Feb. 4/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Undeniably true it is the music of Anton Bruckner grows upon one. This reflection was bolstered yesterday afternoon during a singularly eloquent performance, by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of the Eighth Symphony by that master. The work was last played here in April, 1937. At the concerts this week it occupies the first half of the program, with Moussorgsky's delightful "Pictures at an Exhibition," as arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, coming thereafter.

According to his lights, this reviewer has considered Bruckner to have been overrated by his partisans, and in sincere—though evidently misguided—faith has written disparaging words. With all possible dignity, yet without going to the other extreme and lauding Bruckner as one of the greatest geniuses who ever lived, those words are now publicly eaten.

Bruckner and Gustav Mahler (who was considerably younger than Bruckner) have for years been coupled as a pair of misunderstood artists whose music has not been sufficiently esteemed. In Bruckner's case denial of recognition may have been due principally to the fact that he had the misfortune to live when Wagner and Brahms governed the tonal universe. Naturally, anyone of lesser stature was bound to be overshadowed.

Bruckner, after years of labor, became a master of counterpoint and, in his own fashion, of form. Learning a good deal from Wagner's instrumentation, he at length became a master of the orchestra, though what he learned was largely absorbed into his own individuality.

The Teutonic convention of the symphony, after the example set by Beethoven, was to build closely knit symphonies out of brief, fragmentary themes that could be "developed." Bruckner, on the other hand, was a nonconformist to the extent that he preferred more complete melodies to work with and a correspondingly spreading form. He could, however, write genuinely Beethovenish scherzos which neither Wagner nor Brahms could likely have done so well because their minds were differently organized.

Bruckner possessed considerable skill at inventing distinguished melody, as his slow movements—perhaps his finest accomplishment—plainly show. His music represents the 19th century Germanic ideal of beauty; songful and dramatic by turn, harmonically varied in a complicated way, and his most emotional, not to say visionary, pages have that solid strength which so completely identifies the Teutonic composer of the time.

Conversely, the music of Bruckner does not seem to run so deep as that of his great predecessors and contemporaries. There is less Olympian serenity, less universality and his "high seriousness" occasionally becomes pompous. His allegros have so many climaxes that they come like a succession of mountain peaks and valleys, and somehow detract from the sense of direct progress that ought to be a characteristic of a symphonic allegro. The length of his music is no great stumbling block; length was merely a convention of his epoch.

Both Symphony and performance were received most enthusiastically, and there were some cheers. Little by little, both Mahler and Bruckner make their way.—C. W. D.

Social Activities

Boston Symphony Audience Astonished by Hot-Cha Boys

Victims of Delightful, Subtle Hoax—Koussevitzky Appears as Haydn—Richard Hale in "Peter the Wolf"

(By JAY C. ROSENFELD)

BOSTON, Feb. 2.—"Dick" Burgin and his "BSO" hot-cha-cha boys may not be as renowned in their field as some other of the country's popular bands but it is a question if any troupe ever caused as much astonishment as did they when last night in Symphony Hall they were pushed forward on a movable platform to execute their part of the Pension Fund concert.

To see an oversized dozen or so familiar "Symphony" men in little short white jackets, with gilt letters "BOS" stamped on heraldic banners hanging from the backs of their music-stands, playing Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a piece inspired by Vachel Lindsay's poem, and with the tenor Colin O'More singing the eloquent verses was a sight which the conservative Boston audience which packed the hall could not at once absorb.

In Powdered Wigs

Indeed up to the end of the program it was not completely evident that the spirit of the evening, a delightful subtle hoax, had penetrated the learned craniums of the Hub's inveterate music-lovers. At the opening of the concert they were greeted with a Burgundy red curtain which closed the platform to view instead of the usually brilliantly-lighted stage to which the grand organ provides the backdrop.

But if they were awed by the sight which unfolded at the curtain's first drawing they were less surprised because of the advance publicity which the event had been given. It certainly did not diminish their pleasure as they saw a major part of their beloved orchestra, in powdered wigs and the costumes which were of the day of Haydn, sitting at the candle-lighted desks awaiting the arrival on the stage of their famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, who was to impersonate dear old "Papa" Haydn in the performance of that master's "Farewell" symphony. Haydn and George Washington were vintage of the same year, and the costume in which our first President is portrayed was that copied last night.

Above the orchestra was suspended a gorgeous chandelier; to each side of the orchestra were fluted columns surmounted by candelabra. In the usual place of the conductor's stand was an old spinet of the type from which Haydn is known to have directed his orchestra.

Koussevitzky in Character

The appearance of Koussevitzky drew forth a hush rather than an explosion of applause. His black, brocaded satin, knee-length coat with its wide lace-fringed cuffs within which he tucked his handkerchief; his satin knee-breeches, white stockings and black pumps, comprised a costume which was topped by a white braided wig caught at the back with a dainty black ribbon. He was made up, too, to resemble the old master and his attempt to stay in character not only was well done, but a remarkable feature of the Boston conductoro's personality. Few are the famous men before the musical public, except those of opera perhaps, who would deign to let their hair down, as did Mr. Koussevitzky figuratively and pseudo-literally last night. The evidences of being a human being in addition to a celebrated conductor are indeed extraordinary in his case.

The "Farewell" symphony is the one in the last movement of which, one by one, the musicians extinguish their candles and steal away while their royal patron, happily dozing, neither notices their departure nor the cessation of the sweet sounds. This was carried out last night with painstaking care. The restrained volume of the orchestra gradually diminished until there were left but one of each instrument, and then in soft succession there were six, five, four, a single first violin and a second, finally none but the conductor, who, too, then blows out his candle and tiptoes away.

Hale Narrator

The remainder of the program was done in conventional evening concert costume. Yet to come before intermission was "Peter and the Wolf" of Prokofieff, in which Richard Hale was the narrator. This, a fairy tale for children, was done with spontaneous abandon. Everyone was so happy about the whole evening, on stage and in the audience.

After intermission came a series of waltzes, one by Lanner, two by Johann Strauss, one each of Sibelius and Ravel. The superb orchestra takes such familiar things as the "Voices of Spring" and the "Valse Triste" and makes of them something of "gemutlich" charm and indelible effectiveness.

The program was one chosen with an eye to avoid conflict with any of the regular scheduled concerts of the year, but in relief it stood out all the more clearly and memorably.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

EB 8 - 1939

MUSIC NOTES

Today's events: "Rigoletto," Metropolitan Opera House, evening; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, evening; Boris Golschmann, pianist, Town Hall, evening; Elen Dosia, soprano, and André Burdino, tenor, Town Hall, afternoon; Douglas Moore, lecturer, Town Hall, 5:30 P. M.; Harmony Guild of New York, 705 Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 4 - 1939

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give the third of its Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music on Thursday night at 8:30. The program will include Mozart's Symphony in A major, Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, and Saint-Saens' Concerto in A minor for violincello and orchestra, with Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra as soloist. The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB 5 - 1939

MYRA HESS WITH ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra, after devoting the coming week to a visit to New York, will give the next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 17 and 18. Serge Koussevitzky will then present for the first time here the Second Symphony of William Schuman, a native of New York City, who has composed a number of chamber works, and for full orchestra this symphony, and a prelude and fugue. The Third Symphony of Sibelius, in C major, will also be played, and the Third Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven, in C minor. Myra Mess will be the distinguished soloist of this programme.

Miss Hess will likewise appear as soloist at the fourth pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series to be given on February 20 and 21.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 5 -1939

Feb. 28—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

154

MUSIC

4/39

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 15th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 8 in C minor .... Bruckner
"Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel .... Moussorgsky

The Bruckner-Mahler controversy and all the ramifications which it implies are now far enough distant so that we ought to be able to listen to the symphonies of both—and positively of the former—without prejudice. It was a mistake, except in a very general way, to couple the names of these two composers together, for the differences of their art are as important as the analogies.

Bruckner unquestionably had the strongest of emotional inspiration in writing this symphony, with its long and moving adagio. That is the core and meaning of the piece and the first movement, scherzo and grandiose finale do but surround and encase it. If the adagio, then, does not move you, be assured that the symphony as a whole does not contain much meaning for your ears.

With yesterday's splendid performance and Dr. Koussevitzky's persuasive interpretation one would have to be fantastically out of the mood not to sense the power of the 8th Symphony. Bruckner's faults are not inherent flaws, not abscesses of the soul; they lie on the surface and should not fend us off from the music.

The serious trouble with Bruckner is exemplified in this work in the finale. His scherzos, his lyric and elegiac pages are as a rule sincerely convincing. It is his perorations that sometimes ring hollow. As Mr. Neville Cardus once wrote in the Manchester Guardian: "With tremendous solemnity Bruckner tells us that every cloud has a silver lining. In portentous voice he reminds us that we are here today and gone tomorrow. He commands a terrible stillness, then, in an awful apocalyptic vision he sees that it is a long lane that has no turning."

This is unfair to the Bruckner of the 8th Symphony, even of its finale. There are other composers, considered greater by the world at large, who take a long time with the oratory of the close. Mr. Cardus expresses merely the point of view of the modern listener who at such times would like to cry out: "Another cadence and I fire!"

But the Bruckner of the 7th and 8th Symphonies, to name only two that have been recently heard here, is a welcome relief from a symphonic repertoire that is rapidly approaching the point of going stale. Conductors are well advised to turn up his works now and again. And when they sound as magnificently as the 8th did yesterday the audience is not going to, and emphatically did not, complain.

It is hard to imagine any other composer than Ravel doing justice with such taste and skill to Moussorgsky's charming piano pieces, the "Pictures at an Exhibition." Yet other conductors have commissioned other transcriptions. Out of curiosity it might be interesting to hear another version, but he is a bold spirit who would seek to better Ravel at orchestration.

The pieces themselves can sound effectively on the piano, though it is technically difficult to get the speed that the orchestra can manage out of the Baba-Yaga movement. The piano must also pound unmercifully for the climax of the Kiev Gate, whereas the orchestra can excite us with its tremendous sonority. Ravel has also been able to point up the lighter movements, such as the ballet of the Chicks in their Shells. Still, this transcription is by now so much more familiar to the public than the piano version that it is perhaps pointless to say more than that it made a good conclusion to a most successful concert.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be in New York. The concerts of the 17th and 18th offer Myra Hess as soloist in Beethoven's 3d piano concerto, Sibelius's 3d Symphony and the 2d Symphony of the contemporary William Schuman.

BRUCKNER'S EIGHTH BY SYMPHONY

Austrian's Work Meets With Enthusiastic Reception

B. Post Feb. 4/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon for the fourth time since 1929 and for the second time in two years Dr. Koussevitzky led the Symphony Orchestra through the Eight Symphony of Bruckner. That the Boston public does not yet take this music as a matter of course was proved both by the answering enthusiasm and the animated discussion that afterwards filled the corridors. Like Mahler, Bruckner is still a "new" and somewhat troubling composer.

FIRST PLAYED IN 1909

If we go back to the days of Fiedler and Muck we will find Bruckner well established in Symphony Hall, and generally admired. This Eighth Symphony was first played here under Mr. Fiedler in March, 1909, and there was a requested repetition the following month. Already Dr. Koussevitzky has restored the Austrian symphonist to the place he once held. It is now his opportunity to make that position stronger even than before. By token of the aforementioned enthusiasm yesterday and of the applause that greeted the more easily assimilated Seventh Symphony, when it was last played under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, Boston is eager for the particular emotional, spiritual and musical experience that a Bruckner Symphony can provide.

With Bruckner there are three stumbling blocks: the Symphonies are long; they achieve real momentum only in the always masterly Scherzos, the greatest since those of Beethoven, and there is likely to be a want of continuity. Nevertheless, these objections do not seem to weigh very heavily with our audiences—even the chief objection, that of length.

Has Richness and Depth

Despite much-to-be-regretted cuts, particularly in the Adagio, the Eighth Symphony consumed yesterday over an hour. In this restless, nervous age we are supposedly impatient of operatic and symphonic longuers. But it does not seem to work that way. The public dotes on Wagner and, when given a chance, it rises to Mahler and Bruckner, as the audience rose yesterday to the latter's Eighth and last season to the former's Fifth.

And why? Because in these works there is a notable depth and richness, an earnestness and elevation, a wealth of moving melody, of satisfying harmony and of glowing, resplendent sonorities—things in which the music of our own day is, as a rule, sadly lacking.

Knows Use of Brass

If there ever was a time when the world needed art as a means of escape, that time is here and now. And escape is something which Hindemith and Stravinsky and their swarm of imitators hardly offer us. They give us, instead, what we already feel, not what we wish we felt.

Except for an occasional over-emphasis in the brass, which Bruckner employs in the Wagnerian manner, the performance yesterday was an admirable one, worthy of beauty and majesty of the music. By rights, the Bruckner Symphonies should be given alone and in their entirety. Yesterday the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" made the postscript that custom decrees.

GOTHAM LIFE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 5 - 1939

Seeing New York

By Thetford LeViness

The Musical Art Quartet is booked for an evening of songs at Town Hall, 123 W. 43rd St., on Monday, Feb. 6th. On Wednesday evening, Feb. 6th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Carnegie Hall, and will give repeat performances on the following Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. On

---

Globe

MUSIC

4/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Undeniably true it is the music of Anton Bruckner grows upon one. This reflection was bolstered yesterday afternoon during a singularly eloquent performance, by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of the Eighth Symphony by that master. The work was last played here in April, 1937. At the concerts this week it occupies the first half of the program, with Moussorgsky's delightful "Pictures at an Exhibition," as arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, coming thereafter.

According to his lights, this reviewer has considered Bruckner to have been overrated by his partisans, and in sincere—though evidently misguided—faith has written disparaging words. With all possible dignity, yet without going to the other extreme and lauding Bruckner as one of the greatest geniuses who ever lived, those words are now publicly eaten.

Bruckner and Gustav Mahler (who was considerably younger than Bruckner) have for years been coupled as a pair of misunderstood artists whose music has not been sufficiently esteemed. In Bruckner's case denial of recognition may have been due principally to the fact that he had the misfortune to live when Wagner and Brahms governed the tonal universe. Naturally, anyone of lesser stature was bound to be overshadowed.

Bruckner, after years of labor, became a master of counterpoint and, in his own fashion, of form. Learning a good deal from Wagner's instrumentation, he at length became a master of the orchestra, though what he learned was largely absorbed into his own individuality.

The Teutonic convention of the symphony, after the example set by Beethoven, was to build closely knit symphonies out of brief, fragmentary themes that could be "developed." Bruckner, on the other hand, was a nonconformist to the extent that he preferred more complete melodies to work with and a correspondingly spreading form. He could, however, write genuinely Beethovenish scherzos which neither Wagner nor Brahms could likely have done so well because their minds were differently organized.

Bruckner possessed considerable skill at inventing distinguished melody, as his slow movements—perhaps his finest accomplishment—plainly show. His music represents the 19th century Germanic ideal of beauty; songful and dramatic by turn, harmonically varied in a complicated way, and his most emotional, not to say visionary, pages have that solid strength which so completely identifies the Teutonic composer of the time.

Conversely, the music of Bruckner does not seem to run so deep as that of his great predecessors and contemporaries. There is less Olympian serenity, less universality and his "high seriousness" occasionally becomes pompous. His allegros have so many climaxes that they come like a succession of mountain peaks and valleys, and somehow detract from the sense of direct progress that ought to be a characteristic of a symphonic allegro. The length of his music is no great stumbling block; length was merely a convention of his epoch.

Both Symphony and performance were received most enthusiastically, and there were some cheers. Little by little, both Mahler and Bruckner make their way.—C. W. D.

Social Activities

Boston Symphony Audience Astonished by Hot-Cha Boys

Victims of Delightful, Subtle Hoax—Koussevitzky Appears as Haydn—Richard Hale in "Peter the Wolf"

(By JAY C. ROSENFELD)

BOSTON, Feb. 2.—"Dick" Burgin and his "BSO" hot-cha-cha boys may not be as renowned in their field as some other of the country's popular bands but it is a question if any troupe ever caused as much astonishment as did they when last night in Symphony Hall they were pushed forward on a movable platform to execute their part of the Pension Fund concert.

To see an oversized dozen or so familiar "Symphony" men in little short white jackets, with gilt letters "BOS" stamped on heraldic banners hanging from the backs of their music-stands, playing Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a piece inspired by Vachel Lindsay's poem, and with the tenor Colin O'More singing the eloquent verses was a sight which the conservative Boston audience which packed the hall could not at once absorb.

In Powdered Wigs

Indeed up to the end of the program it was not completely evident that the spirit of the evening, a delightful subtle hoax, had penetrated the learned craniums of the Hub's inveterate music-lovers. At the opening of the concert they were greeted with a Burgundy red curtain which closed the platform to view instead of the usually brilliantly-lighted stage to which the grand organ provides the backdrop.

But if they were awed by the sight which unfolded at the curtain's first drawing they were less surprised because of the advance publicity which the event had been given. It certainly did not diminish their pleasure as they saw a major part of their beloved orchestra, in powdered wigs and the costumes which were of the day of Haydn, sitting at the candle-lighted desks awaiting the arrival on the stage of their famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, who was to impersonate dear old "Papa" Haydn in the performance of that master's "Farewell" symphony. Haydn and George Washington were vintage of the same year, and the costume in which our first President is portrayed was that copied last night.

Above the orchestra was suspended a gorgeous chandelier; to each side of the orchestra were fluted columns surmounted by candelabra. In the usual place of the conductor's stand was an old spinet of the type from which Haydn is known to have directed his orchestra.

Koussevitzky in Character

The appearance of Koussevitzky drew forth a hush rather than an explosion of applause. His black, brocaded satin, knee-length coat with its wide lace-fringed cuffs within which he tucked his handkerchief; his satin knee-breeches, white stockings and black pumps, comprised a costume which was topped by a white braided wig caught at the back with a dainty black ribbon. He was made up, too, to resemble the old master and his attempt to stay in character not only was well done, but a remarkable feature of the Boston conductoro's personality. Few are the famous men before the musical public, except those of opera perhaps, who would deign to let their hair down, as did Mr. Koussevitzky figuratively and pseudo-literally last night. The evidences of being a human being in addition to a celebrated conductor are indeed extraordinary in his case.

The "Farewell" symphony is the one in the last movement of which, one by one, the musicians extinguish their candles and steal away while their royal patron, happily dozing, neither notices their departure nor the cessation of the sweet sounds. This was carried out last night with painstaking care. The restrained volume of the orchestra gradually diminished until there were left but one of each instrument, and then in soft succession there were six, five, four, a single first violin and a second, finally none but the conductor, who, too, then blows out his candle and tiptoes away.

Hale Narrator

The remainder of the program was done in conventional evening concert costume. Yet to come before intermission was "Peter and the Wolf" of Prokofieff, in which Richard Hale was the narrator. This, a fairy tale for children, was done with spontaneous abandon. Everyone was so happy about the whole evening, on stage and in the audience.

After intermission came a series of waltzes, one by Lanner, two by Johann Strauss, one each of Sibelius and Ravel. The superb orchestra takes such familiar things as the "Voices of Spring" and the "Valse Triste" and makes of them something of "gemutlich" charm and indelible effectiveness.

The program was one chosen with an eye to avoid conflict with any of the regular scheduled concerts of the year, but in relief it stood out all the more clearly and memorably.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 8 - 1939

MUSIC NOTES

Today's events: "Rigoletto," Metropolitan Opera House, evening; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, evening; Boris Golschmann, pianist, Town Hall, evening; Elen Dosia, soprano, and André Burdino, tenor, Town Hall, afternoon; Douglas Moore, lecturer, Town Hall, 5:30 P. M.; Harmony Guild of New York, 706 Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 4 - 1939

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give the third of its Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music on Thursday night at 8:30. The program will include Mozart's Symphony in A major, Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, and Saint-Saens' Concerto in A minor for violincello and orchestra, with Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra as soloist. The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB 5 - 1939

MYRA HESS WITH ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra, after devoting the coming week to a visit to New York, will give the next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 17 and 18. Serge Koussevitzky will then present for the first time here the Second Symphony of William Schuman, a native of New York City, who has composed a number of chamber works, and for full orchestra this symphony, and a prelude and fugue. The Third Symphony of Sibelius, in C major, will also be played, and the Third Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven, in C minor. Myra Hess will be the distinguished soloist of this programme.

Miss Hess will likewise appear as soloist at the fourth pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series to be given on February 20 and 21.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 5 - 1939

Feb. 28—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

155

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

FEB 4 - 1939

APPEARING IN NOTABLE CONCERT AND OPERA EVENTS OF THE WEEK

Serge Koussevitzky, fitted out in an eighteenth-century costume by Robert Edmond Jones to impersonate Haydn for a performance of the "Farewell" Symphony, in which he will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Wednesday night. The concert will be a benefit for the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Rose Bampton (right) makes her season's debut at the Metropolitan next Saturday night, February 11, her first local appearance in the title role of "Aida." . . . Left, Helen Jepson, who will sing "Thais," to be revived next Friday evening.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

FEB 4 - 1939

Boston Symphony In Four Concerts Here Next Week

Four concerts in Manhattan and Brooklyn are scheduled by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next week. Visual and dramatic arts will be combined with music at the "Concert Extraordinaire" to be given at Carnegie Hall next Wednesday evening, February 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. An eighteenth century costume, based on pictures of Josef Haydn, will be worn by Dr. Koussevitzky when he conducts the opening number, Haydn's "Farewell" symphony. There will also be appropriate stage settings for this and the following number, "The Daniel Jazz," a setting for small orchestra and tenor of Vachel Lindsay's poem. Richard Hale will be narrator in a Russian fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," which Serge Prokofieff has set for speaker and orchestra, and a selection of waltzes by Strauss, lanner, Sibelius and Ravel will make up the second part of the program.

The orchestra's third pair of local concerts will be given next Friday evening, February 10, and the following Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The program for the first concert lists the Bruckner Eighth Symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Saturday's concert offers Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. 201, two movements from Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Bloch's "Schelemo," with Jean Bedetti as cello soloist.

The third concert of the current Brooklyn series will be given next Thursday evening, February 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Jean Bedetti will be soloist in the Concerto in A minor by Saint-Saens, and the rest of the program will be devoted to the Mozart A major Symphony and the Tchaikovsky Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Sun. N. Y. Herald-Tribune Feb. 5/39

THE ORCHESTRAS

IN ADDITION to their regular subscription concerts, both the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestras will give special concerts of an unusual character this week in Carnegie Hall. The Bostonians, under Serge Koussevitzky, will play for the benefit of that orchestra's Pension Fund next Wednesday night, and on Saturday night Nadia Boulanger will share the Philharmonic baton with John Barbirolli in a concert sponsored by the Philharmonic-Symphony League.

Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Wednesday night, officially styled a "Concert Extraordinaire" will begin with Haydn's "Farewell" symphony," for which Dr. Koussevitzky will wear a Haydnesque costume designed by Robert Edmond Jones, and will direct musicians also wearing late eighteenth century garb, representing the Esterhazy household orchestra under Haydn's direction. There will be a special stage setting for this and also for Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a setting of Vachel Lindsay's poem, for tenor solo (Colin O'More) and small orchestra.

Serge Prokofieff's "orchestral fairy tale for children" titled "Peter and the Wolf" will be performed for the first time in New York, with Richard Hale narrating the adventures of the youthful Peter. The remainder of the program will be devoted to waltzes or music based on the waltz by Lanner, Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

Mlle. Boulanger, making her first appearance here as a conductor, will conduct the first half of next Saturday night's Philharmonic-Symphony program. The Monteverdi Singers, a group of five who have been associated with Mlle. Boulanger's activities in Paris, will sing madrigals by Monteverdi and Faure's "Shylock's Nocturne." Jean Franzaix will make his American debut as soloist in his piano concerto, and another novelty will be an overture by Antoni Szalowski, a thirty-two-year-old Polish composer. Mr. Barbirolli will conduct Mozart's two-piano concerto in E flat, with Mlle, Boulanger and Mr. Franzaix as soloists, and "Pour les funerailles d'un soldat" by Mlle. Boulanger's sister Lili, who died at the age of twenty-four in 1918. This will be sung by Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, barytone, with Mlle. Boulanger at the organ. Mary Frances Lehnerts, a young American soprano, will sing with the Monteverdi group in this concert instead of Irene Kedroff owing to the latter's illness .

Regular Concerts

Georges Enesco will make his last appearance of the season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this afternoon, repeating a program closing with his first symphony. Mr. Barbirolli resumes his schedule with the concerts of next Thursday night and Friday afternoon, when Walter Gieseking will play Rachmaninoff's third concerto in D minor. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony will be the other numbers.

Rachmaninoff's third concerto was last played by this orchestra in December, 1932, with the composer as soloist. Its last performance here was in November, 1934, by Benno Moiseiwitsch with the National Orchestral Association. Mr. Gieseking also will play this concerto next Sunday afternoon, when Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will follow.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony's regular series in Carnegie Hall will be held next Friday, instead of the usual Thursday, when Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Anton Bruckner's eighth symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in Revel's orchestration. Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Saturday afternoon, which has been changed since its first announcement, includes the Moussorgsky work, Mozart's symphony in A (K. 201), two movements from Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," which the Bostonians introduced here in an evening concert in January, and Bloch's "Schelomo," with Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music includes the Mozart symphony, Saint-Saens's cello concerto in A minor with Mr. Bedetti as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony.

Later Events

In the Beethoven program to be given by the Philadelphia Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night, Feb. 14, Kirsten Flagstad, Metropolitan Opera soprano, will sing, and Richard Hale will recite in the music for Goethe's tragedy "Egmont." Mme. Flagstad also will sing the scene and aria "Ah, perfido," the song "Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur" and "Abscheulicher" from "Fidelio." Eugene Ormandy also will conduct the seventh symphony.

A program including works by four American composers who have won fellowships at the American Academy in Rome will be played by the New York Civic Orchestra, under the auspices of the Composers' Forum-Laboratory, on Sunday night, Feb. 19, at the Federal Music Theater. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, and Victor Alessandro, of the Oklahoma Federal Symphony Orchestra, will conduct. The fellowship winners represented are Leo Sowerby, Walter Helfer, Hunter Johnson, Kent Kennan and Frederick Woltman, and the concert will close with Dr. Hanson's "Romantic" symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

B'Klyn Edition

FEB 5 - 1939

Boston Symphony to Play

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is conductor, will give the third concert of its current Brooklyn series Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, will be soloist for Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra. Other numbers will be Mozart's symphony in A major (K. 201) and Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36. The concert is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee, announced the following box holders: Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Women's Club, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association and the Intercity Orchestra members.

Mrs. Schoonhoven, occupying Mrs. Dean C. Osborne's box during the latter's absence from the city, will have as her guests Mr. and Mrs. Floyd S. Neely, the Misses Edith and Eleanor Gertrude Hanam, Howard Carlson and Dr. Eilif Hanssen. Mrs. Johnson's box guests will be Supreme Court Justice John B. Johnston of the Appellate Division and Mrs. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Pendleton and Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush.

Miss Jessie Ogg will be hostess in the Adelphi Alumnae box and Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle and Mrs. Theodore Vosseler will be hostesses in the Woman's Club box. Guests in the latter will be Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, president of the club; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, former president; Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Frederick M. Davidson, Mrs. Jason Davis and Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer.

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.
RECORD

FEB 5 - 1939

Bach Festival Will Be Held March 2 And 3 At Rollins College

WINTER PARK, Fla., Feb. 4.—The Fourth Annual Bach Festival at Winter Park will be held on Thursday and Friday, March 2d and 3d, in the beautiful Memorial Chapel of Rollins College. Professor Christopher O. Honaas, head of the Rollins Conservatory of Music, will direct the Festival Chorus of 150 voices, which is augmented this year by the Apollo Boys Chior from Birmingham, Ala.

A group of nationally famous soloists has been engaged, including the recognized dean of Bach singers, Authur Kraft, tenor, who was the outstanding artist of last year's Festival, also Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, Lilian Knowles, contralto, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, all of whom stand in the front rannk of concert and oratorio singers, and have appeared as soloists with the New York Philharmonic, Boston Symphony, Philadelphia and Chicago Orchestras, and at the larger music festivals throughout the country. Mac Morgan, baritone, of Jacksonville the young pupil of Authur Kraft, who made such a splendid success at last year's Festival is reengaged. Herman Siewert, organist of the Knowles Memorial Chapel, will be at the organ.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

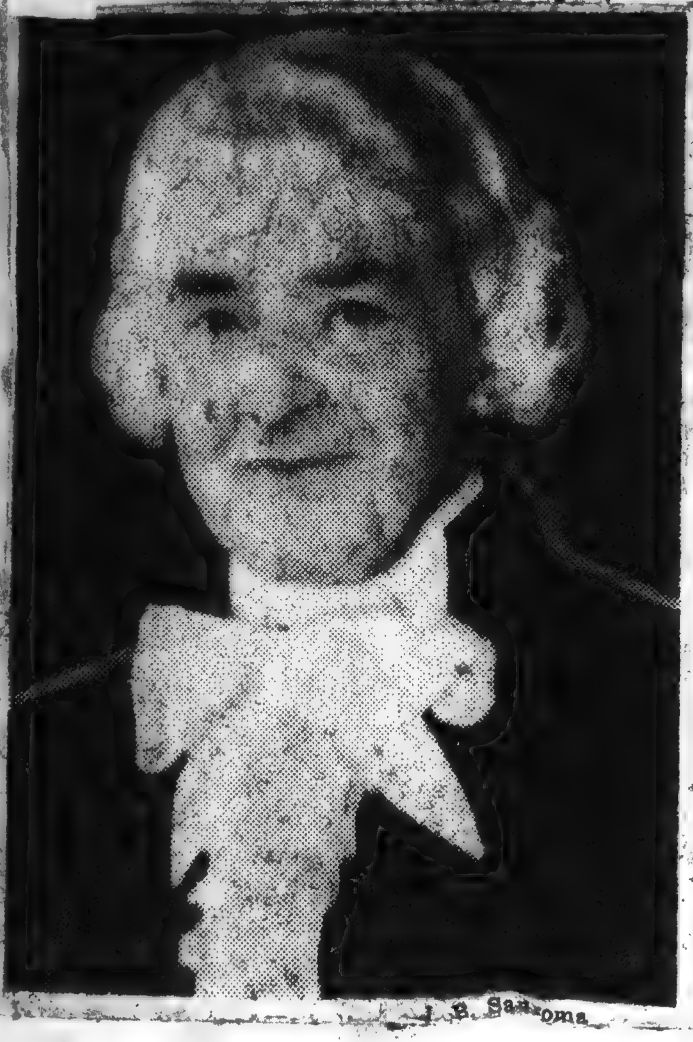
FEB 8 - 1939

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Ill

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Feb. 7.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was taken ill in New York late this afternoon, shortly before he was to come here to lead the orchestra at Rutgers University. His manager said that it was the first concert he had missed this season. Concertmaster Richard Burgin conducted the orchestra before an audience of 3,500, a record crowd for the Rutgers Concert Series.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 5 - 1939



THE ORCHESTRAS

IN ADDITION to their regular subscription concerts, both the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestras will give special concerts of an unu[redacted] in Carnegie Hall. The Bostonians, under Serge Koussevitzky, will play for the benefit of that orchestra's Pension Fund next Wednesday night, and on Saturday night Nadia Boulanger will share the Philharmonic baton with John Barbirolli in a concert sponsored by the Philharmonic-Symphony League.

Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Wednesday night, officially styled a "Concert Extraordinaire" will begin with Haydn's "Farewell" symphony," for which Dr. Koussevitzky will wear a Haydnesque costume designed by Robert Edmond Jones, and will direct musicians also wearing late eighteenth century garb, representing the Esterhazy household orchestra under Haydn's direction. There will be a special stage setting for this and also for Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a setting of Vachel Lindsay's poem, for tenor solo (Colin O'More) and small orchestra.

Serge Prokofieff's "orchestral fairy tale for children" titled "Peter and the Wolf" will be performed for the first time in New York, with Richard Hale narrating the adventures of the youthful Peter. The remainder of the program will be devoted to waltzes or music based on the waltz by Lanner, Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

Mlle. Boulanger, making her first appearance here as a conductor, will conduct the first half of next Saturday night's Philharmonic-Symphony di Singers, been asso- er's activi- adrigals by Monteverdi and Faure's "Shylock's Nocturne." Jean Franzaix will make his American debut as soloist in his piano concerto, and another novelty will be an overture by Antoni Szalowski, a thirty-two-year-old Polish composer. Mr. Barbirolli will conduct Mozart's two-piano concerto in E flat, with Mlle, Boulanger and Mr. Franzaix as soloists, and "Pour les funerailles d'un soldat" by Mlle. Boulanger's sister Lili, who died at the age of twenty-four in 1918. This will be sung by Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, barytone, with Mlle. Boulanger at the organ. Mary Frances Lehnerts, a young American soprano, will sing with the Monteverdi group in this concert instead of Irene Kedroff owing to the latter's illness.

Regular Concerts

Georges Enesco will make his last appearance of the season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this afternoon, repeating a program closing with his first symphony. Mr. Barbirolli resumes his schedule with the concerts of next Thursday night and Friday afternoon, when Walter Gieseking will play Rachmaninoff's third concerto in D minor. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony will be the other numbers.

Rachmaninoff's third concerto was last played by this orchestra in December, 1932, with the composer as soloist. Its last performance here was in November, 1934, by Benno Moiseiwitsch with the National Orchestral Association. Mr. Gieseking also will play this concerto next Sunday afternoon, when Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will follow.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony's regular series in Carnegie Hall will be held next Friday, instead of the usual Thursday, when Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Anton Bruckner's eighth symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in Revel's orchestration. Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Saturday afternoon, which has been changed since its first announcement, includes the Moussorgsky work, Mozart's symphony in A (K. 201), two movements from Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," which the Bostonians introduced here in an evening concert in January, and Bloch's "Schelomo," with Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music includes the Mozart symphony, Saint-Saens's cello concerto in A minor with Mr. Bedetti as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
FEB 5 - 1939

Reviews of New Records

Concert Recordings

By CHARLES LAMMOND

The Victor classical list for February is slimmer than most of the preceeding months but contains a great deal of very fine music. Stokowsky and the Philadelphia Symphony and Koussevitsky and the Boston are rivals for the feature album set of the month, the latter with Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B Flat Major (M-530), the former with a new collection of Wagner embracing the overture and Venusberg music and prelude to Act 3 of Tannhauser (M-529).

This critic leans to the Wagner album as being more exciting and more dramatic, a work which lends itself especially well to modern high fidelity recording and gives the brasses of the Philadelphia a great deal to do, a task in which they have acquitted themselves nobly, as have the recording engineers. An unidentified (and even unlisted) chorus helps the Venusberg atmosphere. The reading has the sweep and intensity of expression which Dr. Stokowsky gives most of his Wagnerian interpretations, and it may be in order to point out that the only complete recording of the opera does not contain the Act 3 prelude, a beautiful miniature tone poem in itself.

The Haydn work contains a very lovely second movement, and a tuneful, danceable third and fourth. The Boston's superb strings do most of the work, naturally, in this short composition, and, so far as their attack, sympathy and precision are concerned, their usual perfection is attained. Hints of Beethoven may be discovered in this work. Recording is as good as the recent Sibelius album, one of last year's best.

Victor's other two albums of the month are M-531. Mendelssohn's Concerto in E Minor, with Yehudi Menuhin and the Colonne Orchestra of Paris under Georges Enesco, presently conducting the New York Philharmonic; and M-532, Bach being represented by his Toccata in C Minor and that in D Major, Artur Schnabel, noted Beethoven interpreter, at the piano.

Three vocal discs dominate the single releases. On 15235 Richard Crooks sings the major tenor aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," with "Una Furtiva Lagrima" from Donizetti's "L'Elisir d'Amore" on the reverse side. Supported by a better than ordinary orchestra under Wilfred Pelletier, Mr. Crooks delivers two of the best interpretations of these arias on records, in a voice

---

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL
FEB 5 - 1939

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the third concert of the Rutgers University series Tuesday night. The concert will mark the fifth consecutive appearance of the orchestra in the series. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Haydn's Symphony in B flat, "La Mer," Debussy, and Brahms, Symphony No. 4. Walter Gieseking, pianist, will appear March 1 and Josephine Antoine, soprano, March 21.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 5 - 1939

Women's Chorus Will Have Bedetti As Guest Soloist

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest soloist for the annual concert of the Wethersfield Women's Chorus to be given Tuesday evening, February 21, at 8:30 in the Wethersfield High School auditorium under the direction of Louis Pellettieri.

Bedetti, who has been soloist with the Boston Symphony since 1919, has had a distinguished career. He was born in Lyons, France, in 1883 and first studied 'cello with his father at the conservatory in his native city, making his first public appearance there at the age of 11. Continuing at the Paris Conservatory with Jules Loeb, he took a first prize in 1902 for his excellence in musicianship. He became 'cellist of the Opera Comique orchestra in 1904, and of the Colonne Orchestra in 1908 under Mm. Colonne and Pierre Monteux.

These activities, together with appearances in chamber music and recitals in various European cities were interrupted by the World War, when he was called to service. In the autumn of 1919 he came to America to assume his present position. Among his outstanding performances with the Boston Symphony were the principal 'cello concertos—the Schumann, Saint Saens, Haydn A Minor, Lalo, Tschaikovsky (Rococo Variations) the Boellmann Symphonic Variations and the Faure "Elegie." He appeared as soloist in the performance of Bloch's "Schelomo," which had its first Boston performance in 1923.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 5 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert Thursday

Boxholders for Third in Brooklyn Series Are Announced—Committee Plans for the Annual Yuletide Ball at Heights Casino Next Dec. 27

At the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening the following will be the boxholders: Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association and the Inter-City Orchestra members, who have been selected by Dr. George H. Gartlan, director of music in the New York City school to occupy the committee box.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony will present Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist in Saint-Saens' Concerto in A Minor for violincello and orchestra. The program also will include Mozart's Symphony in A Major and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Opus 26.

The Boston Symphony concerts now in their 53d season are given under the joint auspices of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which James G. McDonald is president, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is acting chairman and which Adrian VanSinderen heads.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 5 - 1939

Koussevitzky Returns

Boston Symphony's Third Concert at the Academy Friday Night—Children's Ballet to Give 'The Toy Box'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the third concert of its current Brooklyn series next Thursday evening, Feb. 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, will also appear as soloist for Saint-Saens' Concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra. Included on the program are Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201) and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

* * *

The Children's Repertory Ballet will give a four-act performance of "La Boite a Joujoux" (the Toy Box) next Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock at the Academy.

The program is one of a series of Saturday afternoon events given for young people. The ballet will be under the direction of Annette Van Dyke, who has had wide experience in producing revues with children.

In "La Boite a Joujoux," a beautiful French doll plays with the heart of a wooden soldier, as she dances gaily with the puppet, Polichinelle. The wooden soldier is the hero, hewn of the best family tree, and he engages in a battle for his beloved.

When he is wounded and almost dying, the doll realizes how much she loves him and the ballet ends happily.

"Boxes of toys," wrote Debussy, the composer of the music for this ballet, "are like villages where play things live like people. Or better still, villages are perhaps only boxes of toys in which people live like playthings."

Miss Van Dyke's company consists of 60 children whose ages range from four to 14. They have been assembled through the courtesy of a number of leading dancing schools, many of the children coming from other States.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 7 - 1939

Mr. and Mrs. David Johnson To Entertain at Dinner

Mr. and Mrs. David C. Johnson of 135 Eastern Parkway will entertain at dinner at their home preceding the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening at the Academy of Music. Their guests will be Judge and Mrs. John B. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Pendleton, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush and Mr. and Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 6 - 1939

Third Boston Symphony Concert Of Season Thursday Evening; Boxholders Are Announced

Boxholders for the season's third Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert on Thursday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will be: Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, the Adelphi Academy of Alumnae Association and the Inter-City Orchestra members. The latter have been selected by Dr. George H. Gartlan, director of music in New York City schools, to occupy the Committee Box.

Mrs. Schoohoven, occupying Mrs. Dean C. Osborne's box during the latter's absence from the city, will have as her guests Mr. and Mrs. Floyd S. Neely, the Misses Edith and Eleanor Gertrude Hanam, Howard Carlson and Dr. Eilif Hanssen. Mrs. Johnson's guests will be Appelate Justice John B. Johnston and Mrs. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Pendleton and Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush.

Miss Jessie Ogg will be hostess in the Adelphi Alumnae box and Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle and Mrs. Theodore Vosseler will be hostesses in the Woman's Club box. Guests in the latter will be Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, president; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Freerick M. Davidson, Mrs. Jason Davis and Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony will present Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist in Saint-Saens' Concerto in A Monor for violin-cella and orchestra. The program also will include Mozart's Symphony in A Major (K 201) and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Opus 36.

Concerts by the Boston orchestra, now in their fifty-third season here, are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Huntington Woodman is president and the Brooklyn Committee, headed by Adrian Van Sinderen, with Mrs. Henry J. Davenport as chairman.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 9 - 1939

MME. LEROUX HERE FOR CONCERT TOUR

French Pianist to Make Her First Appearance in U. S.

Mme. Germaine Leroux, French pianist, arrived last night on the French liner Paris for her first concert tour of the United States and Canada. She was accompanied by her husband, Milo Safrenek, counselor of the Czecho-Slovak Foreign Office in Pargue, who is on leave from his post.

Mme. Leroux said she had long looked forward to her first visit to the United States, particularly because she has known many Americans in Paris and in Prague, where her husband is popular with the international diplomatic set and with American newspaper correspondents.

It was reported here that Mme. Leroux would have her first American appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but she said last night that final details had not been completed and that she had not been informed whether a definite date had been set. She said she would communicate with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, before announcing her plans definitely.

She will play the second piano concerto of Bolislav Martenu, which was written expressly for her by the Czecho-Slovak composer. It will be the first hearing of this composition in the United States.

"I am also bringing several other Czecho-Slovak compositions for premier performances in the United States," Mme. Leroux said.

In explanation, she added that she had sponsored considerable native Czecho-Slovak music in her concerts in France and elsewhere on the continent and that she had become known as "an ambassador for Czech music in France, and for French music in Czecho-Slovakia."

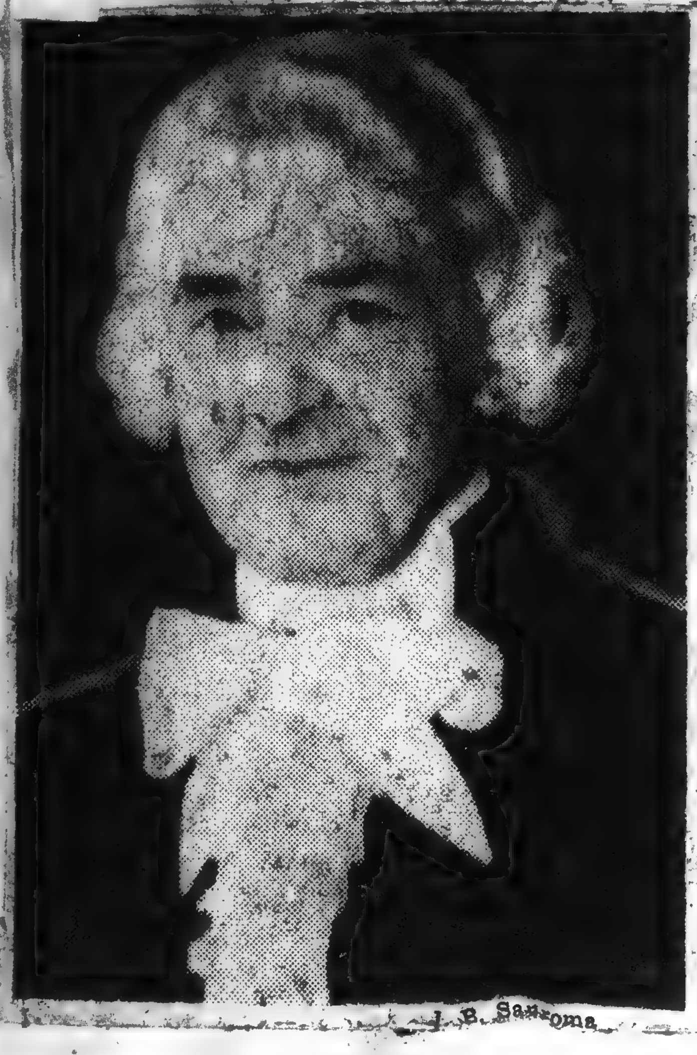
She declined to discuss conditions in Czecho-Slovakia or to comment on any international question current in Europe today.

Mr. Safrenek said he was "very much a private citizen at the present time" and would remain so as long as his visit to the United States lasts.

"I have been away from Prague for some time now and it is not my place to discuss affairs at home," he said. "I will not be able to answer any questions about anything."

156

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 5 - 1939



J. B. Sanroma

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

THE ORCHESTRAS

IN ADDITION to their regular subscription concerts, both the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestras will give special concerts of an unu[redacted]in Carnegie Hall. The Bostonians, under Serge Koussevitzky, will play for the benefit of that orchestra's Pension Fund next Wednesday night, and on Saturday night Nadia Boulanger will share the Philharmonic baton with John Barbirolli in a concert sponsored by the Philharmonic-Symphony League.

Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Wednesday night, officially styled a "Concert Extraordinaire" will begin with Haydn's "Farewell" symphony," for which Dr. Koussevitzky will wear a Haydnesque costume designed by Robert Edmond Jones, and will direct musicians also wearing late eighteenth century garb, representing the Esterhazy household orchestra under Haydn's direction. There will be a special stage setting for this and also for Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a setting of Vachel Lindsay's poem, for tenor solo (Colin O'More) and small orchestra.

Serge Prokofieff's "orchestral fairy tale for children" titled "Peter and the Wolf" will be performed for the first time in New York, with Richard Hale narrating the adventures of the youthful Peter. The remainder of the program will be devoted to waltzes or music based on the waltz by Lanner, Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

Mlle. Boulanger, making her first appearance here as a conductor, will conduct the first half of next Saturday night's Philharmonic-Symphony program. The Monteverdi Singers, a group of five who have been associated with Mlle. Boulanger's activities in Paris, will sing madrigals by Monteverdi and Faure's "Shylock's Nocturne." Jean Franzaix will make his American debut as soloist in his piano concerto, and another novelty will be an overture by Antoni Szalowski, a thirty-two-year-old Polish composer. Mr. Barbirolli will conduct Mozart's two-piano concerto in E flat, with Mlle, Boulanger and Mr. Franzaix as soloists, and "Pour les funerailles d'un soldat" by Mlle. Boulanger's sister Lili, who died at the age of twenty-four in 1918. This will be sung by Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, barytone, with Mlle. Boulanger at the organ. Mary Frances Lehnerts, a young American soprano, will sing with the Monteverdi group in this concert instead of Irene Kedroff owing to the latter's illness.

Regular Concerts

Georges Enesco will make his last appearance of the season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this afternoon, repeating a program closing with his first symphony. Mr. Barbirolli resumes his schedule with the concerts of next Thursday night and Friday afternoon, when Walter Gieseking will play Rachmaninoff's third concerto in D minor. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony will be the other numbers.

Rachmaninoff's third concerto was last played by this orchestra in December, 1932, with the composer as soloist. Its last performance here was in November, 1934, by Benno Moiseiwitsch with the National Orchestral Association. Mr. Gieseking also will play this concerto next Sunday afternoon, when Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will follow.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony's regular series in Carnegie Hall will be held next Friday, instead of the usual Thursday, when Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Anton Bruckner's eighth symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in Revel's orchestration. Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Saturday afternoon, which has been changed since its first announcement, includes the Moussorgsky work, Mozart's symphony in A (K. 201), two movements from Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," which the Bostonians introduced here in an evening concert in January, and Bloch's "Schelomo," with Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. Dr. Koussevitzky's program for Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music includes the Mozart symphony, Saint-Saens's cello concerto in A minor with Mr. Bedetti as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
FE 39

Reviews

Concert Recordings

By CHARLES LAMMOND

The Victor classical list for February is slimmer than most of the preceeding months but contains a great deal of very fine music. Stokowsky and the Philadelphia Symphony and Koussevitsky and the Boston are rivals for the feature album set of the month, the latter with Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B Flat Major (M-530), the former with a new collection of Wagner embracing the overture and Venusberg music and prelude to Act 3 of Tannhauser (M-529).

This critic leans to the Wagner album as being more exciting and more dramatic, a work which lends itself especially well to modern high fidelity recording and gives the brasses of the Philadelphia a great deal to do, a task in which they have acquitted themselves nobly, as have the recording engineers. An unidentified (and even unlisted) chorus helps the Venusberg atmosphere. The reading has the sweep and intensity of expression which Dr. Stokowsky gives most of his Wagnerian interpretations, and it may be in order to point out that the only complete recording of the opera does not contain the Act 3 prelude, a beautiful miniature tone poem in itself.

The Haydn work contains a very lovely second movement, and a tuneful, danceable third and fourth. The Boston's superb strings do most of the work, naturally, in this short composition, and, so far as their attack, sympathy and precision are concerned, their usual perfection is attained. Hints of Beethoven may be discovered in this work. Recording is as good as the recent Sibelius album, one of last year's best.

Victor's other two albums of the month are M-531. Mendelssohn's Concerto in E Minor, with Yehudi Menuhin and the Colonne Orchestra of Paris under Georges Enesco, presently conducting the New York Philharmonic; and M-532, Bach being represented by his Toccata in C Minor and that in D Major, Artur Schnabel, noted Beethoven interpreter, at the piano.

Three vocal discs dominate the single releases. On 15235 Richard Crooks sings the major tenor aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." with "Una Furtiva Lagrima" from Donizetti's "L'Elisir d'Amore" on the reverse side. Supported by a better than ordinary orchestra under Wilfred Pelletier, Mr. Crooks delivers two of the best interpretations of these arias on records, in a voice

---

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL
FEB 5 -1939

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the third concert of the Rutgers University series Tuesday night. The concert will mark the fifth consecutive appearance of the orchestra in the series. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Haydn's Symphony in B flat, "La Mer," Debussy, and Brahms, Symphony No. 4. Walter Gieseking, pianist, will appear March 1 and Josephine Antoine, soprano, March 21.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 5 -1939

Women's Chorus Will Have Bedetti As Guest Soloist

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest soloist for the annual concert of the Wethersfield Women's Chorus to be given Tuesday evening, February 21, at 8:30 in the Wethersfield High School auditorium under the direction of Louis Pellettieri.

Bedetti, who has been soloist with the Boston Symphony since 1919, has had a distinguished career. He was born in Lyons, France, in 1883 and first studied 'cello with his father at the conservatory in his native city, making his first public appearance there at the age of 11. Continuing at the Paris Conservatory with Jules Loeb, he took a first prize in 1902 for his excellence in musicianship. He became 'cellist of the Opera Comique orchestra in 1904, and of the Colonne Orchestra in 1908 under Mm. Colonne and Pierre Monteux.

These activities, together with appearances in chamber music and recitals in various European cities were interrupted by the World War, when he was called to service. In the autumn of 1919 he came to America to assume his present position. Among his outstanding performances with the Boston Symphony were the principal 'cello concertos—the Schumann, Saint Saens, Haydn A Minor, Lalo, Tschaikovsky (Rococo Variations) the Boellmann Symphonic Variations and the Faure "Elegie." He appeared as soloist in the performance of Bloch's "Schelomo," which had its first Boston performance in 1923.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 5 - 1939

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert Thursday

Boxholders for Third in Brooklyn Series Are Announced—Committee Plans for the Annual Yuletide Ball at Heights Casino Next Dec. 27

At the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening the following will be the boxholders: Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association and the Inter-City Orchestra members, who have been selected by Dr. George H. Gartlan, director of music in the New York City school to occupy the committee box.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony will present Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist in Saint-Saens' Concerto in A Minor for violincello and orchestra. The program also will include Mozart's Symphony in A Major and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Opus 26.

The Boston Symphony concerts now in their 53d season are given under the joint auspices of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which James G. McDonald is president, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is acting chairman and which Adrian VanSinderen heads.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 6 - 1939

Third Boston Symphony Concert Of Season Thursday Evening; Boxholders Are Announced

Boxholders for the season's third Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert on Thursday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will be: Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, the Adelphi Academy of Alumnae Association and the Inter-City Orchestra members. The latter have been selected by Dr. George H. Gartlan, director of music in New York City schools, to occupy the Committee Box.

Mrs. Schoohoven, occupying Mrs. Dean C. Osborne's box during the latter's absence from the city, will have as her guests Mr. and Mrs. Floyd S. Neely, the Misses Edith and Eleanor Gertrude Hanam, Howard Carlson and Dr. Eilif Hanssen. Mrs. Johnson's guests will be Appelate Justice John B. Johnston and Mrs. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Pendleton and Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush.

Miss Jessie Ogg will be hostess in the Adelphi Alumnae box and Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle and Mrs. Theodore Vosseler will be hostesses in the Woman's Club box. Guests in the latter will be Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, president; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Freerick M. Davidson, Mrs. Jason Davis and Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony will present Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist in Saint-Saens' Concerto in A Monor for violin-cella and orchestra. The program also will include Mozart's Symphony in A Major (K 201) and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Opus 36.

Concerts by the Boston orchestra, now in their fifty-third season here, are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Huntington Woodman is president and the Brooklyn Committee, headed by Adrian Van Sinderen, with Mrs. Henry J. Davenport as chairman.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 5 - 1939

Koussevitzky Returns

Boston Symphony's Third Concert at the Academy Friday Night—Children's Ballet to Give 'The Toy Box'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the third concert of its current Brooklyn series next Thursday evening, Feb. 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, will also appear as soloist for Saint-Saens' Concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra. Included on the program are Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201) and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

* * *

The Children's Repertory Ballet will give a four-act performance of "La Boite a Joujoux" (the Toy Box) next Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock at the Academy.

The program is one of a series of Saturday afternoon events given for young people. The ballet will be under the direction of Annette Van Dyke, who has had wide experience in producing revues with children.

In "La Boite a Joujoux," a beautiful French doll plays with the heart of a wooden soldier, as she dances gaily with the puppet, Polichinelle. The wooden soldier is the hero, hewn of the best family tree, and he engages in a battle for his beloved.

When he is wounded and almost dying, the doll realizes how much she loves him and the ballet ends happily.

"Boxes of toys," wrote Debussy, the composer of the music for this ballet, "are like villages where play things live like people. Or better still, villages are perhaps only boxes of toys in which people live like playthings."

Miss Van Dyke's company consists of 60 children whose ages range from four to 14. They have been assembled through the courtesy of a number of leading dancing schools, many of the children coming from other States.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 7 - 1939

Mr. and Mrs. David Johnson To Entertain at Dinner

Mr. and Mrs. David C. Johnson of 135 Eastern Parkway will entertain at dinner at their home preceding the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening at the Academy of Music. Their guests will be Judge and Mrs. John B. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Pendleton, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush and Mr. and Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 9 - 1939

MME. LEROUX HERE FOR CONCERT TOUR

French Pianist to Make Her First Appearance in U. S.

Mme. Germaine Leroux, French pianist, arrived last night on the French liner Paris for her first concert tour of the United States and Canada. She was accompanied by her husband, Milo Safrenek, counselor of the Czecho-Slovak Foreign Office in Pargue, who is on leave from his post.

Mme. Leroux said she had long looked forward to her first visit to the United States, particularly because she has known many Americans in Paris and in Prague, where her husband is popular with the international diplomatic set and with American newspaper correspondents.

It was reported here that Mme. Leroux would have her first American appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but she said last night that final details had not been completed and that she had not been informed whether a definite date had been set. She said she would communicate with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, before announcing her plans definitely.

She will play the second piano concerto of Bolislav Martenu, which was written expressly for her by the Czecho-Slovak composer. It will be the first hearing of this composition in the United States.

"I am also bringing several other Czecho-Slovak compositions for premier performances in the United States," Mme. Leroux said.

In explanation, she added that she had sponsored considerable native Czecho-Slovak music in her concerts in France and elsewhere on the continent and that she had become known as "an ambassador for Czech music in France, and for French music in Czecho-Slovakia."

She declined to discuss conditions in Czecho-Slovakia or to comment on any international question current in Europe today.

Mr. Safrenek said he was "very much a private citizen at the present time" and would remain so as long as his visit to the United States lasts.

"I have been away from Prague for some time now and it is not my place to discuss affairs at home," he said. "I will not be able to answer any questions about anything."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 5 - 1939

Underneath the wig is Serge Koussevitzky. He will wear this costume as Josef Haydn in an eighteenth century dress performance of the "Farewell" Symphony. The men of the orchestra in costume, too. All at Carnegie Hall this Wednesday night.

FOUNDING A QUARTET

STUDENT devotees of chamber music who dream of founding their own string quartets and wonder how it can be done may perhaps be enlightened by the experience of the Griller String Quartet, which will make its American debut this evening at Town Hall.

Ten years ago the members of the quartet were chosen from the students of the Royal Academy of Music in London by Lionel Tertis, who encouraged them to become a permanent group. They had no private means, nor did they know a good angel who would proffer a subsidy. To take separate employment would seriously jeopardize the very possibility of the quartet's existence. They determined to forget their needs as individuals and carry on, at whatever sacrifice, as a collective unit.

Their first need was a common residence, which they found in the shape of an old railway carriage stranded in a small town on the south coast of England. This proved so successful a solution that upon leaving the academy they packed their instruments, scores and parts and moved to a small house in St. Albans, a quiet cathedral town about twenty miles out of London. Here they worked intensively for three years, gradually acquiring a reputation in England and receiving more and more engagements, until at last they could afford to live in London.

The residence at St. Albans was made possible only by the faith and cooperation of the tradesmen, who, convinced that the Griller Quartet was aspiring for ideals, were glad to relax their accustomed severity in the matter of bills. The milkman, whose acquaintance with the late Beethoven quartets can scarcely have been considerable, gave the group credit to the extent of £30. The example was followed by the butcher, the baker and the candlestick maker, whose splendid faith was rewarded by the quartet's first big check. Not that it was enough to pay them all off, but it was a symbol of progress and presaged success.

Since those days the Griller Quartet has appeared throughout England and the Continent in something like 800 performances all told. The personnel has remained unchanged.

One of the most interesting musical developments in England, according to the Griller Quartet, is the growth and spread of the so-called "musical clubs." These are no more nor less than pre-subscribed concert series similar to those in this country, with the exception that they are almost solely confined to chamber music, and to the string quartet in particular. The idea has been especially successful in the "very poor' mining towns in North England and in some of the industrial towns in Scotland, whose enthusiastic support of these series testifies to their real enjoyment.

Many of these towns, having heretofore had no concerts, have no concert halls. But this was no obstacle. Stables and "corn and cattle exchanges" may not provide the best acoustical conditions, nor be entirely acceptable to the ordinary concertgoer, but for the music-hungry they offer a clear floor space and four walls—which is enough to hold music, whether it be cowbells or Beethoven. And it seems to make no difference in the degree of enjoyment that the walls bear advertisements for sales of cattle instead of portraits or names of great composers.

BERKSHIRE ACADEMY

THE sixth Berkshire Symphony Festival to be held Aug. 3-13 at Tanglewood in Stockbridge, Mass., will consist of six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. These will be presented in two series. The first series is scheduled for Aug. 3, 5 and 6, and the second for Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

The programs for the festival will be arranged by Dr. Koussevitzky from the following list of compositions: the Second and Third symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third symphonies of Brahms, Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony, the Second and Fifth symphonies of Sibelius, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade," Debussy's" "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra" and others.

Although busied with its program for next Summer's festival, the festival authorities are deeply concerned with the objective of creating a musical center, which it hopes to inaugurate in 1940. The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., with this goal in view, are giving serious thought to the development of the buildings at Tanglewood in anticipation of this academy project.

The plans for an academy were outlined in the address made by Bentley W. Warren, on behalf of the trustees of the orchestra, at the dedicatory exercises for the festival shed last Summer. Mr. Bentley then remarked: "We all hope the annual festival may be supplemented by a school, or academy, holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players. Tanglewood is the ideal location for such a center.

"This fortunate combination of circumstances will provide an excellent beginning for the realization of Dr. Koussevitzky's program. Indeed, the greatest need will be for scholarships. No one can doubt that from some source the necessary funds will be forthcoming; and it is expected that the detailed arrangement for the school will be completed so that its first session may precede the Berkshire Festival of 1940."

In preparation for the festival this August the trustees are making such needed improvements as draining parking areas, installing lighting and laying out new roads. They also hope to provide the shed with an emergency enclosure, in case sufficient funds are raised.

According to the latest announcement, 90 per cent of the boxes have been subscribed for the forthcoming festival and at each of the six concerts audiences of more than 2,000 persons already are assured. Subscriptions are being received for both of the weekly series.

NEGRO CONCERTS

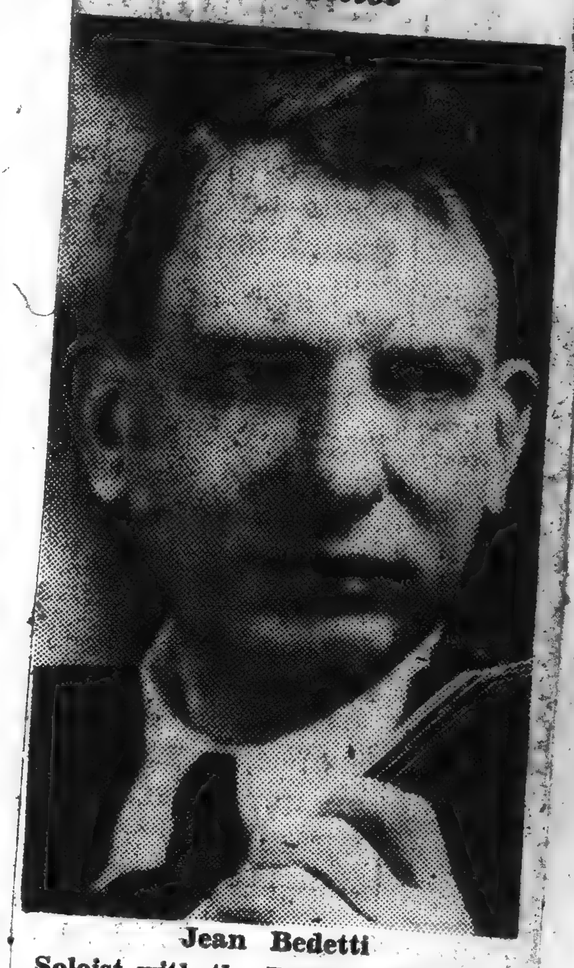
THE initial concert in the series "Negro Music, Past and Present," which is being sponsored by the Labor Club, will be given next Sunday night at the Labor Stage. At this opening event a program directed by Albert Moss will be presented, tracing the history of Negro music from the African period with its tribal dances to the latest type of racial manifestations in the art.

Among the participants in the first concert will be Asadata Dafora, creator of the Kynkunkor dances; James P. Johnson, composer of "Backwater Blues"; Ruby Smith, "blues" singer; Meade "Lux" Lewis and Albert Ammons, pianists; Archie Savage and his group of dancers; "Leadbelly," folksong singer, and Albert Moss and his choir of twenty voices.

The program was conceived by Carlton Moss, who wrote all of the continuity except that for the African numbers, which was provided by Mr. Dafora. Robert H. Gordon is in charge of the staging of the concerts. John Velasco, one of the organizers of the Negro People's Theatre, which became the nucleus of the Negro unit of the Federal Theatre Project, is associated with the Labor Club in the presentation of these concerts.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 7 - 1939

'Cellist



Jean Bedetti
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Thursday evening

Symphonic Activity This Week and for Monday-Tuesday

Myra Hess will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 17 and 18, and at the Symphony concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon following, Feb. 20 and 21. The English pianist will appear with the orchestra in Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor. In the Monday and Tuesday series, she will be heard in Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the program of the Friday and Saturday series with the Second Symphony of William Schuman, when the music of this composer will be heard for the first time hereabouts. William Schuman, born in New York, has studied music there and in Austria. He has written a number of choral and chamber works which have been performed. The Second Symphony, which is in one movement, was the prize-winning composition in a national contest, and has been performed in New York, both in a public and in a broadcast concert. The Third Symphony of Sibelius, in C major, will be played in this program, as well as Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto.

Dr. Koussevitzky announces performances of Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," for the program of the Monday-Tuesday series, Richard Hale appearing as narrator. This program will open with Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. No. 201. It will include, besides Schumann's Piano Concerto, Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

There will be a symphony concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, Feb. 16. Serge Koussevitzky announces for this program Vivaldi's orchestral Concerto in D minor, edited by Siloti; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf"; and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
Sunday News and Sentinel
FEB 5 - 1939

New Recorded Music

(February Releases)

Symphony no. 102 in B flat major (Haydn). Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. In these robust and stirring pages, there is the same unconquerable spirit which surges through the scores of Beethoven's Fourth and Eighth symphonies. You don't find an ache or a pain in it, not even in the graceful, lovely adagio. The first movement, with its majestic introduction, is worthy of Beethoven. The menuetto is full of rustic vigor, and the presto is without peer for its madcap spirits and its hearty peasant flavor. This symphony, indeed, is as ageless and fresh today as anything written by the masters. The Bostonians leap upon it with well disciplined gusto. Their crisp, sure playing, as usual, is a joy, and the recording is equal to that of last month's "Sinfonia Domestica." (Victor Album set M-529.)

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS
FEB 7 - 1939

Vermont Symphony To Play At Montpelier

(Special to the Free Press)

MONTPELIER, Feb. 6.-

the Reader's Digest. Mr. Carter, the director, will be able to have with the Symphony, because of engagements immediately preceding and after the concert, an outstanding soloist, Zlatko Balokovic, violinist. Mr. Balokovic appears with the Boston Symphony the following week.

SOMERVILLE, N. J.
Semi-Weekly Messenger
FEB 7 - 1939

Somerville Folk to Hear Boston Symphony Concert

NEW BRUNSWICK—Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bonham, Mr. and Mrs. C. Palmer Bateman, Mrs. L. P. Gaston, Mrs. C. P. Hoagland and Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Hoagland are among those who will attend the Boston Symphony concert at Rutgers University here tonight.

Symphony Throws a Costume Party

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra forgot about the serious side of music when they gave, at Symphony Hall the other night, an "Extraordinary Concert" for the benefit of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra. They dressed up in fancy costumes and white wigs for Haydn's "Farewell Symphony," which was played against a setting of wreathed columns and candlelight. Dr. Koussevitzky impersonated the 18th Century composer. Next came Louis Gruenberg's 20th Century piece, "The Daniel Jazz," for which the orchestra decked themselves out in mess-jackets, sat on a moving platform in front of a modernistic screen. The evening included Prokofieff's amusing "Peter and the Wolf," a musical setting of a Russian fairy tale, and a glimpse at the history of the waltz, from 19th Century Joseph Lanner of Vienna to Maurice Ravel of modern Paris. Everybody had a nice time.
—Cyrus W. Durgin.

A TUNE-UP and a funny story before the show begins.

FIRST AID for a wig ribbon.

SMART NUMBER from the 1700s; a "weskit" that ties behind.

CONDUCTOR Haydn-Koussevitzky gives his men an approving once-over before he sits down at the spinet.

SYMPHONY gets hot. Richard Burgin conducting a mess-jacketed band in "The Daniel Jazz," while tenor Colin O'More swings into his solo. In back is John Holabird's vivid modernistic screen.

NO, it's not Joseph Haydn and his orchestra, but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and part of the Boston Symphony all dressed up for a performance of Haydn's "Farewell Symphony."

Symphony Throws a Costume Party

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra forgot about the serious side of music when they gave, at Symphony Hall the other night, an "Extraordinary Concert" for the benefit of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra. They dressed up in fancy costumes and white wigs for Haydn's "Farewell Symphony," which was played against a setting of wreathed columns and candlelight. Dr. Koussevitzky impersonated the 18th Century composer. Next came Louis Gruenberg's 20th Century piece, "The Daniel Jazz," for which the orchestra decked themselves out in mess-jackets, sat on a moving platform in front of a modernistic screen. The evening included Prokofieff's amusing "Peter and the Wolf," a musical setting of a Russian fairy tale, and a glimpse at the history of the waltz, from 19th Century Joseph Lanner of Vienna to Maurice Ravel of modern Paris. Everybody had a nice time.
—Cyrus W. Durgin.

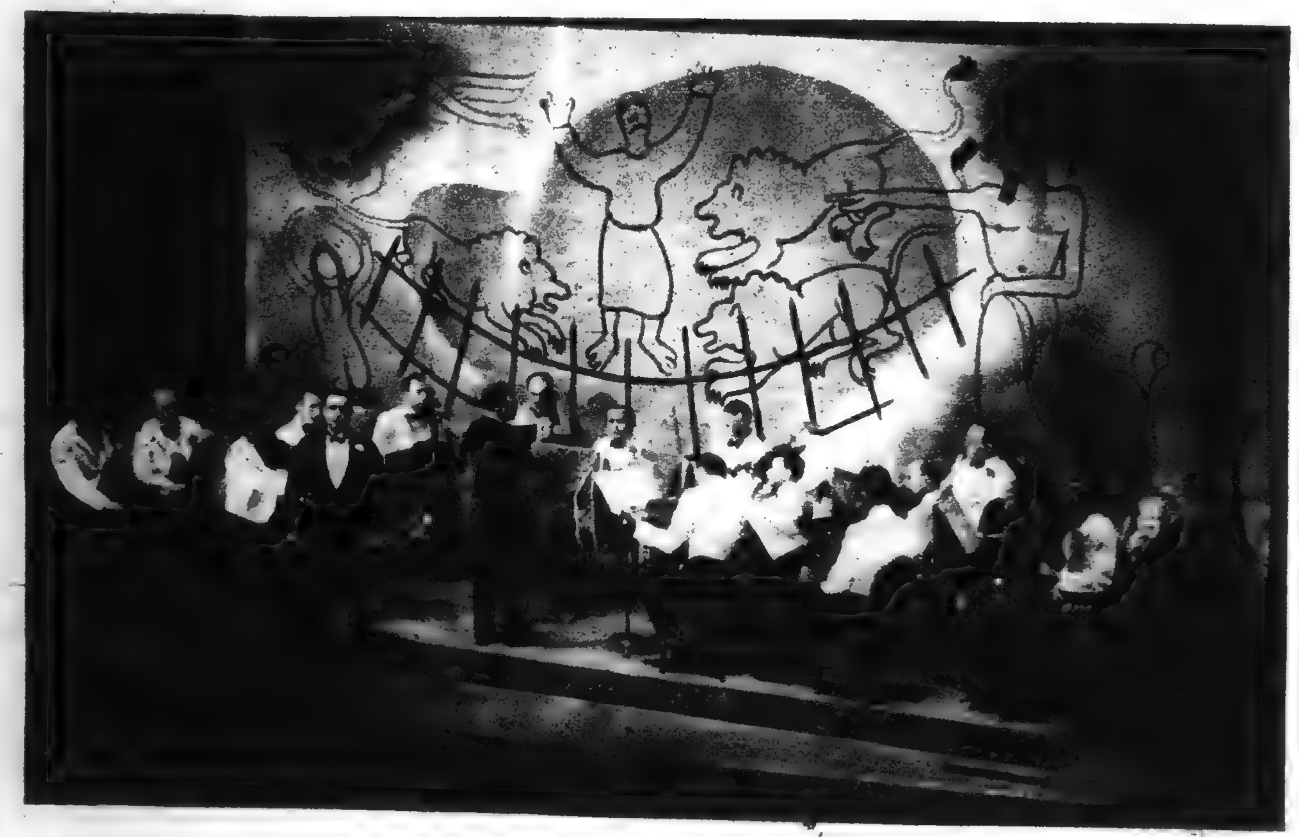
A TUNE-UP and a funny story before the show begins.

FIRST AID for a wig ribbon.

SMART NUMBER from the 1700s; a "weskit" that ties behind.

CONDUCTOR Haydn-Koussevitzky gives his men an approving once-over before he sits down at the spinet.



SYMPHONY gets hot. Richard Burgin conducting a mess-jacketed band in "The Daniel Jazz," while tenor Colin O'More swings into his solo. In back is John Holabird's vivid modernistic screen.

NO, it's not Joseph Haydn and his orchestra, but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and part of the Boston Symphony all dressed up for a performance of Haydn's "Farewell Symphony."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

FEB 2 - 1939

Boston Symphony Audience Astonished by Hot-Cha Boys

Victims of Delightful, Subtle Hoax— Koussevitzky Appears as Haydn— Richard Hale in "Peter the Wolf"

(By JAY C. ROSENFELD)

BOSTON, Feb. 2.—"Dick" Burgin and his "BSO" hot-cha-cha boys may not be as renowned in their field as some other of the country's popular bands but it is a question if any troupe ever caused as much astonishment as did they when last night in Symphony Hall they were pushed forward on a movable platform to execute their part of the Pension Fund concert.

To see an oversized dozen or so familiar "Symphony" men in little short white jackets, with gilt letters "BOS" stamped on heraldic banners hanging from the backs of their music-stands, playing Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," a piece inspired by Vachel Lindsay's poem, and with the tenor Colin O'More singing the eloquent verses was a sight which the conservative Boston audience which packed the hall could not at once absorb.

In Powdered Wigs

Indeed up to the end of the program it was not completely evident that the spirit of the evening, a delightful subtle hoax, had penetrated the learned craniums of the Hub's inveterate music-lovers. At the opening of the concert they were greeted with a Burgundy red curtain which closed the platform to view instead of the usually brilliantly-lighted stage to which the grand organ provides the backdrop.

But if they were awed by the sight which unfolded at the curtain's first drawing they were less surprised because of the advance publicity which the event had been given. It certainly did not diminish their pleasure as they saw a major part of their beloved orchestra, in powdered wigs and the costumes which were of the day of Haydn, sitting at the candle-lighted desks awaiting the arrival on the stage of their famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, who was to impersonate dear old "Papa" Haydn in the performance of that master's "Farewell" symphony. Haydn and George Washington were vintage of the same year, and the costume in which our first President is portrayed was that copied last night.

Above the orchestra was suspended a gorgeous chandelier; to each side of the orchestra were fluted columns surmounted by candelabra. In the usual place of the conductor's stand was an old spinet of the type from which Haydn is known to have directed his orchestra.

Koussevitzky in Character

The appearance of Koussevitzky drew forth a hush rather than an explosion of applause. His black, brocaded satin, knee-length coat with its wide lace-fringed cuffs within which he tucked his handkerchief; his satin knee-breeches, white stockings and black pumps, comprised a costume which was topped by a white braided wig caught at the back with a dainty black ribbon. He was made up, too, to resemble the old master and his attempt to stay in character not only was well done, but a remarkable feature of the Boston conductoro's personality. Few are the famous men before the musical public, except those of opera perhaps, who would deign to let their hair down, as did Mr. Koussevitzky figuratively and pseudo-literally last night. The evidences of being a human being in addition to a celebrated conductor are indeed extraordinary in his case.

The "Farewell" symphony is the one in the last movement of which, one by one, the musicians extinguish their candles and steal away while their royal patron, happily dozing, neither notices their departure nor the cessation of the sweet sounds. This was carried out last night with painstaking care. The restrained volume of the orchestra gradually diminished until there were left but one of each instrument, and then in soft succession there were six, five, four, a single first violin and a second, finally none but the conductor, who, too, then blows out his candle and tiptoes away.

Hale Narrator

The remainder of the program was done in conventional evening concert costume. Yet to come before intermission was "Peter and the Wolf" of Prokofieff, in which Richard Hale was the narrator. This, a fairy tale for children, was done with spontaneous abandon. Everyone was so happy about the whole evening, on stage and in the audience.

After intermission came a series of waltzes, one by Lanner, two by Johann Strauss, one each of Sibelius and Ravel. The superb orchestra takes such familiar things as the "Voices of Spring" and the "Valse Triste" and makes of them something of "gemutlich" charm and indelible effectiveness.

The program was one chosen with an eye to avoid conflict with any of the regular scheduled concerts of the year, but in relief it stood out all the more clearly and memorably.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

FEB 9 - 1939

Boston Symphony Musicians in Costume

By PITTS SANBORN.

Giving your ticket to a man in the wig and costume of the later eighteenth century and finding ushers correspondingly accoutered provided the introductory thrill at Carnegie Hall last evening. The occasion was the "Concert Extraordinaire" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — so extraordinary that the usual Athenian English would not suffice—and the proceeds were destined to swell the orchestra's pension fund.

The program began, paradoxically, with "Haydn's "Farewell" symphony. Candles and candelabra imparted the right period look to the stage. The players were appropriately bewigged and dressed, and Serge Koussevitzky himself impersonated Haydn. In spite of all which, there was no mistaking the fact that the symphony was well performed.

Next, under the leadership of Richard Burgin, the concert-master, and with Colin O'More as tenor soloist, the great audience was treated to Louis Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz." Mess jackets for the players, a dinner jacket for the leader and a rolling platform here entered the picture, while at the back a screen confected by John Holabird supplied a visual evocation of Daniel's adventures.

This disposed of, Mr. Koussevitzky returned to his post, "Costume" retired to the wardrobe and the first local performance of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," described as an orchestral fairy tale for children, took place.

This work, a sort of Walt Disney Prokofieffized, proved to be decidedly charming. Especially delightful is the music associated with Peter himself. There is a narrator who reads at intervals Peter's simple story, sometimes while the music is in progress. His difficult function was fulfilled by Richard Hale with expressiveness and tact, absolute distinctness of utterance and a resonant and finely modulated voice.

The second and final part of the program was simply entitled "The Waltz." It consisted of "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen," by Johann Strauss; the Sibelius "Valse triste" and Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse."

It was an unalloyed joy to listen to this delectable music so expertly performed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 9 - 1939

Boston Symphony's Recital Follows Dress Tradition

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony gave a fancy dress concert in Carnegie Hall last night for the benefit of its Pension Fund.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky conceived the idea of introducing something unique for the event and selected Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, his men and himself wearing the powdered wigs and lace-frilled brocade costumes of the 18th century, the composer's period. The influence was carried to the ticket-takers, ushers, the carriage men and the veteran guardian of the 56th st. entrance, Gus Wade, who all were in the picture with wigs and silken costumes.

The Symphony was played by a diminished orchestra of 30, the conductor taking his position at a spinet, as did the composer during his incumbency at the Esterhazy palace. Each desk of the musicians bore a lighted candle and the stage was similarly lighted from a huge chandelier.

The opening movements were performed with rare charm and grace. When the final section was reached, the musicians, one by one, blew out the candles and silently left the platform until, at the finish, the conductor and two violins were all that was left to represent the "Farewell."

The idea was according to history and was delightfully carried out. The audience applauded generously, recalling the deserting musicians and the conductor several times.

The musical pendulum swung to the other extreme for the next number, Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," with Concert Master Richard Burgin as batonist. Colin O'More was the tenor soloist in that number.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 2 - 1939

Musick Goes Surely, Simply to Heart as S. Koussevitzky Appears as Haydn

By G. Y. Loveridge

Feb. 1.—To Boston by moonlight, and there in Symphony Hall the most entrancing musick that ever I heard.

A great crowd was gathered, it being a special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its pension fund, and many fine and curious things expected. When the hall had been darkened, the rose-colored curtains divided, and on the stage the orchestra, all in elegant cloathes, with powdered wigs and knee-breeches, and sitting in gilded chairs, and on each musick-rack a lighted candle. In front, before a handsome spinet, stood S. Koussevitzky, the conductor, garbed as J. Haydn, the musick-writer. He wore a silver wig with a black ribbon, a plum-colored coat over a waistcoat of gold cloth, knee-breeches, white stockings and shoes with silver buckles, and in his lace cuff a handkerchief of lace that did once or twice fall out as he conducted.

Nor did he smile at all, but turned to direct the "Farewell Symphony" using no baton but only his hands, as was done in Haydn's time. And in the second movement he did sit at the spinet while directing, and afterwards stood again.

In the adagio of the last movement, as Haydn had desired, the musicians one by one arose, blew out their candles and tiptoed from the stage, the musick being all the time continued by those remaining, until but two violins were left, playing sweetly and softly in the great, still hall. Then they, too, put out their candles and departed, and last of all the conductor. And there was no sound from anybody, the finest applause that ever I knew.

Then, the curtains being drawn, there was a roar of hands, and the orchestra and Koussevitzky must needs return time after time, in their splendid cloathes, to be admired.

Afterward came "The Daniel Jazz," the words by V. Lindsay, the poet, about Daniel in the lions' den, and the musick by L. Gruenberg, and sung by a comickal Irishman, Colin O'More. Only a few musicians played this, they dressed in short white coats like a jazz band, and R. Burgin conducting, and V. Polatschek taking hot breaks on the clarinet. Very amusing.

Then Richard Hale reading a fairy story, "Peter the Wolf," with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting the music by S. Prokofieff that he writ to go with it, all very melodious, and he being the only composer now who is not afraid of a melody. But, Lord, how I laughed at the cat in the clarinet and the grandfather in the bassoon and the duck in the oboe and all the other conceits. And so did everybody, and Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Hale and the musicians all much applauded.

After the intermission, waltzes by R. Strauss, J. Lanner, J. Sibelius, and M. Ravel, but I did like the Viennese the best, they being more merry and more melancholy, too. And the orchestra did play them as beautifully as though they were symphonies by L. van Beethoven, for artists are artists in little things as well as in mighty things, and R. Burgin and J. Bedetti and the others made me know why J. Brahms wished he had written a Strauss waltz.

Dr. Koussevitzky was very red and smiling and perspiring and bowed many times, and had the men stand with him, the audience being reluctant to go.

So drove back to Providence, thinking no musick had ever been more surely and simply to the heart. To the office, and then home with the moonlight on the snow, and late to bed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 9 - 1939

BOSTONIANS GIVE COSTUME CONCERT

White Wigs Give Way to Night Club Attire.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

High jinx by ~~that most~~ staid of American musical institutions, the Boston Symphony, amused and gratified a large audience that assembled in Carnegie Hall last night for the orchestra's Pension Fund concert. There was no clowning and the evening was replete with playing of the most polished and refined character. Just the same, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky impersonated Papa Haydn, "The Daniel Jazz" was given in a night club setting and there was a "first time" of the big bad wolf variety; after which came waltzes gay, sad and sardonic. All of this was quite different from a typical Boston Symphony program and none of it will be repeated for the regulars who attend the orchestra's subscription concerts tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon.

A farewell began the evening—the "Farewell" symphony of Haydn—with the conductor and a small orchestra of thirty players attired in white wigs and black satin small clothes of Haydn's time. The audience chamber was darkened, the stage lit by candelabra and individual candles on the stands of the musicians. Sometimes standing, sometimes seated at a harpsichord that was purely decorative and never struck, Dr. Koussevitzky-Haydn elicited from his ensemble such playing as surely never graced the provincial court of Esterhaz.

Haydn authorities still give differing versions of the tale, which was visualized for last night's audience. One by one and two by two, the players blew out their candles and left the platform, until only two violinists continued playing, one on either side of the conductor. Then they, too, retired, leaving their leader to make his way out alone. Perhaps the best authenticated account (that which Hadden bases on Pohl) states that Haydn's purpose was to persuade the Prince to shorten his stay at Esterhaz and thus enable his musicians to rejoin their wives and families. As one after another of the musicians left the orchestra, the quick-witted Esterhazy saw the point and quietly observed: "If all go, we may as well go too."

Last night's audience remained, applauding energetically. After the Haydn of 1772 came the Gruenberg of 1923, the "Farewell" ushering in "The Daniel Jazz." With a new parting of the curtains a platform rolled forward, Music Hall fashion. It bore a scenic screen, depicting Daniel in the lions' den a group of players in white jackets and, as conductor and soloist, respectively, Alfred Bergin and Colin O'More. It was Mr. O'More who first sang here this setting of Vachel Lindsay's delectable parody, some fifteen years ago. Time has not lessened its basic fault—that of obscuring by instrumental competition the words that ought to be heard. But the roaring of the lions is still droll enough to make one wish the music had elsewhere were more direct and less labored. The soloist was prodigiously applauded.

Prokofieff Work Introduced.

Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," described as "a fairy tale for children," was the "first time" work. Completed less than three years ago, it bears the opus number 67. All concerned being now in orthodox evening "tails," Richard Hale spoke the narrator's part and Dr. Koussevitzky held the baton over the full ensemble. "Peter and the Wolf" is a suave and ingenuous-sounding satire on program music, with each of its characters bodied forth by certain instruments—a bird by the flute, a duck by the oboe, a cat by the clarinet, a grandfather by the bassoon, Peter by the strings, and the wolf by three horns. Peter's particular tune is an engaging one and is put through its paces with zestful naivete. Mr. Hale's delivery of the spoken story was a masterly achievement of humor and clarity.

With the Boston strings singing at their magical best, transcendently beautiful playing was bestowed on two Johann Strauss waltzes, "Wiener Bult" and "Fruehlingstimmen"; then on the Sibelius "Valse Triste" and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse." One could only wonder if there was intentional tragedy in this succession—the gayety of old Vienna, the melancholy of a changing time, the tumbling of a house of cards while the dance went on. But the applause bespoke merely a delighted audience.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 4 - 1939

Bostonians See and Hear 'Papa Haydn'

Symphony's Concert Extraordinaire, Gay Graceful Performance

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Symphony Hall, so often frequented by the shades of time's greatest composers, witnessed the personification of the venerable Papa Haydn Wednesday evening when curtains parted upon a scene which required no imagination at all to transport the beholder to the salon of the Esterhazy of the 1790's.

Under a magnificent chandelier sat 30 bewigged players, in breeches, fancy coats and buckled shoes of the period, their music racks lighted by candles and the picture framed on either side by truncated columns surmounted by gleaming candalabra and twined with silver festoons. Before his men stood Haydn himself in a lustrous white peruque, a coat of rich brocaded material, a white waistcoat embroidered in gold and lace cuffs that fairly hid his eloquent hands.

* * *

It was the face of Koussevitzky and yet it was not. Exceedingly grave; he remained true to his part, surveyed the audience with unsmiling reserve, turned an inspective monocle on the players at the left, on the players to the right, and gave the beat, alternately standing before his spinet or seated at its keyboard. Through four movements the elegant music continued—and the leader could not have been true to his part had he permitted anything but the authentic instrumentation—and as the concluding adagio began, two string players blew out their candles and silently left the stage; then another pair and another until the final bar of the "Farewell Symphony" was reached with a lone duet of fiddlers. These retired and Papa Haydn with head bowed paced solemnly off the scene before the spell was broken. The curtains were drawn.

And the curtains parted. Richard Burgin and his orchestra in white jackets were rolled forward on a moveable platform, the music racks bedizened with garishly fringed banners bearing the stage device BSO. Colin O'More stepped off the sliding stage and the aggregation, with the sizzling rhythms and hot breaks right off the Gruenberg griddle, launched into "The Daniel Jazz." It was audacious. It was electric. It was tremendous. As for Colin O'More's vivid performance — space won't allow the telling of it. The curtains were drawn.

* * *

And the curtains parted. The orchestra, formally dressed, was seated well back. In the foreground stood Richard Hale, actor and singer, score in hand, this time narrator for Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." With its introduction of the clarinet duck, the bird flute, grandpa bassoon and other instrumental dramatis personae, the piece might be taken as a facetious commentary on music appreciation demonstrations, or honestly as an "Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, opus 67." It was amusing either way. To watch the face of Koussevitzky mirror the moods of Peter as the theme recurred was as illuminating as the narrator's remarks. In the promenade at intermission time you heard the little hero's tune hummed on every side.

The curtains were gone and the full orchestra filled the broad stage. For the rest of the program all hearts beat in three-four time—to Lanner's "Die Schönbrunner," "Wiener Blut" and "Voices of Spring" by Strauss, the sombre Valse Triste of Sibelius, and to that sardonically glittering and pulsating waltz apotheosis of Ravel. Seductive and contemptuous by turns, satirical and warmly naive, La Valse is made of steel and silks and had always more nervous excitement about it than Bolero.

* * *

How did they play? After the first Strauss waltz amidst the drumfire of applause, Jean Bedetti's glance sought that of Koussevitzky, then that of the cellist next to him; Burgin looked rapt; and down the line each pair of string players exchanged looks which betokened that rare bond which binds artists together but seldom has a visible presence. You could not say they smiled but there was the warmth of mutual congratulation. The daemon of the orchestra was abroad that night.

This was called a concert extraordinaire in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. It is no disparagement to say that it was a grand show. Toward that end no pains had been spared to make it a perfect one. As details, it might be recorded that Dr. Koussevitzky's costume was by Robert Edmond Jones, the painted screen for "The Daniel Jazz" was done by John Holabird, the spinet was lent from the Casadesus collection, and all the costumes and wigs were, strangely enough, by the Hayden Costume Co. A Boston hotel supplied gilt chairs and a Nantucket antique dealer candlesticks for the spinet. The mise en scène was by Jock Munro.

The show was a good deal above high jinks for all the play was earnestly done and with exquisite grace.

Serge Koussevitzky Goes 18th Century

—[AP Photo.

Dr. Koussevitzky powdered and bewigged to impersonate the composer Haydn for the concert "extraordinaire" in which he conducted the Boston Symphony Wednesday night in Boston. The concert will be repeated Feb. 8 in New York.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

FEB 9 - 1939

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky as Haydn In Carnegie Hall Recital

Pension Fund of Boston Symphony Has a Grand Time—So Does Audience

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

There were strange doings in and about Carnegie Hall last night. The doorman who helped you out of your taxi looked like a postillion of Revolutionary days. The ancient, agreeable and celebrated Gus who guards the artists back stage stood resplendent in knee breeches, brocaded coat and periwig. Inside the auditorium beautiful ladies in eighteenth century custumes showed you to your seat. The place, in fact, reeked eighteenth century, and when the curtain went up on a room in the Esterhazy Palace showing Josef Haydn presiding over his Excellency's orchestra, the famous composer and his be-wigged players operating by candlelight, the audience was so entranced that it broke out into eighteenth century ohs and ahs.

The paying guests of the evening had assembled for the purpose of swelling the pension fund of the Boston Symphony, and the orchestra in return had promised entertainment not usually associated with the staid organization and its aloof conductor. The eighteenth century trimming was merely the visible prelude to the first number on the program of the Boston's "Concert Extraordinaire." This was Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony performed in the atmosphere for which it was composed. Dr. Koussevitzky, who is ordinarily among the best tailored of our orchestra conductors, was a magnificent figure as Kappelmeister Josef Haydn. In a costume designed by Robert Edmond Jones and tailored by Eaves, wig by Barris, shoes by I. Miller, he directed as was Haydn's wont, while seated at a spinet (loaned from the Casadesus Collection). One by one the players rose, snuffed out their candles and tiptoed out, until only Dr. Koussevitzky remained on the stage. It was all very staid, cute and utterly eighteenth century.

However, there was no trace of antiquity about the second number, Mr. Gruenberg's once famous "The Daniel Jazz." The setting here was a modern night club with the players (in white mess jackets) led by Mr. Burgin, the orchestra's concert master (in black dinner jacket). The tenor, Colin O'More, sang the Vachel Lindsay words—"hot-cha" stuff, a little cooled off since they were first intoned some years ago. The third scene found the orchestra in proper evening dress playing, to the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, an Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children called "Peter and the Wolf," by Sergie Prokofieff. It was a first New York performance. Mr. Richard Hale acted as narrator, and as he declaimed the tale of Peter and the Wolf the orchestra played appropriate Prokofieffian music.

Later on the Dr. and his men gave the audience three examples of The Waltz—Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen," Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse." The concert was certainly "Extraordinaire," as the program had it, and it is to be hoped that the Boston Pension Fund was the gainer.

N. Y. Times
Feb. 12/39

VARIED BILL GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra Under His Direction Plays A Major Symphony by Mozart

'SCHELOMO' ON PPROGRAM

Bedetti Is 'Cello Soloist in Bloch Work—Hindemith's 'Dances' Repeated

By OLIN DOWNES

The deeds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its buildemr and leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, grow with doing, if not with the elling. To the sensational effect, now historic, which this conductor and orchestra achieved when they played the Eighth Bruckner Symphony last Friday night, is to be added the record of the performances yesterday of an adorable symphony of Mozart; the repetition from an earlier New York program of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances; the performance of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," with Bedetti as soloist, in the presence of the composer, and, one of the most famous of the chef d'oeuvres of this orchestra, the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

It would be hard to find a program which offered more of contrast and which required more versatility of understanding and of style. The Mozart symphony was thhe one in A major, numbered in Koeckel catalogue 201, and it was played with ineffable simplicity, finish and feeling. It is not one of the grand Mozart symphonies, nor the most elaborate in workmanship, but it is perfect in its genre, in the flow of the ideas, in the inspired instrumentation. It need hardly be pointed out, how great a test of the highest attributes of orchestral playing is constituted by such a symphony. This Stradivarius of an orchestra met every test triumphantly.

Introduced Earlier in Season

Dr. Koussevitzky's repetition of the Hindemith "Symphonic Dances," which he had introduced here earlier in the season, was a fine deed for a piece of very significant modern music. For the "Symphonic Dances," received with reservations by a portion of the public and press commentators, this writer among them, on the occasion of their first hearing, were received yesterday afternoon with unreserved and emphatic approval. The present reviewer was constrained materially to modify his earlier opinion. True, the same thing that was obvious at the earlier performance was more fully realized yesterday, namely, that these "Dances" do not represent "abstract music"—music created only with tonal design, without emotional intention. This is music highly charged with feeling and drama.

Secondly, as the development of the ideas by the composer becomes clearer its logic, mastery and imagination become the more inescapable. Those who consider that so-called "classic" composition means music primarily of design and secondarily of feeling, while music coming under the head of "romantic" is music of free and subjective impulse, would be inclined to class this late work of Hindemith in the "romantic" category. And it is music of intense emotion, free in form, so far as the classic symphonic model is concerned. At the same time, if by "classic" we mean clarity, proportion and logic of structure, we must accord the Hindemith score a very high percentage of these qualities.

As a matter of fact, classifications, especially in art, are likely to be deadly, preservative only of the letter and not the spirit of the law. Hindemith's music is deeply charged and powerfully wrought stuff, liable to emerge, as we become familiar with it, as one of his masterpieces. It has two contrasted moods, or effects, the one of tragedy; the other one of drama, and solemn pronunciation, and triumph. Thematically parts of the score are intricately related and contingent upon each other. But this is a side issue, a structural consideration, only important to the listener as it enables him the better to comprehend the gist of the musical discourse. The important thing is the sheer musical and expressive value of the work, its quality as it stands, outside of personal interpretations or definitions. In introducing this composition in New York, and repeating it, Dr. Koussevitzky has done another of his numberless services to art.

Work of First 'Cellist

Cont. at Top

Jean Bedetti, long known as the first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, and a great virtuoso to boot, played the 'cello part in the performance of Bloch's "Schelomo" in a very admirable manner. It was good to hear the score again, and again to be swept away by its energy, color and profound racial impulse. It is music inbued with the ceremony and mystery of the Temple, age-old lamentation and bitter wisdom, and the fury of the ancient prophets. It is truly Hebraic. The Song of Solomon and the Book of Job are both in it—implicit in the cantilena of the solo instrument, the outcries of fanatical denunciations, the thought, in the last monologue of the 'cello, of the vanity of man and his dreams, and the purple and gold of the orchestration. The performance was one of insight and virtuosity of soloist and orchestra. For our part, we would have wished certain pages to have a more elemental fury ,wailing intensity, impassioned rhetoric. Too many refinements can lose a part of the force that is in this grand and savage music.

The composer was present on this occasion as listener. Long and hearty applause called conductor and 'cellist repeatedly back to the platform, and it was attempted to induce Mr. Bloch to show himself on the stage. He bowed from a box, and applauded the performers. The reception of his music, which so moved the audience, must have been gratifying to him.

It is now unnecessary to describe the manner of this orchestra's playing of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Tableaux." They were worthily repeated from earlier concerts. We now maintain that Dr. Koussevitzky owes his New York audiences at least two other repetitions. One is of the delicious humor of Prokofieff's children tale of "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as Narrator. The other is of the Bruckenr Eighth Symphony.

[From Final Edition of Yesterda

OTHER MUSIC IN

Serge Koussevitzky Leads the B Bruckner's Eighth Symphony

A morning paper notice of last night's Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall must be largely an acknowledgment of gratitude to Serge Koussevitzky for a magnificent performance of the Bruckner Eighth symphony. Though organizations of zealots have dedicated themselves these many years to the dissemination of the Brucknerian gospel, it is still more talked about than attended. Dr. Koussevitzky's performance argued unanswerably against this state of affairs, and almost shamed the listener to decent appreciation of this great music. But, paradoxically, and as if to defeat its own purpose, it proved beyond a doubt that only the peers of such an orchestra and such a conductor can adequately expound that music.

Last night the Eighth lasted over an hour. If the Brahms and Beethoven symphonies are considered as tonal canvases, the Bruckner C minor demands comparison with the mural. It is a thing of vast proportions and deep perspectives. Its huge framework contains structures of rhythms and color, a variety of technical resources, an amplitude and intensity of musical expression that are so far beyond the scale of nineteenth century symphonic form as almost to seem unrelated to its precursor.

It is hardly necessary to mention the technical demands such a structure makes upon an orchestra and its conductor, nor is it necessary to say more than that those demands were met superlatively. These matters are, in this instance, subsidiary to others, foremost of which is the problem of proportion. Bruckner, son and grandson of village schoolmasters, was an unearthly visionary whose dreams and ecstasies sought outlet in music of grandiose sonorities and shattering climaxes.

The interpreter's task is to adjust those emotional torrents to the ears and minds of mere mortals, who are limited by reason and reality to credible degrees of ecstasy. He must do this by viewing the work from a high perspective, and by shaping its musical thought into a natural growth. It was thus that Dr. Koussevitzky led us, almost by the hand, to rarefied heights that revealed the symphony to its farthest horizons. For his accomplishment he was rewarded by the acclaim of a rapt and deeply moved audience.

It was music and music-making that almost dwarfed the succeeding performance of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" to mere virtuosity. G. G.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HALL

Dr. Koussevitzky and Players Costumed for the Period in Giving Haydn's 'Farewell'

COLIN O'MORE SINGS SOLO

N. Y. Times

Gruenberg's 'Daniel in Lions' Den' Is Scored for Tenor and Chamber Music

Feb. 9, 1938

By OLIN DOWNES

A "concert extraordinaire," and verily it was that, was given last night in Carnegie Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The stage was concealed by gray curtains when the audience gathered. The curtains parted to reveal a group of players assembled in the orchestral numbers of Mozart's day, clad in eighteenth century costumes, and Dr. Koussevitzky himself in the character of Haydn conducting the "Farewell" symphony.

It was a "spectacle extraordinaire," and in nothing more so than the manner in which the clothes made the men, i. e., the manner in which wigs, frills, frocked coats and knee-britches seemed to change every familiar feature of every player and transform them into perfectly plausible eighteenth century figures. The effect was enhanced by the candles which lighted each music desk, by the brilliant chandelier suspended from the ceiling and by two classic columns on each side of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky himself, Haydn redivivus, conducted part of the time on his feet, or sat at the harpsichord, directing the performance in the old style manner.

Haydn's Joke Perpetuated

The performance perpetuated Haydn's famous joke, or gesture, made for whatever purpose, when he composed this symphony and had it performed at the Esterhazy court. During the last movement, of which the music is cast in a gallant and sentimental vein of farewell, the players, one by one and two by two, rose silently, puffed out the candles which illuminated the music, and left the stage. Thus the famous symphony ends with two violins playing the last echoing strains. These, in turn, depart. The stage darkens. The conductor, slowly and with a dignity somewhat melancholy, himself bends over, blows out his candle, and the scene fades.

Some recalled the time when Leopold Stokowsky used this symphony as an object lesson to his patrons in Philadelphia, when he had the players not only leave early, but arrive, singly and in pairs, late, like some symphony audiences that Mr. Stokowsky could have mentioned. But the mood and suggestions last night were quite otherwise—not satirical, but really poetic.

Costumes Change to Jazz Era

The next time the curtains parted the scene and the costumes had changed. Members of the orchestra appeared attired as jazz players. A crude cartoon of a saint and two menacing lions was the background for Colin O'More's capital singing of Louis Gruenberg's "Daniel in the Lions' Den," scored for solo tenor and chamber orchestra. It is a most ingenious and spirited affair, partly satirical, humorous, in places wildly dramatic, with the extravagant orchestral community which suggests the roaring of the animals, the swishing of tails, perhaps, let us say the protruding eyes and the fantastic jargon of the Narrator, and his part speech and part songs, and outcries and ululations.

Like everything else done during the evening, it was a most brilliant and finished performance, when singers and instrumentalists were as one, under the baton of Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and the orchestral part a remarkable modern consummation of jazz idioms.

Perhaps the best fooling of the evening and one of the most amusing and inventive scores that a witty composer, Serge Prokofieff, has written, was "Peter and the Wolf," for Narrator who speaks and for small orchestra. This was first performed in Moscow in 1936 at a Children's Concert of the Moscow Philharmonic, and was given its first American performance last March 25 in Boston, the composer conducting, and was heard last night for the first time in New York. It is an animal story, wherein the different instruments represent the different animals and Peter and Grandfather. The bird, for purposes of aural identification, is a flute, the duck an oboe, the cat a clarinet, Grandfather the ridiculous bassoon, Peter, the string quartet, and the big bad wolf, three horns—yes, and drums and percussion for the shooting of the hunters.

Richard Hale Is Narrator

Very admirable was Mr. Richard Hale, the narrator, as he read the lines and the orchestra laughably underscored the story. This is real musical humor, in the jaunty motive of the dauntless Peter, the merry ditty of the creeping cat, the wolfish roar of the horns and the raucous bassoon which limps along and complains with grandfather's voice as he falls in with the triumphant procession which conveys the wolf to the menagerie.

Sometimes Prokofieff exhausts the satirical vein, but this has the savor of folk-music, and is very charming. To end this program, so entertaining in its every detail, perhaps only one thing would have been suitable. It consists of a group of waltzes, two by Johann Strauss; one the little masterpiece, "Valse triste," by Sibelius, and finally the brilliant and one had almost said cynical "La valse" by Ravel, a composition in the performance of which the Boston Symphony is pre-eminent.

This event would have served to demonstrate, if such proof were needed at this time, Dr. Koussevitzky's exceptional gifts as a program maker, as also to his sovereign talent for stage spectacle. Broadway, for this, would willingly bestow upon him its proudest title, that of expert "show-man." It was an evening wholly out of the rut of orchestral routine, one devoted to distinguished entertainment that never flagged or palled, that was invariably in perfect taste, and a triumphant demonstration of what a man of genius can do when he chooses to devote himself purely to entertainment.

N. Y. Herald Tribune

MUSIC

Feb. 9/38

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Dress Up

"Concert Extraordinaire," in aid of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; assisted by Colin O'Moore, tenor; Richard Hale, narrator. At Carnegie Hall:

PROGRAM

1. Haydn...."Farewell" Symphony, No. 45
2. Gruenberg..........."The Daniel Jazz"
(Poem of Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'Moore)
Richard Burgin, Conducting
3. Prokofieff........."Peter and the Wolf"
An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67
(Narrator: Richard Hale)
(First performance in New York)

Intermission

The Waltz

Strauss, Johann..."Wiener Blut," Waltzes
"Fruhlingstimmen," Waltzes
Sibelius ....Valse Triste
Ravel...."La Valse," Choreographic Poem

Serge Koussevitzky

259

Costumed as Haydn at the Boston Symphony concert

THE opportunity to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky in costume, putting on a show that included stage sets, jazz, an Old Testament tale in Negro dialect, a singer, a musical fairy tale, a narrator, and a series of waltzes from Lanner and Johann Strauss to Sibelius and Ravel—all this drew a large and obviously delighted audience to Carnegie Hall last night. The fact that this "concert extraordinaire" (as the program described it) was for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, added, of course, to every one's happiness.

* * *

The surprises and excitements began at once. The ticket taker at the main entrance and the usher who guided you down the aisles were youths out of the eighteenth century, garbed in brocaded satin, knee breeches, silk stockings, lace ruffs and wigs—except on the center aisles, which were especially favored by the presence of engaging young women, who also had stepped out of the eighteenth century.

The stage was curtained until the lights were dimmed at 8:45, when they opened to disclose a large portion of Mr. Koussevitzky's famous orchestra, also adorned in eighteenth century costumes, designed by Robert Edmond Jones, and seated in a charming music room lighted by a vast chandelier of candles and by tapers fixed to the desks of the musicians.

* * *

This simple and ingenious setting (devised by Mr. Jock Munro), might almost have been a drawing-room in the castle at Esterhaz during the time that Haydn dwelt there as music-master to Prince Nicolas. And when Mr. Koussevitzky, representing Papa Haydn, and very elegant, indeed, in his black satin coat and breeches and his lace and his wig, stood or sat before the spinet (borrowed from the Casadesus Collection) you might have thought that he was about to conduct the Esterhazy orchestra in the "Farewell" Symphony—which, in fact, he proceeded to do with a delicate precision and vivacity and flexibility of line that Papa Haydn, looking down from the heaven of good symphonists, must surely have applauded. Perhaps he sighed a little, too, as he remembered the salary of seven hundred and eight-two florins a year paid him by the prince, and wondered if Mr. Koussevitzky got as much in Boston.

* * *

Listening last night, one caught oneself wishing that Haydn—the lighter-toned Haydn, at least, if not the deep-throated Haydn of the greater symphonies—might always be played in eighteenth century costume, by candle light, with the glinting lights and sheen of silk reflected in the inimitable grace and riant loveliness and delicate pathos of the score.

* * *

It was for such a setting that the "Farewell" Symphony was contrived. There are many and conflicting accounts of its origin and the significance of its finale; but the tale told by Pohl is as likely as any.

Apparently Haydn composed the "Farewell" Symphony as a gentle hint to his royal employer. The year was 1772 or 1773. The members of the court orchestra had been detained at Esterhaz that year rather later than usual, far from Vienna and their families. They were bored and restless, and the splendor and loneliness of the place had worn upon their spirits.

* * *

Haydn determined to do something about it. He was devoted to his men, the younger of whom were his pupils as well as his subordinates. He composed a new symphony in an unusual key, F sharp minor. It was announced as the last item in a concert at which the Prince was present. The music's secret meaning was not disclosed at once—even the plaintive character of the slow movement, with its muted violins, did not betray its significance. The finale began innocently enough, as a jocund Presto starting off with a theme suggesting a bourrée. But at the 152nd bar, all the instruments came to a sudden stop, in the middle of a forte passage on the dominant.

* * *

The Prince and the rest of the listeners must have started forward in surprise, for a return to the principal key was indicated and expected. Instead, there was a long pause. Then an extraordinary thing occured. The tempo changed to Adigio; a reminiscence of the slow movement appeared, together with a new theme; and a few moments later the first oboe and the second horn blew out the candles on their music stands and tiptoed from the room (last evening it was some of the string players who departed first). The bassoon entered the breach, taking up the first theme of the movement; but after playing a few measures, he, too, blew out his candle and departed. He was followed in turn by the remaining wind players, the second oboe and the first horn.

Now only the strings were left. But they, also, melted away: the double-bass at the beautiful change of key to F sharp major; the 'cello, two of the violins. At last only the first violin (Tomasini, the Prince's favorite) and a second fiddle, playing sadly with mutes on their instruments, remained for a moment at their posts in the dim room. Then they, too, rose, blew out their candles and tiptoed out, leaving Papa Haydn alone in the dark and silent room.

* * *

At Esterhaz, 176 years ago, Haydn prepared to leave the room, wondering, a bit uneasily, how the jest had been received, and whether the point was seen. But the Prince sent for him, and set his mind at rest: he had seen the point, and the musicians might leave on holiday as soon as the sun had risen.

Last evening they were not allowed to go—at least not until the curtain had parted more than once at the demand of the enchanted audience, who seemed unwilling to part with Papa Sergei and his eighteenth-century orchestra so long as they were willing to be seen and heard.

* * *

When the show was resumed, we had left the eighteenth century far behind us. The Esterhazy orchestra had vanished into the past whence it had been evoked; the players had changed from ruffs and breeches to mess jackets and black trousers. They had become a jazz ensemble, prepared to play the music of Mr. Gruenberg's celebrated "Daniel Jazz," set to the gorgeous poem of Vachel Lindsay. The players were propelled to the front of the stage on a movable platform backed by a painted screen on which one beheld the lions' blood-red den with Daniel in it, and King Darius shouting to the lions, "Bite Daniel! Bite him! Bite him!"

* * *

Mr. Colin O'Moore recited the poem with gusto, and Mr. Gruenberg's witty music took us far from Esterhaz and the eighteenth century. But the audience rejoiced in Daniel; as they rejoiced, a while later, in Prokofieff's captivating orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," in which the bird of the story is represented by a flute, the duck by an oboe, the cat by "a clarinet in a low register," Peter by the string quartet, the wolf by dissonant and sinister horns. Mr. Richard Hale, as the narrator, recited the poem with blood-curdling dramatic emphasis, and Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra—now in the garb of twentieth-century Boston—supplied Prokofieff's orchestral commentary on the tale.

When we left, we could hear (as Mr. Hale assured us horribly) the duck quacking in the wolf's tummy, because the wolf, in his hurry, had swallowed her alive.

We, too, were in a hurry, for the program was very long, and we could not wait for Lanner and Johann Strauss and Ravel. But you may be sure that this was our loss.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

N. Y. Times
Feb. 12/39

VARIED BILL GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra Under His Direction Plays A Major Symphony by Mozart

'SCHELOMO' ON PPROGRAM

Bedetti Is 'Cello Soloist in Bloch Work—Hindemith's 'Dances' Repeated

By OLIN DOWNES

The deeds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its buildemr and leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, grow with doing, if not with the elling. To the sensational effect, now historic, which this conductor and orchestra achieved when they played the Eighth Bruckner Symphony last Friday night, is to be added the record of the performances yesterday of an adorable symphony of Mozart; the repetition from an earlier New York program of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances; the performance of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," with Bedetti as soloist, in the presence of the composer, and, one of the most famous of the chef d'oeuvres of this orchestra, the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

It would be hard to find a program which offered more of contrast and which required more versatility of understanding and of style. The Mozart symphony was thhe one in A major, numbered in Koeckel catalogue 201, and it was played with ineffable simplicity, finish and feeling. It is not one of the grand Mozart symphonies, nor the most elaborate in workmanship, but it is perfect in its genre, in the flow of the ideas, in the inspired instrumentation. It need hardly be pointed out, how great a test of the highest attributes of orchestral playing is constituted by such a symphony. This Stradivarius of an orchestral met every test triumphantly.

Introduced Earlier in Season

Dr. Koussevitzky's repetition of the Hindemith "Symphonic Dances," which he had introduced here earlier in the season, was a fine deed for a piece of very significant modern music. For the "Symphonic Dances," received with reservations by a portion of the public and press commentators, this writer among them, on the occasion of their first hearing, were received yesterday afternoon with unreserved and emphatic approval. The present reviewer was constrained materially to modify his earlier opinion. True, the same thing that was obvious at the earlier performance was more fully realized yesterday, namely, that these "Dances" do not represent "abstract music"—music created only with tonal design, without emotional intention. This is music highly charged with feeling and drama.

Secondly, as the development of the ideas by the composer becomes clearer its logic, mastery and imagination become the more inescapable. Those who consider that socalled "classic" composition means music primarily of design and secondarily of feeling, while music coming under the head of "romantic" is music of free and subjective impulse, would be inclined to class this late work of Hindemith in the "romantic" category. And it is music of intense emotion, free in form, so far as the classic symphonic model is concerned. At the same time, if by "classic" we mean clarity, proportion and logic of structure, we must accord the Hindemith score a very high percentage of these qualities.

As a matter of fact, classifications, especially in art, are likely to be deadly, preservative only of the letter and not the spirit of the law. Hindemith's music is deeply charged and powerfully wrought stuff, liable to emerge, as we become familiar with it, as one of his masterpieces. It has two contrasted moods, or effects, the one of tragedy; the other one of drama, and solemn pronunciation, and triumph. Thematically parts of the score are intricately related and contingent upon each other. But this is a side issue, a structural consideration, only important to the listener as it enables him the better to comprehend the gist of the musical discourse. The important thing is the sheer musical and expressive value of the work, its quality as it stands, outside of personal interpretations or definitions. In introducing this composition in New York, and repeating it, Dr. Koussevitzky has done another of his numberless services to art.

Work of First 'Cellist

Cont. at top

Jean Bedetti, long known as the first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, and a great virtuoso to boot, played the 'cello part in the performance of Bloch's "Schelomo" in a very admirable manner. It was good to hear the score again, and again to be swept away by its energy, color and profound racial impulse. It is music inbued with the ceremony and mystery of the Temple, age-old lamentation and bitter wisdom, and the fury of the ancient prophets. It is truly Hebraic. The Song of Solomon and the Book of Job are both in it—implicit in the cantilena of the solo instrument, the outcries of fanatical denunciations, the thought, in the last monologue of the 'cello, of the vanity of man and his dreams, and the purple and gold of the orchestration. The performance was one of insight and virtuosity of soloist and orchestra. For our part, we would have wished certain pages to have a more elemental fury ,wailing intensity, impassioned rhetoric. Too many refinements can lose a part of the force that is in this grand and savage music.

The composer was present on this occasion as listener. Long and hearty applause called conductor and 'cellist repeatedly back to the platform, and it was attempted to induce Mr. Bloch to show himself on the stage. He bowed from a box, and applauded the performers. The reception of his music, which so moved the audience, must have been gratifying to him.

It is now unnecessary to describe the manner of this orchestra's playing of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Tableaux." They were worthily repeated from earlier concerts. We now maintain that Dr. Koussevitzky owes his New York audiences at least two other repetitions. One is of the delicious humor of Prokofieff's children tale of "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as Narrator. The other is of the Bruckenr Eighth Symphony.

(From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times)

OTHER MUSIC IN R

Serge Koussevitzky Leads the Boston Bruckner's Eighth Symphony at C

A morning paper notice of last night's Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall must be largely an acknowledgment of gratitude to Serge Koussevitzky for a magnificent performance of the Bruckner Eighth symphony. Though organizations of zealots have dedicated themselves these many years to the dissemination of the Brucknerian gospel, it is still more talked about than attended. Dr. Koussevitzky's performance argued unanswerably against this state of affairs, and almost shamed the listener to decent appreciation of this great music. But, paradoxically, and as if to defeat its own purpose, it proved beyond a doubt that only the peers of such an orchestra and such a conductor can adequately expound that music.

Last night the Eighth lasted over an hour. If the Brahms and Beethoven symphonies are considered as tonal canvases, the Bruckner C minor demands comparison with the mural. It is a thing of vast proportions and deep perspectives. Its huge framework contains structures of rhythms and color, a variety of technical resources, an amplitude and intensity of musical expression that are so far beyond the scale of nineteenth century symphonic form as almost to seem unrelated to its precursor.

It is hardly necessary to mention the technical demands such a structure makes upon an orchestra and its conductor, nor is it necessary to say more than that those demands were met superlatively. These matters are, in this instance, subsidiary to others, foremost of which is the problem of proportion. Bruckner, son and grandson of village schoolmasters, was an unearthly visionary whose dreams and ecstasies sought outlet in music of grandiose sonorities and shattering climaxes.

The interpreter's task is to adjust those emotional torrents to the ears and minds of mere mortals, who are limited by reason and reality to credible degrees of ecstasy. He must do this by viewing the work from a high perspective, and by shaping its musical thought into a natural growth. It was thus that Dr. Koussevitzky led us, almost by the hand, to rarefied heights that revealed the symphony to its farthest horizons. For his accomplishment he was rewarded by the acclaim of a rapt and deeply moved audience.

It was music and music-making that almost dwarfed the succeeding performance of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" to mere virtuosity. G. G.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HALL

Dr. Koussevitzky and Players Costumed for the Period in Giving Haydn's 'Farewell'

COLIN O'MORE SINGS SOLO

N. Y. Times

Gruenberg's 'Daniel in Lions' Den' Is Scored for Tenor and Chamber Music

Feb. 9, 1938

By OLIN DOWNES

A "concert extraordinaire," and verily it was that, was given last night in Carnegie Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The stage was concealed by gray curtains when the audience gathered. The curtains parted to reveal a group of players assembled in the orchestral numbers of Mozart's day, clad in eighteenth century costumes, and Dr. Koussevitzky himself in the character of Haydn conducting the "Farewell" symphony.

It was a "spectacle extraordinaire," and in nothing more so than the manner in which the clothes made the men, i. e., the manner in which wigs, frills, frocked coats and knee-britches seemed to change every familiar feature of every player and transform them into perfectly plausible eighteenth century figures. The effect was en[illegible]ced by the candles which lighted [illegible]sic desk, by the brilliant [illegible]spended from the ceil[illegible] two classic columns on [illegible] of the orchestra. Dr. [illegible]ky himself, Haydn reconducted part of the time [illegible]at at the harpsi[illegible]e performance in [illegible]ner.

[illegible]ke Perpetuated

[illegible]mance perpetuated [illegible]ous joke, or gesture, [illegible]hatever purpose, when [illegible]ed this symphony and [illegible]rformed at the Esterhazy [illegible]uring the last movement, [illegible]n the music is cast in a [illegible] and sentimental vein of [illegible]ell, the players, one by one [illegible] two by two, rose silently, [illegible]ffed out the candles which illuminated the music, and left the stage. Thus the famous symphony ends with two violins playing the last echoing strains. These, in turn, depart. The stage darkens. The conductor, slowly and with a dignity somewhat melancholy, himself bends over, blows out his candle, and the scene fades.

Some recalled the time when Leopold Stokowsky used this symphony as an object lesson to his patrons in Philadelphia, when he had the players not only leave early, but arrive, singly and in pairs, late, like some symphony audiences that Mr. Stokowsky could have mentioned. But the mood and suggestions last night were quite otherwise—not satirical, but really poetic.

Costumes Change to Jazz Era

The next time the curtains parted the scene and the costumes had changed. Members of the orchestra appeared attired as jazz players. A crude cartoon of a saint and two menacing lions was the background for Colin O'More's capital singing of Louis Gruenberg's "Daniel in the Lions' Den," scored for solo tenor and chamber orchestra. It is a most ingenious and spirited affair, partly satirical, humorous, in places wildly dramatic, with the extravagant orchestral community which suggests the roaring of the animals, the swishing of tails, perhaps, let us say the protruding eyes and the fantastic jargon of the Narrator, and his part speech and part songs, and outcries and ululations.

Like everything else done during the evening, it was a most brilliant and finished performance, when singers and instrumentalists were as one, under the baton of Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and the orchestral part a remarkable modern consummation of jazz idioms.

Perhaps the best fooling of the evening and one of the most amusing and inventive scores that a witty composer, Serge Prokofieff, has written, was "Peter and the Wolf," for Narrator who speaks and for small orchestra. This was first performed in Moscow in 1936 at a Children's Concert of the Moscow Philharmonic, and was given its first American performance last March 25 in Boston, the composer conducting, and was heard last night for the first time in New York. It is an animal story, wherein the different instruments represent the different animals and Peter and Grandfather. The bird, for purposes of aural identification, is a flute, the duck an oboe, the cat a clarinet, Grandfather the ridiculous bassoon, Peter, the string quartet, and the big bad wolf, three horns—yes, and drums and percussion for the shooting of the hunters.

Richard Hale Is Narrator

Very admirable was Mr. Richard Hale, the narrator, as he read the lines and the orchestra laughably underscored the story. This is real musical humor, in the jaunty motive of the dauntless Peter, the merry ditty of the creeping cat, the wolfish roar of the horns and the raucous bassoon which limps along and complains with grandfather's voice as he falls in with the triumphant procession which conveys the wolf to the menagerie.

Sometimes Prokofieff exhausts the satirical vein, but this has the savor of folk-music, and is very charming. To end this program, so entertaining in its every detail, perhaps only one thing would have been suitable. It consists of a group of waltzes, two by Johann Strauss; one the little masterpiece, "Valse triste," by Sibelius, and finally the brilliant and one had almost said cynical "La valse" by Ravel, a composition in the performance of which the Boston Symphony is pre-eminent.

This event would have served to demonstrate, if such proof were needed at this time, Dr. Koussevitzky's exceptional gifts as a program maker, as also to his sovereign talent for stage spectacle. Broadway, for this, would willingly bestow upon him its proudest title, that of expert "show-man." It was an evening wholly out of the rut of orchestral routine, one devoted to distinguished entertainment that never flagged or palled, that was invariably in perfect taste, and a triumphant demonstration of what a man of genius can do when he chooses to devote himself purely to entertainment.

N. Y. Herald Tribune

MUSIC

Feb. 9/38

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Serge Koussevitzky

Costumed as Haydn at the Boston Symphony concert

E9

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Dress Up

"Concert Extraordinaire," in aid of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; assisted by Colin O'Moore, tenor; Richard Hale, narrator. At Carnegie Hall:

PROGRAM

1. Haydn...."Farewell" Symphony, No. 45
2. Gruenberg............"The Daniel Jazz"
(Poem of Vachel Lindsay)
(Tenor: Colin O'Moore)
Richard Burgin, Conducting
3. Prokofieff.........."Peter and the Wolf"
An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67
(Narrator: Richard Hale)
(First performance in New York)

Intermission

The Waltz

Strauss, Johann..."Wiener Blut," Waltzes
"Fruhlingstimmen," Waltzes
Sibelius ....Valse Triste
Ravel...."La Valse," Choreographic Poem

THE opportunity to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky in costume, putting on a show that included stage sets, jazz, an Old Testament tale in Negro dialect, a singer, a musical fairy tale, a narrator, and a series of waltzes from Lanner and Johann Strauss to Sibelius and Ravel—all this drew a large and obviously delighted audience to Carnegie Hall last night. The fact that this "concert extraordinaire" (as the program described it) was for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, added, of course, to every one's happiness.

* * *

The surprises and excitements began at once. The ticket taker at the main entrance and the usher who guided you down the aisles were youths out of the eighteenth century, garbed in brocaded satin, knee breeches, silk stockings, lace ruffs and wigs—except on the center aisles, which were especially favored by the presence of engaging young women, who also had stepped out of the eighteenth century.

The stage was curtained until the lights were dimmed at 8:45, when they opened to disclose a large portion of Mr. Koussevitzky's famous orchestra, also adorned in eighteenth century costumes, designed by Robert Edmond Jones, and seated in a charming music room lighted by a vast chandelier of candles and by tapers fixed to the desks of the musicians.

* * *

This simple and ingenious setting (devised by Mr. Jock Munro), might almost have been a drawing-room in the castle at Esterhaz during the time that Haydn dwelt there as music-master to Prince Nicolas. And when Mr. Koussevitzky, representing Papa Haydn, and very elegant, indeed, in his black satin coat and breeches and his lace and his wig, stood or sat before the spinet (borrowed from the Casadesus Collection) you might have thought that he was about to conduct the Esterhazy orchestra in the "Farewell" Symphony—which, in fact, he proceeded to do with a delicate precision and vivacity and flexibility of line that Papa Haydn, looking down from the heaven of good symphonists, must surely have applauded. Perhaps he sighed a little, too, as he remembered the salary of seven hundred and eight-two florins a year paid him by the prince, and wondered if Mr. Koussevitzky got as much in Boston.

* * *

Listening last night, one caught oneself wishing that Haydn—the lighter-toned Haydn, at least, if not the deep-throated Haydn of the greater symphonies—might always be played in eighteenth century costume, by candle light, with the glinting lights and sheen of silk reflected in the inimitable grace and riant loveliness and delicate pathos of the score.

* * *

It was for such a setting that the "Farewell" Symphony was contrived. There are many and conflicting accounts of its origin and the significance of its finale; but the tale told by Pohl is as likely as any.

Apparently Haydn composed the "Farewell" Symphony as a gentle hint to his royal employer. The year was 1772 or 1773. The members of the court orchestra had been detained at Esterhaz that year rather later than usual, far from Vienna and their families. They were bored and restless, and the splendor and loneliness of the place had worn upon their spirits.

* * *

Haydn determined to do something about it. He was devoted to his men, the younger of whom were his pupils as well as his subordinates. He composed a new symphony in an unusual key, F sharp minor. It was announced as the last item in a concert at which the Prince was present. The music's secret meaning was not disclosed at once—even the plaintive character of the slow movement, with its muted violins, did not betray its significance. The finale began innocently enough, as a jocund Presto starting off with a theme suggesting a bourrée. But at the 152nd bar, all the instruments came to a sudden stop, in the middle of a forte passage on the dominant.

* * *

The Prince and the rest of the listeners must have started forward in surprise, for a return to the principal key was indicated and expected. Instead, there was a long pause. Then an extraordinary thing occured. The tempo changed to Adagio; a reminiscence of the slow movement appeared, together with a new theme; and a few moments later the first oboe and the second horn blew out the candles on their music stands and tiptoed from the room (last evening it was some of the string players who departed first). The bassoon entered the breach, taking up the first theme of the movement; but after playing a few measures, he, too, blew out his candle and departed. He was followed in turn by the remaining wind players, the second oboe and the first horn.

Now only the strings were left. But they, also, melted away: the double-bass at the beautiful change of key to F sharp major; the 'cello, two of the violins. At last only the first violin (Tomasini, the Prince's favorite) and a second fiddle, playing sadly with mutes on their instruments, remained for a moment at their posts in the dim room. Then they, too, rose, blew out their candles and tiptoed out, leaving Papa Haydn alone in the dark and silent room.

* * *

At Esterhaz, 176 years ago, Haydn prepared to leave the room, wondering, a bit uneasily, how the jest had been received, and whether the point was seen. But the Prince sent for him, and set his mind at rest: he had seen the point, and the musicians might leave on holiday as soon as the sun had risen.

Last evening they were not allowed to go—at least not until the curtain had parted more than once at the demand of the enchanted audience, who seemed unwilling to part with Papa Sergei and his eighteenth-century orchestra so long as they were willing to be seen and heard.

* * *

When the show was resumed, we had left the eighteenth century far behind us. The Esterhazy orchestra had vanished into the past whence it had been evoked; the players had changed from ruffs and breeches to mess jackets and black trousers. They had become a jazz ensemble, prepared to play the music of Mr. Gruenberg's celebrated "Daniel Jazz," set to the gorgeous poem of Vachel Lindsay. The players were propelled to the front of the stage on a movable platform backed by a painted screen on which one beheld the lions' blood-red den with Daniel in it, and King Darius shouting to the lions, "Bite Daniel! Bite him! Bite him!"

* * *

Mr. Colin O'Moore recited the poem with gusto, and Mr. Gruenberg's witty music took us far from Esterhaz and the eighteenth century. But the audience rejoiced in Daniel; as they rejoiced, a while later, in Prokofieff's captivating orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," in which the bird of the story is represented by a flute, the duck by an oboe, the cat by "a clarinet in a low register," Peter by the string quartet, the wolf by dissonant and sinister horns. Mr. Richard Hale, as the narrator, recited the poem with blood-curdling dramatic emphasis, and Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra—now in the garb of twentieth-century Boston—supplied Prokofieff's orchestral commentary on the tale.

* * *

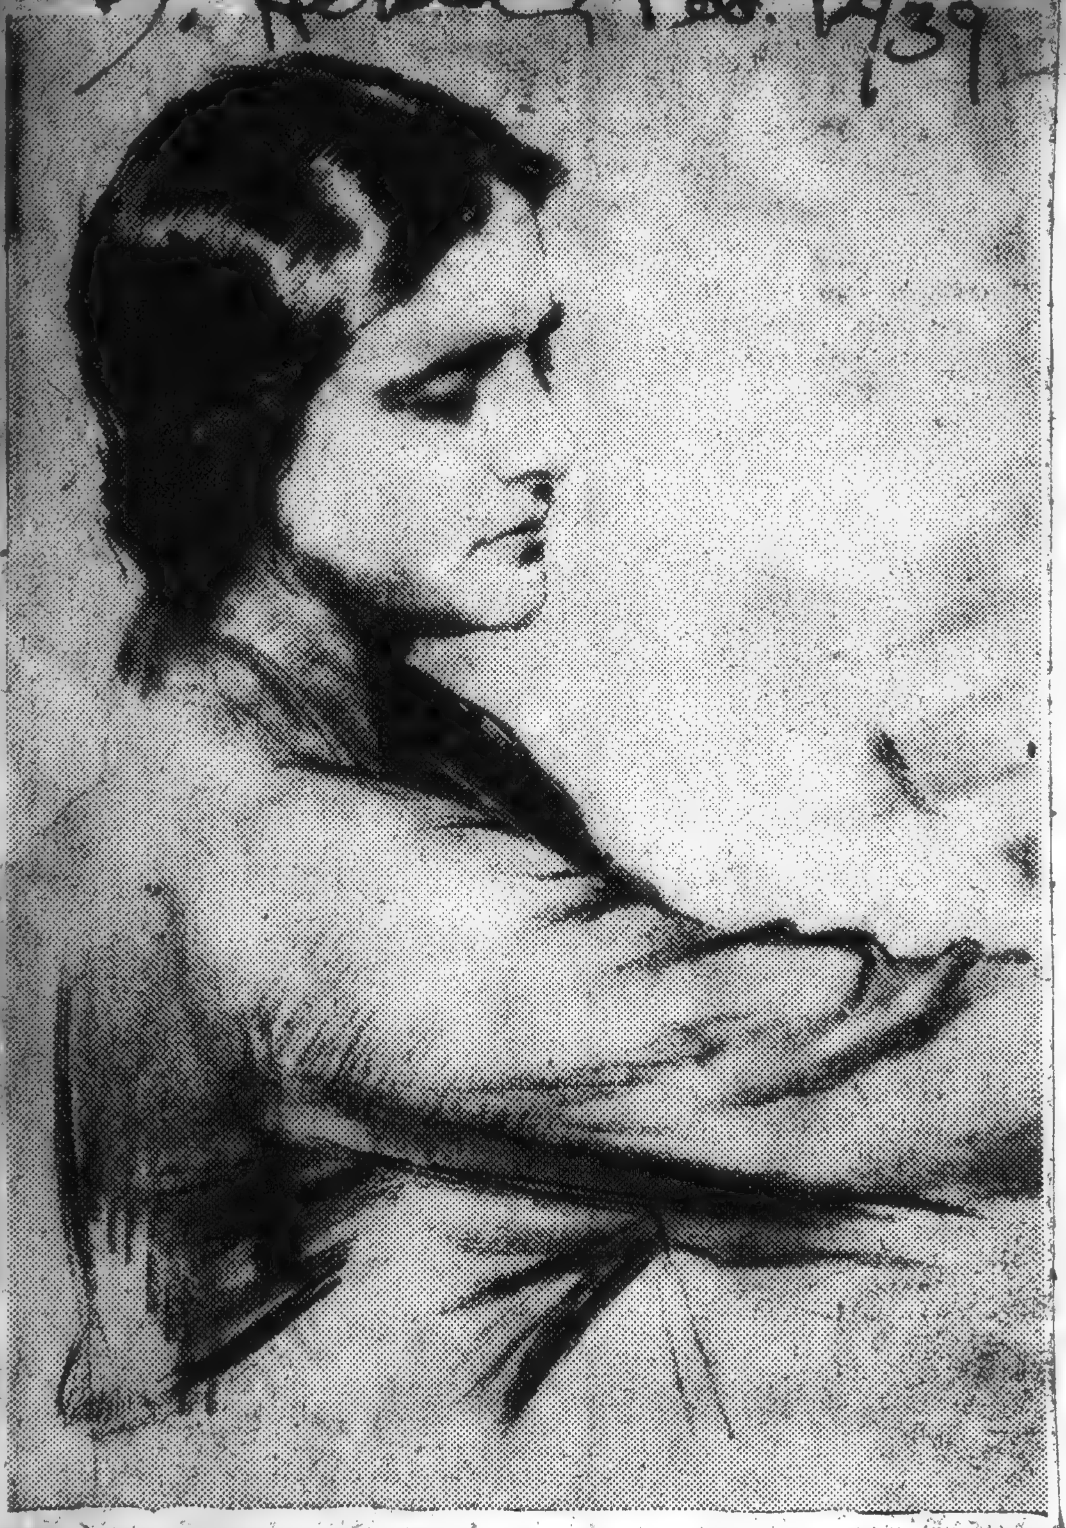
When we left, we could hear (as Mr. Hale assured us horribly) the duck quacking in the wolf's tummy, because the wolf, in his hurry, had swallowed her alive.

We, too, were in a hurry, for the program was very long, and we could not wait for Lanner and Johann Strauss and Ravel. But you may be sure that this was our loss.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Hess with Symphony

B. Herald Feb. 12/39



Myra Hess, distinguished English pianist, who will be the guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week and at the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts next week. On Friday and Saturday she will play in Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor, and on Monday and Tuesday in Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

B. American

Myra Hess In Prospect

By RUTH MARSTERS

Music Editor

Feb. 12/39

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's periodic concertizings in cities other than Boston usually wear the aspect of triumphal tours.

Something of a crisis ensued last week when Dr. Koussevitzky fell ill, was unable to appear at a concert in New Jersey. The state of emergency proved as short-lived as it was unexpected, however.

Richard Burgin tided over the immediate situation by conducting within a few hours' notice. Dr. Koussevitzky recovered to conduct concerts in Carnegie Hall and greater New York during the latter part of the week.

* * *

WHEN Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra resume their activities in Symphony Hall next weekend, Myra Hess will appear as guest soloist in the performance of Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto in C minor. The program will also include the Third Symphony of Sibelius in C major, the Second Symphony of William Schumann, young American composer new to Boston audiences thus far.

There will be a Sanders Theater concert on Thursday evening at which Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto in D minor (edited by Siloti), Prokofieff's Orchestral Fairy Tale, "Peter and the Wolf," and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" will be performed.

Miss Hess will again appear with the orchestra in the program of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, February 20 and 21, playing Schumann's Concerto in A minor. Also to be heard at these concerts: Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," Ravel's "La Valse," Mozart's Symphony in A major K. No. 201.

PRESS

[illegible] N. J.

JAN 27 1939

Boston Symphony At Rutgers Feb. 7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will play three well known works by master composers at its concert in the Rutgers University gymnasium, at New Brunswick, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 7th, at 8:30 o'clock, in the third presentation of the University Concert Series, according to the program announced this week.

The program will open with Haydn's Symphony in B-Flat, No. 102, one of the "Salomon" symphonies from the pen of the 18th century master. Haydn composed the symphony during his tenure as concert conductor in London in 1790. He wrote 12 symphonies in all during his stay there. The dozen compositions were named after the concert manager who arranged the series.

The ever-popular "La Mer" of Claude Debussy will be played as the second number of the program. The interpretation of this rhythm of the sea by Dr. Koussevitzky was hailed at a concert in Carnegie Hall last year as one of the greatest contributions to music in the last fifty years.

The selection is divided into three parts. They are "De l'aube a midi sur la mer," "jeux de vagues," and "dialogue du vent et de la mer." It is considered probably the greatest work of the popular French composer.

After intermission the orchestra will continue with Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Opus 98. The symphony was the last written by the German composer and is considered a masterpiece.

The concert will mark the fifth appearance of the orchestra in New Brunswick. For the past four years the group has been the outstanding feature of the annual university series.

Tickets for the concert have been sold rapidly, but there are still unreserved seats available.

IT'S NOT SO ELUSIVE AS IT SEEMS

B. Post Feb. 12/39

Beethoven's Fourth Not Unknown in Hub, Anyhow

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

WEIRD are the uses of publicity. In a recent announcement of an impending radio broadcast that familiar vehicle for pianistic virtuosity, Beethoven's Fourth, G major, Concerto is described, believe it or not, as "probably the most mysteriously elusive composition in the history of great music." After being told, with some accuracy, that Mendelssohn gave the concerto a new lease of life in 1836, 29 years after its Vienna premiere, we are then assured that "after a decade or so of immense popularity, the concerto once more disappeared from concert programmes . . . until 1938 in the United States when the celebrated Beethoven interpreter, Arthur Schnabel, playing the work here on tour, brought it back into vogue." After that, if you please, it virtually disappeared again; and its revival in the broadcast aforementioned is, therefore, something of an event.

As a matter of fact, between 1881 and 1930, to quote from the tabulation in M. A. DeWolfe Howe's "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," the concerto was performed at 17 pairs of concerts by that organization. Nor has it gone unheard in Symphony Hall since. Not a bad record for an "elusive" piece.

More fitly called a rarity is Beethoven's C minor Concerto, No. 3, which Myra Hess will play at the Symphony concerts of this week. Mr. Howe's book lists four performances only between 1888 and 1921 and, if memory serves, there has only been one performance at Symphony Hall since, at the hands of Mr. Schnabel. The only Beethoven Concerto in which Miss Hess has thus far been heard here is the "elusive" Fourth. On the following Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Miss Hess will play with the orchestra again, this time the Concerto of Schumann, of which she is a most persuasive exponent.

According to unofficial advices from the Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky would have liked to have the Schumann Concerto on Friday and Saturday also. But he had planned, and is planning, to feature at the same concerts the music of another Schuman, the American, William, whose Second Symphony, in one movement, will be played for the first time hereabouts. Apparently the conductor felt that Schuman and Schumann on the same programme would be altogether to confusing. This William, the bearer of a distinguished name (minus one "n"), was born in New York city in 1910 and has studied both in this country and in what used to be Austria. His Second Symphony won a prize in a national contest and has been performed in New York, both in public and a broadcast.

The Third Symphony of Sibelius, somewhat neglected here of late, makes the rest of this particular programme; and the list for Monday and Tuesday includes, besides the Schumann Concerto, Mozart's youthful Symphony in A major, which Dr. Koussevitzky brought to light a few seasons ago; Ravel's "La Valse" and Prokofieff's Musical Fairy Tale, "Peter and the Wolf," given at the recent Pension Fund "Concert Extraordinaire," with Richard Hale again as narrator. By the way, this "concert extraordinaire" was repeated in New York last Wednesday evening and with great success.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1939

WITH A HEIGH-DI HAYDN, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestr
Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the Composer Haydn manner ratory to [illegible]ert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky will impersonate to whom he is said to bear a resemblance—and orchestra members will appear in 18th centur

---

BRUNSWICK, GA.
NEWS

FEB 8 - 1939

WINTER HAVEN, FLA.
DAILY CHIEF

FEB 3 - 1939

SHELBY, N. C.
STAR

FEB 8 - 1939

ATHOL, MASS.
NEWS

FEB 6 - 1939

LANCASTER, PA.
Intelligencer Journal

FEB 9 - 1939

BEATRICE, NEB.
SUN

JAN 30 1939

JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN - PATRIOT

FEB 11 1939

HANNIBAL, MO.
COURIER-POST

FEB 1 - 1939

LEAD, S. D.
CALL

FEB 13 1939

ALEXANDRIA, LA.
TOWN - TALK

FEB 13 1939

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.
SUN

FEB 1 - 1939

TRINIDAD, COLO.
CHRONICLE NEWS

FEB 6 - 1939

BIG SPRING, TEX.
HERALD

FEB 3 - 1939

SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD

FEB 2 - 1939

DURANGO, COLO.
HERALD - DEMOCRAT

FEB 1 - 1939

PALO ALTO, CAL.
TIMES

FEB 3 - 1939

NOGALES, ARIZ.
HERALD

FEB 4 - 1939

ALHAMBRA, CAL.
POST - ADVOCATE

FEB 4 - 1939

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR

FEB 5 - 1939

GREAT FALLS, MONT.
TRIBUNE

FEB 6 - 1939

PINE BLUFF, ARK.
COMMERCIAL

JAN 30 1939

Forum + Century
Concord N. H.

JAN - - 1939

AND here is a set in the "hats off" class. Given Sibelius' Fifth, plus Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Victor's engineers all in a rare mood, you get one of the finest orchestral recordings made to date. Go out and hear it is all I can say. For good measure a tone poem is thrown in. I'll take the Symphony.

Forum
Concord - N. H.

FEB - - 1939

I CANNOT see any reason for duplicating the fine Koussevitzky recording of the Moussorgsky Pictures orchestrated by Ravel. The orchestration here is by Lucien Caillet, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and cannot compare with Ravel's. Ravel made the ideal orchestration, and Caillet's, for all its splendor, just has to be second best. It is unfortunate, for he is able. However, his version profits from an extremely brilliant performance and up-to-date recording technique.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

B. Herald Feb. 12

Myra Hess, distinguished English pianist, who will be the guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week and at the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts next week. On Friday and Saturday she will play in Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor, and on Monday and Tuesday in Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

B. American

Myra Hess In Prospect

By RUTH MARSTERS
Music Editor

1-2[illegible] 12/39

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's periodic concertizings in cities other than Boston usually wear the aspect of triumphal tours.

Something of a crisis ensued last week when Dr. Koussevitzky fell ill, was unable to appear at a concert in New Jersey. The state of emergency proved as short-lived as it was unexpected, however.

Richard Burgin tided over the immediate situation by conducting within a few hours' notice. Dr. Koussevitzky recovered to conduct concerts in Carnegie Hall and greater New York during the latter part of the week.

* * *

WHEN Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra resume their activities in Symphony Hall next weekend, Myra Hess will appear as guest soloist in the performance of Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto in C minor. The program will also include the Third Symphony of Sibelius in C major, the Second Symphony of William Schumann, young American composer new to Boston audiences thus far.

There will be a Sanders Theater concert on Thursday evening at which Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto in D minor (edited by Siloti); Prokofieff's Orchestral Fairy Tale, "Peter and the Wolf," and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" will be performed.

Miss Hess will again appear with the orchestra in the program of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, February 20 and 21, playing Schumann's Concerto in A minor. Also to be heard at these concerts: Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," Ravel's "La Valse," Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. No. 201.

PRESS
Cranbury - N.J.
JAN 27 1939

Boston Symphony At Rutgers Feb. 7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will play three well known works by master composers at its concert in the Rutgers University gymnasium, at New Brunswick, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 7th, at 8:30 o'clock, in the third presentation of the University Concert Series, according to the program announced this week.

The program will open with Haydn's Symphony in B-Flat, No. 102, one of the "Salomon" symphonies from the pen of the 18th century master. Haydn composed the symphony during his tenure as concert conductor in London in 1790. He wrote 12 symphonies in all during his stay there. The dozen compositions were named after the concert manager who arranged the series.

The ever-popular "La Mer" of Claude Debussy will be played as the second number of the program. The interpretation of this rhythm of the sea by Dr. Koussevitzky was hailed at a concert in Carnegie Hall last year as one of the greatest contributions to music in the last fifty years.

The selection is divided into three parts. They are "De l'aube a midi sur la mer," "jeux de vagues," and "dialogue du vent et de la mer." It is considered probably the greatest work of the popular French composer.

After intermission the orchestra will continue with Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Opus 98. The symphony was the last written by the German composer and is considered a masterpiece.

The concert will mark the fifth appearance of the orchestra in New Brunswick. For the past four years the group has been the outstanding feature of the annual university series.

Tickets for the concert have been sold rapidly, but there are still unreserved seats available.

IT'S NOT SO ELUSIVE AS IT SEEMS

B. Post Feb. 12/39

Beethoven's Fourth Not Unknown in Hub, Anyhow

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

WEIRD are the uses of publicity. In a recent announcement of an impending radio broadcast that familiar vehicle for pianistic virtuosity, Beethoven's Fourth, G major, Concerto is described, believe it or not, as "probably the most mysteriously elusive composition in the history of great music." After being told, with some accuracy, that Mendelssohn gave the concerto a new lease of life in 1836, 29 years after its Vienna premiere, we are then assured that "after a decade or so of immense popularity, the concerto once more disappeared from concert programmes . . . until 1938 in the United States when the celebrated Beethoven interpreter, Arthur Schnabel, playing the work here on tour, brought it back into vogue." After that, if you please, it virtually disappeared again; and its revival in the broadcast aforementioned is, therefore, something of an event.

As a matter of fact, between 1881 and 1930, to quote from the tabulation in M. A. DeWolfe Howe's "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," the concerto was performed at 17 pairs of concerts by that organization. Nor has it gone unheard in Symphony Hall since. Not a bad record for an "elusive" piece.

More fitly called a rarity is Beethoven's C minor Concerto, No. 3, which Myra Hess will play at the Symphony concerts of this week. Mr. Howe's book lists four performances only between 1888 and 1921 and, if memory serves, there has only been one performance at Symphony Hall since, at the hands of Mr. Schnabel. The only Beethoven Concerto in which Miss Hess has thus far been heard here is the "elusive" Fourth. On the following Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Miss Hess will play with the orchestra again, this time the Concerto of Schumann, of which she is a most persuasive exponent.

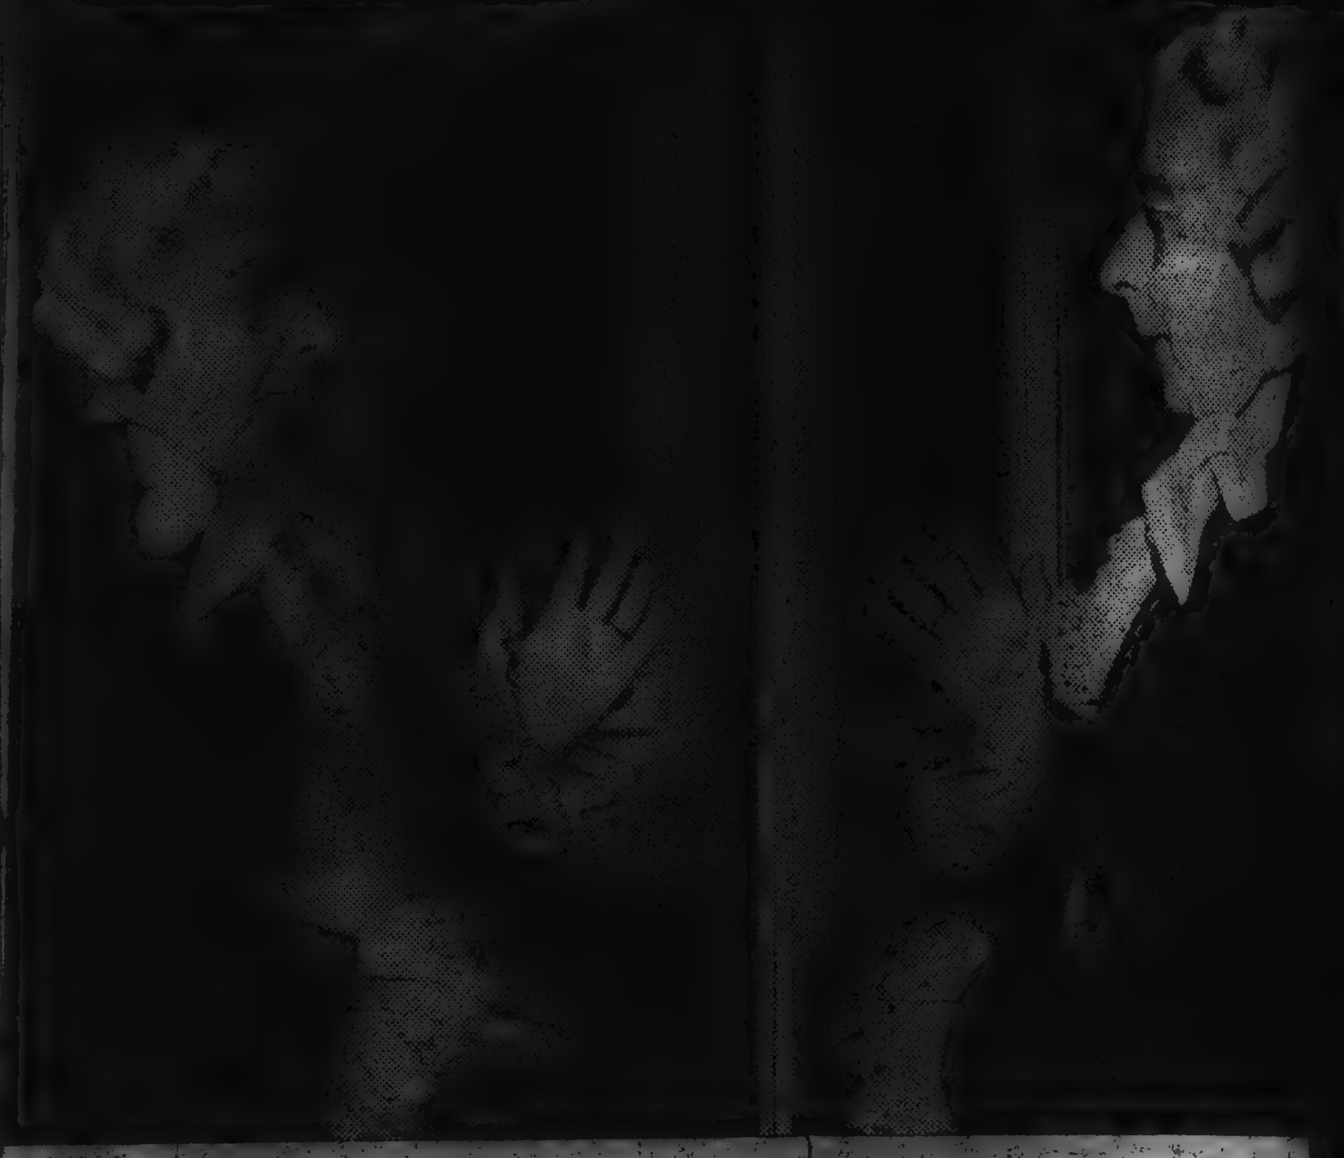
According to unofficial advices from the Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky would have liked to have the Schumann Concerto on Friday and Saturday also. But he had planned, and is planning, to feature at the same concerts the music of another Schuman, the American, William, whose Second Symphony, in one movement, will be played for the first time hereabouts. Apparently the conductor felt that Schuman and Schumann on the same programme would be altogether to confusing. This William, the bearer of a distinguished name (minus one "n"), was born in New York city in 1910 and has studied both in this country and in what used to be Austria. His Second Symphony won a prize in a national contest and has been performed in New York, both in public and a broadcast.

The Third Symphony of Sibelius, somewhat neglected here of late, makes the rest of this particular programme; and the list for Monday and Tuesday includes, besides the Schumann Concerto, Mozart's youthful Symphony in A major, which Dr. Koussevitzky brought to light a few seasons ago; Ravel's "La Valse" and Prokofieff's Musical Fairy Tale, "Peter and the Wolf," given at the recent Pension Fund "Concert Extraordinaire," with Richard Hale again as narrator. By the way, this "concert extraordinaire" was repeated in New York last Wednesday evening and with great success.

Forum Century
Concord N.H.
JAN - - 1939

AND here is a set in the "hats off" class. Given Sibelius' Fifth, plus Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Victor's engineers all in a rare mood, you get one of the finest orchestral recordings made to date. Go out and hear it is all I can say. For good measure a tone poem is thrown in. I'll take the Symphony.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
FEB 5 - 1939



WITH A HEIGH-DI HAYDN, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestr Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the Composer Haydn manner ratory to concert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky will impersonate to whom he is said to bear a resemblance—and orchestra members will appear in 18th centur

---

BRUNSWICK, GA.
NEWS
FEB 8 - 1939

WINTER HAVEN, FLA.
DAILY CHIEF
FEB 3 - 1939

SHELBY, N. C.
STAR
FEB 8 - 1939

ATHOL, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 6 - 1939

LANCASTER, PA.
Intelligencer Journal
FEB 9 - 1939

BEATRICE, NEB.
SUN
JAN 30 1939

JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN - PATRIOT
FEB 11 1939

HANNIBAL, MO.
COURIER-POST
FEB 1 - 1939

LEAD, S. D.
CALL
FEB 13 1939

ALEXANDRIA, LA.
TOWN - TALK
FEB 13 1939

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.
SUN
FEB 1 - 1939

TRINIDAD, COLO.
CHRONICLE NEWS
FEB 6 - 1939

BIG SPRING, TEX.
HERALD
FEB 8 - 1939

SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD
FEB 2 - 1939

DURANGO, COLO.
HERALD - DEMOCRAT
FEB 1 - 1939

PALO ALTO, CAL.
TIMES
FEB 3 - 1939

NOGALES, ARIZ.
HERALD
FEB 4 - 1939

ALHAMBRA, CAL.
POST - ADVOCATE
FEB 4 - 1939

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR
FEB 5 - 1939

GREAT FALLS, MONT.
TRIBUNE
FEB 6 - 1939

PINE BLUFF, ARK.
COMMERCIAL
JAN 30 1939

F. Forum
Concord - N.H.
FEB - - 1939

I CANNOT see any reason for duplicating the fine Koussevitzky recording of the Moussorgsky Pictures orchestrated by Ravel. The orchestration here is by Lucien Caillet, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and cannot compare with Ravel's. Ravel made the ideal orchestration, and Caillet's, for all its splendor, just has to be second best. It is unfortunate, for he is able. However, his version profits from an extremely brilliant performance and up-to-date recording technique.

ARDMORE, PA.
WEEKLY CHRONICLE
JAN 27 1939

Metropolitan Music

A Review of Outstanding Contributions by Florence Leonard

Let us be thankful to Fortune that there is always new music demanding to be heard! And that there is a great variety in this music. For the world consists of "many men of many minds," and those minds are looking for diverse satisfactions in the music they listen to. On one point only do they seem to agree, that the music must somehow take hold on them. Certain ideas would be "gripping" to some ears, whereas other ears would be unaffected or even outraged by them.

Among the new works asking for a verdict of the New York and the radio public was a Concerto for Orchestra by the Russian composer Starokadomsky, born in Brest Litovsk in 1901, who made his chief studies in Moscow at the Conservatory. The concerto was first played in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1937. The title of the movements suggests the concerto grosso of the eighteenth century, with its groups of solo instruments. There are three movements, Sinfonia, Passacaglia and Toccata. But instead of solo groups, the various orchestral groups as strings, or woodwind, or brass, come into the foreground of the music, while the othergroups provide a background.

The portion of this composition which aroused the greatest interest in the reviewer was the Passacaglia, which consists of fourteen variations. This type of musical form is built upon a theme in the bass, which later is transferred to other voices. The movement "includes the most imaginative measures," says the critic. "The music as a whole is further characterized as often brilliant and effective, with certain passages of modernistic Russian flavor, yet having a discreet use of the modern dissonance."

Another Passacaglia recently performed was that entitled "The Plane Beyond," a composition which shared the $500 prize offered by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society last season. This was written by Charles Haubiel, a native of Ohio, and a professor of composition and theory in New York University for some years. The theme of this movement, which is the last of a set of three, is "The peaceful, contemplative, final years during which one faces the life beyond."

In this work the reviewer discovered a somewhat Wagnerian basic theme. But as one can easily discover "a somewhat Chopinish basic theme," or a "somewhat Lisztish basic theme" or traces of themes from still other compositions in Wagner's own compositions, that in itself is not unpardonable. It is what the composer does with the themes that matters most. The exquisite "turn" from Chopin's Valse in A flat is so glorified in Isolde's Death Song that we do not feel that Chopin would have grudged it to Wagner.

Aside from some comments on scoring and contrasts, this Passacaglia called forth no especial remark.

A composition by another American composer, the young Samuel Barber, was an Adagio for Strings . . . This was called full-throated and noble music—"a cantilena that unfolds itself with naturalness and seeming spontaneity; so that one does not think of an anxious and self-conscious experimentalist, striving to make the hearer sit up, but of a tone-poet allowing music to speak through him as it will."

Of another composition still, a prize-winning symphony by Van Vector, the critic wrote: "And what is good music? I wonder if I know? It seemed to me as I listened—that all it needed to make it good was an idea or two, something self-sprung and urgent and spontaneous, something that clamored to be said, that would have seized the listener's mind and lived in it after the sound had ceased—something that would have made Mr. Van Victor's music seem less shiny and slick and streamlined. What is music worth, anyhow? As much as a race horse, or a jade necklace, or a sable coat? Or as little as a song that will stir the imaginations of men as long as they have listening ears?"

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI - WEEKLY TIMES
FEB 3 - 1939

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge, Mass., next August. The first series of concerts will be on Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second on Aug. 10, 12 and 13. Membership lists closed last November, and subscriptions for separate series tickets are now being received.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1939

Working To Aid Fund For Concert

Mrs. Reginald Mott Hull of 510 Boston Post road and Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Jr., are members working for the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund Concert to be given at Symphony Hall on Monday, March 6.

Nadia Boulanger, sister of Lili Boulanger, gifted young French composer whose career came to an untimely close at the age of 24, will again conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, assisted by G. Wallace Woodworth. This takes the place of the annual joint concert of these two choruses in Sanders Theater.

The proceeds will establish a fund for promising composers.

PRESS
Cranbury N. J.
FEB 3 - 1939

Program for Rutgers Concert Announced

Works of Haydn, Debussy, and Brahms, will feature the fifth appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Rutgers University Concert Series in the Rutgers gymnasium in New Brunswick, Tuesday night, Feb. 7th, at 8:30 o'clock.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who received an honorary degree of Doctor of Music from Rutgers when he appeared in New Brunswick with the Orchestra two years ago, will conduct. A capacity crowd is expected to hear the orchestra which is now regarded as a fixture on the Annual Concert Series of the University. Rutgers is the only college or university regularly included on the annual winter tour of the Boston Symphony.

The program to be presented on Tuesday night, follows:

Haydn ——— Symphony in B-flat, No. 102.
1. Largo: Allegro vivace
2. Adagio
3. Menuetto: Allegro: Trio
4. Finale: Presto

Debussy ——— "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques
1. De l'aube a midi sur la mer
2. Jeux de Vagues
3. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer

Intermission

Brahms ——— Symphony No. 4 in E-minor, Op. 98
1. Allegro non troppo
2. Andante moderato
3. Allegro giocoso
4. Allegro energico e passionato

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1939

OSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting: Carnegie Hall, Wed. Eve., Feb. 8 (benefit for the Pension Fund), at 8:45; Fri. Eve., Feb. 10, at 8:45; Sat. Aft., Feb. 11, at 2:30. At the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Thurs. Eve., Feb. 9, at 8:30.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
FEB 3 - 1939

Six Concerts Arranged For Symphonic Festival

August 3rd, 5th, 6th, 10th, 12th and 13th Decided Upon as Dates for Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra With Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor, at Sixth Annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival at "Tanglewood" in Stockbridge—Trustees Will Apply Present Resources for Next Summer's Concerts to Making Needed Improvements at "Tanglewood"—Musical Center for 1940 Remains as Objective.

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at "Tanglewood," in Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

Acoustical Success of Shed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 5,000 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the Festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood overlooking Lake Mahkeenac stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

Never before have so many music lovers heard symphonic programs in so unique a setting. The utilitarian simplicity of the shed only enhances its beauty. Festival trustees are confident that sufficient funds will be forthcoming for its early completion.

The Festival trustees, announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitzky will make the programs for the 1939 Festival from the following list of works: the second and third symphonies of Beethoven, the first and third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the fourth of Tchaikovsky, the second and fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "LaValse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra" and others to be announced.

While directing their immediate attention to a program for 1939, that promises fully as much as in other remains—a mu-
e year 1940. At rcises for the shed
tley W. Warren,
speaking for the trustees of the orchestra, made this announcement:

"We all hope the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players. 'Tanglewood' is the ideal location for such a center.

"This fortunate combination of circumstances will provide an excellent beginning for the realization of Dr. Koussevitzky's program. Indeed the greatest need will be for scholarships. No one can doubt that from some source necessary funds will be forthcoming; and it is expected that the detailed arrangements for the school will be completed so that its first session may precede the Berkshire Festival of 1940."

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra and trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are giving serious thought to the development of the physical plant at "Tanglewood" in anticipation of the next momentous step in expansion, scheduled for 1940.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., at Stockbridge.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 4 - 1939

The Record Album

Two recordings issued this month are of particular interest to Berkshire because they are on the program of the Boston Orchestra which again will play at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August.

From Columbia comes an excellent recording, in fact the best yet issued, of the Brahms F major symphony and from Victor an outstanding recording of the Haydn B flat major symphony. The Brahms is played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra, Felix Weingartner conducting, and while some of the interpretations may sound strange to ears attuned to Serge Koussevitzky, they are none the less lovely. The Haydn symphony recording is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitzky on the podium. Both these master work volumes should be in the library of every person who intends to be at the Festival.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
FEB 5 - 1939

Koussevitzky Offers a Godowsky Tribute

The recent death of Leopold Godowsky in New York has elicited the following tribute from the famous Boston conductor, Serge Koussevitzky:

"The passing of Leopold Godowsky is an unredeemable loss to the musical world. Not only was he a great, masterful pianist and pedagogue, but also a man of the highest culture of whom his contemporaries could justly be proud. I, as one of them, treasure the memory of 30 years of friendship during which I learned to admire, respect and love him. Although he was less active of late, the presence alone of Leopold Godowsky among us was stimulating and his influence could be felt in all and every one close to him. I mourn the passing of a beloved friend and above all I mourn the loss of a great artist and a great human heart."

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR
FEB 5 - 1939

THE Boston Symphony of Music is giving what is described as a "concert extraordinaire" at Carnegie Hall on February 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The program is made up of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, performed in costume; Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," from the poem by Vachel Lindsay, with Colin O'More as tenor; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale with Richard Hale as narrator; Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravels "La Valse."

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE
FEB 4 - 1939

GREAT IMPRESSION MADE BY FIEDLER

Boston 'Pops' Director Conducts Concert Symphonique in Magnificent Style

MOZART STANDS OUT

G Minor Symphony Given Memorable Performance — Arthur Leblanc Makes Debut in Brahms Violin Concerto

By THOMAS ARCHER.
(Gazette Drama and Music Critic.)

Arthur Fiedler of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductor of the famous summer "Pop" concerts of that institution, made his debut in Montreal last night at the Plateau Hall and gave an exhibition of conducting such as this city has not seen for a good many years. It was easily the most exciting orchestral concert this season and it might even be ranked as the most exciting musical event of the year.

Mr. Fiedler is obviously one of the outstanding musical directors on this continent. What he got out of the orchestra of Les Concerts Symphoniques alone proved it. The men played for him as one instrument, giving all they could, showing the greatest enthusiasm and rising, so it seemed, to all the technical and expressive demands he made upon them.

Under the guidance of this conductor the playing of the local musicians was something of a revelation. Members of each section, strings, wood-winds and brass, seemed to feel that a man stood at the conductor's desk who knew absolutely what he wanted when he wanted it in order to give the music of Mozart and Brahms its full weight and purpose.

Mr. Fiedler, it is understood, had three rehearsals in which to become acquainted with the musicians and prepare the scores, one of which was new to everybody. What he did was little short of a miracle. Or perhaps it was just what a conductor of the first order is able to do on short notice because the orchestra is an instrument as familiar to him and as much a part of himself as the piano is to a virtuoso pianist.

Mr. Fiedler's supreme command was obvious throughout the programme, but more particularly in Mozart's Symphony in G minor, of which he made a good deal of a tour de force. This performance stressed the fact that the work occupies a special place in Mozart's output. The composer must have written it when he burned with inspiration. It is a personal document, something that Mozart did not always succeed in writing.

TECHNIQUE IS REMARKABLE.

Notwithstanding this strong emphasis on the human side of the work, Mr. Fiedler achieved remarkable things in the way of technique. He seemed to forget nothing of the hours he must have spent discovering Mozart's style. He made certain that the parts into which Mozart divided his sound structure should be clearly put to the audience. Nothing was missed. The right stress was placed upon the various instruments when they took up the burden of the music. It was all beautifully phrased and beautifully balanced.

For once the second movement did not sound formal in comparison with the first. Instead it was a song of consolation, comparable with the relation of the second movement to the first of Beethoven's Fifth. Mr. Fiedler made a mighty thing of the minuet and it assumed its real place in the general structure. The finale proceeded at a tremendous pace and played the part of coda to what must always remain a memorable performance.

Arthur Leblanc, a Canadian violinist who ought to have been heard here long before, made his debut in the Brahms Concerto in D major. Mr. Leblanc is an executant of unusual ability, a master of the instrument and a musician as well. He produces a beautiful tone and he seemed to have a thorough grasp of the work in hand. Except for a slight nervousness at first, due probably to unfamiliarity with concerto work, he showed neither hesitation nor fear in performing one of the most difficult scores in the repertory of his instrument. He was fortunate in the wonderful support he received from Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra. One scarcely thought of the D major in this instance as a concerto. It seemed more like a symphony for violin solo and orchestra.

The concert closed with the first performance here of a Divertissement by Jacques Ibert, actually music written for the revival of a comedy by Eugene Labiche. The work is in six sections and is light and humorous, orchestrated with the virtuosity of modern France and not to be taken too seriously. Mr. Fiedler did wonders with it.

ARDMORE, PA.
WEEKLY CHRONICLE
JAN 27 1939

Metropolitan Music

A Review of Outstanding Contributions by Florence Leonard

Let us be thankful to Fortune that there is always new music demanding to be heard! And that there is a great variety in this music. For the world consists of "many men of many minds," and those minds are looking for diverse satisfactions in the music they listen to. On one point only do they seem to agree, that the music must somehow take hold on them. Certain ideas would be "gripping" to some ears, whereas other ears would be unaffected or even outraged by them.

Among the new works asking for a verdict of the New York and the radio public was a Concerto for Orchestra by the Russian composer Starokadomsky, born in Brest Litovsk in 1901, who made his chief studies in Moscow at the Conservatory. The concerto was first played in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1937. The title of the movements suggests the concerto grosso of the eighteenth century, with its groups of solo instruments. There are three movements, Sinfonia, Passacaglia and Toccata. But instead of solo groups, the various orchestral groups as strings, or woodwind, or brass, come into the foreground of the music, while the othergroups provide a background.

The portion of this composition which aroused the greatest interest in the reviewer was the Passacaglia, which consists of fourteen variations. This type of musical form is built upon a theme in the bass, which later is transferred to other voices. The movement "includes the most imaginative measures," says the critic. "The music as a whole is further characterized as often brilliant and effective, with certain passages of modernistic Russian flavor, yet having a discreet use of the modern dissonance."

Another Passacaglia recently performed was that entitled "The Plane Beyond," a composition which shared the $500 prize offered by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society last season. This was written by Charles Haubiel, a native of Ohio, and a professor of composition and theory in New York University for some years. The theme of this movement, which is the last of a set of three, is "The peaceful, contemplative, final years during which one faces the life beyond."

In this work the reviewer discovered a somewhat Wagnerian basic theme. But as one can easily discover "a somewhat Chopinish basic theme," or a "somewhat Lisztish basic theme" or traces of themes from still other compositions in Wagner's own compositions, that in itself is not unpardonable. It is what the composer does with the themes that matters most. The exquisite "turn" from Chopin's Valse in A flat is so glorified in Isolde's Death Song that we do not feel that Chopin would have grudged it to Wagner.

Aside from some comments on scoring and contrasts, this Passacaglia called forth no especial remark.

A composition by another American composer, the young Samuel Barber, was an Adagio for Strings . . . This was called full-throated and noble music—"a cantilena that unfolds itself with naturalness and seeming spontaneity; so that one does not think of an anxious and self-conscious experimentalist, striving to make the hearer sit up, but of a tone-poet allowing music to speak through him as it will."

Of another composition still, a prize-winning symphony by Van Vector, the critic wrote: "And what is good music? I wonder if I know? It seemed to me as I listened—that all it needed to make it good was an idea or two, something self-sprung and urgent and spontaneous, something that clamored to be said, that would have seized the listener's mind and lived in it after the sound had ceased—something that would have made Mr. Van Victor's music seem less shiny and slick and streamlined. What is music worth, anyhow? As much as a race horse, or a jade necklace, or a sable coat? Or as little as a song that will stir the imaginations of men as long as they have listening ears?"

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI - WEEKLY TIMES
FEB 3 - 1939

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge, Mass., next August. The first series of concerts will be on Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second on Aug. 10, 12 and 13. Membership lists closed last November, and subscriptions for separate series tickets are now being received.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1939

Working To Aid Fund For Concert

Mrs. Reginald Mott Hull of 510 Boston Post road and Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Jr., are members working for the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund Concert to be given at Symphony Hall on Monday, March 6.

Nadia Boulanger, sister of Lili Boulanger, gifted young French composer whose career came to an untimely close at the age of 24, will again conduct the Boston Symphon, Orchestra, and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, assisted by G. Wallace Woodworth. This takes the place of the annual joint concert of these two choruses in Sanders Theater.

The proceeds will establish a fund for promising composers.

PRESS
Cranbury N.J.
FEB 3 - 1939

Program for Rutgers Concert Announced

Works of Haydn, Debussy, and Brahms, will feature the fifth appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Rutgers University Concert Series in the Rutgers gymnasium in New Brunswick, Tuesday night, Feb. 7th, at 8:30 o'clock.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who received an honorary degree of Doctor of Music from Rutgers when he appeared in New Brunswick with the Orchestra two years ago, will conduct. A capacity crowd is expected to hear the orchestra which is now regarded as a fixture on the Annual Concert Series of the University. Rutgers is the only college or university regularly included on the annual winter tour of the Boston Symphony.

The program to be presented on Tuesday night, follows:

Haydn .... Symphony in B-flat, No. 102.
1. Largo: Allegro vivace
2. Adagio
3. Menuetto: Allegro: Trio
4. Finale: Presto

Debussy .... "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques
1. De l'aube a midi sur la mer
2. Jeux de Vagues
3. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer

Intermission

Brahms .... Symphony No. 4 in E-minor, Op. 98
1. Allegro non troppo
2. Andante moderato
3. Allegro giocoso
4. Allegro energico e passionato

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1939

oston Symphony—Koussevitzky conducting: Carnegie Hall, Wed. Eve., Feb. 8 (benefit for the Pension Fund), at 8:45; Fri. Eve., Feb. 10, at 8:45; Sat. Aft., Feb. 11, at 2:30. At the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Thurs. Eve., Feb. 9, at 8:30.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
FEB 3 - 1939

S Concerts Arranged For Symphonic Festival

August 3rd, 5th, 6th, 10th, 12th and 13th Decided Upon as Dates for Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra With Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor, at Sixth Annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival at "Tanglewood" in Stockbridge—Trustees Will Apply Present Resources for Next Summer's Concerts to Making Needed Improvements at "Tanglewood"—Musical Center for 1940 Remains as Objective.

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at "Tanglewood," in Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second Aug. 10, 12 and 13.

Acoustical Success of Shed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 5,000 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the Festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood overlooking Lake Mahkeenac stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

Never before have so many music lovers heard symphonic programs in so unique a setting. The utilitarian simplicity of the shed only enhances its beauty. Festival trustees are confident that sufficient funds will be forthcoming for its early completion.

The Festival trustees, announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and they hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

Dr. Koussevitzky will make the programs for the 1939 Festival from the following list of works: the second and third symphonies of Beethoven, the first and third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the fourth of Tchaikovsky, the second and fifth of Sibelius Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "LaValse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra" and others to be announced.

While directing their immediate attention to a program for 1939, that promises fully as much as in other years, the objective remains—a musical center for the year 1940. At the dedicatory exercises for the shed last summer, Bentley W. Warren, speaking for the trustees of the orchestra, made this announcement:

"We all hope the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players. 'Tanglewood' is the ideal location for such a center.

"This fortunate combination of circumstances will provide an excellent beginning for the realization of Dr. Koussevitzky's program. Indeed the greatest need will be for scholarships. No one can doubt that from some source necessary funds will be forthcoming; and it is expected that the detailed arrangements for the school will be completed so that its first session may precede the Berkshire Festival of 1940."

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra and trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are giving serious thought to the development of the physical plant at "Tanglewood" in anticipation of the next momentous step in expansion, scheduled for 1940.

Membership lists closed Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2000 are assured for each of the six concerts. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken. Subscriptions are being received for the series of each week. Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., at Stockbridge.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 4 - 1939

. Y., at $4941.70. T
Furniture Compa
s second with a b
ngland Brothers' b

The R

Two recordings issued this month are of particular interest to Berkshire because they are on the program of the Boston Orchestra which again will play at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August.

From Columbia comes an excellent recording, in fact the best yet issued, of the Brahms F major symphony and from Victor an outstanding recording of the Haydn B flat major symphony. The Brahms is played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra, Felix Weingartner conducting, and while some of the interpretations may sound strange to ears attuned to Serge Koussevitzky, they are none the less lovely. The Haydn symphony recording is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitzky on the podium. Both these master work volumes should be in the library of every person who intends to be at the Festival.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
FEB 5 - 1939

Koussevitzky Offers a Godowsky Tribute

The recent death of Leopold Godowsky in New York has elicited the following tribute from the famous Boston conductor, Serge Koussevitzky:

"The passing of Leopold Godowsky is an unredeemable loss to the musical world. Not only was he a great, masterful pianist and pedagogue, but also a man of the highest culture of whom his contemporaries could justly be proud. I, as one of them, treasure the memory of 30 years of friendship during which I learned to admire, respect and love him. Although he was less active of late, the presence alone of Leopold Godowsky among us was stimulating and his influence could be felt in all and every one close to him. I mourn the passing of a beloved friend and above all I mourn the loss of a great artist and a great human heart."

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR
FEB 5 - 1939

THE Boston Symphony of Music is giving what is described as a "concert extraordinaire" at Carnegie Hall on February 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The program is made up of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, performed in costume; Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," from the poem by Vachel Lindsay, with Colin O'More as tenor; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale with Richard Hale as narrator; Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravels "La Valse."

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE
FEB 4 - 1939

61

GREAT IMPRESSION MADE BY FIEDLER

Boston 'Pops' Director Conducts Concert Symphonique in Magnificent Style

MOZART STANDS OUT

G Minor Symphony Given Memorable Performance — Arthur Leblanc Makes Debut in Brahms Violin Concerto

By THOMAS ARCHER.
(Gazette Drama and Music Critic.)

Arthur Fiedler of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conductor of the famous summer "Pop" concerts of that institution, made his debut in Montreal last night at the Plateau Hall and gave an exhibition of conducting such as this city has not seen for a good many years. It was easily the most exciting orchestral concert this season and it might even be ranked as the most exciting musical event of the year.

Mr. Fiedler is obviously one of the outstanding musical directors on this continent. What he got out of the orchestra of Les Concerts Symphoniques alone proved it. The men played for him as one instrument, giving all they could, showing the greatest enthusiasm and rising, so it seemed, to all the technical and expressive demands he made upon them.

Under the guidance of this conductor the playing of the local musicians was something of a revelation. Members of each section, strings, wood-winds and brass, seemed to feel that a man stood at the conductor's desk who knew absolutely what he wanted when he wanted it in order to give the music of Mozart and Brahms its full weight and purpose.

Mr. Fiedler, it is understood, had three rehearsals in which to become acquainted with the musicians and prepare the scores, one of which was new to everybody. What he did was little short of a miracle. Or perhaps it was just what a conductor of the first order is able to do on short notice because the orchestra is an instrument as familiar to him and as much a part of himself as the piano is to a virtuoso pianist.

Mr. Fiedler's supreme command was obvious throughout the programme, but more particularly in Mozart's Symphony in G minor, of which he made a good deal of a tour de force. This performance stressed the fact that the work occupies a special place in Mozart's output. The composer must have written it when he burned with inspiration. It is a personal document, something that Mozart did not always succeed in writing.

TECHNIQUE IS REMARKABLE.

Notwithstanding this strong emphasis on the human side of the work, Mr. Fiedler achieved remarkable things in the way of technique. He seemed to forget nothing of the hours he must have spent discovering Mozart's style. He made certain that the parts into which Mozart divided his sound structure should be clearly put to the audience. Nothing was missed. The right stress was placed upon the various instruments when they took up the burden of the music. It was all beautifully phrased and beautifully balanced.

For once the second movement did not sound formal in comparison with the first. Instead it was a song of consolation, comparable with the relation of the second movement to the first of Beethoven's Fifth. Mr. Fiedler made a mighty thing of the minuet and it assumed its real place in the general structure. The finale proceeded at a tremendous pace and played the part of coda to what must always remain a memorable performance.

Arthur Leblanc, a Canadian violinist who ought to have been heard here long before, made his debut in the Brahms Concerto in D major. Mr. Leblanc is an executant of unusual ability, a master of the instrument and a musician as well. He produces a beautiful tone and he seemed to have a thorough grasp of the work in hand. Except for a slight nervousness at first, due probably to unfamiliarity with concerto work, he showed neither hesitation nor fear in performing one of the most difficult scores in the repertory of his instrument. He was fortunate in the wonderful support he received from Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra. One scarcely thought of the D major in this instance as a concerto. It seemed more like a symphony for violin solo and orchestra.

The concert closed with the first performance here of a Divertissement by Jacques Ibert, actually music written for the revival of a comedy by Eugene Labiche. The work is in six sections and is light and humorous, orchestrated with the virtuosity of modern France and not to be taken too seriously. Mr. Fiedler did wonders with it.

162

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE
FEB 4 - 1939

Berkshire Music Festival Reports 36,000 Attendance for 1938

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival reports an ever increasing number of members for the 1939 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the new Tanglewood shed on Route 183 between Stockbridge and Lenox.

Trustees have issued a brochure to all who have contributed to the building calling attention to accomplishments at Tanglewood—erection of the music shed at a cost of $91,193.95, which includes fees to the architect and engineer and chairs for the front section. The building contract according to the brochure was completed under the contract price and one month ahead of schedule.

More than 82 per cent. of the donations came from people living within a radius of 50 miles of Tanglewood and the trustees themselves contributed more than 40 per cent. of the total. It is estimated that $75,000 more will be necessary to complete the shed and to drain and level the parking area and install lighting. An item of extreme urgency according to the trustees is the enclosing of the shed immediately with roll curtains for protection in winter and for the audience in case of storms during concerts.

"The money contributed thus far has been secured without the aid of professionals at a cost of less than 3 per cent.," says the brochure. "The board of trustees believes the remaining amount can be secured in the same way. This can be assured if you will send in a donation for whatever amount you may feel disposed to contribute. The board of trustees can then turn their attention to the larger problem of the educational aspects of the festival, particularly as concerns the children of the community who will constitute the future audiences. It is hoped educational programmes may be organized for them in the schools as well as for grown-ups in local Festival clubs where recorded music of the great masters may be played.

"The Berkshire Symphonic Festival is non-profit-making and no dividends are paid. All operating expenses are paid from the sale of tickets. The accounts are audited each year. If there is a surplus, it is placed in a reserve fund to meet extraordinary emergencies as, for example, the repairing of parking fields this summer at a cost of over $1,500

"The 1934 and 1935 Festivals showed small deficits. The last three Festivals made a small surplus. The estimated 1938 operating budget of $51,000 was not exceeded.

"It is estimated that 36,000 people attended the six concerts in 1938. Many came from the Pacific Coast and Canada. From the musical standpoint the performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the brilliant direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, were of outstanding merit. The enthusiasm of the audience was extraordinary and revealed an intimate sense of friendliness toward the conductor and the magnificent orchestra. The public was evidently conscious that this annual event is now assuming national and even international significance in the musical world. Its educational and cultural value is difficult to estimate."

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
FEB 5 - 1939

Haydn Symphony, Alice Suite By Taylor Offered On Discs

THE Boston symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, has made an excellent recording of Haydn's Symphony No. 102, in B flat major, another important contribution to the steadily increasing list of phonographic masterpieces. (Victor album M-529).

Artistically and mechanically, the set is one to take its place with the best of those turned out by the record mills in recent months.

"Through the Looking Glass," Deems Taylor's suite for orchestra in which the talented composer seems to have drunk deeply and delightedly at Lewis Carroll's spring of nonsense, receives an understanding reading from Howard Barlow, conducting the Columbia symphony. (Columbia set 350).

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE
FEB 5 - 1939

RECENT RECORDS

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston head Victor's February list with a superb performance of Haydn's delectable Symphony No. 102 in B Flat Major, Victor Set No. M-529. Recorded with crisp brilliance and played with impeccable precision, this ingratiating and charming music is set forth by Dr. Koussevitsky with complete regard for detail and ornament and, in addition, with deep understanding of the vigor which underlies much of the symphony's grace. This symphony holds an especially warm spot in the hearts of the Boston's audiences and it is performed with a devotion which will undoubtedly widen its appeal. It was offered, by the way, on the first program ever presented by the Boston Symphony, under Henschel.

In Victor Set No. M-530, Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia offer expansively recorded and magnificently played excerpts from "Tannhauser," including the overture, the Venusberg music and the Prelude to Act III. The music affords Mr. Stokowski full opportunity to exhibit the virtuosity of the orchestra and the recording has captured the torrents of tone with complete fidelity. It takes a stout machine to do this set full justice.

Artur Schnabel performs Bach's Toccatas in C Minor and D Major in Victor Set. No. M-532 and presents this department with the necessity of making a choice. After repeated playings for comparison, we still prefer Marcel Maas' performance of the C Minor Toccata (Columbia Set No. X-4) to Mr. Schnabel's reading of the work. Mr. Maas plays with more crispness and less contemplative expansiveness than does Mr. Schnabel, especially in the slow movement, thereby making his performance, for us, more essentially consonant with his material. Mr. Schnabel is well recorded and plays, of course, with great and scholarly insight. Mr. Maas, however, makes Bach sound more like Bach.

Two Victor singles of unusual merit and interest are V-12537, Roy Harris' "Chorale for String Sextette," and V-1951, two Chopin mazurkas, beautifully played by Moritz Rosenthal. The Kreiner Quartet, aided by extra viola and cello, perform Mr. Harris' provocative and richly scored work with definitive power.

Victor should be commended for the well planned and exceedingly informative booklet included in the Haydn album. Complete, with notes and quotations of important themes, this "program" is far superior to the general run of such productions. We hope the practice will be continued.

—C. S.

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO
TIMES
FEB 5 - 1939

Leading Musicians

Who have commented on the Hammond Organ have permitted their statements to be printed in booklet forms. These famous musicians are as follows: Eugene Ormandy, Serge Koussevitzky, Fernando Germani, Mischa Levitski, Percy Grainger, Hans Kindler, Deems Taylor, Tito Schipa, Rudolph Ganz, Eugene Goossens, Sir Thomas Beecham, Gaetano Merola, William Mengelberg and Joseph Szigeti. This booklet may be obtained free at Summers & Son, 906 Gallia street, home of the Hammond Organ and the Baldwin Piano.

CELINA, OHIO
DAILY STANDARD
FEB 7 - 1939

Boston (UP)—The "unheard of" has has happened. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra conductor, has been hissed—by students. But it was all in fun.

Apparently disturbed by the presence of spectators at a rehearsal of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in which Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs were participating, the maestro let it be known during intermission that friends of the singers would be barred from future rehearsals.

A wave of hisses greeted the announcement. But Koussevitzky grinned and the rehearsal was resumed.

SOMERVILLE, N. J.
Semi-Weekly Messenger
FEB 7 - 1939

Somerville Folk to Hear Boston Symphony Concert

NEW BRUNSWICK—Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bonham, Mr. and Mrs. C. Palmer Bateman, Mrs. L. P. Gaston, Mrs. C. P. Hoagland and Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Hoagland are among those who will attend the Boston Symphony concert at Rutgers University here tonight.

DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL
FEB 5 - 1939

Artur Schnabel Records Toccatas by Bach

Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto Interpreted by Menuhin

By Merab Eberle.

Classicists and romanticists have given freely of their works to Victor recordings released for February. Bach's toccata in C minor and toccata in D major are played by Artur Schnabel, chief contemporary interpreter of the compositions by the master polyphonist.

Haydn's symphony in B flat major is given a splendid reading by the orchestra of the incomparable strings, the Boston symphony, directed by Serge Koussevitzky. Leopard Stokowski and the Philadelphia orchestra have interpreted the "Tannhauser" overture and Venusberg music in Wagner's Paris version and the prelude to Act III. The prelude has been arranged by Stokowski. To those who like Stoowsi's rich embroideries of cound and almost overpowering dynamic contrasts will find this Wgner music magnificent. Others will believe it a bit extravagant.

Extraordinary

Mendelssohn, in creating the concerto in E minor for violin and orchestra, worked to produce a selection which would fall easily to the hand of the violinist. Therefore, the music flows, and of course it flows with extraordinary beauty from records made by Yehudi Menuhin and the Colonne concert orchestra directed by Georges Enesco.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL BULLETIN
FEB 6 - 1939

Off the Records

By MARIE HICKS DAVIDSON

Harry DeWit and Peter Pike are young San Franciscans who believe that there is a local market for the beautiful and rare things which bibliophiles collect . . . original manuscripts, facsimiles of scores and manuscripts and first editions.

And so they have opened a shop in Tillman place, where they are giving a cocktail party this afternoon to celebrate their launching.

Among other things which they will carry will be phonograph records of rare value, both from the artistic and the monetary point of view.

VALUED HIGHLY

The young men set great store by some recordings of Viennese waltzes played on two pianos by Rawicz and Landauer, a team which enjoyed high favor in Austria. They have recordings by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, now disbanded, and other discs of interest to collectors.

* * *

Symphony No. 102, in B Flat major (Haydn). Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The versatility of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor is well known. Koussevitzky has long been known for his hospitality to new music, new ideas, new projects, and with his orchestra has kept pace with everything significant in modern composition. It is interesting to note that the same magnificent qualities which distinguish his Boston Symphony performances of Sibelius or Debussy are employed in the performance of much simpler but no less difficult music, such as that of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Here is a symphony which is always given a particular welcome.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes it sound so fresh, so bright and so lovely that it becomes quite irresistible.

DELICACY OF BALANCE

Seldom has the loveliness of string tone of this orchestra been so faithfully recreated, and the delicacy of balance, the just proportions in contrasted masses of tone are recaptured with almost the precision with which Mr. Koussevitzky created them. Admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be keenly interested in it, particularly because of the contrast which it affords to other outstanding Boston Symphony recordings, all by Victor Recording Company.

OSHKOSH, WIS.
NORTHWESTERN
FEB 6 - 1939

The Boston Symphony orchestra is giving what is described as a "concert extraordinaire" at Carnegie hall on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The program is made up of Haydn's "Farewell" symphony, performed in costume; Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," from the poem by Vachel Lindsay, with Colin O'More as tenor; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale with Richard Hale as narrator; Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 6 - 1939

Ask Your Library

By the Reference Department
Berkshire Athenaeum
Telephone 2-6442

A reader may receive the answer to any question of fact by phoning or writing The Berkshire Athenaeum Reference Department. Selected answers are published daily. All books cited are available at the library unless otherwise noted. All mail inquiries should bear the name and address of the writer.

Q. Who was Henry Lee Higginson? A. Henry Lee Higginson (1834-1919), American banker, was born in New York City on Nov. 18, 1834. He entered the banking house of S. and E. Austin of Boston, but later went to Vienna for a year, where he studied music. In the Civil War he served as a volunteer officer. In 1863 he was severely wounded and honorably discharged. In 1868 he joined the banking firm of Lee, Higginson and Company of Boston, with whom he remained until his death. His interest in music led to his founding the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. A long line of distinguished directors placed this organization in the first rank and won full recognition abroad. In 1891, as a memorial to certain friends who died in the Civil War, he presented Soldiers' Field to Harvard University. In 1899 he erected the Harvard Union as a general meeting-place for all undergraduates. For many years a Fellow of Harvard University, he died in Boston on Nov. 14, 1919. ("Encyclopaedia Britannica")

Q. What is the meaning of "Horse Latitudes"? A. "Horse Latitudes" is the name formerly given by mariners to a belt of tedious calms in the Atlantic Ocean, near the Tropic of Cancer. The name is said to have originated in Colonial times, when vessels freighted with horses, from New England to the West Indies, were often so long detained under the scorching rays of the sun in this belt of calms that many of the animals died because of lack of water. The term, however, is generally given to belts of very light rainfall extending around the earth in latitudes 250 degree to 30 degrees north and south. ("The World Book")

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD
FEB 5 - 1939

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving what is described as a "concert extraordinaire" at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 8, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The program is made up of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, performed in costume: Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz," from the poem by Vachel Lindsay, with Colin O'More as tenor; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale with Richard Hale as narrator; Lanner's "Die Schoenbrunner" waltzes; Strauss' "Wiener Blut" and "Fruehlingstimmen" waltzes; Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

Alfredo Salmaggi's New York Hippodrome Opera Company has returned to the scene for a series of Saturday and Sunday night popular operas at the Hippodrome. In the first three weeks, "Faust," "Traviata," "Barber of Seville," "Aida," "La Boheme" and "Rigoletto" will be given.

Georges Enesco, Rumanian composer and conductor, is holding the fort with the New York Philharmonic until John Barbirolli returns on Feb. 9, from a brief vacation. During his tenure, Enesco presented six Rumanian works, including three of his own.

The Garden City Press has brought out the "Music Lovers' Encyclopedia," a reference book of musical information, which should be a gold mine for those who want quick and accurate data. One of its great advantages is that it sells for only $1.98.

It is a revised and up-to-date edition, edited by Deems Taylor and Rusell Kerr, of the original compilation by Rupert Hughes. Its many pages include a biographical dictionary of composers and musicians, a dictionary of musical terms, some excellent short essays on music, and the condensed stories of 90 operas.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 8 - 1939

Providence Gives Arturo Toscanini Great Ovation; Capacity Audience Is Thrilled by Splendid Concert

Conductor Whisked Away As Admirers Storm Backstage

By G. Y. Loveridge

Four years ago Arturo Toscanini came to this city with a fine orchestra and played to an audience that could have found shelter under a beach umbrella.

Last night he returned, with another fine orchestra, and filled Metropolitan theatre's 3400 seats, virtually. Most of the audience stood when he walked onto the stage. They shouted and clapped his superb performance. They stormed his dressing room afterward. They were still looking for him when he was stealthily led out one of the Broad street exits of the theatre and smuggled to the railroad station in a limousine with the curtains drawn.

It was an audience that included not only the furred and jeweled but also many to whom the high-priced tickets represented a genuine sacrifice. There were members of the National Broadcasting Company hierarchy, there were critics from New York and Boston. Everybody expected to be thrilled, nay, was determined to be. And everybody was.

Here, before their very eyes, there came to view a man who is almost a myth, a hero of the art of tone, a humanitarian of sympathies too broad to be contained within the boundaries of any one nation. He worked with tremendous vigor and insight, and accepted the applause calmly but not indifferently.

It is scarcely likely that Toscanini at 71 is a greater interpreter than he was at 67; that would be all but impossible. The curious difference in the size of the audiences that heard him here in 1935 and last night must be ascribed to other reasons, among them the potent modern technique of publicity. Long ago a well-known Italian—Julius Caesar, by name—said that "men believe willingly what they wish to believe," and more recently a well-known Yankee, Ralph Waldo Emerson, said that "we are born believers in great men." Working on these principles, the publicity wizards have labored with newspapers, magazines and radio to give Mr. Toscanini something that as an artist he did not need, but as the highly-paid leader of a highly-paid orchestra is useful to those who employ him. We fear that if some moderation is not used there will presently be people who will discern that Mr. Toscanini is not a god at all, but merely a genius, and will be dissatisfied.

The genius of Mr. Toscanini shone forth in all that he did. He warmed up his N. B. C. orchestra with a confection by Rossini, the overture to "Cinderella." At once the splendidly controlled vigor of the strings and the clarity of other voices showed that the men were on their mettle, like athletes limbering up before the real work of the occasion.

Then came the Eroica symphony of Beethoven, No. 3, in E-flat major, and here, indeed, the qualities of both conductor and orchestra were demonstrated beyond question. From the opening tonic chords and bugle call theme to the closing reiteration it was a fine musical experience. The strength and vitality of the first movement, the breadth and grandeur of the reading, were magnificent. The funeral march lacked something of the nobility and intensity that we had hoped it would have, but the scherzo was brilliant and the finale was a whirl of artistic excitement.

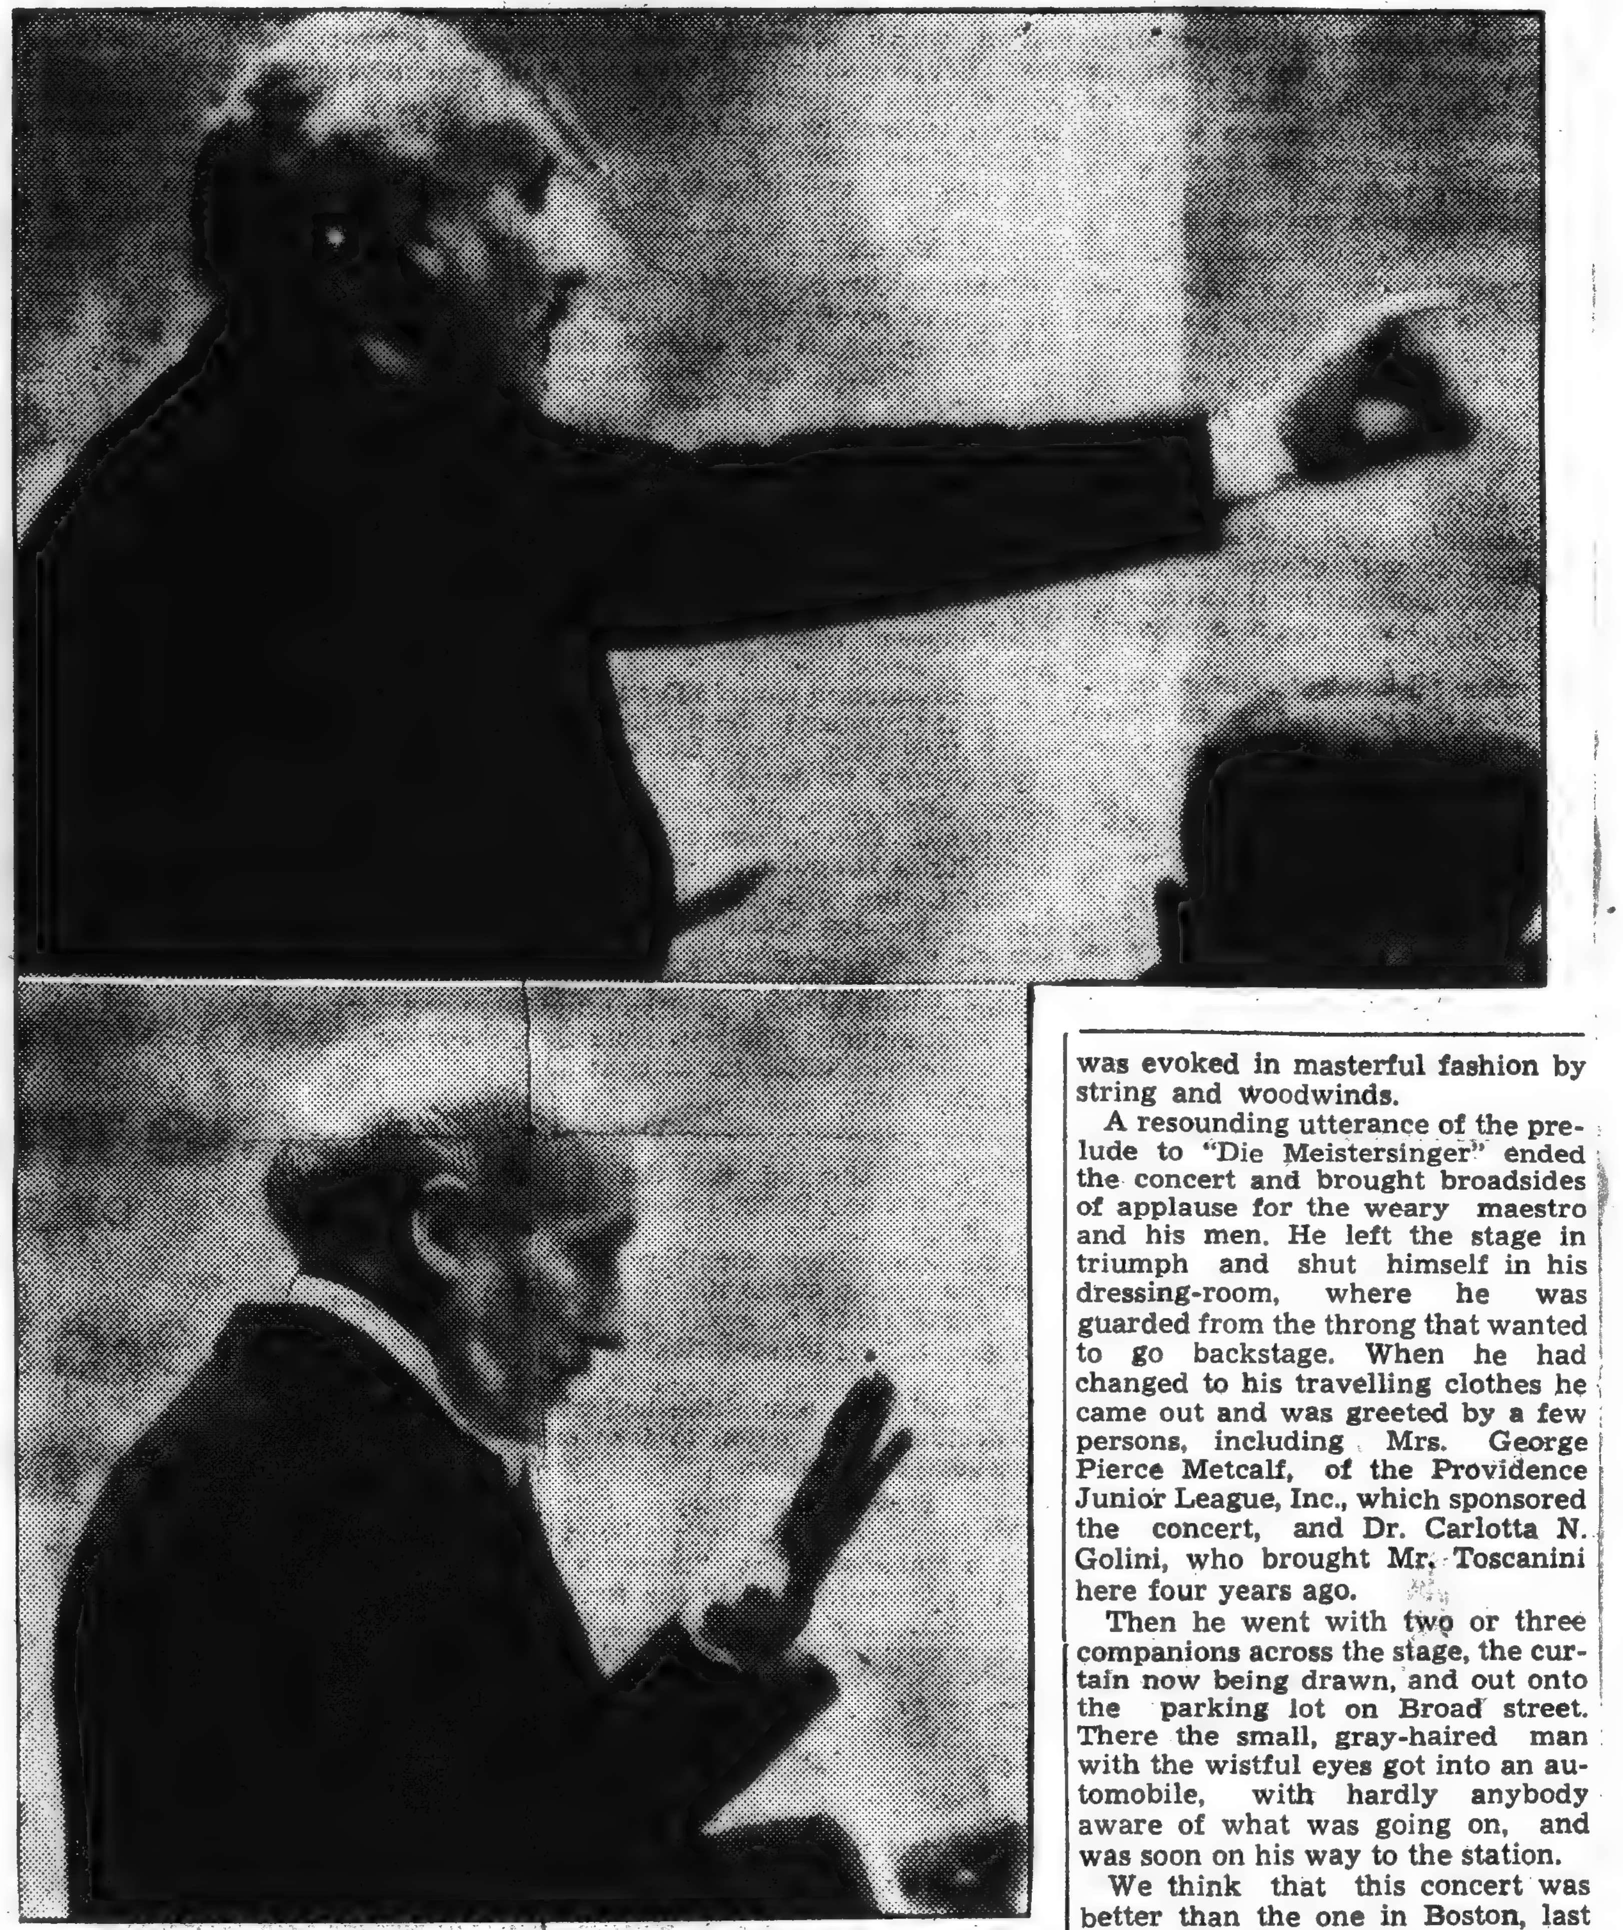
In the Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn, Mr. Toscanini performed wonders of phrasing and nuance. The tone of the orchestra was exceptionally clear and lustrous.

The "Invitation to the Dance," after the 'cello-invitation, seemed vigorous enough to be a wrestling match rather than a waltz, but quickly adjusted itself and swept with virtuoso command through the poetic measures. Dollops from Wagner finished the program, the first being the "Forest Murmurs" from Act II of "Siegfried," in which the misty and enchanting atmosphere of the forest was evoked in masterful fashion by string and woodwinds.

A resounding utterance of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" ended the concert and brought broadsides of applause for the weary maestro and his men. He left the stage in triumph and shut himself in his dressing-room, where he was guarded from the throng that wanted to go backstage. When he had changed to his travelling clothes he came out and was greeted by a few persons, including Mrs. George Pierce Metcalf, of the Providence Junior League, Inc., which sponsored the concert, and Dr. Carlotta N. Golini, who brought Mr. Toscanini here four years ago.

Then he went with two or three companions across the stage, the curtain now being drawn, and out onto the parking lot on Broad street. There the small, gray-haired man with the wistful eyes got into an automobile, with hardly anybody aware of what was going on, and was soon on his way to the station.

We think that this concert was better than the one in Boston, last month, the only other New England appearance of Mr. Toscanini this season. And we still say, at the risk of being considered the devil's advocate or perhaps the devil himself, that the Boston Symphony excels the N. B. C. symphony, in brilliance of fortissimo, in flexibility, in tonal colors. Although, man for man, the orchestras may be composed of equal virtuosos, the teamwork of the N. B. C. orchestra does not equal that of the Boston orchestra. The radio orchestra has been in existence about two years. It has not the perfection of ensemble that the Boston orchestra has acquired in decades. We venture to think that this is apparent both to the reason and to the ears.



An Evening Bulletin candid cameraman catches Arturo Toscanini as he directs the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra in a concert at the Metropolitan Theatre.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 8 - 1939

Record Crowd Hears Boston Symphony Here

3,600 Jam Rutgers Gymnasium to Hear Program By Famous Orchestra

The largest crowd ever to assemble in Rutgers University gymnasium, estimated at more than 3,600, heard the nationally-renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of three major concert works here last night.

The gymnasium, scene of many Rutgers concerts in the past, was filled to overflowing with music lovers, who expressed their appreciation of the program by prolonged applause.

The assemblage was disappointed when, shortly before the start of the program, Dr. Robert C. Clothier president of the university, announced that illness prevented the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous orchestra.

The program was capably conducted, however, by Richard Burgin, assistant to the famous Koussevitzky.

An analysis of the concert and a description of the program by Clifford B. Ross, music critic, may be found on page 7 of this issue.

ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL

FEB 9 - 1939

SYMPHONIC "VAUDEVILLE SHOW" GIVEN

By JOHN SELBY.
(Associated Press Arts Editor.)

New York, Feb. 9.—Serge Koussevitzky, recovered from the illness which prevented his conducting the Boston symphony Tuesday in New Brunswick, N. J., presided last night over something appropriately called a "concert extraordinaire" in Carnegie hall.

The generally impeccable Boston symphony never has let its hair down with such abandon in all the 50-odd years it has been giving concerts in New York. What it turned out for the benefit of its own pension fund was something like a symphonic vaudeville show.

It began with a performance of Haydn's famous "Farewell" symphony, for which the orchestra was costumed in wigs and small clothes, and Dr. Koussevitzky was particularly elegant in a costume designed by Robert Edmond Jones from likenesses of Haydn himself. Dr. Koussevitzky resembles the composer, anyway.

The stage was lighted with elaborate candelabra and a hanging chandelier, and each music stand bore a lighted candle which the men blew out as they departed one by one in the last movement.

Next came a performance of Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz" on a "wagon" borrowed from musical comedy, before a huge painted rectangle designed after kindergarten models, apparently, by John Holabird. Soloist was Colin O'More, the tenor, conductor was Richard Burgin, and the small orchestra used was togged out in white monkey jackets and black trousers, a la jazz.

Then Serge Prokofieff's "Orchestral Fairy Tale," allegedly for children, was conducted by Dr. Kousevitsy, with Richard Hale acting as narrator. This turned out to be a genuinely funny effort in which the orchestra, by an outrageous distortion of one Richard Wagner's leitmotif idea, commented hilariously on the text as read by Mr. Hale. It's called "Peter and the Wolf," and winds up with everybody happy but the wolf and a duck, which can be heard quacking in a perfectly Disney fashion inside the wolf.

After intermission Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the audience personally through the development of the waltz. He began with Johann Strauss' "Wiener Blut," and ended with Ravel's kalsomined and polychromed "La Valse."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 8 - 1939

May Have Popular Indiana Symphony

Sunday afternoon at the meeting sponsored by the Y. M. C. A. in the Auditorium, slips were passed out giving a list of lectures, motion pictures and musical attractions which might be heard here next season under "Y" sponsorship. The audience was asked to choose what they would like to hear and have until next Sunday to pass in their slips.

Mr. Lee, secretary f othe "Y," said yesterday the response was excellent and he expects that a large number of slips will be turned in next Sunday. Until then no tabulation will be made

Of interest to musical folk was the name of the Indianapolis orchestra, which is led by Fabien Svitzsky, said to be a nephew of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. If the Indianapolis players have an Eastern tour next season, Springfield may have the opportunity of hearing them. It will be their first appearance in the East if they tour next season.

CHILLICOTHE, O.
NEWS ADVERTISER

FEB 8 - 1939

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last Nov. 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2,000 for each of the six concerts.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 7 - 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE TODAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Rutgers Gymnasium tonight in the third presentation of the annual University Concert Series. The concert, featuring three of the best known symphonic works of favorite composers, will start at 8:30.

In his fifth appearance on the local series, Dr. Koussevitzky will render Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Opus 98. A capacity crowd of 3,500 persons is expected to hear the famed 120 piece orchestra.

CARLISLE, PA.
SENTINEL
FEB 9 - 1939

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last Nov. 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2,000 for each of the six concerts.

NEWS

Mi… 2/…/39

164

Festival Trustees Plan A Symphonic Academy

Trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, this week announced that plans are definitely under way for the establishment in 1940 of a "school or academy devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrument players." The school, which would hold sessions preceding the concerts, would be located at Tanglewood, scene of the annual festival.

Give Serious Thought

"The trustees of the Boston Symphonic Festival are giving serious thought to the development of the physical plant at Tanglewood in anticipation of the next momentous step in expansion, scheduled for 1940," the announcement said.

Bentley W. Warren, speaking for the trustees, said: "We all hope the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players. Tanglewood is the ideal location for such a center.

"This fortunate combination of circumstances will provide an excellent beginning for the realization of Dr. Koussevitzky's program. Indeed the greatest need will be for scholarships. No one can doubt that from some source the necessary funds wil be forthcoming; and it is expected that the detailed arrangements for the school will be completed so that its first session may precede the Berkshire Festival of 1940."

Announcement was also made that Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present six concerts at Tanglewood this summer, beginning Aug. 3. Other dates will be Aug. 5, 6, 10, 12 and 13.

Varied Program

Programs for the 1939 festival will be made up from the following works: Beethoven's Second and Fifth Symphonies, Brahms' First and Third Symphonies, Haydn's and Mozart's works, Tchaikowsky's Fourth, the Second and Fifth of Sibelius, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra," and others to be announced later.

Membership lists reveal that audiences of more than 2,000 are assured for each of the six concerts, and that 90 per cent of the boxes have been taken.

The announcement also stated the Trustees will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to needed improvements at Tanglewood, such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting, laying out roads, and possibly an emergency enclosure for the shed.

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
FEB 9 - 1939

MUSIC

Music Records Of the Month

The February list of new Victor Records, issued by the R. C. A. Victor Company, contains three big sets of orchestral records. Exceptionally good is the recording by the Boston Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, of a Haydn symphony in B-flat; a delightful symphony finely played all through, and specially well in its lovely slow movement. Leopold Stokowski, with the Philadelphia Orchestra has made a big recording of parts of "Tannhauser", covering nine sides. The first six sides are taken up by the Paris version of the Overture, running straight on into the Venusberg music; the playing is splendid in these and in the Prelude to Act three, which covers three sides, and is even more effective in this shape than it usually is in a performance of the opera. The third Masterpiece Set has a record of a very fine performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto by Menuhin, with Enesco conducting the orchestra.

A Montreal performance is among the shorter records of this month; a violin and piano record by Maurice Onderet and Edna Marie Hawkin. One side of this has a pleasant and tuneful Romance by the Montreal composer, Georges Emile Tanguay; the other has a transcription of Chopin's Waltz in D minor; the violin and piano fit well together in these and both playing and recording are very good. Two Mazurkas by Chopin are recorded as played by the veteran pianist, Moriz Rosenthal, whose strength and brilliant finger work seem as good as ever. Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet music has been recorded by the London Symphony Orchestra, under Bruno Walter, and two Jewish airs by the Boston Pops orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler.

A good record of Richard Crooks' singing, in arias by Mozart and Donizetti, was sung with an orchestra, conducted by Wilfrid Pelletier. Two songs by Chaliapin and two violin solos by Kreisler are in this month's list, which also contains piano-accordeon solos by Galla-Rini, and Vocadances by Maxine Sullivan.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 9 - 1939

Special Concert Is Presented By Boston Symphony

New York, Feb. 9 (AP). — Serge Koussevitzky, recovered from the illness which prevented his conducting the Boston symphony Tuesday in New Brunswick, N. J., presided last night over something appropriately called a "concert extraordinaire" in Carnegie hall.

The generally impeccable Boston symphony never has let its hair down with such abandon in all the 50-odd years it has been giving concerts in New York. What it turned out for the benefit of its own pension fund was something like a symphonic vaudeville show.

It began with a performance of Haydn's famous "Farewell" symphony, for which the orchestra was costumed in wigs and small clothes, and Dr. Koussevitzky was particularly elegant in a costume designed by Robert Edmond Jones from likenesses of Haydn himself. Dr. Koussevitzky resembles the composer, anyway.

The stage was lighted with elaborate candelabra and a hanging chandelier, and each music stand bore a lighted candle which the men blew out as they departed one by one in the last movement.

Next came a performance of Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz" on a "wagon" borrowed from musical comedy, before a huge painted rectangle designed after kindergarten models, apparently, by John Holabird. Soloist was Colin O'More, the tenor conductor was Richard Burgin, and the small orchestra used was togged out in white monkey jackets and black trousers, a la jazz.

Then Serge Prokofieff's "Orchestral Fairy Tale," allegedly for children, was conducted by Dr. Koussevitsky, with Richard Hale acting as narrator. This turned out to be a genuinely funny effort in which the orchestra, by an outrageous distortion of one Richard Wagner's Leitmotif idea, commented hilariously on the text as read by Mr. Hale. It's called "Peter and The Wolf", and winds up wih everybody happy but the wolf and a duck, which can be heard quacking in a perfect Disney fashion inside the wolf.

After intermission Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the audience personally through the development of the waltz. He began with Johann Strauss' "Wiener Blut," and ended with Ravel's kalsomined and polychromed "La Valse."

The audience was one of the most distinguished in years, and one of the most enthusiastic.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 9 - 1939

CARNEGIE HALL ROCKED WITH NOVEL CONCERT

Boston Symphony Lets Its Hair Down to Stage Most Extraordinary Musical Revel

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

New York, Feb. 9.—Serge Koussevitzky, recovered from the illness which prevented his conducting the Boston Symphony Tuesday in New Brunswick, N. J., presided last night over something appropriately called a "Concert Extraordinaire" in Carnegie Hall.

The generally impeccable Boston Symphony never has let its hair down with such abandon in all the 50-odd years it has been giving concerts in New York. What it turned out for the benefit of its own pension fund was something like a symphonic vaudeville show.

It began with a performance of Haydn's famous "Farewell" Symphony, for which the orchestra was costumed in wigs and small clothes, and Dr. Koussevitzky was particularly elegant in a costume designed by Robert Edmond Jones from likenesses of Haydn himself. Dr. Koussevitzky resembles the composer, anyway.

Candle Novelty

The stage was lighted with elaborate candelabra and a hanging chandelier, and each music stand bore lighted candle which the men blew out as they departed one by one in the last movement.

Next came a performance of Louis Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz" on a "wagon" borrowed from musical comedy, before a huge painted rectangle designed after kindergarten models, apparently, by John Holabird. Soloist was Colin O'More, the tenor, conductor was Richard Burgin, and the small orchestra used was togged out in white monkey jackets and black trousers, a la jazz.

Then Serge Prokofieff's "Orchestral Fairy Tale," allegedly for children, was conducted by Dr. Koussevitsky, with Richard Hale acting as narrator. This turned out to be a genuinely funny effort in which the orchestra, by an outrageous distortion of one Richard Wagner's Leitmotif idea, commented hilariously on the text as read by Mr. Hale. It's called "Peter and the Wolf," and winds up with everybody happy but the wolf and a duck, which can be heard quacking in a perfectly Disney fashion inside the wolf.

Distinguished Audience

After intermission Doctor Koussevitsky conducted the audience personally through the development of the waltz. He began with Johann Strauss's "Wiener Blut," and ended with Ravel's kalsomined and polychromed "La Valse."

The audience was one of the most distinguished in years, and one of the most enthusiastic.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 10 1939

* * *

Illness this week caused Dr Serge Koussevitzky to miss a concert for the first time in many moons. Scheduled to play with the Boston orchestra at Rutgers college, he had to stop at New York for treatment. Concertmaster Richard Burgin took over the baton, and performed in his usual acceptable manner.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
FEB 9 - 1939

'ROUND ABOUT TOWN

CONGRATULATIONS TO:

Miss Margaret T. Corwin, dean of New Jersey College for Women, who has just completed five years as head of the institution.

Richard Burgin of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for capable substitution for Serge Koussevitzky the other night.

Former Governor Harold G. Hoffman, on his 43rd birthday anniversary.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 10 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Plays Its Third Brooklyn Concert; Wagner's 'Ring' Opens With 'Rheingold' at the Met.

Having cut up in the most approved fashion at Carnegie Hall the night before, the Boston Symphony Orchestra regained its composure and pursued its accustomed ways at its third Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music last night. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted a program consisting of Mozart's Symphony in A, Saint-Saens' Concerto for Violoncello, No. 1, in A Minor, and the Tchaikowsky Fourth Symphony as though he had never made a stage appearance as Josef Haydn nor conducted a nursery tale about Peter and the big bad wolf. The Bostonian atmosphere was unruffled.

Jean Bedetti, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, was the soloist in the Saint-Saens, that pleasant piece of music that has instant appeal and little profundity, a delightful allegretto with the theme in the muted strings, and a finale written with true French polish. Mr. Bedetti's musicianship revealed itself in a highly satisfactory if not an especially brilliant performance. Securing admirable quality of tone in the more measured legato passages, he was pressed in matters of intonation and agility in the more rapid passages so that a thin tone contrasted considerably with the body of tone produced by the orchestra. There was more music in the solo part than was heard last night.

The Tchaikowsky had its inevitable appeal, especially in the unique third movement wherein the strings play Pizzacato. The performance opened effectively with a throbbing rhythym and a hushed entrance of the strings and progresed with clarity and precision. What became apparent as the movements succeeded one another was the restraint of the interpretation. There is more drama and fire in this music than was heard last night in spite of fine playing. A purist would have found considerable over which to cavil.

The performance of the evening was the symphony that Mozart wrote at the age of 18. This had at once the polish and the spirit, the sparkle and the intensity of the music. It was an achievement for both conductor and musicians.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 10 1939

MUSIC NOTES

Today's events: "La Bohème" (Smith College benefit), 2 P. M., and "Thais," 8:30 P. M., Metropolitan Opera House; Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45; Anne Mundy, piano, Town Hall, 8:30; Perole String Quartet, New School for Social Research, 8:30; Beniamino Gigli, tenor, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 14 1939

STRAVINSKY CANCELS TRIP

Abandons Journey to U. S. Because of Death of Daughter.

The recent death of a daughter of Igor Stravinsky has made it impossible for him to come to this country next month to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced last night. Mr. Stravinsky does not feel that he can leave his wife at this time.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 10 1939

Many Are Hosts At Concert

Symphony Orchestra Gives Third Program At Academy of Music

For the third time this season the opera house of the Academy of Music was filled to capacity for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The program included Saint-Saens' Concerto in A minor for violin cellon and orchestra in which Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was presented as the soloist; Mozart's Symphony in A major and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor, opus 36.

Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven, occupying Mrs. Dean C. Osborne's box during the latter's absence from the city had as her guests Mr. and Mrs. Floyd S. Neely, the Misses Edith and Eleanor Gertrude Hannam, Howard Carlson and Dr. Eilif Hanssen.

Mrs. David C. Johnson in her box entertained Supreme Court Justice John B. Johnston, Mrs. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Pendleton, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush, and Mr. Johnson. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson entertained at dinner at their home for their box guests and Mr. and Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow before the concert.

Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle and Mrs. Theodore Vosseler were hostesses in the Woman's Club box. The guests were Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, president of the club; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, former president; Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Frederick M. Davidson, Mrs. Jason Davis and Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince's box guests were Mr. and Mrs. Karp P. Mikhalenkoff, Mrs. W. Sterns Cooney, Mr. and Mrs. William FitzHugh, Jr., and Parker Fillmore. Miss Jessie Ogg was hostess in the Adelphi box to Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Parker and Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Voorhees.

Members of the Intercity High School orchestra occupied another box and the Rev. Lawrence Bracken, conductor of the Diocesan Choir occupied the box of Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr.

Mrs. Margaret Ager Wales was the guest of Robert Alfred Shaw, chairman of the governing committee of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences under whose auspices the Boston Symphony is presenting the Brooklyn series. Joint sponsors with the Brooklyn Institute are the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. James G. McDonald is president of Brooklyn Institute.

JOLIET, ILL.
HERALD - NEWS
FEB 10 1939

SENTENCE EDITORIALS.

"Music is not a matter of the length of time it takes to play but rather of its thoroness of expression."

—Sergei Koussevitzky

165

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 10 1939

THIRD CONCERT HERE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Koussevitsky Conducts Orchestra in Series at the Academy of Music

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Sergei Koussevitzky gave its third concert of its Brooklyn series last night at the Academy of Music and as might have been anticipated, gave it splendidly. A capacity audience listened most attentively and quite apparently enjoyed the music. Certainly the applause was long and spontaneous.

Last night's was the third in another series; the third in three nights in the Boston Symphony's trip to our Metropolitan area. Yet it was the only one of the three that held no surprise. The first night, Tuesday, at Rutgers in New Brunswick, found Dr. Koussevitzky too ill to conduct. Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall, the orchestra were dressed in Eighteenth Century knee breeches, ruffs and wigs and had candles on their music desks for the playing of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, and in the next number were dressed as jazz band players. Last night was strictly normal; it provided a well-chosen and well-directed program of unexceptionable music.

One might have wished for a repetition of the eighteenth century setting for the first work, Mozart's Symphony in A Major, written for strings, two oboes and two horns. The symphony, composed when Mozart was only 17, is almost chamber music. It is strictly melodic, simple and refreshing. The perfect string harmony could hardly have been surpassed by a string trio of long-continued association. At times gentle, at others lively, the symphony was always poetic and beautiful.

The second work was a double triumph for the Boston Symphony, as its first 'cellist, Jean Bedetti, was soloist in the Saint-Saens Concerto for Violincello in A Minor. Mr. Bedetti, who first played the Concerto as soloist with the Boston Orchestra in 1920, was complete master of the difficult music. Particularly in the opening minor movement and in the closing triumphant bravura, h was all of a great cellist.

The program closed with Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, a most satisfying complement to the other half of the program, with its varying moods, its melody interspersed with sonority, its opening and closing with the deep brasses of Fate, its sustained periods of combined horns and pizzicato strings. Tchaikowsky made the Symphony far too stirring, for us to keep in mind his message of the inevitablity of Fate, but in so doing he composed a work of great force and beauty, one which Koussevitzky and his men can do with supreme effect.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 10 1939

Third Boston Symphony Concert Attracts Capacity Audience; Many Attend with Guests

The season's third Boston Symphony Concert last evening attracted a capacity audience to the Brooklyn Academy of Music, many of the subscribers attending with guests.

Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven was hostess in the box of Mrs. Dean C. Osborne. Her guests were Mr. and Mrs. Floyd S. Neely, the Misses Edith and Eleanor Gertrude Hanam, Howard Carlson and Dr. Eilif Hanssen.

Mrs. David C. Johnson entertained in another box for Appellate Justice John B. Johnston and Mrs. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Pendleton and Mr. and Mrs. William W. Brush.

Miss Jessie Ogg was hostess in the Adelphi Alumnae box. With her were Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Voorhees, Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart and Mrs. William P. Parker.

Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle and Mrs. Theodore Vosseler were hostesses in the Brooklyn Woman's Club box. Guests were Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, president; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Frederick M. Davidson, Mrs. Jason Davis and Mrs. William Briggs Zimmer.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince was hostess in her box. In her party were Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mrs. W. Sterns Cooney, Mr. and Mrs. William Fitzhugh Jr., and Parker Filmore.

Robert Alfred Shaw entertained Mrs. Margaret Ager Wales.

In another box the guests were members of the Inter-City Orchestra of the public schools.

The concerts are presented here under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Huntington Woodman is president and the Brooklyn Committee, headed by Adrian Van Sinderen, with Mrs. Henry J. Davenport as chairman.

A review of the concert will be found in another section of this edition of "The Brooklyn Citizen." The orchestra will be heard here again on the evening of Friday, March 10.

Concert Narrator

B. Globe - Feb. 10/39

RICHARD HALE

Who will be heard in the spoken part of the Narrator in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" at the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall tonight and tomorrow afternoon.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS

FEB 10 1939

MAINLY ABOUT MANHATTAN

By JOHN CHAPMAN.

A rare musical pleasure was Wednesday's pension fund concert by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie. In costumes of the period the men made Haydn's "Farewell" symphony a beautiful, stirring thing—and then they cut loose with two fine pranks—Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz" and Prokoffieff's children's tale, "Peter and the Wolf." The latter struck me as being a modern, long version of the old McNaughton record, "The Three Trees"—you know: the one about the rabbit and the beautiful bubbling spring and the three trees, there, there and there.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

FEB 11 1939

The New Recordings

At the first public concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 22, 1881, under the direction of George Henschel, the major work on the program was Haydn's Symphony No. 102, in B flat major This month Victor releases this same symphony, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The symphony is issued in a three-pocket Masterpiece album, M-529.

This symphony is the 102nd of the 104 symphonies which most recent musical research has accepted as authentic by this one composer Symphonies before Haydn were simply orchestral compositions. Haydn developed the form which Beethoven later further developed. The Austrian princes retained orchestras and kappelmeisters. Haydn served under four of these princes, and was continually composing symphonies for performance at court.

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

FEB 11 1939

VERMONT SYMPHONY FEB. 16

Will Play At City Hall, Montpelier, With Zlatko Balokovic, Violin-Soloist.

The Vermont Symphony orchestra association has just announced that there will be a concert by the Vermont Symphony orchestra in the City hall auditorium in Montpelier Thursday evening, Feb. 16. This will be the first time that the orchestra will have given a public performance in the Montpelier-Barre district, it having played a private performance at Norwich university last October. The association which sponsors the orchestra, and the Little Symphony of Washington county under the leadership of Mrs. Francis Bailey, has been anxious for sometime to present the Vermont Symphony to the Montpelier district and add it to its list of Vermont towns where the orchestra will appear at regular intervals during each season.

Zlatko Balokovic.

The orchestra has already played in Burlington, Middlebury, Rutland, Manchester, Bennington, Brattleboro, Woodstock and Northfield. It gives a regular subscription series each season of three concerts in Burlington and Rutland and hopes it will be possible to do likewise in the Barre-Montpelier district.

Zlatko Balokovic, internationally famous Yugoslav violin virtuoso will be the guest soloist at this perform ance. Mr. Balokovic will also appear with the orchestra in Burlington Wednesday the 15th and Rutland the 17th. He next plays with the Boston Symphony on March 3 and 4.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

FEB 11 1939

For its pension fund appearance in Carnegie Hall last Wednesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, dressed in appropriate costumes of Haydn's period. The opening number was that composer's "Farewell" Symphony. This was followed by Louis Gruenberg's setting of Vachel Lindsay's "The Daniel Jazz" and the first New York hearing of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." After the intermission a sort of musical survey of the waltz from its Viennese to its Parisian manifestations was offered—specifically, Lanner's "Schoenbrunner," Strauss' "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring," Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Ravel's "La Valse."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger

FEB 11 1939

The Critic Talks to MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

THERE appears to be more than a remote possibility that there will be no concerts at Robin Hood Dell this Summer, at least by the members of the Philadelphia Orchestra, who have been playing there each Summer since the Dell was opened. Or, if there are concerts by these musicians, arrangements different from those which have prevailed for the last eight seasons must be made. While the idea of a Summer without the Dell concerts performed by members of the Philadelphia Orchestra is exceedingly unpalatable to the music lovers of the city, it is equally true that the men have much of justice and right on their side. The advantages of such a season are so apparent that it is scarcely necessary to recall them.

In the first place, it gives music lovers the opportunity to hear the famous organization, of which a very large majority of the men who play during the Summer season are members, at a greatly reduced admission fee than is possible during the regular Winter symphony season. The same thing applies as to hearing the many famous artists who appear at these concerts and the distinguished conductors who lead them. Equally important is the fact that the Dell concerts give opportunity t competent and rising young conductors which they would not otherwise enjoy, this applying to certain members of the Dell orchestra as well as to youthful leaders from outside the city, in addition to which is the chance given to a large number of the younger soloists who, for one reason or another, cannot be heard with an orchestra during the Winter season.

* * *

THE ORCHESTRAL Committee for the Robin Hood Dell concerts a few days ago issued a formal statement to the effect that it had been instructed by the men of the Orchestra who regularly perform at these concerts to announce that the Dell concerts will be abandoned if it is necessary for them to consider another co-operative season. For eight years, the statement continues, the men of the Orchestra have operated the Dell themselves, employing a manager and sharing equally in the net receipts. During this time there has been no fixed salary guaranteed, nor has there been any fund-raising mechanism to assist them. Therefore, they have unanimously agreed not to hazard another season on this basis and they will give up the concerts unless some different arrangement can be devised.

It is admitted that last Summer's events were given during a spell of the worst weather that the Dell has ever experienced, the number of postponements and cancellations made necessary for this reason reaching at least 50 per cent more than might normally be expected, judging from past seasons both here and at the New York Stadium. This has been shown over a period of many years to average one postponement or cancellation per week, or eight for a season of eight weeks, whereas last Summer there were fourteen, several of them coming on consecutive evenings. While this might not occur again for many years, still it is possible for it to happen again next Summer, for there is nothing so unpredictable as the weather during June, July and August.

* * *

HOWEVER, this is not the main point, which is that the men of the Orchestra feel strongly that the complicated task of operating a musical season which embraces opera and ballets, as well as soloists and regular concerts, all of the highest standard, cannot rightly be borne by the musicians, who must perform in the Summer season in a manner which will reflect credit upon them and upon their Winter orchestra. Contrary to the situation in most other large cities which maintain Summer orchestral concerts, the men of the local Orchestra have had for eight years to worry along as best they could, without the support of any organized group of citizens behind them, and they feel that, in justice to themselves and to the reputation of the Orchestra, that they cannot do so for another season.

The situation in other cities is reviewed in the statement sent out by the committee. Thus at the Stadium concerts in New York the salaries of the men are underwritten by a group of philanthropic citizens; in Boston the Summer "pop" concerts, which have been in existence for many years, are operated officially by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; at Ravinia Park, in Chicago, a citizens' committee formed for that purpose raises money annually for the season; in Hollywood again, the Bowl concerts are operated by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Society. And so, the statement points out, across the whole country except in Philadelphia the Summer season is operated either by the official orchestra organizations or by committees which undertake the financial part of the project.

* * *

THE MEMBERS of the Orchestra have no proposal to make, the statement continues, except that they are ready and willing to present a season of Summer concerts which will match in artistry and in attractiveness the similar concerts of any orchestra in the world. But they feel that the planning and the guaranteeing of such a series is not rightfully the province of the performers and that this phase of the plan should be undertaken by those more experienced in such matters, leaving the musicians free to concentrate upon the excellence of the performances. Therefore, unless Philadelphians in some manner can find a way of planning and guaranteeing such a season, the members of the Orchestra who would normally play at the Dell will seek work in other cities during the Summer.

It is unthinkable that Philadelphia will allow the Dell concerts to be abandoned even for a single season, and it will be a tremendous blow to the musical prestige of the city should this happen. The sum to be guaranteed would not be very large and it could easily be computed upon the basis of ticket sales for the last several seasons and the cost of giving the concerts for these seasons. The committee of the Robin Hood Dell Concerts stands ready and willing to meet and cooperate with any one who will assist in planning a guaranteed season of Summer concerts and the only thing to do is to organize a group which will do this work. But some one will have to start it, and the question is, who will do it? It is only reasonable to anticipate a generous public response.

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

FEB 11 1939

Burgin Leads Boston Symphony At Hour's Notice

On last Tuesday evening the 10 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were assembled on the improvised stage and the Rutgers gymnasium was crowded beyond its seating capacity for 3000 when Dr Howard D. McKinney, director of music at Rutgers University, announced that Serge Koussevitsky had been taken suddenly ill and could not conduct his men. Richard Burgin, who has been this noted orchestra's concert-master for 20 years, stepped onto the podium and opened the Haydn B-flat symphony with persuasive hands and baton.

The orchestra, used to rehearsing with Mr. Burgin, gave him of their best in the way of support and the audience responded enthusiastically to the excellent reading given all four movements of both the Haydn and the Brahms symphonies. In the latter, the E minor, No. 4, Mr. Burgin's leadership became authoritative, throughout the robust syncopation of the first movement; the reassuring, throbbing pulse of the melodiously flowing "Andante"; the rousing, jocular "Allegro"; and the vigorous, choir-like finale.

The exotic offering of the evening's program was the set of three symphonic sketches named by the composer, Claude Debussy, "The Sea", in which the orchestra set-up for the Haydn number was augmented by extra wood-winds (especially bassoons), two harps, and all those hybrid instruments which Debussy loved to employ, including, the tam-tam and glockenspiel.

The elusive and extremely difficult Debussian score defies exact analysis, but the audience, given the subtitles "From Dawn to Noontide on the Sea", "Play of the Waves", and "Dialogue Between Wind and Sea", as clues, was lured by the understanding interpretation given Tuesday evening by an orchestra so largely composed of Debussy's fellow-countrymen, to a mood of mystic, emotional enjoyment.

MERCURY

FEB 11 1939

A "concert extraordinaire," and verily it was that, was given last night in Carnegie Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, writes Olin Downes in the New York Times. The stage was concealed by gray curtains when the audience gathered. The curtains parted to reveal a group of players assembled in the orchestral numbers of Mozart's day, clad in 18th Century costumes, and Dr. Koussevitzky himself in the character of Haydn conducting the "Farewell" symphony.

It was a "spectacle extraordinaire," and in nothing more so than the manner in which the clothes made the men, i. e., the manner in which wigs, frills, frocked coats and knee-breeches seemed to change every familiar feature of every player and transform them into perfectly plausible 18th Century figures. The effect was enhanced by the candles which lighted each music desk, by the brilliant chandelier suspended from the ceiling and by two classic columns on each side of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky himself, Haydn redivivus, conducted part of the time on his feet, or sat at the harpsichord, directing the performance in the old style manner.

The performance perpetuated Haydn's famous joke, or gesture, made for whatever purpose, when he composed this symphony and had it performed at the Esterhazy court. During the last movement, of which the music is cast in a gallant and sentimental vein of farewell, the players, one by one and two by two, rose silently, puffed out the candles which illuminated the music, and left the stage. Thus the famous symphony ends with two violins playing the last echoing strains. These, in turn, depart. The stage darkens. The conductor, slowly and with a dignity somewhat melancholy, himself bends over, blows out his candle, and the scene fades.

Some recalled the time when Leopold Stokowsky used this symphony as an object lesson to his patrons in Philadelphia, when he had the players not only leave early, but arrive, singly and in pairs, late, like some symphony audiences that Mr. Stokowsky could have mentioned. But the mood and suggestions last night were quite otherwise—not satirical, but really poetic.

The next time the curtains parted the scene and the costume had changed. Members of the orchestra appeared attired as jazz players. A crude cartoon of a saint and two menacing lions was the background for Colin O'More's capital singing of Louis Gruenberg's "Daniel in the Lions' Den," scored for solor tenor and chamber orchestra. It is a most ingenious and spirited affair, partly satirical, humorous, in places wildly dramatic, with the extravagant orchestral community which suggests the roaring of the animals, the swishing of tails, perhaps, let us say the protruding eyes and the fantastic jargon of the Narrator, and his part speech and part songs, and outcries and ululations.

Like everything else done during the evening, it was a most brilliant and finished performance, when singers and instrumentalists were as one, under the baton of Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and the orchestra part a remarkable modern consummation of jazz idioms.

Perhaps the best fooling of the evening and one of the most amusing and inventive scores that witty composer, Serge Prokofieff, has written, was "Peter and the Wolf," for Narrator who speaks and for small orchestra. This was first performed in Moscow in 1936 at a Children's Concert of the Moscow Philharmonic, and was given its first American performance last March 25 in Boston, the composer conducting, and was heard last night for the first time in New York. It is an animal story, wherein the different instruments represent the different animals and Peter and Grandfather. The bird, for purposes of aural identification, is a flute, the duck an oboe, the cat a clarinet, Grandfather, the ridiculous bassoon, Peter, the string quartet, and the big bad wolf, three horns—yes, and drums and percussion for the shooting of the hunters.

Very admirable was Mr. Richard Hale, the narrator, as he read the lines and the orchestra laughably underscored the story. This is real musical humor, in the jaunty motive of the dauntless Peter, the merry ditty of the creeping cat, the wolfish roar of the horns and the raucous bassoon wit limps along and complains with grandfather's voice as he falls in with the triumphant procession which conveys the wolf to the menagerie.

Sometimes Prokofieff exhausts satirical vein, but this has the savor of folk-music, and is very charming. To end this program, so entertaining in its every detail, perhaps only one thing would have been suitable. It consists of a group of waltzes, two by Johann Strauss; one the little masterpiece, "Valse triste," by Sibelius, and finally the brilliant and one had almost said synical "La valse" by Ravel, a composition in the performance of which the Boston Symphony is preeminent.

This event would have served to demonstrate, if such proof were needed at this time, Dr. Koussevitzky's exceptional gifts as at program maker, as also to his sovereign talent for stage spectacle. Broadway, for this, would willingly bestow upon him its proudest title, that of expert "show-man." It was an evening wholly out of the rut of orchestral routine, one devoted to distinguished entertainment that never flagged or palled, that was invariably in perfect taste, and a triumphant demonstrations of what a man of genius can do when he chooses to devote himself purely to entertainment.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
POST

FEB 11 1939

Greater Latitude in Symphonic Music Programs, Plea of Reviewer

Happy Medium Between Old and New Is Suggested

BY EDWYN E. PFISTER
Milwaukee Evening Post Music Editor

Upon the shoulders of the symphony orchestra conductor rests the weight of supreme responsibility. His duty it is to impart Music's message. His task to interpret in terms of tone the feverish emotions of mankind. Does he do it? Sometimes . . . and too seldom!

We pride ourselves on having the best symphony orchestras in the world. We can equally be proud of having developed some of the world's greatest conductors. But what these orchestras and conductors are doing for us is of gravest concern. Indeed, we should rise up in our wrath and proclaim emancipation's day.

How many times have you sat through a program of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms? And another time, it was Brahms, Bach and Beethoven. And still another time, the program included all three? Precisely. And on rare occasions Mozart, Haydn or Wagner would be included for the sake of variety.

Variety Is Lacking

Bearing in mind that directors have been programming this same stuff for several generations, does it not become apparent that such programs are mere reviews? Must we, and our children, and our children's children, never hear anything but sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth century compositions? Now you are getting my point.

If our literary indulgence was confined to the Bible, Shakespeare, and Milton, we might be commended for our excellent taste. And so with Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. But we are not so narrow and limited in our choice of books. We delight in Pearl Buck, Fannie Hurst, Lloyd Douglas, and many others. We are a people of inveterate readers. We seek out new doctrines, new principles, and new departures in every field of human thought and endeavor. We honestly weigh and accept or reject with wilful freedom of thought. But in music! We stoically accept what the orchestra plays, occupying ourselves with the occasion's social import. Or we stay at home. Either reaction is serious.

I enjoy my Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. I enjoy my Bible, Shakespeare and Milton. But, even as you, I simply must have my moments with the contemporary authors. And by the same token, you and I should demand an equal amount of familiarity with contemporary composers.

Yes, There Are a Few

Thank heavens we have a few conductors who regularly play contemporary music! Pierre Monteux, director of the San Francisco orchestra, stated recently that "it is the prime duty of every conductor to offer one American composition, one completely new work, several novelties and revivals, in addition to a classic masterpiece, on every program!" Our hats are off to Monteux and his kind!

Local patrons agree that the Chicago orchestra's concerts are more enjoyable this year. And it is a laudable fact that Dr. Frederick Stock is choosing better program material this season. Much of the music is familiar and much of it is not. But Doctor Stock has still farther to go in his selections. Why not give us Mahler's "Song of the Earth" as was recently given in Chicago? And there are many others which Chicago hears, but we do not. To be sure, read that city's critics!

Stock's predecessor, Theodore Thomas, had a reputation for playing new, unusual and novel music. During his tenure, biographers claim that Thomas was a "radical modernist [illegible] inclined toward currently written works." Now what do you think of that?

Should Choose Happy Medium

Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston orchestra, Eugene Goossens of the Cincinnati orchestra, Fabian Sevitsky of the Indianapolis orchestra, and many others, have swung to the opposite pole. Many of their patrons claim that these directors play too much recent music and not sufficient of the old masters! Such allegations are unbelievable, but creditable if true.

If we can attend symphony concerts with the feeling that we are sharing in the pioneering of new, contemporary, and AMERICAN music—in addition to our renewed acquaintance with that of classical and romantic eras— much of our frequent boredom and animosity will be erased in favor of reborn interest. A little of Deems Taylor, Gershwin, and even Ferde Grofe would not be beneath the honest dignity of a symphony orchestra, not to mention, of course, the modern works of those composers who write purely symphonic material.

Do you agree with me? If you do, join the chorus and raise your voice so that it can be heard at heaven's portals.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

FEB 11 1939

* * *

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has announced that Serge Koussevitzky will choose the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in next summer's festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from a list including Beethoven's second and third symphonies, Brahms's first and third symphonies, Sibelius's second and fifth symphonies, Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, various symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Walter Piston's concerto for orchestra and excerpts from Wagner's operas. The six festival concerts will be held on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, August 3, 5, 6, 10 12 and 13.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

FEB 11 1939

Philadelphia Symphony In Concert At Springfield

There's nothing like a symphony orchestra, and there's nothing like Beethoven; therefore you can't beat a symphony orchestra playing Beethoven. At any rate that's the conclusion many people came to after they had heard the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra play Beethoven's Seventh symphony at the municipal auditorium in Springfield last night.

The concert was the last in a series of four Community concerts sponsored annually by the Springfield Junior league. In spite of dangerous conditions, a full audience attended, and the Holyoke subscribers faithfully arrived by the dozen, to be rewarded by a concert which climaxed one of the best series that has been arranged for several years.

The program for next year was announced during an intermission in the concert by Atty. Raymond T. King. Explaining that the choice was made with reference to the votes of the subscribers, and that a great demand for vocal recitals had been expressed, Mr. King announced the four concerts as follows: Simon Barer, pianist; Lawrence Tibbett, baritone; the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky; and a quartet of four young singers from the Metropolitan Opera company, Josephine Antoine, Helen Olheim, John Brownlee and Charles Kullman.

For the concert last night Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony, chose a program consisting entirely of works by Beethoven and Wagner, and thus gave his audience food for unlimited discussion on the way home as to which master is more wonderful.

The Egmont overture with which the concert opened was a fitting introduction to the rest of the program. This delineative work of Beethoven's is not often heard in concerts, and it serves as a reminder that a work of short scope can still contain his majesty.

It is probably unmusical to pick a symphony apart, but the vivace of the first movement, and the second movement of the seventh symphony afford such delight in themselves regardless of what has gone before or what will come after, that they remain the most memorable parts of the work. In this symphony Beethoven has chosen some of the loveliest melodies that can be heard, some prolonged to a Brahms-like extent. Although those who revel in the brilliance of the fifth symphony will never give the seventh first place, its romantic qualities ensure its popularity.

The second half of the program, devoted to Wagner, opened with the prelude and "Liebestod' of "Tristan." This well-loved music was played with an understanding which would please any "Tristan" addict, and the two works which followed, "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the prelude to the third act, dance of the apprentices, the entrance of the masters from "Die Meistersinger" were just as satisfying.

Perfection cannot be described, and when these great orchestras play for us it seems as if there were no satisfactory way in which the music could be presented other than as it has just been heard. Aside from its skill, however, the Philadelphia orchestra has distinction in the style of Ormandy's conducting. He has a finesse of manner and of gesture which surely must be transmitted to his music.

For an encore, Mr. Ormandy presented Charles O'Connell, formerly of Springfield, who has conducted the Philadelphia symphony in the past, and whom Ormandy met by chance in a Springfield hotel before the concert last night. Mr. O'Connell led the orchestra in Debussey's "Clair de Lune" and in the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin', by Wagner. Mr. O'Conneli showed that the range of his conducting was equal to both the delicacy of the first piece. and to the climactic richness of the second.

DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

FEB 12 1939

Lines-o'-News

"Papa Haydn" is about to be interpreted by Serge Koussevitsky. At least the eminent doctor of music will be attired in a knee breeches costume and thereupon conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a special program in Carnegie hall. It is to be a benefit for the Boston Symphony pension fund; and I will give the details in my next letter.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 11 1939

Records: Dr. Koussevitzky And Gieseking

By C. E. L.

The symphony which opened the present Bushnell season was one of some historic interest for it happened that the Boston Symphony was playing a work which was on the first program ever performed by that honorable body on Oct. 22, 1881, under the baton of George Henschel. This 102nd symphony of Haydn in B flat has now been preserved by Victor (Musical Masterpiece Series M-529) with the Bostonians under Serge Koussevitzky.

From last October's concert will be remembered the maturity and prophetic breadth of this Haydn. The themes of the first movement, excepting perhaps the main subject, are Beethovian in character and their development is truly so. The slow movement is also forward looking and taken as a whole the symphony savors of the nineteenth century rather than the eighteenth, certainly the work of a man of Europe rather than of the provincial kapellmeister of Eisenstadt.

The disks are faultlessly made with the dynamic scale permitting an acute and brilliant impression. The menuetto has a heavy tread but it will be remembered that such was Koussevitzky's way with this movement at his Bushnell concert.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 11 1939

◆◆◆

The sixth annual Berkshire symphonic festival will be held in August at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass. Concerts are scheduled in the Music Shed, which was dedicated last summer, series A on Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and series B on Aug. 10, 12 and 13. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra and Miss Robinson Smith, president of the board of trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, has announced that membership in the association has considerably increased. The festival is one of the major musical events in this country.

MERCURY

FEB 11 1939

A "concert extraordinaire," and verily it was that, was given last night in Carnegie Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, writes Olin Downes in the New York Times. The stage was concealed by gray curtains when the audience gathered. The curtains parted to reveal a group of players assembled in the orchestral numbers of Mozart's day, clad in 18th Century costumes, and Dr. Koussevitzky himself in the character of Haydn conducting the "Farewell" symphony.

It was a "spectacle extraordinaire," and in nothing more so than the manner in which the clothes made the men, i. e., the manner in which wigs, frills, frocked coats and knee-breeches seemed to change every familiar feature of every player and transform them into perfectly plausible 18th Century figures. The effect was enhanced by the candles which lighted each music desk, by the brilliant chandelier suspended from the ceiling and by two classic columns on each side of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky himself, Haydn redivivus, conducted part of the time on his feet, or sat at the harpsichord, directing the performance in the old style manner.

The performance perpetuated Haydn's famous joke, or gesture, made for whatever purpose, when he composed this symphony and had it performed at the Esterhazy court. During the last movement, of which the music is cast in a gallant and sentimental vein of farewell, the players, one by one and two by two, rose silently, puffed out the candles which illuminated the music, and left the stage. Thus the famous symphony ends with two violins playing the last echoing strains. These, in turn, depart. The stage darkens. The conductor, slowly and with a dignity somewhat melancholy, himself bends over, blows out his candle, and the scene fades.

Some recalled the time when Leopold Stokowsky used this symphony as an object lesson to his patrons in Philadelphia, when he had the players not only leave early, but arrive, singly and in pairs, late, like some symphony audiences that Mr. Stokowsky could have mentioned. But the mood and suggestions last night were quite otherwise—not satirical, but really poetic.

The next time the curtains parted the scene and the costume had changed. Members of the orchestra appeared attired as jazz players. A crude cartoon of a saint and two menacing lions was the background for Colin O'More's capital singing of Louis Gruenberg's "Daniel in the Lions' Den," scored for solor tenor and chamber orchestra. It is a most ingenious and spirited affair, partly satirical, humorous, in places wildly dramatic, with the extravagant orchestral community which suggests the roaring of the animals, the swishing of tails, perhaps, let us say the protruding eyes and the fantastic jargon of the Narrator, and his part speech and part songs, and outcries and ululations.

Like everything else done during the evening, it was a most brilliant and finished performance, when singers and instrumentalists were as one, under the baton of Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and the orchestra part a remarkable modern consummation of jazz idioms.

Perhaps the best fooling of the evening and one of the most amusing and inventive scores that witty composer, Serge Prokofieff, has written, was "Peter and the Wolf," for Narrator who speaks and for small orchestra. This was first performed in Moscow in 1936 at a Children's Concert of the Moscow Philharmonic, and was given its first American performance last March 25 in Boston, the composer conducting, and was heard last night for the first time in New York. It is an animal story, wherein the different instruments represent the different animals and Peter and Grandfather. The bird, for purposes of aural identification, is a flute, the duck an oboe, the cat a clarinet, Grandfather, the ridiculous bassoon, Peter, the string quartet, and the big bad wolf, three horns—yes, and drums and percussion for the shooting of the hunters.

Very admirable was Mr. Richard Hale, the narrator, as he read the lines and the orchestra laughably underscored the story. This is real musical humor, in the jaunty motive of the dauntless Peter, the merry ditty of the creeping cat, the wolfish roar of the horns and the raucous bassoon wit limps along and complains with grandfather's voice as he falls in with the triumphant procession which conveys the wolf to the menagerie.

Sometimes Prokofieff exhausts satirical vein, but this has the savor of folk-music, and is very charming. To end this program, so entertaining in its every detail, perhaps only one thing would have been suitable. It consists of a group of waltzes, two by Johann Strauss; one the little masterpiece, "Valse triste," by Sibelius, and finally the brilliant and one had almost said synical "La valse" by Ravel, a composition in the performance of which the Boston Symphony is preeminent.

This event would have served to demonstrate, if such proof were needed at this time, Dr. Koussevitzky's exceptional gifts as at program maker, as also to his sovereign talent for stage spectacle. Broadway, for this, would willingly bestow upon him its proudest title, that of expert "show-man." It was an evening wholly out of the rut of orchestral routine, one devoted to distinguished entertainment that never flagged or palled, that was invariably in perfect taste, and a triumphant demonstrations of what a man of genius can do when he chooses to devote himself purely to entertainment.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
POST

FEB 11 1939

Greater Latitude in Symphonic Music Programs, Plea of Reviewer

Happy Medium Between Old and New Is Suggested

BY EDWYN E. PFISTER
Milwaukee Evening Post Music Editor

Upon the shoulders of the symphony orchestra conductor rests the weight of supreme responsibility. His duty it is to impart Music's message. His task to interpret in terms of tone the feverish emotions of mankind. Does he do it? Sometimes . . . and too seldom!

We pride ourselves on having the best symphony orchestras in the world. We can equally be proud of having developed some of the world's greatest conductors. But what these orchestras and conductors are doing for us is of gravest concern. Indeed, we should rise up in our wrath and proclaim emancipation's day.

How many times have you sat through a program of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms? And another time, it was Brahms, Bach and Beethoven. And still another time, the program included all three? Precisely. And on rare occasions Mozart, Haydn or Wagner would be included for the sake of variety.

Variety Is Lacking

Bearing in mind that directors have been programming this same stuff for several generations, does it not become apparent that such programs are mere reviews? Must we, and our children, and our children's children, never hear anything but sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth century compositions? Now you are getting my point.

If our literary indulgence was confined to the Bible, Shakespeare, and Milton, we might be commended for our excellent taste. And so with Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. But we are not so narrow and limited in our choice of books. We delight in Pearl Buck, Fannie Hurst, Lloyd Douglas, and many others. We are a people of inveterate readers. We seek out new doctrines, new principles, and new departures in every field of human thought and endeavor. We honestly weigh and accept or reject with wilful freedom of thought. But in music! We stoically accept what the orchestra plays, occupying ourselves with the occasion's social import. Or we stay at home. Either reaction is serious.

I enjoy my Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. I enjoy my Bible, Shakespeare and Milton. But, even as you, I simply must have my moments with the contemporary authors. And by the same token, you and I should demand an equal amount of familiarity with contemporary composers.

Yes, There Are a Few

Thank heavens we have a few conductors who regularly play contemporary music! Pierre Monteux, director of the San Francisco orchestra, stated recently that "it is the prime duty of every conductor to offer one American composition, one completely new work, several novelties and revivals, in addition to a classic masterpiece, on every program!" Our hats are off to Monteux and his kind!

Local patrons agree that the Chicago orchestra's concerts are more enjoyable this year. And it is a laudable fact that Dr. Frederick Stock is choosing better program material this season. Much of the music is familiar and much of it is not. But Doctor Stock has still farther to go in his selections. Why not give us Mahler's "Song of the Earth" as was recently given in Chicago? And there are many others which Chicago hears, but we do not. To be sure, read that city's critics!

Stock's predecessor, Theodore Thomas, had a reputation for playing new, unusual and novel music. During his tenure, biographers claim that Thomas was a "radical modernist . . . inclined toward currently written works." Now what do you think of that?

Should Choose Happy Medium

Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston orchestra, Eugene Goossens of the Cincinnati orchestra, Fabian Sevitsky of the Indianapolis orchestra, and many others, have swung to the opposite pole. Many of their patrons claim that these directors play too much recent music and not sufficient of the old masters! Such allegations are unbelievable, but creditable if true.

If we can attend symphony concerts with the feeling that we are sharing in the pioneering of new, contemporary, and AMERICAN music—in addition to our renewed acquaintance with that of classical and romantic eras— much of our frequent boredom and animosity will be erased in favor of reborn interest. A little of Deems Taylor, Gershwin, and even Ferde Grofe would not be beneath the honest dignity of a symphony orchestra, not to mention, of course, the modern works of those composers who write purely symphonic material.

Do you agree with me? If you do, join the chorus and raise your voice so that it can be heard at heaven's portals.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

FEB 11 1939

* * *

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has announced that Serge Koussevitzky will choose the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in next summer's festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from a list including Beethoven's second and third symphonies, Brahms's first and third symphonies, Sibelius's second and fifth symphonies, Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, various symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Walter Piston's concerto for orchestra and excerpts from Wagner's operas. The six festival concerts will be held on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, August 3, 5, 6, 10 12 and 13.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

FEB 11 1939

Philadelphia Symphony In Concert At Springfield

There's nothing like a symphony orchestra, and there's nothing like Beethoven; therefore you can't beat a symphony orchestra playing Beethoven. At any rate that's the conclusion many people came to after they had heard the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra play Beethoven's Seventh symphony at the municipal auditorium in Springfield last night.

The concert was the last in a series of four Community concerts sponsored annually by the Springfield Junior league. In spite of dangerous conditions, a full audience attended, and the Holyoke subscribers faithfully arrived by the dozen, to be rewarded by a concert which climaxed one of the best series that has been arranged for several years.

The program for next year was announced during an intermission in the concert by Atty. Raymond T. King. Explaining that the choice was made with reference to the votes of the subscribers, and that a great demand for vocal recitals had been expressed, Mr. King announced the four concerts as follows: Simon Barer, pianist; Lawrence Tibbett, baritone; the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky; and a quartet of four young singers from the Metropolitan Opera company, Josephine Antoine, Helen Olheim, John Brownlee and Charles Kullman.

For the concert last night Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony, chose a program consisting entirely of works by Beethoven and Wagner, and thus gave his audience food for unlimited discussion on the way home as to which master is more wonderful.

The Egmont overture with which the concert opened was a fitting introduction to the rest of the program. This delineative work of Beethoven's is not often heard in concerts, and it serves as a reminder that a work of short scope can still contain his majesty.

It is probably unmusical to pick a symphony apart, but the vivace of the first movement, and the second movement of the seventh symphony afford such delight in themselves regardless of what has gone before or what will come after, that they remain the most memorable parts of the work. In this symphony Beethoven has chosen some of the loveliest melodies that can be heard, some prolonged to a Brahms-like extent. Although those who revel in the brilliance of the fifth symphony will never give the seventh first place, its romantic qualities ensure its popularity.

The second half of the program, devoted to Wagner, opened with the prelude and "Liebestod' of "Tristan." This well-loved music was played with an understanding which would please any "Tristan" addict, and the two works which followed, "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the prelude to the third act, dance of the apprentices, the entrance of the masters from "Die Meistersinger" were just as satisfying.

Perfection cannot be described, and when these great orchestras play for us it seems as if there were no satisfactory way in which the music could be presented other than as it has just been heard. Aside from its skill, however, the Philadelphia orchestra has distinction in the style of Ormandy's conducting. He has a finesse of manner and of gesture which surely must be transmitted to his music.

For an encore, Mr. Ormandy presented Charles O'Connell, formerly of Springfield, who has conducted the Philadelphia symphony in the past, and whom Ormandy met by chance in a Springfield hotel before the concert last night. Mr. O'Connell led the orchestra in Debussey's "Clair de Lune" and in the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" by Wagner. Mr. O'Connell showed that the range of his conducting was equal to both the delicacy of the first piece, and to the climactic richness of the second.

DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

FEB 12 1939

Lines-o'-News

"Papa Haydn" is about to be interpreted by Serge Koussevitsky. At least the eminent doctor of music will be attired in a knee breeches costume and thereupon conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a special program in Carnegie hall. It is to be a benefit for the Boston Symphony pension fund; and I will give the details in my next letter.

4-21

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 11 1939

Records: Dr. Koussevitzky And Gieseking

By C. E. L.

The symphony which opened the present Bushnell season was one of some historic interest for it happened that the Boston Symphony was playing a work which was on the first program ever performed by that honorable body on Oct. 22, 1881, under the baton of George Henschel. This 102nd symphony of Haydn in B flat has now been preserved by Victor (Musical Masterpiece Series M-529) with the Bostonians under Serge Koussevitzky.

From last October's concert will be remembered the maturity and prophetic breadth of this Haydn. The themes of the first movement, excepting perhaps the main subject, are Beethovian in character and their development is truly so. The slow movement is also forward looking and taken as a whole the symphony savors of the nineteenth century rather than the eighteenth, certainly the work of a man of Europe rather than of the provincial kapellmeister of Eisenstadt.

The disks are faultlessly made with the dynamic scale permitting an acute and brilliant impression. The menuetto has a heavy tread but it will be remembered that such was Koussevitzky's way with this movement at his Bushnell concert.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 11 1939

◆-◆-◆

The sixth annual Berkshire symphonic festival will be held in August at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass. Concerts are scheduled in the Music Shed which was dedicated last summer series A on Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and series B on Aug. 10, 12 and 13. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra and Miss Robinson Smith, president of the board of trustees of the Berkshire Symphonie Festival, has announced that membership in the association has considerably increased. The festival is one of the major musical events in this country.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 11 1939

OTHER MUSIC IN REVIEW

Serge Koussevitzky Leads the Boston Orchestra in Bruckner's Eighth Symphony at Carnegie Hall

A morning paper notice of last night's Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall must be largely an acknowledgment of gratitude to Serge Koussevitzky for a magnificent performance of the Bruckner Eighth symphony. Though organizations of zealots have dedicated themselves these many years to the dissemination of the Brucknerian gospel, it is still more talked about than attended. Dr. Koussevitzky's performance argued unanswerably against this state of affairs, and almost shamed the listener to decent appreciation of this great music. But, paradoxically, and as if to defeat its own purpose, it proved beyond a doubt that only the peers of such an orchestra and such a conductor can adequately expound that music.

Last night the Eighth lasted over an hour. If the Brahms and Beethoven symphonies are considered as tonal canvases, the Bruckner C minor demands comparison with the mural. It is a thing of vast proportions and deep perspectives. Its huge framework contains structures of rhythms and color, a variety of technical resources, an amplitude and intensity of musical expression that are so far beyond the scale of nineteenth century symphonic form as almost to seem unrelated to its precursor.

It is hardly necessary to mention the technical demands such a structure makes upon an orchestra and its conductor, nor is it necessary to say more than that those demands were met superlatively. These matters are, in this instance, subsidiary to others, foremost of which is the problem of proportion. Bruckner, son and grandson of village schoolmasters, was an unearthly visionary whose dreams and ecstasies sought outlet in music of grandiose sonorities and shattering climaxes.

The interpreter's task is to adjust those emotional torrents to the ears and minds of mere mortals, who are limited by reason and reality to credible degrees of ecstasy. He must do this by viewing the work from a high perspective, and by shaping its musical thought into a natural growth. It was thus that Dr. Koussevitzky led us, almost by the hand, to rarefied heights that revealed the symphony to its farthest horizons. For his accomplishment he was rewarded by the acclaim of a rapt and deeply moved audience.

It was music and music-making that almost dwarfed the succeeding performance of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" to mere virtuosity. G. G.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

FEB 11 1939

WORDS WITHOUT MUSIC

BY LOUIS REID

There's been considerable agitation of late over swing adaptations of the classics. Fiery protests from "outraged music lovers" have come in to music editors. The protestants, however, overlook that musical history is filled with examples of so-called classical music adapted, borrowed by the great masters. They frequently helped themselves to the works of their contemporaries, to any material, indeed, that interested them.

That recent violent disturbance of the earth is probably Debussy rocking in his grave. His haunting little piece, "Reverie," put through the swing wringer as "My Reverie," now leads all tunes in America's popular music lists.

Recommended phonograph records: The Czech Philharmonic's magnificent performance of Dvorak's "New World Symphony," with George Szell conducting; Sibelius' captivating Symphony No. 5 in E Flat Major, as played by the Boston Symphony with the composer's vivid tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter," filling out the last three sides of the 10-sided recording; the only recording available of Mozart's great Concerto in E Flat Major for Two Pianos and Orchestra as performed by the London symphony, with Arthur and Karl Schnabel as assisting artists; De Falla's colorful "Three Cornered Hat-Dances" by the Boston "Pops" orchestra. All of these bear Victor's imprint.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 11 1939

Boulanger Gives Views on Careers

She Believes Women Desire Lives as Mothers and Wives

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Nadia Boulanger, conductor, composer, teacher, pianist, organist, lecturer, and patroness-saint of Young France in music, prefers to have people think of her first as a musician, second as a teacher, third as a conductor, and fourth as a woman. She believes sex, like age, makes no difference in music.

Interviewed in the apartment of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Damrosch, Mme. Boulanger, a handsome woman, with fine gray hair and well chiseled features, talked volubly, her face expressively mobile, her hands clasping and unclasping with the inflections of her speech. She spoke fluent English with a charming accent. She will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall tonight, the second woman to do so.

"What is important is the music and the quality of the playing," she said. "Men or women, old or young, tall or short, thin or fat, it makes no difference. As a conductor, what interests me is results. As a teacher I have had only two kinds of pupils, good or bad. As a musician I know only two kinds of music, good or bad music."

The writer remarked that in some quarters it was regarded as undignified for a woman to play the double bass or kettledrums in a symphony orchestra.

"I am afraid that everywhere," she replied good-naturedly, "women do many things in life which are more harmful to their dignity than playing kettledrums."

Musicians' Reactions.

Recently Mme. Boulanger was the first woman to conduct the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, the London Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony.

Of course, one always likes to find out how the musicians react to a woman's baton.

"A priori, a man has more authority over a body of men," she said. "If men were perfectly frank I believe they would say they prefer to be led by men. They have never made me feel that, however. In Paris and elsewhere there has always been a fine camaraderie between myself and the musicians."

The writer asked her whether a man or a woman would conduct Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" better, all other qualifications being equal. Mme. Boulanger reflected a moment, leaned over, and whispered:—

"I am afraid a man."

She said it was the natural instinct of women to have careers, in the arts, in the professions, in the business world, but most of all careers as mothers and wives.

"It is more natural for them to want that," she explained. "I say that with the deepest respect. I had a mother who filled me with great reverence for all mothers. When I think of the lives of the mothers of great men I feel that that is perhaps the greatest career of all."

None of Her Own.

She was asked if she had children of her own.

"Unfortunately not," she replied. "I am not at all satisfied with that. But life made it so." When another interviewer present suggested that what she had been giving the world was "brain children," she sighed thoughtfully, "Ah, but it is not the same . . . no."

A widely known and influential teacher herself, Mme. Boulanger pointed out that it was woman's inner instinct to "discover riches in others," to develop qualities in the young, rather than to do creative work. She emphasized the importance of training children's ears as early as possible.

"Sound is as important as color," she said. "If you trained children to distinguish tones and tonalities as you train them to distinguish colors they would later listen more sensitively to music."

She is a classicist in music, but a classicist of her own defining. She regards it as a discipline, an attitude, rather than a slavish conformity to orthodox formulas.

Classical, Not Academic.

"Jean Francaix, my young pupil whose concerto I am conducting in Carnegie Hall is classical," she said. "That is, classical in the large sense of the word. I do not mean academic. A composer must accept certain limitations, but be absolutely free within these limitations. That sounds vague, but everything one says about music sounds vague.

"To put it differently. Great art likes chains. The greatest artists have created art within bounds. Or else they have created their own chains."

She was complimented by both interviewers on her amazing vitality and versatility. She is now lecturing at several American schools, besides conducting and appearing as piano and organ soloist on many programs. She is forever studying scores and planning new courses for her classes at Fontainebleau.

"In music, as in other things, one must try to serve as one can," she said. "But the music comes before everything else. We do what we can in its shadow."

Boston Symphony In Superb Concert

Appearing in Carnegie Hall last night for the second time this week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was led by Serge Koussevitzky in two superlative performances.

The first was of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony. The playing left nothing to be desired. In gorgeous tone, nuance, climactic building up, sustained balance it was gripping from the first chord. The serenely eloquent adagio was superbly unfolded.

The second was of Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." For exquisite perfection of detail an orchestra can do no more than the Bostonians did with the "Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells." But the whole thing was brilliant beyond words. Many in the audience rose and "Bravoed!" L. B.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 12 1939

Lines-O'-News.

"Papa Haydn" is about to be interpreted by Serge Koussevitzky. At least the eminent Doctor of Music will be attired in a knee breeches costume and thereupon conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special program in Carnegie Hall. It is to be a benefit for the Boston Symphony pension fund; and I will give the details in my net letter.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 11 1939

Philharmonic Again Directed By Barbirolli

Gieseking Is Soloist Before Capacity House; Boston SymphonyPlaysBruckner

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under [illegible] Koussevitzky, devoted the third program of its regular evening series in Carnegie Hall to two works, Anton Bruckner's eighth symphony, in C minor, and Maurice Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Some members of the audience may have taken their seats with some slight uncertainty about what was to be played before the intermission, since, while the house programs and the program notes agreed upon the Bruckner work, a leaflet in the latter stated that Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, and Scriabin's "Poème de l'Extase" would be substituted. The restoration of the Bruckner symphony was, it was said, in answer to requests from many subscribers.

Except for performances of part of the fourth symphony by W. P. A. orchestras last summer, this was the first time that any orchestral work of Bruckner had been played here since March, 1936, when Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the seventh symphony. Despite the devoted work of Bruno Walter and Otto Klemperer in their Philharmonic engagements earlier in this decade, it is unlikely that Bruckner's appearance in a New York program lengthens the line before the Carnegie Hall box-office. The reasons for this have been outlined too often to need much repetition, but increasing acquaintance with the exceptional Austrian's music may well lead to the impression that at least the last three of the nine symphonies are touched at least here and there with genius and potent inspiration.

The eighth symphony has the drawbacks customarily associated with Bruckner's work in this form, such as length, occasional iterativeness, and unevenness of inspiration. But on repeated hearings these become of less consequence; there is largeness of style and vision as well as temporal length, persuasively sincere eloquence, whose most convincing expression is in the great adagio, with its meditative lyric depth, tenderness and the moving grandeur of its climaxes. Nor is imagination and expressive power limited to this movement; if Bruckner at times seems to miss his objective, yet the work as a whole leaves a sense of accomplishments, of music which, if refractory, is in the main treasurable.

The interpretation of Dr. Koussevitzky, who did some judicious cutting, deserevd high praise both for its execution and the general interpretative conception, and there was much, if not unanimous enthusiasm after the resplendently proclaimed close. The virtues of this excellent orchestra were also set forth in the Moussorgsky-Ravel work, which has long been associated with Dr. Koussevitzky's Bostonians.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 11 1939

Boston Symphony

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall served once again to demonstrate Dr. Koussevitzky's remarkable control over his forces and the admirable response furnished by his men. The finely graded shading achieved in Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C Minor gave the impression of being produced by one instrument.

Despite his living and working in Vienna during the period when that city was absorbed with the music of Brahms, Bruckner made no effort in his writings to conceal the admiration which he had for Wagner. The closing cadence of the adagio is a phrase right out of the "ring" and the instrumentation reveals Wagnerian devices throughout the symphony. The music is impressive and dramatic and as played last night was invested in a gorgeous panoply of sound.

Ravel's symphonic transcription of the series of piano pieces by Moussorgsky describing "Pictures at an Exhibition," concluded the program. R. O. W.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 11 1939

BOSTONIANS PLAY BRUCKNER EIGHTH

Symphony Is Heard in Carnegie Hall.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

No doubt as much to his own surprise as that of any member of the audience, Serge Koussevitzky enjoyed a remarkable success last night in Carnegie Hall with the playing of the Bruckner Eighth Symphony of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It might even be whispered that the conductor had thought seriously of revising the evening's music by substituting a Haydn symphony and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" for the mammoth work (an intention conveyed by a slip' in the program-book). But when the concert began, with no further word of change, it was with the Bruckner symphony, whose last notes, an hour later, were followed by a prolonged demonstration.

It was reasonable to attribute some of this enthusiasm to the extraordinary response of the players to the vivifying direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, which was of an intensity and concentration to animate the musical equivalent of an Egyptian mummy. Nor could it be overlooked that in preparing the work for performance, Mr. Koussevitzky had cut close to twenty minutes from its various movements, presumably pages of repetition and prolixity.

In any case, it was an hour of Bruckner to which the audience listened and responded. Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the work gave it an impression of unity and cohesiveness that is not usually granted to works by this composer. There was genuine eloquence and rapt musical beauty in the adagio, where Bruckner's head was truly among the stars, and a boldness of utterance in the finale that might usher in the crack of doom. Some doubts remain about the first movement, which becomes entwined in its own complexities at several points, but in consideration of the fresh impact of the work as a whole, it might be well to rest the case of Bruckner, until further evidence of this relevance is presented.

As if the orchestra had not given sufficiently of its incomparable powers in this score, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to devote the second half of the concert to Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition" in the orchestration of Maurice Ravel. If there is a more brilliant example of a transcriber's identification with the thoughts of a composer who wrote for another medium, it has not been heard here recently. As Mr. Koussevitzky performed it, there was separate and yet inseparable credit for composer, transcriber, orchestra and conductor. It provoked another outburst from the aurally dazzled listeners.

MYRA HESS

Piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the following Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon.

Transcript
Sat., Feb. 11/39

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 11 1939

CITY NEWS

CONCERT SERIES BROUGHT TO END WITH SYMPHONY

Atty. King Announces Four 1940 Events; Sale of Tickets Feb. 13-24

By Willard M. Clark

The season's Community Concerts came to an end last night with a memorable concert by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. In spite of inclement weather practically every seat in the Auditorium was taken, for the Philadelphia players are heard so seldom that every appearance must be treasured. It seems safe to prophesy that even though the Boston Symphony is heard here next season, the Philadelphians will be here in 1941.

Skilful Contrasts

Mr Ormandy provided a program of skilful contrasts. He chose to play only the works of Beethoven and Wagner. Thus the first half of the program was made up of the overture to "Egmont" and the "Symphony No. 7 in A major" by Beethoven. The second half opened with the "Prelude" and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and included "Waldweben" and the following excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," "Prelude to Act 3," "Dance of the Apprentices" and "Entrance of the Masters."

This was the official program but following great applause Mr. Ormandy made a happy speech in which he spoke of his pleasure at being here and noted that Mr. Stokowski and the orchestra dedicated the Auditorium 25 years ago. He then introduced a young man who needs no introduction to Springfield, namely Charles O'Connell. Mr. O'Connell was most cordially greeted and then took his place and conducted a beautifully conceived reading of Debussy's "Clair de Lune" and a striking performance of the prelude to the Act 3 of "Lohengrin."

It is needless to go into detail as to the playing of this great orchestra. One could thrill at the apparently limitless amount of tone produced at appropriate times and then relax to the beauty of the loveliest of pianissimi, all directed by one who appeared to be striving to bring the music to us, just as it was written.

Establishes Mood

The deeply sensitive reading of the Egmont overture established a mood that continued throughout the evening. Every detail of the amazingly frank and open music of the symphony was revealed. There was always a perfect balance, a nicety of phrase and sureness of attack to admire. To this must be added the indescribable sheen which makes the tone of the Philadelphians stand out from all others. This was never more noticeable than in the "Tristan" music. The ungovernable ecstasy of this, the greatest love music ever written, was completely and superbly articulated. Mr. Ormandy's reading of this music will remain a model.

In like manner Mr. Ormandy made known the varied moods of the "Waldweben" or the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried." Its early reflective quality, its joy and passionate eagerness were made very real through the magic of the colors Mr. Ormandy was able to summon at will.

The excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" provided a splendid ending. It revealed, perhaps, as nothing else, the full scope of Wagner's craftsmanship. Mr. Ormandy's interpretation of the prelude was one of the great moments of the evening and the Shakspearean humor of the "Dance of the Apprentices" was perfectly captured.

Artists Engaged

Following intermission, Atty Raymond T. King, president of the Springfield Community Concerts Association, announced the four concerts to be given next season. They are as follows: Boston Symphony Orchestra; Lawrence Tibbett, baritone; Simon Barer, Russian pianist, and the Metropolitan Opera Quartet, consisting of Charles Kullman, tenor; Josephine Antoine, soprano; Helen Olheim, contralto and John Brownlee, baritone.

In engaging Simon Barer, the Junior League inaugurates a new policy, that of including in the course a young artist or one new to this country. Mr. Barer received remarkable criticisms after his first New York concert. Mr. King said that Tibbett led the list of singers in the audience poll and the Boston orchestra a like place among orchestras polled.

Mrs. Russell F. Swett, president of the Springfield Junior League, invited the members of the association to a tea in the Women's Club Feb. 17 at 3 p. m. at which time the league scholarship winners will be heard. These are Gladys Kuchta, soprano; Sonia Protzenko, contralto; Edward Hayes, tenor and Isadore Cohn, violinist.

It was also announced that the sale of tickets, all seats reserved and prices the same, will start Feb. 13 and continue until Feb. 24, after which no tickets can be obtained. Members were asked to make their reservations as soon as possible after the drive commences.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 12 1939

FOOTNOTES ON HEADLINERS

AS HAYDN: A famous scene from the history of music was re-enacted last week on the stage of New York's Carnegie Hall. The curtains parted to reveal an orchestra dressed in the wigs and lace-trimmed costumes of eighteenth century Austria, reading their scores by candlelight. The music was Joseph Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" and the conductor, dressed as the composer of Prince Esterhazy's court, was Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In Haydn's original performance of the work at Esterhaz, 176 years ago, the musicians, during the finale, blew out their candles one by one and tiptoed out of the room. It was a sort of "walk-out strike," by which Haydn and his men indicated their desire for a vacation—and, the story goes, they got one. In last week's re-enactment the musicians also left the stage, one by one, but they returned—in modern dress—to finish out a varied program that included Viennese waltzes and a jazz symphony. The "Concert Extraordinaire," as the program had it, was for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund and was engineered by the Russian-born Mr. Koussevitzky, who has presided over the orchestra since 1924.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 11 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS BRUCKNER

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who began their third local visit with a "Concert Extraordinaire" at Carnegie Hall three nights ago, played the first of their regular pair of concerts at that hall last night. With an intermission between, the program offered the Symphony No. 8, in C minor, by Anton Bruckner and the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky in the orchestration by Ravel.

Some day, Bruckner may enjoy a vogue and his symphonies, despite their merit or lack of it, become fixtures in the popular orchestral repertoire. This will probably happen; after all, Gade was once a familiar name on programs, yet who can today whistle one of his themes? Public taste will have to undergo a great change, however, and, as far as the musical horizon looks now, there is slight chance of its happening in the immediate future.

Bruckner missed being a great symphonist by a remarkably small margin. He had a flair for writing distinctive and highly usable motives and his slow movements are among the most inspired and eloquent; added to which, he was no novice in the science of orchestration; in fact, his use of the orchestra is infinitely more imaginative and colorful and as well balanced as, for instance, that of Brahms or Schumann.

But when it came to marsheling his talents to put them to symphonic uses, he labored in an alien musical world whether he realized it or not, and the results are at best naive.

His splendiforous use of the brasses in the final movement last night roused the audience from the lethargy into which it had been lulled by the incessant and clocklike four- or eight-bar divisions of the symphony, and the doctor and the orchestra joined in receiving hearty applause which, if it was proffered in appreciation of a brilliant and enthusiastic performance, could not have been a hand-clap too many.

O'G.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 11 1939

Records: News and Reviews

Koussevitzky, in Modern Attire, Records Haydn—Bach by Artur Schnabel

Serge Koussevitzky's fondness for Josef Haydn has taken many forms of expression, from impersonating the old master for a Carnegie Hall concert to recording his symphonic music for Victor. Haydn's 102nd Symphony in B flat major, last but two of his works in that form, is offered in a three-record album by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one of the four albums which comprise this month's Musical Masterpiece releases. Though the records are only three, the movements are the usual four.

The Dr. is renowned as an enterprising conductor whose untiring zeal in presenting contemporary or fairly recent scores has augmented the relatively small, active, symphonic library by many handsome works; but he is also known as a program maker with a predisposition toward Haydn symphonies, which he serves to his numerous audiences with the same care and artistic success with which he does his Sibelius or his Prokofieff. It begs the adjective "versatile," but that has been a by-word for the Dr. and the Symphony for as long as any one of their devotees can remember.

This recorded symphony dates from Haydn's "London" period and is among his most celebrated and best loved works. Those whose scanty knowledge of the "London" Symphonies permits them to enjoy the popular fallacy that Haydn was a quaint old dear, who dashed off attractive but unimportant tidbits for odd court occasions, are due for a surprise in this album.

• • •

The fourth and final Musical Masterpiece album this month is diminutive (four ten-inch records) but of hefty musical worth. Artur Schnabel records two Bach Clavier Toccatas; the first forty inches contain the later C minor one and the remaining space is devoted to the earlier one in D major.

Bach's Toccatas for organ have placed the Clavier pieces in this form in the shade but Mr. Schnabel's four records are a stride forward for the neglected ones. The choice of the C minor and D major Toccatas is a happy one and the two make a nicely matched pair. Mr. Schnabel's readings strive toward an artistic ideal that will please Bach lovers, piano lovers or just plain music lovers in general.

It goes without saying that Mr. Schnabel's conception of the pieces is really Red-Seal. The melodic outlines are clearly defined and the three fugues and fugato are handled with a satisfying amount of structural deliberation. The recording is acoustically excellent.

SINGLES

Speaking of pianists: the inimitable and formidable Moriz Rosenthal offers, currently with his Golden Jubilee, a ten-inch record of two Chopin Mazurkas. Victor is the proud Godfather.

A twelve-inch record that makes easy listening, thanks to Schubert, Bruno Walter, the London Philharmonic and Victor, is a recording of two numbers of the "Rosamunde" Ballet Music. Schubert's charm, Walter's delicacy and the excellence of the orchestra will sell this disc before the music reaches the eighth bar.

"Il Mio Tesaro" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "Una Furtiva Lagrima" from Donizetti's "L'Elisir D'Amore" are offered on a twelve-inch record by Richard Crooks, tenor, and Wilfred Pelletier, conductor, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra fill a large Red Seal record with "Rachen" (Mercy), by Manna-Zucca, and the traditional "Eili Eili," Roger Voison, solo trumpeter, plays all of the latter and joins Julius Theodorowicz, violinist, in the solo parts of the first.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 12 1939

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, March 17 and 18, in its home city, the program which Ernest Bloch will conduct includes two symphonic preludes from his opera "Macbeth," which had its première in 1910 in Paris and was revived recently with pronounced success in Italy. Boston also will hear for the first time at this event Bloch's symphonic suite "Evocations" (Contemplation, Houang Ti and Renouveau) and his symphonic fresco "Helvetia, the Land of Mountains and Its People." The "Trois Poèmes Juifs" (Danse, Rite and Cortège funèbre) complete the offerings of this all-Bloch list.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 12 1939

THE ORCHESTRAS

Out of Town

The second symphony of William Schuman, young New York composer, who is a member of the faculty of Sarah Lawrence College, in Bronxville, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in its home concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Sibelius's third symphony and Beethoven's C minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, complete the program. Another American composer, Paul Nordoff, will be the soloist in the first public performance of his piano concerto by the National Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Washington, with Hans Kindler conducting.

The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe will dance with the Seattle Symphony Orchestra in five performances from next Thursday to Sunday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 12 1939

VARIED BILL GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra Under His Direction Plays A Major Symphony by Mozart

'SCHELOMO' IS ON PROGRAM

Bedetti Is 'Cello Soloist in Bloch Work—Hindemith's 'Dances' Repeated

By OLIN DOWNES

The deeds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its builder and leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, grow with the doing, if not with the telling. To the sensational effect, now historic, which this conductor and orchestra achieved when they played the Eighth Bruckner Symphony last Friday night is to be added the record of the performances yesterday of an adorable symphony of Mozart; the repetition from an earlier New York program of Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances"; the performance of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," with Bedetti as soloist, in the presence of the composer, and, one of the most famous of the chef d'oeuvres of this orchestra, the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

It would be hard to find a program which offered more of contrast and which required more versatility of understanding and of style. The Mozart symphony was the one in A major, numbered in Koeckel catalogue 201, and it was played with ineffable simplicity, finish and feeling. It is not one of the grand Mozart symphonies, nor the most elaborate in workmanship, but it is perfect in its genre, in the flow of the ideas, in the inspired instrumentation. It need hardly be pointed out how great a test of the highest attributes of orchestral playing is constituted by such a symphony. This Stradivarius of an orchestral met every test triumphantly.

Introduced Earlier in Season

Dr. Koussevitzky's repetition of the Hindemith "Symphonic Dances," which he had introduced here earlier in the season, was a fine deed for a piece of very significant modern music. For the "Symphonic Dances," received with reservations by a portion of the public and press commentators, this writer among them, on the occasion of their first hearing, were received yesterday afternoon with unreserved and emphatic approval. The present reviewer was constrained materially to modify his earlier opinion. True, the same thing that was obvious at the earlier performance was more fully realized yesterday, namely, that these "Dances" do not represent "abstract music"—music created only with tonal design, without emotional intention. This is music highly charged with feeling and drama.

Secondly, as the development of the ideas by the composer becomes clearer its logic, mastery and imagination become the more inescapable. Those who consider that so-called "classic" composition means music primarily of design and secondarily of feeling, while music coming under the head of "romantic" is music of free and subjective impulse, would be inclined to class this late work of Hindemith in the "romantic" category. And it is music of intense emotion, free in form, so far as the classic symphonic model is concerned. At the same time, if by "classic" we mean clarity, proportion and logic of structure, we must accord the Hindemith score a very high percentage of these qualities.

As a matter of fact, classifications, especially in art, are likely to be deadly, preservative only of the letter and not the spirit of the law. Hindemith's music is deeply charged and powerfully wrought stuff, liable to emerge, as we become familiar with it, as one of his masterpieces. It has two contrasted moods, or effects, the one of tragedy; the other one of drama, and solemn pronunciation, and triumph. Thematically parts of the score are intricately related and contingent upon each other. But this is a side issue, a structural consideration, only important to the listener as it enables him the better to comprehend the gist of the musical discourse. The important thing is the sheer musical and expressive value of the work, its quality as it stands, outside of personal interpretations or definitions. In introducing this composition in New York, and repeating it, Dr. Koussevitzky has done another of his numberless services to art.

Work of First 'Cellist

Jean Bedetti, long known as the first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, and a great virtuoso to boot, played the 'cello part in the performance of Bloch's "Schelomo" in a very admirable manner. It was good to hear the score again, and again to be swept away by its energy, color and profound racial impulse. It is music inbued with the ceremony and mystery of the Temple, age-old lamentation and bitter wisdom, and the fury of the ancient prophets. It is truly Hebraic. The Song of Solomon and the Book of Job are both in it—implicit in the cantilena of the solo instrument, the outcries of fanatical denunciation, the thought, in the last monologue of the 'cello, of the vanity of s, and the purple rchestration. The ne of insight and t and orchestra. For our part, we would have wished certain pages to have a more elemental fury, wailing intensity, impassioned rhetoric. Too many refinements can lose a part of the force that is in this grand and savage music.

The composer was present on this occasion as listener. Long and hearty applause called conductor and 'cellist repeatedly back to the platform, and it was attempted to induce Mr. Bloch to show himself on the stage. He bowed from a box, and applauded the performers. The reception of his music, which so moved the audience, must have been gratifying to him.

It is now unnecessary to describe the manner of this orchestra's playing of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Tableaux." They were worthily repeated from earlier concerts. We now maintain that Dr. Koussevitzky owes his New York audiences at least two other repetitions. One is of the delicious humor of Prokofieff's children's tale of "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as Narrator. The other is of the Bruckner Eighth Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 11 1939

160

CITY NEWS

CONCERT SERIES BROUGHT TO END WITH SYMPHONY

Atty. King Announces Four 1940 Events; Sale of Tickets Feb. 13-24

By Willard M. Clark

The season's Community Concerts came to an end last night with a memorable concert by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. In spite of inclement weather practically every seat in the Auditorium was taken, for the Philadelphia players are heard so seldom that every appearance must be treasured. It seems safe to prophesy that even though the Boston Symphony is heard here next season, the Philadelphians will be here in 1941.

Skilful Contrasts

Mr Ormandy provided a program of skilful contrasts. He chose to play only the works of Beethoven and Wagner. Thus the first half of the program was made up of the overture to "Egmont" and the "Symphony No. 7 in A major" by Beethoven. The second half opened with the "Prelude" and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and included "Waldweben" and the following excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," "Prelude to Act 3," "Dance of the Apprentices" and "Entrance of the Masters."

This was the official program but following great applause Mr. Ormandy made a happy speech in which he spoke of his pleasure at being here and noted that Mr. Stokowski and the orchestra dedicated the Auditorium 25 years ago. He then introduced a young man who needs no introduction to Springfield, namely Charles O'Connell. Mr. O'Connell was most cordially greeted and then took his place and conducted a beautifully conceived reading of Debussy's "Clair de Lune" and a striking performance of the prelude to the Act 3 of "Lohengrin."

It is needless to go into detail as to the playing of this great orchestra. One could thrill at the apparently limitless amount of tone produced at appropriate times and then relax to the beauty of the loveliest of pianissimi, all directed by one who appeared to be striving to bring the music to us, just as it was written.

Establishes Mood

The deeply sensitive reading of the Egmont overture established a mood that continued throughout the evening. Every detail of the amazingly frank and open music of the symphony was revealed. There was always a perfect balance, a nicety of phrase and sureness of attack to admire. To this must be added the indescribable sheen which makes the tone of the Philadelphians stand out from all others. This was never more noticeable than in the "Tristan" music. The ungovernable ecstasy of this, the greatest love music ever written, was completely and superbly articulated. Mr. Ormandy's reading of this music will remain a model.

In like manner Mr. Ormandy made known the varied moods of the "Waldweben" or the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried." Its early reflective quality, its joy and passionate eagerness were made very real through the magic of the colors Mr. Ormandy was able to summon at will.

The excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" provided a splendid ending. It revealed, perhaps, as nothing else, the full scope of Wagner's craftsmanship. Mr. Ormandy's interpretation of the prelude was one of the great moments of the evening and the Shaksperean humor of the "Dance of the Apprentices" was perfectly captured.

Artists Engaged

Following intermission, Atty Raymond T. King, president of the Springfield Community Concerts Association, announced the four concerts to be given next season. They are as follows: Boston Symphony Orchestra; Lawrence Tibbett, baritone; Simon Barer, Russian pianist, and the Metropolitan Opera Quartet, consisting of Charles Kullman, tenor; Josephine Antoine, soprano, Helen Olheim, contralto and John Brownlee, baritone.

In engaging Simon Barer, the Junior League inaugurates a new policy, that of including in the course a young artist or one new to this country. Mr. Barer received remarkable criticisms after his first New York concert. Mr. King said that Tibbett led the list of singers in the audience poll and the Boston orchestra a like place among orchestras polled.

Mrs. Russell F. Swett, president of the Springfield Junior League, invited the members of the association to a tea in the Women's Club Feb. 17 at 3 p. m. at which time the league scholarship winners will be heard. These are Gladys Kuchta, soprano; Sonia Protzenko, contralto; Edward Hayes, tenor and Isadore Cohn, violinist.

It was also announced that the sale of tickets, all seats reserved and prices the same, will start Feb. 13 and continue until Feb. 24, after which no tickets can be obtained. Members were asked to make their reservations as soon as possible after the drive commences.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 12 1939

FOOTNOTES ON HEADLINERS

AS HAYDN: A famous scene from the history of music was re-enacted last week on the stage of New York's Carnegie Hall. The curtains parted to reveal an orchestra dressed in the wigs and lace-trimmed costumes of eighteenth century Austria, reading their scores by candlelight. The music was Joseph Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" and the conductor, dressed as the composer of Prince Esterhazy's court, was Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In Haydn's original performance of the work at Esterhaz, 176 years ago, the musicians, during the finale, blew out their candles one by one and tiptoed out of the room. It was a sort of "walk-out strike," by which Haydn and his men indicated their desire for a vacation—and, the story goes, they got one. In last week's re-enactment the musicians also left the stage, one by one, but they returned—in modern dress—to finish out a varied program that included Viennese waltzes and a jazz symphony. The "Concert Extraordinaire," as the program had it, was for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund and was engineered by the Russian-born Mr. Koussevitzky, who has presided over the orchestra since 1924.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 11 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS BRUCKNER

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who began their third local visit with a "Concert Extraordinaire" at Carnegie Hall three nights ago, played the first of their regular pair of concerts at that hall last night. With an intermission between, the program offered the Symphony No. 8, in C minor, by Anton Bruckner and the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky in the orchestration by Ravel.

Some day, Bruckner may enjoy a vogue and his symphonies, despite their merit or lack of it, become fixtures in the popular orchestral repertoire. This will probably happen; after all, Gade was once a familiar name on programs, yet who can today whistle one of his themes? Public taste will have to undergo a great change, however, and, as far as the musical horizon looks now, there is slight chance of its happening in the immediate future.

Bruckner missed being a great symphonist by a remarkably small margin. He had a flair for writing distinctive and highly usable motives and his slow movements are among the most inspired and eloquent; added to which, he was no novice in the science of orchestration; in fact, his use of the orchestra is infinitely more imaginative and colorful and as well balanced as, for instance, that of Brahms or Schumann.

But when it came to marsheling his talents to put them to symphonic uses, he labored in an alien musical world whether he realized it or not, and the results are at best naive.

His splendiforous use of the brasses in the final movement last night roused the audience from the lethargy into which it had been lulled by the incessant and clocklike four- or eight-bar divisions of the symphony, and the doctor and the orchestra joined in receiving hearty applause which, if it was proffered in appreciation of a brilliant and enthusiastic performance, could not have been a hand-clap too many.

O'G.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 11 1939

Records: News and Reviews

Koussevitzky, in Modern Attire, Records Haydn—Bach by Artur Schnabel

Serge Koussevitzky's fondness for Josef Haydn has taken many forms of expression, from impersonating the old master for a Carnegie Hall concert to recording his symphonic music for Victor. Haydn's 102nd Symphony in B flat major, last but two of his works in that form, is offered in a three-record album by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one of the four albums which comprise this month's Musical Masterpiece releases. Though the records are only three, the movements are the usual four.

The Dr. is renowned as an enterprising conductor whose untiring zeal in presenting contemporary or fairly recent scores has augmented the relatively small, active, symphonic library by many handsome works; but he is also known as a program maker with a predisposition toward Haydn symphonies, which he serves to his numerous audiences with the same care and artistic success with which he does his Sibelius or his Prokofieff. It begs the adjective "versatile," but that has been a by-word for the Dr. and the Symphony for as long as any one of their devotees can remember.

This recorded symphony dates from Haydn's "London" period and is among his most celebrated and best loved works. Those whose scanty knowledge of the "London" Symphonies permits them to enjoy the popular fallacy that Haydn was a quaint old dear, who dashed off attractive but unimportant tidbits for odd court occasions, are due for a surprise in this album.

• • •

The fourth and final Musical Masterpiece album this month is diminutive (four ten-inch records) but of hefty musical worth. Artur Schnabel records two Bach Clavier Toccatas; the first forty inches contain the later C minor one and the remaining space is devoted to the earlier one in D major.

Bach's Toccatas for organ have placed the Clavier pieces in this form in the shade but Mr. Schnabel's four records are a stride forward for the neglected ones. The choice of the C minor and D major Toccatas is a happy one and the two make a nicely matched pair. Mr. Schnabel's readings strive toward an artistic ideal that will please Bach lovers, piano lovers or just plain music lovers in general.

It goes without saying that Mr. Schnabel's conception of the pieces is really Red-Seal. The melodic outlines are clearly defined and the three fugues and fugato are handled with a satisfying amount of structural deliberation. The recording is acoustically excellent.

SINGLES

Speaking of pianists: the inimitable and formidable Moriz Rosenthal offers, currently with his Golden Jubilee, a ten-inch record of two Chopin Mazurkas. Victor is the proud Godfather.

A twelve-inch record that makes easy listening, thanks to Schubert, Bruno Walter, the London Philharmonic and Victor, is a recording of two numbers of the "Rosamunde" Ballet Music. Schubert's charm, Walter's delicacy and the excellence of the orchestra will sell this disc before the music reaches the eighth bar.

"Il Mio Tesaro" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "Una Furtiva Lagrima" from Donizetti's "L'Elisir D'Amore" are offered on a twelve-inch record by Richard Crooks, tenor, and Wilfred Pelletier, conductor, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra fill a large Red Seal record with "Rachen" (Mercy), by Manna-Zucca, and the traditional "Eili Eili," Roger Voison, solo trumpeter, plays all of the latter and joins Julius Theodorowicz, violinist, in the solo parts of the first.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 12 1939

THE [illegible]gler in

Out of Town

The second symphony of William Schuman, young New York composer, who is a member of the faculty of Sarah Lawrence College, in Bronxville, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in its home concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Sibelius's third symphony and Beethoven's C minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, complete the program. Another American composer, Paul Nordoff, will be the soloist in the first public performance of his piano concerto by the National Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Washington, with Hans Kindler conducting.

The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe will dance with the Seattle Symphony Orchestra in five performances from next Thursday to Sunday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 12 1939

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, March 17 and 18, in its home city, the program which Ernest Bloch will conduct includes two symphonic preludes from his opera "Macbeth," which had its première in 1910 in Paris and was revived recently with pronounced success in Italy. Boston also will hear for the first time at this event Bloch's symphonic suite "Evocations" (Contemplation, Houang Ti and Renouveau) and his symphonic fresco "Helvetia, the Land of Mountains and Its People." The "Trois Poèmes Juifs" (Danse, Rite and Cortège funèbre) complete the offerings of this all-Bloch list.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 12 1939

VARIED BILL GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra Under His Direction Plays A Major Symphony by Mozart

'SCHELOMO' IS ON PROGRAM

Bedetti Is 'Cello Soloist in Bloch Work—Hindemith's 'Dances' Repeated

By OLIN DOWNES

The deeds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its builder and leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, grow with the doing, if not with the telling. To the sensational effect, now historic, which this conductor and orchestra achieved when they played the Eighth Bruckner Symphony last Friday night is to be added the record of the performances yesterday of an adorable symphony of Mozart; the repetition from an earlier New York program of Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances"; the performance of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," with Bedetti as soloist, in the presence of the composer, and, one of the most famous of the chef d'oeuvres of this orchestra, the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

It would be hard to find a program which offered more of contrast and which required more versatility of understanding and of style. The Mozart symphony was the one in A major, numbered in Koeckel catalogue 201, and it was played with ineffable simplicity, finish and feeling. It is not one of the grand Mozart symphonies, nor the most elaborate in workmanship, but it is perfect in its genre, in the flow of the ideas, in the inspired instrumentation. It need hardly be pointed out how great a test of the highest attributes of orchestral playing is constituted by such a symphony. This Stradivarius of an orchestral met every test triumphantly.

Introduced Earlier in Season

Dr. Koussevitzky's repetition of the Hindemith "Symphonic Dances," which he had introduced here earlier in the season, was a fine deed for a piece of very significant modern music. For the "Symphonic Dances," received with reservations by a portion of the public and press commentators, this writer among them, on the occasion of their first hearing, were received yesterday afternoon with unreserved and emphatic approval. The present reviewer was constrained materially to modify his earlier opinion. True, the same thing that was obvious at the earlier performance was more fully realized yesterday, namely, that these "Dances" do not represent "abstract music"—music created only with tonal design, without emotional intention. This is music highly charged with feeling and drama.

Secondly, as the development of the ideas by the composer becomes clearer its logic, mastery and imagination become the more inescapable. Those who consider that so-called "classic" composition means music primarily of design and secondarily of feeling, while music coming under the head of "romantic" is music of free and subjective impulse, would be inclined to class this late work of Hindemith in the "romantic" category. And it is music of intense emotion, free in form, so far as the classic symphonic model is concerned. At the same time, if by "classic" we mean clarity, proportion and logic of structure, we must accord the Hindemith score a very high percentage of these qualities.

As a matter of fact, classifications, especially in art, are likely to be deadly, preservative only of the letter and not the spirit of the law. Hindemith's music is deeply charged and powerfully wrought stuff, liable to emerge, as we become familiar with it, as one of his masterpieces. It has two contrasted moods, or effects, the one of tragedy; the other one of drama, and solemn pronunciation, and triumph. Thematically parts of the score are intricately related and contingent upon each other. But this is a side issue, a structural consideration, only important to the listener as it enables him the better to comprehend the gist of the musical discourse. The important thing is the sheer musical and expressive value of the work, its quality as it stands, outside of personal interpretations or definitions. In introducing this composition in New York, and repeating it, Dr. Koussevitzky has done another of his numberless services to art.

Work of First 'Cellist

Jean Bedetti, long known as the first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, and a great virtuoso to boot, played the 'cello part in the performance of Bloch's "Schelomo" in a very admirable manner. It was good to hear the score again, and again to be swept away by its energy, color and profound racial impulse. It is music inbued with the ceremony and mystery of the Temple, age-old lamentation and bitter wisdom, and the fury of the ancient prophets. It is truly Hebraic. The Song of Solomon and the Book of Job are both in it—implicit in the cantilena of the solo instrument, the outcries of fanatical denunciation, the thought, in the last monologue of the 'cello, of the vanity of man and his dreams, and the purple and gold of the orchestration. The performance was one of insight and virtuosity of soloist and orchestra. For our part, we would have wished certain pages to have a more elemental fury, wailing intensity, impassioned rhetoric. Too many refinements can lose a part of the force that is in this grand and savage music.

The composer was present on this occasion as listener. Long and hearty applause called conductor and 'cellist repeatedly back to the platform, and it was attempted to induce Mr. Bloch to show himself on the stage. He bowed from a box, and applauded the performers. The reception of his music, which so moved the audience, must have been gratifying to him.

It is now unnecessary to describe the manner of this orchestra's playing of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Tableaux." They were worthily repeated from earlier concerts. We now maintain that Dr. Koussevitzky owes his New York audiences at least two other repetitions. One is of the delicious humor of Prokofieff's children's tale of "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as Narrator. The other is of the Bruckner Eighth Symphony.

169

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

FEB 12 1939

Reviews of Recordings

By ALICE EVERSMAN.

Something for every real music lover's taste is offered this month in the releases of the Victor Co. For those who love the classics there is first of all one of the finest Haydn symphonies—that in B flat major, No. 102, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Naming this symphony as one of the finest that Haydn has written rests on the deeper general plan on which it is based and on the richer quality of music which Haydn has created. It is the second from the last of that enormous output to the composer's credit and dates from his successful stay in London. While the fresh vitality that permeates all of Hadyn's writings is there in fullest measure, one can sense a growth in style and power possibly due to his association with Beethoven which preceded its composition. In this work the composer had abandoned that graceful character so popular in his day and called upon his mature powers to give out a work of substance and beauty.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives it a splendid reading wherein the rich tone of the ensemble is especially fitting. The second movement is one of rare loveliness which the Bostonians further embellish in their manner of playing, but the whole symphony is one that has much to give that can be heard time and again with constant enjoyment.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

FEB 12 1939

Hearers Pick Music Choices

Boston, Philadelphia, New York Orchestras Head List in America

Ask a group of well-informed music lovers to name the three finest orchestras in America and they will name the Philadelphia, the Boston and the New York Philharmonic. The order of preference may follow any other arrangement of the three names, but it will be unanimously agreed that these are the foremost symphonic ensembles in this country.

Those who feel inclined to particularize and explain their choices may dwell upon the fitness of one body or the other to interpret certain kinds of music. This circumscribing of function may narrow even farther down to the ability of one conductor or another to give the right reading of some particular composer's music.

Without making any definite suggestion as to its own feelings in the matter, the Victor company this month is featuring the first two of the above three orchestras in masterworks albums. The Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, plays the Haydn symphony in B flat, No. 102. The Philadelphia orchestra, responding to the baton of Leopold Stokowski, gives out another of the conductor's Wagnerian sytheses. This time it is an assemblage of favorite passages from "Tannhauser."

The logic of these choices is immediately apparent. Renowned as the Boston orchestra is for its silken strings, one is not surprised that their service is enlisted in the recording of a symphony of that period wherein the string choir bore the main brunt of musical expression.

With the Wagnerian album the choice was natural, not only because Stokowski had made the arrangement, but because he is a recognized master of tonal masses and sweeping emotional climaxes. Concert versions of Wagner are one of his best contributions to the cherishable experiences of symphony audiences. Into album M-530 this arranger-conductor has put the overture, the Venusberg music and the prelude to the third act of "Tannhauser." It is Wagner in rich dress.

Mr. Koussevitzky gives us one of Haydn's very finest symphonies, the ninth of that dozen composed for his London concerts.—H. G.

PEORIA, ILL.
Morning Journal Transcript

FEB 12 1939

Music As You Desire It

NOTE: The purpose of this and subsequent articles shall be to give the reader up to the minute news on new recordings of interest to the lover of good music, and as occasion demands, to review outstanding recordings not so recently released. H. G. DEWEES.

H. G. DEWEES

SYMPHONY NO. 102, IN B FLAT MAJOR (Haydn) Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Victor album number M-529.

Too often we are inclined to think of Haydn's symphonies in the light of his earlier symphonies, and more especially his "Surprise Symphony." They are musical, delicate, and graceful, but not heavily orchestrated. This symphony, written late in his life, is not widely known like many of his other works. However, it is richly orchestrated and splendidly conceived, retaining the good points of his previous symphonic endeavors and adding a maturity and breadth which will be a distinct surprise to those unfamiliar with "Symphony No. 102."

The second movement of the symphony is undoubtedly the most outstanding part of the entire work. It is quiet, but most impressive with two beautiful themes effectively developed. Near the end of the movement, one of Haydn's best minuettes is strikingly presented.

The third movement is rapid moving and almost flipantly humorous in typical style of Haydn.

Director Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra do excellent work in recording this work.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

FEB 12 1939

Glazer to Appear in Concert After 2 Years Absence

FRANK GLAZER, the young pianist who is still claimed as a Milwaukeean although he now maintains studios in New York and Boston, will be heard as soloist with the Lyric Male chorus Feb. 23 at the Auditorium. This will be his first appearance here since his successful recital in the spring of 1937.

Mr. Glazer is rapidly becoming recognized as one of the leading American pianists. For several years he has been under the fatherly eye of Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston symphony orchestra, who has engaged him as soloist with the orchestra Mar. 18 in Boston. In this course Mr. Glazer appears with such outstanding artists as Myra Hess, Georges Enesco and Igor Stravinsky.

In his most recent orchestral appearance Mr. Glazer played with the St. Louis symphony. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat's reviewer wrote after the concert:

"Mr. Glazer's pianism is an art which effaces self but never the piano. In the Bach, he was revealed as one handsomely equipped with technical proficiency and an authority on dynamics; one responsive to the spirit of the work as Hans Lange read it, and one possessed of fine, firm tone."

In his program with the Lyrics, Mr. Glazer will be heard in Schubert's "Wanderer" phantasy, Haydn's G major sonata and a considerable group of Chopin.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

FEB 12 1939

Igor Stravinsky Work To Have Local Premiere At O. S. U. on Feb. 19

COLUMBUS audiences have come to expect the new and the unusual in the annual concerts given by choruses under the direction of Prof. Louis H. Diercks, of the department of music, Ohio State university.

The concert to be given Sunday, Feb. 19, at 3 p. m., in the men's gymnasium by the Ohio State university chorus, will be no exception to Professor Diercks' rule of extending the musical knowledge of his audiences as well as of his students. It will feature several numbers being presented in Columbus for the first time.

Another innovation to the annual concert will be the assistance of a second group, the Men's Glee club, in several numbers. Admission is free, and the concert is open to the public.

⁂

IN THE OPENING portion of the program Igor Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" will be heard. This number will not only be presented here for the first time—it will be given in a manner never before employed anywhere.

Ada Ruth Davis

The publishers and the composer have sanctioned an experimental rendition, in which the electric organ will be used sparingly to bring out the more persistent orchestral qualities. The instrumentation has been done by the class in instrumentation taught by Prof. M. Emmett Wilson, in co-operation with Professor Diercks.

Jean Seybold will be heard at the first piano, Viola Patzer at the second piano. Mary L. Meister and Jane Coulter will do the organ parts.

According to Professor Diercks the Stravinsky approach in this number is one of "power and eloquence" rather than beauty.

⁂

THIS SETTING of excerpts from the Psalms was dedicated to the Boston Symphony orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary, but the actual first performance was given in Brussels by the Brussels Philharmonic society, Dec. 13, 1930, with Ernest Ansermet conducting. The initial performance by the Boston Symphony occurred the following week, with the Cecelia Society chorus assisting.

Ada Ruth Davis, 270 Fifteenth avenue, a senior music major, will be heard as soloist in the rendition of "Herbstlied" ("A Song of Autumn"), by Anton Bruckner. Wenda Worthington, of Wilmington, will be another soloist heard with this number. Joseph Tague, New Lexington, will be at the piano.

The program for the concert will include, besides the Stravinsky work:

Um Mitternacht ....Anton Bruckner
Mary Lentz Morrison, contralto; Joseph Tague, pianist, and the Men's Glee Club.

Herbstlied (A Song of Autumn)....Anton Bruckner
Ada Ruth Davis, soprano; Wenda Worthington, soprano; Joseph Tague, pianist, and the Men's Glee Club.

Trosteria Musik ....Anton Bruckner
Men's Glee Club and M. Emett Wilson, organist.

Songs from Drum Taps ....Howard Hansen
The Chorus; Jean Seybold and Viola Patzer, pianos.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
Sunday News and Sentinel

FEB 12 1939

New Recorded Music

(February Releases)

Tannhaeuser—Overture and Venusberg Music, and the Prelude to Act III (Wagner). Philadelphia orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor. The combination of Wagner, Stokowski and the Philadelphia orchestra makes for a Bacchanalian orgy which will practically leave you limp with its blazing splendor and its overpowering emotions. It is a re-recording, but with the benefit of the engineering advances made since Stokowski first engraved these tones on wax. In this new set, too, the voices are included to sing the Sirens' lovely song in the Venusberg music, and Stokowski has added the prelude to Act III, telling of the pilgrimage to Rome and the final forgiveness of Tannhaeuser. All this magnificent music fits pretty well together into one great symphonic poem—an eloquent summary of the entire opera. (Victor set M-530.)

Toccata in C minor (Bach) and Toccata in D major (Bach). Arthur Schnabel, piano. After the gargantuan passions of "Tannhaeuser," these little Bach pieces seem refreshingly cool and clear, like water from a spring. They display Bach's delight in weaving fascinating patterns and the phrases leap and dance with effortless ease. Schnabel is especially good in the brilliant D major. The latter has been previously recorded in a harpsichord version by Landowska (Victor 15172-3) and by Pessl (Columbia X-70). The C minor also has been done by Marcel Maas (Columbia X-4).

Black Eyes and the Prisoner (Rubinstein). Feodor Chaliapin, bass. If "Black Eyes" is one of your favorites, you will delight in this version by the late basso, regarded as the greatest of his generation. He is assisted by the Aristoff choir and a balalaika orchestra. He also sings "The Prisoner," a favorite on his concert programs. (Victor 15236.)

Rachem (Manna Zucca, arranged by Agida Jachia) and Eili, Eili (arranged by Jacchia from notation of Shalitt). Boston "Pops" orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor. The profoundly moving "Rachem" (Mercy) and the more solemn and awe-inspiring "Eili, Eili" are given a stirring performance, with magnificently portentous trumpet blasts by Roger Voisin. (Victor 12536.)

Hymne des Cherubims, no. 7 (Bortniansky) and Que Ma Priere Monte (That My Prayer May Arise) (Tchesnokoff). Choir of the Russian cathedral of Paris, Nicolas Afonsky, director. The majestic hymn and the somber "Prayer" are beautifully sung by the Russians. (Victor 36223.)

Mazurka in D major (Opus 33, no. 2) and Mazurka in B major (Opus 63, no. 1) (Chopin). Moriz Rosenthal, piano. The venerable but still magnificent Rosenthal, with infinite tenderness, muses over these delicately lovely mazurkas. (Victor 1951.)

La Gitana (Kreisler) and Liebesleid (Kreisler). Fritz Kreisler, violin, with Franz Rupp, piano. Two of Kreisler's encore numbers are done in the master's own warmhearted style. (Victor 1950.)

Chorale for String Sextet (Roy Harris). Kreiner sextet. One of America's most important young composers evokes strange and somber images with this darkly glowing incantation for strings. Something for the mind rather than the heart. (Victor 12537.)

Don Giovanni—"Il Mio Tesoro" (To My Beloved) (Mozart) and L'Elisir d'Amore—"Una Furtiva Lagrima" (A Furtive Tear) (Donizetti). Richard Crooks, tenor, with orchestra directed by Wilfred Pelletier. The popular tenor, in fine voice, sings these two favorites of the operatic repertory. (Victor 15235.)

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB 12 1939

THE MUSICAL DIGEST:

Koussevitzky Reads Haydn In Costume

BY PIERRE V. R. KEY,
Special Correspondent of The News.

NEW YORK, Feb. 11.—Papa Haydn is about to be interpreted by Serge Koussevitzky. At least the eminent Doctor of Music will be attired in a knee breeches costume and thereupon conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special program in Carnegie Hall. It is to be a benefit for the Boston Symphony pension fund, and I will give the details in my next letter.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

FEB 12 1939

* * *

One of Haydn's London symphonies, No. 102 in B Flat Major, is another delight on Victor's February list, and the honors again go to the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The director's fondness for the symphony is revealed by the delicacy, precision and silky loveliness of tone which he weedles from the orchestra.

It is a most ingratiating piece, full of hints of the romanticism that was eventually to sweep through all nineteenth century literature. The third movement is lively and reminiscent of rustic pleasures. The second is an excellent example of how the composer developed the minuetto symphonically.

The album comprises three 12-inch records and it is also a must item for your library shelf.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

FEB 12 1939

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between August 3 and 12.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last November 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2000 for each of the six concerts.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 12 1939

Gieseking, Pianist, In Woolsey Hall Tuesday

On Wednesday evening, March 8, the Boston Symphony comes to New Haven for the season's second concert by this famous musical organization presided over by the dynamic Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. This great orchestral occasion rings down the curtain on the Woolsey Hall Concert Series of 1938-39.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 12 1939

Community Concert Drive For Series Memberships Will Be Opened Tomorrow

Large Number of Workers to Assist in Campaign in This City, Holyoke and Other Neighboring Communities — Attractions for Coming Year Include Boston Symphony, Lawrence Tibbett, Simon Barer and Operatic Quartet—Reserved Seat System to Be Continued — Mrs Laurence E. Baker Named Drive Secretary—Heads of Various Divisions Appointed for Local Campaign, With Mrs Richard P. Towne, Chairman, and Mrs William Skinner, 2d., Cochairman for Holyoke—Drive Will Be Brought to Close On Friday, the 24th

THE COMMUNITY Concert membership campaign for 1939-40 will open in this city, Holyoke and vicinity tomorrow and continue through Friday, the 24th, with a large corps of workers soliciting memberships from present and prospective members. The attractions for next year's series will be the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky; Lawrence Tibbett, leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera company; Simon Barer, pianist, and an operatic quartet composed of Josephine Antoine, Helen Ohlheim, Charles Kullman and John Brownlee.

Will Reserve Seats

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
FEB 12 1939

MYRA HESS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Myra Hess will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 17 and 18, and at the Symphony concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon following, February 20 and 21. The English pianist will appear with the orchestra in Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor, the first performance in Boston of this work. In the Monday and Tuesday series, she will be heard in Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme of the Friday and Saturday series with the Second Symphony of William Schuman, when the music of this composer will be heard for the first time hereabouts. William Schuman, born in New York, has studied music there and in Austria. He has written a number of choral and chamber works which have been performed. The Second Symphony, which is in one movement, was the prize winning composition in a national contest, and has been performed in New York, both in a public and in a broadcast concert. The Third Symphony of Sibelius, in C major, will be played in this programme, as well as Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto.

Dr. Koussevitzky announces performances of Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," for the programme of the Monday-Tuesday series, Richard Hale appearing as narrator. This programme will open with Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. No. 201. It will include, besides Schumann's Piano Concerto, Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

There will be a symphony concert in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, February 16. Serge Koussevitzky announces for this programme Vivaldi's orchestral Concerto in D minor, edited by Silotti; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf"; and Ravel's orchestration of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 12 1939

The Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, directed by Arthur Rodzinski is visiting New England, having played in Hartford on Friday, and scheduled for Springfield this afternoon; Providence is also on the list. The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy directing, played in Worcester last Thursday, with Arthur Rubinstein as soloist. The Boston Symphony is on tour to New Jersey and New York; when they return, Myra Hess will be soloist this weekend in five concerts—an unusual number for one engagement—for which Bostonians are duly grateful. Beethoven's Third Pianoforte Concerto will be played three times; the other work is not announced.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
FEB 12 1939

⁘ On the Records ⁘

By MICHAEL SHAW, JR.

WHETHER YOU THINK you are a modern or a classicist in music, the delectable Finale of Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat Major" is sure to get you, especially in the spirited performance of the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky (Victor Set M-529; six sides).

It is doubtful even if you have previously heard this second from the last of the estimable "Papa's" 104 credited symphonies. The entire work is given with a flair that at times might have surprised its composer, but, with the sense of humor that was his, he doubtless would have reaped the ultimate in enjoyment.

Laudable Texturing

Receiving its initial engraving, it is particularly fitting that it should be done by the Bostonians, for it was the featured work at their first concert in 1881. Apart from the Finale, with its coda containing a "bassoon joke," the instrumental texturing at the end of the second movement is laudably achieved without Koussevitsky demanding fussy detail of his men.

A little more fussiness by technicians would not have been amiss, for they stretch the piece over a side more than is necessary. Besides the question of price, it is time they learned that one of their jobs is to minimize to the ultimate the number of record changes.

Chorale for Strings

ROY HARRIS, who already leads American contemporaries in the number of works recorded, has one of his later compositions added by the Kreiner Sextette (Victor 12537). "Chorale for String Sextette" combines formal with new developments and is a well-balanced bit of writing, but, to one listener, at least, it is better mathematics than music.

After almost every chord Harris seems to say: "Q. E. D." There is no denying his sincerity, nor, we fear, his monotony. He still has to learn that eloquence depends on gradations of sound. Rounded reproduction prevails with the tone brought forth by Sylvan Shulman and Josef Gingold, violins; Edward Kreiner and Ely Lifshey, violas, and Alan Shulman and Carl Stern, cellos.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
FEB 12 1939

"Opera-on-Tour" Difficulties Ironed Out

Margaret Matzenauer will be contralto in Stravinsky's difficult "Oedipus Rex" with the Boston Symphony next month in Boston and New York. . . . In honor of her art and her gifts to French charity, Grace Moore now wears the Cross of a Knight of the Legion of Honor. . . . After several years' interval, Pierre Monteux again will guest-lead Amsterdam's Concertgebouw next season.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
Sunday News and Sentinel
FEB 12 1939

Menuhin to Play Friday

Young Violinist at the Pabst

HANDEL, Bach and Mendelssohn are the major figures on the program which Yehudi Menuhin, the violinist of 21 who rocketed to musical fame more than 11 years ago, will give at the Pabst theater Friday evening.

Menuhin, hailed all over the world as one of the greatest of violinists, is making his first Milwaukee appearance. Not for showmanship, though he draws huge crowds everywhere, but for sterling artistic qualities and for insight into the music he plays, has he been acclaimed by critics and fellow musicians.

The intimate friendship of this youth with such men as Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter and Serge Koussevitzky attests to his rank in the world of music.

Menuhin will play the Handel Sonata no. 6 in E major, the Bach Partita no. 3 in E major for unaccompanied violin and the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, besides a group of smaller pieces. The latter include Ernest Bloch's "Abodah," a Yom Kippur melody translated as "God's Worship," which Bloch dedicated to the young violinist. Hendrik Endt will be at the piano.

The complete program follows:

I. Sonata No. 6 in E Major.....Handel
  Adagio
  Allegro
  Largo
  Allegro
II. Partita no. 3 in E Major (for violin alone) ....Bach
  Preludio
  Loure
  Gavotte en Rondeau
  Menuett I—Menuett II
  Bourree
  Gigue
III. Concerto in E Minor, opus 64... .... Mendelssohn
  Allegro molto appassionato
  Andante
  Allegretto—Allegro molto Vivace
IV. (a) "Abodah" .... Bloch
  (b) Malaguena .... Sarasate
  (c) Zapateado (The Cobbler's Dance) .... Sarasate
  (d) La Fille aux cheveux de lin .... Debussy-Hartmann
  (e) Labyrinth (Caprice) ..Locatelli

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 12 1939

Koussevitzky Concert Offers Work by Bloch

Boston OrchestraAlso Plays Ravel Transcription and Mozart A MajorSymphony

By Jerome D. Bohm

Serge Koussevitzky's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon included repetitions of two of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, which had been performed here on Jan. 6; Ravel's transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which was played at last Friday night's concert; Mozart's symphony in A major (291), and Bloch's rhapsody, "Schelomo." The cello part in the latter was set forth by the orchestra's first cellist, Jean Bedetti.

Despite the opinion of the eminine Mozart scholars, T. de Wyzewa and G. de Saint-Foix that the A major symphony of Mozart, created in his eighteenth year, "is from the point of view of invention as well as that of "metier" the most perfect work to be met with in all this first part of the master's career, up to his departure for Mannheim and Paris," it sounded, at least to this reviewer, like one of Mozart's least inspired products, having neither the arresting thematic material nor the structural mastery which in the later symphonies resulted in masterpieces. The performance was an admirable one.

The Hindemith Symphonic Dances were not well received in some quarters when played here last, but the dirge-like dance in slow tempo and the ensuing lively one, with its recitative-like unisons, both superbly played, impressed some of yesterday's audience as being distinctly worth-while additions to the orchestral repertoire.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American
FEB 12 1939

'Carmen' In Restored

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making one of its longest local visits, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall gave its third concert within four days. The program commenced with Mozart's A major Symphony, played by an orchestra of intimate size. Into diminishing his band, Conductor Koussevitzky preserved the quality and outline of the work, maintaining the delicacy and charm of the music which was captured and communicated with extraordinary beauty and appeal.

Jean Bedette was heard in the solo 'cello part in Bloch's Hebrew Melody "Schelomo"; and the program scheduled two movements from Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition.

Myra Hess for Soloist at Commuters' Matinee

There will have been four appearances of Myra Hess, admirable English pianist, with the orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, during the five days from Friday through Tuesday next. Out-of-towners will be chiefly interested in the Tuesday afternoon concert, one of six monthly called "the commuters' matinees," which for their convenience are scheduled at 3 p. m.

The Tuesday program repeats the supplementary Monday night's program and includes Mozart's Symphony in A major (K-201), Schumann's piano concerto (with Miss Hess), Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" (Richard Hale, narrator) and Ravel's "La Valse."

Two of these numbers were heard in the recent Pension Fund concert in Boston repeated last week in New York on one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's frequent visits.

We personally have a long-standing admiration for Richard Hale, actor and baritone, whose two abilities fuse so well into the role of narrator—a performance of comic seriousness, perfectly dictioned and precisely measured; thoroughly cognizant in timing of the music, which illustrates by various instruments (Peter's jaunty air in string quartet; the bird, Mr. Laurent's flute; the horns for the wolf and so on to infinite delight). Mr. Hale was engaged by the Boston Symphony when Prokofieff himself conducted the first American performance, March 25, 1938, in Symphony Hall.

The other number from the waltz half of the Pension Fund program will be Ravel's "La Valse."

A. C. R.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
FEB 12 1939

Times-Herald Weekly Record Review

Although frequently given to exploiting new and modern works, Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra go back to the father of the symphony, F. J. Haydn, to present a brilliant and sparkling recording of the Symphony No. 102, in B flat major, in album M-529 (Victor).

Haydn did not have the orchestral resources both as to power and variety of voices that are now possible, but when a modern orchestra breathes new life into the older work, the result is most pleasing.

While Arthur Schnabel is a noted interpreter of Beethoven, he ably demonstrates his versatility of interpretation and technique in playing two works by Bach, the Toccata in C minor, and the Toccata in D major, album M-532. Schnabel may be trusted to deliver a profound and scholarly performance of any classic work he attempts and this album is no exception. This set will be of especial interest to those numerous piano students who devote much time to the fugue and toccata.

Bruno Walter left Vienna and stopped long enough in London to make some recordings with the London Symphony Orchestra. This month Victor offers his interpretation of the most tuneful ballet music written by Schubert for Rosamunde, and the noble phrasing of Beethoven's Coriolan Overture (or Coriolanus), each work on single large discs. C. L. B.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK
FEB 13 1939

RECORD WEEK

HAYDN—Symphony in B flat. (Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony. Three 12-inch Victor records, $6.50.) Of the Austrian's 100-odd symphonic works (the exact number is still disputed by scholars), this is one of the last—No. 102 among his catalogued symphonies and No. 9 among the dozen famous "Salomon" symphonies written by Haydn when he was past 60 and living in London. The performing artists make compliments fatuous.

OFFENBACH—Gaîté Parisienne. (London Philharmonic under Efrem Kurtz. Two 12-inch Columbia records, $3.25.) Follow-

170

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 12 1939

Community Concert Drive For Series Memberships Will Be Opened Tomorrow

Large Number of Workers to Assist in Campaign in This City, Holyoke and Other Neighboring Communities — Attractions for Coming Year Include Boston Symphony, Lawrence Tibbett, Simon Barer and Operatic Quartet—Reserved Seat System to Be Continued — Mrs Laurence E. Baker Named Drive Secretary—Heads of Various Divisions Appointed for Local Campaign, With Mrs Richard P. Towne, Chairman, and Mrs William Skinner, 2d., Cochairman for Holyoke—Drive Will Be Brought to Close On Friday, the 24th

THE COMMUNITY Concert membership campaign for 1939-40 will open in this city, Holyoke and vicinity tomorrow and continue through Friday, the 24th, with a large corps of workers soliciting memberships from present and prospective members. The attractions for next year's series will be the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky; Lawrence Tibbett, leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera company; Simon Barer, pianist, and an operatic quartet composed of Josephine [illegible], Helen Olheim, Charles Kullman and John Brownlee.

Will Reserve Seats

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
FEB 12 1939

MYRA HESS, SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Myra Hess will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 17 and 18, and at the Symphony concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon following, February 20 and 21. The English pianist will appear with the orchestra in Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor, the first performance in Boston of this work. In the Monday and Tuesday series, she will be heard in Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme of the Friday and Saturday series with the Second Symphony of William Schuman, when the music of this composer will be heard for the first time hereabouts. William Schuman, born in New York, has studied music there and in Austria. He has written a number of choral and chamber works which have been performed. The Second Symphony, which is in one movement, was the prize winning composition in a national contest, and has been performed in New York, both in a public and in a broadcast concert. The Third Symphony of Sibelius, in C major, will be played in this programme, as well as Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto.

Dr. Koussevitzky announces performances of Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," for the programme of the Monday-Tuesday series, Richard Hale appearing as narrator. This programme will open with Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. No. 201. It will include, besides Schumann's Piano Concerto, Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

There will be a symphony concert in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, February 16. Serge Koussevitzky announces for this programme Vivaldi's orchestral Concerto in D minor, edited by Siloti; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf"; and Ravel's orchestration of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 12 1939

The Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, directed by Arthur Rodzinski is visiting New England, having played in Hartford on Friday, and scheduled for Springfield this afternoon; Providence is also on the list. The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy directing, played in Worcester last Thursday, with Arthur Rubinstein as soloist. The Boston Symphony is on tour to New Jersey and New York; when they return, Myra Hess will be soloist this weekend in five concerts—an unusual number for one engagement—for which Bostonians are duly grateful. Beethoven's Third Pianoforte Concerto will be played three times; the other work is not announced.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
Sunday News and Sentinel
FEB 12 1939

Menuhin to Play Friday

Young Violinist at the Pabst

HANDEL, Bach and Mendelssohn are the major figures on the program which Yehudi Menuhin, the violinist of 21 who rocketed to musical fame more than 11 years ago, will give at the Pabst theater Friday evening.

Menuhin, hailed all over the world as one of the greatest of violinists, is making his first Milwaukee appearance. Not for showmanship, though he draws huge crowds everywhere, but for sterling artistic qualities and for insight into the music he plays, has he been acclaimed by critics and fellow musicians.

The intimate friendship of this youth with such men as Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter and Serge Koussevitzky attests to his rank in the world of music.

Menuhin will play the Handel Sonata no. 6 in E major, the Bach Partita no. 3 in E major for unaccompanied violin and the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, besides a group of smaller pieces. The latter include Ernest Bloch's "Abodah," a Yom Kippur melody translated as "God's Worship," which Bloch dedicated to the young violinist. Hendrik Endt will be at the piano.

The complete program follows:

I. Sonata No. 6 in E Major.....Handel
Adagio
Allegro
Largo
Allegro
II. Partita no. 3 in E Major (for violin alone) ....Bach
Preludio
Loure
Gavotte en Rondeau
Menuett I—Menuett II
Bourree
Gigue
III. Concerto in E Minor, opus 64...
....................Mendelssohn
Allegro molto appassionato
Andante
Allegretto—Allegro molto Vivace
IV. (a) "Abodah" ....Bloch
(b) Malaguena ....Sarasate
(c) Zapateado (The Cobbler's Dance) ....Sarasate
(d) La Fille aux cheveux de lin
..................Debussy-Hartmann
(e) Labyrinth (Caprice) ...Locatelli

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
FEB 12 1939

On the Records

By MICHAEL SHAW, JR.

WHETHER YOU THINK you are a modern or a classicist in music, the delectable Finale of Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat Major" is sure to get you, especially in the spirited performance of the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky (Victor Set M-529; six sides).

It is doubtful even if you have previously heard this second from the last of the estimable "Papa's" 104 credited symphonies. The entire work is given with a flair that at times might have surprised its composer, but, with the sense of humor that was his, he doubtless would have reaped the ultimate in enjoyment.

Laudable Texturing

Receiving its initial engraving, it is particularly fitting that it should be done by the Bostonians, for it was the featured work at their first concert in 1881. Apart from the Finale, with its coda containing a "bassoon joke," the instrumental texturing at the end of the second movement is laudably achieved without Koussevitsky demanding fussy detail of his men.

A little more fussiness by technicians would not have been amiss, for they stretch the piece over a side more than is necessary. Besides the question of price, it is time they learned that one of their jobs is to minimize to the ultimate the number of record changes.

Chorale for Strings

ROY HARRIS, who already leads American contemporaries in the number of works recorded, has one of his later compositions added by the Kreiner Sextette (Victor 12537). "Chorale for String Sextette" combines formal with new developments and is a well-balanced bit of writing, but, to one listener, at least, it is better mathematics than music.

After almost every chord Harris seems to say: "Q. E. D." There is no denying his sincerity, nor, we fear, his monotony. He still has to learn that eloquence depends on gradations of sound. Rounded reproduction prevails with the tone brought forth by Sylvan Shulman and Josef Gingold, violins; Edward Kreiner and Ely Lifshey, violas, and Alan Shulman and Carl Stern, cellos.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
FEB 12 1939

"Opera-on-Tour" Difficulties Ironed Out

Margaret Matzenauer will be contralto in Stravinsky's diffi- ult "Oedipus Rex" with the Boston Symphony next month in ston and New York. . . . In honor of her art and her gifts to ch charity, Grace Moore now wears the Cross of a Knight of Legion of Honor. . . . After several years' interval, Pierre Mon- again will guest-lead Amsterdam's Concertgebouw next son.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 12 1939

Koussevitzky Concert Offers Work by Bloch

Boston Orchestra Also Plays Ravel Transcription and Mozart A Major Symphony

By Jerome D. Bohm

Serge Koussevitzky's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon included repetitions of two of Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, which had been performed here on Jan. 6; Ravel's transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which was played at last Friday night's concert; Mozart's symphony in A major (201), and Bloch's rhapsody, "Schelomo." The cello part in the latter was set forth by the orchestra's first cellist, Jean Bedetti.

Despite the opinion of the eminent Mozart scholars, T. de Wyzewa and G. de Saint-Foix that the A major symphony of Mozart, created in his eighteenth year, "is from the point of view of invention as well as that of 'metier' the most perfect work to be met with in all this first part of the master's career, up to his departure for Mannheim and Paris," it sounded, at least to this reviewer, like one of Mozart's least inspired products, having neither the arresting thematic material nor the structural mastery which in the later symphonies resulted in masterpieces. The performance was an admirable one.

The Hindemith Symphonic Dances were not well received in some quarters when played here last, but the dirge-like dance in slow tempo and the ensuing lively one, with its recitative-like unisons, both superbly played, impressed some of yesterday's audience as being distinctly worth-while additions to the orchestral repertoire.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American
FEB 12 1939

'Carmen' In Restored

By GRENA BENNETT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making one of its longest local visits, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall gave its third concert within four days. The program commenced with Mozart's A major Symphony, played by an orchestra of intimate size. Into diminishing his band, Conductor Koussevitzky preserved the quality and outline of the work, maintaining the delicacy and charm of the music which was captured and communicated with extraordinary beauty and appeal.

Jean Bedetta was heard in the solo 'cello part in Bloch's Hebrew Melody "Schelomo"; and the program scheduled two movements from Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Myra Hess for Soloist at Commuters' Matinee

There will have been four appearances of Myra Hess, admirable English pianist, with the orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, during the five days from Friday through Tuesday next. Out-of-towners will be chiefly interested in the Tuesday afternoon concert, one of six monthly called "the commuters' matinees," which for their convenience are scheduled at 3 p. m.

The Tuesday program repeats the supplementary Monday night's program and includes Mozart's Symphony in A major (K-201), Schumann's piano concerto (with Miss Hess), Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" (Richard Hale, narrator) and Ravel's "La Valse."

Two of these numbers were heard in the recent Pension Fund concert in Boston repeated last week in New York on one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's frequent visits.

We personally have a long-standing admiration for Richard Hale, actor and baritone, whose two abilities fuse so well into the role of narrator—a performance of comic seriousness, perfectly dictioned and precisely measured; thoroughly cognizant in timing of the music, which illustrates by various instruments (Peter's jaunty air in string quartet; the bird, Mr. Laurent's flute; the horns for the wolf and so on to infinite delight). Mr. Hale was engaged by the Boston Symphony when Prokofieff himself conducted the first American performance, March 25, 1938, in Symphony Hall.

The other number from the waltz half of the Pension Fund program will be Ravel's "La Valse."

A. C. R.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
FEB 12 1939

Times-He

Weekly Record Review

Although frequently given to exploiting new and modern works, Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra go back to the father of the symphony, F. J. Haydn, to present a brilliant and sparkling recording of the Symphony No. 102, in B flat major, in album M-529 (Victor).

Haydn did not have the orchestral resources both as to power and variety of voices that are now possible, but when a modern orchestra breathes new life into the older work, the result is most pleasing.

While Arthur Schnabel is a noted interpreter of Beethoven, he ably demonstrates his versatility of interpretation and technique in playing two works by Bach, the Toccata in C minor, and the Toccata in D major, album M-532. Schnabel may be trusted to deliver a profound and scholarly performance of any classic work he attempts and this album is no exception. This set will be of especial interest to those numerous piano students who devote much time to the fugue and toccata.

Bruno Walter left Vienna and stopped long enough in London to make some recordings with the London Symphony Orchestra. This month Victor offers his interpretation of the most tuneful ballet music written by Schubert for Rosamunde, and the noble phrasing of Beethoven's Coriolan Overture (or Coriolanus), each work on single large discs.

C. L. B.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK
FEB 13 1939

RECORD WEEK

HAYDN—Symphony in B flat. (Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony. Three 12-inch Victor records, $6.50.) Of the Austrian's 100-odd symphonic works (the exact number is still disputed by scholars), this is one of the last—No. 102 among his catalogued symphonies and No. 9 among the dozen famous "Salomon" symphonies written by Haydn when he was past 60 and living in London. The performing artists make compliments fatuous.

OFFENBACH—Gaité Parisienne. (London Philharmonic under Efrem Kurtz. Two 12-inch Columbia records, $3.25.) Follow-

171

VARIED BILL GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra Under His Direction Plays A Major Symphony by Mozart

'SCHELOMO' IS ON PROGRAM

Bedetti Is 'Cello Soloist in Bloch Work—Hindemith's 'Dances' Repeated

N.Y. Times Feb. 12/39

By OLIN DOWNES

The deeds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its builder and leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, grow with the doing, if not with the telling. To the sensational effect, now historic, which this conductor and orchestra achieved when they played the Eighth Bruckner Symphony last Friday night is to be added the record of the performances yesterday of an adorable symphony of Mozart; the repetition from an earlier New York program of Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances"; the performance of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," with Bedetti as soloist, in the presence of the composer, and, one of the most famous of the chef d'oeuvres of this orchestra, the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

It would be hard to find a program which offered more of contrast and which required more versatility of understanding and of style. The Mozart symphony was the one in A major, numbered in Koeckel catalogue 201, and it was played with ineffable simplicity, finish and feeling. It is not one of the grand Mozart symphonies, nor the most elaborate in workmanship, but it is perfect in its genre, in the flow of the ideas, in the inspired instrumentation. It need hardly be pointed out how great a test of the highest attributes of orchestral playing is constituted by such a symphony. This Stradivarius of an orchestral met every test triumphantly.

Introduced Earlier in Season

Dr. Koussevitzky's repetition of the Hindemith "Symphonic Dances," which he had introduced here earlier in the season, was a fine deed for a piece of very significant modern music. For the "Symphonic Dances," received with reservations by a portion of the public and press commentators, this writer among them, on the occasion of their first hearing, were received yesterday afternoon with unreserved and emphatic approval. The present reviewer was constrained materially to modify his earlier opinion. True, the same thing that was obvious at the earlier performance was more fully realized yesterday, namely, that these "Dances" do not represent "abstract music"—music created only with tonal design, without emotional intention. This is music highly charged with feeling and drama.

Secondly, as the development of the ideas by the composer becomes clearer its logic, mastery and imagination become the more inescapable. Those who consider that so-called "classic" composition means music primarily of design and secondarily of feeling, while music coming under the head of "romantic" is music of free and subjective impulse, would be inclined to class this late work of Hindemith in the "romantic" category. And it is music of intense emotion, free in form, so far as the classic symphonic model is concerned. At the same time, if by "classic" we mean clarity, proportion and logic of structure, we must accord the Hindemith score a very high percentage of these qualities.

As a matter of fact, classifications, especially in art, are likely to be deadly, preservative only of the letter and not the spirit of the law. Hindemith's music is deeply charged and powerfully wrought stuff, liable to emerge, as we become familiar with it, as one of his masterpieces. It has two contrasted moods, or effects, the one of tragedy; the other one of drama, and solemn pronunciation, and triumph. Thematically parts of the score are intricately related and contingent upon each other. But this is a side issue, a structural consideration, only important to the listener as it enables him the better to comprehend the gist of the musical discourse. The important thing is the sheer musical and expressive value of the work, its quality as it stands, outside of personal interpretations or definitions. In introducing this composition in New York, and repeating it, Dr. Koussevitzky has done another of his numberless services to art.

Work of First 'Cellist

Jean Bedetti, long known as the first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, and a great virtuoso to boot, played the 'cello part in the performance of Bloch's "Schelomo" in a very admirable manner. It was good to hear the score again, and again to be swept away by its energy, color and profound racial impulse. It is music inbued with the ceremony and mystery of the Temple, age-old lamentation and bitter wisdom, and the fury of the ancient prophets. It is truly Hebraic. The Song of Solomon and the Book of Job are both in it—implicit in the cantilena of the solo instrument, the outcries of fanatical denunciation, the thought, in the last monologue of the 'cello, of the vanity of man and his dreams, and the purple and gold of the orchestration. The performance was one of insight and virtuosity of soloist and orchestra. For our part, we would have wished certain pages to have a more elemental fury, wailing intensity, impassioned rhetoric. Too many refinements can lose a part of the force that is in this grand and savage music.

The composer was present on this occasion as listener. Long and hearty applause called conductor and 'cellist repeatedly back to the platform, and it was attempted to induce Mr. Bloch to show himself on the stage. He bowed from a box, and applauded the performers. The reception of his music, which so moved the audience, must have been gratifying to him.

It is now unnecessary to describe the manner of this orchestra's playing of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Tableaux." They were worthily repeated from earlier concerts. We now maintain that Dr. Koussevitzky owes his New York audiences at least two other repetitions. One is of the delicious humor of Prokofieff's children's tale of "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as Narrator. The other is of the Bruckner Eighth Symphony.

Koussevitzky Concert Offers Bloch Rhapsody

N.Y. Tribune [illegible]

Boston Orchestra Also Plays Ravel Transcription and Mozart A Major Symphony

By Jerome D. Bohm

Serge Koussevitszy's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon included repititions of two of Hinedmuith's Symphonic Dances which had been performed here on Jan. 6; Ravel's transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exihibition," which was played at last Friday night's concert; Mozart's smyphony in A major (291), and Bloch's rhapsody, "Schelomo." The cellor part in the latter was set forth by the orchestra's first cellist, Jean Bedtti.

Despite the opinion of the eminine Mozart scholars, T. de Wyzewar and G. de Saint-Foix that the A major symphony of Mozart created in his eighteenth year, "is from the point of view of invention as well as that of "metier" the most perfect work to be met with in all this first part of the master's career, up to his departure for Mannheim and Paris," it sounded, at least to this reviewer, like one of Mozart's least inspired products, having neither the arresting thematic material nor the structural mastery which in the later symphonies resulted in masterpieces. The performance was an admirable one. Mr. Kousevitzky employed a reduced orchestra in keeping with the simple instrumentation of the symphony.

The Hindemith symphonic dances were not well received in some quarters when played here last, but the dirge-like dance in slow tempo and the ensuing lively one, with its recitative-like unisons, both superbly played, impressed some of yesterday's audience as being distinctly worth-while additions to the orchestral repertoire.

However, the best music disclosed at this concert was Bloch's "Schelomo," one of the indisputably lasting musical creations of our time. It was interpreted both by soloist and orchestra with the essential rich sonorities and with a full revelation of its impassioned contents.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

FEB 13 1939

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra wound up their current Carnegie Hall concerts last Saturday afternoon. Aside from the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," both played at previous concerts, the program offered the Mozart Symphony in A major (K. 201) and Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo." In the latter the soloist was the orchestra's first cellist, Jean Bedetti

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 13 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Philharmonic-Symphony League Promotes Special Concert—Toscanini Conducts Brahms—Other Events of Weekend Chiefly Orchestral

Of the women who assert themselves more and more each year in the world of music, perhaps no one has exerted a greater influence than Nadia Boulanger around whose presence the Philharmonic Symphony League built its gala concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday night. As one of the most dynamic personalities of the present-day musical world, she is as unassuming as she is accomplished in her versatility. She conducted the orchestra for the first half of the concert, appeared as organist in the performance of her sister's composition, "Pous Les FuneRailles d'un Soldat," and played as one of the pianists in Mozart's Concert for two pianos, in E Flat, displaying a mastery that is probably even the more admirable in her indefatigable efforts to guide promising composers. If the concert was given in her honor, she honored both the league and the audience by her presence.

She conducted with a directness that gave brilliance to Szalowski's Overture, a wrok rhythmically alive and highly spirited, with a sensitivity that made eloquent the simple beauty of four vocal works of Monteverdi, tastefully sung by the Monteverdi Singers, and a Faure Nocture for orchestra, and with spirit the polished score of Jean Francaix's Piano Concerto in its first American hearing, with the compose as soloist. The conceto was decidedly French in its rhythmic, pecises and hardly weighty material, assuming a similarity in the final two movements with the brittle superficialities of the first. It was all highly polished in both the composition and the performance, with its chief merit entertainment. M. Francaix proved as facile as his music.

John Barbirolli assumed the direction of the rest of the concert given over to Lili Boulanger's composition and the Mozart. The league is to be heartily congratulated for this unusual concert.

* * *

All-Brahams Program

In the face of a truly magnificent performance of the Brahms Fourth Symphony, the remainder of Toscanin's all-Brahms program with the NBC Symphony Orchestra on Saturday night was an anti-climax. It may be that New York has never heard the Brahms Fourth played with such driving intensity and such heaven-storming greatness, for the culmination of the performance in that momentous passacaglia at the end was almost unbelievable in its emotional strength and olympian utterance. All this happened after a somewhat uncertain beginning, when one readily assumed that this would be just another of Toscanini's usual performances. It proved to be otherwise, for the limitless energy of the conductor rose to fiery pitch as the music enveloped him. He sang lustily while conducting as a man possessed and the orchestra rose to the occasion and gave everything it had.

The second half of the program contained the Liebeslièder Waltzes for piano duet and mixed voices, and the Academic Overture. Erich Leinsdorf of the Metropolitan and Joseph Kahn were the pianists. There were 16 singers. While there was much to praise in the uninimity of singers and pianists, reservations as to tempo and effectiveness crept into the lister's mind as the performance progressed. All was done with clarity and delicacy, if not with perfection in matters of interpretation. The overture ran true to form, but for the best effect should have opened the concert, thus leaving the symphony to the last.

* * *

Boston Matinee

The first of Saturday's three orchestral concerts was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Koussevitzky conducted the Mozart Symhony in A heard here on Thursday, Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, Bloch's rhapsody, "Schelom," with Jean Bedetti as soloist, and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition." The performances were superb.

It was the dance in slow tempo that held more interest than when the Hindemith was first heard on the last visit of the Bostonians, the more lively one still sounding noisy and superficial. The Bloch deserved to be heard again, for it is a ranking composition whose worth is yet to be recognized. The Ravel orchestration of the Moussorgsky has always been one of the Boston's most accomplished and brilliant performances.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 13 1939

The Boston Symphony.

The composer of "Schelomo," Ernest Bloch, was present to bow from a box in acknowledgment of the applause evoked by this work's performance at Saturday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. After more than a score of years it wears well. Few works of its time—it was composed in 1916—have for audiences of today the freshness and vitality that it exerted at this rehearing. Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, achieved the solo part warmly and well. Mr. Koussevitzky and his ensemble played no favorites in bestowing their virtuosity on a program of brilliant and satisfying substance. Altogether delightful in its clarity, sympathy and animation was the playing of Mozart's symphony in A major (No. 201 of Koechel's catalogue), in which the strings were of the finest quality. Two repetitions from earlier programs of the Bostonians, Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances" and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exposition," were representative of the orchestra at its best.

O. T.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 13 1939

Boston Symphony

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Winding up a busy week in New York, the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra and its leader Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon in a richly varied program, the single repetition being the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," which had figured on the previous night's list.

Mr. Koussevitzky's special fondness for Mozart came out in the opening number, the A major symphony (K. 201). The reading had an ineffable grace and purity of line that beggar praise. Each of the movements was a gem of exquisite delicacy and the four sections were bound together in a complete and wondrously finished fabric.

From an earlier program of some weeks before Mr. Koussevitsky brought back Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances." These expertly, absorbingly contrived "abstractions" were lucidly expounded by the orchestra. Complex patterns unfolded one after and above another in crystal-clear order.

This Hindemith must have thought fugues the moment his brain began to function. They chatter as blithely as speech through the "lebhaft" section, sometimes forced under by the scheme of things, but popping up again like geysers.

The afternoon's soloist was the orchestra's first 'cellist, Jean Bedetti, who was heard in a communicative and tonally pure rendering of the solo portions of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo." Mr. Bloch, who was present, took a bow from a box.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

FEB 13 1939

COMMUNITY CONCERT DRIVE IS OPENED

A big mail, lots of telephone calls and the personal appearance of a great many of an interested public, started the Community Concert association drive, sponsored and run by the Junior League of Springfield, Mass., inc., off with a loud bang this morning at their headquarters at Steinert's Music store, 1217 Main street.

The artists for the concerts of the season 1939-'40 were announced Friday night at the last concert of this season. They will include Lawrence Tibbett, baritone; Simon Barer, pianist; a Metropolitan opera quartet consisting of Charles Kullman, tenor; Josephine Antoine, soprano; Helen Olheim, contralto, and John Brownlee, baritone. The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear [illegible] special request of the general public.

A subscription drive, in outlying suburban town and cities, under the direction of Mrs Harlow Kibbe, is being made by team captains in those towns. Mrs John Kirby will handle the drive in Chicopee; Mrs S. R. Carsley, Palmer; Mrs John Casson, Suffield; Mrs George W. Clark, Westfield; Mrs William C. Hamilton, West Springfield; Mrs Donald Benson, Wilbraham; Mrs Philip Palamountain, Ware; Miss Marion Clark, East Longmeadow, and Mrs Alice Hoyt in Ludlow. The Holyoke team, with headquarters at Heidner's Music store in that city is in charge of Mrs Richard P. Towne and Mrs William Skinner, 2d.

Proof of the success of the reserved seating plan, inaugurated by the Springfield association last year, was confirmed at headquarters this morning by the large number of requests for the same seats held during the last season.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 14 1939

STRAVINSKY TRIP TO U. S. CANCELLED

Death of His Daughter Causes Conductor to Abandon Plan

The recent death of a daughter of Igor Stravinsky has made it impossible for him to come to this country next month to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced last night. Mr. Stravinsky does not feel that he can leave his wife at this time.

The composer was to have been guest conductor of the orchestra for two weeks, giving programs of his own works. One of these weeks, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The other week, Ernest Bloch will be guest conductor, playing programs the afternoons of March 17 and 21 and the evenings of March 18 and 20, in Symphony Hall, and the evening of March 16 in Cambridge.

The Russian fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf," with music by Prokofieff, will be on the program for the next concert by the orchestra here, the evening of Feb. 28. Richard Hale, who was narrator at the pension fund concerts in Boston and New York, will be the narrator here.

Second Thoughts B. Trans

A second hearing of the Symphony by William Schumann at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky on Saturday night left this attestant with a feeling of renewed pleasure. The young composer clearly knew what he wanted to say and how to say it. Furthermore—and this is more obviously a matter of opinion—what he had to say was worth saying. The composer, again on hand to hear what sounded like an excellent performance, was greeted by considerably more applause than had been the case at the Friday matinee.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NEWS
FEB 13 1939

72

HOW ABOUT THE G. G. I. E. MUSIC,

Swing Bands Have Place But So Have Other Things

Inquiries From Many Places Indicate There Is Interest in What Our Own Musical Forces Have to Offer

BY MARJORY M. FISHER
The News Music Editor

An open letter to Harris D. Connick,
G. G. I. E., San Francisco.

Dear Sir: For the past year you have been talking to the press about your magnificent library of opera scores (including copies of every opera ever published and your big ideas re music for Treasure Island in 1939.) The ideas were excellent, running the gamut from Toscanini down to the Radio City Ballet which you considered the greatest dance aggregation in the world.

Up to the present moment, which is just five days before the Exposition opens, you have announced nothing of any musical import whatever, except the very negative statement that Toscanini would not be here. But who, or what, will—apart from radio shows, brass bands, dance orchestras and Sally Rand?

It may be a matter of news to you that people are writing from all parts of the country for the music schedule at the Fair. Persons planning vacations have written to the San Francisco Symphony office to know the orchestra's schedule at Treasure Island. New York editors have wired and written in vain in an effort to ascertain our music plans—ready and eager to publicize them throughout the nation.

What answer have they received? None. For the "tomorrow" or "next week," when an official announcement was to be forthcoming, never arrived.

New York Knows Now

We are advised it is all a matter of money shortage. Maybe so. But Olin Downes didn't have any money when he started the New York Fair music plans either. He took the post of music director much against his own inclinations, because he foresaw what would happen if he didn't. Then he started out to prove his case. How well he did it is now a matter of history. How he got the $1,200,000 fund for music activities is too long a tale to relate here. But he did it.

People are coming from far and near to witness the arts of the Pacific Basin on Treasure Island. San Francisco certainly touches the Pacific and we have one of the finest symphony orchestras in any land and one of the few municipal choruses in the country. And what have you signed up for opening day?

It Could Happen

Oh, yes! You wanted to get Jeanette MacDonald to sing the "Star Spangled Banner." That would have been a delightful idea, provided she was backed up by the San Francisco Symphony and the Municipal Chorus. But nothing of the sort seems destined to occur.

It so happens the East has listened to a lot of malicious propaganda that this is a ghost city. If Easterners come here and find only imported and (in some instances) third-rate concert attractions on the island, they will retain the same low opinion they now hold.

Don't think for an instant any one underestimates the importance of brass bands, dance orchestras and plenty of the popular type of musical entertainment. They all have their place. But are you so sure that they will have a bigger drawing power than symphonies, chamber music, choruses and concert stars as to justify booking such organizations for a longer period and for much higher sums than you are allotting to the latter type? If so, we beg to differ.

It is conceivable that Sally Rand's Nude Farm and Benny Goodman's Swing Band (if it comes) may draw more persons than a symphony orchestra. Just as it is possible to suppose that more 1915 Exposition-goers saw "Stella" than heard the Boston Symphony in Festival Hall. But which, may I ask you, did the greatest ultimate good and proved of the more lasting value.

Worth Featuring

The San Francisco Symphony, the Municipal Chorus, the Wood-Wind Ensemble and the San Francisco String Quartet should be heard on Treasure Island frequently throughout the run of the Fair. Not to the exclusion of imported musical attractions, but side by side with them. And they should be given equal prominence.

Furthermore, conductors should be encouraged to present American music and big works not regularly a part of the concert repertoire. But if there is any dictatorship in connection with programs, the musicians themselves should be the dictators—for they are the ones who are going to be praised or censured by the public for the fare they offer.

But it is you, and you alone (according to all reports), who will be blamed or praised for the choice of attractions.

It is not too late, even now, to do something about it. If Olin Downes could prove to all the powers-that-be in New York that money spent for music would be a profitable investment for the World's Fair, you can prove it here. If it isn't a matter of money, why the silence?

Only you can say.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
FEB 15 1939

Symphony Concert Dolled Up With Acting And Singing

Philadelphia Orchestra Presents Goethe's 'Egmont' With Kirsten Flagstad And Richard Hale Interpreting Portions

NEW YORK, Feb. 14 (AP)—A program more like Friday afternoon in the district school than a regular symphony concert brought the Philadelphia Orchestra to Carnegie Hall tonight. There was speaking and singing as well as the usual instrumental fare.

Conductor Eugene Ormandy wanted his audience to get a good idea of Goethe's "Egmont," the drama for which Beethoven wrote extensive incidental music.

So he engaged Kirsten Flagstad, Metropolitan Opera soprano, Richard Hale, actor, and included his own orchestra. This is what happened:

First the orchestra played the overture to "Egmont."

Next Hale read an excerpt from the drama beginning, "Peace My People."

Then the second entr'acte was played, and Hale recited again. At this point Flagstad rose and sang one of Clarchen's songs: "Die Trommel Geruehret."

Things went on this way until the orchestra concluded the first New York performance of this sort in decades by playing the Seventh Beethoven Symphony.

Symphony orchestras have been dressing up their performances a lot of late. Last Wednesday the Boston Symphony dressed up in costumes and presented a sort of symphonic vaudeville in Carnegie Hall. And Saturday night the Philharmonic-Symphony combined periods and styles astonishingly, at a concert featuring Nadia Boulenger.

EL DORADO, ARK.
NEWS
FEB 14 1939

STUDENTS HISS CONDUCTOR AND HE MERELY GRINS

BOSTON (UP)—The "unheard of" has happened. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra conductor, has been hissed—by students. But it was all in fun.

Apparently disturbed by the presence of spectators at a rehearsal of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in which Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs were participating, the maestro let it be known during intermission that friends of the singers would be barred from future rehearsals.

A wave of hisses greeted the announcement. But Koussevitzky grinned and the rehearsal was resumed.

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS
FEB 14 1939

Balokovic And Symphony

Whether the European civilizations of the future will produce the great musicians of the past is a question which is worrying many lovers of music in these days. For it appears that individual talents are being minimized in the interests of great mass movements to glorify the State and its rulers, as the idea of the totalitarian State spreads in Central Europe. But at least we may enjoy the musicians we have, and there is all the more reason for taking advantage of the opportunities we have to enjoy them now.

Tomorrow evening, the renowned Yugoslav violinist, Zlatko Balokovic comes to the Memorial Auditorium as the soloist with the Vermont Symphony Orchestra, presenting its second subscription concert of the season. Balokovic has just returned from European triumphs and is to make two appearances in Vermont—here and in Rutland—before going to Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony on March 3 and 4. Thus Vermonters will enjoy the same musical event which Bostonians will enjoy later in the season.

RALEIGH, N. C.
TIMES
FEB 14 1939

Noted Musicians To Play at UNC

CHAPEL HILL—Emma Otera Cuban soprano, and Orlando Barrera, Italian violinist, noted musicians, will appear in Memorial Hal at the University Monday evening February 20, under the auspices o the Student Entertainment committee.

Miss Otera returned to Americ after a successful tour of eigh European capitals last spring. Copenhagen, Stockholm, Helsingfors Oslo, Brussels, The Hague, Amsterdam and Paris, all received the young Cuban singer enthusiastically, demanding second performances.

Barora, 31 years old, is a graduate of the conservatoire in Bologna, and is an accomplished pianist as well as violinist. In February, 1936, he made his New York debut, returning to Town Hall the following December to play on the famous "Ward" Stradivarious from the Whittall Collection of the Library of Congress. He has played soloist under Koussevitzky in the Boston Ex Symphony, besides performing in the same capacity with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, Budapest, Moscow and Prague

---

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN
FEB 15 1939

Boston Programs.

At the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week [illegible] afternoon and Saturday evening Myra Hess, admired English pianist, will be assisting artist. She will play the Third Piano Concerto of Beethoven. A Schumann Second Symphony will be played for the first time in Boston. But this is the work of William of that name, a young American composer. The program will be rounded out with the Third Symphony of Sibelius.

At the supplementary series concerts next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Miss Hess will again be soloist. This time she will play the Schumann Piano Concerto. The program will open with the Mozart Symphony in A major and will also include two of the numbers presented at the recent pension fund concert, Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" with Richard Hale as narrator, and Ravel's "La Valse."

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
FEB 16 1939

Famed Violinist Here For Concert Tonight

Zlatko Balokovic, the Yogoslavian violinist, who is to appear with the Vermont Symphony orchestra in its initial program at the city hall this evening, is scheduled to play with the Boston Symphony orchestra later in the season. The program starts at 8 o'clock.

Mr. and Mrs. Balokovic will be guests at Montpelier Tavern during their stay in this city.

Alan Carter of Woodstock will direct the symphony and Edwin Sherrard of Norwich is the concert-maestro.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 15 1939

THE Lyons Den

By LEONARD LYONS

LAMENT: Herbert Hoover, now visiting here, witnessed a performance of "Leave It to Me," and then went backstage to visit Victor Moore and William Gaxton, who had starred in "Of Thee I Sing" . . . "Well," Hoover told the Wintergreen and Throttlebottom of that Pulitzer Prize play, "I'm glad you're laying off Presidents now". . ."Yes, this season it's Ambassadors," said Moore, who portrays an American Ambassador to Russia. . ."Listen," Hoover returned, "I'm almost tempted to write a musical comedy too—what with the experiences I've had with our Ambassadors."

DEFEAT: Mayor LaGuardia was another backstage visitor last night. He saw "The Boys From Syracuse," and then went back to see Jimmie Savo and Eddie Albert . . . The Mayor was invited to pose for photographs. . ."I do this twice a year," sighed the Mayor of New York, "but the papers never print the picture."

HASTE: A few Sundays ago Will Geer, who was featured in "Sing Out the News," was scheduled to go to Boston, and preside at the Lenin Memorial meeting there . . . Geer, who had overslept, leaped from his bed, went downstairs, borrowed $5 from his landlady and rushed for the train . . . En route, he lost the $5, raced to a hotel whose credit manager knew him, and cashed a check . . . Geer then ran for the train, and was distressed because floods delayed the trip for almost two hours.

He arrived in Boston, taxied to the meeting-hall, and rushed by the guards and down the aisle . . . Geer was pleased when, in a hurried glance, he noticed that the house was packed and that music was being supplied . . . The meeting's "chairman," however, had his back to the audience. Geer walked up to him, and only then did he discover that he had arrived three hours before schedule—and that he was addressing Serge Koussevitzky, who was conducting the Boston Symphony.

13

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEE 1 5 1939

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Beethoven'sMusic to 'Egmont,' by the Phi!adelphians and Flagstad

New York concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor; assisting artists: Kirsten Flagstad, soprano; Richard Hale, reader. All-Beethoven program.

1. Music to Goethe's Tragedy, "Egmont"
   - Overture
   - Recitation
   - Entr'acte II
   - Recitation
   - Song: "Die Trommel geruehret"
   - Recitation
   - Song: "Freudvoll und Leidvol"
   - Entr'acte III
   - Recitation
   - "Clarchen's Death"
   - "Melodrama"
   - Recitation
   - "Symphony of Victory"

   Soprano: Kirsten Flagstad
   Reader: Richard Hale
2. Scena and Aria, "Ah, Perfido!"
   Kirsten Flagstad

Intermission

3. (a) "Die ehre Gottes aus der Natur"
   (b) Aria: "Abscheulicher!" from Act I, "Fidelio"
   Kirsten Flagstad
4. Symphony No. 7 in A major
   (I) Poco sostenuto. Vivace
   (II) Allegretto
   (III) Presto. Presto meno assai
   (IV) Finale. Allegro con brio

Kirsten Flagstad

Singing with the Philadelphia Orchestra

MR. ORMANDY and the Philadelphia Orchestra deserve our gratitude for letting us hear at their Tuesday evening concert a substantial part of Beethoven's music for Goethe's "Egmont." They deepened our gratitude by engaging no less an artist than Kirsten Flagstad to sing the two songs allotted to Clärchen in Beethoven's score, and by securing Richard Hale (fresh from his adventures with Peter and the Wolf at Wednesday's Boston Symphony concert) to recite passages from the text of the tragedy.

Vocally we had Goethe in bilingual form, Mme. Flagstad singing "Die Trommel Gerühret" and "Freudvoll und leidvoll" in German, and Mr. Hale declaiming Egmont's speeches in somebody's English translation.

* * *

But with due respect for Mr. Hale and his admirable reading of his lines, it was Beethoven's music that counted, after all. Madame de Staël considered "Egmont" "the finest of Goethe's tragedies." George Henry Lewes (a most worthy man of letters, whose chief distinction for the present generation is bound up with his achievement in not having found it necessary to make George Eliot a British matron) dismissed the drama as being "very, very far from a masterpiece." "As a tragedy," he added, "criticism makes sad work of it."

* * *

One is content to let the late Mr. Lewes fight that matter out with Goethe's ghost. The fact remains that for most concert-goers—if not for most cultivated persons outside of central Europe—"Egmont" has become synonymous with the mighty Overture of Beethoven—as the Coriolanus of Shakespeare and Josef von Collin and Roman history exists today largely because he inspired Beethoven to another engulfing and gigantic overture.

The greatest music has probably not received sufficient credit for its power to make whatever it touches peculiarly its own. Who, today, thinks of the vast accretion of legend and literature about the figures of Tristan and Iseult except as the scaffolding for an opera by Wagner?

* * *

Something of an analagous sort, indeed, has happened to Beethoven himself. His opera "Fidelio" survives on the stage with recurrent vitality, and for some it is a wonderful and treasurous work. Yet for even so devout a Beethovenian as Richard Wagner, the heart and essence of that opera seemed to have been transferred to the greatest of the four overtures that Beethoven composed for it, leaving the stage-work almost superfluous.

A like fate has descended upon the music that Beethoven composed for Goethe's "Egmont." He wrote for the drama, in addition to an overture, nine numbers: four entr'actes, two songs sung by Clärchen, and three orchestral movements: "Clärchen's Death," "Melodrama," and a "Triumph Symphony" (the material of the latter appears in the Coda of the Overture). The music was performed for the first time, in conjunction with the drama, at the Hofburg Theater, Vienna, May 24, 1810.

* * *

How many concert-goers had ever heard any of this music besides the Overture, and perhaps the two songs, until Mr. Ormandy played it with the Philadelphians? How many musicians—save those whose business it is to know such things—have ever seen the score of the "Egmont" music in the Complete Edition? For most of us—certainly for most concert-goers—"Egmont" and his tragedy are epitomized with overwhelming sufficiency in the magnificent Overture that all the symphonic concert world has heard a thousand times: here are "Egmont," his valor and his martyrdom and his spiritual triumph, enclosed for ever in music of incomparable dramatic eloquence.

* * *

This, one is tempted to say, is all we need to know of Egmont.

* * *

Yet that is perhaps too hasty a conclusion. The second of Clärchen's songs, "Freudvoll und leidvoll," has some of Beethoven's quality, and when it is sung as it was on Tuesday night by Mme. Flagstad one is tempted to rank it higher than it may deserve. But several of the entr'actes are masterly, and the music that accompanies Clärchen's death scene is among the most poignant of Beethoven's instrumental utterances. There are few things in his music more sharply and searchingly expressive as the passage in which the sorrowful cantilena of the muted first violins ascends to the bitter dissonance that is the sforzando climax of their piteous lament. This brief interlude, played with unforgettable tenderness and beauty by the Philadelphians, was the high point of an admirable performance.

* * *

After the "Egmont" music, there was more Beethoven—the Seventh Symphony, and three arias, ("Ah, perfido," "Die ehre Gottes," and the "Abscheulicher" from "Fidelio"), sung with conquering splendor of tone and mastery of style by the unapproachable artist who was the evening's guest of honor.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

Feb. 15/39

Starring ★ ★ ★ ★

The New RECORDS

By D. S. Steinfirst

Chabrier—Cottilon—Ballet

★★ London Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Antal Dorati, Columbia No. X-113

This is a first recording of this complete ballet, although the Scherzo is probably already familiar music to many Chabrier adherents. The whole ballet is brilliant, exhuberant and witty music, and the wood-winds of the London Philharmonic do yeoman service. The recording is singularly clear and free from surface flaws. The set consists of two records (four sides).

Haydn—Symphony No. 102. B Flat Major

★★★★ Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, Victor No. [illegible]

Anyone who heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play this season in Pittsburgh will recall this lovely Haydn Symphony. Its performance at that time was one of the high lights of the concerts and its recording here is equally notable. The Boston's strings were never reproduced with a more velvety finish, nor the wood-winds more clearly. There has not been a previous recording of this Symphony. Why? No one knows, but this is worth waiting for.

AUBURN, N. Y.
CITIZEN - ADVERTISER

FEB 1 5 1939

WALK-OUT.

In Carnegie Hall last week Serge Koussevitzky conducted Joseph Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" before a pleasant, interested audience. When the "Farewell Symphony" was first presented at Esterhaz, 176 years ago, it was also a success. But its first authentic performance in the United States some years ago under the direction of Leopold Stokowski was anything but a triumph.

Haydn and his orchestra staged their performance as a sort of "walk-out strike", a hint that they would profit by and enjoy a vacation. During the finale each musician as he finished his part, blew out his candle and quietly retired. The hint was taken pleasantly. The orchestra got its vacation.

The Carnegie Hall players, complete with wigs and gold lace, followed the Haydn performance faithfully. And the audience accepted history instead of tradition without a murmur. But Philadelphia music-lovers will remember Stokowski's reproduction of the "Farewell Symphony." The orchestra wore no costumes, but they did indulge in candle-blowing and departure. The result was catastrophic. One old lady, insulted beyond the limits of decorum, slammed a door behind her as she left the auditorium. Before the last candle had been extinguished, protest was vocal and vehement.

If memory is faithful, this was the year Stokowski took leave of his Philadelphia audience in the manner which has made him noted for other things than musical genius. He thanked the balcony for its appreciation and consideration, then looked at the members of the audience in the orchestra seats and told them he hoped their colds would be better.

The breach has since been healed, but Stokowski, a man before his time, must look with real annoyance at the success of the Koussevitzky performance. The way of the innovator is sometimes hard and a "walk-out strike" may cut both ways.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

FEB 1 6 1939

Small Town Talk

SORRY to hear Mrs. J. Hector McNeal has a dislocated arm. Her daughters, Mrs. Freddie Van Lennep and Mrs. Frederick McCormack, are having a reunion in Bermuda, where the former is visiting at the latter's home on the sunny isle. . . . Dog lovers are having themselves a time in Gotham where their pets are being exhibited in Madison Square Garden. Mrs. Isaac Jeanes has gone over, as have the Saunders Meades and others. 'Twould make life much easier if Philadelphia dog fanciers had swank "dog-wagons" like the one the Angie Biddle Dukes trail behind their car. It's painted red and blue, the colors of their kennels, and houses pointers, beagles and setters. . . . Congrats to Clifford Hawley, Jr., who recently celebrated his birthday.

GERTRUDE ELY
. . . has guests from Paris.

IF you see three out-of-towners in Miss Gertrude Ely's box at the Orchestra tomorrow, they're musicians from Paris: Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, organist, pianist, lecturer and conductor, who has the distinction of being the only woman who ever conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony; Doda Conrad, singer of Polish birth, son of Maria Freund, famous lieder singer of Europe, and Jean Francaix, composer and pianist who recently performed a concerto of his own composition with the New York Philharmonic. . . . They're all set at Episcopal Academy for their annual entertainment tomorrow night. It's "Pinafore," and is put on by the Middle School and the school's dramatic society, the Domino Club.

CARLISLE, PA.
SENTINEL

FEB 1 6 1939

The World of Music

By LOUIS F. KEEMLE

New York (U.P.) — The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitzky impersonating Mozart, conducting from a period spinet from the Casedesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

Another out-of-the-ordinary event was the second intimate dinner concert in the Empire Room of the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria by Macklin Marrow and an ensemble from the New York Philharmonic Symphony. The audience went through an elaborate menu of some 40 items to choose from.

Then the ensemble played an easy-to-listen-to program which included such selections as Wagner's "Siegfried-Idyll," the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the waltz song from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," the polka from Weinberger's "Schwanda" and similar numbers.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

9 FEB 1 7 1939

Output of Creative Musicians Hurt by War Scares, Says Pianist

Boston, Feb. 16—(AP)—Myra Hess, famous English pianist, today predicted the output of creative musicians of this era would "suffer" because of Europe's "perennial war scares."

Here to play four concerts in five days with the Boston Symphony, Miss Hess said in an interview "Americans are unable to grasp that terrible feeling of approaching conflict as we in England, living near the sources of trouble, do."

"While Britain's rearming may prevent war, nevertheless, the tension is too high for creative artists to do their best."

Music, she added, was proving a great emotional stabilizer in Europe.

"I was playing a concert in London during the Munich conferences last September," she said, "when the speech of Prime Minister Chamberlain was broadcast directly into the music hall. The audience was keyed up to an amazing pitch. Then came the music of Mozart's concerto, and the atmosphere changed in a trice. People forget their troubles in the glories of music."

MAMARONECK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 1 7 1939

MUSICALE SET FOR BOSTON PRESENTATION

F. Colwell Conklin, Executive Secretary Of Organization Planning Musical

A streamlined, integrated musical program will be presented at Boston, March 14 through 17 by the Eastern Music Educators Conference, of which F. Colwell Conklin, of Mamaroneck, is executive secretary.

Mr. Conklin, supervisor of music in the Mamaroneck schools, has been working on the preparation of this program which is presented bi-annually for the last two years.

Harland L. Pinney, assistant supervisor of music in the local schools, is on the instrumental committee of the program and Mrs. Marjorie Cowles, glee club instructor, is on the vocal committee.

The program will feature an open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs, and a New England Conservatory concert, in addition to outstanding speakers and section meetings.

Four members of the Mamaroneck High School Glee Club will go to Boston to sing in the Eastern Chorus selected from all the Eastern States at the Friday night concert to be held in Symphony Hall on March 17. They include:

Miss Ann Coffin, Miss Marian Reich, Miss Ruth Herrick and Miss Doris Dewhurst.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

FEB 1 7 1939

The Music Box

By JOHN D. DONOGH

The little bird that whispered in our ear last week was a pretty good little bird, as announcements proved. The Boston orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, will be back. So will Lawrence Tibbett, who gave subscribers a few seasons back a thrilling recital. The Metropolitan quartet, with four fine young voices, should be a great favorite with the many Saturday afternoon listeners of the opera broadcasts. The artists' committee deserves commendation for deciding to choose a new artist each year, and a fine start has been made with Simon Barer, the Russian pianist. The committee had some trepidation in taking this step, but the uniformly excellent reviews given him in New York justify their courage, and subscribers can anticipate four concerts of the standard which has been long ago established.

174

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

FEB 17 1939

VARIATIONS

Brilliant Concerts Promised by Community Concerts and Wagner Series; Sylvia Zaremba, 7-Years-Old Pianist, to Play for Tuesday Morning Music Club; Wilbur Evans Sings in Amherst Feb. 27; Student Musicians Need Musicianship According to Prominent Choir Director

By Willard M. Clark

With concerts by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra and Walter Gieseking, pianist, bringing the concert season to a close, as far as major events are concerned, one naturally looks towards the coming season and all signs point to a season even more brillant than the one just finished.

The Community Concerts promise a notable list of concerts which include the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Lawrence Tibbett, baritone; Simon Barer, pianist, and the Metropolitan Opera Quartet composed of Charles Kullman, tenor; Josephine Antoine, soprano; Helen Olheim, contralto; and John Brownlee, baritone.

Springfield knows well both the Boston players and Tibbett. The members of the quartet have not appeared here individually, but radio has brought them to notice. Kullman, formerly a teacher of voice at Smith College, is a tenor of solid attainments and last week sang in "Die Meistersinger" in Hartford. Antoine sings such roles as Gilda in "Rigoletto" and Philine in "Mignon." Helen Olheim is well known on the air and sings small parts at the Metropolitan while John Brownlee is considered one of the best of the singers from England and sang for years at Covent Garden before coming here. He has proven a versatile artist always ready to stand in, for he has a very large repertoire.

New Artists Welcomed

It is a wise bit of policy to bring to attention new artists. The older artists cannot live forever and it is fitting that music lovers should hear the new artists. Simon Barer first came to this country two seasons ago. He attracted some favorable attention at that time, but it was not until his concert in Town Hall a few weeks ago that the critics awoke to the realization that he was a very great pianist. It was interesting to read the opening paragraphs of the criticisms of Noel Strauss of the N. Y. Times and of Jerome D. Bohm of the N. Y. Herald Tribune. Both bear a striking similarity.

Mr. Strauss wrote as follows:

"After the superlative playing by Simon Barer at his recital yesterday afternoon in Town Hall, the immensely gifted Russian pianist must be reckoned among the greatest of all exponents of the keyboard heard here in recent times. With a technical equipment unrivaled among pianists of the day, he astounded his large audience by the virtuosity of his performances, his extraordinary control of tone and dynamics and his superb musicianship.

"Mr. Barer approached his task with a touching modesty and simplicity that evidenced a humility of spirit, a love and reverence for his art such as only the most genuinely inspired musicians possess. It is this very sensitiveness, this lack of all desire to shine at the expense of the music under consideration, that often hinders artists of Mr. Barer's type from making the sweeping conquest of the public made by less talented performers whose work is more aggressively personal."

In similar vein Mr. Bohm wrote as follows:

"This reviewer has never encountered more extraordinary pianism than that vouchsafed by Simon Barer in his only recital of the season in Town Hall yesterday afternoon. This Russian pianist, who first appeared here two seasons ago, was then recognized as a player of remarkable attributes; but in neither of his two previous recitals did he disclose the full extent of his gifts, gifts which entitle him to a place among the two or three supreme instrumentalists of our day. Without hesitation, and not forgetting the accomplishments of several pianists noted for their technical prowess, the writer asserts that Mr. Barer's mechanical equipment is without a peer among pianists at the present time.

"Not that mere virtuosity is Mr. Barer's only claim to distinction. The fact that he can play faster than any one else would not be sufficient ground for the astounded admiration his performances aroused in me. It is the use to which Mr. Barer puts his amazing digital dexterity which is deserving of unqualified praise. For he is, in addition to being a supreme master of the externals of his art, a self-effacing musician of flawless taste."

The Junior League and Community Concerts Association officers are to be congratulated upon their choice of artists for next season and it is safe to prophesy that the usual sold out Auditorium will be the result of the current drive which closes the 21st

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 18 1939

• • •

The Prokofieff novelty "Peter and the Wolf," an "orchestral fairy tale for children," will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concert, a week from Tuesday night, in Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct.

BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

FEB 17 1939

The World Of Music

By LOUIS F. KEEMLE

NEW YORK, Feb. 17.—(UP)—The Boston Symphoney orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years.

It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitsky impersonating Haydn conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In a soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depecting Daniel in the Lions' Den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

MYRA HESS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Work by Schuman Is Received Rather Coldly

B. Post Feb. 18/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To William Schuman's Second Symphony, which has C as a "pivotal" and persistent tone, Dr. Koussevitzky added, at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, the C major Symphony of Sibelius, No. 3, and the Third Pianofore Concerto of Beethoven, which begins in C minor and ends in C major. Thus was achieved unity (if not variety). In the Concerto Myra Hess was the soloist, and her generally admirable exposition of the music won her many rounds of applause.

PERSISTENT C IN TRUMPET

To return to Mr. Schuman, the persistent C which, according to the composer's analysis, quoted in the programme book, is either present or "implied" throughout (how do you imply a tone, by the way?), at first arrests and then irritates the listening ear. When in the course of the single movement this pedal tone, mostly carried by a trumpet, is dropped, the listener experiences a blessed sense of relief, as when a dentist removes his drill, and the music for a moment seems actually to get somewhere.

All the figures of speech used to describe music are borrowed from one source or another, and so we speak of a composer's musical ideas and thoughts. Young Mr. Schuman in this symphony seems to substitute a "process," and the result is neither stimulating nor edifying. Whether or not this piece, in one movement, one tempo (larghissimo) and one mood, can properly be called a symphony is an open question, but a rather academic one. Hearing once an alleged sonata by George Antheil, Lawrence Gilman was moved to remark that if that was a sonata, an upper berth was a suite at the Ritz.

Audience Unresponsive

Mr. Schuman was present to hear his music yesterday, and if he was gratified by the performance he could hardly have been as pleased with the amount of applause. So far as its reception by the audience was concerned the symphony was a flop. Dr. Koussevitzky has decided to sponsor the youngest generation of American composers, but his first two attempts, with Gardner Read's Suite for Strings and Mr. Schuman's Symphony, have not proved very rewarding.

Sibelius' Third Symphony has had a curious history here in Boston, and in a way it is a curious piece. Both Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux contemplated playing it—the latter even put it in rehearsal—and then abandoned it as not worth the effort. In 1928 Dr. Koussevitzky produced it with success, and there had been two other performances, a few weeks and four years later, respectively, before that of yesterday.

Shortest of His Symphonies

Whereas Beethoven in passing from his first two symphonies to his third greatly expanded both his style and his form, Sibelius, in making the same step, conspicuously contracted his and produced a sort of experiment in symphonic compression. Shorter than any of the other Sibelius symphonies, it is also slighter. Yet it is easy to find it fascinating, and Dr. Koussevitzky did well to revive it. We are now entitled to a rehearing of the relatively neglected fourth and sixth.

We did not hear Beethoven at his best yesterday, either, though like Sibelius he is here most successful with his middle movement. Not all of the poetry in this romantic largo was revealed in Miss Hess' rather studied performance.

B. Globe Feb. 18/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Although public interest in the music of Sibelius has increased enormously in the last few years, three of his seven symphonies—the Third, Fourth and Sixth—are still not well known. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky remedied this situation to some extent for local concert-goers, by including at the Boston Symphony concerts this week the Finnish master's Third Symphony, in C major. The work stands midway on a program that begins with the Second Symphony of William Shuman, and ends with Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto, in which the distinguished Myra Hess is soloist.

If Sibelius' Fifth Symphony may be called his "Eroica," the Third Symphony is his "Pastoral" and shows a less familiar side of the man. Here is a lighthearted sort of music, folkish in its lively gentleness and simplicity, brimming with melody from start to finish. In a manner that baffles description, Sibelius—whether intentionally or not—so infused his score with color and play of fancy that it seems almost like a story in music, as if some character from Finnish folklore were about to step out of the depths of the orchestra.

Technically, however, the Third Symphony cannot be compared with the grandiose, romantic First and Second Symphonies, nor with the highly condensed symphonies that were to follow. When Sibelius wrote the Third, he was attempting but had not mastered the art of concentrating what he had to say within the limits of a comparatively short and tightly-knit form. That mastery was to come in the Fourth Symphony and find its ultimate perfection in the one-movement Seventh Symphony. On the other hand, the style is typical: melody that could have been written by Sibelius and no other, unusual shades of instrumental color, sudden changes of rhythm, the device of repeating melodies or combinations of harmony. What is lacking is the amazing brevity the directness of his subsequent music. Charm and originality nevertheless compensate for unevenness. Heard often enough, the Third Symphony should become a favorite.

William Schuman is a New York composer, 28 years old. His Second Symphony, composed in 1937 and winner of a national contest prize, was played for the first time in Boston yesterday. It is set in a single movement that sub-divides into three easily recognized sections. Dissonance prevails, and the themes are evidently based on more than one key at a time.

Most important, Schuman has an independent mind; his Second Symphony is technically unconventional. He sets great store by the use of a sustained note (C) which is, as he says, "stated or implied" through the whole piece. And the first section contains many insistent melodies or rhythmic patterns, a device called "ostinato." As music, the work boasts no distinctive melody, and there is little variety of rhythm and tempo. In a phrase, it may justly be termed an interesting intellectual experiment but not a work of inspired art. Mr. Schuman was present in the audience.

The polished art of Miss Hess, joined with an irreproachable accompaniment by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, resulted in a heavenly performance of Beethoven's Concerto. A comparatively early score that now and again betrays the influence of Mozart, this Concerto is treasurable both because it is so fresh, tender and songful, and because it also happens to be a masterpiece. It does not soar, but the ground on which its feet rest is singularly inviting and peaceful.

Soloist and orchestra brought out these qualities to perfection, even if there were a few fleeting disagreements in the tempo. All concerned merited the "ovation" which followed.

C. W. D.

B. Her Feb. 18/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 16th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Myra Hess, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

William Schuman.........Symphony No. 2
Sibelius
Symphony No. 3 in C major Op. 52
Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 3 in C minor Op. 37

Mr. William Schuman's score, which was heard for the first time in Boston yesterday, may look well on paper. It may have an interesting theoretical background. On the basis of a first hearing, however, it sounds like fury. The persistence of the note C, around which Mr. Schuman dives and disports himself, becomes before long peculiarly disagreeable. We have not yet got to the point where we appreciate music chiefly for what it looks like, for its good intentions, as it were. Mr. Schuman chose to disregard this fact or avoided it by sheer force of will. At any rate, this Symphony is ugly, if that word has much meaning any longer.

Why Symphony? We have become so loose in the application of our musical terms that Mr. Schuman has probably as much right to call his work a symphony as other composers have to use the word concerto with such abandon. Somehow one thinks of a symphony as a more important work than this piece. Symphonies always abound in contrast, and of that quality Mr. Schuman's score is singularly barren. It may be too much to say that this music was written solely to demonstrate the structural possibilities of the one note idea, but it is hard to see any other artistic justification for it.

The program next offered us one of the distinctly lesser symphonies of Sibelius. It has, of course, its virtues and the historical significance of being the first thoroughly individual and uninfluenced of Sibelius's symphonies. But it is not on a level with the fourth, fifth or seventh, nor has it the emotional appeal of the first or second.

If the third Symphony is on the whole a bore, it is at least a bore in which one can take an interest in view of the composer's greater music. It contains ideas of which he was to make much more effective use later. The general impression, in spite of the beauties embedded in the first two movements, is one of some triviality. This is not surprising, since Sibelius's output has been uneven. He has no second best to fall back on, though the third Symphony comes as near to it as any.

Obviously, if one agrees with these remarks, the concert was only memorable for the Beethoven Concerto. This was superbly performed by Myra Hess and the orchestra. There was complete accord between soloist and conductor as to the nature of the interpretation, nor any doubt that that nature was classical, eloquence without sentimentality. Such were the purity and sincerity of Miss Hess's performance that we could leave the hall with the feeling that here was the real thing and no mistake about it. The audience was clearly of the same mind and lingered to stamp and applaud. We may remind any chance reader that Miss Hess will be with the orchestra on next Monday night and Tuesday afternoon, playing the Schumann Concerto.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Beethoven's sixth Symphony, Roy Harris's third Symphony and Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" music will be played.

B. Globe Feb. 24/39

Composer Here

ROY HARRIS

This American composer will be at Symphony Hall this afternoon when his Third Symphony is performed for the first time anywhere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD, DONNERSTAG, den 9. FEBRUAR 1939

Aus der Musikwelt

Pensionsfonds-Konzert des Boston Orchestra

Für ſein diesjähriges Konzert zum Beſten ſeines Penſionsfonds hatte das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra geſtern abend Papa Haydn verpflichtet, der die Eſterhazy'ſche Kapelle aus Eiſenſtadt mitbrachte. Es war ein vornehmes, elegantes Muſizieren auf der von Kerzen beleuchteten Bühne, ſo daß die nüchterne Carnegie Hall, deren gefüllter Hörerraum tief verdunkelt wurde, faſt etwas Feierliches und Feſtliches erhielt. Haydn hatte ſeine „Abſchieds-Symphonie" zur Aufführung beſtimmt, jenes wohlklingende, Herz und Seele beſänftigende Werk, bei deſſen letzten Takten die Muſikanten einer nach dem anderen die Pulte verlaſſen, ſo daß Papa Haydn ſchließlich ganz allein vor ſeinem Cembalo ſteht und ihm nichts weiter übrig bleibt, als die letzten Kerzen auszublaſen und ebenfalls Feierabend zu machen. Urſprünglich ſoll ja das allmähliche „Verduften" der Kapelle als Proteſt gegen die Abſicht des ſparſamen Grafen Eſterhazy, das Enſemble zu verkleinern, vorgenommen worden ſein, aber auch geſtern verfehlte dieſe humorvolle Warnung ihre Wirkung nicht, und man lachte lange und herzlich darüber.

Nach der Abſchiedsſymphonie gab es Gruenbergs „The Daniel Jazz", geſpielt von einer richtigen Jazz-Band, deren weißbejackte Mitglieder ſich jedoch bei näherem Hinſehen als Angehörige des Boſton Orcheſtra entpuppten. Nichtsdeſtoweniger klang die Muſik, die dieſe verkleideten Orcheſtramuſiker machten, echt nach Jazz und ſchuf einen bewegten, anſchaulichen Hintergrund für Vachel Lindſays gleichnamige Dichtung, die von dem Tenor Colin O'More mit viel Humor geſungen und geſprochen wurde. Richard Burgin, der Konzertmeiſter der Boſtoner Gäſte, erwies ſich als ſattelfeſter Jazzband-Dirigent.

Danach übernahm Serge Kouſſevitzky die Leitung des vollen Orcheſters, und man hatte faſt meinen können, Papa Haydn ſtünde wieder am Dirigentenpult; nur fehlten Kouſſevitzky die weiße Perücke, der blaue Kapellmeiſterrock mit den gelben Aufſchlägen, na, und auch das Kerzenlicht. Was er da aufführte, das war allerdings keine Muſik des 18. Jahrhunderts ſondern ganz unverkennbar eine jüngere Schöpfung, nämlich Prokofieffs Märchenſtück vom Peter, der den Wolf fängt. Richard Hale las den ins Engliſche überſetzten amüſanten Text und löſte damit, wie auch das Orcheſter mit der überaus witzigen Muſik, viel Gelächter und Beifall aus.

Nach der Pauſe verhieß das Programm noch Walzermuſik aus verſchiedenen Stilepochen: „Wiener Blut" und „Frühlingsſtimmen" von Johann Strauß, den „Valſe Triſte" von Sibelius und Ravels choreographiſche Dichtung „La Valſe".

POST BOSTON SUNDAY P

Boston Symphony Sends Audiences Into "Stitches"

Feb. 19/39

"Peter and the Wolf" Is Made to Order for Walt Disney

When great audiences of intellectual concert subscribers and scholarly critics in Boston and New York are put into stitches of laughter, not at, but for, an orchestral composition by a celebrated composer, something unusual has happened in the concert world.

And that is what happened last week in Sanders Theatre, at Harvard University, and shortly previously in New York's Carnegie Hall and Boston's Symphony Hall.

The cause of this hilarity was the playing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, of the piece by the noted living Russian composer, Prokofieff, entitled "Peter and the Wolf, an Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children."

An actor, Richard Hale, recited the story of a little Russian boy and how the animals on his granddad's farm were attacked by a wolf and lassooed by him with the help of a little bird.

As a result of the acclaim of delighted audiences and critics, the composition is to be repeated in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon, and in the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, the following Tuesday evening.

The celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, has nominated "Peter and the Wolf" as a successor to "Ferdinand the Bull" for the next great hit film of Walt Disney.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 19 1939

RECENT PHONOGRAPH RECORDINGS

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

CONSIDERING their number, it is not surprising to encounter a first recording of a Haydn symphony, but that the B flat, No. 102, should have waited this long for attention seems peculiar, for undoubtedly it is of Haydn's finest. The ninth of the series produced for the London impresario Salomon, it represents Haydn in his prime. In Victor album M-529 it is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Kousse[illegible] directing, and requires three disks. Aural evidence suggests its release has been delayed, for this is by no means current recording.

A hint of heaviness in the solemn introduction gives just the right contrast to set off the lively vigor of the allegro, a movement containing a succession of surprises so ingeniously sprung that only after repeated hearings does one begin to realize what is going on beneath a surface attractive enough in itself. There follows song and exuberant wit before we are returned, in the finale, to much the same bustling atmosphere that pervaded the first movement. It is all beautifully spaced and all Haydn. Which makes it seem unfair that Koussevitzky should regard parts of it as having an affinity with the more heroic parts of the "Eroica." Not that he tears a passion to tatters, but he does make much ado about something that happens not to be there.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 19 1939

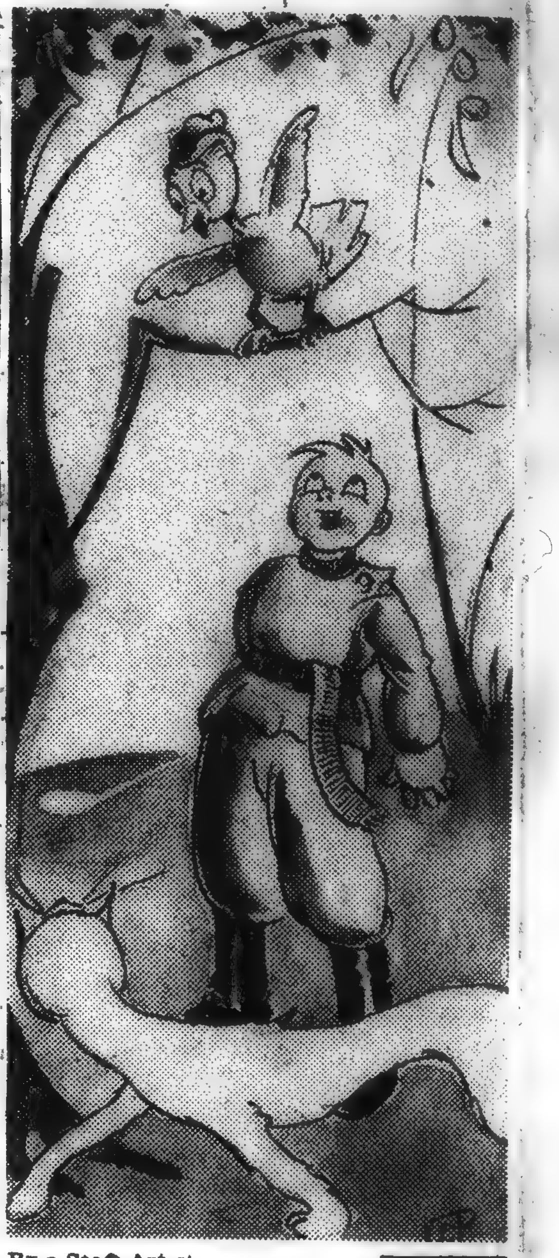
10

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, conducted by John Barbirolli, will give a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, March 13, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Artur Schnabe[illegible], will be the soloist. The concert will mark Mr. Barbirolli's first appearance in Boston.

Try 'Peter and the Wolf'; Koussevitzky Tips Disney

Boston Symphony Orchestra leader nominates Prokofieff's work as a [W]hite' Successor

an D. Beaufort
Staff Writer of
The Christian Science Monitor



By a Staff Artist

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

'Peter and the Wolf'

Peter and his friend, the bird, talk things over preparatory to the big wolf hunt in "Peter and the Wolf," by Serge Prokofieff, to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now giving wide performance.

If Walt Disney is looking for some new nursery characters with which to charm the grown-ups, then Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and himself a Disney fan, suggests Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

"You see, I attend all the principal Disney films," said Dr. Koussevitzky today. "Now that 'Ferdinand the Bull' has had his day, I nominate 'Peter and the Wolf' as the successor, a story for children that adults will take to their hearts."

If one were seeking so solemn a thing as a trend, he might well contemplate Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion. "Ferdinand the Bull," written and drawn for children, suffered the same fate as little Marmaduke's electric train. It was taken up wholeheartedly by the grown-ups of the family. Radio Pictures must have made at least part of the $8,000,000 gross it claims for "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" on parents making repeat visits—"just so Willie can see it again"—to the Disney fantasy.

In fact, the bulwark of the Disney following is probably among those who have been paying full fare on the railroads for some time. Perhaps the Disney creatures are to this decade what Alice and Peter Pan and Christopher Robin have been to the generations of child adults which have gone before.

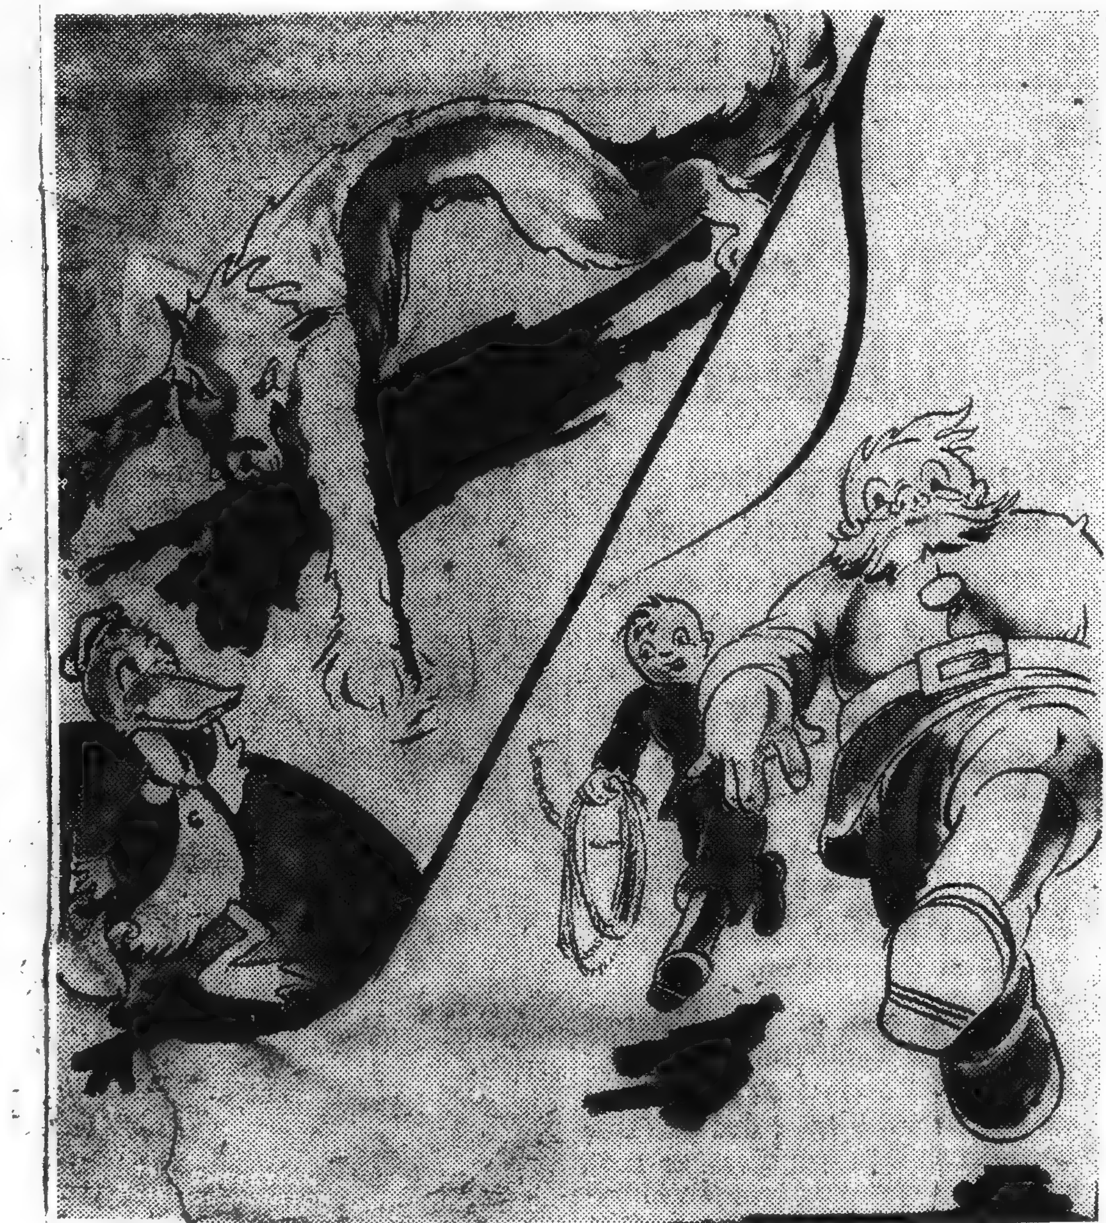
To return to the most immediate instance of the trend, the Russian composer's amusing musical fantasy has been enjoying a phenomenal success lately. It was revived for the Pension Fund concerts in Boston and New York after being introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony on March 25, 1938, with the composer conducting.

Not only was it a great success at the Pension Fund "Concert Extraordinaire" in this city, but the sometime skeptical New York took Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, Peter's grandfather and even the wolf to its collective heart. Critics accounted "Peter and the Wolf" one of the high points in the orchestra's two pension fund concerts there. Olin Downes, of the New York Times, even insisted that Dr. Koussevitzky should trot out Mr. Prokofieff's fancy on the or-

(Continued on Page 10, Column 5)

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1939

Koussevitzky Hands Out a Tip to Walt Disney



By a Staff Artist

'Peter and the Wolf'

The fierce wolf, Peter and his grandfather running with the rope, the duck (not yet swallowed) all involved in a musical notation by Serge Prokofieff.

'Peter and the Wolf' is declared to have elements which made 'Snow White' such a success.

(Continued from Page 1)

chestra's next regular visit to New York.

And that is exactly what has been decided. The piece will be played, with Richard Hale as usual delivering the narration, in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on March 10, and again in Carnegie Hall, New York, March 11. Bostonians will have another opportunity to chuckle over the musical antics at the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts on Feb. 20 and 21. And the peripatetic Peter will journey with his friends to Providence for a concert at the Metropolitan Theater on Feb. 28.

Quite an exciting life for such a small boy as Peter, but Symphony officials assure us that he thrives on it.

The story behind the story of Peter's American success is almost as amusing as the tale itself. It seems that Mr. Prokofieff introduced "Peter" to Boston in a bit of a huff. Bostonians, he complained, had not taken to his Fourth Symphony. So when he came to this city to conduct, last year, Mr. Prokofieff announced that he was bringing with him something that children — and Bostonians — could comprehend.

Boston turned the barb deftly. It enjoyed "Peter and the Wolf." It said: "No, Mr. Prokofieff, this is not child's stuff at all. We enjoyed it hugely therefore it must have adult appeal, even if you did write it for children."

For those who have not yet heard "Peter and the Wolf," one should perhaps explain that it is about a small boy who, with the help of his friend the bird, captures a fierce wolf. The wolf swallowed the duck, but, "if one would listen very carefully, he could hear the duck quacking in the wolf's belly, because the wolf in his hurry had swallowed her alive."

Well, Mr. Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony, Mr. Hale, Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, the grandfather and the wolf have all done their part.

The next move is up to Mr. Disney.

Nickolas Muray

Richard Hale

Who narrates Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky perform it.

N. Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD, DONNERSTAG, den 9. FEBRUAR 1939

Aus der Musikwelt

Pensionsfonds-Konzert des Boston Orchestra

Für ſein diesjähriges Konzert zum Beſten ſeines Penſionsfonds hatte das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra geſtern abend Papa Haydn verpflichtet, der die Eſterhazy'ſche Kapelle aus Eiſenſtadt mitbrachte. Es war ein vornehmes, elegantes Muſizieren auf der von Kerzen beleuchteten Bühne, ſo daß die nüchterne Carnegie Hall, deren gefüllter Hörerraum tief verdunkelt wurde, faſt etwas Feierliches und Feſtliches erhielt. Haydn hatte ſeine „Abſchieds-Symphonie" zur Aufführung beſtimmt, jenes wohlklingende, Herz und Seele beſänftigende Werk, bei deſſen letzten Takten die Muſikanten einer nach dem anderen die Pulte verlaſſen, ſo daß Papa Haydn ſchließlich ganz allein vor ſeinem Cembalo ſteht und ihm nichts weiter übrig bleibt, als die letzten Kerzen auszublaſen und ebenfalls Feierabend zu machen. Urſprünglich ſoll ja das allmähliche „Verduften" der Kapelle als Proteſt gegen die Abſicht des ſparſamen Grafen Eſterhazy, das Enſemble zu verkleinern, vorgenommen worden ſein, aber auch geſtern verfehlte dieſe humorvolle Warnung ihre Wirkung nicht, und man lachte lange und herzlich darüber.

Nach der Abſchiedsſymphonie gab es Gruenbergs „The Daniel Jazz", geſpielt von einer richtigen Jazz-Band, deren weißbejackte Mitglieder ſich jedoch bei näherem Hinſehen als Angehörige des Boſton Orcheſtra entpuppten. Nichtsdeſtoweniger klang die Muſik, die dieſe verkleideten Orcheſtramuſiker machten, echt nach Jazz und ſchuf einen bewegten, anſchaulichen Hintergrund für Vachel Lindſays gleichnamige Dichtung, die von dem Tenor Colin O'More mit viel Humor geſungen und geſprochen wurde. Richard Burgin, der Konzertmeiſter der Boſtoner Gäſte, erwies ſich als ſattelfeſter Jazzband-Dirigent.

Danach übernahm Serge Kouſſevitzky die Leitung des vollen Orcheſters, und man hatte faſt meinen können, Papa Haydn ſtünde wieder am Dirigentenpult; nur fehlten Kouſſevitzky die weiße Perücke, der blaue Kapellmeiſterrock mit den gelben Aufſchlägen, na, und auch das Kerzenlicht. Was er da aufführte, das war allerdings keine Muſik des 18. Jahrhunderts ſondern ganz unverkennbar eine jüngere Schöpfung, nämlich Prokofieffs Märchenſtück vom Peter, der den Wolf fängt. Richard Hale las den ins Engliſche überſetzten amüſanten Text und löſte damit, wie auch das Orcheſter mit der überaus witzigen Muſik, viel Gelächter und Beifall aus.

Nach der Pauſe verhieß das Programm noch Walzermuſik aus verſchiedenen Stilepochen: „Wiener Blut" und „Frühlingsſtimmen" von Johann Strauß, den „Valſe Triſte" von Sibelius und Ravels choreographiſche Dichtung „La Valſe".

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 19 1939

RECENT PHONOGRAPH REC

general." H realize its s nothing, of twenty

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

CONSIDERING their number, it is not surprising to encounter a first recording of a Haydn symphony, but that the B flat, No. 102, should have waited this long for attention seems peculiar, for undoubtedly it is of Haydn's finest. The ninth of the series produced for the London impresario Salomon, it represents Haydn in his prime. In Victor album M-529 it is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Kousse[redacted] directing, and requires three disks. Aural evidence suggests its release has been delayed, for this is by no means current recording.

A hint of heaviness in the solemn introduction gives just the right contrast to set off the lively vigor of the allegro, a movement containing a succession of surprises so ingeniously sprung that only after repeated hearings does one begin to realize what is going on beneath a surface attractive enough in itself. There follows song and exuberant wit before we are returned, in the finale, to much the same bustling atmosphere that pervaded the first movement. It is all beautifully spaced and all Haydn. Which makes it seem unfair that Koussevitzky should regard parts of it as having an affinity with the more heroic parts of the "Eroica." Not that he tears a passion to tatters, but he does make much ado about something that happens not to be there.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 19 1939

10

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, conducted by John Barbirolli, will give a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, March 13, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Artur Schnab[redacted], will be the soloist. The concert will mark Mr. Barbirolli's first appearance in Boston.

Try 'Peter and the Wolf'; Koussevitzky Tips Disney

Boston Symphony Orchestra leader nominates Prokofieff's work as a 'Snow White' Successor

By John D. Beaufort
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

If Walt Disney is looking for some new nursery characters with which to charm the grown-ups, then Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and himself a Disney fan, suggests Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

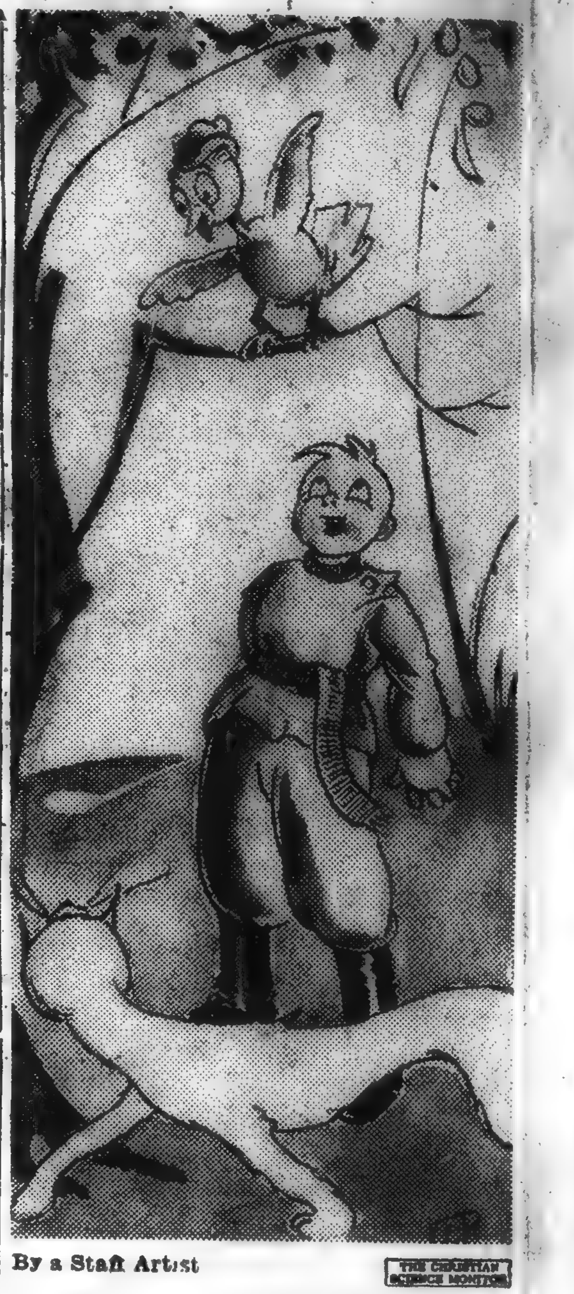
"You see, I attend all the principal Disney films," said Dr. Koussevitzky today. "Now that 'Ferdinand the Bull' has had his day, I nominate 'Peter and the Wolf' as the successor, a story for children that adults will take to their hearts."

If one were seeking so solemn a thing as a trend, he might well contemplate Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion. "Ferdinand the Bull," written and drawn for children, suffered the same fate as little Marmaduke's electric train. It was taken up wholeheartedly by the grown-ups of the family. Radio Pictures must have made at least part of the $8,000,000 gross it claims for "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" on parents making repeat visits—"just so Willie can see it again"—to the Disney fantasy.

In fact, the bulwark of the Disney following is probably among those who have been paying full fare on the railroads for some time. Perhaps the Disney creatures are to this decade what Alice and Peter Pan and Christopher Robin have been to the generations of child adults which have gone before.

To return to the most immediate instance of the trend, the Russian composer's amusing musical fantasy has been enjoying a phenomenal success lately. It was revived for the Pension Fund concerts in Boston and New York after being introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony on March 25, 1938, with the composer conducting.

Not only was it a great success at the Pension Fund "Concert Extraordinaire" in this city, but the sometime skeptical New York took Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, Peter's grandfather and even the wolf to its collective heart. Critics accounted "Peter and the Wolf" one of the high points in the orchestra's two pension fund concerts there. Olin Downes, of the New York Times, even insisted that Dr. Koussevitzky should trot out Mr. Prokofieff's fancy on the or-



By a Staff Artist — THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

'Peter and the Wolf'

Peter and his friend, the bird, talk things over preparatory to the big wolf hunt in "Peter and the Wolf," by Serge Prokofieff, to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now giving wide performance.

(Continued on Page 10, Column 5)

POST BOSTON SUNDAY P

Boston Symphony Sends Audiences Into "Stitches"

Feb. 19/39

"Peter and the Wolf" Is Made to Order for Walt Disney

When great audiences of intellectual concert subscribers and scholarly critics in Boston and New York are put into stitches of laughter, not at, but for, an orchestral composition by a celebrated composer, something unusual has happened in the concert world.

And that is what happened last week in Sanders Theatre, at Harvard University, and shortly previously in New York's Carnegie Hall and Boston's Symphony Hall.

The cause of this hilarity was the playing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, of the piece by the noted living Russian composer, Prokofieff, entitled "Peter and the Wolf, an Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children."

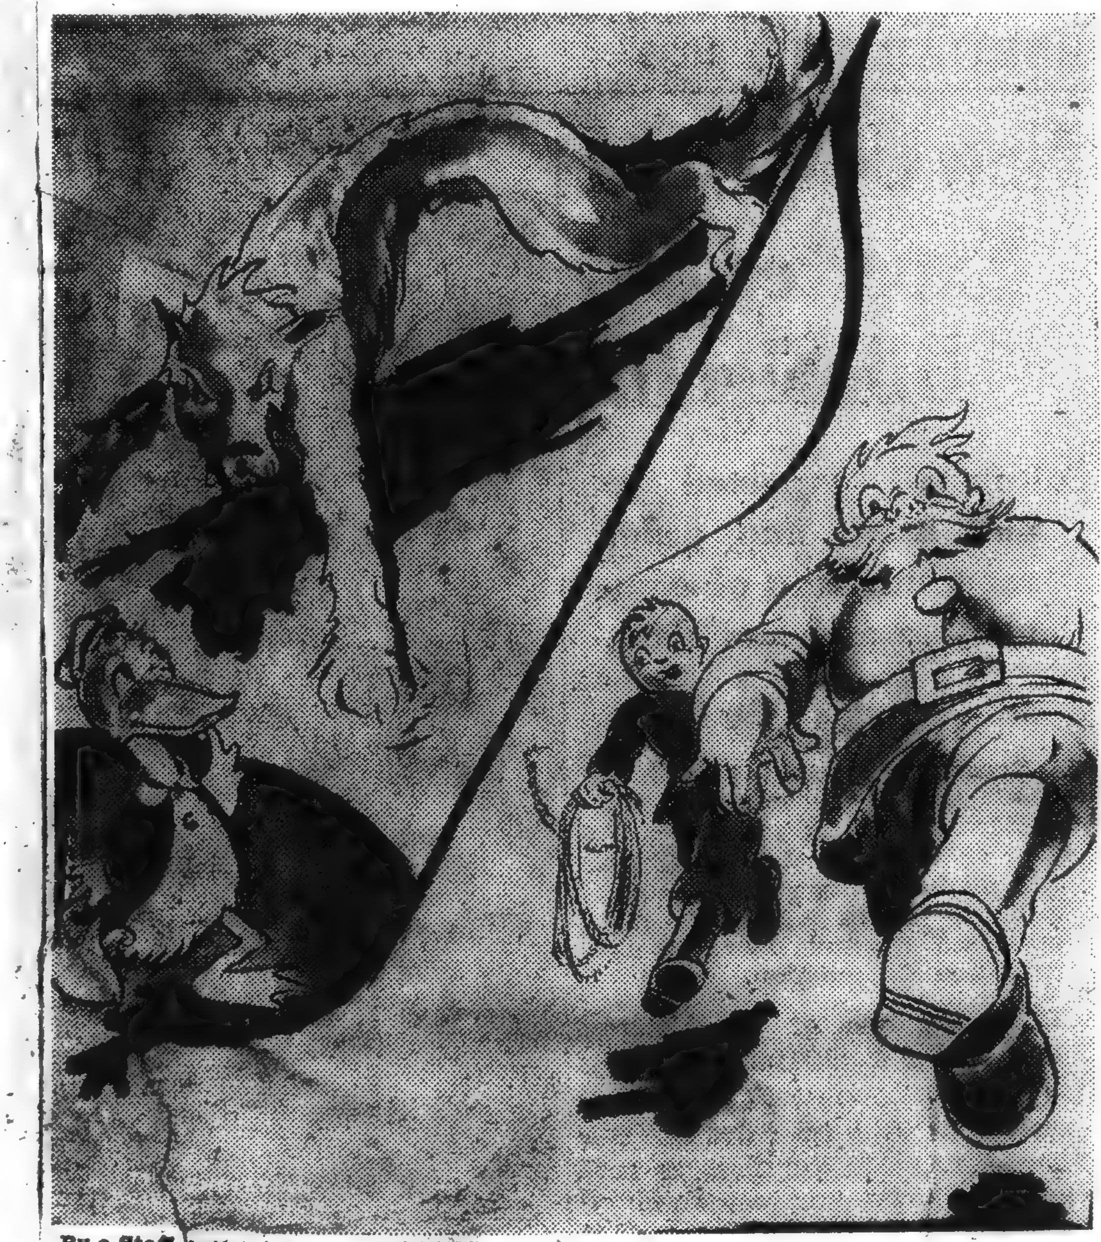
An actor, Richard Hale, recited the story of a little Russian boy and how the animals on his granddad's farm were attacked by a wolf and lassooed by him with the help of a little bird.

As a result of the acclaim of delighted audiences and critics, the composition is to be repeated in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon, and in the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, the following Tuesday evening.

The celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, has nominated "Peter and the Wolf" as a successor to "Ferdinand the Bull" for the next great hit film of Walt Disney.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1939

Koussevitzky Hands Out a Tip to Walt Disney



By a Staff Artist

'Peter and the Wolf'

The fierce wolf, Peter and his grandfather running with the rope, the duck (not yet swallowed) all involved in a musical notation by Serge Prokofieff.

'Peter and the Wolf' is declared to have elements which made 'Snow White' such a success.

(Continued from Page 1)

chestra's next regular visit to New York.

And that is exactly what has been decided. The piece will be played, with Richard Hale as usual delivering the narration, in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on March 10, and again in Carnegie Hall, New York, March 11. Bostonians will have another opportunity to chuckle over the musical antics at the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts on Feb. 20 and 21. And the peripatetic Peter will journey with his friends to Providence for a concert at the Metropolitan Theater on Feb. 28.

Quite an exciting life for such a small boy as Peter, but Symphony officials assure us that he thrives on it.

The story behind the story of Peter's American success is almost as amusing as the tale itself. It seems that Mr. Prokofieff introduced "Peter" to Boston in a bit of a huff. Bostonians, he complained, had not taken to his Fourth Symphony. So when he came to this city to conduct, last year, Mr. Prokofieff announced that he was bringing with him something that children — and Bostonians — could comprehend.

Boston turned the barb deftly. It enjoyed "Peter and the Wolf." It said: "No, Mr. Prokofieff, this is not child's stuff at all. We enjoyed it hugely therefore it must have adult appeal, even if you did write it for children."

For those who have not yet heard "Peter and the Wolf," one should perhaps explain that it is about a small boy who, with the help of his friend the bird, captures a fierce wolf. The wolf swallowed the duck, but, "if one would listen very carefully, he could hear the duck quacking in the wolf's belly, because the wolf in his hurry had swallowed her alive."

Well, Mr. Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony, Mr. Hale, Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, the grandfather and the wolf have all done their part.

The next move is up to Mr. Disney.

Nickolas Muray

Richard Hale

Who narrates Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky perform it.

176

B. Transcript
Feb. 18/39

Symphony Concert

Miss Hess as Soloist, And 100 Men to Follow

By MOSES SMITH

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon enlisted the services of approximately one hundred men and a girl. It is true that the girl is now of woman's estate, and that she is a pianist, not a singer. Furthermore, she relied entirely on her musical attainments, brought to the recreation of Beethoven's C minor Piano Concerto, whereas the girl in the movie had to be an actress as well. There were, it is scarcely necessary to write, numerous differences between yesterday's concert and the movie. But in one important additional matter the two were alike: the girl dominated the proceedings so far as the audience was concerned.

Until Myra Hess had come on stage for the Beethoven Concerto, which constituted the concluding half of yesterday's program, those proceedings had been a conventional symphony concert. Serge Koussevitzky had led the Orchestra through the first Boston performance of William Schuman's Second Symphony; and even the composer's presence in the audience had not been sufficient to stimulate more than scattering applause. There was some show of audience-enthusiasm after the performance of the relatively unfamiliar Third Symphony of Sibelius. But even here, for the most part, the audience sat on its hands.

* * *

But Miss Hess was a different matter. A remembered friend, she had but to appear to generate warm applause. Since she was to play a composition for which her talents are particularly suited the result was readily predictable. There was considerable applause after the end of the first movement. There were even scattered plaudits after the Largo—and nobody tried to stop them. At the end came one of those rousing demonstrations of enthusiasm and affection that indicate how unmistakably engrossed the listeners have been throughout the performance.

And it was, indeed, a beautiful performance, not only on the part of Miss Hess but also on the part of everyone else concerned in it. Her piano-playing, meeting the demands of the composer at every stage, now robust and virile, now sensitive and exquisitely refined, found the most sympathetic response from the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. An occasional deviation from perfect coincidence in attack did not appreciably alter the conviction that the ensemble was remarkably good and was based on an unusual sympathy among the performers.

* * *

If the Sibelius Symphony fell a little flat it was not because Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were not doing their utmost to present it in an exceptionally vital performance. The reason is rather to be sought partly in the unfamiliarity of the music, partly in its almost complete lack of showmanship and ready appeal. It is slight not only in duration but also in other dimensions. The climaxes are not big, the contrasts not obvious. The endings are abrupt.

In spite of these things, though, the Symphony is almost wearisomely repetitious (although I doubt whether this fact was in any degree responsible for the luke-warm response of the audience). In it is displayed more nakedly perhaps than in any of the other symphonies of Sibelius his almost pathological need for incessant restatement, with no more relief than transposition from one degree of the scale to another. The device is more successfully employed in the later symphonies because the thematic growth and development are more ingenious than they are in this Third Symphony. And the harmonic vocabulary and thematic material are a little less banal.

* * *

Mr. Schumann, whose rank is of course not to be confused with that of Sibelius, also relies on repetition in his Second Symphony. In fact, re-iteration is its dominant motive. But the devices of restatement that he uses, even though equally obvious, are more attractive to an ear sated with the nineteenth-century sequence. Mr. Schumann's writing is mainly polyphonic, in contrast with Sibelius's, which is principally harmonic. If he keeps a C sounding, as he does in one way or another almost throughout the entire length of the Symphony, there is something else happening at the same time; as likely as not, several things happening. If one instrument or set of instruments goes off on a seemingly endless ostinato, another is proceeding along a different line. By free employment of the old polyphonic devices of imitation, like the canon, the composer ends by restating the virtue of repetition, which, as far as I could make out at a first hearing, was his principal concern.

Even aside from these technical and analytical considerations (which seemed to interest nobody else in the audience), I found the music healthy and stimulating. In one long movement, which could discernibly be broken up into three sections, the symphony had muscular drive as well as intellectual conviction. Perhaps the language it employs and the form in which it is cast take it inevitably out of the category of music for large numbers of listeners. But I am not ready to concede even so much. It seems to me rather that Dr. Koussevitzky, far from having made a mistake in placing it on one of his programs, is actually disclosing to Boston audiences a genuine American talent.

C.S. Monitor
Feb. 18/39

Orchestral Novelties

By Pitts Sanborn

New York

Orchestral novelties have lent special interest to recent Carnegie Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. First came Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" at the "Concert Extraordinaire" given by the visiting Bostonians on the evening of Feb. 8 for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. This "Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children" made an undeniable hit, especially the charming theme associated with Peter himself. The program began (paradoxically, if you like) with Haydn's "Farewell" symphony, revived Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz," and ended with a waltz section, offering the "Wiener Blut" and "Frühlingstimmen" waltzes of Johann Strauss, Sibelius's "Valse triste," and Ravel's "La Valse."

The orchestral performance was excellent throughout, Dr. Koussevitzky directing everything except the Gruenberg piece, which he turned over to Richard Burgin, the concertmaster. Richard Hale read the text in "Peter and the Wolf" with rare skill, and Colin O'More struggled courageously with the Gruenberg voice part. The large audience was properly pleased to find doormen and ushers dressed in the costume of Haydn's prime, as well as the members of the orchestra during the "Farewell" Symphony for which candles and candelabra had been duly assembled. Dr. Koussevitzky himself impersonated Haydn.

The Philharmonic-Symphony novelties were exhibited on the evening of Feb. 11 at a "Special Gala Concent" which was really a tribute to that versatile French musician Nadia Boulanger and her followers. Thus two of Miss Boulanger's pupils were represented by a composition each, performed for the first time in America, and one of them, the young French composer Jean Françaix (born 1912) making his American début, figured also as pianist. The absent pupil was Antoni Szalowski, a Pole, born at Warsaw in 1907. His contribution was an overture written in 1935, absolute music, without further title, a brisk, energetic, somewhat dissonant work, doubtless influenced by Stravinsky, and tinged with humor and maybe irony.

* * *

Less of drive and cutting edge marked Mr. Françaix's Piano Concerto, in which he gave a fluent and spirited account of the solo part, but three of its four movements were no less brisk and chattering, if of a lighter, simpler gaiety. What pleased the house most, though, was the Andante, with its obvious melodic line. To conclude the program Mr. Françaix shared with Miss Boulanger the solo work in Mozart's E flat Concerto for two pianos, while John Barbirolli conducted—a performance admirable in its adjustments and keeping, if by no means the last word in Mozartean grace and elegance.

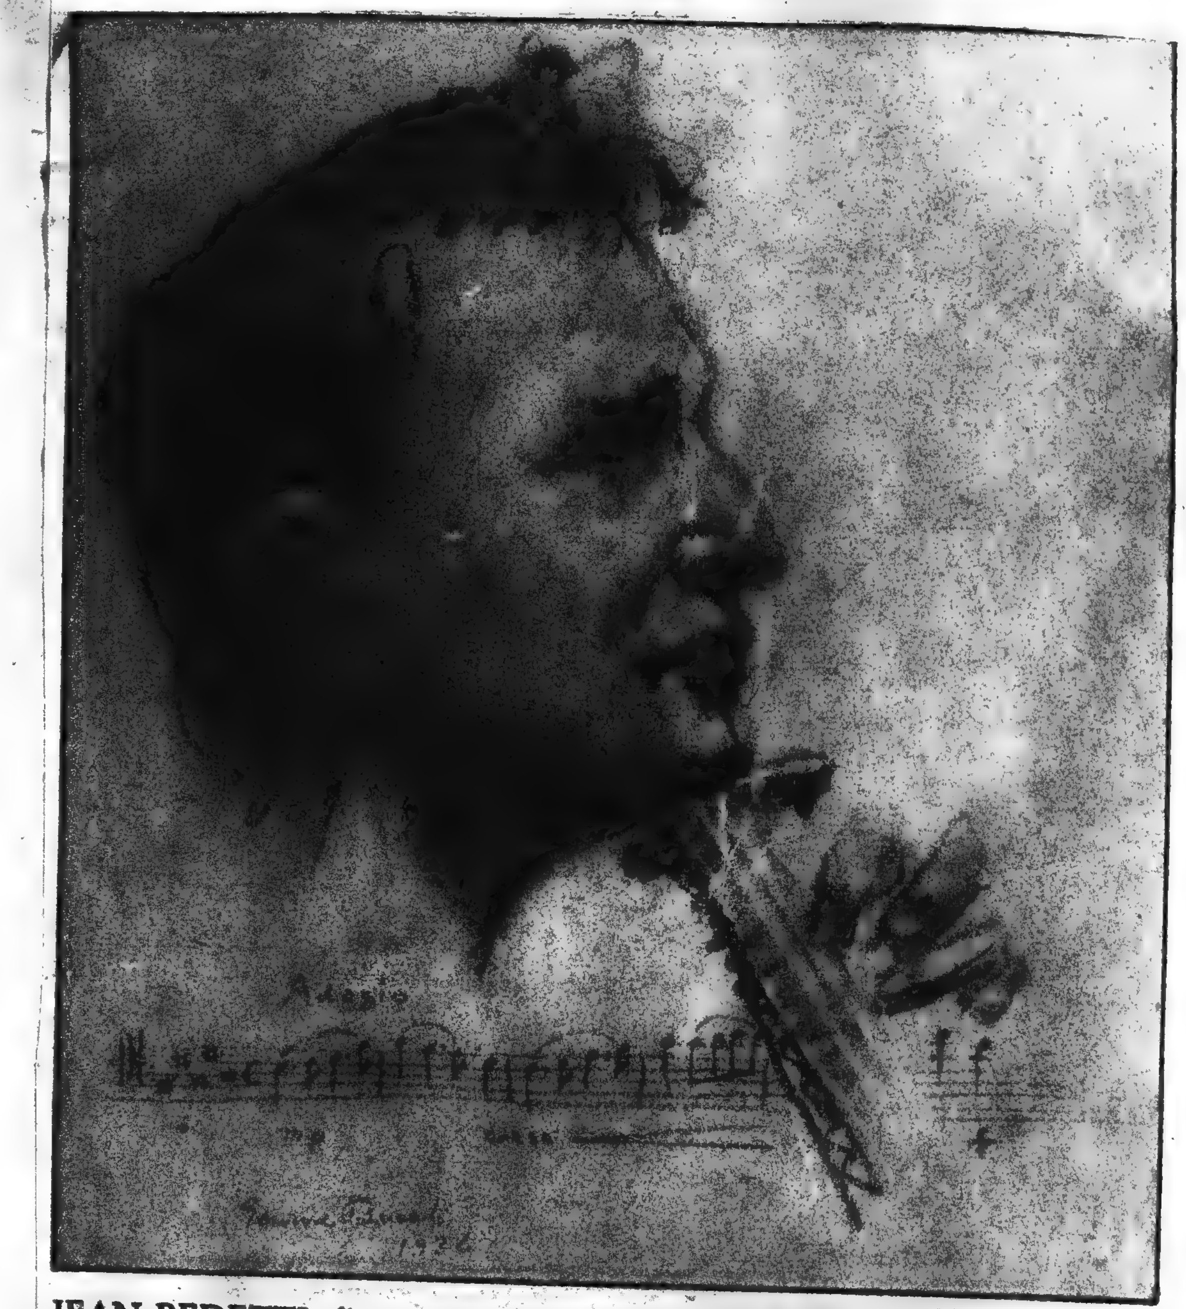
Miss Boulanger herself was the conductor (batonless, by the way) of the first half of the program, and an exceedingly efficient one. It was with pleasure, too, that you observed her easy modest demeanor, dignified without strut, totally lacking in self-consciousness. Thus she led an orchestra of men who played for her at their best through the two novelties and also the characteristic and beautiful nocturne for orchestra that Gabriel Fauré included in his incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock."

Nor did the contributions of the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonic-Symphony by any means end with these extraordinary occasions. On the evening of Feb. 10 Dr. Koussevitzky conducted Bruckner's Eighth Symphony (somewhat curtailed) and Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in a way that won only resounding praise, and the next afternoon he obtained no less distinguished results in a program comprising Mozart's A major Symphony, K. 201; Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," the "Schélomo" of Ernest Bloch (who bowed his acknowledgments from a box), and again the "Pictures at an Exhibition."

The Philharmonic-Symphony program for the evening of Feb. 9, the following afternoon, and the afternoon of Feb. 12, brought forward Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, and as symphony Tchaikovsky's Fifth on the first two occasions and Beethoven's "Eroica" on the last. At all these concerts John Barbirolli conducted and Walter Gieseking was the soloist. Mr. Gieseking's stupendous playing in the concerto, in spite of the myriad other things going on, has been quite the talk of the town.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 19 1939



JEAN BEDETTI, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest artist for eighth annual concert by Wethersfield Women's Chorus at Wethersfield High School, Feb. 21. Louis Pellettieri will direct.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 19 1939

Boston Symphony Cellist To Play Here Tuesday

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest soloist for the annual concert of the Wethersfield Women's Chorus Tuesday at 8:30 p. m. at the Wethersfield High School. His program will be as follows: "Suite Ancienne," by Breval; "Allegro," "Adagio" and "Rondo"; "Toccata," by Frescobaldi; "Elegie," by Faure; "Dragon Fly," Delune, and "Russian Dance," by Liadoff. Leo Litvin of Boston will be Mr. Bedetti's accompanist.

Holyoke Transcript
Feb. 20/39

Koussevitzky Drops His Reserve And Kisses Pianist

BOSTON, Feb. 20—Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is noted for his reserve.

Thus, orchestra members were astonished today when they heard him exclaim, "before the whole orchestra!" and saw him implant an impulsive kiss upon the cheek of dark-eyed Myra Hess, celebrated English pianist, during a rehearsal.

Miss Hess, who had just played Schumann's "Concerto in A minor" in a way that delighted Koussevitzky, smilingly echoed his words, "before the whole orchestra!" and kissed him on the lips.

The orchestra loudly applauded both kisses.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 19 1939

THE ORCHESTRA

On Monday, March 13, the Philharmonic-Symphony will give a concert in Boston at Symphony Hall, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will mark Mr. Barbirolli's first appearance in the New England metropolis. Artur Schnabel will be the soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. The Philharmonic last visited Boston, under Arturo Toscanini, in March, 1936. It will play in Hartford Tuesday night, March 14, in its third and last out-of-town concert of the season.

Next Season's Schedule

In 1939-'40, between Nov. 20 and Dec. 3, however, Mr. Barbirolli will take the Philharmonic-Symphony on its longest tour in this country since 1928-'29. The orchestra will travel as far west as Chicago and will also appear in three Canadian cities. The concerts on Nov. 26 in Chicago and Dec. 3 in Utica will go on the air, so as not to interrupt the sequence of the orchestra's regular Sunday broadcasts.

Next fall's trip has been made possible through the co-operation of the Columbia Broadcasting System. The home season at Carnegie Hall will again be twenty-eight weeks long, but, owing to the tour, will begin a week earlier and end a week later than in this season, opening Thursday night, March 14 and closing Sunday afternoon, May 5, 1940. The number and length of the various series will be as present, including the six Young People's concerts under Ernest Schelling. Next season will be the orchestra's ninety-eighth, counting from the organization of the original Philharmonic Society in 1842; its fourth season under Mr. Barbirolli, and the third since Mr. Barbirolli's engagement as the Philharmonic's regular conductor.

Mr. Barbirolli will be the guest of honor at a luncheon to be given by the Beethoven Association tomorrow in its clubhouse, where he will speak on the history of conducting. Carl Engel will introduce Mr. Barbirolli, and the British Consul, Godfrey Haggard, C. M. G., will also be a speaker.

American Program Tonight

A special concert of American music consisting of six works by composers who have won fellowships at the American Academy in Rome will be played by the New York Civic Orchestra tonight at the Federal

176

Symphony Concert

B. Trans
Feb. 18/39

Miss Hess as Soloist, And 100 Men to Follow

By MOSES SMITH

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon enlisted the services of approximately one hundred men and a girl. It is true that the girl is now of woman's estate, and that she is a pianist, not a singer. Furthermore, she relied entirely on her musical attainments, brought to the recreation of Beethoven's C minor Piano Concerto, whereas the girl in the movie had to be an actress as well. There were, it is scarcely necessary to write, numerous differences between yesterday's concert and the movie. But in one important additional matter the two were alike: the girl dominated the proceedings so far as the audience was concerned.

Until Myra Hess had come on stage for the Beethoven Concerto, which constituted the concluding half of yesterday's program, those proceedings had been a conventional symphony concert. Serge Koussevitzky had led the Orchestra through the first Boston performance of William Schuman's Second Symphony; and even the composer's presence in the audience had not been sufficient to stimulate more than scattering applause. There was some show of audience-enthusiasm after the performance of the relatively unfamiliar Third Symphony of Sibelius. But even here, for the most part, the audience sat on its hands.

* * *

But Miss Hess was a different matter. A remembered friend, she had but to appear to generate warm applause. Since she was to play a composition for which her talents are particularly suited the result was readily predictable. There was considerable applause after the end of the first movement. There were even scattered plaudits after the Largo—and nobody tried to stop them. At the end came one of those rousing demonstrations of enthusiasm and affection that indicate how unmistakably engrossed the listeners have been throughout the performance.

And it was, indeed, a beautiful performance, not only on the part of Miss Hess but also on the part of everyone else concerned in it. Her piano-playing, meeting the demands of the composer at every stage, now robust and virile, now sensitive and exquisitely refined, found the most sympathetic response from the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. An occasional deviation from perfect coincidence in attack did not appreciably alter the conviction that the ensemble was remarkably good and was based on an unusual sympathy among the performers.

* * *

If the Sibelius Symphony fell a little flat it was not because Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were not doing their utmost to present it in an exceptionally vital performance. The reason is rather to be sought partly in the unfamiliarity of the music, partly in its almost complete lack of showmanship and ready appeal. It is slight not only in duration but also in other dimensions. The climaxes are not big, the contrasts not obvious. The endings are abrupt.

In spite of these things, though, the Symphony is almost wearisomely repetitious (although I doubt whether this fact was in any degree responsible for the luke-warm response of the audience). In it is displayed more nakedly perhaps than in any of the other symphonies of Sibelius his almost pathological need for incessant restatement, with no more relief than transposition from one degree of the scale to another. The device is more successfully employed in the later symphonies because the thematic growth and development are more ingenious than they are in this Third Symphony. And the harmonic vocabulary and thematic material are a little less banal.

* * *

Mr. Schumann, whose rank is of course not to be confused with that of Sibelius, also relies on repetition in his Second Symphony. In fact, re-iteration is its dominant motive. But the devices of restatement that he uses, even though equally obvious, are more attractive to an ear sated with the nineteenth-century sequence. Mr. Schumann's writing is mainly polyphonic, in contrast with Sibelius's, which is principally harmonic. If he keeps a C sounding, as he does in one way or another almost throughout the entire length of the Symphony, there is something else happening at the same time; as likely as not, several things happening. If one instrument or set of instruments goes off on a seemingly endless ostinato, another is proceeding along a different line. By free employment of the old polyphonic devices of imitation, like the canon, the composer ends by restating the virtue of repetition, which, as far as I could make out at a first hearing, was his principal concern.

Even aside from these technical and analytical considerations (which seemed to interest nobody else in the audience), I found the music healthy and stimulating. In one long movement, which could discernibly be broken up into three sections, the symphony had muscular drive as well as intellectual conviction. Perhaps the language it employs and the form in which it is cast take it inevitably out of the category of music for large numbers of listeners. But I am not ready to concede even so much. It seems to me rather that Dr. Koussevitzky, far from having made a mistake in placing it on one of his programs, is actually disclosing to Boston audiences a genuine American talent.

Orchestral Novelties

C. S. Monitor
Feb. 18/39

By Pitts Sanborn

New York

Orchestral novelties have lent special interest to recent Carnegie Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. First came Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" at the "Concert Extraordinaire" given by the visiting Bostonians on the evening of Feb. 8 for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. This "Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children" made an undeniable hit, especially the charming theme associated with Peter himself. The program began (paradoxically, if you like) with Haydn's "Farewell" symphony, revived Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz," and ended with a waltz section, offering the "Wiener Blut" and "Frühlingstimmen" waltzes of Johann Strauss, Sibelius's "Valse triste," and Ravel's "La Valse."

The orchestral performance was excellent throughout, Dr. Koussevitzky directing everything except the Gruenberg piece, which he turned over to Richard Burgin, the concertmaster. Richard Hale read the text in "Peter and the Wolf" with rare skill, and Colin O'More struggled courageously with the Gruenberg voice part. The large audience was properly pleased to find doormen and ushers dressed in the costume of Haydn's prime, as well as the members of the orchestra during the "Farewell" Symphony for which candles and candelabra had been duly assembled. Dr. Koussevitzky himself impersonated Haydn.

The Philharmonic-Symphony novelties were exhibited on the evening of Feb. 11 at a "Special Gala Concent" which was really a tribute to that versatile French musician Nadia Boulanger and her followers. Thus two of Miss Boulanger's pupils were represented by a composition each, performed for the first time in America, and one of them, the young French composer Jean Françaix (born 1912) making his American début, figured also as pianist. The absent pupil was Antoni Szalowski, a Pole, born at Warsaw in 1907. His contribution was an overture written in 1935, absolute music, without further title, a brisk, energetic, somewhat dissonant work, doubtless influenced by Stravinsky, and tinged with humor and maybe irony.

* * *

Less of drive and cutting edge marked Mr. Françaix's Piano Concerto, in which he gave a fluent and spirited account of the solo part, but three of its four movements were no less brisk and chattering, if of a lighter, simpler gaiety. What pleased the house most, though, was the Andante, with its obvious melodic line. To conclude the program Mr. Françaix shared with Miss Boulanger the solo work in Mozart's E flat Concerto for two pianos, while John Barbirolli conducted—a performance admirable in its adjustments and keeping, if by no means the last word in Mozartean grace and elegance.

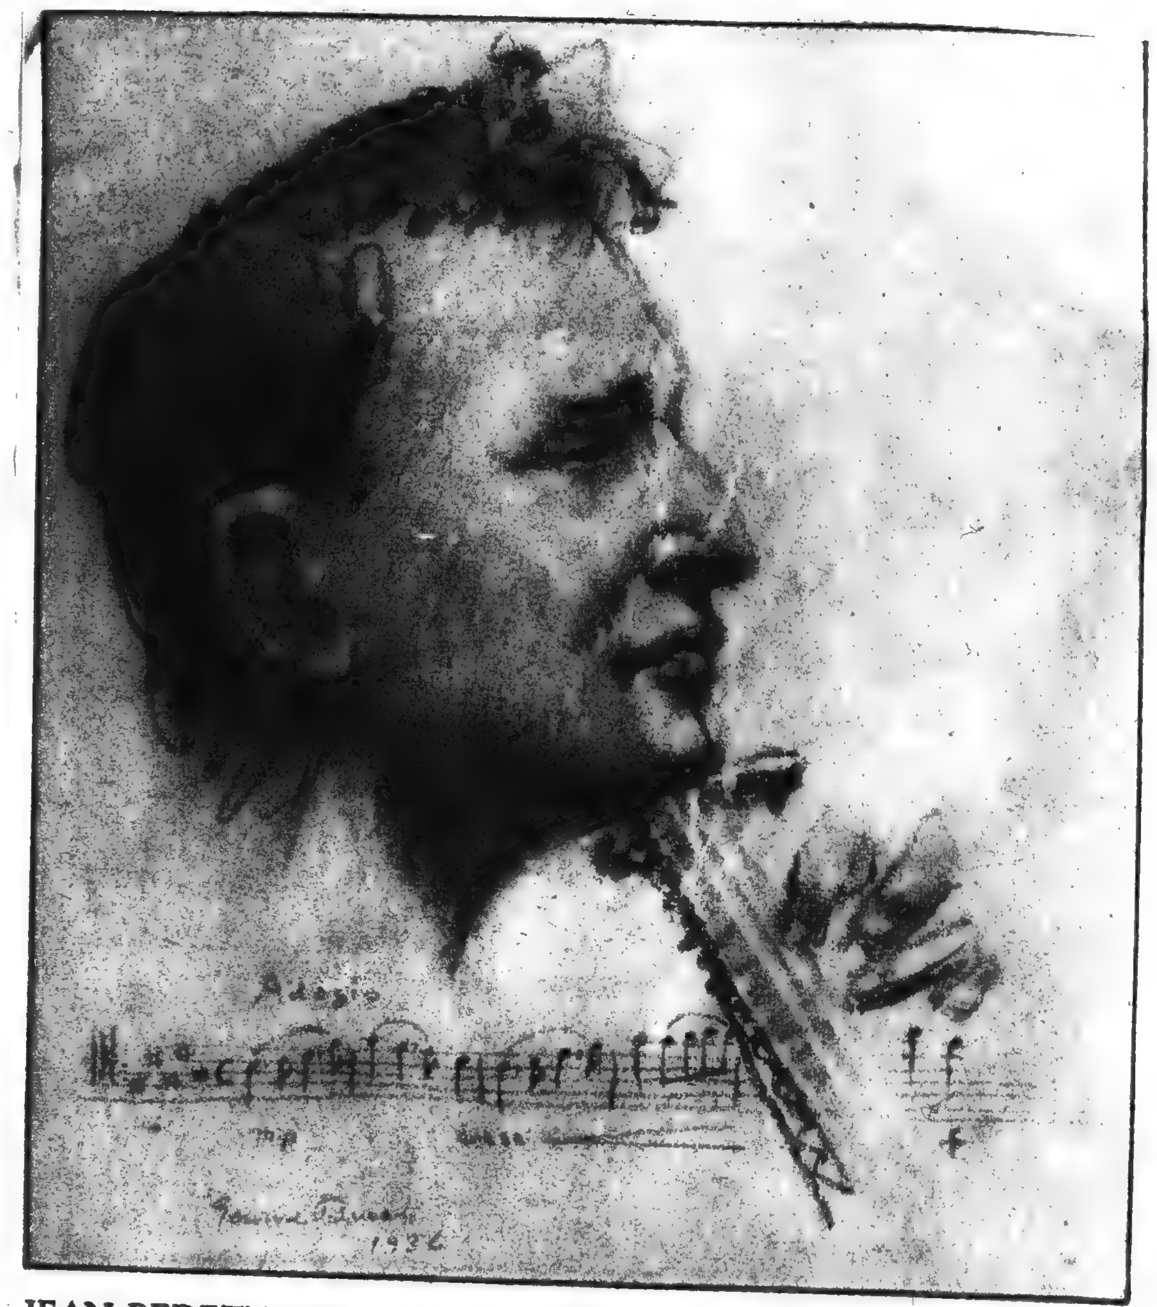
Miss Boulanger herself was the conductor (batonless, by the way) of the first half of the program, and an exceedingly efficient one. It was with pleasure, too, that you observed her easy modest demeanor, dignified without strut, totally lacking in self-consciousness. Thus she led an orchestra of men who played for her at their best through the two novelties and also the characteristic and beautiful nocturne for orchestra that Gabriel Fauré included in his incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock."

Nor did the contributions of the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonic-Symphony by any means end with these extraordinary occasions. On the evening of Feb. 10 Dr. Koussevitzky conducted Bruckner's Eighth Symphony (somewhat curtailed) and Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in a way that won only resounding praise, and the next afternoon he obtained no less distinguished results in a program comprising Mozart's A major Symphony, K. 201; Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances," the "Schélomo" of Ernest Bloch (who bowed his acknowledgments from a box), and again the "Pictures at an Exhibition."

The Philharmonic-Symphony program for the evening of Feb. 9, the following afternoon, and the afternoon of Feb. 12, brought forward Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, and as symphony Tchaikovsky's Fifth on the first two occasions and Beethoven's "Eroica" on the last. At all these concerts John Barbirolli conducted and Walter Gieseking was the soloist. Mr. Gieseking's stupendous playing in the concerto, in spite of the myriad other things going on, has been quite the talk of the town.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 19 1939



JEAN BEDETTI, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest artist for eighth annual concert by ~~Wethersfield~~ Women's Chorus at Wethersfield High School, Feb. 21. Louis Pellettieri will direct.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 19 1939

Boston ~~Symphony~~ Cellist To Play Here Tuesday

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest soloist for the annual concert of the Wethersfield Women's Chorus Tuesday at 8:30 p. m. at the Wethersfield High School. His program will be as follows: "Suite Ancienne," by Breval; "Allegro," "Adagio" and "Rondo"; "Toccata," by Frescobaldi; "Elegie," by Faure; "Dragon Fly," Delune, and "Russian Dance," by Liadoff. Leo Litvin of Boston will be Mr. Bedetti's accompanist.

Holyoke Transcript
Feb. 20/39

Koussevitzky Drops His Reserve And Kisses Pianist

BOSTON, Feb. 20—Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is noted for his reserve.

Thus, orchestra members were astonished today when they heard him exclaim, "before the whole orchestra!" and saw him implant an impulsive kiss upon the cheek of dark-eyed Myra Hess, celebrated English pianist, during a rehearsal.

Miss Hess, who had just played Schumann's "Concerto in A minor" in a way that delighted Koussevitzky, smilingly echoed his words, "before the whole orchestra!" and kissed him on the lips.

The orchestra loudly applauded both kisses.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 19 1939

THE ORCHESTRA

On Monday, March 13, the Philharmonic-Symphony will give a concert in Boston at Symphony Hall, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will mark Mr. Barbirolli's first appearance in the New England metropolis. Artur Schnabel will be the soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. The Philharmonic last visited Boston, under Arturo Toscanini, in March, 1936. It will play in Hartford Tuesday night, March 14, in its third and last out-of-town concert of the season.

Next Season's Schedule

In 1939-'40, between Nov. 20 and Dec. 3, however, Mr. Barbirolli will take the Philharmonic-Symphony on its longest tour in this country since 1928-'29. The orchestra will travel as far west as Chicago and will also appear in three Canadian cities. The concerts on Nov. 26 in Chicago and Dec. 3 in Utica will go on the air, so as not to interrupt the sequence of the orchestra's regular Sunday broadcasts.

Next fall's trip has been made possible through the co-operation of the Columbia Broadcasting System. The home season at Carnegie Hall will again be twenty-eight weeks long, but, owing to the tour, will begin a week earlier and end a week later than in this season, opening Thursday night, March 14 and closing Sunday afternoon, May 5, 1940. The number and length of the various series will be as present, including the six Young People's concerts under Ernest Schelling. Next season will be the orchestra's ninety-eighth, counting from the organization of the original Philharmonic Society in 1842; its fourth season under Mr. Barbirolli, and the third since Mr. Barbirolli's engagement as the Philharmonic's regular conductor.

Mr. Barbirolli will be the guest of honor at a luncheon to be given by the Beethoven Association tomorrow in its clubhouse, where he will speak on the history of conducting. Carl Engel will introduce Mr. Barbirolli, and the British Consul, Godfrey Haggard, C. M. G., will also be a speaker.

American Program Tonight

A special concert of American music consisting of six works by composers who have won fellowships at the American Academy in Rome will be played by the New York Civic Orchestra tonight at the Federal

17

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 19 1939

Records in Review

Koussevitzky Conducts Bostonians in Haydn Symphony—Brahms' Third Played by London Philharmonic

Any one with half an ear can whistle the tunes of a Haydn symphony after one hearing. Like Mozart, Haydn's music is extremely easy to listen to, being essentially melodic and clear as crystal in structure. It has all the necessary requisites for great popularity. Concertgoers hear perhaps half a dozen Haydn symphonies played over and over. This season a number of the practically unknown of his 104 symphonies will be played here for the first time in the Friends of Music series to be conducted by Fritz Stiedry.

Why should Haydn be so neglected? If he has been slighted in the concert halls he has been downright ignored by the record companies. A recent survey in this column showed that while Mozart's music led in the number of recordings, Haydn's was near the bottom of the list.

Beyond the natural unpredictability of popular taste one is hard put to it to find a reason for this phenomenon. It is sincerely hoped that the record companies will take advantage of the service the Stiedry series is rendering and transfer to wax some of the many beautiful Haydn symphonies which have never been heard by the American public.

* * *

A vote of sincere gratitude is due Dr. Koussevitzky for a current addition to the meager recorded library of Haydn symphonies in his superb performance of the B flat major No. 102 on Victor records.

The persistent conception of cheery "Papa Haydn" is quickly dispelled in listening to the broad Beethovenesque measures which form the slow introduction of this work. Likewise, the dramatic modulations, sudden dynamic contrasts of the first and last movements, the vigorous menuetto foreshadowing Beethoven's brusque scherzos, do not conform to the delicate, powdered-wigged Haydn popularly pictured. The music is played crisply and with great vitality and the recording is excellent.

* * *

In 1883, almost a century after the completion of the Haydn work, Brahms wrote his Third Symphony in F major, which was dubbed by some critics at the time of its first performance as a second "Eroica." No doubt the No. 3 classification of the symphony had something to do with the title. Despite the fine quality of the music, however, it is not a heroic symphony in any part except the exalted finale.

Not many months ago Columbia released a magnificent version of Brahms' Fourth by a combination which in such music is unsurpassable with the possible exception of Bruno Walter and his late lamented Vienna Philharmonic. The combination is Felix Weingartner and the London Philharmonic, and their performance is all that might be expected. Faithful care for detail is observed without losing sight of broad lyric patterns, while the intimate charm of the song-like andante and the intimate brooding of the allegretto are treated with rare understanding.

B. Her. Feb. 21/39

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fourth concert in the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Myra Hess, pianist, was the soloist. Richard Hale, narrator, assisted. The program was as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in A major, K. No. 201.
Prokofieff—"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Op. 67.
Schumann—Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54.
Ravel—"La Valse," Choreographic Poem.

As often happens in this subsidiary series, last night's concert was a particularly delightful and rewarding occasion. The combination of Mozart's enchanting symphony, Prokofieff's amusing fairy tale, the glorious Schumann concerto and Ravel's stimulating "waltz" proved, as might easily have been anticipated, irresistible. Moreover, it was all brilliantly played. Dr. Koussevitzky showed the finest judgment in interpretation between the classical, the modern and the romantic.

Miss Hess, as on the weekend concerts, gave a performance that was engrossing to listen to. Some might even prefer her Schumann to her Beethoven, though this is matter for conversational dissection rather than a printed appraisal. The phrasing, the rhythmic problems, were all taken care of in expert fashion. Again there was a wonderful sense of co-ordination with the orchestra and conductor. Again there was the feeling of the music first, last and all the time.

"Peter and the Wolf" has obviously come to stay. It would be interesting to test its effect upon an audience of children; but the beauty and freshness of its melodies and the sparkle of its orchestration can always have a wider appeal. Dr. Koussevitzky's policy of accelerating the whole performance is undoubtedly wise, though possibly the composer might have preferred that the wood-wind themes be not too hurried. There is no point here in laboring the fact that we have not seen and still do not see eye to eye with Mr. Hale's narration of the text. He has spoken it enough now and has noticed the reaction on a number of audiences so that he need have scant concern with its close.

Ravel's remarkable "La Valse" brought this exceptional concert to it sclose.

It will be repeated this afternoon. The next pair in the series will be given—in the middle of our annual session with the Metropolitan Opera, unhappily—on March 20 and 21.

Music and The Dance

SYMPHONY HALL—COM. 1492
TODAY 3
Boston Symphony
ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor
Soloist—MYRA HESS—Piano

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
FEB 9 - 1939

THE Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr Serge Koussevitsky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last Nov. 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2000 for each of the six concerts.

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR
FEB 19 1939

The World Of Music

By LOUIS F. KEEMLE.

NEW YORK, Feb. 18 (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitzky impersonating Haydn, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony.. In the last movement, the players, one by one, snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the Lions' Den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin Moore sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

B. Globe Feb. 21/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A chronicler of last night's Boston Symphony concert is faced with the dilemma of just where to begin. For the evening boasted not only a superlative performance of Schumann's A minor Piano Concerto with Myra Hess as the soloist, but a thrilling recreation of Ravel's "La Valse," as well. These two compositions—and the manner in which they were played—came as exciting second half to a concert that began with one of Mozart's youthful and delectable symphonies—in A major (K. 201), and included "Peter And the Wolf," that charming setting of a Russian fairly tale, by Prokofieff. As in previous performances here of "Peter And the Wolf," the spoken part of narrator was expressively taken by Richard Hale.

Since a cardinal rule of courtesy is ladies first, this is the place to say that Myra Hess was again at the top of her form, playing with her familiar though unobtrusive technical mastery and beautifully polished style one of the noblest piano concertos in the realm of music. The Schumann Concerto was created by a tone poet, and it takes a poet (or poetess) of the keyboard to bring out its essentially romantic spirit. This Miss Hess did superbly to an equally shortcoming perceptible—and that was minor—lay in one or two discrepancies in the tempo between soloist and orchestra.

Although "La Valse" is more forceful than subtle and ends with a walloping climax, Ravel's sardonic evocation of the most sentimental of dances is the product of a complex mind and time. Dr. Koussevitsky has always interpreted it with unusual distinction, but the effect last night was electrifying.

The Monday audience evidently were of the same mind, to judge by their applause. The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon.

C. W. D.

MYRA HESS AT EXTRA CONCERT

Soloist With Symphony in Schumann Concerto

B. Post — Feb. 21/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not often have the subscribers to the extra series of Symphony Concerts received so attractive a programme as the one presented by Dr. Koussevitzky last evening and which will be heard again this afternoon. As is the rule at these concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky drew somewhat on programmes already presented this season. Prokofieff's musical fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as the narrator, heard at the recent Pension Fund Concert, had place on last evening's list, as did Ravel's "La Valse," another item from this so-called "Concert Extraordinaire."

For the rest, however, this programme was comprised of music that had not been heard in Boston this season. The opening number was Mozart's youthful Symphony in A major, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced here in the fall of 1936, and the remaining and chief item on the programme was the Pianoforte Concerto of Schumann with Myra Hess as the soloist. Ever since Miss Hess played this most romantic concertos at a Pension Fund Concert a few years ago the music has seemed to be peculiarly her own. Possibly last evening's performance was a little less inspired, as the phrase goes, but it would still be difficult to imagine a more sympathetic performance from any other pianist. As was the case when Miss Hess played the Beethoven C minor Concerto at the concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the audience was tumultuously enthusiastic. Nor was it any less appreciative of the combined efforts of Prokofieff, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Hale. In the familiar music of "La Valse" conductor and orchestra quite outdid themselves.

C. S. Monitor — Feb. 21/39.

'Peter and the Wolf' Again

If you are one of the "children" who have not yet heard the Prokofieff version of that Orchestral Fairy Tale, "Peter and the Wolf," then you may as well swallow your disappointment . . . and write to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra about it, for it was performed last night and announced for this afternoon as the orchestra's fourth program in the Monday-Tuesday series of concerts. Presumably, it will be done again this season, but there is always another season in prospect.

With Richard Hale again in the role of narrator, the deliciously shivery tale went forward last night with its customary quota of thrills, and it is doubtful if any previous audience derived any greater enjoyment. As a matter of fact, one listener found last night's performance superior to former ones on several counts. Mr. Hale himself, for instance, has settled more naturally into the part; the strings have found a more comprehensive strut for Peter, and the various birds and beasts have enlarged their dynamic vocabulary. Dr. Koussevitzky has performed a real service to his patrons and they in turn have given him a gratifying, if slightly Bostonese, response.

The Prokofieff item was, however, but one of the several enjoyable things which Dr. Koussevitzky offered last night. The opening Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) by Mozart was one of the most charming performances of orchestral music which we have heard from the orchestra this winter. It deserves an early repetition.

And of course, there was the soloist, Miss Myra Hess who is literally spending the week end with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the pair of concerts in this series she is heard in the Schumann Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra. Her performance last night was one of the most poetic which she has yet compassed . . . and that is saying a great deal. There may be a restless few who would like to hear some of the newer pianoforte works from her, yet so long as they may hear the older works performed with the perfection of detail which Miss Hess discloses, they should be more than satisfied. Evidently those at the concert last night were captivated, since they appeared reluctant to allow the soloist to retire, but must bring her forward for an ovation which she shared with orchestra and conductor. The program closed with a brilliant publication of the Ravel "La Valse," choreographic poem.

G. M. S.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 18 1939

BECAUSE the recent visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra embraced a moment of exceptional felicity, it seems pertinent to bestow an affectionate comment upon the concert on February 8 in aid of the Pension Fund.

Whether you were struck by the resemblance of Serge Koussevitzky to the surviving photographs of "Papa" Haydn, the fact remains that one was compelled to concede such a resemblance, so artfully was the Boston conductor made up. The stage was set to recall an eighteenth century salon, probably in the Esterhaz castle. The players wore wigs, laced coats, and knee-breeches, candles fluttered over their music stands, and a soft and classic glow bathed the scene from a hundred candles set in a great chandelier.

Rarely has the "Farewell" symphony enjoyed such a delicious performance. True to the story, the musicians stole out, one by one, as the end drew near, blowing out their candles and finally leaving only "Papa" Haydn himself and a lone violinist to bow in the dim light as the audience applauded.

After Mr. Colin O'More had shouted his way through Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz", a setting of the Lindsay poem which has been heard here before, with the orchestra in mess jackets, seated on a movable platform against a garish but clever backdrop, the real entertainment began. This was Prokofieff's new piece, "Peter and the Wolf", in which Mr. Richard Hale used his magnificent voice to address the audience as "My dear children" and relate the movement of this fairy tale in amusing fashion. The music itself is salty, brilliant, and adroit, yet fraught with a truly childish simplicity. Everyone enjoyed it. Then came Waltzes from Strauss to Ravel, and the evening ended upon a festive note.

17

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 19 1939

Records in Review

Koussevitzky Conducts Bostonians in Haydn Symphony—Brahms' Third Played by London Philharmonic

Any one with half an ear can whistle the tunes of a Haydn symphony after one hearing. Like Mozart, Haydn's music is extremely easy to listen to, being essentially melodic and clear as crystal in structure. It has all the necessary requisites for great popularity. Concertgoers hear perhaps half a dozen Haydn symphonies played over and over. This season a number of the practically unknown of his 104 symphonies will be played here for the first time in the Friends of Music series to be conducted by Fritz Stiedry.

Why should Haydn be so neglected? If he has been slighted in the concert halls he has been downright ignored by the record companies. A recent survey in this column showed that while Mozart's music led in the number of recordings, Haydn's was near the bottom of the list.

Beyond the natural unpredictability of popular taste one is hard put to it to find a reason for this phenomenon. It is sincerely hoped that the record companies will take advantage of the service the Stiedry series is rendering and transfer to wax some of the many beautiful Haydn symphonies which have never been heard by the American public.

• • •

A vote of sincere gratitude is due Dr. Koussevitzky for a current addition to the meager recorded library of Haydn symphonies in his superb performance of the B flat major No. 102 on Victor records.

The persistent conception of cheery "Papa Haydn" is quickly dispelled in listening to the broad Beethovenesque measures which form the slow introduction of this work. Likewise, the dramatic modulations, sudden dynamic contrasts of the first and last movements, the vigorous menuetto foreshadowing Beethoven's brusque scherzos, do not conform to the delicate, powdered-wigged Haydn popularly pictured. The music is played crisply and with great vitality and the recording is excellent.

• • •

In 1883, almost a century after the completion of the Haydn work, Brahms wrote his Third Symphony in F major, which was dubbed by some critics at the time of its first performance as a second "Eroica." No doubt the No. 3 classification of the symphony had something to do with the title. Despite the fine quality of the music, however, it is not a heroic symphony in any part except the exalted finale.

Not many months ago Columbia released a magnificent version of Brahms' Fourth by a combination which in such music is unsurpassable with the possible exception of Bruno Walter and his late lamented Vienna Philharmonic. The combination is Felix Weingartner and the London Philharmonic, and their performance is all that might be expected. Faithful care for detail is observed without losing sight of broad lyric patterns, while the intimate charm of the song-like andante and the intimate brooding of the allegretto are treated with rare understanding.

B. Her. Feb. 21/39

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fourth concert in the Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Myra Hess, pianist, was the soloist. Richard Hale, narrator, assisted. The program was as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in A major, K. No. 201.
Prokofieff—"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Op. 67.
Schumann—Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54.
Ravel—"La Valse," Choreographic Poem.

As often happens in this subsidiary series, last night's concert was a particularly delightful and rewarding occasion. The combination of Mozart's enchanting symphony, Prokofieff's amusing fairy tale, the glorious Schumann concerto and Ravel's stimulating "waltz" proved, as might easily have been anticipated, irresistible. Moreover, it was all brilliantly played. Dr. Koussevitzky showed the finest judgment in interpretation between the classical, the modern and the romantic.

Miss Hess, as on the weekend concerts, gave a performance that was engrossing to listen to. Some might even prefer her Schumann to her Beethoven, though this is matter for conversational dissection rather than a printed appraisal. The phrasing, the rhythmic problems, were all taken care of in expert fashion. Again there was a wonderful sense of co-ordination with the orchestra and conductor. Again there was the feeling of the music first, last and all the time.

"Peter and the Wolf" has obviously come to stay. It would be interesting to test its effect upon an audience of children; but the beauty and freshness of its melodies and the sparkle of its orchestration can always have a wider appeal. Dr. Koussevitzky's policy of accelerating the whole performance is undoubtedly wise, though possibly the composer might have preferred that the wood-wind themes be not too hurried. There is no point here in laboring the fact that we have not seen and still do not see eye to eye with Mr. Hale's narration of the text. He has spoken it enough now and has noticed the reaction on a number of audiences so that he need have scant concern with its close.

Ravel's remarkable "La Valse" brought this exceptional concert to it sclose.

It will be repeated this afternoon. The next pair in the series will be given—in the middle of our annual session with the Metropolitan Opera, unhappily—on March 20 and 21.

Music and The Dance

SYMPHONY HALL—COM. 1492
TODAY 3
Boston Symphony
ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor
Soloist—MYRA HESS—Piano

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
FEB 9 - 1939

THE Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last Nov. 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2000 for each of the six concerts.

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR
FEB 19 1939

The World Of Music

By LOUIS F. KEEMLE.

NEW YORK, Feb. 18 (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitzky impersonating Haydn, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one, snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the Lions' Den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin Moore sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

Globe Feb. 21/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A chronicler of last night's Boston Symphony concert is faced with the dilemma of just where to begin. For the evening boasted not only a superlative performance of Schumann's A minor Piano Concerto with Myra Hess as the soloist, but a thrilling recreation of Ravel's "La Valse," as well. These two compositions—and the manner in which they were played—came as exciting second half to a concert that began with one of Mozart's youthful and delectable symphonies—in A major (K. 201), and included "Peter And the Wolf," that charming setting of a Russian fairly tale, by Prokofieff. As in previous performances here of "Peter And the Wolf," the spoken part of narrator was expressively taken by Richard Hale.

Since a cardinal rule of courtesy is ladies first, this is the place to say that Myra Hess was again at the top of her form, playing with her familiar though unobtrusive technical mastery and beautifully polished style one of the noblest piano concertos in the realm of music. The Schumann Concerto was created by a tone poet, and it takes a poet (or poetess) of the keyboard to bring out its essentially romantic spirit. This Miss Hess did superbly to an equally shortcoming perceptible—and that was minor—lay in one or two discrepancies in the tempo between soloist and orchestra.

Although "La Valse" is more forceful than subtle and ends with a walloping climax, Ravel's sardonic evocation of the most sentimental of dances is the product of a complex mind and time. Dr. Koussevitzky has always interpreted it with unusual distinction, but the effect last night was electrifying.

The Monday audience evidently were of the same mind, to judge by their applause. The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon.

C. W. D.

MYRA HESS AT EXTRA CONCERT

Soloist With Symphony in Schumann Concerto

B. Post Feb. 21/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not often have the subscribers to the extra series of Symphony Concerts received so attractive a programme as the one presented by Dr. Koussevitzky last evening and which will be heard again this afternoon. As is the rule at these concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky drew somewhat on programmes already presented this season. Prokofieff's musical fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as the narrator, heard at the recent Pension Fund Concert, had place on last evening's list, as did Ravel's "La Valse," another item from this so-called "Concert Extraordinaire."

For the rest, however, this programme was comprised of music that had not been heard in Boston this season. The opening number was Mozart's youthful Symphony in A major, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced here in the fall of 1936, and the remaining and chief item on the programme was the Pianoforte Concerto of Schumann with Myra Hess as the soloist. Ever since Miss Hess played this most romantic concertos at a Pension Fund Concert a few years ago the music has seemed to be peculiarly her own. Possibly last evening's performance was a little less inspired, as the phrase goes, but it would still be difficult to imagine a more sympathetic performance from any other pianist. As was the case when Miss Hess played the Beethoven C minor Concerto at the concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the audience was tumultuously enthusiastic. Nor was it any less appreciative of the combined efforts of Prokofieff, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Hale. In the familiar music of "La Valse" conductor and orchestra quite outdid themselves.

C. S. Monitor Feb. 21/39.

'Peter and the Wolf' Again

If you are one of the "children" who have not yet heard the Prokofieff version of that Orchestral Fairy Tale, "Peter and the Wolf," then you may as well swallow your disappointment . . . and write to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra about it, for it was performed last night and announced for this afternoon as the orchestra's fourth program in the Monday-Tuesday series of concerts. Presumably it will be done again this season, but there is always another season in prospect.

With Richard Hale again in the role of narrator, the deliciously shivery tale went forward last night with its customary quota of thrills, and it is doubtful if any previous audience derived any greater enjoyment. As a matter of fact, one listener found last night's performance superior to former ones on several counts. Mr. Hale himself, for instance, has settled more naturally into the part; the strings have found a more comprehensive strut for Peter, and the various birds and beasts have enlarged their dynamic vocabulary. Dr. Koussevitzky has performed a real service to his patrons and they in turn have given him a gratifying, if slightly Bostonese, response.

The Prokofieff item was, however, but one of the several enjoyable things which Dr. Koussevitzky offered last night. The opening Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) by Mozart was one of the most charming performances of orchestral music which we have heard from the orchestra this winter. It deserves an early repetition.

And of course, there was the soloist, Miss Myra Hess who is literally spending the week end with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the pair of concerts in this series she is heard in the Schumann Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra. Her performance last night was one of the most poetic which she has yet compassed . . . and that is saying a great deal. There may be a restless few who would like to hear some of the newer pianoforte works from her, yet so long as they may hear the older works performed with the perfection of detail which Miss Hess discloses, they should be more than satisfied. Evidently those at the concert last night were captivated, since they appeared reluctant to allow the soloist to retire, but must bring her forward for an ovation which she shared with orchestra and conductor. The program closed with a brilliant publication of the Ravel "La Valse," choreographic poem.

G. M. S.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 18 1939

BECAUSE the recent visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra embraced a moment of exceptional felicity, it seems pertinent to bestow an affectionate comment upon the concert on February 8 in aid of the Pension Fund.

Whether you were struck by the resemblance of Serge Koussevitzky to the surviving photographs of "Papa" Haydn, the fact remains that one was compelled to concede such a resemblance, so artfully was the Boston conductor made up. The stage was set to recall an eighteenth century salon, probably in the Esterhaz castle. The players wore wigs, laced coats, and knee-breeches, candles fluttered over their music stands, and a soft and classic glow bathed the scene from a hundred candles set in a great chandelier.

Rarely has the "Farewell" symphony enjoyed such a delicious performance. True to the story, the musicians stole out, one by one, as the end drew near, blowing out their candles and finally leaving only "Papa" Haydn himself and a lone violinist to bow in the dim light as the audience applauded.

After Mr. Colin O'More had shouted his way through Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz", a setting of the Lindsay poem which has been heard here before, with the orchestra in mess jackets, seated on a movable platform against a garish but clever backdrop, the real entertainment began. This was Prokofieff's new piece, "Peter and the Wolf", in which Mr. Richard Hale used his magnificent voice to address the audience as "My dear children" and relate the movement of this fairy tale in amusing fashion. The music itself is salty, brilliant, and adroit, yet fraught with a truly childish simplicity. Everyone enjoyed it. Then came Waltzes from Strauss to Ravel, and the evening ended upon a festive note.

Boston Amusements—

C. S. Monitor - Feb. 23/39

'Contemporary Classicism;' Roy Harris' New Symphony

By Alfred H. Meyer

Twice in the last two weeks I have heard composers (William Schuman and Roy Harris) talk in almost identical terms about contemporary music:

"The composer knows that melody is the prime element in all music. He would learn more about developing melody by studying that greatest store of melodic writing, the Plainsong of the Gregorian period in the history of music. He would avoid all the trickery, the sensationalism, the showmanship of the music of the nineteenth century, but he would learn from that showmanship the most telling and effective way of presenting his own music. He would learn from the Romanticists their use of color, without being led into the excesses of the colorists. The composer of the present is trying to achieve a contemporary classicism."

This is indeed the creed of the forward-looking composer of this beginning middle portion of the twentieth century. He is through with the study and exploitation of dissonance and discord for their own sake, as practised in the 'teens and twenties of this century. Said Mr. Schuman at the Boston Public Library last Wednesday, "I am glad I was not born 10 years earlier, for then I would have taken part in that horrible study of discord which took place 10 years ago." And Mr. Harris, who is 12 years older than Mr. Schuman, echoed much of this point of view in talking about his new symphony, when he said, "The symphony is a piece of melodic organic evolution. The melody is always diatonic. The harmony is always made up of new uses of consonant triads—when it does not revert to the earlier forms of organum, which historically preceded all counterpoint and harmony."

* * *

To be sure, the composer of the present has learned from his elder brother not to be afraid of dissonance. Thus in Mr. Harris' new symphony the melody, which is consistently diatonic, is sometimes polytonal or polymodal, or is sometimes based on a polytonal chord (that is, a chord made up of two distinct, separate chords, or chords taken from two keys or two modes). The harmonic scheme, this new use of consonant triads, also frequently places in close juxtaposition chords from several different keys or modes. If clashes occur, the new composer has learned from the last two decades to be tolerant toward them—that is, if he feels them as clashes at all.

"This new treatment of consonances and dependence on the free use of consonances has innumerable possibilities," said Mr. Harris. "The surface has only been scratched. But I do believe that we should exhaust the study of conconance in all its relationships before we go systematically into the study of dissonance, as the earlier part of the century unpreparedly and abortively attempted."

Turning more specifically to his new "Third Symphony: 1939," which is to receive its first performances at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday and Saturday, Mr. Harris stated that the whole melodic outline of this piece of "melodic organic evolution" was evolved in a single day. Its working out was completed shortly before Christmas, last year. The new symphony is in a single movement, "Con moto."

This one movement is in five sections, which, however, by the most skillfully contrived transitions, flow into one another without interrupting in the least the continuity of the whole. The first section is intense and tragic; the second more lyric; the third, with pastoral connotations, is brighter—in the words of the composer, is "full of light"; the fourth, a fugue, is a section of strength and vigor; the fifth recapitulates in such a way as to be both a thematic and an emotional reprise.

* * *

The tragic intensity of the first section is established by sonorities in low strings. The open fourths and fifths of the ancient organum are the only harmony and serve to emphasize the hard and dour beginning. But this grim beginning, in its turn, has as its chief purpose to enhance and to throw into the greatest possible relief the beginning of the principal melody of the first section, which enters when violins are first heard and when major triads first put in their appearance.

In the second section the lyric flow becomes more obvious, the melody is more disjunct, there is a sense of release from the more forbidding first section, a feeling as of spontaneous joy. It is thus an intermediate stage on the way toward the brightly colored and ingratiating Pastorale or third section.

This section moves in gay melodic patterns in high-pitched instruments, over polytonal arpeggiated chords in strings. It is dispassionate, free, gracious. The transition toward the fugue of the fourth section gets more and more boisterous.

The fugue is all strength and vigor. As in the first two sections strings were prominent, and as in the third the melodic lines were in wood winds, so in this fugue brasses and percussion come in for their turn. A counterpoint near the end of this section is derived from the second section of the symphony and begins to meet the formal demands for recapitulation. A strong rhythmic motive affords transition to the fifth section.

This section reintroduces the string melody of the first section. It comes to its culmination in a multiple canon in strings and wood winds, punctuated by rhythmic motives in brass and percussion. The symphony ends in low-pitched instruments, in the mood of the beginning.

Early Curtain For 'Five Kings'

Performances of "Five Kings" will begin at 8 in the evening and at 2 for matinées, at the Colonial next week. The piece, abstracted from three Shakespearean plays, is longer than the usual run.

Because of Orson Welles' radio engagement, performances of "Five Kings" will be omitted on Friday evenings, but there will be three matinée, on Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays.

Parts of "Henry IV," Parts I and II, and of "Henry V" are included in the presentation. Mr. Welles plays Falstaff, and Burgess Meredith Prince Hal.

Symphony Analysis, Concert

Photographs at Symphony Hall

C. S. Monitor - Feb. 23/39

By Dorothy Adlow

In the Exhibition Foyer of Symphony Hall there are on view New England photographs furnished by a dozen camera clubs of Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts.

The many subjects which invite a photographer's interest are represented: personal portraits, snow scenes, marines, architectural details, dunes, and genre. The photographer finds his camera responsive to many variations of mood. In general he does what the hobby painter does; he goes to the country with his apparatus, finds a pleasant stretch of meadow, a glittering waterfall, a handsome patch of clouds; he trains his camera upon the chosen spot, controls the shot as fully as he can, and then, hopes for the best. When we see five dozen camera prints, we find them conforming to an expected pattern. The gray tonal gamut is adaptable, but limited; the possibility of variation wide but soon encompassed. One waterfall comes to look like another, if the camera man does not take pains to capture a maximum of distinguishing qualities. That he can do through care, skill, and with benefit of a sensitive apparatus.

The prints at Symphony Hall show how common today is good craftsmanship in photography. They show how many people are having a good time taking pictures of which they may well be proud. Outstanding contributions come from L. Whitney Standish, Harold King, R. L. Coffin, Franklin I. Jordan, H. B. Tower, Jr., and Charles White.

B. Globe Feb. 28/39

MUSIC

HOTEL VENDOME

The Litwin Trio

The Litwin Trio, composed of three Boston artists, gave its first public concert as a unit last night in the Concert Hall of the Hotel Vendome. Leo Litwin, pianist, and George Millrood, violinist, have previously appeared in solo recitals. Arthur Winograd, cellist, was here heard for the first time. A cordial reception was given by the audience.

The program comprised three Trios: one by Buxtehude, 17th century composer, one by Joseph Jongen, heard here for the first time, and the Trio Op. 101 by Brahms. The Brahms Trio is undoubtedly the best music, and here the Litwin Trio did its best playing.

It was easy to imagine that the Trio by Buxtehude would be more effective when played by the instruments for which it was originally written — violin, harpsichord and viola da gamba. It is a little too thin in substance and body for the modern instruments. Jongen's Trio impresses as being much too long for what the composer (a contemporary Belgian) has to say. There is little originality in the thematic material, and it is developed by monotonous imitation by the instruments. The Andante section contains moments of some distinction, with some good melody writing.

The members of the Litwin Trio are undoubtedly well-schooled, able artists. Their performance showed a good ensemble spirit, and a real feeling for the music in hand. Occasional shortcomings of intonation or failure to give a part its due prominence are minor flaws that show only the short time that they have been organized as a unit.

Post Feb 28/39 Copyright, 19

LITWIN TRIO CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Litwin Trio, a newly formed ensemble of three young resident musicians, was heard in its first public concert at the Hotel Vendome last evening. Specifically, these performers are George Millrood, violinist; Arthur Winograd, 'cellist, and Leo Litwin, pianist. Mr. Litwin, who has given his name to the organization, is well known here both as accompanist and solo pianist.

By testimony of last evening's concert the Litwin Trio is a group to be heard with pleasure in whatever music it essays. The programme it offered on this occasion was neither radical nor conventional, and listed trios by Buxtehude, Joseph Jongon and Brahms. That age in music is a relative rather than an actual matter was demonstrated anew in the case of the first two of these works. Joseph Jorgon, who is head of the Conservatory of Brussels, has just turned 65, and Dietrich Buxtehude, who excited the emulation of Bach, both as performer and composer, was born in 1637. Nevertheless, the music of the ancient composer is still very much alive and that of the living one quite the reverse—tiresomely monotonous and derivative; full of echoes of Franck, Rimsky-Korsakov and other composers. Why the three young players chose to expend their skill upon it is not easy to see, unless it was that they thought they were offering us music that was not staled by repetition and would, therefore, be acceptable upon that ground alone.

They were heard and warmly applauded last evening by an audience which filled most of an auditorium ideally suited to the performance of chamber music.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

FEB 12 1939

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER

FEB 13 1939

LOOKING FORWARD TO SIXTH FESTIVAL

Six concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge

---

NEW CASTLE, IND.
COURIER - TIMES

FEB 13 1939

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last Nov. 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2,000 for each of the six concerts.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

FEB 12 1939

SIX CONCERTS WILL

. . . be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood in Stockbridge, Mass., next summer. There will be two series on concerts, the first on Aug. 3, 5 and 6 and the second Aug. 10, 12 and 13. The membership lists closed on Nov. 1 with the result that audiences of more than 2,000 are assured. Ninety per cent of the boxes have been taken.

Everything is being done to insure the convenience and comfort of the patrons.

CANTON, ILL.
LEDGER

FEB 11 1939

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr.

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR

FEB 12 1939

THE Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge

---

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

FEB 11 1939

Supervisors of Music Favor Festival Plan

At the invitation of Superintendent of Schools Edward J. Russell and F. Carl Gorman, supervisor of music for Pittsfield, several supervisors of music in Berkshire met yesterday afternoon to discuss a proposal of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to sponsor a series of lectures on music appreciation. The lectures, to be given by Miss Harriet Johnson of the Layman's Music Course, would take place when and if the Festival had sufficient funds to finance them.

The supervisors were enthusiastic over the idea and passed a resolution unanimously favoring the plan. They were also anxious that the Festival should make plans in the future if possible to permit school children interested in music to attend rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

The Festival was represented by George W. Edman of this city and Miss Alice Riggs of Stockbridge. Others present were Mr. Russell, Mr. Gorman, William H. Flynn of Dalton, Miss Adeline O. Johnson of Lenox, James Morley Chambers of North Adams, M. John Shand of Adams and Miss Spagniol of the parochial schools in North Adams.

GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE

FEB 10 1939

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevtisky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last Nov. 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2000 for each of the six concerts.

NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER

FEB 15 1939

35 JR. HIGH PUPILS TO HEAR HUB SYMPHONY

Teachers Will Escort Students To Concert By Boston Symphony Orchestra Of Classic And Semi-Classic Music

About 35 pupils in the Junior high school will attend the Youth's concert this afternoon in Symphony hall, Boston where 70 musicians of the Boston symphony orchestra will give a concert of classic and semi-classic music from Bach to more modern composers. Wheeler Beckett will conduct. The children will be under the supervision of Miss Ann Switzer and Mrs. Marie Brown, teachers in the Junior high school.

The concert will probably be given in three parts. Arranged so that the children will grasp some of the sterner motifs of the masters there is sufficient relief provided by the waltz music of Johann Strauss and the later Richard Strauss, to make the concert particularly entertaining for the young pupils. It is expected that the ever popular and lilting Blue Danube waltz will be given without variations, exactly as Strauss composed it.

The children will leave Norwood by bus. The concert is scheduled to begin at 3:30 and every ticket allotted to Norwood has been taken by Junior high pupils.

The Youth Concerts is something new to New England recently and follows a broad attempt to educate children in an appreciation of music.

B. Trans

MUSIC

Feb. 23 1939

Foreword to New Symphony By a Seasoned American

By Moses Smith

Fresh from an essay with a young American composer, William Schuman, whose Symphony last week disturbed many and engrossed a few at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky turns his attention, for the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, to the new Third Symphony of a seasoned hand, Roy Harris, who, as it happens, has been teacher of Schuman.

Mr. Harris's Symphony, which will be followed on the program by Stravinsky's "Fire - Bird" Suite and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (the last-named in place of the same composer's "Pastoral," originally announced), will be receiving first performances on these occasions. The Boston Symphony concerts have also been the scene for first performances of Mr. Harris's earlier symphonies—the First in January, 1934, the Second in February, 1936. Dr. Koussevitzky's admiration for the composer's talent has been no secret; and his zeal on behalf of the progressive American composers has thus been spectacularly manifested by the assignment of Boston premieres to three successive symphonies by one of the American leaders, and by including works by two of these composers on programs in successive weeks.

The merits and implications of Mr. Harris's latest work, which was completed last month, may be considered after tomorrow's performance. For the present we may limit ourselves to such matters as may be gleaned from a conversation with the composer and from a perusal of the score with the composer at one's side.

The Third Symphony is written for large modern orchestra, with much doubling of wind instruments. The percussion is not unusual except for the inclusion of the vibraphone, that instrument of characteristic timbre and sonority. There is neither harp nor piano.

The work is in a single movement, without a break for its duration of about twenty minutes. There are, however, five sections, which the composer has attempted to bridge carefully, one section growing from the other, so that the division may not be apparent to the casual listener. The first section, which the composer describes as tragic in vein, begins with a statement, from the unaccompanied 'cellos, of a long theme. As the 'cellos continue the subject they are joined by other strings, the resulting intervals being fourths and fifths, but no thirds—a procedure to which the composer refers as modern organum. The interval of the third, completing the conventional harmony, is not heard, indeed, until the first violins state their subject, which seemingly grows out of the preceding material. The method of development is similar, the emphasis being always on the long line.

The second section, which the composer calls lyric, employs what he terms disjunct melody. The treatment here is polyphonic, principally by the device of the canon. The instrumentation includes horns and wood winds as well as the strings, which are emphasized in the opening section. The middle section is pastoral. Again there are canons, which, in both parallel and contrary motion, make of the string parts a veritable shimmering network of sound, against which the wood winds later ply their essentially melodic discussion.

The succeeding section is a fugue, dramatic in character. It is subdivided, in turn, into three parts, the second of which employs materials coming out of the canons of the second main portion of the symphony. The end of the fugue is devoted to a rhythmic climax, which leads to the finale of the Symphony—dramatic and tragic. Here the subject-matter of the opening section of the Symphony is used in canons against the climax of the fugue. The ending is strong, but with harmony and instrumentation thinned out as many of the instruments slide off a C-sharp onto a C.

CONDUCTOR STRESSES A POINT

THIRD
SYMPHONY

(Photo by AP)

Roy Harris, Oklahoma-born composer, and Mrs. Harris listen attentively as Serge Koussevitzky (left), conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stresses a point after first performance of Mr. Harris' Third Symphony, which had its premiere here yesterday. Mr. Harris also has the distinction of having had his first two symphonies given their first performances by the Boston orchestra.

Pondering the American Scene

ROY HARRIS

Whose Third Symphony will receive first performances at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Globe

MUSIC

Feb. 25/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of the Third Symphony by the American composer, Roy Harris, at the concert yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program included the suite drawn by Igor Stravinsky from his music to the ballet "The Fire-Bird," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Mr. Harris is a prominent figure among American composers of the day, and he writes with obvious strength and conviction. When his "Symphony; 1933" was introduced here five years ago, the work impressed this writer as definitely individual, the product of one who possessed a considerable though not fully developed talent. Mr. Harris' conviction was very much to the fore in that work, though the means employed in expressing it, that is to say, the material and orchestration, suggested that he had not yet found his own voice.

The new Third Symphony, composed last Autumn, shows Mr. Harris to have advanced in that regard. His idom now is plainly his own It has become even more moderate than that of the Second Symphony, if memory may be relied upon. And he writes more directly and to the point. Mr. Harris has, too, improved his instrumentation. Gone is the thickness attendant upon excessively heavy orchestration, and in its place is found a pleasing clearness of texture.

Instead of supplying an involved discussion of his score, Mr. Harris has contributed to the program book a concise statement which divides the single movement of 20 minutes' duration into five sections, with a hint as to the emotional character that each section represents to the composer.

The finest parts of the score, to this reviewer, are the first and the last. In each Mr. Harris has fashioned music of arresting originality. Surely none but an American could have written those sharply defined themes for brass in the closing pages. Yet lying between are many measures of almost mechanical interplay of instruments, rhythmically unvaried (so it seemed at brief acquaintance), and as a whole the Symphony is neither distinguished nor profound. The term "profound," however, must always be relative in the tonal art, since one page of music may be differently understood according to the temperament of the listener.

The true merit of the Third Symphony perhaps lies in its unflagging vitality, a quality that stands out from first to last.

Mr. Harris was present and bowed from the stage.

For "The Fire-Bird" suite and Beethoven's "Symphony of the Dance," Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were conspicuously in the vein. Their performance of Stravinsky's imaginative work was about as enthralling as could be imagined. It was also a marvel of technical finesse, a reminder—if any had by some unaccountable chance forgotten—that the Boston Symphony continues a wonder of the modern world.

Dr. Koussevitzky took the Symphony at just the right tempo throughout. Especially was this true of the allegretto, where once he was inclined to the slow side. If the latter part of the finale rushed along at a breathless rate, that was not too fast, with the Boston Symphony virtuosi to play it.

C. W. D.

Andover Mass.
Townsman

FEB 16 1939

State Symphony Here Next Week

The State Symphony Orchestra, a Federal Music Project unit which will appear at the Memorial Auditarium on the evening of February 23 to present a concert under the auspices of the Andover Teachers' Association, will create a unique occasion in that it will be one of the largest musical aggregations ever to appear in this locality. This orchestra, conducted by youthful Alexander Thiede, numbers nearly 70 members at full strength, which it will be for the coming event, and requires a spacious stage to accommodate it without overcrowding. Only one other symphony orchestra in Massachusetts is larger than this unit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Andover Teachers' Association expects an audience of music lovers which will tax the capacities of the Auditorium. Advance sale for tickets is reported to be very brisk with all indications pointing to an occasion which will prove to be the highlight of the season in Andover.

SYMPHONY IN HARRIS PREMIERE

First Performance of Composer's Third Major Work

B. Post Feb. 25/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon, for a second time within eight days, Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to this city a symphony by an American composer; this time, the Third of Roy Harris. But whereas the performance of William Schuman's Symphony a week ago was merely the first in Boston, that of Mr. Harris' was what may be termed a world premiere. Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony made the rest of the programme.

WORK IS ORIGINAL

Since these Symphonies of Messrs. Schuman and Harris are each in one movement and since the first-named composer was, for a time, a pupil of the latter, it is a temptation to compare them, even though such comparison is hardly fair. In contrast to the aspiring, experimenting Schuman, Mr. Harris, who has just turned 41, is an old hand at the symphonic game. Although his Symphony runs in a single movement and takes no more than 20 minutes to play, it contains well defined and suitably contrasted sections, as was distinctly not the case with Mr. Schuman's curious venture with the symphonic form. And Mr. Harris' music, whether you like it or dislike it, is recognizably his own.

Someone has suggested that the long-spun, rather vague and wandering melodies to which Mr. Harris is addicted are a reflection of the spaciousness, the absence either of close confines or of sharp definition that one finds in the Western prairies. While this melody, which might better be called "cantilena" or "arioso," is seldom arresting, seizing, or memorable at any one point, its general effect is by no means unagreeable.

An Effective Device

Mr. Harris employs such melody in the first of the five sections of his Symphony, which he himself characterizes as "tragic," "lyric" and "pastoral," respectively. A rather obvious device, perhaps, but the composer's trick of presenting his cantilena at the outset, first without accompaniment, then with "organum"-like fourths and fifths and, finally, with the hitherto missing thirds (a sort of synthesis of music's early history) is undeniably effective.

There is, as it happens, no very pronounced suggestion of tragedy in the first division or of drama in the Fugue, which Mr. Harris describes as "dramatic," and there is nothing particularly "dramatic" or "tragic" about the final section. It would really be better if composers never tried to analyze their own music; they almost always make a mess of it. Mr. Harris' Fugue does, however, have that vigor and energy which is one of the hall-marks of his style; though a sharp resemblance in the subject of the Fugue to the "Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms" in Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" takes a little of the kick out of what would otherwise be the most salient detail in the whole work.

Composer on Stage

Plainly Dr. Koussevitzky, who also brought the other Harris symphonies to their first performances, has faith in this one and yesterday he conducted it con amore. Moreover, when Mr. Harris was brought and returned to the stage by an applauding audience his expression was that of one well pleased with the proceedings.

The once bright plumage of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" is perceptibly fading. Nevertheless, one can still remark on its boldness and independence, as of the year 1910. And if the 27-year-old Stravinsky was influenced, as everyone says, by Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakov, the "Fire-Bird" music sounds little enough like that of either the Frenchman or the elder Russian. Yesterday's performance, as was to be expected, was a brilliant one.

177

B. Trans. MUSIC Feb. 23 1939

Foreword to New Symphony By a Seasoned American

By Moses Smith

Fresh from an essay with a young American composer, William Schuman, whose Symphony last week disturbed many and engrossed a few at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky turns his attention, for the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, to the new Third Symphony of a seasoned hand, Roy Harris, who, as it happens, has been teacher of Schuman.

Mr. Harris's Symphony, which will be followed on the program by Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (the last-named in place of the same composer's "Pastoral," originally announced), will be receiving first performances on these occasions. The Boston Symphony concerts have also been the scene for first performances of Mr. Harris's earlier symphonies—the First in January, 1934, the Second in February, 1936. Dr. Koussevitzky's admiration for the composer's talent has been no secret; and his zeal on behalf of the progressive American composers has thus been spectacularly manifested by the assignment of Boston premieres to three successive symphonies by one of the American leaders, and by including works by two of these composers on programs in successive weeks.

The merits and implications of Mr. Harris's latest work, which was completed last month, may be considered after tomorrow's performance. For the present we may limit ourselves to such matters as may be gleaned from a conversation with the composer and from a perusal of the score with the composer at one's side.

The Third Symphony is written for large modern orchestra, with much doubling of wind instruments. The percussion is not unusual except for the inclusion of the vibraphone, that instrument of characteristic timbre and sonority. There is neither harp nor piano.

The work is in a single movement, without a break for its duration of about twenty minutes. There are, however, five sections, which the composer has attempted to bridge carefully, one section growing from the other, so that the division may not be apparent to the casual listener. The first section, which the composer describes as tragic in vein, begins with a statement, from the unaccompanied 'cellos, of a long theme. As the 'cellos continue the subject they are joined by other strings, the resulting intervals being fourths and fifths, but no thirds—a procedure to which the composer refers as modern organum. The interval of the third, completing the conventional harmony, is not heard, indeed, until the first violins state their subject, which seemingly grows out of the preceding material. The method of development is similar, the emphasis being always on the long line.

The second section, which the composer calls lyric, employs what he terms disjunct melody. The treatment here is polyphonic, principally by the device of the canon. The instrumentation includes horns and wood winds as well as the strings, which are emphasized in the opening section. The middle section is pastoral. Again there are canons, which, in both parallel and contrary motion, make of the string parts a veritable shimmering network of sound, against which the wood winds later ply their essentially melodic discussion.

The succeeding section is a fugue, dramatic in character. It is subdivided, in turn, into three parts, the second of which employs materials coming out of the canons of the second main portion of the symphony. The end of the fugue is devoted to a rhythmic climax, which leads to the finale of the Symphony—dramatic and tragic. Here the subject-matter of the opening section of the Symphony is used in canons against the climax of the fugue. The ending is strong, but with harmony and instrumentation thinned out as many of the instruments slide off a C-sharp onto a C.

CONDUCTOR STRESSES A POINT

(Photo by AP)

Roy Harris, Oklahoma-born composer, and Mrs. Harris listen attentively as Serge Koussevitzky (left), conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stresses a point after first performance of Mr. Harris' Third Symphony, which had its premiere here yesterday. Mr. Harris also has the distinction of having had his first two symphonies given their first performances by the Boston orchestra.

Pondering the American Scene

ROY HARRIS

Whose Third Symphony will receive first performances at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Globe MUSIC Feb. 25/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of the Third Symphony by the American composer, Roy Harris, at the concert yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program included the suite drawn by Igor Stravinsky from his music to the ballet "The Fire-Bird," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Mr. Harris is a prominent figure among American composers of the day, and he writes with obvious strength and conviction. When his "Symphony; 1933" was introduced here five years ago, the work impressed this writer as definitely individual, the product of one who possessed a considerable though not fully developed talent. Mr. Harris' conviction was very much to the fore in that work, though the means employed in expressing it, that is to say, the material and orchestration, suggested that he had not yet found his own voice.

The new Third Symphony, composed last Autumn, shows Mr. Harris to have advanced in that regard. His idom now is plainly his own It has become even more moderate than that of the Second Symphony, if memory may be relied upon. And he writes more directly and to the point. Mr. Harris has, too, improved his instrumentation. Gone is the thickness attendant upon excessively heavy orchestration, and in its place is found a pleasing clearness of texture.

Instead of supplying an involved discussion of his score, Mr. Harris has contributed to the program book a concise statement which divides the single movement of 20 minutes' duration into five sections, with a hint as to the emotional character that each section represents to the composer.

The finest parts of the score, to this reviewer, are the first and the last. In each Mr. Harris has fashioned music of arresting originality. Surely none but an American could have written those sharply defined themes for brass in the closing pages. Yet lying between are many measures of almost mechanical interplay of instruments, rhythmically unvaried (so it seemed at brief acquaintance), and as a whole the Symphony is neither distinguished nor profound. The term "profound," however, must always be relative in the tonal art, since one page of music may be differently understood according to the temperament of the listener.

The true merit of the Third Symphony perhaps lies in its unflagging vitality, a quality that stands out from first to last.

Mr. Harris was present and bowed from the stage.

For "The Fire-Bird" suite and Beethoven's "Symphony of the Dance," Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were conspicuously in the vein. Their performance of Stravinsky's imaginative work was about as enthralling as could be imagined. It was also a marvel of technical finesse, a reminder—if any had by some unaccountable chance forgotten—that the Boston Symphony continues a wonder of the modern world.

Dr. Koussevitzky took the Symphony at just the right tempo throughout. Especially was this true of the allegretto, where once he was inclined to the slow side. If the latter part of the finale rushed along at a breathless rate, that was not too fast, with the Boston Symphony virtuosi to play it.

C. W. D.

Andover Mass. -Townsman

FEB 16 1939

State Symphony Here Next Week

The State Symphony Orchestra, a Federal Music Project unit which will appear at the Memorial Auditarium on the evening of February 23 to present a concert under the auspices of the Andover Teachers' Association, will create a unique occasion in that it will be one of the largest musical aggregations ever to appear in this locality. This orchestra, conducted by youthful Alexander Thiede, numbers nearly 70 members at full strength, which it will be for the coming event, and requires a spacious stage to accommodate it without overcrowding. Only one other symphony orchestra in Massachusetts is larger than this unit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Andover Teachers' Association expects an audience of music lovers which will tax the capacities of the Auditorium. Advance sale for tickets is reported to be very brisk with all indications pointing to an occasion which will prove to be the highlight of the season in Andover.

SYMPHONY IN HARRIS PREMIERE

First Performance of Composer's Third Major Work

B. Post Feb. 25/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon, for a second time within eight days, Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to this city a symphony by an American composer; this time, the Third of Roy Harris. But whereas the performance of William Schuman's Symphony a week ago was merely the first in Boston, that of Mr. Harris' was what may be termed a world premiere. Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony made the rest of the programme.

WORK IS ORIGINAL

Since these Symphonies of Messrs. Schuman and Harris are each in one movement and since the first-named composer was, for a time, a pupil of the latter, it is a temptation to compare them, even though such comparison is hardly fair. In contrast to the aspiring, experimenting Schuman, Mr. Harris, who has just turned 41, is an old hand at the symphonic game. Although his Symphony runs in a single movement and takes no more than 20 minutes to play, it contains well defined and suitably contrasted sections, as was distinctly not the case with Mr. Schuman's curious venture with the symphonic form. And Mr. Harris' music, whether you like it or dislike it, is recognizably his own.

Someone has suggested that the long-spun, rather vague and wandering melodies to which Mr. Harris is addicted are a reflection of the spaciousness, the absence either of close confines or of sharp definition that one finds in the Western prairies. While this melody, which might better be called "cantilena" or "arioso," is seldom arresting, seizing, or memorable at any one point, its general effect is by no means unagreeable.

An Effective Device

Mr. Harris employs such melody in the first of the five sections of his Symphony, which he himself characterizes as "tragic," "lyric" and "pastoral," respectively. A rather obvious device, perhaps, but the composer's trick of presenting his cantilena at the outset, first without accompaniment, then with "organum"-like fourths and fifths and, finally, with the hitherto missing thirds (a sort of synthesis of music's early history) is undeniably effective.

There is, as it happens, no very pronounced suggestion of tragedy in the first division or of drama in the Fugue, which Mr. Harris describes as "dramatic," and there is nothing particularly "dramatic" or "tragic" about the final section. It would really be better if composers never tried to analyse their own music; they almost always make a mess of it. Mr. Harris' Fugue does, however, have that vigor and energy which is one of the hall-marks of his style; though a sharp resemblance in the subject of the Fugue to the "Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms" in Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" takes a little of the kick out of what would otherwise be the most salient detail in the whole work.

Composer on Stage

Plainly Dr. Koussevitzky, who also brought the other Harris symphonies to their first performances, has faith in this one and yesterday he conducted it con amore. Moreover, when Mr. Harris was brought and returned to the stage by an applauding audience his expression was that of one well pleased with the proceedings.

The once bright plumage of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" is perceptibly fading. Nevertheless, one can still remark on its boldness and independence, as of the year 1910. And if the 27-year-old Stravinsky was influenced, as everyone says, by Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakov, the "Fire-Bird" music sounds little enough like that of either the Frenchman or the elder Russian. Yesterday's performance, as was to be expected, was a brilliant one.

18

LITCHFIELD, CONN.
WEEKLY ENQUIRER

FEB 2 - 1939

NOTES OF MUSIC

by Ralph M. Fremont

Mr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony came back to New York, ~~and again~~ demonstrated that this orchestra, which concededly plays to the cream of New York's musical population, deserves its audience. Their program was one to provoke discussion and differences of opinion on the worth of the piece de resistance, but there can be no adverse comment on the way they presented it.

There is no doubt that interest centered in Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Dances", which were presented for the first time in this city. It is a work in four movements, three of which are internally divided, although without changes in tempo designation except in the first; naturally there is no key indicated, since the composer is the leader of the atonal or polytonal school. The work was originally planned for Leonid Massine, who, however, preferred to use the "Nobilissima Visione"; it was then completed, late in August of 1937, in its present form. Its first performance in America was under Frederick Stock, in Chicago, last March.

The composition is uneven. It contains passages of brilliant polyphonic writing, of ultra-modern tonality and harmony, of extremely interesting rhythmic character. It also suffers from parts that are conventional to the point of being oddly reminiscent of many great ones who have gone before, notably Richard Strauss, and from excessive length and verbosity. Perhaps it is not fair to judge this work on one hearing, or by completely symphonic standards, since it is frankly intended as a choreographic base and very clearly indicates this characteristic; in fact one can readily visualize a Martha Wigman a Maya Lex or a Hanya Holm, or perhaps many others in the modern dance school, building very beautifully and expressively around much of the music. Since it is offered as a symphonic composition, however, it must, as such, bear the searchlight of this exalted grouping, and it must then be admitted that there is much that could have been said with far less elaborate repetition and far more effect. The orchestra gave the work more than justice; we fear that in lesser hands our first impression might have been much less pleasant. There is no doubt that Mr. Hindemith has something to say, and says it effectively for the most part.

We were jumped two hundred and fifty years between the Vivaldi Concerto Grosso in D Minor, with which the program opened, and the modern work. Perhaps the contrast was a little violent; yet nothing in the exquisitely played Concerto, in which Siloti's edition was used, was the least bit dimmed by the fury which followed it. The men of the orchestra played this work with a consummate perfection of technique and understanding that was a real joy.

The program closed with Brahms' Fourth Symphony. If it were possible to choose among the great symphonies as played by great bands, under inspired leaders, we might easily be tempted to choose this one. If it were possible to say that any one work was the apotheosis of Brahms' colossal genius, this might readily be the one. Its glorious opening, leading so perfectly into the broodingly beautiful Andante, which has been described as "an assuaging spirit hovering over calm waters"; its brilliant Scherzo and culminating, exalted Finale make up a rounded, completed whole. It is music such as this that testifies to the immortality and inextinguishable greatness of the human spirit, that revives one's flagging faith in the ultimate redemption of the insect called Man who, by this means, can reach almost to God.

GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE

FEB 17 1939

The World of Music

New York, Feb. 17.—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitzky impersonating Mozart, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the lions' den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

ERIE, PA.
TIMES

FEB 18 1939

Notes Gleaned From World Of Music

CONCERT Extraordinaire, a famous scene from the history of music was re-enacted last week on the stage of Carnegie Hall. The curtains parted to reveal an orchestra dressed in the wigs and lace-trimmed costumes of eighteenth century Austria, reading their scores by candlelight. The music was Joseph Hayden's "Farewell Symphony" and the conductor, dressed as the composer of Prince Esterhazy's court, was Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In Hayden's original performance of the work of Esterhazy, 176 years ago, the musicians, during the finale, blew out their candles one by one and tiptoed out of the room. It was a sort of "walk-out strike," by which Hayden and his men indicated their desire for a vacation . . . and, the story goes, they got one.

In last week's re-enactment the musicians also left the stage, one by one, but they returned, in modern dress, to finish out a varied program that included Viennese Waltzes and a modern symphonic work.

SOUTH HAVEN, MICH
TRIBUNE

FEB 17 1939

Music World

New York, (UP) — The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitzky impersonating Mozart, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each players stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backstop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the Lion's Den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

FEB 17 1939

RIVERSIDE, CAL.
PRESS

FEB 22 1939

WITH A HEIGH-DI HAYDN, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the Composer Haydn manner, preparatory to a concert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky will impersonate Haydn—to whom he is said to bear a resemblance—and orchestra members will appear in 18th century finery.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

FEB 17 1939

Famous Pianist Finds 'War Jitters' Are Cramping Composers' Music

BOSTON, Feb. 16—(AP) Myra Hess, famous English pianist, today predicted the output of creative musicians of this era would "suffer" because of Europe's "perennial war scares."

Here to play four concertos in five days with the Boston Symphony, Miss Hess said in an interview "Americans are unable to grasp that terrible feeling of approaching conflict as we in England, living near the sources of trouble, do."

"While Britain's re-arming may prevent war, nevertheless, the tension is too high for creative artists to do their best."

Music, she added, was proving a great emotional stabilizer in Europe.

"I was playing a concert in London during the Munich conferences last September," she said, "when the speech of Prime Minister Chamberlain was broadcast directly into the music hall. The audience was keyed up to an amazing pitch. Then came the music of Mozart's concerto, and the atmosphere changed in a trice. People forget their troubles in the glories of music."

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 17 1939

WORK OF MODERN COMPOSERS SUFFERS IN CURRENT WAR SCARE SAYS PIANIST

BOSTON, Feb. 16-AP-Myra Hess, famous English pianist, today predicted the output of creative musicians of this era would "suffer" because of Europe's "perennial war scares."

Here to play four concertos in five days with the Boston Symphony, Miss Hess said in an interview "Americans are unable to grasp that terrible feeling of approaching conflict as we in England, living near the sources of trouble, do."

"While Britain's re-arming may prevent war, nevertheless, the tension is too high for creative artists to do their best."

Music, she added, was proving a great emotional stabilizer in Europe.

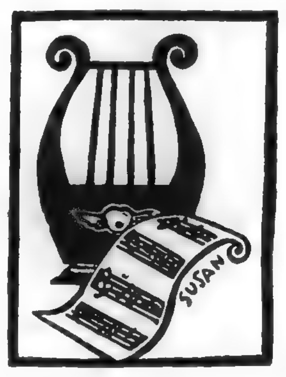
"I was playing a concert in London during the Munich conferences last September," she said, "when the speech of Prime Minister Chamberlain was broadcast directly into the music hall. The audience was keyed up to an amazing pitch. Then came the music of Mozart's concerto, and the atmosphere changed in a trice. People forget their troubles in the glories of music."

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 18 1939

MUSICAL EVENTS

Wigs, Women, and Wagner



JUST to indicate what has happened to concert audiences in the fourteen years since The New Yorker started getting around to musical events, I might note that last week no one was perturbed by the appearance of the Boston Symphony in white wigs and eighteenth-century livery, or by the presence of a woman as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony. In 1925, a good many people would have been disturbed by such goings-on.

The Boston Symphony's "Concert Extraordinaire" to aid the orchestra's pension fund might have seemed pretty radical business to some of the 1925 customers. They might have demurred at the sight of Carnegie Hall attendants, including taxi callers, rigged out in wigs and period costumes, at the use of scenery for Haydn's "Farewell" symphony and Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz" (and at the word "jazz" on the program), and at the vision of Serge Koussevitzky made up as Papa Haydn. For this season's consumers, however, the evening was a good show, smoothly produced, with all of the Boston Symphony's musical assets intact.

On a candle-lit stage, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting in front of a spinet, the orchestra played Haydn in its best Haydnesque manner. A change of scenery and costumes then brought forward a small unit to serve as a jazz band, directed by the concertmaster, Richard Burgin, for "The Daniel Jazz." Burgin's Bostonians, assisted valiantly by Colin O'More, who battled triumphantly with the difficult vocal music, revealed the amusing qualities of Mr. Gruenberg's score.

Without scenic complements, in conventional evening clothes, and with Serge Koussevitzky as Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra then introduced the season's most attractive and successful novelty—Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf." This is a musical fairy tale for children (they'll enjoy it, all right) and it's also a neat parody on pretentious programmatic music. It was played magnificently—these four words seem to be standard for almost anything that Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra offer—and Richard Hale, the narrator, who explained the music and intoned the scenario, was the life of the party. This time, "life of the party" is meant entirely in a favorable sense. Waltzes by Strauss, Sibelius, and Ravel topped off the session.

The two regularly scheduled subscription concerts of the orchestra, if not so newsy, were equally impressive as demonstrations of the standard that Mr. Koussevitzky sets.

CANTON, ILL.
LEDGER

FEB 18 1939

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

New York, Feb. 18—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitsky impersonating Mozart, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the Lions' Den. Then played "The Laniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

FEB 18 1939

By LOUIS F. KEEMLE

NEW YORK, Feb. 18 (U.P.) — The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appear-

---

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 18 1939

..Music and Other Notes..

Never before have we wished for the moon and had such immediate prospects of its falling in our lap. This delightful situation comes about from having wished very hard about a Fairy Tale. Once upon a time we heard a Pension Fund Concert in Boston (Feb. 1 to be exact) when halfway through the program was played "Peter and the Wolf" which is "An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children" with music by Prokofieff (Op. 67) and interpretation by Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Richard Hale, narrator. This proved to be an absolutely unique experience and ever since, we have been hoping to be able to repeat the thrill before leaving this earth although it never once occurred to us that our wish could be fulfilled. In talking about music, which is one of our favorite pastimes, we have discovered in and about Providence, one housewife, one banker, one newspaper man and one professional musician who have been wishing just as hard as we have been, that "Peter and the Wolf" may be heard in Providence. To the great delight of all concerned, it is going to happen on Feb. 2 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Metropolitan Theatre for its fourth Providence concert.

"Peter" is a real person to us. We even know what he looks like and we have incorporated his theme in our "reserve for depreciation." It is the most carefree, purposeful tune we know. It goes about with perfect confidence and much charm, accomplishing the wonders which can be accomplished in fairy tales and we shall keep it, we hope, as a defense against bad news. The themes for grandfather, the duck, the cat, the bird and the hunters are all equally good in their way and to hear them threaded through the score—there is really nothing to do about it really except to go and meet these delightful visitors. We fully expect "Peter" to bring out the S. R. O. sign. The line forms at the right.

We have neglected to mention that also on this program will be played the first movement of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symbhony, Op. 58, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Op. 67. These we shall discuss next Saturday.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

FEB 18 1939

Myra Hess for Soloist at Commuters' Matinee

There will have been four appearances of Myra Hess, admirable English pianist, with the orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, during the five days from Friday through Tuesday next. Out-of-towners will be chiefly interested in the Tuesday afternoon concert, one of six monthly called "the commuters' matinees," which for their convenience are scheduled at 3 p. m.

The Tuesday program repeats the supplementary Monday night's program and includes Mozart's Symphony in A major (K-201), Schumann's piano concerto (with Miss Hess), Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" (Richard Hale, narrator) and Ravel's "La Valse."

Two of these numbers were heard in the recent Pension Fund concert in Boston repeated last week in New York on one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's frequent visits.

We personally have a long-standing admiration for Richard Hale, actor and baritone, whose two abilities fuse so well into the role of narrator—a performance of comic seriousness, perfectly dictioned and precisely measured; thoroughly cognizant in timing of the music, which illustrates by various instruments (Peter's jaunty air in string quartet; the bird, Mr. Laurent's flute; the horns for the wolf and so on to infinite delight). Mr. Hale was engaged by the Boston Symphony when Prokofieff himself conducted the first American performance, March 25, 1938, in Symphony Hall.

The other number from the waltz half of the Pension Fund program will be Ravel's "La Valse."

WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

FEB 18 1939

The Berkshire Symphonic festival announces that the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last Nov. 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2,000 for each of the six concerts.

* * *

A performance of Walter Damrosch's operatic version of Rostand's "Cyrano de Bergerac" is in prospect during the New York World's fair. It was written 25 years ago but was dropped after five performances by the Metropolitan. It has now been completely rewritten by the composer, who recently observed his 77th birthday.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 18 1939

ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS USED IN CONCERT

Boston Artists Appear At Junior College

The "Soicety of Ancient Instruments", composed of five members of the Boston Symphony orchestra organized for the purpose of reviving musical works of the past and performing them on instruments for which they were written, presented a concert at Bradford Junior College last evening. Friends and alumnae of the college joined the student body as guests of the faculty.

The members of the society are Paul Fedororsky, high descant; Albert Bernard, treble; Alfred Zighera, bass viol; Gaston Dufresne violone, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord.

Playing the works of the old masters of the 16th and 17th centuries as a consort of viols the artists presented a program on ancient instruments that were as pleasing to the ear as modern instruments, especially the harpsichord, an instrument similar in tonal effect to the piano.

A group of 16th century dance melodies, known as "Gervaise Danceries" for the harpsichord and four viols, was presented. The works of Coperarir, Gastoldi and Tomkins, composers of the 16th century, Schmierer of the 17th century, and Pameau and Couperin of the 18th century, including the Donata by Bach, for the harpsichord and viola da gamba, were played.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB 19 1939

THE WAX LIBRARY:

Serge Koussevitzky Restores Full-Throated Haydn Opus

A few days ago Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony indulged in a charming masquerade for the sake of Haydn's Farewell Symphony. The orchestra and conductor were dressed in Eighteenth Century breeches and periwigs. A flickering candle illuminated each music stand. Koussevitzky conducted at a period spinet from the Casadesus collection. After the performance the players snuffed their candles and the stage was enfolded by darkness.

PAPA HAYDN.—Serge Koussevitzky in his Haydn makeup.

Another Haydn item for the Bostonians is a three-pocket Victor album of the Symphony in B Flat Major, usually listed as No. 102 of Haydn's 104. It dates from 1794-95 and is, therefore, a product of the second London period.

For the Boston Symphony the work has a sentimental value as George Henschel gave it in 1881 on the program that inaugurated the orchestra's existence. Since then it has suffered entirely undeserved neglect.

The B Flat Major is positively Beethovenesque in its range, dramatic richness and seriousness. And for this, there may have been a reason. Haydn and Beethoven had begun an association in Vienna. The elderly master, creator of a hundred delicate, casual and merely pretty symphonies, may have learned something from the younger man who was already extending music's scope beyond all known frontiers.

In addition to the inspired and ever-ingratiating invention, the Haydn B Flat Major achieves climaxes as hearty and as firm as anything you might find in Beethoven. Startling, daring and craftsmanlike modulations enrich the effects; rhythms grow exciting and bold. Polyphony runs to elaborate fugues, a vigorous three-part canon.

The last movement, according to Tovey, contains a coda which "does everything that even a coda of a Haydn finale can think of, beginning with the great bassoon joke and continuing with Haydn's characteristic insinuation that everybody in the orchestra has the theme on the top of his tongue but cannot pronounce it."

The playing, of course, is superb and Koussevitzky undoubtedly underlines the arresting modernity of the score.

Bruno Walter Overtures.

Two more Bruno Walter records are to be found in Victor's February list, both worth owning. One is Beethoven's masterly Coriolanus Overture, on two sides, which has never been bettered in the literature of theatrical classics. The first and second suites of the ballet music from Schubert's Rosamunde score are contained on the two sides of another disk. The music is familiar and deserves to be. The melodic flow is consistently wonderful and unforced. Again we are impressed by Schubert's symphonic proficiency.

The London Symphony sounds well and Bruno Walter's conducting, as always, is aptly styled and ever propulsive.

—JOHN ROSENFIELD.

OSHKOSH, WIS.
NORTHWESTERN

FEB 18 1939

(By Louis F. Keemle)

New York— (U.P.) —The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky appeared at Carnegie

---

CLEVELAND, TENN.
BANNER

FEB 18 1939

The World Of Music

NEW YORK, Feb. 18.—(U.P.)— The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevit-

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 18 1939

MUSICAL EVENTS

Wigs, Women, and Wagner

JUST to indicate what has happened to concert audiences in the fourteen years since The New Yorker started getting around to musical events, I might note that last week no one was perturbed by the appearance of the Boston Symphony in white wigs and eighteenth-century livery, or by the presence of a woman as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony. In 1925, a good many people would have been disturbed by such goings-on.

The Boston Symphony's "Concert Extraordinaire" to aid the orchestra's pension fund might have seemed pretty radical business to some of the 1925 customers. They might have demurred at the sight of Carnegie Hall attendants, including taxi callers, rigged out in wigs and period costumes, at the use of scenery for Haydn's "Farewell" symphony and Gruenberg's "The Daniel Jazz" (and at the word "jazz" on the program), and at the vision of Serge Koussevitzky made up as Papa Haydn. For this season's consumers, however, the evening was a good show, smoothly produced, with all of the Boston Symphony's musical assets intact.

On a candle-lit stage, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting in front of a spinet, the orchestra played Haydn in its best Haydnesque manner. A change of scenery and costumes then brought forward a small unit to serve as a jazz band, directed by the concertmaster, Richard Burgin, for "The Daniel Jazz." Burgin's Bostonians, assisted valiantly by Colin O'More, who battled triumphantly with the difficult vocal music, revealed the amusing qualities of Mr. Gruenberg's score.

Without scenic complements, in conventional evening clothes, and with Serge Koussevitzky as Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra then introduced the season's most attractive and successful novelty—Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf." This is a musical fairy tale for children (they'll enjoy it, all right) and it's also a neat parody on pretentious programmatic music. It was played magnificently—these four words seem to be standard for almost anything that Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra offer—and Richard Hale, the narrator, who explained the music and intoned the scenario, was the life of the party. This time, "life of the party" is meant entirely in a favorable sense. Waltzes by Strauss, Sibelius, and Ravel topped off the session.

The two regularly scheduled subscription concerts of the orchestra, if not so newsy, were equally impressive as demonstrations of the standard that Mr. Koussevitzky sets.

1.5 X

OSHKOSH, WIS.
NORTHWESTERN

FEB 18 1939

(By Louis F. Keemle)

New York— (U.P.) —The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky appeared at Carnegie

---

CANTON, ILL.
LEDGER

FEB 18 1939

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

New York, Feb. 18—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitsky impersonating Mozart, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the Lions' Den. Then played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 18 1939

ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS USED IN CONCERT

Boston Artists Appear At Junior College

The "Soicety of Ancient Instruments", composed of five members of the Boston Symphony orchestra organized for the purpose of reviving musical works of the past and performing them on instruments for which they were written, presented a concert at Bradford Junior College last evening. Friends and alumnae of the college joined the student body as guests of the faculty.

The members of the society are Paul Fedororsky, high descant; Albert Bernard, treble; Alfred Zighera, bass viol; Gaston Dufresne violone, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord.

Playing the works of the old masters of the 16th and 17th centuries as a consort of viols the artists presented a program on ancient instruments that were as pleasing to the ear as modern instruments, especially the harpsichord, an instrument similar in tonal effect to the piano.

A group of 16th century dance melodies, known as "Gervaise Danceries" for the harpsichord and four viols, was presented. The works of Coperarir, Gastoldi and Tomkins, composers of the 16th century, Schmierer of the 17th century, and Pameau and Couperin of the 18th century, including the Donata by Bach, for the harpsichord and viola da gamba, were played.

CLEVELAND, TENN.
BANNER

FEB 18 1939

he World Of Music

NEW YORK, Feb. 18.—(U.P.)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevit-

---

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

FEB 18 1939

By LOUIS F. KEEMLE

NEW YORK, Feb. 18 (U.P.) —The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appear-

---

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 18 1939

..Music and Other Notes..

Never before have we wished for the moon and had such immediate prospects of its falling in our lap. This delightful situation comes about from having wished very hard about a Fairy Tale. Once upon a time we heard a Pension Fund Concert in Boston (Feb. 1 to be exact) when halfway through the program was played "Peter and the Wolf" which is "An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children" with music by Prokofieff (Op. 67) and interpretation by Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Richard Hale, narrator. This proved to be an absolutely unique experience and ever since, we have been hoping to be able to repeat the thrill before leaving this earth although it never once occurred to us that our wish could be fulfilled. In talking about music, which is one of our favorite pastimes, we have discovered in and about Providence, one housewife, one banker, one newspaper man and one professional musician who have been wishing just as hard as we have been, that "Peter and the Wolf" may be heard in Providence. To the great delight of all concerned, it is going to happen on Feb. 2 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Metropolitan Theatre for its fourth Providence concert.

"Peter" is a real person to us. We even know what he looks like and we have incorporated his theme in our "reserve for depreciation." It is the most carefree purposeful tune we know. It goes about with perfect confidence and much charm, accomplishing the wonders which can be accomplished in fairy tales and we shall keep it, we hope, as a defense against bad news. The themes for grandfather, the duck, the cat, the bird and the hunters are all equally good in their way and to hear them threaded through the score—there is really nothing to do about it really except to go and meet these delightful visitors. We fully expect "Peter" to bring out the S. R. O. sign. The line forms at the right.

We have neglected to mention that also on this program will be played the first movement of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony, Op. 58, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Op. 67. These we shall discuss next Saturday.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

FEB 18 1939

Myra Hess for Soloist at Commuters' Matinee

There will have been four appearances of Myra Hess, admirable English pianist, with the orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, during the five days from Friday through Tuesday next. Out-of-towners will be chiefly interested in the Tuesday afternoon concert, one of six monthly called "the commuters' matinees," which, for their convenience are scheduled at 3 p. m.

The Tuesday program repeats the supplementary Monday night's program and includes Mozart's Symphony in A major (K-201), Schumann's piano concerto (with Miss Hess), Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" (Richard Hale, narrator) and Ravel's "La Valse."

Two of these numbers were heard in the recent Pension Fund concert in Boston repeated last week in New York on one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's frequent visits.

We personally have a long-standing admiration for Richard Hale, actor and baritone, whose two abilities fuse so well into the role of narrator—a performance of comic seriousness, perfectly dictioned and precisely measured; thoroughly cognizant in timing of the music, which illustrates by various instruments (Peter's jaunty air in string quartet; the bird, Mr. Laurent's flute; the horns for the wolf and so on to infinite delight). Mr. Hale was engaged by the Boston Symphony when Prokofieff himself conducted the first American performance, March 25, 1938, in Symphony Hall.

The other number from the waltz half of the Pension Fund program will be Ravel's "La Valse."

WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

FEB 18 1939

181

The Berkshire Symphonic festival announces that the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between Aug. 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last Nov. 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2,000 for each of the six concerts.

* * *

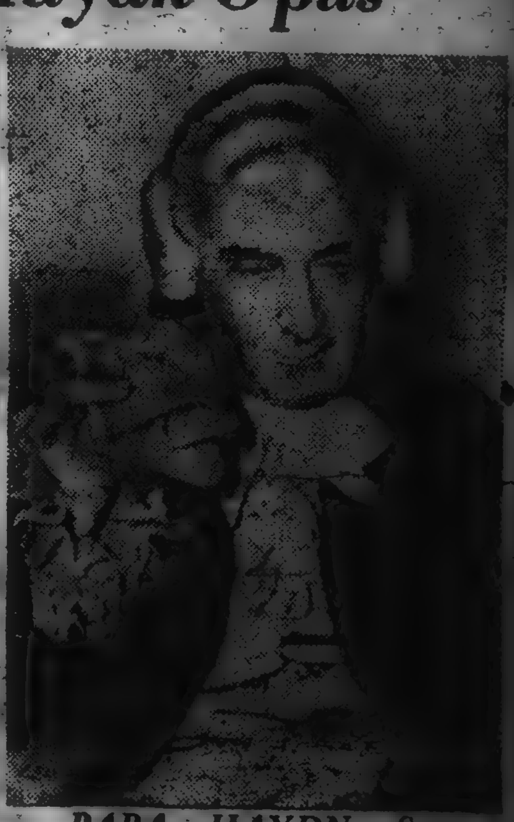
A performance of Walter Damrosch's operatic version of Rostand's "Cyrano de Bergerac" is in prospect during the New York World's fair. It was written 25 years ago but was dropped after five performances by the Metropolitan. It has now been completely rewritten by the composer, who recently observed his 77th birthday.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB 19 1939

THE WAX LIBRARY:

Serge Koussevitzky Restores Full-Throated Haydn Opus



PAPA HAYDN.—Serge Koussevitzky in his Haydn makeup.

A few days ago Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony indulged in a charming masquerade for the sake of Haydn's Farewell Symphony. The orchestra and conductor were dressed in Eighteenth Century breeches and periwigs. A flickering candle illuminated each music stand. Koussevitzky conducted at a period spinet from the Casadesus collection. After the performance the players snuffed their candles and the stage was enfolded by darkness.

Another Haydn item for the Bostonians is a three-pocket Victor album of the Symphony in B Flat Major, usually listed as No. 102 of Haydn's 104. It dates from 1794-95 and is, therefore, a product of the second London period.

For the Boston Symphony the work has a sentimental value as George Henschel gave it in 1881 on the program that inaugurated the orchestra's existence. Since then it has suffered entirely undeserved neglect.

The B Flat Major is positively Beethovenesque in its range, dramatic richness and seriousness. And for this, there may have been a reason. Haydn and Beethoven had begun an association in Vienna. The elderly master, creator of a hundred delicate, casual and merely pretty symphonies, may have learned something from the younger man who was already extending music's scope beyond all known frontiers.

In addition to the inspired and ever-ingratiating invention, the Haydn B Flat Major achieves climaxes as hearty and as firm as anything you might find in Beethoven. Startling daring and craftsmanlike modulations enrich the effects; rhythms grow exciting and bold. Polyphony runs to elaborate fugues, a vigorous three-part canon.

The last movement, according to Tovey, contains a coda which "does everything that even a coda of a Haydn finale can think of, beginning with the great bassoon joke and continuing with Haydn's characteristic insinuation that everybody in the orchestra has the theme on the top of his tongue but cannot pronounce it."

The playing, of course, is superb and Koussevitzky undoubtedly underlines the arresting modernity of the score.

Bruno Walter Overtures.

Two more Bruno Walter records are to be found in Victor's February list, both worth owning. One is Beethoven's masterly Coriolanus Overture, on two sides, which has never been bettered in the literature of theatrical classics. The first and second suites of the ballet music from Schubert's Rosamunde score are contained on the two sides of another disk. The music is familiar and deserves to be. The melodic flow is consistently wonderful and unforced. Again we are impressed by Schubert's symphonic proficiency.

The London Symphony sounds well and Bruno Walter's conducting, as always, is aptly styled and ever propulsive.

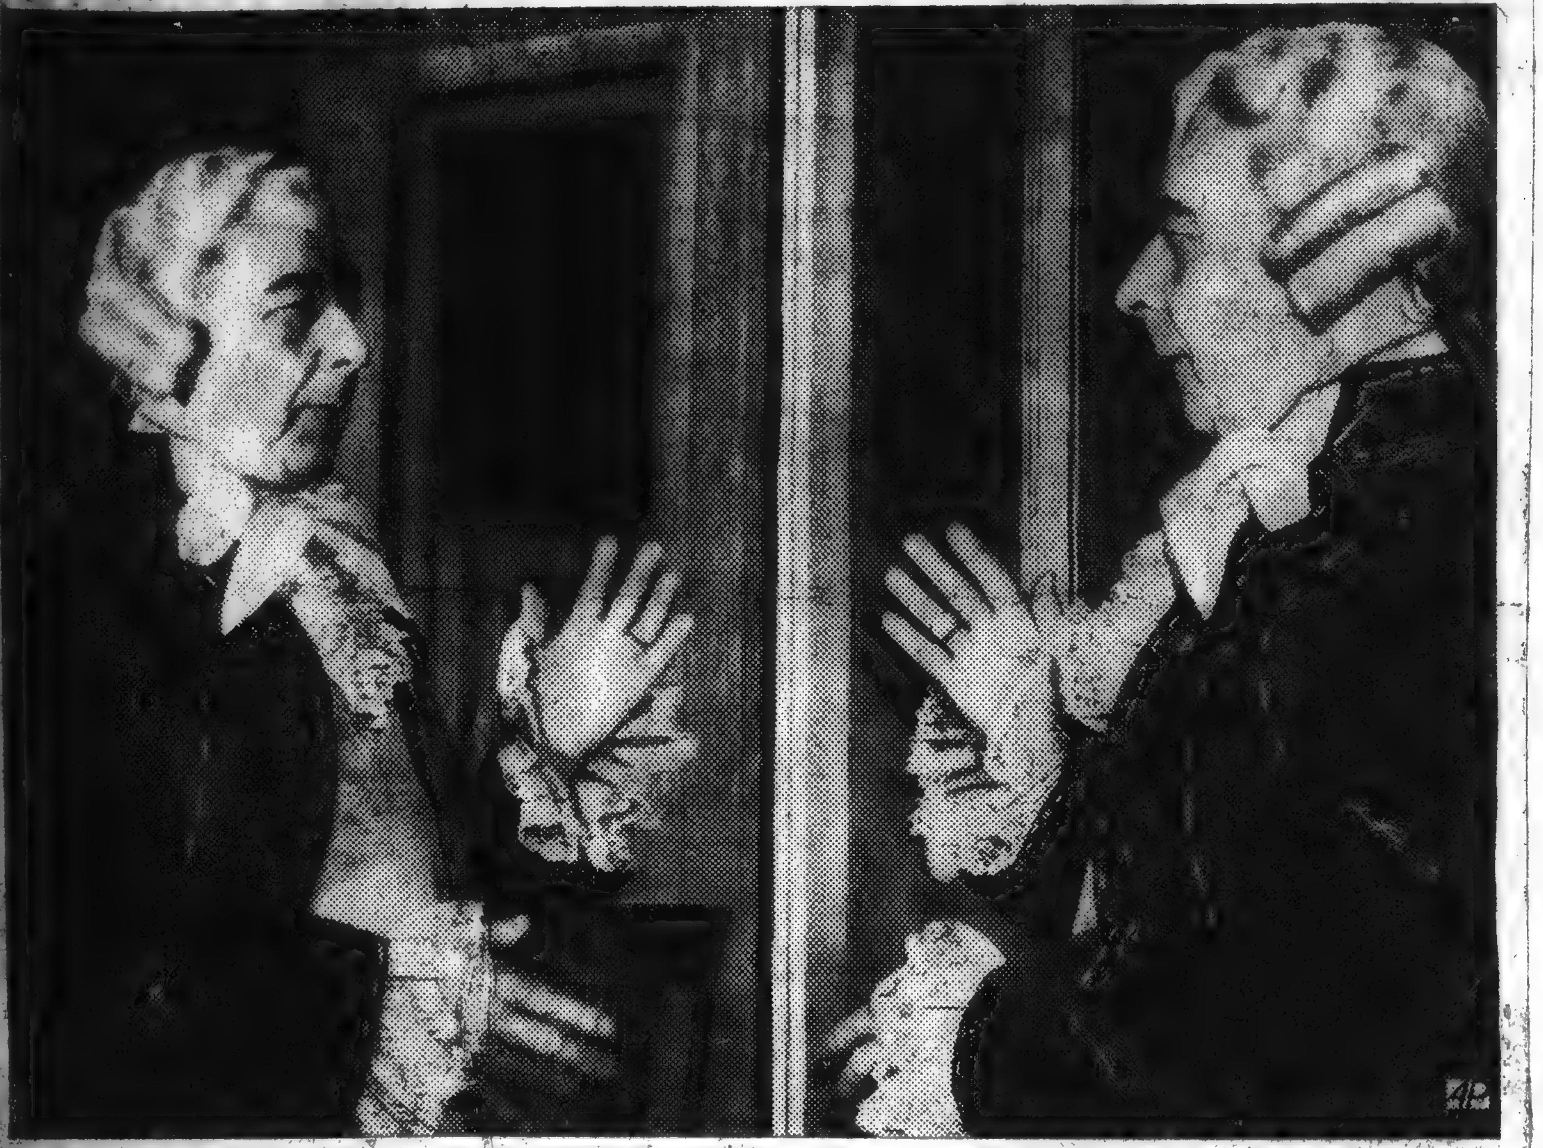
—JOHN ROSENFIELD.

182

SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

FEB 19 1939

KOUSSEVITZKY BRINGS HAYDN TO LIFE.



The conductor of the Boston Mass., symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the Composer Haydn manner, preparatory to a concert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky impersonated Haydn—to whom he is said to bear a resemblance —and orchestra members appeared in 18th century finery. (See fuller account in "The World of Music" column on this page.)

ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT

FEB 19 1939

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

NEW YORK, Feb. 18 (U.P.) The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the door-keepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydin, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitsky impersonating Mozart, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed ou their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In the startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude. Russianistic art depicted Daniel in the Lion's Den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

FEB 19 1939

WITH THE SYMPHONIES

By LOUIS F. KEEMLE

New York, Feb. 18.—(UP) —The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky ap-

---

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

FEB 19 1939

The World of Music

New York, Feb. 18 (UP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie Hall this month in what was generally

---

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

FEB 19 1939

Boston Symphony Plays In Costume

The Boston Symphony got real skittish and performed Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony in costume, with Koussevitsky dressed up and made up as Papa Haydn. In this work, the players in the last movement turn off their lights and leave the stage one by one. It is an amusing stunt. Also on the program was Gruenberg's "Daniel Jazz," which had Colin O'Moore, tenor, as soloist. The work hardly seems to merit a place on a Boston program, but it was worth while hearing once. There were also three Strauss waltzes and Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as narrator.

The Philadelphia Orchestra also went out of the beaten track and had Mr. Hale read portions of Goethe's "Egmont," with Kirsten Flagstad singing Klärchen's songs, and, it being an all-Beethoven list, she also did "Ah, Perfido," which nobody else can do as she does it, and "Abscheulicher!" from "Fidelio," as well as "Die Ehre Gottes." The purely orchestral number was the Seventh Symphony.

The Philharmonic-Symphony made a ten-strike with Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, with Gieseking playing superbly as soloist. Mr. Barbirolli also offered Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" for some reason or other, and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

Marie Gabriel Arakian, an Armenian soprano, displayed a beautiful soprano voice, but was not altogether happy in her selection of program. Hope Miller, on the contrary, offered a unique and beautiful list, somewhat beyond her abilities.

The World of Music.

BY LOUIS F. KEEMLE.
United Press.

NEW YORK, Fe' 18.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all.

MISS ANDERSON.

The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitzky impersonating Haydn, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" symphony. In the last movement the players one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

* * *

THE STORY is that Hadyn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the lions' den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

FEB 25 1939

DR. KOUSSEVITZY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in knee breeches, eighteenth century costumes and wigs—horrors, can this be dear old Boston.

Boston, none the less, it is and the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing the Haydn "Farewell Symphony" as a benefit for the retired musicians' pension fund.

A small orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, gave Louis Gruenberg's setting of Vachel Lindsay's poem "The Daniel Jazz." This group dressed in white mess jackets and sat in front of a modernistic screen.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 19 1939

Russian Fairy Tale

Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," described as an orchestral fairy tale for children, will be a feature of the next Boston Symphony concert here, Feb. 28, to be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. In this work the instruments represent various animals and there is a narrator, Richard Hale. As played at the orchestra's recent pension fund concerts in Boston and New York, the piece was a "hit." Also announced for the program are Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which is for many the most popular symphony in the world, and the first movement, "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," from Tschaikowski's "Manfred" Symphony, after Byron's dramatic poem.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will again be present at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival, to take place at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., from Aug. 3 to 13. They will present six programs.

DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

FEB 19 1939

Berkshire Festival Has Six Concerts

The Berkshire Symphonic festival announces that the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will give six concerts during the sixth annual festival at Tanglewood, in Stockbridge, Mass., between August 3 and 13.

The aim of the festival is to create a musical center at Stockbridge in 1940. Its purpose is stated as follows:

"That the annual festival may be supplemented by a school or academy holding annual sessions preceding the concerts themselves, and devoted to the cultivation of the highest standards in the work of orchestral conductors, chorus leaders and instrumental players."

Membership lists for this year closed last November 1, with the assurance of an audience of more than 2,000 for each of the six concerts.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

FEB 20 1939

When Childhood's Fancies Seize Realists

IF IS IT A BIT puzzling to those who have been accustomed to hearing nothing but impressive Wagnerian themes at symphony concerts and to seeing nothing but Rembrandt pictures in the art galleries to find Walt Disney's pictures there among the gasping Old Masters, and to hear Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" at the concerts—if, we were about to say, these things puzzle the staid and solemn, must we not charge it off to the same impulse that makes grown-ups drag children back to see "Snow White" again and again, or that causes daddy to monopolize the electric train which he purchased for little Willie?

That is a terribly long and involved sentence, and we doubt if you find your way through it. What it comes to is that when the spirit of childhood, too long repressed, crops out, and the urge to follow fancy into the land of Make-Believe seizes us elders, we are glad to have an excuse to indulge it under the name of art or scientific experimentation.

Here comes another long name—skip it if you can't say it without sounding like an exuberant steam locomotive—Doctor Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, suggests that Doctor Walt Disney make a picture on the other Serge's Russian fantasy, "Peter and the Wolf." The rapacious wolf he cheerfully recommends to join Ferdinand the Bull, Donald Duck, Mickey and Minnie and the rest of the fancies which so amuse grown-up children. Serge What's-His-Name already has the Wolf all caught and tamed in quarter-notes.

Our guess is that we stupid mortals take everything so seriously that we just hanker for something to tickle our fancy and transport us out of the world of cold realism into that Never-Never Land to which Maude Adams used to lead so many thousands of us when we had more hair than we have now.

Then there was Alice in Wonderland written by a perfectly serious professor—of all things—of mathematics. There is no reason that we should take everything so seriously. There's nothing much you can do about anything, except to await inauguration day in 1941, and that's quite a way off. In the meantime, we may as well enjoy ourselves, and if Ferdinand and the Wolf and Minnie can help, why let 'em go on; and tell Charlie Chaplin to hurry up with his funny film about dictators who also take themselves too seriously.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 20 1939

MUSIC

Farewell Symphony

The Prince sat in the music room of his country palace, listening to a new symphony by his court Kapellmeister. The stocky, periwigged Kapellmeister himself sat at the harpsichord, bobbing out the rhythm with his head, cuing in an occasional oboe or bassoon with one lace-cuffed hand. Before him peered and labored a score of white-wigged, brocaded musicians. The first oboe closed the music on his stand, blew out his candle, tiptoed from the stage. The second horn followed. One by one, other musicians got up and went out. Soon there were only two violinists left. Together they played the symphony's last note, then rose, doused their candles and departed. Silently the powder-haired Kapellmeister turned, bowed, blew out his candle, plunged the room into total darkness.

Thus did Court Composer Franz Joseph Haydn hint to his employer, Prince Esterhazy, that autumn was well along, and that he and his musicians were chafing to get back to Vienna.

That was in 1772. Last week a similar scene took place in Manhattan's Carnegie Hall, where Sergei Koussevitzky's famed Boston Symphony had announced a "concert extraordinaire." Manhattan concertgoers could see that something was up when 18th-Century ushers led them to their seats. When Boston's stiff-necked orchestra appeared in silk stockings and periwigs with Conductor Koussevitzky himself got up as Franz Joseph ("Papa") Haydn, they began to catch on. Without batting an eye, poker-faced Koussevitzky led his men through Haydn's rococo whimsey, bowed gravely, pinched out his candle and left the stage.

Almost before the candle fumes were cleared, the Boston musicians returned in white pea jackets, and were on their way to town with Composer Louis Gruenberg's modernistic jazz score, Daniel Jazz. The result was hardly enough to shake a Brahmin into a shag, but it was pretty hot stuff for the Boston Symphony.

After another quick change, this time to their store clothes, Conductor Koussevitzky and his men gave Manhattanites their first taste of Serge Prokofieff's children's suite, Peter and the Wolf, made them whoop and giggle to hear Peter's duck (the oboe) quack mournfully inside the hungry wolf's stomach (three French horns). With the evening topped off with waltzes by Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel, concertgoers felt that Henry Lee Higginson's band had kicked up its heels about as much as any self-respecting 58-year-old symphony had a right to.

Carl M. Mydans

KOUSSEVITZKY AND ORCHESTRA
The second horn followed the oboe.

Carl M. Mydans

. . . the fiddles followed each other.

NEW CASTLE, IND.
COURIER - TIMES

FEB 20 1939

The World of Music

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitsky impersonating Haydn, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the Lions' Den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Raxel.

183

MUSIC
B. Trans. Feb. 21/39

Music-Making Rare in Quality

Symphony Orchestra With Miss Hess Again

By Moses Smith

The music purveyed at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last evening was such as to gladden the heart of a jaded professional concert-goer, to say nothing of the fortunate subscribers to the extra series. The program, containing nothing problematical with which to tax or puzzle the listener, was nevertheless an admirable assortment of familiar and unfamiliar material.

At the beginning of the list stood the neglected and bewitching little Symphony of Mozart in A major (K. 201). The subscribers to the shorter season were then offered an opportunity to hear that delightful fairy tale, Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale to set forth the narrative admirably. The Schumann Piano Concerto enlisted the services of Myra Hess, who was scheduled at the repetition of the program this afternoon to complete a sort of four-concert, five-day festival with the orchestra. For pendent there was that exercise in orchestral sorcery, Ravel's "La Valse."

The audience was also fortunate in the quality of performance it was privileged to hear. The presentation of the Mozart Symphony was as deft and unclouded as the music itself, the single possible reservation being to the brisk pace of the minuet. The Prokofiev piece seemed even more happily performed than it had been on a previous occasion. And the present writer was again struck with the desirability (which is too weak a word) of transferring this performance to the quasi-permanent and readily available phonograph records with as much dispatch as possible.

Miss Hess's playing of the Schumann Concerto is not unfamiliar here, especially now that it is available on phonograph records. But it was good to hear it again in the concert-hall and with the superlative accompaniment of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. With her remarkably sensitive pianism for principal protagonist and with the exceptionally sensitive orchestral playing to second it (or take the lead when necessary) the result was one of those infrequent combinations that approach perfection. The whole was rare experience. The audience seemed to think so, too.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

FEB 20 1939

Koussevitzky Drops His Reserve And Kisses Pianist

BOSTON, Feb. 20—Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is noted for his reserve.

Thus, orchestra members were astonished today when they heard him exclaim, "before the whole orchestra!" and saw him implant an impulsive kiss upon the cheek of dark-eyed Myra Hess, celebrated English pianist, during a rehearsal.

Miss Hess, who had just played Schumann's "Concerto in A minor" in a way that delighted Koussevitzky, smilingly echoed his words, "before the whole orchestra!" and kissed him on the lips.

The orchestra loudly applauded both kisses.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES-STAR

FEB 21 1939

To Play Bruckner Symphony Thursday

Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 in E Flat Major, also known as the Romantic Symphony, will be a feature of the program to be presented by the Bridgeport Federal Symphony Orchestra at its concert at Central High school auditorium on Thursday evening. Fritz Mahler will be guest conductor, while Louis Persinger, violinist, will appear as guest artist. Mr. Persinger will play Concerto for Violin in D Major, Op 61, by Beethoven.

Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 will be played for the first time in Connecticut. Anton Bruckner was born on Sept. 4, 1824 in Ansfelden, Austria and died on Oct. 11, 1896, in Vienna. His importance as a composer gained late recognition. Dr. Stock, in Chicago and Dr. Koussewitzky of Boston, have performed many of his symphonies. Two weeks ago the Boston Symphony performed Bruckner's 8th Symphony in New York. The Romantic Symphony to be played on Thursday evening is one of the most popular of his nine symphonies and was completed in 1874.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

FEB 25 1939

Haydn Symphony Heads Victor List, With Koussevitzky

Stokowski Offers More Stokowski With Variety of February Music

There's some very fine Haydn on Victor's February list and we would mention it again rather than have you pass it up. It's the symphony in B flat, No. 102, and it is surely from the best of the composer.

In Victor Album, M-529, it's played by the Boston Symphony with Koussevitsky in charge. There are indications that it was pressed some time ago for, in some ways, even Mr. Koussevitsky has changed. Given his own or anybody else's orchestra, it's possible that he wouldn't play the opus this way now.

However, there are some fine contrasts, both in tempo and tone, with many of the Haydn touches that demand rehearing to appreciate. At the same time, the emphasis is put where it most certainly doesn't belong here and there—and that's disturbing from such an auspices.

Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra do a little confecting which is important according to the light in which you hear this combination. This time Leopold, who'll be coming back to the old podium next month during Mr. Ormandy's respite from Philadelphia, offers his own arrangement of the Tannhauser Overture and Venusberg Music (Paris Version).

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

FEB 26 1939

The violin concerto of John Alden Carpenter, Chicago composer, will receive its eastern première Friday afternoon at the hands of Zlatko Balokovic and the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The performance will be in Symphony hall, Boston, and will be followed by a repetition there the following evening. The same forces will present the concerto in New York on Mar. 9.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

New York Philharmonic To Be Heard in Boston

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will appear at Symphony Hall in Boston on March 13, in a concert sponsored by the Boston Symphony. It will be the first Boston appearance of John Barbirolli, conductor. Artur Schnabel will be soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

On March 14, the orchestra will play at Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford. The Boston concert will be the 3497th in the 97 years of the orchestra's history.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Symphony Program Announced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday night, at 8:30 o'clock, is as follows:

Symphony in A-major, K. No. 201. . Mozart
"Peter and the Wolf," Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, opus 67 . . . . Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, opus 67. . . . . Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

Composed recently in Soviet Russia, "Peter and the Wolf" was introduced to this country by Prokofieff at the Boston Symphony concerts last season and has figured

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Today—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program, John B. Archer; Providence Public Library, 4 p. m. Verdi's "Requiem," Providence Oratorio Society, William W. DeRoin, conductor; Elmwood - Christian Congregational Church, 7:30 p. m. Providence Federal Orchestra, Edouard Caffier, conductor; concerto program, Emma Winslow Childs, Alexandre Peloquin, Gladys Mulchahey and Earl Hedberg, soloists; Hope high school, 8:30 p. m.

183

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 20 1939

MUSIC

Farewell Symphony

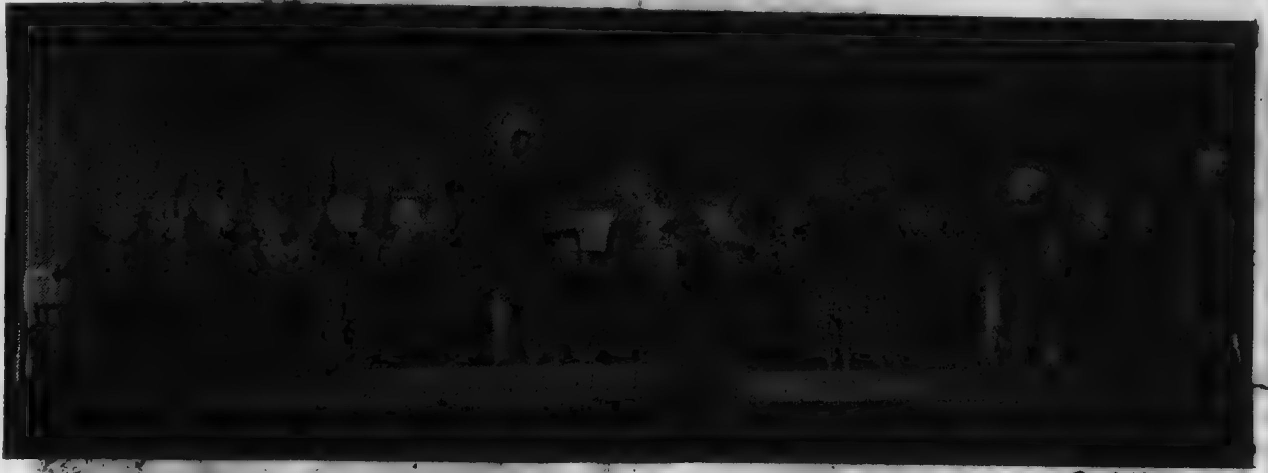
The Prince sat in the music room of his country palace, listening to a new symphony by his court Kapellmeister. The stocky, periwigged Kapellmeister himself sat at the harpsichord, bobbing out the rhythm with his head, cuing in an occasional oboe or bassoon with one lace-cuffed hand. Before him peered and labored a score of white-wigged, brocaded musicians. The first oboe closed the music on his stand, blew out his candle, tiptoed from the stage. The second horn followed. One by one, other musicians got up and went out. Soon there were only two violinists left. Together they played the symphony's last note, then rose, doused their candles and departed. Silently the powder-haired Kapellmeister turned, bowed, blew out his candle, plunged the room into total darkness.

Thus did Court Composer Franz Joseph Haydn hint to his employer, Prince Esterhazy, that autumn was well along, and that he and his musicians were chafing to get back to Vienna.

That was in 1772. Last week a similar scene took place in Manhattan's Carnegie Hall, where Sergei Koussevitzky's famed Boston Symphony had announced a "concert extraordinaire." Manhattan concertgoers could see that something was up when 18th-Century ushers led them to their seats. When Boston's stiff-necked orchestra appeared in silk stockings and periwigs with Conductor Koussevitzky himself got up as Franz Joseph ("Papa") Haydn, they began to catch on. Without batting an eye, poker-faced Koussevitzky led his men through Haydn's rococo whimsey, bowed gravely, pinched out his candle and left the stage.

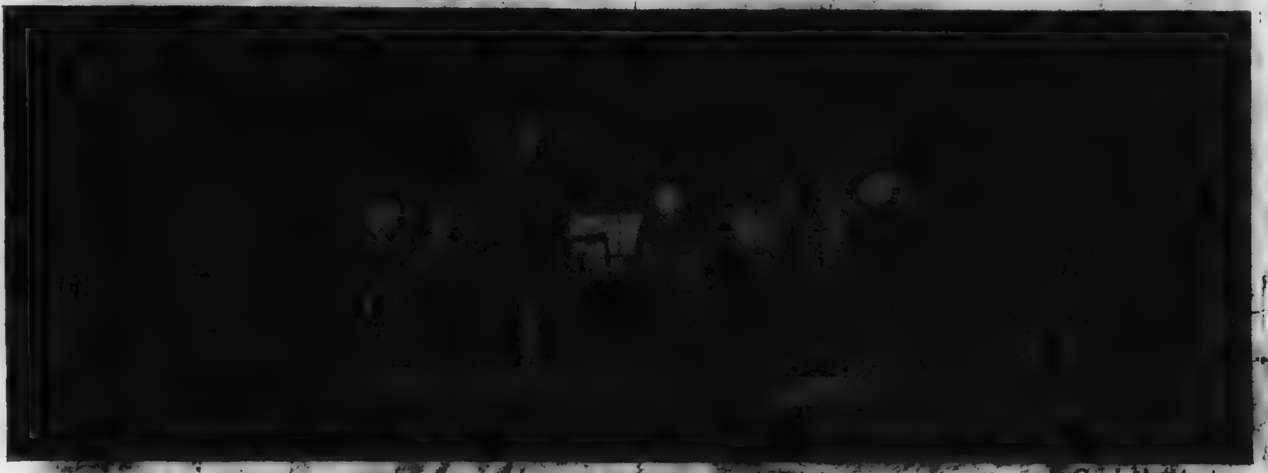
Almost before the candle fumes were cleared, the Boston musicians returned in white pea jackets, and were on their way to town with Composer Louis Gruenberg's modernistic jazz score, Daniel Jazz. The result was hardly enough to shake a Brahmin into a shag, but it was pretty hot stuff for the Boston Symphony.

After another quick change, this time to their store clothes, Conductor Koussevitzky and his men gave Manhattanites their first taste of Serge Prokofieff's children's suite, Peter and the Wolf, made them whoop and giggle to hear Peter's duck (the oboe) quack mournfully inside the hungry wolf's stomach (three French horns). With the evening topped off with waltzes by Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel, concertgoers felt that Henry Lee Higginson's band had kicked up its heels about as much as any self-respecting 58-year-old symphony had a right to.



Carl M. Mydans

KOUSSEVITZKY AND ORCHESTRA
The second horn followed the oboe.



Carl M. Mydans

. . . the fiddles followed each other.

NEW CASTLE, IND.
COURIER - TIMES

FEB 20 1939

The World of Music

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky appeared at Carnegie hall this month in what was generally hailed as one of the most delightful concerts in years. It was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and filled the hall.

The program combined beauty, grace and musical humor. On arrival at the hall, the patrons were startled to find the doorkeepers and ticket takers in the costume of the period of Haydn, wigs and all. The ushers were similarly garbed.

The stage was veiled by a curtain. When it went up, the orchestra was revealed in costume, with Koussevitsky impersonating Haydn, conducting from a period spinet from the Casadesus collection.

A large chandelier of candles hung center stage. Right and left were pedestals with candelabra. A flickering candle was on each player's stand.

In the soft light, the orchestra started Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. In the last movement, the players, one by one snuffed out their candles and glided from the scene. Finally only Haydn was left. After bowing his head in a melancholy gesture, he too disappeared and the curtain fell.

The story is that Haydn and his men were weary of their long stay at the Esterhazy court and wanted to return home. The symphony was intended as a gentle hint to Prince Esterhazy, who got the point and cheerfully acceded.

In a startling change of pace, the curtain went up next on a small orchestra garbed as jazz players, with a backdrop of crude, Russianistic art depicting Daniel in the Lions' Den. They played "The Daniel Jazz," written by Louis Gruenberg from the poem of Vachel Lindsay, for tenor and orchestra. Colin O'More sang the amusing conception of the Negro-style verses.

Next was "Peter and the Wolf," Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, never heard in New York before. Richard Hale was the narrator, accompanying the music with a running story of what the orchestra was telling. The second half of the program consisted of waltz music of Johann Strauss, Sibelius and Ravel.

MUSIC
B. Trans. Feb. 21/39

Music-Making Rare in Quality

Symphony Orchestra With Miss Hess Again

By Moses Smith

The music purveyed at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last evening was such as to gladden the heart of a jaded professional concert-goer, to say nothing of the fortunate subscribers to the extra series. The program, containing nothing problematical with which to tax or puzzle the listener, was nevertheless an admirable assortment of familiar and unfamiliar material.

At the beginning of the list stood the neglected and bewitching little Symphony of Mozart in A major (K. 201). The subscribers to the shorter season were then offered an opportunity to hear that delightful fairy tale, Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale to set forth the narrative admirably. The Schumann Piano Concerto enlisted the services of Myra Hess, who was scheduled at the repetition of the program this afternoon to complete a sort of four-concert, five-day festival with the orchestra. For pendent there was that exercise in orchestral sorcery, Ravel's "La Valse."

The audience was also fortunate in the quality of performance it was privileged to hear. The presentation of the Mozart Symphony was as deft and unclouded as the music itself, the single possible reservation being to the brisk pace of the minuet. The Prokofiev piece seemed even more happily performed than it had been on a previous occasion. And the present writer was again struck with the desirability (which is too weak a word) of transferring this performance to the quasi-permanent and readily available phonograph records with as much dispatch as possible.

Miss Hess's playing of the Schumann Concerto is not unfamiliar here, especially now that it is available on phonograph records. But it was good to hear it again in the concert-hall and with the superlative accompaniment of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. With her remarkably sensitive pianism for principal protagonist and with the exceptionally sensitive orchestral playing to second it (or take the lead when necessary) the result was one of those infrequent combinations that approach perfection. The whole was rare experience. The audience seemed to think so, too.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

FEB 20 1939

Koussevitzky Drops His Reserve And Kisses Pianist

BOSTON, Feb. 20—Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is noted for his reserve.

Thus, orchestra members were astonished today when they heard him exclaim, "before the whole orchestra!" and saw him implant an impulsive kiss upon the cheek of dark-eyed Myra Hess, celebrated English pianist, during a rehearsal.

Miss Hess, who had just played Schumann's "Concerto in A minor" in a way that delighted Koussevitzky, smilingly echoed his words, "before the whole orchestra!" and kissed him on the lips.

The orchestra loudly applauded both kisses.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES-STAR

FEB 21 1939

To Play Bruckner Symphony Thursday

Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 in E-Flat Major, also known as the Romantic Symphony, will be a feature of the program to be presented by the Bridgeport Federal Symphony Orchestra at its concert at Central High school auditorium on Thursday evening. Fritz Mahler will be guest conductor, while Louis Persinger, violinist, will appear as guest artist. Mr. Persinger will play Concerto for Violin in D Major, Op 61, by Beethoven.

Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 will be played for the first time in Connecticut. Anton Bruckner was born on Sept. 4, 1824 in Ansfelden, Austria and died on Oct. 11, 1896, in Vienna. His importance as a composer gained late recognition. Dr. Stock, in Chicago and Dr. Koussewitzky of Boston, have performed many of his symphonies. Two weeks ago the Boston Symphony performed Bruckner's 8th Symphony in New York. The Romantic Symphony to be played on Thursday evening is one of the most popular of his nine symphonies and was completed in 1874.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

FEB 25 1939

Haydn Symphony Heads Victor List, With Koussevitzky

Stokowski Offers More Stokowski With Variety of February Music

There's some very fine Haydn on Victor's February list and we would mention it again rather than have you pass it up. It's the symphony in B flat, No. 102, and it is surely from the best of the composer.

In Victor Album, M-529, it's played by the Boston Symphony with Koussevitsky in charge. There are indications that it was pressed some time ago for, in some ways, even Mr. Koussevitsky has changed. Given his own or anybody else's orchestra, it's possible that he wouldn't play the opus this way now.

However, there are some fine contrasts, both in tempo and tone, with many of the Haydn touches that demand rehearing to appreciate. At the same time, the emphasis is put where it most certainly doesn't belong here and there—and that's disturbing from such an auspices.

Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra do a little confecting which is important according to the light in which you hear this combination. This time Leopold, who'll be coming back to the old podium next month during Mr. Ormandy's respite from Philadelphia, offers his own arrangement of the Tannhauser Overture and Venusberg Music (Paris Version)

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

FEB 26 1939

The violin concerto of John Alden Carpenter, Chicago composer, will receive its eastern première Friday afternoon at the hands of Zlatko Balokovic and the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The performance will be in Symphony hall, Boston, and will be followed by a repetition there the following evening. The same forces will present the concerto in New York on Mar. 9.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

New York Philharmonic To Be Heard in Boston

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will appear at Symphony Hall in Boston on March 13, in a concert sponsored by the Boston Symphony. It will be the first Boston appearance of John Barbirolli, conductor. Artur Schnabel will be soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

On March 14, the orchestra will play at Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford. The Boston concert will be the 3497th in the 97 years of the orchestra's history.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Symphony Program Announced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday night, at 8:30 o'clock, is as follows:

Symphony in A-major, K. No. 201 . . Mozart
"Peter and the Wolf," Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, opus 67 . . . . Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, opus 67 . . . . Beethoven
  I. Allegro con brio
  II. Andante con moto
  III. Allegro; Trio
  IV. Allegro

Composed recently in Soviet Russia, "Peter and the Wolf" was introduced to this country by Prokofieff at the Boston Symphony concerts last season and has figured

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Today—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program, John B. Archer; Providence Public Library, 4 p. m. Verdi's "Requiem," Providence Oratorio Society, William W. DeRoin, conductor; Elmwood - Christian Congregational Church, 7:30 p. m. Providence Federal Orchestra, Edouard Caffier, conductor; concerto program, Emma Winslow Childs, Alexandre Peloquin, Gladys Mulchahey and Earl Hedberg, soloists; Hope high school, 8:30 p. m.

Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is conductor of the Zighera Chamber Orchestra, brought into existence in 1936 to provide Boston music lovers with the more intimate music especially written for small orchestras. Mr. Zighera has very mobile features and expressive hands, which make him a singularly photogenic conductor. These performance photographs taken by Transcript photographer Richard Tucker show him as he rehearsed his orchestra in preparation for his last concert of this season on March 1.

NEWARK, N. J.
LEDGER

FEB 28 1939

MUCH ADO!

By Sylvia Smith

"Why did you come to America?"

I asked the question of Fritz Mahler, guest conductor for the 75-piece Federal Symphony Orchestra which will present a concert tonight at Fuld Hall.

Mahler, here just three years, replied, "because America is the hope of the world-culturally, politically and in every conceivable way."

He answered the question without a moment's hesitation because he has known this answer for a long, long time.

He added proudly, "I too shall be an American very soon."

He is not a refugee. That is, not in the sense that all recent arrivals from Austria and Germany are refugees. At the age of 19 he was already carving a great career for himself as a conductor. He studied with Arnold Schoenberg, in Vienna from the time he was a child. Three years ago Schoenberg also fled the confining influences of his native land and is now teaching music and tutoring some of Hollywood's most noted musicians, at the University of California.

Highly Regarded In Germany

Mahler was well thought of in Vienna. He was highly regarded in Germany also. He was once permanent conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony which was comparable to our NBC Symphonic broadcasts. He had appeared as a guest conductor in Mannheim, and had in fact traveled and performed as conductor in all the principal cities of Europe.

In Copenhagen where he was conducting a symphony for the radio, NBC scouts invited him to America.

He came—not as a refugee, excepting that his spirit was that of a refugee.

"Dictatorships cannot sponsor cultural development," he says. "I felt stifled wherever I went. In dictatorships a conductor must play not what he feels but what the dictator tells him to feel. Art and culture cannot thrive that way. They never have and they never will."

For years, says Mahler, he had longed to come here, but most particularly through the recent years when he felt music dying all about him. The magnificent culture of Germany and Italy are rapidly being stifled, and this he could not bear.

"Here," he says, his eyes glowing with the zeal of a pioneer behind his heavy lenses, "here is the hope and the possibility of developing a culture for the masses which will be the finest the world has ever seen. America is young and learns quickly. Here is the place for the music of the future."

He wants to be the true American trail-blazer. He has visions of great musical centers all over America which will equal and outstrip anything Europe has ever seen. And Mahler wants to work—for the years and years it will take to do the job—toward this end.

Favors Local Musical Groups

"In this country," he explains, "there must be no room for the snobism which brings people to concerts and the opera only because they are fashionable. Here there must be—and will be, in time, a true and honest and native urge to support concerts and musical events for themselves alone."

This aim can be accomplished, he feels sure, by the simple process of establishing local choral, symphonic and operatic groups which might quite conceivably sponsor WPA musical events.

"Then, if WPA, which is a great force for the development of music and not just a stopgap for mediocre musicians—if by political developments it should disappear, the music centers would remain," he explains.

He has already begun this great trail-blazing career of his by appearing as guest conductor at the Boston Symphony, in Bridgeport, and even in Birmingham, Alabama~~, and is the permanent~~ director of the Philadelphia La Scala Opera Co.

It is Mahler's belief that Toscanini is, of course, the world's greatest conductor.

"Not only because he is a great musician," states his worshiper, "but because he is also a great personality, who is unafraid to voice his opinion in order to be true to his ideals—musically and politically."

This is the Mahler ideal. It is peculiarly and splendidly an American ideal—one which has blossomed, in a man who is proud to say "I will soon be an American," in an amazingly short time. It is one which might well be the ideal of every American.

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

FEB 28 1939

O'CONNELL TO CONDUCT

Victor Director Will Lead Concert Symphonique Friday

Charles O'Connell, musical director of the RCA-Victor Company, Camden, N.J., will be guest conductor of Les Concerts Symphoniques next Friday evening at the Plateau Auditorium. The concert will also be the occasion of the Montreal debut of Jesus Maria Sanroma, distinguished Boston pianist. Mr. Sanroma will be soloist in Weber's Concert Piece, opus 79.

The programme will include Bach's Prelude in E major in the Caillet transcription, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Weber work for piano and orchestra, and the following pieces transcribed by Mr. O'Connell and Lucien Caillet under the heading of "Vignettes of Spain": Sacro-Monte" (Turina); "Cordoba" (Albeniz); "Danse Rituelle de Feu" (De Falla).

Writing of his recent performance of Ravel's Concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Lawrence Gilman, critic of The Herald-Tribune, said of Mr. Sanroma's playing: "The Ravel work is surefire with any audience when it is played as superbly as it was last night by Mr. Sanroma. It would be unreasonable to ask for a better performance than he achieved, one more entirely in the vein of the music. When Mr. Sanroma had completed the dazzling feat of acrobatics which he final Presto requires, the audience gave him what one is obliged to call an ovation. It was well deserved."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

connection with campus

Alumnae Hall, 8.

Tuesday—Concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre. Donor's luncheon, Rhode Island Ladies' Auxiliary of Jewish Consumptive Relief Society, Hotel Narragansett, 12:30.

con amore
pianissimo

Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is conductor of the Zighera Chamber Orchestra, brought into existence in 1936 to provide Boston music lovers with the more intimate music especially written for small orchestras. Mr. Zighera has very mobile features and expressive hands, which make him a singularly photogenic conductor. These performance photographs taken by Transcript photographer Richard Tucker show him as he rehearsed his orchestra in preparation for his last concert of this season on March 1.

NEWARK, N. J.
LEDGER

FEB 28 1939

MUCH ADO!

By Sylvia Smith

"Why did you come to America?"

I asked the question of Fritz Mahler, guest conductor for the 75-piece Federal Symphony Orchestra which will present a concert tonight at Fuld Hall.

Mahler, here just three years, replied, "because America is the hope of the world-culturally, politically and in every conceivable way."

He answered the question without a moment's hesitation because he has known this answer for a long, long time.

He added proudly, "I too shall be an American very soon."

He is not a refugee. That is, not in the sense that all recent arrivals from Austria and Germany are refugees. At the age of 19 he was already carving a great career for himself as a conductor. He studied with Arnold Schoenberg, in Vienna from the time he was a child. Three years ago Schoenberg also fled the confining influences of his native land and is now teaching music and tutoring some of Hollywood's most noted musicians, at the University of California.

Highly Regarded In Germany

Mahler was well thought of in Vienna. He was highly regarded in Germany also. He was once permanent conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony which was comparable to our NBC Symphonic broadcasts. He had appeared as a guest conductor in Mannheim, and had in fact traveled and performed as conductor in all the principal cities of Europe.

In Copenhagen where he was conducting a symphony for the radio, NBC scouts invited him to America.

He came—not as a refugee, excepting that his spirit was that of a refugee.

"Dictatorships cannot sponsor cultural development," he says. "I felt stifled wherever I went. In dictatorships a conductor must play not what he feels but what the dictator tells him to feel. Art and culture cannot thrive that way. They never have and they never will."

For years, says Mahler, he had longed to come here, but most particularly through the recent years when he felt music dying all about him. The magnificent culture of Germany and Italy are rapidly being stifled, and this he could not bear.

"Here," he says, his eyes glowing with the zeal of a pioneer behind his heavy lenses, "here is the hope and the possibility of developing a culture for the masses which will be the finest the world has ever seen. America is young and learns quickly. Here is the place for the music of the future."

He wants to be the true American trail-blazer. He has visions of great musical centers all over America which will equal and outstrip anything Europe has ever seen. And Mahler wants to work—for the years and years it will take to do the job—toward this end.

Favors Local Musical Groups

"In this country," he explains, "there must be no room for the snobism which brings people to concerts and the opera only because they are fashionable. Here there must be—and will be, in time, a true and honest and native urge to support concerts and musical events for themselves alone."

This aim can be accomplished, he feels sure, by the simple process of establishing local choral, symphonic and operatic groups which might quite conceivably sponsor WPA musical events.

"Then, if WPA, which is a great force for the development of music and not just a stopgap for mediocre musicians—if by political developments it should disappear, the music centers would remain," he explains.

He has already begun this great trail-blazing career of his by appearing as guest conductor at the Boston Symphony, in Bridgeport, and even in Birmingham, Alabama~~, and is the~~ permanent director of the Philadelphia La Scala Opera Co.

It is Mahler's belief that Toscanini is, of course, the world's greatest conductor.

"Not only because he is a great musician," states his worshiper, "but because he is also a great personality, who is unafraid to voice his opinion in order to be true to his ideals—musically and politically."

This is the Mahler ideal. It is peculiarly and splendidly an American ideal—one which has blossomed, in a man who is proud to say "I will soon be an American," in an amazingly short time. It is one which might well be the ideal of every American.

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

FEB 28 1939

O'CONNELL TO CONDUCT

Victor Director Will Lead Concert Symphonique Friday

Charles O'Connell, musical director of the RCA-Victor Company, Camden, N.J., will be guest conductor of Les Concerts Symphoniques next Friday evening at the Plateau Auditorium. The concert will also be the occasion of the Montreal debut of Jesus Maria Sanroma, distinguished Boston pianist. Mr. Sanroma will be soloist in Weber's Concert Piece, opus 79.

The programme will include Bach's Prelude in E major in the Caillet transcription, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Weber work for piano and orchestra, and the following pieces transcribed by Mr. O'Connell and Lucien Caillet under the heading of "Vignettes of Spain": Sacro-Monte" (Turina); "Cordoba" (Albeniz); "Danse Rituelle de Feu" (De Falla).

Writing of his recent performance of Ravel's Concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Lawrence Gilman, critic of The Herald-Tribune, said of Mr. Sanroma's playing: "The Ravel work is surefire with any audience when it is played as superbly as it was last night by Mr. Sanroma. It would be unreasonable to ask for a better performance than he achieved, one more entirely in the vein of the music. When Mr. Sanroma had completed the dazzling feat of acrobatics which he final Presto requires, the audience gave him what one is obliged to call an ovation. It was well deserved."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

connection with campus [illegible] Alumnae Hall, 8.

Tuesday—Concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre. Donor's luncheon, Rhode Island Ladies' Auxiliary of Jewish Consumptive Relief Society, Hotel Narragansett, 12:30.

185

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

FEB 24 1939

MUSIC

Paul Hindemith, German Composer, Arrives to Conduct S. F. Symphony

By ALFRED FRANKENSTEIN

PAUL HINDEMITH
"Cultural Bolshevist"

For Paul Hindemith life goes on.

The distinguished German composer, "Aryan" as any hero out of Wagner, but from the Nazi point of view, a "cultural Bolshevist," arrived in San Francisco yesterday to appear as soloist and guest conductor with the San Francisco Symphony this afternoon and tomorrow night at the Opera House.

"If a German composer didn't have trouble, he wouldn't be a true German composer," he said in discussing the present ban on his works in his native country. "In former times composers were permitted to perform their music but they may not have had enough to eat. I have enough to eat, and so I have this political situation to compensate for it. It is only a minor blemish, and it will pass. Furthermore, now that my works cannot be publicly performed in Germany, more copies of them are sold there than ever before."

CHANNELS FOR RELEASE

This serene, not to say humorous philosophy colored every aspect of the brief interview Hindemith was able to grant the press between rehearsals. The usual outlets in Germany being closed. Hindemith has found channels for the release of his energies throughout the world, especially in Turkey, where he has spent part of every year since 1934. The late Mustapha Kemal Ataturk invited hi mto Ankara to build up organized musical life in that country, wrote his suggestions into law, and made Hindemith virtually the musical dictator of his nation. There he has charge of symphony orchestras, schools and every phase of musical activity and aims, in the enacting of a long-range policy, to develop both the nation Oriental and the imported Occidental music.

ALWAYS COMPOSING

But a composer composes, as Hindemith himself said. In fact, as he put it, a composer is always composing because it is his life and his business. Reminded that he had once enunciated the principle that the days of writing music for its own sake were gone forever, and that the modern musician must write for the needs of his audience, he answered: "Yes, that's true, but it does not necessarily follow that the modern composer must write solely for the instantaneous pleasure of his hearers. The composer works to produce his score. The player works to present it, and the audience might well do a little work in understanding it. Just paying the price of admission is not enough."

VIOLO CONCERTO

Hindemith, whose ballet "St. Francis" was given here a few days ago by the Monte Carlo Ballet Company, will play his viola concerto entitled "Der Schwanendreher" and conduct his "Concert Music" for strings and brass. "Der Schwanendreher" is based on old German folk songs, and derives it stitle from that of one of the tunes employed. ("Der Schwanendreher" means the "swan-cook" or the "swan-turner.") A considerable number of Hindemith's recent works are similarly based on old German folk melodies. "For 11 years I taught composition," he said, "and used these things as subjects for class exercises. Consequently, I had them constantly in mind. Now I've made use of them in my own way and I feel better."

WRITTEN ON COMMISSION

The "Concerto Music" for strings and brass was written on a commission from Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which ~~Hindemith~~ compared the San Francisco Symphony. The technique and discipline of the local orchestra he finds markedly similar to that in Boston, because Pierre Monteux of the San Francisco Symphony built up the Boston organization in the years immediately following the war.

In addition to the Hindemith works, Mr. Monteuz will direct Beethoven's eighth symphony and Eschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" on the program this afternoon and tomorrow night.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

FEB 25 1939

Playing for the second time in its history under a woman conductor, the National Symphony Orchestra will give its concert next Sunday, February 26, under the direction of Nadia Boulanger, world-famous French musician. Mlle. Boulanger will have the last half of the program. Dr. Hans Kindler, conductor of the National Symphony, will be on the podium for the first half, presenting Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

Mlle. Boulanger, who is also conducting the New York Philharmonic and Boston Symphony orchestras this season, will be assisted by a group of vocalists, will present "Poul les Funerailles d'un Soldat," a composition by her sister, Lili Boulanger, who died in 1918 at the age of 25. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat Major is the major symphonic work to be conducted by the French-woman. Also on the program are an Overture by Antoni Szalowski, young Polish composer and pupil of Mlle. Boulanger, and five madrigals by the seventeenth century Italian composer, Monteverdi.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

FEB 26 1939

Repertoire Announced For Berkshire Series

Koussevitzky Will Conduct Six Concerts in August

In the six concerts of the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival, next August in the Music Shed, on the Tanglewood estate at Lenox, Mass., the repertoire from which Serge Koussevitzky will make his choices for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programs will consist mainly, as before, of standard works, including Beethoven's second and third symphonies, Brahms's first and third symphonies, Haydn and Mozart symphonies, Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, Sibelius's second and fifth symphonies, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse" and Wagner excerpts. Walter Piston's Concerto for Orchestra is also scheduled.

The dates are Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, August 3, 5, 6, 10, 11 and 12. The Festival trustees expect to have accomplished improvements such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting and laying out additional roads by the beginning of the series. They also hope to complete projected improvements in the Music Shed itself if sufficient funds are received from contributors within the next few months. Full information about the .939 festival may be obtained at the Be-kshire Symphonic Festival office in Stockbridge, Mass.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

FEB 24 1939

Haydn Symphony Heads Victor List, With Koussevitzky

Stokowski Offers More Stokowski With Variety of February Music

There's some very fine Haydn on Victor's February list and we would mention it again rather than have you pass it up. It's the symphony in B flat, No. 102, and it is surely from the best of the composer.

In Victor Album, M-529, it's played by the Boston Symphony with Koussevitsky in charge. There are indications that it was pressed some time ago for, in some ways, even Mr. Koussevitsky has changed. Given his own or anybody else's orchestra, it's possible that he wouldn't play the opus this way now.

However, there are some fine contrasts, both in tempo and tone, with many of the Haydn touches that demand rehearing to appreciate. At the same time, the emphasis is put where it most certainly doesn't belong here and there—and that's disturbing from such an auspices.

Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra do a little confecting which is important according to the light in which you hear this combination. This time Leopold, who'll be coming back to the old podium next month during Mr. Ormandy's respite from Philadelphia, offers his own arrangement of the Tannhauser Overture and Venusberg Music (Paris Version) with the Prelude to Act Three. There are some who will be enraptured by the Pilgrim's Chorus and will conclude that all the rest is correspondingly good. The recording is, as the blurbist declares, brilliant.

Which reminds us that perhaps we didn't say all that should have been said about another recently issued Stokowski. Handing it out for comment to one who is a Wagner expert, we got this reaction:

In Album M-508, Leopold Stokowski conducts the Philadelphia Orchestra in his own "synthesis" of Tristan and Isolde. It is an orchestral arrangement based on the Prelude, second act Love Music and Love Death. The "perfect Wagnerites" who have heard Mr. Stokowski do this with the Orchestra will need no detailed description of the set; the "imperfect" ones should by all means listen to it. The recording is of the usual high standard.

For the Yehudi Menuhin fans there is the Mendelssohn Concerto in E Minor, a rather exciting performance with the Orchestre des Concerts Colonne, conducted by Georges Enesco, who is conducting in Philadelphia this weekend (M-532).

If you got excited about the movie version of "The Great Waltz," you will want to make that experience permanent in having the records of Miliza Korjus, singing "Tales from the Vienna Woods," "One Way When We Were Young" and "There Will Come a Time"—with orchestra accompaniment by the MGM Orchestra, with our old friend, Toscha Seidel, playing the solos (4410 and 4411).

The Boston Pops is in serious mood this month with "Rachem" of Manna Zucca and "Eili, Eili," with Mr. Fiedler and his men well accounting for themselves in something of a departure (12536).

Richard Crooks sings with what Victor calls "the most perfect voice we know in opera today," the "Il Mio Tesoro," from Don Giovanni, and "Una Furtiva Lagrima" from "L'Elisir d'Amore" (15235).

Chaliapin is still coming back from the grave, this time in "Black Eyes," sung against the choral tapestry of The Aristoff Choir and Balalaika Orchestra, combined with Rubinstein's "The Prisoner" (15236). The modernists will snap up Roy Harris' "Chorale for String Sextette," played by the Kreiner Quartet with an extra violin and 'cello (12537). Bruno Walter will never be in exile as long as Victor brings him out—this time in the Rosamunde Ballet Music of Schubert and the Beethoven Cariolan overture, both played in London, one by the Philharmonic and the other by the Symphony, not according to the RCA literature but according to reliable Mr. Pakenham (12534 and 12535).

Moriz Rosenthal, 75-year-old pianist who still packs a punch, plays two Chopin Mazurkas, D major and B major, and these should be regarded as excellent examples from a celebrated Chopin authority (15236). Fritz Kreisler takes advantage of advances made in recording methods with new versions of "La Gitana" and "Liebesleid" (1950).

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR

FEB 26 1939

* * *

The Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo will start a brief spring season at the New York Metropolitan Opera House on March 13, before sailing for Europe. The ballet, directed by Leonide Massine, has been touring the country since last October. During the engagement in New York, the company will leave for a short time to appear in Cincinnati with the Cincinnati Symphony.

* * *

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will appear at Symphony Hall in Boston on March 13, in a concert sponsored by the Boston Symphony. It will be the first Boston appearance of John Barbirolli, conductor. Artur Schnabel will be soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

On March 14, the orchestra will play at Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford. The Boston concert will be the 3,497th in the 97 years of the orchestra's history.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 25 1939

..Music and Other Notes..

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays its fourth [illegible] of the season on Tuesday evening to the Metropolitan Theatre. The program opens with the first movement of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony, Op. 58 (after Byron's Dramatic Poem). This symphony was played completely in Boston on last November 25 and 26 with Eugene Goosens as guest conductor. It is not listed with Tchaikovsky's symphonies but is considered as program music, or music with a story. It was written in 1885 and first performed in Moscow, the following year. Theodore Thomas conducted the first American performance of it with the New York Philharmonic Society in December, 1886. Its first Boston performance by the Boston Symphony was in April, 1901, under Mr. Gericke and its last, until this season was in 1920.

The four movements of the symphony are titled, 1—Manfred's Wanderings and Despair, 2—The Witch of the Alps, 3—Pastorale, 4—The Palace of Arimanes. Manfred loved a beautiful maiden named Astarte. He is "racked by remorse and despair" at losing the fair lady and the music describes his seeking forgetfulness. One writer of program notes has described Manfred as a sort of nineteenth century Faust (Burk). Occult powers are attributed to Manfred but they are of no avail in his seeking for peace. He forms the background for the tragic music of this movement and his theme, which recurs at intervals, is scored for bassoons and bass clarinet.

Next comes the Prokoffieff "Peter and The Wolf", an Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children, Op. 67. For this utterly absorbing number, Mr. Richard Hale is narrator. Its interpretation is bound to make orchestral history in Providence. There never was anything like it and the line we are waiting to hear, is the one by the duck, "From the middle of the pond".

Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 will close the program. Always, there will arise some surfeited concert-goer to say, "What again" when what he should say is "What luck." Somewhere in the audience is sure to be some listener who has never heard this immortal music and it is doubtless to him that Serge Koussevitsky will be playing the well-loved phrases. To the person who is hearing it for the hundredth time, we say that there are as many variations of color in this music as in a beautiful sunset. Surely we can enjoy one more sunset.

John B. Archer will lecture on the Boston Symphony program at the Providence Public Library Sunday afternoon at four o'clock. The Monday Morning Musical Club sponsors these lectures which are free to the public.

◆◆◆

The Providence Federal Orchestra presents four well-known Rhode Island artists, from as many different communities, in an all-concerto evening Sunday at Hope high school at 8:30. Edouard Caffier will conduct. Earl Hedberg, violinist, represents Pawtucket and his playing of the Nardini Concerto in E minor will be awaited with interest. This number was a feature of his recital last spring and he has also played it in Pawtucket with the orchestra. Mr. Hedberg is a pupil of Sasha Jacobson, first violinist of the Musical Art quartet and at the Chamber Music Festival, presented by this group in Providence in the fall of 1937, Mr. Hedberg played in an augmented string ensemble at the opening concert.

Providence will be represented by Emma Winslow Childs, pianist, who will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor. This melodious composition was heard by Mrs. Childs when she was very young, in a performance by the famous Adele aus der Ohe. It is not often heard although its middle movement contains some of the most beautiful examples of Mendelssohn's melodic beauty.

Barrington sends Gladys Mulcahey, cellist, to play two movements of the seldom heard Lalo Concerto for Cello in D minor. This composition was last played in Providence by Flsa Ruegger, Nov. 15, 1899, with the Boston Symphony under Gericke. Miss Mulcahey is a pupil of Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony and she has been heard many times in solo and ensemble work.

Woonsocket is represented by Alexander Peloquin, pianist, who will play the Fantassy on Hungarian Folktunes by Liszt. Mr. Peloquin has appeared three times previously with the orchestra and has been heard as soloist this season with the Catholic Choral Club. He is a pupil of Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His work will no doubt make a brilliant climax to the program.

JOSEF HOFMANN NEXT SUNDAY

One week from tomorrow, March 5th, in Symphony hall at 3.30, Josef Hofmann will make his only Boston appearance of the season. The great pianist will be heard in the following programme:

Harmonious Blacksmith Variations ..... Handel
Pastorale Capriccio ..... Scarlatti
"Moonlight" Sonata .... Beethoven
Fantaisie Impromptu in C sharp minor, Op. 66 .... Chopin
Valse in A-flat major, Op. 64, No. 3 .... Chopin
Nocturne in B major, Op. 62, No. 1 .... Chopin
Carnaval, Op. 9 .... Schumann
Waldesruchen .... Liszt
Liebestraum in A-flat major .. Liszt
Mephisto Valse .... Liszt

Boston Transcript 2/25/39

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

FEB 26 1939

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE New York Philharmonic-Symphony will appear at Symphony Hall in Boston on March 13, in a concert sponsored by the Boston Symphony. It will be the [illegible] appearance of John Barbirolli, conductor. Arturo Schnabel will be soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

On March 14, the orchestra will play at Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford. The Boston concert will be the 3,497th in the 97 years of the orchestra's history.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Today—Public lecture by Mr. John B. Archer on program of Boston Symphony Orchestra, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, Providence Public Library, 4.
Tomorrow—Play, "Sleeping Beauty," Providence Junior League, Oliver

186

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Four Soloists Appear Tonight in Federal Orchestra Concert

Well-Known Rhode Island Musicians to be Featured in Concertos on Unusual Program.—Boston Symphony Coming Tuesday. Choral Music Among Week's Events

FOUR Rhode Island soloists will be guest artists on an unusual symphony program of concertos by the Providence Federal Orchestra this evening at 8:30 o'clock in Hope high school. The soloists will be Emma Winslow Childs, pianist, of this city; Miss Gladys Mulchahey, 'cellist, of Barrington; Earl Hedberg, Pawtucket violinist, and Alexandre Peloquin, organist and pianist, of Woonsocket. Edouard Caffier will conduct.

Presenting Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," for the first time in this city, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its [redacted] next to the last concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock. Instead of the first movement from Tschaikowski's "Manfred" Symphony originally announced, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has substituted Mozart's Symphony in [illegible]-major, a work of the composer's [illegible]th year, as the opening number. Beethoven's popular Fifth Symphony will close the concert.

A free lecture on the program will be given by John B. Archer in the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 4 o'clock, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Miss Olive Snow will assist with illustrations on the piano.

Concerts of choral music are scheduled for tonight and Wednesday. Tonight the Providence Oratorio Society, William W. DeRoin, conductor, will sing Verdi's "Requiem" in the Elmwood-Christian Congregational Church, at 7:30 o'clock. Wednesday night, in Plantations Auditorium, at 8:15 o'clock, the Catholic Choral Club will present Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" under the direction of Fr. Leo Rowlands.

On the following evening the Brown-Pembroke Orchestra, Prof. Arlan R. Coolidge, director, will appear in the second of its season's series in Faunce House Theatre. Miss Muriel P. Port, '40, pianist, will be soloist.

BALOKOVIC SYMPHONY SOLOIST THIS WEEK

Zlatko Balokovic, the violinist from Jugoslavia, will make his first appearance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at the eighteenth pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances this coming week. Serge Koussevvitzky will then present for the first time in Boston the Violin Concerto of John Alden Carpenter. Carpenter's Concerto had its first performance in Chicago in 1937, when Mr. Balokovic was also soloist. There have been performances in other western cities. Zlatko Balokovic, completing his preparation under Sevcik in Vienna, has made many tours of Europe. His first American appearances were in the season 1925-26.

Dr. Koussevitzky will perform Richard Straus' "Symphonic Domestica" as the closing number. The programme will open with "Catalonia," by Albeniz, a movement of a projected but never completed suite based on popular tunes.

Lowell
Telegram
Feb 26/39

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

FEB 25 1939

Woman to Conduct Phila. Orchestra In Programs Mar. 10-11

Nadia Boulanger, French Composer, to Make History; Caston Aids

Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French composer, conductor and teacher who is now visiting this country, will achieve the distinction of being the only woman who has ever directed the Philadelphia Orchestra.

At the concerts of March 10-11, Mlle. Boulanger will share the podium with Saul Caston, associate conductor of the Orchestra. Mr. Caston will conduct the first half of the program.

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct four numbers in all. One will be a Piano Concerto by Jean Francaix, with the composer as soloist. This brilliant twenty-six year old French composer made his debut with the work at a concert given under the auspices of the Philharmonic-Symphony League in Carnegie Hall, New York on Feb. 11, with Mlle. Boulanger conducting.

Assisting also in Mlle. Boulanger's portion of the program will be the Monteverdi singers, a group of five artists who have accompanied her from France. The singers have been associated with Mlle. Boulanger in Paris and have given concerts of choral music specializing in little known works of old composers, and first performances of young composers.

Their numbers will be announced at a later date. The orchestral selection will be an overture by A. Szalowski.

Nadia Boulanger comes of a musical family. Her father and her grandfather had been professors at the Paris Conservatoire. Her mother was a Russian, Princess Mischetsky, who studied at the Conservatoire with Nadia's father, Ernest Boulanger.

Nadia was born in Paris, entered the Conservatoire, and was a classmate of Enesco, Ravel, Roger-Ducasse, Florent Schmitt and Louis Aubert. She took many prizes, and in 1908, as a pupil of Widor, won the Deuxieme Grand Prix de Rome.

For almost twenty years she has taught at the Fontainbleu School of Music. She is head of the Composition Department at the Ecole Normale de Musique and she teaches privately.

Nadia Boulanger made her first appearance in New York in 1924-1925 at a concert of the Symphony Society directed by Walter Damrosch. At that time she was soloist, playing an organ concerto of Handel's.

Last year, she conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first [redacted] ever to do so. This season she adds both the New York Philharmonic Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra to the American organizations that have broken precedent to accept her as a conductor.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

FEB 27 1939

Mr. and Mrs. Clayton H. Prouty and son, William Carl, of St. George Street attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Boston Saturday evening.

WOOSTER, OHIO
OHIO RECORD

FEB 27 1939

MAGNIFICENT 'CELLO PIATIGORSKY PLAYS IS GIFT OF FRIEND

PIATIGORSKY

This is the story of a sick 'cello and a kind man, the story of how Gregor Piatigorsky acquired the glorious old Montagnana violoncello which he will play when he appears in the college chapel tomorrow evening under the auspices of the Wooster Federation of Music.

In the autumn of 1934 the 'cellist was making an extensive tour of the British Isles. One day, while walking down a London street, he suddenly met a friend from Boston. Piatigorsky accepted an invitation to dine that night. The 'cellist's thoughts seemed far away. Finally his host said: "What is troubling you? I can see you are worried." "To tell the truth," Piatigorsky answered, "it's my 'cello. It's sick. I don't know what to do with it. Something is always going wrong with it."

Next morning Piatigorsky had a telephone call. His friend was leaving for America in the afternoon. One thing he wanted to see before sailing was the best collection of old musical instruments.

They went to the house of W. E. Hill and Sons, internationally famous dealers. There they admired the Stradivarii and the Guarnerii and other priceless instruments. Finally the Bostonian turned to Alfred Hill and asked: "Have you any good 'celli?"

"Yes," answered Hill, "I not only have a good 'cello here but a magnificent one, one of the great 'celli of the world. It's been buried on the country estate of one of our old families for 70 years and now it's on the market. I wish you'd try it."

He brought out a Montagnana, 1739, a wonderful old instrument with a luminous golden brown surface, one of the finest works of the time. He handed Piatigorsky a bow.

Piatigorsky tentatively drew the bow over the strings. The tone was ravishing. He tried a few scales, a chord or two, a passage from a favorite work. Soon he was playing away in earnest.

A half hour passed. He was hardly aware that there was one moment when his friend patted him affectionately on the back, whispered "It's yours," and left the room with Hill. When Piatigorsky stopped playing hours, literally, had passed. He suddenly realized that he had been alone for a long, long time. He looked around, called. The proprietor came back. "Your friend is gone," he said. "He had to catch the boat train. But he has left the 'cello for you as a gift."

Piatigorsky insists on telling his name. "I am too grateful to allow him to remain anonymous," he said. "He is the treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest [redacted]iatigorsky had played in Boston in 1931, 1932, 1933, and Piatigo[illegible] tagnana to America on Jan. 31, 1935, when he appeared with Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. In addition to a famous instrument, Piatigorsky has also a remarkable collection of bows which now number seventeen.

To bring to Wooster for the 1939-40 concert season numbers of this calibre, the Wooster Federation of Music will make its annual canvass for memberships March 6 to 11.

No memberships will be sold locally after the closing date, according to John D. McKee, federation president.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

FEB 27 1939

Large Crowd Greets Civic 'Fun Night'

By A. J. WARNER

Classics Acknowledged

The classics were gracefully acknowledged by the playing of the Finale from Haydn's "Farewell" symphony, Mr. White having hurriedly donned wig and coat of brocade, thus suggesting the "concert extraordinaire" which the Boston Symphony gave a few weeks ago in New York when Mr. Koussevitzky appeared superbly costumed in the character of Haydn conducting the whole of the "Farewell" symphony. It was the Finale that perpetuated the composer's famous joke, made when he wrote the symphony and had it performed at the court of Prince Esterhazy in the year 1772 or 1773. During the last movement —which was heard last evening— the players, one by one and two by two, rise silently, blow out the candles which are attached to their

---

NEW CASTLE, IND.
COURIER - TIMES

FEB 27 1939

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will appear at Symphony Hall in Boston on March 13, in a concert sponsored by the Boston Symphony. It will be the first Boston appearance of John Barbirolli, conductor. Artur Schnabel will be soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

On March 14, the orchestra will play at Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford. The Boston concert will be the 3,497th in the 97 years of the orchestra's history.

Further Comment on the Ravel "Revue Musicale" Memorial

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Disregarding the risk that any account of so bulky and varied a testimonial as the special issue of the Revue Musicale on Ravel is apt to sound incoherent, we must venture to mention a few other points in it that space did not allow for last week. When such an issue depends on some hundred contributors the result is likely to be uneven. Important articles will lie side by side with merely polite "temoignages"; ideas will be repeated and other judgments, that could have been made the subject of some discussion, will be passed over in the shuffle.

For example, we could certainly have done with an authoritative survey of Ravel's achievement as an orchestrator, a field in which he was enormously significant. H. Gil-Marchex takes a very interesting glance at the Concertos of Ravel, and Arthur Hoeree at less length a similar view of the songs. The biographical material, a good deal of which must be entirely new to the general public, will doubtless be some time collected in a definitive life of the composer.

One point that comes up for examination in this issue by two eminent men is the question of the influence exerted on Ravel by Debussy. Both Emile Vuillermoz and Arthur Honegger have written on it and arrived at pretty much the same conclusions. Ravel arrived on the active scene just when the Debussyian revolution was exercising its greatest effect. M. Vuillermoz continues: "He admired Debussy, he shared his faith and his ambitions. It was he who made not only the reduction for piano (four hands) of the Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun but also the transcription (2 pianos) of the Nocturnes. He also used the whole-tone scale, juggled with ninths, muffled the trumpets and divided the string quartet. He also made an effort to give the declamation a more French twist. He wanted melody to approach closer to the normal curves of our speech, instead of prolonging arbitrarily the too vigorous arabesques of Italian or German lyricism. He made something out of racial qualities in art and gloried in his classical heredity. And, while Debussy wrote his Hommage to Rameau, he created the Tombeau de Couperin. Nothing further need be said in order that superficial observers may at once perceive in the younger a disciple of the elder."

M. Vuillermoz then goes on to point out the confusion that this easy conclusion has brought about and to show that the differences between the two artists are as important as the parallels. M. Honegger sums up the former a little more concisely than M. Vuillermoz, and we may turn to him for guidance. He finds in Debussy's imitators, not necessarily in Debussy himself, "too much softness, too languishing a rhythm, an excess of indecisive form." He observes that what was an inner necessity in Debussy's own case, as in Chopin's, became a procedure with his followers. In this sense Ravel opened a reaction, which was completed by Stravinsky and, M. Honegger might have added, by Prokofieff.

"It is easy to see nowadays," M. Honegger goes on to say, "in what way Ravel is opposed to Debussy and what are his principal aesthetic preoccupations. Form, with Ravel, is cleanly classical. (Illustrations are then given.) Finally, he passes with a mastery of instrumental style from counterpoint to accompanied melody in order to realize that synthesis of modern style where Mozart excelled. There are also a precision in the general aspect of his music, a cleanness of line, a rhythmic accentuation, a slightly dry conciseness of language, in spite of a lyricism sometimes hardly restrained, which are characteristic of the composer of 'Daphnis.'" To these M. Vuillermoz adds the agreeable observation: "Orchestration is, in fact, for Ravel a sort of forest of Broceliande where each tree emprisons a fairy spirit."

A couple of generalizations, in conclusion, will have to polish off this review of an unusually interesting publication. Romain Rolland's comment may be quoted in French, for his meaning is not easily and cannot exactly be rendered into English: "Ce qu'il exprime en musique me touche rarement. Mais son expression est d'une justesse, d'une finesse et d'un eclat insurpassables. Toute musique, aupres de la sienne, semble imparfaite. Il est un maitre du coloris et du dessin."

Edouard Herriot's contribution also sounds better in French and can readily be understood as it stands: "Son oeuvre est une protestation contre le pathos, le jargon, contre tout ce qui nous encombre, contre le puffisme, le pharisiasme et toutes les choses en isme. Un metal net et clair. Ou mieux, une source dans un paysage de chez nous . . ." In spite of the touch of complacency about these opinions, there is a truth in them that does help us to appreciate the art of Maurice Ravel.

186

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1939

Four Soloists Appear Tonight in Federal Orchestra Concert

Well-Known Rhode Island Musicians to be Featured in Concertos on Unusual Program.—Boston Symphony Coming Tuesday. Choral Music Among Week's Events

FOUR Rhode Island soloists will be guest artists on an unusual symphony program of concertos by the Providence Federal Orchestra this evening at 8:30 o'clock in Hope high school. The soloists will be Emma Winslow Childs, pianist, of this city; Miss Gladys Mulchahey, 'cellist, of Barrington; Earl Hedberg, Pawtucket violinist, and Alexandre Peloquin, organist and pianist, of Woonsocket. Edouard Caffier will conduct.

Presenting Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," for the first time in this city, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its ~~fourth and~~ next to the last concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock. Instead of the first movement from Tschaikowski's "Manfred" Symphony originally announced, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has substituted Mozart's Symphony in -major, a work of the composer's th year, as the opening number. Beethoven's popular Fifth Symphony will close the concert.

A free lecture on the program will be given by John B. Archer in the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 4 o'clock, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Miss Olive Snow will assist with illustrations on the piano.

Concerts of choral music are scheduled for tonight and Wednesday. Tonight the Providence Oratorio Society, William W. DeRoin, conductor, will sing Verdi's "Requiem" in the Elmwood-Christian Congregational Church, at 7:30 o'clock. Wednesday night, in Plantations Auditorium, at 8:15 o'clock, the Catholic Choral Club will present Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" under the direction of Fr. Leo Rowlands.

On the following evening the Brown-Pembroke Orchestra, Prof. Arlan R. Coolidge, director, will appear in the second of its season's series in Faunce House Theatre. Miss Muriel P. Port, '40, pianist, will be soloist.

Lowell Telegram
Feb 26/39

BALOKOVIC SYMPHONY SOLOIST THIS WEEK

Zlatko Balokovic, the violinist from Yugoslavia, will make his first appearance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at the eighteenth pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances this coming week. Serge Koussevvitzky will then present for the first time in Boston the Violin Concerto of John Alden Carpenter. Carpenter's Concerto had its first performance in Chicago in 1937, when Mr. Balokovic was also soloist. There have been performances in other western cities. Zlatko Balokovic, completing his preparation under Sevcik in Vienna, has made many tours of Europe. His first American appearances were in the season 1925-26.

Dr. Koussevitzky will perform Richard Straus' "Symphonic Domestica" as the closing number. The programme will open with "Catalonia," by Albeniz, a movement of a projected but never completed suits based on popular tunes.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

FEB 25 1939

Woman to Conduct Phila. Orchestra In Programs Mar. 10-11

Nadia Boulanger, French Composer, to Make History; Caston Aids

Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French composer, conductor and teacher who is now visiting this country, will achieve the distinction of being the only woman who has ever directed the Philadelphia Orchestra.

At the concerts of March 10-11, Mlle. Boulanger will share the podium with Saul Caston, associate conductor of the Orchestra. Mr. Caston will conduct the first half of the program.

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct four numbers in all. One will be a Piano Concerto by Jean Francaix, with the composer as soloist. This brilliant twenty-six year old French composer made his debut with the work at a concert given under the auspices of the Philharmonic-Symphony League in Carnegie Hall, New York on Feb. 11, with Mlle. Boulanger conducting.

Assisting also in Mlle. Boulanger's portion of the program will be the Monteverdi singers, a group of five artists who have accompanied her from France. The singers have been associated with Mlle. Boulanger in Paris and have given concerts of choral music specializing in little known works of old composers, and first performances of young composers.

Their numbers will be announced at a later date. The orchestral selection will be an overture by A. Szalowski.

Nadia Boulanger comes of a musical family. Her father and her grandfather had been professors at the Paris Conservatoire. Her mother was a Russian, Princess Mischetsky, who studied at the Conservatoire with Nadia's father, Ernest Boulanger.

Nadia was born in Paris, entered the Conservatoire, and was a classmate of Enesco, Ravel, Roger-Ducasse, Florent Schmitt and Louis Aubert. She took many prizes, and in 1908, as a pupil of Widor, won the Deuxieme Grand Prix de Rome.

For almost twenty years she has taught at the Fontainbleu School of Music. She is head of the Composition Department at the Ecole Normale de Musique and she teaches privately.

Nadia Boulanger made her first appearance in New York in 1924-1925 at a concert of the Symphony Society directed by Walter Damrosch. At that time she was soloist, playing an organ concerto of Handel's.

Last year, she conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first ~~woman~~ ever to do so. This season she adds both the New York Philharmonic Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra to the American organizations that have broken precedent to accept her as a conductor.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

FEB 27 1939

Mr. and Mrs. Clayton H. Prouty and son, William Carl, of St. George Street attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Boston Saturday evening.

WOOSTER, OHIO
OHIO RECORD

FEB 27 1939

MAGNIFICENT 'CELLO PIATIGORSKY PLAYS IS GIFT OF FRIEND

PIATIGORSKY

This is the story of a sick 'cello and a kind man, the story of how Gregor Piatigorsky acquired the glorious old Montagnana violoncello which he will play when he appears in the college chapel tomorrow evening under the auspices of the Wooster Federation of Music.

In the autumn of 1934 the 'cellist was making an extensive tour of the British Isles. One day, while walking down a London street, he suddenly met a friend from Boston. Piatigorsky accepted an invitation to dine that night. The 'cellist's thoughts seemed far away. Finally his host said: "What is troubling you? I can see you are worried." "To tell the truth," Piatigorsky answered, "it's my 'cello. It's sick. I don't know what to do with it. Something is always going wrong with it."

Next morning Piatigorsky had a telephone call. His friend was leaving for America in the afternoon. One thing he wanted to see before sailing was the best collection of old musical instruments.

They went to the house of W. E. Hill and Sons, internationally famous dealers. There they admired the Stradivarii and the Guarnerii and other priceless instruments. Finally the Bostonian turned to Alfred Hill and asked: "Have you any good 'celli?"

"Yes," answered Hill, "I not only have a good 'cello here but a magnificent one, one of the great 'celli of the world. It's been buried on the country estate of one of our old families for 70 years and now it's on the market. I wish you'd try it."

He brought out a Montagnana, 1739, a wonderful old instrument with a luminous golden brown surface, one of the finest works of the time. He handed Piatigorsky a bow.

Piatigorsky tentatively drew the bow over the strings. The tone was ravishing. He tried a few scales, a chord or two, a passage from a favorite work. Soon he was playing away in earnest.

A half hour passed. He was hardly aware that there was one moment when his friend patted him affectionately on the back, whispered "It's yours," and left the room with Hill. When Piatigorsky stopped playing hours, literally, had passed. He suddenly realized that he had been alone for a long, long time. He looked around, called. The proprietor came back. "Your friend is gone," he said. "He had to catch the boat train. But he has left the 'cello for you as a gift."

Piatigorsky insists on telling his name. "I am too grateful to allow him to remain anonymous," he said. "He is the treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest ~~B. Dane.~~ Piatigorsky had played in Boston in 1931, 1932, 1933, and 1934.

Piatigorsky introduced his Montagnana to America on Jan. 31, 1935, when he appeared with Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. In addition to a famous instrument, Piatigorsky has also a remarkable collection of bows which now number seventeen.

To bring to Wooster for the 1939-40 concert season numbers of this calibre, the Wooster Federation of Music will make its annual canvass for memberships March 6 to 11.

No memberships will be sold locally after the closing date, according to John D. McKee, federation president.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

FEB 27 1939

Large Crowd Greets Civic 'Fun Night'

By A. J. WARNER

Classics Acknowledged

The classics were gracefully acknowledged by the playing of the Finale from Haydn's "Farewell" symphony, Mr. White having hurriedly donned wig and coat of brocade, thus suggesting the "concert extraordinaire" which the Boston Symphony gave a few weeks ago in New York when Mr. Koussevitzky appeared superbly costumed in the character of Haydn conducting the whole of the "Farewell" symphony. It was the Finale that perpetuated the composer's famous joke, made when he wrote the symphony and had it performed at the court of Prince Esterhazy in the year 1772 or 1773. During the last movement—which was heard last evening—the players, one by one and two by two, rise silently, blow out the candles which are attached to their

---

NEW CASTLE, IND.
COURIER - TIMES

FEB 27 1939

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will appear at Symphony Hall in Boston on March 13, in a concert sponsored by the Boston Symphony. It will be the first Boston appearance of John Barbirolli, conductor. Artur Schnabel will be soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

On March 14, the orchestra will play at Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford. The Boston concert will be the 3,497th in the 97 years of the orchestra's history.

Further Comment on the Ravel "Revue Musicale" Memorial

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Disregarding the risk that any account of so bulky and varied a testimonial as the special issue of the Revue Musicale on Ravel is apt to sound incoherent, we must venture to mention a few other points in it that space did not allow for last week. When such an issue depends on some hundred contributors the result is likely to be uneven. Important articles will lie side by side with merely polite "temoignages"; ideas will be repeated and other judgments, that could have been made the subject of some discussion, will be passed over in the shuffle.

For example, we could certainly have done with an authoritative survey of Ravel's achievement as an orchestrator, a field in which he was enormously significant. H. Gil-Marchex takes a very interesting glance at the Concertos of Ravel, and Arthur Hoeree at less length a similar view of the songs. The biographical material, a good deal of which must be entirely new to the general public, will doubtless be some time collected in a definitive life of the composer.

One point that comes up for examination in this issue by two eminent men is the question of the influence exerted on Ravel by Debussy. Both Emile Vuillermoz and Arthur Honegger have written on it and arrived at pretty much the same conclusions. Ravel arrived on the active scene just when the Debussyian revolution was exercising its greatest effect. M. Vuillermoz continues: "He admired Debussy, he shared his faith and his ambitions. It was he who made not only the reduction for piano (four hands) of the Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun but also the transcription (2 pianos) of the Nocturnes. He also used the whole-tone scale, juggled with ninths, muffled the trumpets and divided the string quartet. He also made an effort to give the declamation a more French twist. He wanted melody to approach closer to the normal curves of our speech, instead of prolonging arbitrarily the too vigorous arabesques of Italian or German lyricism. He made something out of racial qualities in art and gloried in his classical heredity. And, while Debussy wrote his Hommage to Rameau, he created the Tombeau de Couperin. Nothing further need be said in order that superficial observers may at once perceive in the younger a disciple of the elder."

M. Vuillermoz then goes on to point out the confusion that this easy conclusion has brought about and to show that the differences between the two artists are as important as the parallels. M. Honegger sums up the former a little more concisely than M. Vuillermoz, and we may turn to him for guidance. He finds in Debussy's imitators, not necessarily in Debussy himself, "too much softness, too languishing a rhythm, an excess of indecisive form." He observes that what was an inner necessity in Debussy's own case, as in Chopin's, became a procedure with his followers. In this sense Ravel opened a reaction, which was completed by Stravinsky and, M. Honegger might have added, by Prokofieff.

"It is easy to see nowadays," M. Honegger goes on to say, "in what way Ravel is opposed to Debussy and what are his principal aesthetic preoccupations. Form, with Ravel, is cleanly classical. (Illustrations are then given.) Finally, he passes with a mastery of instrumental style from counterpoint to accompanied melody in order to realize that synthesis of modern style where Mozart excelled. There are also a precision in the general aspect of his music, a cleanness of line, a rhythmic accentuation, a slightly dry conciseness of language, in spite of a lyricism sometimes hardly restrained, which are characteristic of the composer of 'Daphnis.'" To these M. Vuillermoz adds the agreeable observation: "Orchestration is, in fact, for Ravel a sort of forest of Broceliande where each tree emprisons a fairy spirit."

A couple of generalizations, in conclusion, will have to polish off this review of an unusually interesting publication. Romain Rolland's comment may be quoted in French, for his meaning be rendered into English: "Ce ouche rarement. Mais son ex-

la sienne, semble imparfaite. Il est un maitre du coloris et du dessin."

Edouard Herriot's contribution also sounds better in French and can readily be understood as it stands: "Son oeuvre est une protestation contre le pathos, le jargon, contre tout ce qui nous encombre, contre le puffisme, le pharisiasme et toutes les choses en isme. Un metal net et clair. Ou mieux, une source dans un paysage de chez nous . . ." In spite of the touch of complacency about these opinions, there is a truth in them that does help us to appreciate the art of Maurice Ravel.

was a veritable storm of applause from the entire house. If any part of the concerto were more entrancing than any other, it was the slow movement which had a wooing charm that brought out all of its beauty. Mr. Barbirolli gave a well-considered performance of the Berlioz and a good if not startling one of the Tchaikovsky.

D.

Koussevitzky and His Bostonians Give Bruckner's Eighth

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Feb. 10, evening:

Symphony, No. 8, in C Minor......Bruckner
'Pictures at an Exhibition'......Mussorgsky
(arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel)

That the name of Bruckner is synonymous with boredom in the minds of most habitués of orchestra concerts in New York is now axiomatic, and so the advance announcement of this program caused dire forebodings on the part of the Bostonians' local public. But so triumphantly did Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates emerge from an act of obeisance of exceptional mental, emotional and physical strain, transforming it into a great, illuminating musical experience for everyone concerned, that the doughty conductor automatically assumed the position of High Priest of Brucknerism in the estimation of his audience and those who had come to groan remained to cheer.

Even with the cuts adopted the work consumed more than an hour in performance, but the Boston conductor had so searchingly penetrated and so completely assimilated its elements and had gained so commanding a perspective of their significance that the traditional Bruckner loose-jointedness in form was not at any time permitted to obtrude itself. From beginning to end the material was held in hand with a taut structural compactness that at the same time did not exclude the plasticity demanded by the essential nature of the music. The Scherzo, indeed, was made to sound almost Beethovenish in its straightforward clarity of design. The extended Adagio, with, as the program annotator pointed out, three separate developments of its two themes, created a mood of other-worldly beauty, while in the coda of the final movement, where the composer gathers up the main themes of all four movements in a culminating peroration in the major, the emotional impact was almost overwhelming.

As for the Mussorgsky 'Pictures at an Exhibition', the gorgeously colored Ravel orchestration once more justified the appropriating of a mainstay of the pianist's Russian repertoire to make a symphonic group's holiday. The various moods and situations and scenic bits suggested by the Hartmann pictures were made potently vivid in a projection of the work characterized by an extraordinarily wide range of orchestral sonorities, reaching a climax in the massive and opulent tonal proportions of 'The Great Gate at Kiev'. The audience was roused to almost as great a pitch of enthusiasm as it had been by the performance of the Bruckner symphony.

C.

Boston Symphony Plays Bloch and Hindemith Works

Boston Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Soloist, Jean Bedetti, 'cellist. Carnegie Hall, Feb. 11, afternoon:

Symphony in A (Koechel 201)..........Mozart
Symphonic Dances ....Hindemith
'Schelomo' ....Bloch
Mr. Bedetti
'Pictures at an Exhibition'
Mussorgsky-Ravel

This concert provided for at least one listener one of those rare musical experiences that come all too seldom in the concert hall. The afternoon was one of superlative playing, profound insight into stylistic differences, and realization of musical beauty. The Mozart was a gem of orchestral vitality within a frame of exquisite refinement, and the famous Boston strings shone with incomparable lustre. The Hindemith works, repeated from an earlier program, left no doubt of the desirability of hearing them again, for they revealed substance and integrity of musical thought that carried conviction by themselves, although the performance accorded them was justification enough for their presence, so searching and compelling was it.

Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody is as effective today as it ever was, music of such individual stamp in feeling and subtlety of orchestration that it cannot miss identification. Mr. Bedetti brought sensitivity and sweep to the 'cello threnody, and the orchestra soared, wailed and philosophized over, around and through the warm thread of 'cello melody with the passionate fervor which the score implies. Mr. Bloch was present in the audience and received genuine tribute along with the performers. The Mussorgsky-Ravel suite, a well-known tour de force of Mr. Koussevitzky's closed the red-letter afternoon.

Q.

New Bedford Mercury - Feb. 22/39

GRACE NOTES .... By A. C. R.

Local Musicians Hear Myra Hess

Tuesday Matinee of Boston Symphony Repeats 'Peter And the Wolf'

The fourth in the Monday evening—Tuesday afternoon paired programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was enjoyed yesterday at the "Commuters' Matinee' in Symphony Hall. We delighted ones from New Bedford, South Dartmouth and Fall River were a party of five—two well-trained pianists, a very young lad who is doing well at his Bach and this reviewer, whose pleasure and musical duty it has been for two seasons to make known the possibilities for out-of-towners in these sets of six extra Symphony concerts. (The audience seems to increase at each visit).

Though the day had closed down dull and raw, sunshine gleamed and glinted in Symphony Hall. What an art is Music, that with one brief movement, the Allegro moderato of Mozart's Symphony in A major (Koechel no. 201), it can remake a day. And how Dr. Koussevitzky illumined by gesture the artlessly sparkling themes of the 18-year-old Wolfgang Amadeus!

Two of us were hearing for a second time in three weeks, with increased delight, the enchanting foolery of a contemporary Russian Mozart. The others were eagerly anticipating Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Op 67. For front section seats or second balcony, Richard Hale ,the Narrator, plys his combined accomplishments of actor and baritone with marvellous clarity of enunciation, a feeling for pace and measure precisely timed with the musical portions and a sense of dramatic effect that pictures and fixes attention by a comic stress of great import mock-seriously communicated. Mr. Hale has a versatile talent which he focuses intensively on the problem of the moment. Recall the macabre flavor of his banjo-playing farmhand in Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs."

So we saw Peter sally out into "the great green meadow" to his jaunty, fascinating little theme in the strings which sends a hum of chuckles through the audience every time it starts up for a fresh adventure of the resourceful boy. We heard the twitter of the flute as the bird; the awkward duck of the oboe; the crafty cat of the clarinet; the wolf of the three horns emerging from the richly orchestrated dark forest; the charming counterpoint of these leitmotifs as associations shifted; the change in her rhythm as the cat crept after the bird—it is a gay world we live in, after all!

That distinguished modern Saint Cecilia, Miss Myra Hess of the constant angel sleeves (in this instance flowing black chiffon glistening discreetly with cut steel bands) came on for the Schumann piano concerto to such a prolongued greeting as is the due of a great lady of the keyboard. The balance in the conception of the concerto was admirably coordinated by soloist and orchestra—theme given and theme taken to poetic enhancement as piano or supporting players assumed it in turn. Miss Hess to pearls added occassional diamonds in tone color and all kept the beauty and dignity of the essential Schumann in full luster.

"La Valse," Ravel's choreographic poem, had been a discussed disagreement when two of us heard it in the recent Pension Fund concert. Both have now grown up to its magnificence, its fierce breath of things harsh blotting out waltz memories once romantic and fair; may detect the eerie breeze of death that blows across the string sections, stir to the crash of a world gone mad. Here we were guided by the concept left by H. T. P., one of his most brilliant interpretations, and acknowledge helpfully assembled choice of intentions in the valuable program notes of John N. Burk.

All of which proves that two hearings repay in added understanding.

A. C. R.

Anonomously comes this marked paragraph from "Murder in the Music-Room," a magazine article by Samuel Chotzinoff: "I hate absolutely the ban on applause at the end of a movement of a symphony and the shushing that assaults the poor wretch who dares to clap his hands in appreciation. Why, Beethoven would have been outraged if people hadn't applauded the movements of his symphonies and even demanded repetitions!"

Now, as among his ridiculously assembled list of dislikes, Mr. Chotzinoff includes the music of Mahler and Hindemith which we personally enjoy, this opinion does not sway our sense of concert behavior. It is the inexperienced concert goer who puts palms together at every pause (sometimes in the middle of a movement). The accepted rule: "applaud the movements of a concerto; not of a symphony, a sonata nor a suite," has reason behind it.

It was probably a recently printed phrase, "The Toscanini back remained firm," that incited the enclosure. When Hans Kindler conducted the National Symphony of Washington here last season, he politely bowed to all interruptions. This season, he adopted a cautious position of poised baton, fearing those untrained poundings.

If Dr. Koussevitzky should be called from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Apollo forbid, here is a vote for Georges Enesco, Roumanian violinist, composer and conductor, whose musicianship and modesty endear him to players, audience and reviewers alike. At the Commuters' matinee for January, one of his five guest appearances, it was sunshine, as always when one meets her, to have a passing word with Bernice Fisher Butler (Mrs. Morgan Butler) of Dedham and Salters Point. She was paying for a ticket at the box office, her petite prettiness set off by a small toque smashed out of sight in front with two huge pink velvet roses. As she has been thought of as a Friday subscriber, the pink roses seated almost over the stage at the extreme end of the first balcony betokened another devotee come a second time to pay tribute to the guest conductor.

Martha Broughton at that same concert came back after intermission radiant over a meeting with Enesco through Sanroma, her teacher, who had been at the piano for tricky work in the Gypsy music of Lipatti, the conductor's young compatriot. Waiving compliment, Enesco talked graciously of his early memories of Brahms.

GAZETTE

Hightstown N J

FEB 23 1939

WORDS WITHOUT MUSIC

By LOUIS REID

(Music Features & Photo Syndicate, N. Y.)

THE mecca of musical sightseers of Gotham at present is the weekly Saturday night concert of Arturo Toscanini and his NBC Symphony Orchestra . . . No musical figure of our times, operating in the more rarified areas and arias of music, is given such zealous, such almost incredible devotion. Even football fans are less enthusiastic in their hero-worship than the music lovers who weekly pay tribute to the maestro.

Louis Reid

Hero Worship

Of course, there is no question of Toscanini's art of interpretation. . . . But watching and hearing his frenzied followers in action we wonder if the maestro is not at times resentful of the emphasis upon interpretation and the apparent subordination of the music's creators. . . . Has the idolization reached a point where the Toscanini fan is unable to see the forest for the trees? . . . Toscanini brings matchless skill to his understanding of Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner and the lesser composers of the Italian school, but long before Toscanini perfected his art and long after he has gone, the great creators stood and will stand supreme.

Only 50 Great Masters

We are too often prone to forget that all the great music of the world was and is being written by a small group of men. The masters themselves do not number over fifty. . . . Even in the popular field creation is confined, at least in America, according to the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, to some 125 persons. . . . In all the world there are not more than 1,000 men and women who are creating music that regularly gets a hearing. . . . But the interpreters of music are countless. Maestri and the musicians they lead number in the hundreds of thousands.

◆

Of classical maestri, no one is regarded today in a class with the venerable Italian. . . . And it was a master stroke of enterprise that NBC lured him from his comparative retirement in his native Italy to conduct a truly notable corral of musicians in an endeavor to build up and maintain radio's cultural traditions. . . . The man's energy is truly amazing. . . . Though he is in his seventies, he wields a baton, drives his musicians with a force that would send many an athlete panting to the showers.

Gets Down To Business

The men take their places on a semi-circular stage in Radio City's largest auditorium at about two minutes before the zero hour. . . . A bit of tuning-up, and Toscanini walks briskly from the wings, bows quite as briskly, though never brusquely, to his applauding audience, wheels around, lifts his baton —and the concert is on. . . . You note his white hair, his thin, nervous figure . . . You note, too, that he does not read from score. . . . He has memorized the music. . . . There are no lights on the music racks, the lighting for the musicians coming from powerful incandescents in the lofty ceiling. . . . The auditorium is dimmed. . . . A faint glow issues from a control room, indicating that an announcer is on the job for the invisible audience, but the spectators present do not hear his remarks.

Including an intermission, the program lasts an hour and a half. . . . At the end there is clamorous applause. . . . The audience, still under the spell of great music, superbly interpreted, is not in a hurry to reach the elevators. . . . It is discussing animatedly the playing of this symphony or that tone poem, and Toscanini's vitality. . . . Here and there one detects an approving voice of the maestro's plan of giving hearings to America's young and altogether too obscure composers.

Lamar Stringfield, A.S.C.A.P. (American composer and conductor)

Hearing for Americans

American composers are also getting respectful hearing in other quarters. The Boston Symphony has made a place on its programs for a rhapsody called "El Salon Mexico," by Aaron Copland. The work is the result of a visit to Mexico City by the composer and is based on Mexican tunes heard in the cafes. Sir Adrian Boult, English conductor, directed a radio performance of the piece here last season.

MUSICAL AMERICA for February 25, 1939

was a veritable storm of applause from the entire house. If any part of the concerto were more entrancing than any other, it was the slow movement which had a wooing charm that brought out all of its beauty. Mr. Barbirolli gave a well-considered performance of the Berlioz and a good if not startling one of the Tchaikovsky.

D.

Koussevitzky and His Bostonians Give Bruckner's Eighth

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Carnegie Hall, Feb. 10, evening:

Symphony, No. 8, in C Minor......Bruckner
'Pictures at an Exhibition'.....Mussorgsky
(arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel)

That the name of Bruckner is synonymous with boredom in the minds of most habitués of orchestra concerts in New York is now axiomatic, and so the advance announcement of this program caused dire forebodings on the part of the Bostonians' local public. But so triumphantly did Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates emerge from an act of obeisance of exceptional mental, emotional and physical strain, transforming it into a great, illuminating musical experience for everyone concerned, that the doughty conductor automatically assumed the position of High Priest of Brucknerism in the estimation of his audience and those who had come to groan remained to cheer.

Even with the cuts adopted the work consumed more than an hour in performance, but the Boston conductor had so searchingly penetrated and so completely assimilated its elements and had gained so commanding a perspective of their significance that the traditional Bruckner loose-jointedness in form was not at any time permitted to obtrude itself. From beginning to end the material was held in hand with a taut structural compactness that at the same time did not exclude the plasticity demanded by the essential nature of the music. The Scherzo, indeed, was made to sound almost Beethovenish in its straightforward clarity of design. The extended Adagio, with, as the program annotator pointed out, three separate developments of its two themes, created a mood of other-worldly beauty, while in the coda of the final movement, where the composer gathers up the main themes of all four movements in a culminating peroration in the major, the emotional impact was almost overwhelming.

As for the Mussorgsky 'Pictures at an Exhibition', the gorgeously colored Ravel orchestration once more justified the appropriating of a mainstay of the pianist's Russian repertoire to make a symphonic group's holiday. The various moods and situations and scenic bits suggested by the Hartmann pictures were made potently vivid in a projection of the work characterized by an extraordinarily wide range of orchestral sonorities, reaching a climax in the massive and opulent tonal proportions of 'The Great Gate at Kiev'. The audience was roused to almost as great a pitch of enthusiasm as it had been by the performance of the Bruckner symphony.

C.

Boston Symphony Plays Bloch and Hindemith Works

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Soloist, Jean Bedetti, 'cellist. Carnegie Hall, Feb. 11, afternoon:

Symphony in A (Koechel 201)..........Mozart
Symphonic Dances ....Hindemith
'Schelomo' ....Bloch
Mr. Bedetti
'Pictures at an Exhibition'
Mussorgsky-Ravel

This concert provided for at least one listener one of those rare musical experiences that come all too seldom in the concert hall. The afternoon was one of superlative playing, profound insight into stylistic differences, and realization of musical beauty. The Mozart was a gem of orchestral vitality within a frame of exquisite refinement, and the famous Boston strings shone with incomparable lustre. The Hindemith works, repeated from an earlier program, left no doubt of the desirability of hearing them again, for they revealed substance and integrity of musical thought that carried conviction by themselves, although the performance accorded them was justification enough for their presence, so searching and compelling was it.

Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody is as effective today as it ever was, music of such individual stamp in feeling and subtlety of orchestration that it cannot miss identification, Mr. Bedetti brought sensitivity and sweep to the 'cello threnody, and the orchestra soared, wailed and philosophized over, around and through the warm thread of 'cello melody with the passionate fervor which the score implies. Mr. Bloch was present in the audience and received genuine tribute along with the performers. The Mussorgsky-Ravel suite, a well-known tour de force of Mr. Koussevitzky's closed the red-letter afternoon.

Q.

New Bedford Mercury - Feb. 22/39

8

GRACE NOTES ...... By A. C. R.

Local Musicians Hear Myra Hess

Tuesday Matinee of Boston Symphony Repeats 'Peter And the Wolf'

The fourth in the Monday evening—Tuesday afternoon paired programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was enjoyed yesterday at the "Commuters' Matinee' in Symphony Hall. We delighted ones from New Bedford, South Dartmouth and Fall River were a party of five—two well-trained pianists, a very young lad who is doing well at his Bach and this reviewer, whose pleasure and musical duty it has been for two seasons to make known the possibilities for out-of-towners in these sets of six extra Symphony concerts. (The audience seems to increase at each visit).

Though the day had closed down dull and raw, sunshine gleamed and glinted in Symphony Hall. What an art is Music, that with one brief movement, the Allegro moderato of Mozart's Symphony in A major (Koechel no. 201), it can remake a day. And how Dr. Koussevitzky illumined by gesture the artlessly sparkling themes of the 18-year-old Wolfgang Amadeus!

Two of us were hearing for a second time in three weeks, with increased delight, the enchanting foolery of a contemporary Russian Mozart. The others were eagerly anticipating Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Op 67. For front section seats or second balcony, Richard Hale, the Narrator, plys his combined accomplishments of actor and baritone with marvellous clarity of enunciation, a feeling for pace and measure precisely timed with the musical portions and a sense of dramatic effect that pictures and fixes attention by a comic stress of great import mock-seriously communicated. Mr. Hale has a versatile talent which he focuses intensively on the problem of the moment. Recall the macabre flavor of his banjo-playing farmhand in Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs."

So we saw Peter sally out into "the great green meadow" to his jaunty, fascinating little theme in the strings which sends a hum of chuckles through the audience every time it starts up for a fresh adventure of the resourceful boy. We heard the twitter of the flute as the bird; the awkward duck of the oboe; the crafty cat of the clarinet; the wolf of the three horns emerging from the richly orchestrated dark forest; the charming counterpoint of these leitmotifs as associations shifted; the change in her rhythm as the cat crept after the bird—it is a gay world we live in, after all!

That distinguished modern Saint Cecilia, Miss Myra Hess of the constant angel sleeves (in this instance flowing black chiffon glistening discreetly with cut steel bands) came on for the Schumann piano concerto to such a prolongued greeting as is the due of a great lady of the keyboard. The balance in the conception of the concerto was admirably coordinated by soloist and orchestra—theme given and theme taken to poetic enhancement as piano or supporting players assumed it in turn. Miss Hess to pearls added occassional diamonds in tone color and all kept the beauty and dignity of the essential Schumann in full luster.

"La Valse," Ravel's choreographic poem, had been a discussed disagreement when two of us heard it in the recent Pension Fund concert. Both have now grown up to its magnificence, its fierce breath of things harsh blotting out waltz memories once romantic and fair; may detect the eerie breeze of death that blows across the string sections, stir to the crash of a world gone mad. Here we were guided by the concept left by H. T. P., one of his most brilliant interpretations, and acknowledge helpfully assembled choice of intentions in the valuable program notes of John N. Burk.

All of which proves that two hearings repay in added understanding.

A. C. R.

Anonomously comes this marked paragraph from "Murder in the Music-Room," a magazine article by Samuel Chotzinoff: "I hate absolutely the ban on applause at the end of a movement of a symphony and the shushing that assaults the poor wretch who dares to clap his hands in appreciation. Why, Beethoven would have been outraged if people hadn't applauded the movements of his symphonies and even demanded repetitions!"

Now, as among his ridiculously assembled list of dislikes, Mr. Chotzinoff includes the music of Mahler and Hindemith which we personally enjoy, this opinion does not sway our sense of concert behavior. It is the inexperienced concert goer who puts palms together at every pause (sometimes in the middle of a movement). The accepted rule: "applaud the movements of a concerto; not of a symphony, a sonata nor a suite," has reason behind it.

It was probably a recently printed phrase, "The Toscanini back remained firm," that incited the enclosure. When Hans Kindler conducted the National Symphony of Washington here last season, he politely bowed to all interruptions. This season, he adopted a cautious position of poised baton, fearing those untrained poundings.

If Dr. Koussevitzky should be called from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Apollo forbid, here is a vote for Georges Enesco, Roumanian violinist, composer and conductor, whose musicianship and modesty endear him to players, audience and reviewers alike. At the Commuters' matinee for January, one of his five guest appearances, it was sunshine, as always when one meets her, to have a passing word with Bernice Fisher Butler (Mrs. Morgan Butler) of Dedham and Salters Point. She was paying for a ticket at the box office, her petite prettiness set off by a small toque smashed out of sight in front with two huge pink velvet roses. As she has been thought of as a Friday subscriber, the pink roses seated almost over the stage at the extreme end of the first balcony betokened another devotee come a second time to pay tribute to the guest conductor.

Martha Broughton at that same concert came back after intermission radiant over a meeting with Enesco through Sanroma, her teacher, who had been at the piano for tricky work in the Gypsy music of Lipatti, the conductor's young compatriot. Waiving compliment, Enesco talked graciously of his early memories of Brahms.

GAZETTE

Hightstown N.J.

-187

FEB 23 1939

WORDS WITHOUT MUSIC

By LOUIS REID

(Music Features & Photo Syndicate, N. Y.)

Louis Reid

THE mecca of musical sightseers of Gotham at present is the weekly Saturday night concert of Arturo Toscanini and his NBC Symphony Orchestra . . . No musical figure of our times, operating in the more rarified areas and arias of music, is given such zealous, such almost incredible devotion. Even football fans are less enthusiastic in their hero-worship than the music lovers who weekly pay tribute to the maestro.

Hero Worship

Of course, there is no question of Toscanini's art of interpretation. . . . But watching and hearing his frenzied followers in action we wonder if the maestro is not at times resentful of the emphasis upon interpretation and the apparent subordination of the music's creators. . . . Has the idolization reached a point where the Toscanini fan is unable to see the forest for the trees? . . . Toscanini brings matchless skill to his understanding of Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner and the lesser composers of the Italian school, but long before Toscanini perfected his art and long after he has gone, the great creators stood and will stand supreme.

Only 50 Great Masters

We are too often prone to forget that all the great music of the world was and is being written by a small group of men. The masters themselves do not number over fifty. . . . Even in the popular field creation is confined, at least in America, according to the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, to some 125 persons. . . . In all the world there are not more than 1,000 men and women who are creating music that regularly gets a hearing. . . . But the interpreters of music are countless. Maestri and the musicians they lead number in the hundreds of thousands.

◆

Of classical maestri, no one is regarded today in a class with the venerable Italian. . . . And it was a master stroke of enterprise that NBC lured him from his comparative retirement in his native Italy to conduct a truly notable corral of musicians in an endeavor to build up and maintain radio's cultural traditions. . . . The man's energy is truly amazing. . . . Though he is in his seventies, he wields a baton, drives his musicians with a force that would send many an athlete panting to the showers.

Gets Down To Business

The men take their places on a semi-circular stage in Radio City's largest auditorium at about two minutes before the zero hour. . . . A bit of tuning-up, and Toscanini walks briskly from the wings, bows quite as briskly, though never brusquely, to his applauding audience, wheels around, lifts his baton—and the concert is on. . . . You note his white hair, his thin, nervous figure . . . You note, too, that he does not read from score. . . . He has memorized the music. . . . There are no lights on the music racks, the lighting for the musicians coming from powerful incandescents in the lofty ceiling. . . . The auditorium is dimmed. . . . A faint glow issues from a control room, indicating that an announcer is on the job for the invisible audience, but the spectators present do not hear his remarks.

Including an intermission, the program lasts an hour and a half. . . . At the end there is clamorous applause. . . . The audience, still under the spell of great music, superbly interpreted, is not in a hurry to reach the elevators. . . . It is discussing animatedly the playing of this symphony or that tone poem, and Toscanini's vitality. . . . Here and there one detects an approving voice of the maestro's plan of giving hearings to America's young and altogether too obscure composers.

Lamar Stringfield, A.S.C.A.P. (American composer and conductor)

Hearing for Americans

American composers are also getting respectful hearing in other quarters. The Boston Symphony has made a place on its programs for a rhapsody called "El Salon Mexico," by Aaron Copland. The work is the result of a visit to Mexico City by the composer and is based on Mexican tunes heard in the cafes. Sir Adrian Boult, English conductor, directed a radio performance of the piece here last season.

188

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

FEB 19 1939

In The World of Music

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

Six Concerts for Annual Berkshire Music Festival

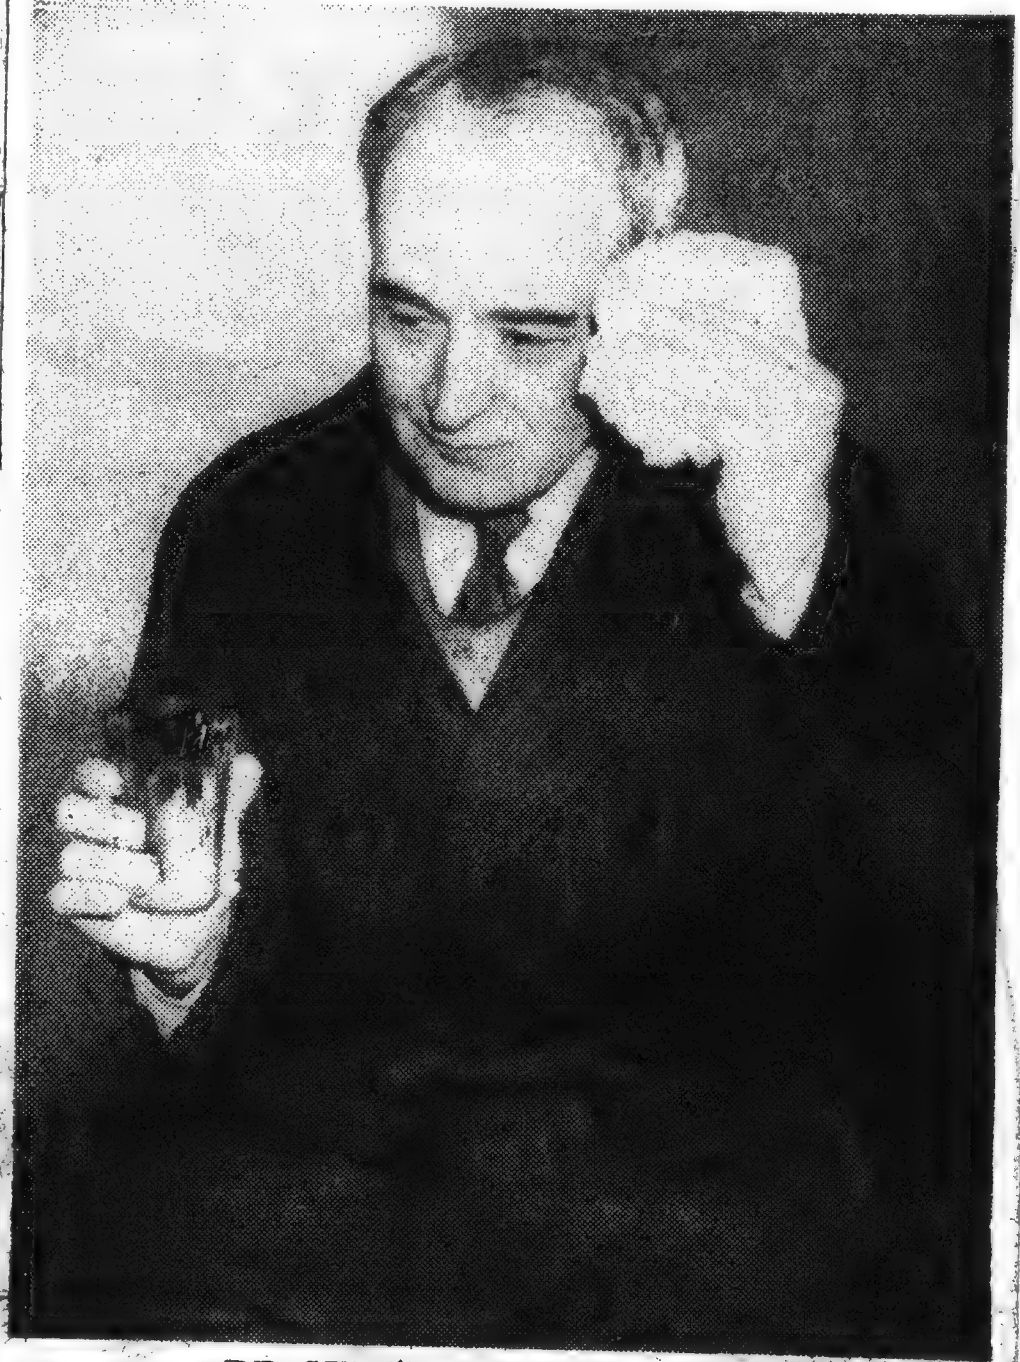
SIX concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the sixth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival next summer at "Tanglewood" in Stockbridge. The first series of concerts will be given August 3, 5, and 6 and the second, August 10, 12 and 13.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has progressed through five years to a climax of achievement in the dedication of the new shed last summer. There was general comment upon the fine acoustical properties of the auditorium which made it possible for an audience of more than 5,000 to hear every detail. It was built at the insistence of Dr. Koussevitzky and with the complete accord of the Festival trustees, that there might be full protection for the orchestra and the public. The structure of steel and wood, overlooking Lake Mahkeenac, stands as a monument to the past and at the same time as an indication and a promise for the future.

Never before have so many music lovers heard symphonic programs, in so unique a setting. The utilitarian simplicity of the shed only enhances its beauty. Festival trustees are confident that sufficient funds will be forthcoming for its early completion.

The Festival trustees, in announcing six concerts, will apply present resources for next summer's concerts to making needed improvements at "Tanglewood," such as draining parking areas, installing permanent lighting and laying out roads. They hope enough money will be received to provide an emergency enclosure for the shed.

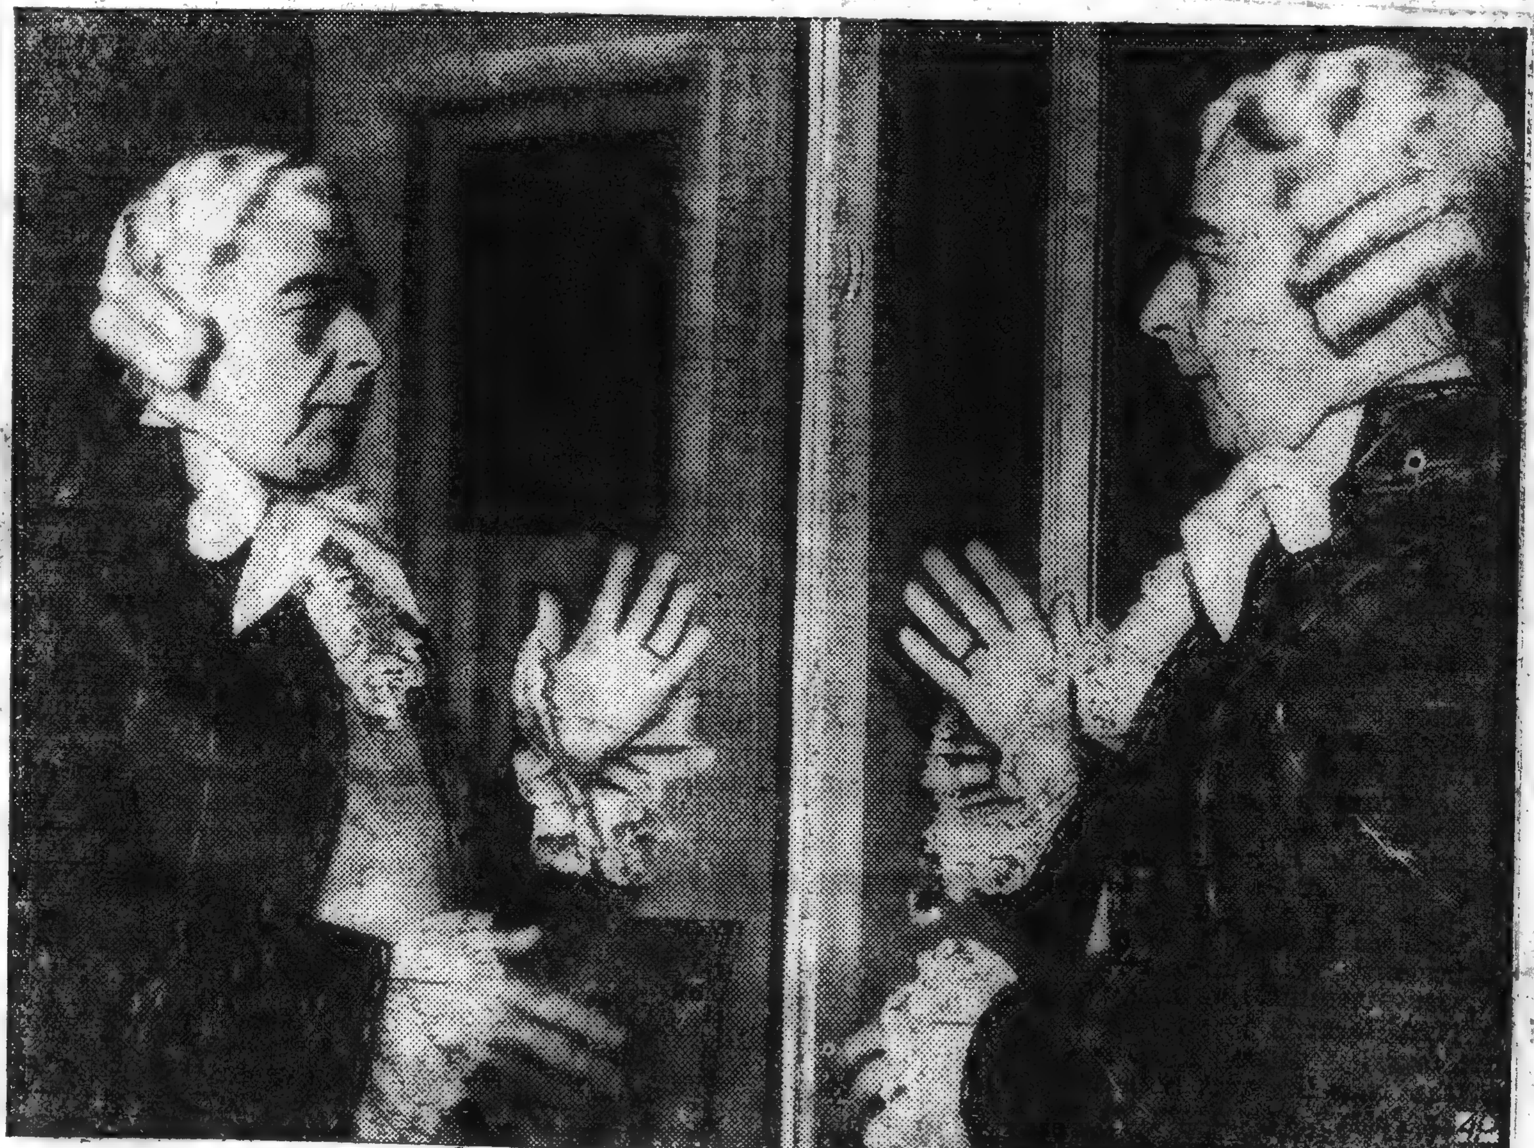
Dr. Koussevitzky will make the program for the 1939 Festival from the following list of works; the Second and Third Symphonies of Beethoven, the First and Third of Brahms; symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, the Fourth of Tchaikovsky; the Second and Fifth of Sibelius; Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Volse;" Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra," and others to be announced.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS - PALLADIUM

MAR 1 - 1939



WITH A HEIGH-DI HAYDN, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, rehearses before a mirror and holds his mouth in the [redacted] Haydn manner, preparatory to a concert "extraordinaire" in Boston. Bewigged Mr. Koussevitzky will impersonate Haydn—to whom he is said to bear a resemblance—and orchestra members will appear in 18th century finery.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 1 - 1939

Music

By G. Y. Loveridge

We all thundered down the Beethovian highway to destiny last night, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the reins, sparing neither horses nor passengers. There were moments when we had misgivings, as we hurtled past mighty chasms or felt the spray of charging seas, but we arrived unharmed in a land of ultimate glory that grows yet more magnificent as the vision dims.

The Fifth Symphony, in C Minor, our vehicle, the Boston Symphony our steeds, the Metropolitan Theatre our point of going and, worse luck, of returning. O rare and noble journey, to use the vernacular. It was like the annual two weeks' vacation, a year coming, a day departing.

There are those who complain that the Fifth is old stuff, and so it is. But so are truth, sincerity, beauty and a good many other things that are still occasionally admired. If the Fifth is what it seemed last night, it ought not, for an age or so at least, to languish for want of listeners.

Dr. Koussevitzky proclaimed it with logic and with passion. The inexorable rhythmic figure of the first movement shook down the prison walls of daily life, the andante drew us forth with mysterious and vatic utterance, fate stalked us stealthily from the strings, but the trombones stormed forth in final triumph. Today, of course, back to prison, but we did ride the clouds for a time.

The audience gave abundant evidence of its appreciation, and Dr. Koussevitzky motioned the orchestra to its feet twice.

The symphony in A major, K. 201, one of the early works of Mozart, began the program. It was not especially interesting, except that it is always interesting to hear the Boston Orchestra's strings.

Between came the evening's novelty, the orchestral fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff. It requires the services of a narrator, who tells the story, and of an orchestra, which embellishes the narrative and illustrates it with musical pictures. Richard Hale was narrator, and a fine one.

The story is about a boy, Peter, who ventures outside the wall of his home and into a meadow, where he is in the company of friends—a bird, a duck, a cat. Peter is disobedient to his grandfather, who had warned him not to go out for fear of a wolf. The wolf does come, and swallows the duck, but is caught by Peter and marched away to a zoo.

Various instruments have leitmotifs identifying the characters—the string quartet, Peter; the bassoon, grandfather; the clarinet, the cat; the oboe, the duck, and so on. Everybody found it delightful.

It occurs to us (tardily, it is true) to wonder whether a public performance of this work ought to have been permitted in this city. It is avowedly a product of Soviet Russia, and, though it purports to be a fairy tale, who knows that it does not conceal a cunning fable tending to set class against class, and to extol Communism at the expense of lower-case democracy?

Look at it this way: The wolf represents capitalism. It has evaded the hunters (moral and governmental regulation) and has swallowed the duck (the working class), which can be heard protesting ineffectively inside the wolf. Were it not for young Peter (Communism) nobody knows what it might go on to swallow. Maybe grandfather (the Supreme Court).

We shudder.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

MAR 4 - 1939

Boston Symphony In Three Concerts Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in three local concerts next week, two at Carnegie Hall and one at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. For the program next Thursday evening, March 9, at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen the Schumann Fourth Symphony and Strauss tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Zlatko Balokovic, Croatian violinist, will be soloist with the orchestra in the John Alden Carpenter Concerto, which will be given its first performance in the East at this concert.

For the concert Saturday afternoon, March 11, at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitsky has listed the first New York performance of the Third Symphony of Roy Harris. The rest of the program will be devoted to the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist; the orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, with Richard Hale as narrator, and Ravel's "La Valse."

The Brooklyn concert will be given next Friday evening, March 10. The program lists "Peter and the Wolf," Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ and the Beethoven Seventh Symphony in A major. This concert is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
MAR 5 - 1939

Rotogravure Magazine
The Detroit Free Press
Sunday, March 5, 1939

One of the outstanding events of the musical season in New York was the costumed performance of Haydn's Farewell Symphony staged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carne~~gie Hall last month.~~ Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor, is seen at right, impersonating Haydn as he first conducted his symphony. The Farewell Symphony is famous as a musical joke. Haydn composed the music while employed at the Esterhazy Court and the orchestra, the story says, hadn't been given a vacation for a long time. Haydn decided to ask for a holiday with his music. In the last movement of The Farewell Symphony the players one by one and two by two rise from their seats, puff out their candles and walk away, while the rest of the orchestra plays on. At last the conductor remains, a pathetically lonely figure, bows and retires. At Carnegie Hall, Koussevitzky again stood on the stage—alone—until the lights dimmed and the curtain fell.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
MAR 5 -1939

Rotogravure Magazine | The Detroit Free Press | Sunday, March 5, 1939

One of the outstanding events of the musical season in New York was the costumed performance of Haydn's Farewell Symphony staged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie ~~Hall last month.~~ Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor, is seen at right, impersonating Haydn as he first conducted his symphony.

The Farewell Symphony is famous as a musical joke. Haydn composed the music while employed at the Esterhazy Court and the orchestra, the story says, hadn't been given a vacation for a long time. Haydn decided to ask for a holiday with his music. In the last movement of The Farewell Symphony the players one by one and two by two rise from their seats, puff out their candles and walk away, while the rest of the orchestra plays on. At last the conductor remains, a pathetically lonely figure, bows and retires. At Carnegie Hall, Koussevitzky again stood on the stage—alone—until the lights dimmed and the curtain fell.

189

Symphony Concert

Roy Harris's New Third Symphony Receives Its First Performance

B. Trans. By MOSES SMITH March /39

Long an exponent of music by Americans, particularly those of our time, Serge Koussevitzky is in the midst of an unusual crusade. Last Friday and Saturday he presented the Second Symphony of William Schuman, one of the younger and more talented American composers. At yesterday's matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he directed the first performance of the Third Symphony of Roy Harris, who became 41 years old on the recent Lincoln's birthday, and who is now an established and leading composer on the American scene. At the concerts of next week Dr. Koussevitzky will provide Bostonians an opportunity to make first acquaintance with the Violin Concerto of John Alden Carpenter, who will achieve the age of 63 next Tuesday and who was a modern composer before Schuman was born.

American music was not ignored earlier in the year; and a quarter of the season will remain after the next program. The obvious inference is that if the American composer is being neglected in his own country, as even the millions who listen weekly to the broadcast concerts of the Phillharmonic-Symphony Orchestra are reminded, the fault is not that of Serge Koussevitzky. He is, on the contrary, sometimes taken to task for being too kind to American composers. What the grumblers sometimes fail to consider is that the conductor is too conscientious and too honest to palm off the latest mellifluous product of an American pen, saying absolutely nothing, as a worthy expression of native talent. Instead he has sought out fresh, eager voices, like those of Walter Piston and Roger Sessions and Aaron Copland; like that of Roy Harris in the two previous Symphonies by which his rugged imagination was made known here; and like that of the gifted Schuman last week.

The First Symphony of Harris five years ago disclosed a vigorous voice that still wanted schooling. The Second Symphony, composed only a year after the First and performed here under the direction of Richard Burgin almost exactly three years ago, showed a much higher degree of organization; but its edges were still crude. It was to be expected that a Third Symphony, completed only a month ago, should present a mellower and more polished surface.

The expectation was realized, albeit with some reservations suggested by first acquaintance. Without apparent loss of vigor or arresting character Harris has in this Symphony tempered his harmony into a less dissonant medium, has ironed out his voice-leading into smoother progressions, has built phrases into more plastic, more persuasive periods, and has evolved a more sonorous, yet still characterful, instrumentation.

The result is indeed a mellower work, the obvious manifestation of which was a degree of enthusiasm in its reception by yesterday's audience—more or less the same audience which had taken coldly to the two previous Symphonies. And by that token Harris, making his way on stage after what sounded like a splendid performance, could plausibly have believed that he had finally "arrived" to the point of being taken seriously by a heterogeneous public.

The reservations to which allusion has been made have to do principally with repetitiousness. On first hearing, the length of the Pastoral section seemed unjustified by its thematic content. The Fugue, which was intended to be dramatic, missed some of the intended fire because there seemed to be insufficient variety in the statement of the principal subject and because the development seemed at times heavy-handed. In the opposite direction of understatement, the dramatic ending of the final section seemed hurried.

Set against these things, however, the beauty and power of the opening section, principally for strings, where the warm lyricism of the composer is to be heard at its best. Or the beautiful figuration (which is probably not the right word) of the string instruments in the Pastoral, and the striking sonorities emerging from the wood winds. Or the almost pioneer vitality of the fugue subject as it comes out of the heavy brass. . . . But for a first impresison of a stimulating work this account has run long enough.

* * *

The rest of the concert was given over to Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. In the former the orchestral playing, which was of a high order throughout the concert, achieved miracles of sonority, shading and expressiveness. In the Symphony the spectacular thing for one interested observer was the tempering of the exposition by Dr. Koussevitzky. Here was a far more logical presentation of the Seventh than any he has vouchsafed Boston audiences in the past, so far as the present writer is aware. The rhythmic and dynamic distortions were levelled down, the choice of tempos was juster, the distinctions were subtler or more pronounced, as the character of the music demanded. And since over all there reigned an imperious, imaginative musician the result was a most musical, engrossing and powerful performance.

The Public Is Right

In Which Bernard Zighera Is Interviewed And States Briefly Basis of His Faith

B. Trans March /39

Bernard Zighera, conductor of the Zighera Chamber Orchestra, which will give the final concert of its third season in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, March 1, took time off from a rehearsal the other morning to talk and answer questions. It is not hard to get him to talk on the subject. For he still regards the venture as his "baby," even though it was first suggested to him by Serge Koussevitzky and though, entirely without his knowledge, a committee of guarantors was formed last summer.

"I feel," said Mr. Zighera, "that we have made as much progress in three years as I had thought possible in five. Everybody has been very kind. Of course we are going ahead. I will continue just about as I have in the past, as that seems the best way for me."

The most characteristic quality of the man as revealed in his talk of experience and hopes is his independence of spirit, his firmness in making his own judgments and his willingness to stand or fall by his decisions.

"When I started I said I would give Boston what I feel is best, and then I would let the public decide whether it liked it or not. If they wanted the concerts, I would go on, if not, I would not go on. But they have liked them"—and he relaxed in a broad smile—"and they have showed they did.

"From the start I decided not to ask favors of anybody—musicians, soloists, or friends—in financing the concerts, because I wanted above all else to feel perfectly free to choose the programs I like and the musicians I want. By now I think that people realize that it is useless to ask me to put anything on my programs just to please an individual.

"If one tries to please everybody he will sway this way"—motioning both hands to the right, "and that way" with a sweep to the left, "and then he will go down-plump!" and with both hands he depicted the downfall of the too obliging man. "The artist is killed unless he can express the full force of his personality.

"I first try to build good programs, for variety choosing from the classics, the romantic period and the modern, without considering the cost. Then I select my musicians." He admitted that he does not care for experimental music. "I don't feel it; I do not understand it, perhaps, and I cannot express what I do not feel. It would be like trying to say something that I don't mean—I can't be just polite in music!"

There are two ways by which a conductor may plan his program. The frankly economical way is to select compositions which require no more than the regular number in the orchestra, and thus limit one's choice considerably. Or one may begin by choosing what he wants to play without considering the possible extra instruments involved. Mr. Zighera's method is the latter one.

"Some of my friends ask me if I am a Rothschild when I build programs in this expensive way," he said, smiling like a mischievous youth. "But I cannot help it. For instance, in order to include Mahler's 'Songs of a Wayfarer' on the January program I had to engage four more horn-players and a trombone-player for that single number. It took only 14 minutes to play, and they were paid for a whole evening's performance. But I was repaid, because it accomplished what I set out to do. It gave Bostonians a surprise encounter with this delightful work of Mahler's youth."

Despite his independence of judgment, Mr. Zighera welcomes suggestions for his programs. "I have a note book"—and he proved it by producing it from a coat pocket. "Whenever anyone tells me that I should hear some piece or musician, I write it down here, but I make no promises. Then in the long summer months I go over these notes very thoroughly and am often delighted to find the suggestions are very good. That is how I happened to put the 'Choric Dances' of the young composer, Paul Creaton, on the last program. I have never met him, but I tried his scores and liked them."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 4 - 1939

NOVEL WORK OFFERED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" on Friday Program—Also Beethoven's Seventh

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fourth Brooklyn concert of the season next Friday evening, at 8:30 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Included on its program will be, by popular request, the orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, which was performed with great success at the orchestra's Pension concert in Carnegie Hall last month.

Richard Hale, who acted as narrator at that concert, will appear in the same role in this Brooklyn concert. Also included on the program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music ar Vivaldi's concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Roy Harris' Third Symphony

Monitor The Arts in Boston March /39

The Third Symphony of Roy Harris had its first performance yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The other numbers of the program were Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. It was the first concert of the seventeenth pair of the Boston Symphony season.

Mr. Harris' first two symphonies have been played at these concerts, the first in 1934, under Dr. Koussevitzky, the second in 1939, under Mr. [illegible]gin. The "Symphony: 1933" dis[illegible] a strong native talent w[illegible]ot quite found itself but w[illegible]eat promise. The Secon[illegible]y did not quite fulfill th[illegible]used by the first. There wa[illegible]n authentic individual flav[illegible]ut other influences were noti[illegible]ble and there was a mastery of [illegible]nical problems which was no[illegible]atched by the musical substance of the work.

In his Third Symphony the composer has thrown off the shackles of "influences," and has been able to devote his musical scholarship to the service of his own musical individuality. The f[illegible]m of the work is unconventional. It is in one movement of five well-defined sections. Instead of a "program" or a long analysis, Mr. Harris supplied a structural outline of the score to the editor of the program book. This describes the first section as tragic, the second as lyric, the third as pastoral, the fourth as dramatic, and the last as dramatic and tragic. This of course corresponds only roughly to the classic symphonic form, but the work is big enough in conception to justify the use of the label.

The composer told a representative of this newspaper the other day that he was striving for a "contemporary classicism." It seems to this writer that he is approaching it. He has avoided the romantic clichés without producing a weak imitation of a classic model. His employment of organum and of ancient modes does succeed in establishing a tragic mood. His lyrical and pastoral sections are really lyrical and pastoral, and his fugal section is dramatically worked out. The rhythmic patterns of the work are complicated, and exciting to listen to. The work gives a unified impression, and justifies the hopes raised by the "Symphony: 1933."

The new symphony was well received, and the composer took several bows. He showed clearly his appreciation of the aid he had had from the conductor and the orchestra, who had given him (so far as one may judge on a single hearing) a splendid performance of a work very difficult to play.

The orchestra and its leader also distinguished themselves, of course, in the Stravinsky item, which was revealed in all its glittering colors. But the triumph of the day came with the Beethoven Seventh, which had a reading and a performance phenomenal even for Symphony Hall. No wonder the audience lingered to clap, stamp and cheer.

L. A. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 1 - 1939

Providence Folk at Concert

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives ~~Program Before~~ More Than 2,500

Special to the Herald Tribune

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 28.—More than 2,500 attended the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here tonight. In the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Shaw Safe, Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell jr., Mr. and Mrs. S. Foster Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson G. Wing, Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley, Mrs. Frederick Stanhope Peck, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh F. Maccoll, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, Mr. and Mrs. Byron S. Watson, Dr. and Mrs. Halsey DeWolf, Mrs. Walter S. Ball, Mrs. James Richard Richardson, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Powel and Mr. and Mrs. Royal Little.

Mrs. Stewart Campbell, of London, England, is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis E. Howe in Bristol.

Mrs. Richard F. Hoyt, of New York, will join her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, over the week end.

Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis will go to Southern Pines, N. C., Saturday to visit Mr. and Mrs. Almet Jenks.

Mrs. Frank Mauran jr. and her cousin, Miss Mary Ann Lippitt, have returned from Canada.

Mr. and Mrs. Albro M. Dana will be joined tomorrow by Mr. and Mrs. Irving N. Alderson, of Birney, Mont.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 1 - 1939

Unique Composition Marks Boston Symphony Concert

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played another rarec oncert for their Providence friends last evening at Metropolitan Theatre. This program had a most unique piece of writing, "Peter and the Wolf," by a modern Russian composer, Prokofieff, well set off between an early Mozart Symphony and Beethoven's incomparable Fifth. The evening was delightful throughout as the musicians displayed the full gamut of their artistic capabilties.

The Mozart Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) is scored for the small orchestra of that day and included only strings, two oboes and two horns. It is exactly the type of composition which a student of score reading can comprehend and it is delightful in its orderliness and grace. The opening bars are very refreshing and as for the Minuet, it is completely charming. We are glad to have had the chance to hear this young Mozart and can commend it as a vehicle to free the mind for a flight of the imagination such as it required to go adventuring with "Peter."

Prokofieff has displayed amazing wit and pure stagecraft in this "Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children." Nothing is lacking. It is understood that without the art of Richard Hale, the narrator, who set the atmosphere perfectly with his opening sentence, "my dear children," and without the frankness and humor of the orchestral interpreters, it might not have been so pleasurable. The combination would be hard to excel. Prokofieff, now 48, left Russia in 1918, with much rhythm in his musical equipment. He returns, or rather is allowed to return, after his having been a citizen of the world, with the addition of real melodies and an indispensable sense of humor. Those listeners who were fortunate enough to have head "Lieut. Kije" last season will recall the tunes from that. They are, along with the tunes from Peter, the kind one whistles in the dark. Thanks be for composers who can still produce the illusion of going along, if it be in the dark, in step with rhythm from the past and with a suggestion of a gay tune.

Beethoven wrote a magnificent piece of music in his Fifth Symphony and enough has been written about it to fill several volumes. We try to avoid any suggestions of plot or intentions to be conveyed. We consider it solely as beautiful music and relish the opportunity to hear it played on any occasion. Last enening's interpretation will be the high mark for some time to come.

R. T.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
MAR 3 - 1939

BEETHOVEN, PROKOFIEFF AND NEW HARRIS OPUS FOR SMITH AUDIENCE

The Seventh symphony of Beethoven (A major); the Prokofieff orchestral fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf"; and the third symphony or Roy Harris, American composer will comprise the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra at John M. Greene hall at Smith college on Tuesday night at 8.

The program will open with the Harris symphony which had its world premier under Dr Koussevitzky on February 24 at Boston. In the Prokofieff work, Richard Hale will act as narrator. Composer of the now famous "Lieutenant Kije" suite which the orchestra brought to this country, Prokofieff tells in musical fashion the story of "Peter and the Wolf" by assigning a theme and a certain instrument for each person or animal in the tale. The familiar Beethoven symphony completes the program.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

90

MAR 4 - 1939

Boston Symphony to Be Heard at Smith Tuesday

Fifth Concert in College Course. Works of Beethoven, Harris and Prokofieff Included on the Program

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will present the fifth concert of the Smith college concert course in John M. Greene hall, Smith college, on Tuesday, March 7, at 8 p. m. Two modern works, Symphony No. 3, by Roy Harris, and "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, by Prokofieff, and the Symphony, No. 7, of Beethoven, will be included on the program. Tickets for standing room may be obtained at the door on the evening of the concert.

The Symphony No. 3 of Roy Harris will bring something new in musical fare to local concertgoers. Among America's outstanding contemporary composers, Roy Harris is a native of Lincoln County, Okla., where he first began his study of music with his mother, who taught him piano. This work was interrupted by farming, truck driving and service in the American army during the World war. In 1920, he resumed his study of music with Arthur Farwell, later continuing with Bliss, Altchuler and Scalero. He went to Paris in 1926 to study with Nadia Boulanger, during which period he received a Guggenheim fellowship for study in 1927-29. This award was followed in 1930 by a Creative fellowship grant from the Pasadena Music and Arts association of this country.

Roy Harris has served as head of the composition department of the Westminster Choir school at Princeton, N. J., and as director of the Princeton Festival of American Music, and is a member of the executive committee of the American Composers' Alliance. His compositions include works for orchestra, chamber ensembles, chorus and piano.

Prokofieff, a modern Russian composer, has been gaining in public attention within the past few years, owing largely to the success of his Orchestra Suite, Op. 60, Lieutenant Kije, performed last summer at the Berkshire Festival, and heard here in February by the Cleveland orchestra. Richard Hale will take the part of the narrator in "Peter and the Wolf." The concluding work, the familiar Symphony No. 7 of Beethoven, includes the following movements:

Poco sostenuto: Vivace
Allegretto
Presto: assai meno presto:
Tempo primo
Allegro con brio

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
EVE. NEWS

MAR 3 - 1939

ALLONS! ALL READY?

Wide World Photo

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER

Mlle. Boulanger conducting a rehearsal of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. At her elbow is Jean Francaix, composer of "Le Diable Boiteux," which the orchestra presented at its concert at Wellesley College last night.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAR 5 - 1939

ERNEST BLOCH TO BE SYMPHONY GUEST

Ernest Bloch will visit Boston and conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra as guest at the next concerts to be given by the orchestra here. The coming week will be occupied by the fourth visit to New York. Ernest Bloch will conduct the concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 17 and 18, in Symphony hall, and on the Thursday evening previous, in Sanders theatre, Cambridge. He will also conduct the concerts in Symphony hall on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, March 20 and 21. The programme announced will consist of his own music, and include his epic rhapsody, "America." "America" was performed at these concerts in 1928-29. The programme will open with two interludes from his opera "Macbeth," then to have their first performance here, and his Three Jewish Poems, a familiar number of the Orchestra's repertory. Ernest Bloch was invited by the Boston Symphony orchestra to conduct his Three Jewish Poems in the year 1917, when the piece was new and the composer as yet little known.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 4 - 1939

Brooklyn Plans Benefits

An organization celebrating its eighty-fifth anniversary with a tea Tuesday is the Woman's Exchange of Brooklyn, which will display some of its most treasured handiwork. This includes a flag made at the time of Lincoln's assassination and fine needlework samplers.

The president, Miss Isabel F. Ide, whose family has been associated with the exchange since its founding in 1854, will receive, and directors, including Mrs. Cornelius Ruxton Love, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. Malcolm Van Zandt, Miss Frances H. Coutts and Miss Annie H. Halsted, will pour.

For Friday night's Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music, Serge Koussevitsky will again conduct in this fourth concert of the Brooklyn series, adding Prokofieff's orchestrated fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," by popular request. Richard Hale will be narrator.

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

MAR 4 - 1939

Paul Stassevitch must be nominated the outstanding figure of the present season of concerts. Mr Stassevitch achieved two memorable feats. He prepared a performance of Liszt's very important but seldom performed "Faust" Symphony on January 20 and, on February 17, appeared both as conductor and solo pianist. Last year Mr Stassevitch was one of the violin soloists. He proved himself equally proficient in all three functions.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston "Pops" and director of the St. Cecilia Society, the choral group associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led a concert on February 3 which will long be remembered. What Mr. Fiedler got out of the orchestra was little short of phenomenal. But then Mr. Fiedler is an exceptional conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 4 - 1939

Figures In Current News

Associated Press Photo.

POINT OR COUNTERPOINT.—Roy Harris, distinguished composer, and Mrs. Harris listen attentively to Serge Koussevitzky conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after the first performance of Harris's third symphony in Boston. Two previous symphonies by the Oklahoma-born composer were also introduced by Koussevitzky in Boston.

B. Globe March 4/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Violin Concerto by John Alden Carpenter was played for the first time here at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Zlatko Balokovic, Yugoslavian artist, who had not before appeared with this orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, after changing the other numbers of the program originally announced, placed the Concerto between Schumann's Fourth Symphony and the grand and glorious tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss.

Like Charles Ives, Mr. Carpenter has divided his life between business and art. Composition for these two Americans has been an avocation. But unlike Mr. Ives, whose music is practically an unknown quantity here, the works of Mr. Carpenter have appeared with some frequency in Boston. Hence the salient characteristics found in Carpenter scores—facile melodic invention, assiduous craftsmanship, rhythmic zest and a comparatively moderate idiom so far as dissonant harmony is concerned—have long since been known to local concertgoers.

These terms may readily be applied to the Violin Concerto, which, incidentally, has more beauty than the last two Carpenter works heard in Boston—"Patterns" and "Danza." Running its course of numerous climaxes in a single movement, the Concerto is for the most part lyrical rather than spacious. The solo part, at first hearing, seemed essentially "violinistic." A large orchestra, with added percussion, is required. There are novel touches, as when the solo violin is heard against strokes upon a wood-block, and, at the very end, above soft notes of the vibraphone. To make a brief summary, it should be said that if relatively in substantial and hardly a masterpiece, this Concerto is pleasant.

Mr. Balokovic has a polished technic, and he produces a rich, luminous tone. His playing is vital and full of expression, yet beautifully poised. So far as could be judged from a new work, the composer may be congratulated upon the presence of a soloist whose performance was both sympathetic and irreproachable. Mr. Carpenter, who was present, came to the stage and shared applause with Mr. Balokovic and Dr. Koussevitzky.

Hard words are uttered about Richard Strauss these days. To be sure, this necromancer of the orchestra is generally considered to have depended, in recent years, upon technic to fill out the spaces where true inspiration is absent. And of course he reflected his own period (the post-Romantic age, so called) in the vast scope and luxuriant orchestral polyphony of his music. But it is downright silly of the less effusive 20th Century, to sneer at the unconstrained musical manners of 40 years ago. Sometime another generation will look back upon these years after the War and wonder what ailed us.

The breadth and the emotional impact of Strauss' music, and "Zarathustra" is no exception, still overwhelm a receptive listener. As for the "vulgarity" of Strauss' luscious melodies and his swollen orchestra, what could be more vulgar, in another way, than the dreary wastes of sterile dissonance, the tonal "patterns" and the esthetic snootiness of the present? After all, in the fact of recognized blemishes upon his music, Strauss was capable of warmth, fantasy, and at least occasional exaltation.

"Zarathustra," apart from poor intonation here and there, and the whole of Schumann's great Symphony, received magnificent performances that showed Dr. Koussevitzky at his interpretive best.

C. W. D.

C. S. Monitor - March 4/39

—Boston News—

Balokovic Symphony Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has now reached the three-quarter mark in its present season, and with the concerts of this week-end it completes its eighteenth pair. For program Dr. Koussevitzky chose the Schumann Symphony No. 4 in D minor, and the Strauss tone poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," with, for piquant item, the new Violin Concerto by John Alden Carpenter, which had its first performance in Boston yesterday afternoon by Zlatko Baloković.

Last season, during the week-end which Dr. Koussevitzky set aside in which to do homage to Ravel, the Schumann Symphony No. 4 was brought forward, having remained unheard for more than two years. It proved peculiarly rewarding and yesterday afternoon it again gave undeniable charm to the program.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra thoroughly caught the spirit of the work and gave it a superb performance.

Virtuosity marked the performance of the Strauss opus also. The performance was as vital and as carefully considered as though it were a first performance. In fact, it seemed to this commentator that Dr. Koussevitzky reached new heights in an unusually dramatic portrayal of the tone picture, giving full value to the work without becoming melodramatic in his reading.

Mr. Carpenter's concerto is in slightly different vein from his previous works. Possibly he has not yet become entirely comfortable in molding his material in this form. The opening is authentic and at once betrays the master hand at orchestration, and the melodic content of the work holds the attention. Mr. Carpenter has also learned the trick of tempering an orchestral accompaniment to a solo instrument, and of placing that accompaniment in the registers most advantageous to the solo voice. His harmonic scheme reveals an exploring mind and the outline of the work indicates that he is a progressive and not a formalist.

With so many points in its favor, the concerto revealed a few slight faults. There appear to be measures which could be omitted without spoiling the story. There were also places in the central part of the work which were a bit diffuse.

Of the performance by Mr. Baloković it is easy to speak in terms of praise. His technical equipment is good and he exercises good taste in his performance. The program book informed us that Mr. Baloković gave the work its first performance in 1937. It was evident yesterday that he found it congenial material, and his performance of the final measures, which are very effectively written, was admirably compassed. The audience heartily applauded artist, conductor, and orchestra. Mr. Carpenter also came in for applause when he was brought to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky.

G. M. S.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 5 - 1939

Bostonians to Play 'Peter and the Wolf' At Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fourth Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday evening, March 10, at 8:30 o'clock in the Academy of Music.

Included on its program will be, by popular request, the orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, which was performed with great success at the orchestra's Pension Concert in Carnegie Hall last month. Richard Hale, who acted as narrator at that concert, will appear in the same role in this Brooklyn concert.

Also on the program at the Academy of Music are Vivaldi's concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn Committee.

191

SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Concerto, New Solo Violinist And an Extraordinary Machine

B. Trans. By MOSES SMITH March 4/39

The hero of yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, was a machine. It was a machine consisting of about 100 human parts, for the most part assembled by the conductor over some years, and fashioned according to his requirements. The fashioning itself has been rather remarkable, because as the smooth operation of the parts has met the conductor's demands, his requirements have become greater. Thus the mutual interplay has gone on until it was apparent in the performance of the Schumann D minor Symphony, which began yesterday's program, that the operation of the machine is more nearly perfect and seemingly more effortless than anyone would have believed possible, say, five years ago.

The machine in other words, was the orchestra itself, playing the Symphony and subsequently the Strauss Tone-Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," at the end of the program, with marvellous precision, beauty and variety of tone and with an almost incredible cohesiveness among the several parts. The behavior of the machine was more striking in the case of the Symphony, perhaps because that came at the beginning, but perhaps also because here the orchestral playing was on an even higher plane than it was for the Strauss work.

* * *

The performance of the Symphony was further noteworthy in that Dr. Koussevitzky presented a thoroughly Romantic work in straightforward fashion —more straightforward, certainly, than has sometimes been true of his readings of classical works. There were even moments yesterday when one would have wished for more plasticity in the shaping of the outlines, both dynamic and rhythmic. But on the whole it was a most enjoyable performance. And the Schumann fantasy and poesy were perhaps more in evidence in such treatment of the Symphony than they would have been if the performance had been freer.

As to the presentation of "Zarathustra," that has long been one of the adornments of the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor. It is enough to say that the playing yesterday was as brilliant as ever, while the music of Strauss showed even greater signs of wear.

* * *

The one other number was John Alden Carpenter's Concerto for violin and orchestra, in first Boston performance. The solo violin was played by Zlatko Balokovic, Jugoslavic violinist, who "created" the part when the piece was first performed at a concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 18, 1937. As it happened, the present writer was in attendance as that performance, and even wrote a report for these columns. Relying on memory (it would be unfair to do otherwise on the occasion of reporting a subsequent performance) this writer may summarize his impression as of disappointment both in the composition itself and in its principal protagonist. The impression was strengthened by yesterday's hearing.

Perhaps one expected too much from Mr. Carpenter, a leading American composer for a quarter of a century. Certainly those other major works of his with which one was familiar did not predict the sentimentalism that fairly oozes from the present one. The composer has in the past flirted with jazz, and the musical results have been amusing or exhilarating, according to the point of view of the listener. But in the instance of the Concerto under discussion the jazzy tune is as likely as not to be either cheap or threadbare. The straining after effect is frequently apparent. It is especially irritating in the episodic last movement, where each of numerous changes of tempo seems at last to herald the approaching end, only to resolve itself into another anti-climax.

Mr. Balokovic may be a first-class violinist, and in that case the Concerto is even feebler than it seems. It is at least equally plausible, however, that the soloist might have made the piece more ingratiating than that which emerged yesterday. It seems hardly possible, for example, that Mr. Carpenter had in mind a tone so prevailingly wobbly and fluty, resulting from either dreadfully excessive vibrato or insufficient pressure of bow. Of that he sought a treatment that was so gypsy-like in everything except fire and vigor.

It is also possible that the present writer is all wrong (it has happened before); that both the Concerto and the soloist were of a quality quite different from that which has been set forth, and that Dr. Koussevitzky, putting the work on his program, was not merely paying the expected respect to a major American composer. So the major part of yesterday's audience seemed to think, for their applause was of a duration and volume more than courtesy alone would dictate, even though the composer was on hand to take his bows with conductor

---

ALTERED LIST BY SYMPHONY

B. Post

Carpenter's Violin Work Alone Survives Original Plan

March 4/39

Not in some time has Dr. Koussevitzky so radically altered a Symphony programme as he has that of yesterday afternoon and this evening. Instead of the originally announced "Catalonia" of Albeniz comes Schumann's D minor Symphony, and in place of Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," that composer's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Only the central number, the violin concerto of John Alden Carpenter, in which Zlatko Balokovic is the soloist, survives from the first list.

PLAYED IN THREE CITIES

Whether these changes constituted an improvement, or otherwise, is something for the individual listener to decide. At least the initial programme was a bit fresher than the one which the conductor finally decided.

Regarding the performances of Schumann's intimate Symphony and of Strauss' resplendent tone poem it is altogether safe to use only superlatives, and in the case of the new Concerto these may be presumed. Mr. Balokovic, who has not been heard here in some time, is an excellent violinist, and it is something of a pity that he was not heard yesterday in more substantial music than that of the Chicago composer, agreeable as that work proved to be.

Composed in 1936 Mr. Carpenter's Concerto has been already played by the orchestras of Chicago, Los Angeles and Cleveland and in each case Mr. Balokovic was the soloist.

Like the Symphonies of William Schuman and Roy Harris, recently heard here, Mr. Carpenter's Concerto runs in a single movement, there are, however, three well-defined divisions. As befits the composer of "Krazy Kat" and "Skyscrapers" there are jazzy touches in the Concerto, and as with Mr. Carpenter's "Patterns" and "Danza," the last of his works previously to be heard here, there is much pleasing but somewhat inconsequential melodic material.

The work is scored with the composer's usual skill for large orchestra in which many instruments of percussion are employed. Present in the audience yesterday, Mr. Carpenter was warmly applauded by the audience.

Strauss' Great Poem

Familiar as are the tone poems of Strauss in Boston, there must still be a great many listeners who experience difficulty in recognizing their various divisions. Only those who know these intricate scores at first hand can be perfectly sure which section is which. Mr. Burk's notes on "Zarathustra" might be clearer if it were explained in them that the episode which Strauss entitles "The Convalescent" comes in the midst of that extraordinary fugal passage, "Of Science." It might be gathered that it merely follows it.

Both Schumann and Strauss made yesterday their first appearance of the season at the "regular" Symphony Concerts. Both were welcome.

B. Her March 4/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 18th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Zlatko Balokovic, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Schumann....Symphony No. 4 in D minor Op. 120
Carpenter.....Violin Concerto
Strauss........"Thus Spake Zarathustra," Tone Poem Op. 30

Dr. Koussevitzky's sweeping change of program for this week's concerts has had, one may hazard, a fortunate result. There are few people who do not prefer Strauss's Zarathustra to his Domestic Symphony; and, whatever the merits of Albeniz's "Catalonia," we may be sure that they could not measure up to Schumann's masterpiece. Altogether it was a splendid concert and not the least because of the fine performance of Schumann's remarkable 4th Symphony. Its originality seldom fails to impress one anew, and Dr. Koussevitzky's partiality for it and sympathetic interpretation of it give proof of the enduring qualities of the music. Those who are wont to decry Schumann's orchestration and proceed to impute his talent as an inventive artist should listen to such a performance as we heard yesterday.

Mr. John Alden Carpenter's Violin Concerto is by no means an unworthy addition to a genre that has few recent peaks of achievement. It is not a classical concerto in the sense that Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms constructed theirs. Rather it is in the category that Sir Donald Tovey asserts was invented by Mendelssohn, an easier and attractive type. In more recent times Sibelius and Prokofieff have, perhaps, been most successful in creating effective violin concertos, though the English would make a strong claim for Elgar. Mr. Carpenter's, since it is more diffuse and less strikingly individual, cannot rank with the Sibelius or the Second Violin Concerto of Prokofieff.

Nevertheless it has some unusual features and as a whole cannot fail to attract an audience. In a sense it is a rhapsody or fantasia whose sections do not defy analysis yet whose entirety is more important and convincing than any episode. There is brilliant passage work for the solo instrument, whose opportunities the composer has at no time neglected. The contrasts of the violin with the full power of the orchestra are also ingeniously wrought.

We wish that Mr. Carpenter had prevailed over his more sentimental side and altered that peculiarly glutinous finish. There was so much that was robust in the earlier parts, nor was the slow section too nostalgic a contrast. Why, then, that coda? It is also only fair to say that the concerto is a fusion of styles rather than unmistakably the composer's own. At the least it is a work that is successful in a very difficult medium.

Mr. Balokovic is obviously an expert violinist. His performance was one of great dexterity and finish. Nor did he neglect, without overdoing, the lyrical side of the concerto. It was a thoroughly confident and easy performance, without being aggressive or indifferent. He seemed to relish, with the able support of conductor and orchestra, bringing out the qualities of the music. Mr. Carpenter was in the audience and shared the applause with Mr. Balokovic.

There is little need to write at this date in detail about the tone poem of Strauss. For us "Thus Spoke Zarathustra," wears well, much better than most. It so blatantly rejoices to run its course that a good performance of it is irresistible. Moreover it has become a war-horse with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, and from any point of view it rode gloriously into battle yesterday.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be in New York.

Carpenter's Violin Concerto

By Alfred H. Meyer

The symphony programs for Friday and Saturday contain one "first performance in Boston." For the third time in three weeks an American composer receives a hearing with a work entirely new to this city. Close upon the youthful Schuman and the now mature Harris comes the established John Alden Carpenter with a Concerto for violin and orchestra.

Mr. Carpenter's concerto was written between March and September, 1936, at Eze Village, in France, and at the composer's summer home at Beverly, Mass. It is dedicated to his wife. It received its first performance on Nov. 18, 1937, at a concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, with Zlatko Baloković as the soloist. This talented violinist has also played the concerto in Cleveland and Los Angeles, and several times in Europe, including his native Yugoslavia. Mr. Baloković will also be the soloist in the concerts of the present week.

The concerto is scored for the large modern orchestra with a rather full percussion group, including many varieties of bells and instruments giving bell-like tone. After the manner of modern concerti, the score is of symphonic proportions and import, and might possibly have been designated a symphonie concertante.

The concerto is in a single movement. It suggests a sonata-allegro in which the middle section or development is replaced by a slow, lyric division. The first, or exposition part, consists of a number of allegros of many varieties—"robustamente," "giojoso," "grazioso," and others. The first theme is heard at once in the orchestra, a "robust" theme entirely in the character of the day in which it is written. After some developments in which both solo violin and orchestra take part, the solo violin announces the second theme, "grazioso," above an orchestral pizzicato. There is also a broadly accented "closing theme."

Then follows a Lento, placed as would be the development of a sonata-allegro, but suggesting a slow movement. Its principal theme is a flowing melody in the lyric style, for the solo violin. Another theme, broader, but still very expressive, follows. A final section recapitulates much of the exposition.

Symphony Program This Week Changed

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts of this week in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, has been changed. The list now reads: Schumann's Fourth Symphony, in D minor; John Alden Carpenter's Violin Concerto, Zlatko Baloković, soloist; Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HEARD FRIDAY

Fourth in Series of Concerts Will Include Prokofieff's Orchestral Fairy Tale

CIVIC GROUP'S PROGRAM

Schubert's Music and Songs to Be Features at Brooklyn Museum Saturday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its fourth Brooklyn concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday night. The program will include Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as narrator; Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

The concert will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

The Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Frank E. Simmons of 160 Henry Street, Brooklyn, will give a dinner party before the concert for the box guests of Mrs. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester, who will include Mrs. Valentine Seaman, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest P. Goodrich, Jacob C. Klinck and Rudolph Reimer.

Boxholders for Concert

Boxholders for the concert will be Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson of Fort Hamilton, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Miss Florence L. Logan, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, Brooklyn Woman's Club and the All City High School Orchestra members.

Guests of Colonel and Mrs. Brabson will be Major and Mrs. Frank Heywood, Major and Mrs. Albert Wing and Major and Mrs. Charles Griffin. Occupants of the Woman's Club box will be Mrs. Frederick H. Paine, Mrs. William Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. Theodore Vosseler, Mrs. John Vliet and Mrs. Frederick M. Davidson.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 5 - 1939

Boxholders Announced for Symphony Concert on Friday

Socially Prominent Will Entertain Guests at Academy of Music and at Dinners Beforehand; 'Go Young and Fair' Benefit Next Friday

The Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Frank E. Simmons of 160 Henry St. will give a dinner party Friday evening for the box guests of Mrs. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester, preceding the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this season in the Academy of Music. The dinner guests will be Mrs. Lester, Mrs. Valentine Seaman, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest P. Goodrich, Jacob C. Klinck and Rudolph Reimer.

The concert program will include, by popular request, the orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, which was performed with great success this season by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Richard Hale, who acted as narrator, will appear in the same role in the Brooklyn concert. The program, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will include also Vivaldi's concerto in D Minor for orchestra and organ and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A Major.

The Boston Symphony's Brooklyn concerts, now in their 53d season, are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president, and a Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

In addition to Mrs. Simmons and Mrs. Lester, boxholders for Friday evening's concert will be Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson of Fort Hamilton, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Miss Florence L. Logan, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, Brooklyn Woman's Club and the All City High School Orchestra members.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Concerto, New Solo Violinist And an Extraordinary Machine

By. Trans. By MOSES SMITH March 4/39

The hero of yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, was a machine. It was a machine consisting of about 100 human parts, for the most part assembled by the conductor over some years, and fashioned according to his requirements. The fashioning itself has been rather remarkable, because as the smooth operation of the parts has met the conductor's demands, his requirements have become greater. Thus the mutual interplay has gone on until it was apparent in the performance of the Schumann D minor Symphony, which began yesterday's program, that the operation of the machine is more nearly perfect and seemingly more effortless than anyone would have believed possible, say, five years ago.

The machine in other words, was the orchestra itself, playing the Symphony and subsequently the Strauss Tone-Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," at the end of the program, with marvellous precision, beauty and variety of tone and with an almost incredible cohesiveness among the several parts. The behavior of the machine was more striking in the case of the Symphony, perhaps because that came at the beginning, but perhaps also because here the orchestral playing was on an even higher plane than it was for the Strauss work.

* * *

The performance of the Symphony was further noteworthy in that Dr. Koussevitzky presented a thoroughly Romantic work in straightforward fashion—more straightforward, certainly, than has sometimes been true of his readings of classical works. There were even moments yesterday when one would have wished for more plasticity in the shaping of the outlines, both dynamic and rhythmic. But on the whole it was a most enjoyable performance. And the Schumann fantasy and poesy were perhaps more in evidence in such treatment of the Symphony than they would have been if the performance had been freer.

As to the presentation of "Zarathustra," that has long been one of the adornments of the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor. It is enough to say that the playing yesterday was as brilliant as ever, while the music of Strauss showed even greater signs of wear.

* * *

The one other number was John Alden Carpenter's Concerto for violin and orchestra, in first Boston performance. The solo violin was played by Zlatko Balokovic, Jugoslavic violinist, who "created" the part when the piece was first performed at a concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 18, 1937. As it happened, the present writer was in attendance as that performance, and even wrote a report for these columns. Relying on memory (it would be unfair to do otherwise on the occasion of reporting a subsequent performance) this writer may summarize his impression as of disappointment both in the composition itself and in its principal protagonist. The impression was strengthened by yesterday's hearing.

Perhaps one expected too much from Mr. Carpenter, a leading American composer for a quarter of a century. Certainly those other major works of his with which one was familiar did not predict the sentimentalism that fairly oozes from the present one. The composer has in the past flirted with jazz, and the musical results have been amusing or exhilarating, according to the point of view of the listener. But in the instance of the Concerto under discussion the jazzy tune is as likely as not to be either cheap or threadbare. The straining after effect is frequently apparent. It is especially irritating in the episodic last movement, where each of numerous changes of tempo seems at last to herald the approaching end, only to resolve itself into another anti-climax.

Mr. Balokovic may be a first-class violinist, and in that case the Concerto is even feebler than it seems. It is at least equally plausible, however, that the soloist might have made the piece more ingratiating than that which emerged yesterday. It seems hardly possible, for example, that Mr. Carpenter had in mind a tone so prevailingly wobbly and fluty, resulting from either dreadfully excessive vibrato or insufficient pressure of bow. Of that he sought a treatment that was so gypsy-like in everything except fire and vigor.

It is also possible that the present writer is all wrong (it has happened before); that both the Concerto and the soloist were of a quality quite different from that which has been set forth, and that Dr. Koussevitzky, putting the work on his program, was not merely paying the expected respect to a major American composer. So the major part of yesterday's audience seemed to think, for their applause was of a duration and volume more than courtesy alone would dictate, even though the composer was on hand to take his bows with conductor

---

ALTERED LIST BY SYMPHONY

B. Post

Carpenter's Violin Work Alone Survives Original Plan

March 4/39

Not in some time has Dr. Koussevitzky so radically altered a Symphony programme as he has that of yesterday afternoon and this evening. Instead of the originally announced "Catalonia" of Albeniz comes Schumann's D minor Symphony, and in place of Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," that composer's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Only the central number, the violin concerto of John Alden Carpenter, in which Zlatko Balokovic is the soloist, survives from the first list.

PLAYED IN THREE CITIES

Whether these changes constituted an improvement, or otherwise, is something for the individual listener to decide. At least the initial programme was a bit fresher than the one which the conductor finally decided.

Regarding the performances of Schumann's intimate Symphony and of Strauss' resplendent tone poem it is altogether safe to use only superlatives, and in the case of the new Concerto these may be presumed. Mr. Balokovic, who has not been heard here in some time, is an excellent violinist, and it is something of a pity that he was not heard yesterday in more substantial music than that of the Chicago composer, agreeable as that work proved to be.

Composed in 1936 Mr. Carpenter's Concerto has been already played by the orchestras of Chicago, Los Angeles and Cleveland and in each case Mr. Balokovic was the soloist.

Like the Symphonies of William Schuman and Roy Harris, recently heard here, Mr. Carpenter's Concerto runs in a single movement, there are, however, three well-defined divisions. As befits the composer of "Krazy Kat" and "Skyscrapers" there are jazzy touches in the Concerto, and as with Mr. Carpenter's "Patterns" and "Danza," the last of his works previously to be heard here, there is much pleasing but somewhat inconsequential melodic material.

The work is scored with the composer's usual skill for large orchestra in which many instruments of percussion are employed. Present in the audience yesterday, Mr. Carpenter was warmly applauded by the audience.

Strauss' Great Poem

Familiar as are the tone poems of Strauss in Boston, there must still be a great many listeners who experience difficulty in recognizing their various divisions. Only those who know these intricate scores at first hand can be perfectly sure which section is which. Mr. Burk's notes on "Zarathustra" might be clearer if it were explained in them that the episode which Strauss entitles "The Convalescent" comes in the midst of that extraordinary fugal passage, "Of Science." It might be gathered that it merely follows it.

Both Schumann and Strauss made yesterday their first appearance of the season at the "regular" Symphony Concerts. Both were welcome.

B. Herald 4/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 18th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Zlatko Balokovic, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Schumann....	Symphony No. 4 in D minor Op. 120
Carpenter.....	Violin Concerto
Strauss.......	"Thus Spake Zarathustra," Tone Poem Op. 30

Dr. Koussevitzky's sweeping change of program for this week's concerts has had, one may hazard, a fortunate result. There are few people who do not prefer Strauss's Zarathustra to his Domestic Symphony; and, whatever the merits of Albeniz's "Catalonia," we may be sure that they could not measure up to Schumann's masterpiece. Altogether it was a splendid concert and not the least because of the fine performance of Schumann's remarkable 4th Symphony. Its originality seldom fails to impress one anew, and Dr. Koussevitzky's partiality for it and sympathetic interpretation of it give proof of the enduring qualities of the music. Those who are wont to decry Schumann's orchestration and proceed to impute his talent as an inventive artist should listen to such a performance as we heard yesterday.

Mr. John Alden Carpenter's Violin Concerto is by no means an unworthy addition to a genre that has few recent peaks of achievement. It is not a classical concerto in the sense that Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms constructed theirs. Rather it is in the category that Sir Donald Tovey asserts was invented by Mendelssohn, an easier and attractive type. In more recent times Sibelius and Prokofieff have, perhaps, been most successful in creating effective violin concertos, though the English would make a strong claim for Elgar. Mr. Carpenter's, since it is more diffuse and less strikingly individual, cannot rank with the Sibelius or the Second Violin Concerto of Prokofieff.

Nevertheless it has some unusual features and as a whole cannot fail to attract an audience. In a sense it is a rhapsody or fantasia whose sections do not defy analysis yet whose entirety is more important and convincing than any episode. There is brilliant passage work for the solo instrument, whose opportunities the composer has at no time neglected. The contrasts of the violin with the full power of the orchestra are also ingeniously wrought.

We wish that Mr. Carpenter had prevailed over his more sentimental side and altered that peculiarly glutinous finish. There was so much that was robust in the earlier parts, nor was the slow section too nostalgic a contrast. Why, then, that coda? It is also only fair to say that the concerto is a fusion of styles rather than unmistakably the composer's own. At the least it is a work that is successful in a very difficult medium.

Mr. Balokovic is obviously an expert violinist. His performance was one of great dexterity and finish. Nor did he neglect, without overdoing, the lyrical side of the concerto. It was a thoroughly confident and easy performance, without being aggressive or indifferent. He seemed to relish, with the able support of conductor and orchestra, bringing out the qualities of the music. Mr. Carpenter was in the audience and shared the applause with Mr. Balokovic.

There is little need to write at this date in detail about the tone poem of Strauss. For us "Thus Spoke Zarathustra," wears well, much better than most. It so blatantly rejoices to run its course that a good performance of it is irresistible. Moreover it has become a war-horse with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, and from any point of view it rode gloriously into battle yesterday.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be in New York.

Carpenter's Violin Concerto

By Alfred H. Meyer

The symphony programs for Friday and Saturday contain one "first performance in Boston." For the third time in three weeks an American composer receives a hearing with a work entirely new to this city. Close upon the youthful Schuman and the now mature Harris comes the established John Alden Carpenter with a Concerto for violin and orchestra.

Mr. Carpenter's concerto was written between March and September, 1936, at Eze Village, in France, and at the composer's summer home at Beverly, Mass. It is dedicated to his wife. It received its first performance on Nov. 18, 1937, at a concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, with Zlatko Baloković as the soloist. This talented violinist has also played the concerto in Cleveland and Los Angeles, and several times in Europe, including his native Yugoslavia. Mr. Baloković will also be the soloist in the concerts of the present week.

The concerto is scored for the large modern orchestra with a rather full percussion group, including many varieties of bells and instruments giving bell-like tone. After the manner of modern concerti, the score is of symphonic proportions and import, and might possibly have been designated a symphonie concertante.

The concerto is in a single movement. It suggests a sonata-allegro in which the middle section or development is replaced by a slow, lyric division. The first, or exposition part, consists of a number of allegros of many varieties—"robustamente," "giojoso," "grazioso," and others. The first theme is heard at once in the orchestra, a "robust" theme entirely in the character of the day in which it is written. After some developments in which both solo violin and orchestra take part, the solo violin announces the second theme, "grazioso," above an orchestral pizzicato. There is also a broadly accented "closing theme."

Then follows a Lento, placed as would be the development of a sonata-allegro, but suggesting a slow movement. Its principal theme is a flowing melody in the lyric style, for the solo violin. Another theme, broader, but still very expressive, follows. A final section recapitulates much of the exposition.

Symphony Program This Week Changed

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts of this week in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, has been changed. The list now reads: Schumann's Fourth Symphony, in D minor; John Alden Carpenter's Violin Concerto, Zlatko Baloković, soloist; Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Brooklyn
MAR 5 - 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HEARD FRIDAY

Fourth in Series of Concerts Will Include Prokofieff's Orchestral Fairy Tale

CIVIC GROUP'S PROGRAM

Schubert's Music and Songs to Be Features at Brooklyn Museum Saturday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its fourth Brooklyn concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday night. The program will include Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as narrator; Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

The concert will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

The Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Frank E. Simmons of 160 Henry Street, Brooklyn, will give a dinner party before the concert for the box guests of Mrs. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester, who will include Mrs. Valentine Seaman, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest P. Goodrich, Jacob C. Klinck and Rudolph Reimer.

Boxholders for Concert

Boxholders for the concert will be Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson of Fort Hamilton, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Miss Florence L. Logan, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, Brooklyn Woman's Club and the All City High School Orchestra members.

Guests of Colonel and Mrs. Brabson will be Major and Mrs. Frank Heywood, Major and Mrs. Albert Wing and Major and Mrs. Charles Griffin. Occupants of the Woman's Club box will be Mrs. Frederick H. Paine, Mrs. William Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. Theodore Vosseler, Mrs. John Vliet and Mrs. Frederick M. Davidson.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 5 - 1939

Boxholders Announced for Symphony Concert on Friday

Socially Prominent Will Entertain Guests at Academy of Music and at Dinners Beforehand; 'Go Young and Fair' Benefit Next Friday

The Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Frank E. Simmons of 160 Henry St. will give a dinner party Friday evening for the box guests of Mrs. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester, preceding the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this season in the Academy of Music. The dinner guests will be Mrs. Lester, Mrs. Valentine Seaman, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest P. Goodrich, Jacob C. Klinck and Rudolph Reimer.

The concert program will include, by popular request, the orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofieff, which was performed with great success this season by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Richard Hale, who acted as narrator, will appear in the same role in the Brooklyn concert. The program, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will include also Vivaldi's concerto in D Minor for orchestra and organ and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A Major.

The Boston Symphony's Brooklyn concerts, now in their 53d season, are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president, and a Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

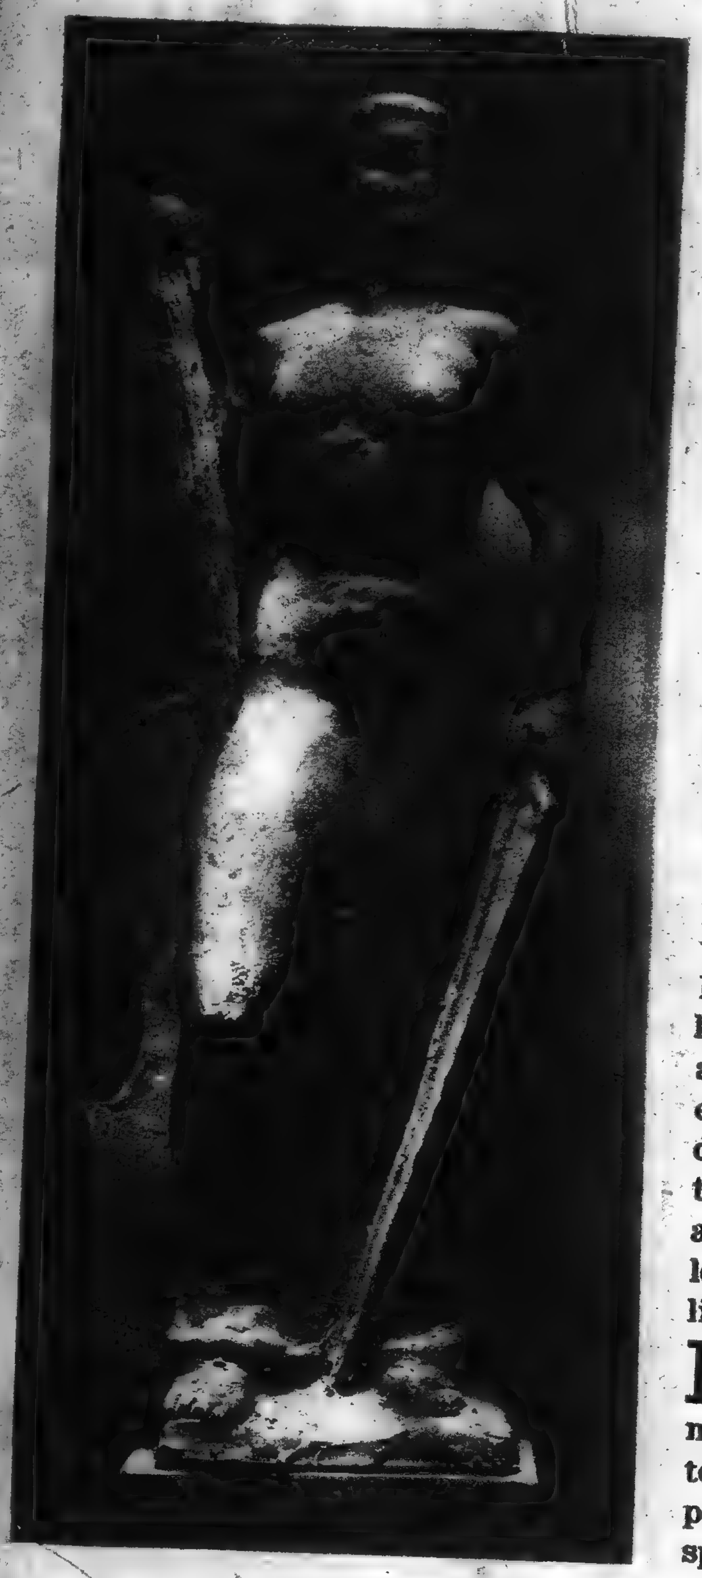
In addition to Mrs. Simmons and Mrs. Lester, boxholders for Friday evening's concert will be Colonel and Mrs. Fay W. Brabson of Fort Hamilton, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Miss Florence L. Logan, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, Brooklyn Woman's Club and the All City High School Orchestra members.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 5 -1939

192

SOARING MUSIC

By SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra



Music

Sculpture by Samuel Bell to stand in the Foreign Government Section.

THE Old World is troubled and shaken. The fundamental principles of civilization have received a blow; not only culture and art but life itself has been put in question. Yet in our own New World there is hope, and if there ever was a time to speak of music in a hopeful voice it is now. It is, indeed, during the troubled periods in history that those who believe in the values and the inheritance of culture should stand in the front rank, battling to help an endangered humanity.

If we glance back into history we find that music, as a vitally essential force, has existed in all times. The cultural standing of a people, as we know, is determined by its creative potency in art, more than in any other field, and music, of all arts, expresses the very depth and soul of a people. Like a living stream, music ever finds its expression in the life of one individual or the history of a whole country; at some time, for a long or short period, it inevitably exists in the life of each man and of each nation. And it is the names and work of creative artists which mark an epoch and remain immortal.

BEING an organic and absolute expression of human life, music accompanies man from the cradle song he hears in his infancy to the funeral march at the passing of his life.

Indeed, it seems that there is no phase in human existence in which music does not play a part. In childhood rhymes and games are accompanied by song; in a hymn man will convey his praise of God; by a love song he will attract the woman of his choice; if he is called to arms to defend his country music will give him courage to encounter the foe and defeat death; in hours of labor a rhythmic song will organize his work and give strength and elasticity to his muscles.

This first and prominent part that music plays in life is, so to speak, on the physical plane of human reflex. The second plane is the pure enjoyment of music as an art, as a source of tonal beauty. This is a higher plane in which music stands beyond daily and practical life.

There is, however, a third and superior plane, when music reveals the truest and most intimate depths of the human soul, when it opens to man the knowledge and perception of new worlds and arouses in him the feeling of ecstasy, of heroic aspirations to high deeds and ideals. Then music reaches the supreme stage of creative power and the height of attainment in art, leaving an imprint on whole epochs of life.

IN our conception of culture we do not mean, of course, the summary of all technical achievements in the outward process of civilization, but the inward spiritual intensity, the inner inclination —all of which is the victory of man over the raw, hard and wild element and the power of animal instinct.

Today the balance between culture and civilization seems considerably disturbed. The inconceivable growth of a mechanistic civilization has lowered the cultural values of contemporary musical art and, by a gradual and persistent flow of events, music has fallen into the clutches of a civilization to which it either voluntarily submits and is thus in subordination or with which it engages in conflict. These two tendencies determine the basic standing of music in contemporary life. On its higher plane music aspires to take possession of the real cultural place that belonged to it in the past.

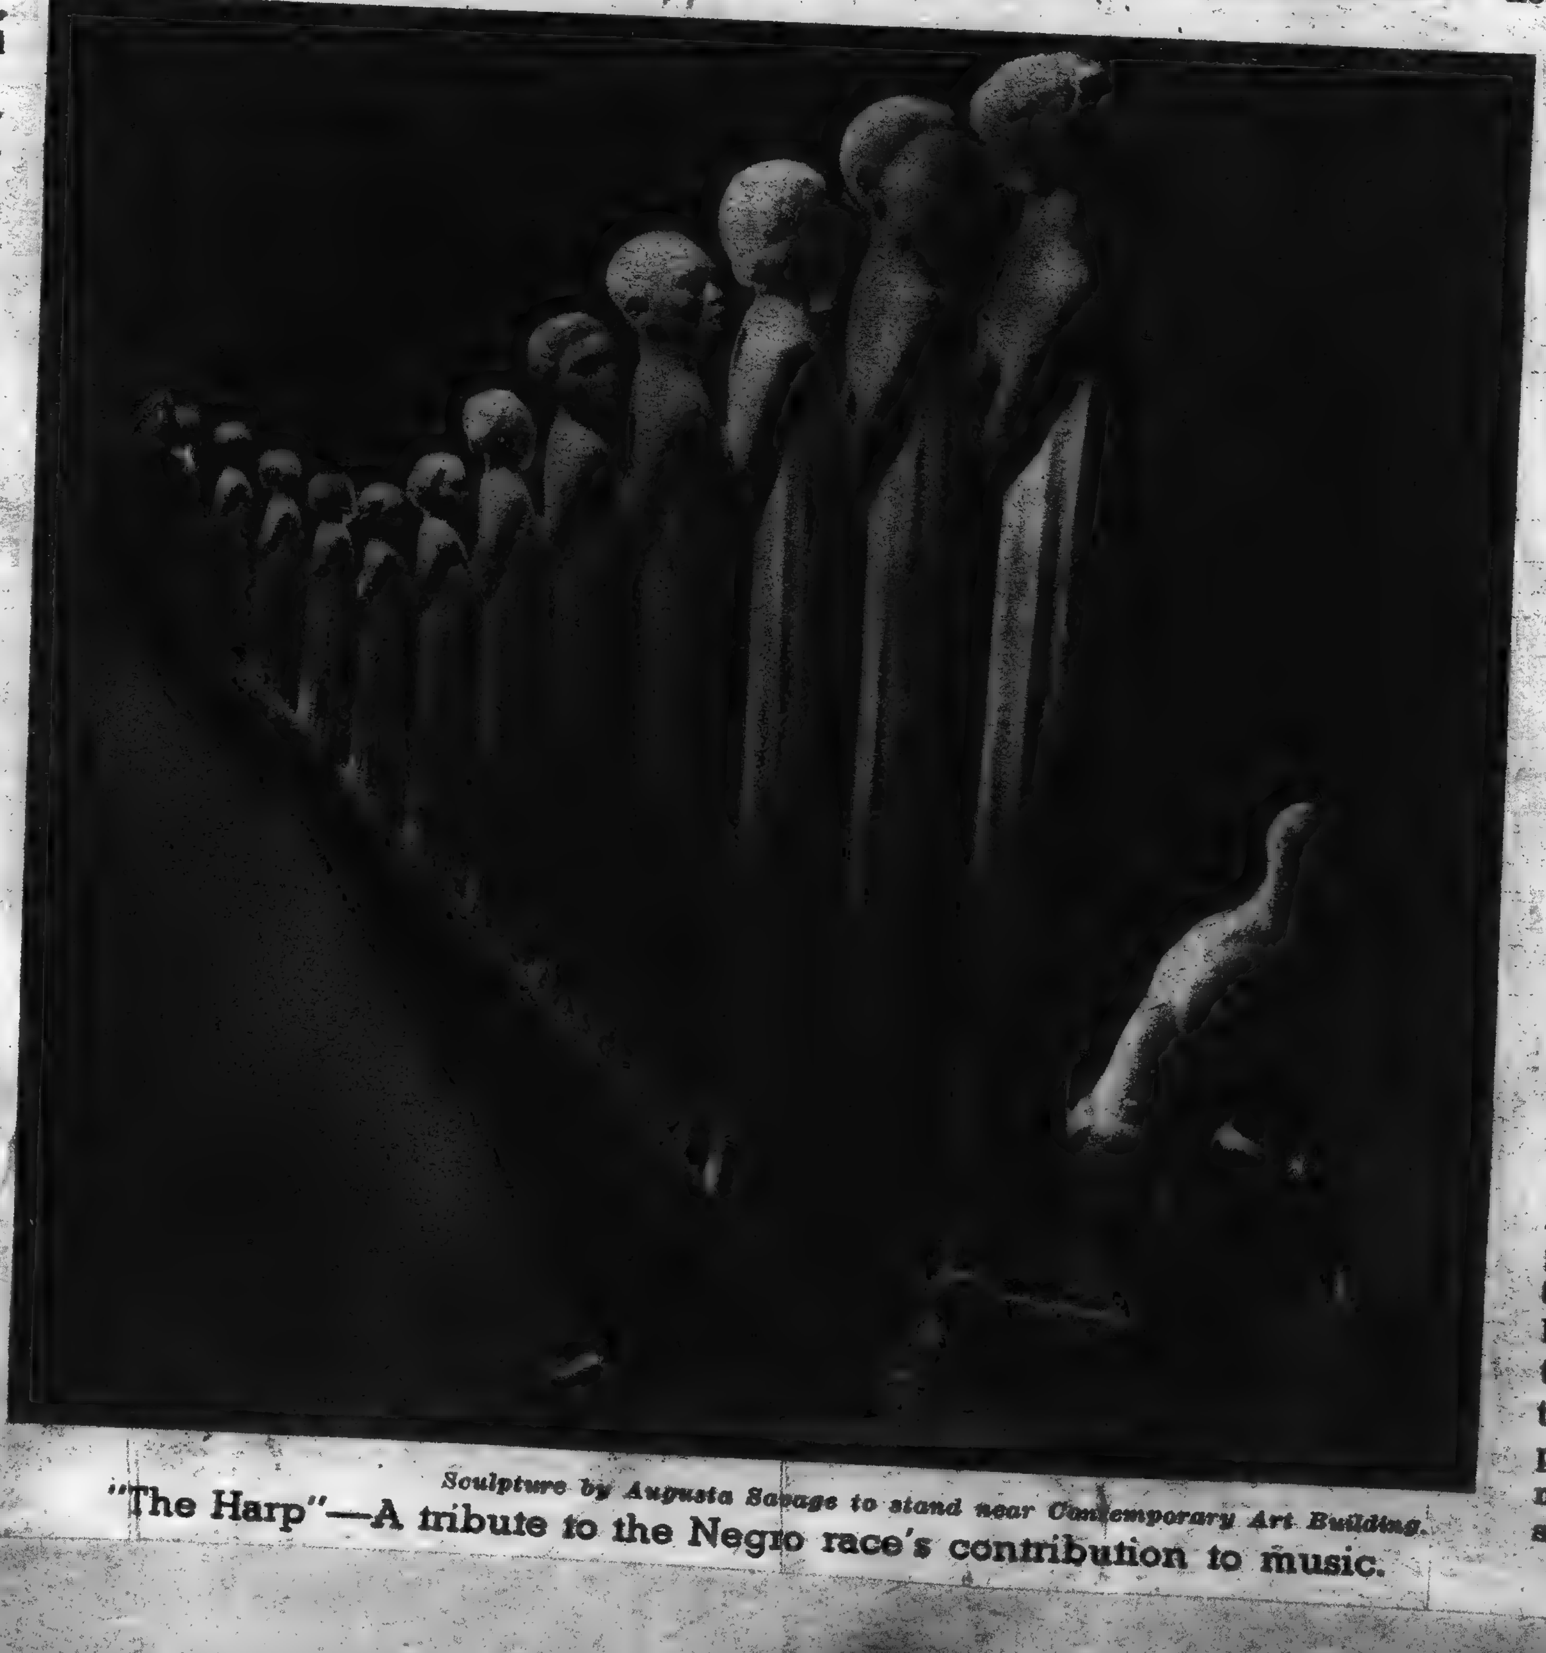
YET, notwithstanding the many actual deadlocks, we are far from reaching pessimistic conclusions; we believe that contemporary music has important advantages. A great factor of our day is the far-reaching accessibility of musical art. The concert world, formerly the guarded sanctum of the élite, has now become a familiar world to millions of men and women. Can any one doubt the profound significance this new factor is bound to have for the immediate and the more distant future? The development of symphonic orchestras and the variety and progress in musical performances may also be taken as a portent of the future. These phenomena by themselves are outstanding attributes of our day.

Dance

Sculpture by Jean de Marco to stand in the Foreign Government Section.

Speaking of music of the future, we can hardly be concerned with the more or less utopian ideas that, in years to come, unheard-of instruments will be invented, electrical apparatus will substitute for entire symphony orchestras or that gigantic organs will be brought in motion by the power of the Atlantic Ocean. Such prophecies present little interest, for they pertain to the question of technical perfection. What seems of vital importance to us is the answer to be given by future musicians to the problems set forth by our time. Music of the future cannot follow the path of mechanization and formalistic artifice. This would mean the loss of art. We do not believe in it. Music will recover its spiritual and deeply humanitarian meaning which today has been considerably lost in Europe.

> "Music of the future will recover its spiritual and humanitarian meaning, which today has been considerably lost."



Sculpture by Augusta Savage to stand near Contemporary Art Building.

"The Harp"—A tribute to the Negro race's contribution to music.

In matters of culture and art, there is no differentiation between the Old World and the New. For as European culture once emerged from ancient Greece, so American culture has absorbed the old culture of Europe. And it is not too much to say that the musical future of the whole world is bound up with the musical future of America. If in the past the torch has been carried from country to country—passing from France to The Netherlands, to England, to Italy, to Germany, to Russia—then it is safe prophecy that America has been singled out to carry forward the banner of musical progress.

THE musical situation in present-day America is not unlike that which existed in Russia during the middle of the nineteenth century. There, too, the seeds of the future musical development of the nation were sown by a host of visiting artists. There, too, it was not until the appearance on the scene of a typical school of Russian composers that the country was able to play its part in the musical culture of the world at large. These "new" Russian composers had the inestimable advantage of basing their art on folklore material. It is interesting to note a similar tendency on the part of certain American composers to find a native musical material upon which to base their symphonies and sonatas.

It is a (Continued on Page 55)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1939

Radcliff Singers To Aid Memorial

Nadia Boulanger, Arranging Fund Concert, Hails Choral Work in Colleges Here

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., March 4.—That Nadia Boulanger should have asked student choruses, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, to sing the choral numbers at the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund Concert, which she is giving in Boston Symphony Hall on Monday evening instead of in Paris, as she has each year at this time, is not surprising in view of her opinion that "in no other country has choral singing among college students developed so far as it has in the United States."

The Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund Concert is a cooperative undertaking, with special emphasis on youth. The concert is under the management of the Longy School of Music, with which Radcliffe has an arrangement whereby its students may study the technique of playing different instruments, or of singing, and extend the time for getting their degree in music from Radcliffe to five or six years.

Sixty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will participate in the memorial concert, and G. Wallace Woodworth, regular conductor of the joint student choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe, will share the baton with Mlle. Boulanger, conducting the first half of the program. The late Lili Boulanger was a sister of Mlle. Boulanger.

Given as a benefit concert to establish a Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund in honor of the brilliant young woman whose career was cut short by an untimely death, the fund established with the proceeds will provide a scholarship for a promising young composer of today.

The committee of judges who will pick the recipient of this scholarship is international in character, consisting of Serge Koussevitzky, Igor Stravinsky, Aaron Copland, Walter Piston and Mlle. Boulanger. Contestants are not restricted to any nationality.

The high development of choral singing which Mlle. Boulanger finds among American college students is exemplified by the joint choruses of Radcliffe and Harvard. Twenty-five and twenty years ago respectively they were singing good music under the leadership of Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and for nearly fifteen years these college students have gone in regularly to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 7 - 1939

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CONCERT TONIGHT

Northampton, March 7—An opportunity to hear new music as well as familiar fare will be offered in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this evening, in John M. Greene hall at 8. The presentation marks the fifth concert in the Smith college concert course, and is expected to attract a capacity audience, including Roy Harris, composer of the opening symphony, and Mrs Harris.

Recently performed in Boston by the Boston orchestra, directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, the Symphony No 3 of Roy Harris has been well received by critics and concert-goers in that vicinity.

Other works on tonight's program include: "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Opus 67, by Prokofieff, with Richard Hale as the narrator, and the symphony No 7 in A major, of Beethoven. Tickets will be on sale at the box office.

SOARING MUSIC

Continued from Page 54)

question whether this obvious dependence of American composers upon Indian, Negro or jazz sources will serve the composers of this country as the folksong of his country served the Russian composer. For obvious reasons the situation is not quite analogous. Already one can see a definite trend on the part of contemporary Americans toward attaching themselves to a more universal musical tradition.

Music in America, whether of the past, the present or the future, depends for its furtherance on the development of three factors: a creative school of native composers, a full flowering of interpretative artists and organizations and a country-wide body of intelligent listeners. The musical history of the United States proves that it is the second element of this indivisible trio which developed first. Indeed, whatever the future may hold in America's musical life, nothing will surpass the incredible transformation from the primitive musical life of the early nineteenth century during the pioneering period, when music was confined to the home and the church, to the picture presented by present-day America.

It is a fact to which every American has a right to point with pride that, having begun by merely inviting the best of interpretative artists of the Old World to its shores, America has known how to weld its own performers into organizations which have a right to be compared with, and in certain fields surpass, similar organizations in Europe. The development of symphonic orchestras in this country, for instance, may be taken as a symbol of the advance in all the interpretative fields.

And it is not the quality of the orchestras alone which is remarkable, but also the breadth and variety of musical fare they present. These and similar organizations lay the groundwork upon which listeners are developed. For it must be remembered that without an educated and responsive music-loving public, there is no chance of having a musical culture. Today American audiences not only show their love and admiration of music but also a deep understanding of the necessity and importance of musical art in the progress of humanity.

A CONVINCING evidence of this is the great musical project for the New York World's Fair of 1939. That project will present music in its manifold and extensive fields, from its early sources, from the folklore of a people or tribe, to the synthesis of our time. Thus music, as never before at a fair, will be set forth not as mere "entertainment" but as an "exhibit" of its own. This will be a unique demonstration and an unprecedented event as well as a great stimulus to creative forces in art. No other than an American community could have had the vision of it and no other country than America could undertake a project of such magnitude. Here, indeed, we can see hope in action in a shaken and troubled world.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 5 - 1939

Boston Symphony To Conclude Woolsey Hall Concert Series

Making its second visit of the season in New Haven, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening. This outstanding musical event will mark the concluding concert of the season's Woolsey Hall Concert Series, and led by the dynamic Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra will present a program calculated to further endear this distinguished body of 110 musicians to the musical public of this vicinity.

Strauss, Prokofieff and Schumann will be the composers represented on the forthcoming program. The Fourth Symphony of Robert Schumann, that in D minor, Opus 120, will open the evening of fine music. The second selection will be Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf."

"Thus Spake Zarathustra", Richard Strauss' tone poem, will bring the evening of fine musical to a brilliant close. This grandly conceived composition, inspired by the prose poem of Friedrich Nietzsche, utilized the richest resources of the orchestra. Several seasons ago the Bostonians played this great Strauss work here with brilliant success, and its repitition on Wednesday evening's program promises a fine finale to a notable concert and one of the finest concert series' in New Haven's musical history.

The widespread and growing interest in fine music has never been better indicated than during the Woolsey Hall Series now drawing to a close. Subscriptions for the six events that comprised the list of offerings totaled the entire seating capacity of spacious Woolsey Hall, and hundreds of requests for reservations could not be accepted. The concerts, in order, were Jascha Heifetz, violinist; the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Amparo and Jose Iturbi, pianists; Marian Anderson, contralto; Walter Gieseking, pianist, and the second appearance of the Boston Orchestra this coming midweek.

Presented under the auspices of the Yale School of Music, the Woolsey Series draws its auditors from all over this section of the state, with New Haven's large concert going public and Yale University's faculty and student body forming a considerable portion of the attendants.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 19 1939

FROM THE MAIL POUCH

Roy Harris's Symphony

To the Music Editor:

In his review of Roy Harris's Symphony No. 3, performed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday afternoon, Mr. Downes asks the reader to accept "at his own value" what he says of the symphony, since tardiness caused him to miss the first five minutes of the work.

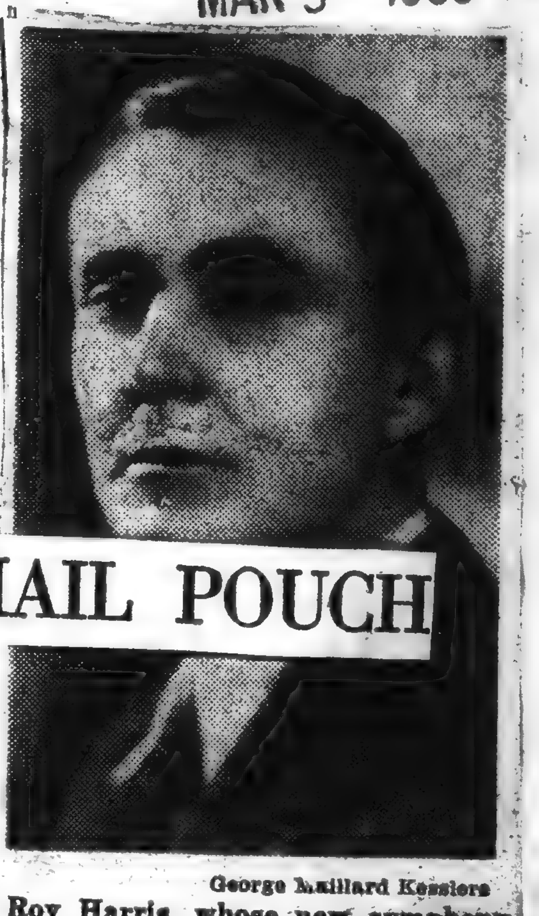
I am sure that other readers of THE TIMES feel with me that an event so important to our music as the first performance of Harris's new work in our city deserves some full report in the paper we choose to read. Therefore, may I be permitted to express my thoughts on the third symphony after having heard it twice, in addition to Saturday's performance.

This symphony seems to me an extraordinary work. Its melodic material reveals once again Harris's remarkable gift. The contrapuntal writing is explicit, the orchestration is original and colorful. The harmonic texture is decidedly on the consonant side, although the combinations are largely polytonal. These materials are successfully wrought into a form, autogenetic in character, wherein each idea is brought to its logical conclusion. Beyond these considerations, the symphony has dramatic fire and a definite sense of direction, which gives it great power.

WILLIAM SCHUMAN.
Bronxville, N. Y., March 14, 1939.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1939



George Maillard Kesslere

Roy Harris, whose new symphony will be played by Boston Orchestra.

Thursday

National Opera Club of America, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, 2:15 P. M. Program of Irish music. Participants: Julia Rooney Lennon, Clifford Williams, Irish songs, Rhys Morgan and others.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Zlatko Balokovic, violin.

Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120, ...Schumann
Concerto for violin and orchestra (first time) ....Carpenter
Tone Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," Op. 30 ....Strauss

Mara Sebriansky, violin recital, the MacDowell Club, 8:30 P. M.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; narrator, Richard Hale.

Concerto in D minor for orchestra, ...Vivaldi-Siloti
"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Op. 67........Prokofieff
Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92....Beethoven

Saturday

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Ruth Posselt, violin; narrator, Richard Hale.

Symphony No. 3 (first time)...Roy Harris
Concerto for violin in D, Op. 35, ...Tchaikovsky
"Peter and the Wolf," Op. 67....Prokofieff
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem.....Ravel

B. Her.
March /39

MUSIC

PHILHARMONIC SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, John Barbirolli, conductor, gave a concert last night in Symphony Hall under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony. Artur Schnabel, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Berlioz..Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9.
Beethoven..Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 73.
Mendelssohn..Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Op. 20.
Brahms..Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.

It is an odd fact that visiting orchestras in Boston do not attract as large a public as they usually deserve. Last night, for instance, there was an audience that filled three-fourths of Symphony Hall, and a wildly enthusiastic audience to boot. But, in spite of the weather, the hall should have been full for so justly renowned an institution as the Philharmonic and so splendid a concert as it did, in fact, present. There is a hint of smugness in a public that will only turn out in force for an orchestra and a conductor that is theirs by right, particularly when there is so much for interest and profit in a judicious, personal comparison.

The Philharmonic is thrice familiar to the public by dint of its Sunday afternoon broadcasts, but by no stretch of the imagination did it sound yesterday as mild as those agreeable, but somewhat soporific, occasions always turn out to be. Mr. Barbirolli made his first appearance in Boston as a conductor last night, and one may at once hope that it will not be his last. He is an interpreter possessed of a sound musical knowledge and taste that inform his readings and that, with a natural vigor and intensity of temperament, make for singularly vital and stimulating performances. It would be impossible to take serious issue with any interpretation last night. The orchestra was clearly on its mettle, and the concert was decidedly rewarding from any point of view.

It might still be said that Mr. Schnabel's performance of the Beethoven E flat concerto was the most impressive feature of the concert. It was piano playing by the master and scholar, who is so rightly respected for his integrity and authority, of a high order even for him. There will be many in last night's audience who will declare that this was "echt-Beethoven." That is a small and even disputable matter, for Beethoven's genius admits of more than one cast of interpretation. It was, at any rate, a superbly co-ordinated performance from both soloist's and orchestra's side.

Mr. Barbirolli, having begun the concert with the brilliant Berlioz overture, continued it with the delightfully ethereal Scherzo of Mendelssohn, the Mendelssohn of the pre-oratorio and Birmingham festival days. One might dispute the perfection of sonority in the wind in the Brahms Symphony, as compared, say, with our own orchestra; but it was an eloquent and thoroughly just and unsentimental performance. The audience, in contrast to our preliminary remarks about size and proper support of "foreign" orchestras, applauded tremendously and stamped to a degree that is seldom heard in Symphony Hall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1939

Zlatko Balokovic, who plays first performance of John Alden Carpenter violin concerto with Boston Symphony this week.

Geoffrey Landesman

193

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1939

Radcliff Singers To Aid Memorial

Nadia Boulanger, Arranging Fund Concert, Hails Choral Work in Colleges Here

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., March 4.—That Nadia Boulanger should have asked student choruses, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, to sing the choral numbers at the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund Concert, which she is giving in Boston Symphony Hall on Monday evening instead of in Paris, as she has each year at this time, is not surprising in view of her opinion that "in no other country has choral singing among college students developed so far as it has in the United States."

The Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund Concert is a cooperative undertaking, with special emphasis on youth. The concert is under the management of the Longy School of Music, with which Radcliffe has an arrangement whereby its students may study the technique of playing different instruments, or of singing, and extend the time for getting their degree in music from Radcliffe to five or six years.

Sixty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will [illegible]cipate in the memorial concert, and G. Wallace Woodworth, regular conductor of the joint student choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe, will share the baton with Mlle. Boulanger, conducting the first half of the program. The late Lili Boulanger was a sister of Mlle. Boulanger.

Given as a benefit concert to establish a Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund in honor of the brilliant young woman whose career was cut short by an untimely death, the fund established with the proceeds will provide a scholarship for a promising young composer of today.

The committee of judges who will pick the recipient of this scholarship is international in character, consisting of Serge Koussevitzky, Igor Stravinsky, Aaron Copland, Walter Piston and Mlle. Boulanger. Contestants are not restricted to any nationality.

The high development of choral singing which Mlle. Boulanger finds among American college students is exemplified by the joint choruses of Radcliffe and Harvard. Twenty-five and twenty years ago respectively they were singing good music under the leadership of Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and for nearly fifteen years these college students have gone in regularly to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 7 - 1939

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CONCERT TONIGHT

Northampton, March 7—An opportunity to hear new music as well as familiar fare will be offered in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this evening in John M. Greene hall at 8. The presentation marks the fifth concert in the Smith college concert course, and is expected to attract a capacity audience, including Roy Harris, composer of the opening symphony, and Mrs Harris.

Recently performed in Boston by the Boston orchestra, directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, the Symphony No 3 of Roy Harris has been well received by critics and concert-goers in that vicinity.

Other works on tonight's program include: "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Opus 67, by Prokofieff, with Richard Hale as the narrator, and the symphony No 7 in A major, of Beethoven. Tickets will be on sale at the box office.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 5 - 1939

Boston Symphony To Conclude Woolsey Hall Concert Series

Making its second visit of the season in New Haven, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening. This outstanding musical event will mark the concluding concert of the season's Woolsey Hall Concert Series, and led by the dynamic Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra will present a program calculated to further endear this distinguished body of 110 musicians to the musical public of this vicinity.

Strauss, Prokofieff and Schumann will be the composers represented on the forthcoming program. The Fourth Symphony of Robert Schumann, that in D minor, Opus 120, will open the evening of fine music. The second selection will be Prokofieff's orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf."

"Thus Spake Zarathustra", Richard Strauss' tone poem, will bring the evening of fine musical to a brilliant close. This grandly conceived composition, inspired by the prose poem of Friedrich Nietzsche, utilized the richest resources of the orchestra. Several seasons ago the Bostonians played this great Strauss work here with brilliant success, and its repitition on Wednesday evening's program promises a fine finale to a notable concert and one of the finest concert series' in New Haven's musical history.

The widespread and growing interest in fine music has never been better indicated than during the Woolsey Hall Series now drawing to a close. Subscriptions for the six events that comprised the list of offerings totaled the entire seating capacity of spacious Woolsey Hall, and hundreds of requests for reservations could not be accepted. The concerts, in order, were Jascha Heifetz, violinist; the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Amparo and Jose Iturbi, pianists; Marian Anderson, contralto; Walter Gieseking, pianist, and the second appearance of the Boston Orchestra this coming midweek.

Presented under the auspices of the Yale School of Music, the Woolsey Series draws its auditors from all over this section of the state, with New Haven's large concert going public and Yale University's faculty and student body forming a considerable portion of the attendants.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 19 1939

OF PAS

Roy Harris's Symphony

To the Music Editor:

In his review of Roy Harris's Symphony No. 3, performed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday afternoon, Mr. Downes asks the reader to accept "at his own value" what he says of the symphony, since tardiness caused him to miss the first five minutes of the work.

I am sure that other readers of THE TIMES feel with me that an event so important to our music as the first performance of Harris's new work in our city deserves some full report in the paper we choose to read. Therefore, may I be permitted to express my thoughts on the third symphony after having heard it twice, in addition to Saturday's performance.

This symphony seems to me an extraordinary work. Its melodic material reveals once again Harris's remarkable gift. The contrapuntal writing is explicit, the orchestration is original and colorful. The harmonic texture is decidedly on the consonant side, although the combinations are largely polytonal. These materials are successfully wrought into a form, autogenetic in character, wherein each idea is brought to its logical conclusion. Beyond these considerations, the symphony has dramatic fire and a definite sense of direction, which gives it great power.

WILLIAM SCHUMAN.
Bronxville, N. Y., March 14, 1939.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1939

George Maillard Kesslere

Roy Harris, whose new symphony will be played by Boston Orchestra.

Thursday

National Opera Club of America, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, 2:15 P. M. Program of Irish music. Participants: Julia Rooney Lennon, Clifford Williams, Irish songs, Rhys Morgan and others.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Zlatko Balokovic, violin.

Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120, Schumann
Concerto for violin and orchestra (first time) .... Carpenter
Tone Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," Op. 30 .... Strauss

Mara Sebriansky, violin recital, the MacDowell Club, 8:30 P. M.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; narrator, Richard Hale.

Concerto in D minor for orchestra, Vivaldi-Siloti
"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children, Op. 67 .... Prokofieff
Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92 .... Beethoven

Saturday

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Ruth Posselt, violin; narrator, Richard Hale.

Symphony No. 3 (first time) ... Roy Harris
Concerto for violin in D, Op. 35, Tchaikovsky
"Peter and the Wolf," Op. 67 .... Prokofieff
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem ..... Ravel

SOARING MUSIC

(Continued from Page 54)

question whether this obvious dependence of American composers upon Indian, Negro or jazz sources will serve the composers of this country as the folksong of his country served the Russian composer. For obvious reasons the situation is not quite analogous. Already one can see a definite trend on the part of contemporary Americans toward attaching themselves to a more universal musical tradition.

Music in America, whether of the past, the present or the future, depends for its furtherance on the development of three factors: a creative school of native composers, a full flowering of interpretative artists and organizations and a country-wide body of intelligent listeners. The musical history of the United States proves that it is the second element of this indivisible trio which developed first. Indeed, whatever the future may hold in America's musical life, nothing will surpass the incredible transformation from the primitive musical life of the early nineteenth century during the pioneering period, when music was confined to the home and the church, to the picture presented by present-day America.

It is a fact to which every American has a right to point with pride that, having begun by merely inviting the best of interpretative artists of the Old World to its shores, America has known how to weld its own performers into organizations which have a right to be compared with, and in certain fields surpass, similar organizations in Europe. The development of symphonic orchestras in this country, for instance, may be taken as a symbol of the advance in all the interpretative fields.

And it is not the quality of the orchestras alone which is remarkable, but also the breadth and variety of musical fare they present. These and similar organizations lay the groundwork upon which listeners are developed. For it must be remembered that without an educated and responsive music-loving public, there is no chance of having a musical culture. Today American audiences not only show their love and admiration of music but also a deep understanding of the necessity and importance of musical art in the progress of humanity.

A CONVINCING evidence of this is the great musical project for the New York World's Fair of 1939. That project will present music in its manifold and extensive fields, from its early sources, from the folklore of a people or tribe, to the synthesis of our time. Thus music, as never before at a fair, will be set forth not as mere "entertainment" but as an "exhibit" of its own. This will be a unique demonstration and an unprecedented event as well as a great stimulus to creative forces in art. No other than an American community could have had the vision of it and no other country than America could undertake a project of such magnitude. Here, indeed, we can see hope in action in a shaken and troubled world.

B. Her.
March /39

MUSIC

PHILHARMONIC SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, John Barbirolli, conductor, gave a concert last night in Symphony Hall under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony. Artur Schnabel, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Berlioz..Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9.
Beethoven..Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 73.
Mendelssohn..Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Op. 20.
Brahms..Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.

It is an odd fact that visiting orchestras in Boston do not attract as large a public as they usually deserve. Last night, for instance, there was an audience that filled three-fourths of Symphony Hall, and a wildly enthusiastic audience to boot. But, in spite of the weather, the hall should have been full for so justly renowned an institution as the Philharmonic and so splendid a concert as it did, in fact, present. There is a hint of smugness in a public that will only turn out in force for an orchestra and a conductor that is theirs by right, particularly when there is so much for interest and profit in a judicious, personal comparison.

The Philharmonic is thrice familiar to the public by dint of its Sunday afternoon broadcasts, but by no stretch of the imagination did it sound yesterday as mild as those agreeable, but somewhat soporific, occasions always turn out to be. Mr. Barbirolli made his first appearance in Boston as a conductor last night, and one may at once hope that it will not be his last. He is an interpreter possessed of a sound musical knowledge and taste that inform his readings and that, with a natural vigor and intensity of temperament, make for singularly vital and stimulating performances. It would be impossible to take serious issue with any interpretation last night. The orchestra was clearly on its mettle, and the concert was decidedly rewarding from any point of view.

It might still be said that Mr. Schnabel's performance of the Beethoven E flat concerto was the most impressive feature of the concert. It was piano playing by the master and scholar, who is so rightly respected for his integrity and authority, of a high order even for him. There will be many in last night's audience who will declare that this was "echt-Beethoven." That is a small and even disputable matter, for Beethoven's genius admits of more than one cast of interpretation. It was, at any rate, a superbly co-ordinated performance from both soloist's and orchestra's side.

Mr. Barbirolli, having begun the concert with the brilliant Berlioz overture, continued it with the delightfully ethereal Scherzo of Mendelssohn, the Mendelssohn of the pre-oratorio and Birmingham festival days. One might dispute the perfection of sonority in the wind in the Brahms Symphony, as compared, say, with our own orchestra; but it was an eloquent and thoroughly just and unsentimental performance. The audience, in contrast to our preliminary remarks about size and proper support of "foreign" orchestras, applauded tremendously and stamped to a degree that is seldom heard in Symphony Hall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1939

Zlatko Balokovic, who plays first performance of John Alden Carpenter violin concerto with Boston Symphony this week.

Geoffrey Landesman

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 5 - 1939

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which concludes the Woolsey concert series Wednesday evening, as his players see him.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 7 - 1939

Smith College

Boston Symphony At Smith Tonight

NORTHAMPTON, March 6—New music as well as familiar fare will be offered in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday in John M. Greene Hall, Smith College, at 8. It will be the fifth concert in the Smith College Concert Course, and is expected to attract a capacity audience, including among other notables, Roy Harris, composer of the opening symphony, and Mrs. Harris. An effort was made early today to engage Mr. Harris to speak before the college and public in Sage Hall Tuesday at 4.

Recently performed in Boston by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, the Symphony No. 3 of Roy Harris has been well received by critics and concert-goers in that vicinity. Other works on Tuesday's program include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale by Prokofieff, and the Symphony, No. 7 in A Major of Beethoven.

Tickets will be on sale at the box office preceding the concert.

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

MAR 5 -1939

Recorded Music

+ + +

Mature Haydn

By Harry Sheer

CLASSICAL

HAYDN: Symphony No. 102 (RCA-Victor, six 12 in. sides). Haydn generally has been criticized for being a miniature Beethoven in composing frothy, delicate minuets, et al . . . Here, however, is the mature Haydn in the 102nd of his 104 authentic symphonies, and with what passionate power and brilliance! . . . No doubt it is Haydn's most dramatic symphony, and yet one feels here and there the Beethoven touch, as if by design . . . Serge Koussevitzky's direction of the Boston symphony orchestra is admirable for its prodigious understanding and its unlimited sensitivity to Haydn's score . . . The recording is superior.

---

2 Symphonies Conducted by Koussevitzky

N. Y. Tribune

Boston Orchestra Program Here Contains Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works

March 2 1939

Serge Koussevitzky, whose programs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Carnegie Hall visits may nearly always be depended upon to include some work by a contemporary composer, either one wholly new or at least one seldom heard, joined the arch-conservatives Thursday night. At the fifth and final concert of the organization's evening series, it chose to perform two of the most familiar symphonies — the Seventh of Beethoven, and the Fourth of Tchaikovsky. That this procedure pleased the patrons of the orchestra was obvious. Every available seat was occupied, and the audience, which included standees, was unstinting with its expressions of approval.

The interpretations accorded these two symphonies furthered convictions long held that while Mr. Koussevitzky admires the genius of Beethoven, he brings profound affection, as well as deep understanding, to his conveyances of the Russian master's creations.

For, despite the implacably rhythmic and technically authoritative disclosure of the first, third and fourth movements of the Beethoven A major symphony, the Dionysiac spirit of the music was not imparted and the melancholy allegretto movement was too objectively set forth.

Quite another matter was the Tchaikovsky F minor Symphony. The impassioned, intensely dramatic first movement, the nostalgically tinged andantino, the fleet scherzo and the flamboyantly theatrical finale all appeal strongly to Mr. Koussevitzky and he conducted throughout with fiery intensity, eliciting striking tonal effects from his musicians. J. D. B.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

MAR 8 - 1939

BURGIN LEADS ORCHESTRA AT SMITH CONCERT

Koussevitzky Unable to Conduct Boston Symphony at College

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 8—A program of unusual interest was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Due to illness, Dr. Koussevitzky could not be present but his place was admirably filled by Richard Burgin. John M. Greene Hall was filled to capacity for the annual concert by the Boston players is always one of the major events of the season at Smith College.

Composer Present

Two living composers were represented on the program and one, Roy Harris, was present to hear his "Symphony No. 3" played and to receive the plaudits of the audience. The other was Prokofieff, represented by his charming orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf." Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A major" completed the program.

Ever since the works of Roy Harris became known he has been a significant figure in American music. He always has something to say and says it in his own peculiar manner, usually straightforward writing, arresting in quality and entirely his own. His third symphony is in one movement divided into four sections. The amount of percussion in it must delight the heart of the percussionists.

The work opens dramatically with a theme for the lower strings. As it progresses, strings, horns and woodwinds are heard, then a veritable rainbow of color comes from the woodwinds after which the percussions appear. Following the fourth section one hears clever rhythmic developments and some passages of sullen mumbling. The work shows a marked growth in technical facility over "Johnny Comes Marching Home," written in 1934. The symphony was completed the first of this year.

If Roy Harris may be considered the most significant figure in American music, surely Prokofieff may be considered the outstanding contemporary composer. His "Classical Symphony," piano concerto, "Lieutenant Keji," played last summer at Stockbridge, and his violin concerto all bear the mark of genius. His unfailing humor, melodic sense and clever rhythms and craftsmanship carry hi mto a high place among the living composers.

These attributes were never more clearly realized than in "Peter and the Wolf." Aside from the music there was the magnificent voice of Richard Hale to narrate the story. Each character in the story is represented by an instrument, for example, the bluebird by the flute; grandfather by the bassoon; the wolf by three horns, and the duck by the clarinet, to say nothing of the hunters who were ushered in by the kettledrums and bass drums. Mr. Hale would read a portion of the story and then the orchestra would play that part and so on to the end. It was all very enjoyable and players and audience seemed to have a fine time.

Mr. Burgin's reading of the Seventh Symphony was one of the finest heard for a long time. Strangely enough both the Philadelphia and Cleveland orchestras included it on their programs hereabouts. The mighty surge of the music was fully realized and once again the superb tone and color of this great orchestra was revealed in all its beauty. Round after round of applause called Mr. Burgin back several times, applause which he shared with the players.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 9 - 1939

17

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES CAPACITY AUDIENCE HERE

With the usual calm acceptance o' oft-repeated pleasure, a capacity audience last evening heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, as final event in the Woolsey Series. The program listed three works of a sufficiently varied nature to add a line or two, but no more, to New Haven's musical progress.

It is no great slur on Doctor Koussevitsky's judgment to remark that none of the works chosen for this program are of first-rate importance in the history of music. Schumann's Fourth Symphony (actually the Second in point of composition) is filled with charm and loveliness of melody and harmony. Sublimely unregardful of accepted formal structure it constantly unfolds verdant colorings of string and wood-wind tone without a single Beethovenian shake of the fist or philosophic brooding. It is reminded that music may be beautiful and nothing more. When played by an aggregation so notable for its tonal virtues as is the Boston Symphony, the performance becomes a glowing and absorbing treat to the ear.

Woof!

The history of music in the concert hall is punctuated with works which make sensational appeals to the audiences. The last, if we recall rightly, was Ravel's "Bolero" which went the circuit of "Pop" concerts and, judging by the style of that work, is probably inexhaustible in its appeal. Prokofieff has taken a fairy-tale called "Peter and the Wolf," dressed it up with some gay ribbons found recumbent in the orchestra, and set a narrator before us as novelty. Obviously, the work has merit of its own quite apart from the remarkable cleverness of the dress, and the repertory of the children's concerts will be hearing more of Peter's adventure. Mr. Richard Hale is here denominated our favorite story-teller, and we shall miss him tonight.

Richard Second

Since the composer of "Peter and the Wolf" owes much to Richard Strauss as master of the orchestra, a comparison of the two techniques is permissable even though the subject matter has great disparity with "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Few persons today among the general public are qualified to argue the continued acceptance of the ideas contained in Nietzsche's work of the same name; furthermore, Strauss has not intended to write philosophical music or portray Nietzsche's work musically, although copious program notes are appended at every performance. Some of it reads very strangely indeed and much of the music sounds very dull, relieved by blatant portions.

There is much grandeur in Strauss' employment of the full orchestra, and a touching pathos in the gentler sections. Somehow both fail to move this reviewer as they did in days gone by, and the impression persists that much of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is everblown, pompous, and a rather faded relic of the post-Wagnerian school.

Other listeners last evening, however, may rise up to object; most of us just rose and went out into the night. There was no lack of appreciation for the magnificent playing of the orchestra, or implication of genial pleasure at the announcement that the Boston Symphony will return for two concerts in the season 1939-1940.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 8 - 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FINE RECITAL AT SMITH COLLEGE

Magnificent Performance of Beethoven Seventh High Light of Concert Conducted by Richard Burgin

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 7—The Boston Symphony orchestra appeared this evening at John M. Greene hall, in the Smith college concert course, with Richard Burgin conducting, in place of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, who was unable to appear because of a severe cold. The feature of the evening was a magnificent performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

This is a symphony which this orchestra has played in so notable a way under Mr Koussevitzky that notice of the change of conductors caused disappointment which was soon relieved. As concertmaster and assistant conductor, Mr Burgin is in the closest possible touch with the orchestra and is always prepared to give either an announced program or any other. Under such circumstances it is needless to inquire how much of the interpretation of the symphony was his own. It was in any case a noble presentation of one of the greatest of all Beethoven's orchestral works, with none of the perfunctory character often resulting from such a change at the last moment.

The first movement was not decisive, but after a weighty pause leader and men threw themselves into the tragic grandeur of the famous allegretto with an intensity which soon brought a curious hush over the audience. From that point on the effect was cumulative. The orchestra played with sparkling brilliance in the presto and achieved great emotional power in the recurrent mournful contrasting strain. The whole performance was full of life and was conceived in a large way, yet with no sacrifice of fineness. From Mr Burgin, an exquisite violinist, fineness is a matter of course, but he has power too, as the performance of the symphony showed.

For the rest, the program was rather disappointing, not so much in the separate items as in the meagerness of the space allotted to first-class music by a first-class orchestra for a concert in a town which so seldom hears great symphonies greatly played. There was reason for giving the third symphony by the well-known American composer Roy Harris, a work so new that it was first played in public on February 24.

It interested the audience also, and interest was of course hightened by the presence of the composer, who was called to the stage to acknowledge hearty applause. It was, moreover, a short symphony, cast in a single movement not much more than 20 minutes in length, an allotment of time to an important new American work which certainly cannot be deemed excessive.

Prokofieff Fairy Tale

There was reason also for including so intriguing a novelty as Serge Prokofieff's comic strip "Peter and the Wolf," with the running narrative admirably recited by Richard Hale. It perhaps fits better the atmosphere of a "pop," but its clever composer has outdone himself in this entertaining fairy tale, nominally for children, and it may be regarded as a suitable diversion for a symphony program under the right conditions.

The trouble is that the 25 minutes or so allotted to this amusing skit, added to the time given to the unleavened bread of Mr Harris's original but not very artistically developed symphony, filled the first half of the program, leaving the Beethoven symphony standing alone to show what splendid things creative genius can evoke from the varied voices of a great orchestra.

Under the circumstances, the distribution of time was out of just proportion. In its own genre the Prokofieff work is a masterpiece. The Harris symphony is far from being that, but it does show an individual quality which commands respect and may lead to something. The inclusion of both left the program, aside from the fine performance of the seventh symphony, disappointingly thin.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAR 8 - 1939

Boston Symphony Is Acclaimed In Annual Smith College Concert

Burgin Conducts in Dr. Koussevitzky's Absence; Composer Present to Hear Own Work

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 8—A program of unusual interest was played

Artistic Hand Termed 'the Bunk' By Hofmann, in Boston for Recital

B. Her. March 8/39

The fiction of the "artistic hand," the description given a slender hand with long, tapering fingers, has been destroyed by leading technicians in music and sculpture, notably by Josef Hofmann, famed pianist.

"The artistic hand is the bunk," said Hofmann, who will appear in a recital in Symphony Hall this afternoon. His strong hands are almost square. "The length of the fingers must be in proportion to the width of the hand, but it is the width which I consider most important," he explained.

"The genuine piano hand must be broad, in order to give each finger a strong base for the action of its phalanges and to give the base space enough for the development of muscles. Nearly all the great technicians had or have hands of such proportion."

The almost effeminate hand which tradition has designated as "artistic" would not have the strength necessary for great piano technique, according to Hofmann. One of the favorite anecdotes told by a former secretary of Ignace Jan Paderewski concerns the Polish pianist's amusement at showing the power of a single finger by bringing it down on a quarter-inch thickness of glass with such force as to shatter it.

Although the graceful gestures of Serge Koussevitzky have been greatly admired, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has hands which are broad, with powerful, square-tipped fingers.

Study of the construction of hands was a favorite hobby of the late Dr. Frederick Cotton, noted bone surgeon, sculptor and painter. In a conversation before his death, he ridiculed talk of the "delicate" hands of a surgeon, and the "pretty" hands of the artist.

Holding up his strong, broad hands with their square-tipped fingers, he said, "Look at those mitts! There are the so-called delicate hands of a surgeon and, if you like, the hands of an artist, too. So far as I have ever been able to determine, the leaders in art and surgery all have strong, capable, practical hands. They may be sensitive, that is true, but it is a case of capable hands being guided by a sensitive mind."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

MAR 9 - 1939

SCHNABEL SOLOIST WITH PHILHARMONIC

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra was heard in the first of its weekly pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall last night, the concert having been moved up from the regular Thursday evening to make room for an appearance of the Boston Orchestra. John Barbirolli conducted, and the soloist was Artur Schnabel who played the solo part in the Brahms Concerto in B-flat major for Piano and Orchestra. The symphony of the evening was the first, in C major, of Beethoven. The concert opened with the Ralph Vaughan Williams "Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis," for double string orchestra.

After Mr. Barbirolli and the orchestra had offered their subscribers and guests a strenuous. but expertly accomplished Beethoven First, and an intermission had gone by, Mr. Schnabel appeared for his Brahms Concerto.

In many respects, Mr. Schnabel creates a nobler effect when he is heard in conjunction with an orchestra and its conductor. When about a hundred and two cooks have a personal interest in the musical broth, the result is generally an arbitration in favor of the absent composer. Mr. Barbirolli and Mr. Schnabel had labored well for Brahms, and the concerto enjoyed an equable and well-received exposition. If occasionally the pianist's tone was overly crisp and that of the orchestra excessively rich in comparison, the poetic close of the slow movement, the deft agility of of the final movement and the brusque clarity in the playing of the work as a whole, were three of the numerous virtues that made up amply for it.

O'G.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 8 - 1939

Boston Symphony Makes Roy Harris' Work Its Feature

Composition First Played Two Weeks Ago Is Introduced to Northampton Audience. Richard Burgin Conducts

Roy Harris' Third Symphony, composed during the autumn of last year and first performed in Boston less than two weeks ago, was introduced to Northampton last evening at the Boston Symphony concert in John M. Greene hall.

There were no preliminaries; No music of the past to avert interests of an expectant audience; no opportunity for the listener to relax and listen to Bach, Mozart or Beethoven speak in their familiar languages. Richard Burgin, conducting in the place of Serge Koussevitsky (who at the last moment was unable to be present because of a severe cold), turned immediately to the considerable task of revealing this new work, the most important event of the program.

Perhaps it would be well to preface observations of Mr Harris' symphony with some notice of remarks made by the composer during his talk in Sage hall yesterday afternoon. For certain of his statements pertain vitally to the importance of hearing any new work.

Mr. Harris mentioned the inevitable "ear habit" of musical listeners. Our ears, he said, become trained to the language of 18th and 19th century music, and it is difficult for them to break this training in order to accept other idioms. This is to be remembered when we hear the new language.

The problem facing the American composer is to justify hope placed in him by those who support his work, continued Mr. Harris. That men of his ability realize this fact is encouraging for the future of American music, but it is an equally serious correlate that American audiences face the problem of justifying the hope placed in them by earnest composers. As Mr. Harris has written:

"It remains to be seen whether Whitman's 'I Hear America Singing' will prove to be the dying echo of an overconfident hope, or the prophecy of strong voices arising from the lives of millions of Americans."

Musical listeners, then, should be tolerant. They should realize that their ears have become trained to a musical language of past centuries. If they do not like a new work at first hearing, they should hear it again and again before they dismiss it as worthless. This they owe to the composer and, what is more important, to themselves.

So it is not for those who heard Harris' Third Symphony for the first time last evening to prophecy that the work will or will not take a significant place in future musical literature. It was Mr. Burgin's and the orchestra's task to perform the symphony for all it was worth (need it be said that they did?); the listener was to react one way or another.

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD - TRIBUNE

MAR 1 0 1939

Koussevitzky Directs Music By Carpenter

Balakovic Soloist as Boston Orchestra Introduces Violin Concerto Here

Serge Koussevitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestera to Carnegie Hall last night for its fourth concert in its evening series. The uncommonly interesting program held Schumann's fourth Symphony in D minor, the Violin Concerto of John Alden Carpenter, hitherto unhead here, and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." The soloist in the Carpenter work was the Yugoslavian violinist Zlatko Balakovic. Penned in 1936, this concerto was first performed by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on November 18, 1937, and it has also been played by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and the Cleveland Orchestra. The soloist on all three occasions was Mr. Balakovic.

The concerto, which is unfolded without pause between its three clearly defined sections, begins promisingly with an arresting, buoyant theme which is tersely developed. Unfortunately, the composer's invention soon flags and the ensuing slow episode is built of more conventional material and the discursiveness which begins to make itself apparent in this portion of the work becomes still greater in the ensuing rapid movement. This diffuseness is all the more detrimental to the work's viability because of the inherent weakness of the thematic substance utilized. The formalistic weaknesses of the work are further accentuated by the hybrid style of the score as a whole. Bits in unmistakeable Spanish idiom, in the manner of Oebussy's "Iberia," rub shoulders with antipodal measures which recall the recognition scene from Strauss's "Elektra." These in turn are juxtaposed with sentimental tunes of a balladlike nature. Such an admixture of harmonic and melodic approaches is most disturbing. The most engageing part of the composition is its instrumentation, which is expert, if not strikingly original. The performance itself was wholly admirable. Mr. Balakovic made light of the intricacies which abound in the concerto, his tone was consistently vibrant, his intonation secure, and there was no want of ardor in his disclosure. The accompanist was all that could be desired in all respects.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Schumann Symphony was appropriately exuberant in the quick movements, poetic and tender in the Romanze. His pacing was just and his observance of the composer's desires in questions of nuance and dynamics was meticulous. Tonally regarded, the performance was superb.

Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" is not heard so often in our concert halls as it deserves to be, for with all of its flaws, this tone-poem based on Nietzsche's famous philosophical poem, is one of the greatest products of genius. The wonderful opening pages, depicting Zarathustra's greeting to the sun, have lost none of their splendor; the surging passion which pervades the "Freuden und Leidenschaften" episode, and the mysterious murmurings of the "Nachtwanderlied" are indubitably strokes of genius. And the brilliancy of the orchestration remains undimmed, despite the later scores of Ravel, Stravinsky or of any other modern master. Nor does Strauss depend exclusively on the mere piling up of orchestral masses for his effects. There is nothing more telling in the whole of "Zarathustra" than the bassoon solo on the score's penultimate page, softly penetrating the whispered song of the strings over a single sustained bass-clarinet tone. There is no denying the Munich "Bierstube" quality of the Tanzlied" as it is first heard, but what a Dionysian climax Strauss has constructed from this banal germ! The performance was one of the most magnificent and electrifying this wonderful orchestra has given us. The virtuosity of the players, the indescribably incandescent tonal texture achieved along with the unfailing consentaneousness redounded to the glory of both the conductor and his musicians. The large audience was duly appreciative.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

MAR 1 0 1939

U. S. COMPOSER'S CONCERTO HEARD IN NEW YORK

Composition, Played by Boston Symphony, Has Pleasant Reception

NEW YORK, March 10 (AP)—The first of two new major musical compositions by Americans to be played this week in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a pleasant reception last night in Carnegie Hall. This was John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, new to this city.

Composer Attends

The composer, one of the few Americans to have combined successful careers in music and business, came on from Chicago for the performance and shared the recalls with the soloist. He was Zlatko Balokovic, the Croatian violinist.

Probably because it was the first time New York has heard the music, the audience seemed a little puzzled by parts of the work. It is nervous music, seldom in repose, and many found it suggestive of city life rather than of the two small towns in which it was composed: Eze village, in the south of France, and Beverly, Mass.

The second American work new to New York will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony tomorrow afternoon. Roy Harris is the composer, and the work is his third symphony. The music was composed last fall, and first heard two weeks ago in Boston.

Harris is a faculty member of the Westminster Choir School in Princeton, N. J., and lecturer at the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

Harris is an Oklahoman, a native of the Cimmaron country, and one of the most frequently performed of American composers.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 0 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Conducts 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' and Work by Schumann

ZLATO BALAKOVIC SOLOIST

Violinist Plays Carpenter's Concerto, Heard Here for the First Time

By OLIN DOWNES

The customary distinguished audience packed Carnegie Hall for the concert given there last night by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program was admirably arranged. It began with the most personal of all the Schumann symphonies, the one numbered "fourth," and ended with the collossal and fantastical tone poem of Richard Strauss "Also sprach Zarathustra." Between these two works came John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, heard for the first time here and played by Zlato Balakovic.

Little information about the character of this concerto or the specific creative purpose of the composer in writing it—if there was any—has been made known. The Boston Symphony program book contents itself with a technical analysis by the eminent Felix Borowski, as it had been printed in the program book of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, when the concerto was given its first public performance in the Windy City Nov. 18, 1937. The analysis is informative, as Mr. Borowski's words are certain to be, as to the structure of the score and allied matters. There it stops. The composer, present last night to acknowledge long applause with Dr. Koussevitzky, has evidently been reticent where any personal explanation of the music was concerned.

Concerto in One Movement

It is a concerto in one movement, with changes of theme, tempo, mood. Its character is sometimes buoyant, exuberant, and sometimes a little sentimental. There is a decidedly American idiom, one that does not imitate jazz but derives some rhythmical ideas and melodic piquancy from that source, translating this material into a form distinguished by fine craftsmanship. The rhythmic treatment of the ideas is unusual. The difficult violin part is stuff to make all but the confident virtuoso tremble.

Its problems, especially the rhythmic ones, demand clear musical thinking and a player capable of holding to his own through no matter what conflicting rhythms or counter-effects. The instrumentation is dexterous and effective. What the work seems to suffer from is a length out of proportion to the potency of the ideas. They are distinguished by grace, humor, fancy, rather than by melodic entities which can become the cornerstones of imposing symphonic creations.

Poetical Atmosphere

The ending has poetical atmosphere, the violin sustaining a high E, while the mellow and reverberant tones of the vibraphone sound underneath. The net impression of the work is the creation of a composer who was saying something especially personal when he put the music on paper, but desires that the score should be judged, without special explanations, as music, and intends to make no other appeal to the interest and imagination of his audiences. Repeated hearings of the music might well reveal much more than the first impression of matter that is significant.

Mr. Balakovic's interpretation of the piece was a feat of unusual virtuosity and musical acumen. To the technical and rhythmical problems he brought confidence and authority, and an ample technique and sensibility. The audience received both player and conductor well.

Schumann's symphony is inimitable and not always easy to capture where mood is concerned, and always at a certain psychological disadvantage when played in a big hall. Dr. Koussevitzky has his own conception of the passionate and introspective music, which he placed in certain unexpected lights, without weakening or distorting its essential nature. The technical quality of the orchestra was made particularly manifest.

An Impressive Conclusion

This music, and the score of Carpenter, made Strauss's "Zarathustra" more than ever an impressive conclusion. Especially did Dr. Koussevitzky capture the grand mood and the tremendous line of the opening. That was tonal sculpture, carved as from rock. Again the phrase of Philip Hale came to mind—the vast beginning that was to him "as the portals of eternity, swinging slowly asunder."

There are small and petty themes in this music, side by side with other gigantic fragments. The work, notwithstanding inequalities, contains pages of the freest, greatest, most wildly imaginative music Strauss ever penned. The freedom of his form makes this possible. Busoni said that many of the most original creations of music occur between the boundaries of the main divisions of classic forms of composition. He cited as an example the free introduction, with the horn theme, of the last movement of Brahms's C minor symphony. There are these freedoms, these sudden free flights, glimpses into the infinite, in "Zarathustra."

Strauss's music of the backworld dwellers is not so amazing as the mystical dialogue of solo instruments which precedes the appearance of the chorale. The fugue to science is extraordinary; more remarkable is the mad laughter that breaks out through the orchestra as the vast and complicated fugue comes to its peroration. The passage, "the convalescent," preceding the celebrated waltz theme, a page of almost inhuman exultation and sardonic glee, remains always in the memory. The climax of the tone poem came out superbly, with the whole orchestra chanting, hymning the night-wanderer's song, the trumpets screaming across infinite space, the strings with their wide leaps, their Dionysiac frenzy.

We have seldom heard a performance of such technical virtuosity, or the pages to which we have referred given more meaning than last night. "Zaroltustro" is the Strauss tone-poem which has been longest in coming into its own. The reception it received may be acknowledged as due, particularly, to the insight and interpretive resource of Dr. Koussevitzky.

196

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 10 1939

American Work Is Introduced

With Balokovic as Soloist, Koussevitzky Presents Carpenter Violin Concerto.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

If the ordinarily persistent and experienced concertgoer were asked to name on one hand the violin concertos by American composers that he had heard at symphony concerts he would be conscious at once of a rather surprising superfluity of fingers. Last night in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its Thursday subscribers opportunity to turn one digit down—or up, as the manner of tabulation might require.

First from a box, then from the platform, John Alden Carpenter bowed an acknowledgment of the applause bestowed upon him as the composer of the concerto of the evening. Sharing in the plaudits were the violinist who performed the solo part, Zlatko Balokovic, and the deferential Dr. Koussevitzky. All had reason to pass a liberal part of the approbation along to the virtuoso orchestra.

This was a first New York performance of a composition completed in September, 1936, and since that time played at orchestral concerts in Chicago, Los Angeles, Cleveland and Boston, each time with Mr. Balokovic as soloist. The Yugoslav violinist presumably has taken counsel with the composer in working out the details of his interpretation, thus qualifying himself as something of a specialist in this concerto. His performance of it last night was one of winning tone and technical brilliance, very much alive and brimful of enthusiasm.

In One Movement.

The concerto is one movement, its several contrasting sections being played without pause. In the instrumentation the composer has expanded the usual percussion to include snare drum, oriental drum, wood block, gong, glockenspiel, bells and—for a dulcet close—a vibraphone. But the effect of the scoring is not that of thickness or ponderosity. All is neat and transparent, with momentary suggestion here and there of contemporary popular music in the use of the pulsatile instruments as well as in fleeting rhythmic suggestions of ragtime—one would hardly go so far as to term it jazz or swing. There is in the thematic substance more that is breezy than profound.

There are sweetish sections, particularly for the solo instrument, that might almost be Viennese, but it is Richard rather than Johann Strauss who is sometimes reflected in the orchestral mirror. The concerto is resourcefully written. But its one-movement form and its lightweight material considered, it is too long. There are stretches that do not readily hold attention. Others make a very agreeable impression. The modernity of the work is not disturbing. In the matter of dissonance, as in its other details, this is the concerto of a gentleman. Whether it will appeal widely to virtuosi is not so certain.

Schumann and Strauss.

The evening had its other attractions in superb performances of Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." In the symphony the quality of tone was rather brighter and sharper than our friends, the Germans, might have liked and some of the tempi were debatable. But in clarity, precision, balance and sheer zest of playing the achievement was a remarkable one. "Zarathustra" remains the most curious—and perhaps the most typical—of those compounds of witchery, mastery and banality that leave one shaking an accusing finger at Strauss the while one prostrates oneself in sheer admiration at his feet. The dramatic episodes of this tone poem are magnificent; the cantilena sections sentimental in the extreme. Yet even the cheap is not commonplace, so colossal and so fascinating is the orchestral and harmonic dress, so glowing the sonorities, so amazing the modulations. Barring some off-key playing by the concert master in an ascending solo passage near the polytonal close, this was a performance as immaculate as it was fiery and breathtaking in its sweep.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 10 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky Introduces Violin Concerto Of John Alden Carpenter With Balokovic As Soloist at Carnegie Hall Concert

With a couple of American scores for first performances here and two violinists to re-introduce, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to town for their fourth visit. In Carnegie Hall last night John Alden Carpenter's new (1936) Concerto for violin and orchestra was presented with Zlatko Balokovic as soloist. The remainder of the program contained Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor, and Strauss' Tone Poem "Also sprach Zarathustra."

Just 25 years ago, John Alden Carpenter broke into recognition with his orchestral suite, "Adventure in a Perambulator" and very amusing and delightful it was. There followed a number of interesting works some of which have been widely played. His new concerto, written in one movement, may not receive such extensive recognition though it must be admitted that there is "hardly a dull moment" in the playing of the score. This is chameleonic music for its mood and style are constantly changing. At the start, the influence of jazz rhythms and instrumentation are evident, later on there is some French impressionism, a touch of Russian folk-song, a sentimental melody—in short, a little of everything expertly mixed up to be much ado about entertaining an audience and no doubt the performers.

Mr. Balokovic first appeared in America in 1925-26. Last night he proved himself a capable violinist with good tone, sound rhythmic sense and musical intelligence. There were some moments of impure intonation and a rather anti-climactic ending on the prolonged high E which punctuates the work. But the work sounded more satisfactory for the orchestra than the solo instrument so that much of his playing was as though he were a part of the orchestra—a somewhat ungrateful position for a soloist.

The concert opened with a romantic performance of a romantic symphony, played without pause to give a unifying effect of a single musical mood. Under Koussevitzky's baton and in the hands of the Bostonians it was notably played. Strauss' mighty work after Nietzsche is a part of the standard Koussevitzky repertoire and as much rings true in any performance.

The orchestra plays at Academy of Music tonight.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

MAR 10 1939

Concert and Opera

Bostonians Perform Carpenter Opus; Balokovic Soloist

By GRENA BENNETT.

At last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky carried on in his pioneering for American music and introduced Carpenter's violin concerto. The number featured Zlatko Balokovic as the solo violinist.

The concerto impressed one as an effort more ambitious than epoch-making as a medium for charming the ear. The score is a curious admixture of brief melodic figures glimpsed through long intervals of lusty, inharmonious pages; the warp and woof of a tonal fabric woven in great, explosive almost irrelevant splashes of sound. At times one heard a suggestion of Spanish rhythms but these were soon obliterated. At others a hint of Strauss promised a benign episode or two, but, this also was dissipated by loud accents from the full orchestra. The message and meaning of the music was so involved, the idiom based on so many changes of ideas that one hearing is insufficient for judging its merits or significance.

Mr. Balokovic performed his part on the famous Stradivarius known as "The Swan," loaned by the Wurlitzer collection. It is doubtful if "The Swan" ever sang so curious a song as last evening's. The composer appeared on the stage and shared in the applause.

The concert began with Schumann's D minor symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky directed it with deep sincerity and a feeling for style and effect. He brought out the potentialties without exaggeration of accent or expression, communicating the obvious and the inner voices with smoothness, and arriving at the climaxes with gradations well guarded, and artfully increased. This was a performance of inspired music magnificently interpreted.

* * *

At the Metropolitan Opera House last evening a capacity audience attended the final subscription performance of "Lohengrin." The leading characters were portrayed by Mmes. Flagstad and Branzell and Messrs. Melchior, Huehn, Alsen and Cehanovsky. Mr. Leinsdorf conducted.

The same opera will be given at a special performance under the auspices of the Metropolitan Opera Guild. Mmes. Jessner and Manski and Messrs. Maison, Huehn, Alsen and Cehanovsky will be heard in the principal parts, Mr. Leinsdorf again directing the orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 10 1939

88

New York Hears Carpenter Work

NEW YORK, March 10 (AP)—The first of two new major musical compositions by Americans to be played this week in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a pleasant reception last night in Carnegie Hall. This was John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, new to this city.

The composer, one of the few Americans to have combined successful careers in music and business, came on from Chicago for the performance and shared the recalls with the soloist, Zlatko Balokovic, the Croatian violinist.

Probably because it was the first time New York has heard the music, the audience seemed a little puzzled by parts of the work. It is nervous music, seldom in repose, and many found it suggestive of citylife rather than of the two small towns in which it was composed: Eze Village, in the South of France, and Beverly, Mass.

The second American work new to New York will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony tomorrow afternoon. Roy Harris is the composer, and the work is his third symphony. The music was composed last Fall, and first heard two weeks ago in Boston.

Harris is a faculty member of the Westminster Choir School in Princeton, N. J., and lecturer at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. He is an Oklahoman, a native of the Cimmaron country, and one of the most frequently performed of American composers.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 10 1939

Concerto for Violin Is Heard

Feature of Concert Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first local performance of a concerto for violin and orchestra by John Alden Carpenter, with Zlatko Balokovic as soloist, was the novel feature of last evening's concert in Carnegie Hall of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The other pieces were the Schumann symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120, and the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra."

The concerto, in three movements played without pause, is modernistic—to employ a much abused term—dissonant, though not self-consciously so, and quite in the vein of early jazz on occasion. In fact, part of its first section, particularly, is something on the order of a symphonic cakewalk.

There are in it several expressive passages, but mostly the solo-violinistic line roams all over the place. A kind of ironic laughter filters out of it at some spots. And certain measures are treated in an interesting manner harmonically. Besides. the work in general seems to hold pretty well together.

Mr. Balokovic did his part only fairishly, but it must be reported that the concerto is by no means a soft touch for any violinist. The composer came out for bows.

Mr. Koussevitzky had his musicians well under control in the concerto, as well as in the Schumann and the Strauss items, the last-named, particularly, obtaining a brilliant performance.

A large, enthusiastic audience attended.

R. C. B.

HUB SYMPHONY PLAYS IN N. Y.

New Composition Heard —Second Scheduled for Tomorrow

B. Trav.

By JOHN SELBY
(Associated Press Arts Editor)

10/39

NEW YORK, March 10—The first of two new major musical compositions by Americans to be played this week in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a pleasant reception last night in Carnegie Hall. This was John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, new to this city.

The composer, one of the few Americans to have combined successful careers in music and business, came on from Chicago for the performance and shared the recalls with the soloist. He was Zlatko Balokovic, the Croatain violinist.

Probably because it was the first time New York has heard the music, the audience seemed a little puzzled found it suggestive of city life rather than of the two small towns in which it was composed: Eze Village, in the south of France, and Beverly, Mass.

The second American work new to New York will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony tomorrow afternoon. Roy Harris is the composer, and the work is his third symphony. The music was composed last fall, and first heard two weeks ago in Boston.

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD - TRIBUNE

MAR 11 1939

Koussevitzky Directs Music By Carpenter

Balakovic Soloist as Boston Orchestra Introduces Violin Concerto Here

By Jerome D. Bohm

Serge Koussevitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall Thursday night for its fourth concert in its evening series. The uncommonly interesting program held Schumann's fourth Symphony in D minor, the Violin Concerto of John Alden Carpenter, hitherto unheard here, and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." The soloist in the Carpenter work was the Yugoslavian violinist Zlatko Balakovic. Penned in 1936, this concerto was first performed by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on November 18, 1937, and it has also been played by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and the Cleveland Orchestra. The soloist on all three occasions was Mr. Balakovic.

The concerto, which is unfolded without pause between its three clearly defined sections, begins promisingly with an arresting, buoyant theme which is tersely developed. Unfortunately, the composer's invention soon flags and the ensuing slow episode is built of more conventional material and the discursiveness which begins to make itself apparent in this portion of the work becomes still greater in the ensuing rapid movement. This diffuseness is all the more detrimental to the work's viability because of the inherent weakness of the thematic substance utilized. The formalistic weaknesses of the work are further accentuated by the hybrid style of the score as a whole. Bits in unmistakable Spanish idiom, in the manner of Debussy's "Iberia," rub shoulders with antipodal measures which recall the recognition scene from Strauss's "Elektra." These in turn are juxtaposed with sentimental tunes of a balladlike nature. Such an admixture of harmonic and melodic approaches is most disturbing. The most engaging part of the composition is its instrumentation, which is expert, if not strikingly original. The performance itself was wholly admirable. Mr. Balakovic made light of the intricacies which abound in the concerto, his tone was consistently vibrant, his intonation secure, and there was no want of ardor in his disclosure. The accompaniment was all that could be desired in all respects.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Schumann Symphony was appropriately exuberant in the quick movements, poetic and tender in the Romanze. His pacing was just and his observance of the composer's desires in questions of nuance and dynamics was meticulous. Tonally regarded, the performance was superb.

Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" is not heard so often in our concert halls as it deserves to be, for with all of its flaws, this tone-poem based on Nietzsche's famous philosophical poem, is one of the greatest products of his genius. The wonderful opening pages, depicting Zarathustra's greeting to the sun, have lost none of their splendor; the surging passion which pervades the "Freuden und Leidenschaften" episode, and the mysterious murmurings of the "Nachtwanderlied" are indubitably strokes of genius. And the brilliancy of the orchestration remains undimmed, despite the later scores of Ravel, Stravinsky or of any other modern master. Nor does Strauss depend exclusively on the mere piling up of orchestral masses for his effects. There is nothing more telling in the whole of "Zarathustra" than the bassoon solo on the score's penultimate page, softly penetrating the whispered song of the strings over a single sustained bass-clarinet tone. There is no denying the Munich "Bierstube" quality of the "Tanzlied" as it is first heard, but what a Dionysian climax Strauss has constructed from this banal germ! The performance was one of the most magnificent and electrifying this wonderful orchestra has given us. The virtuosity of the players, the indescribably incandescent tonal texture achieved along with the unfailing consentaneousness redounded to the glory of both the conductor and his musicians. The large audience was duly appreciative.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 1 0 1939

196

American Work Is Introduced

With Balokovic as Soloist, Koussevitzky Presents Carpenter Violin Concerto.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

If the ordinarily persistent and experienced concertgoer were asked to name on one hand the violin concertos by American composers that he had heard at symphony concerts he would be conscious at once of a rather surprising superfluity of fingers. Last night in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its Thursday subscribers opportunity to turn one digit down—or up, as the manner of tabulation might require.

First from a box, then from the platform, John Alden Carpenter bowed an acknowledgment of the applause bestowed upon him as the composer of the concerto of the evening. Sharing in the plaudits were the violinist who performed the solo part, Zlatko Balokovic, and the deferential Dr. Koussevitzky. All had reason to pass a liberal part of the approbation along to the virtuoso orchestra.

This was a first New York performance of a composition completed in September, 1936, and since that time played at orchestral concerts in Chicago, Los Angeles, Cleveland and Boston, each time with Mr. Balokovic as soloist. The Yugoslav violinist presumably has taken counsel with the composer in working out the details of his interpretation, thus qualifying himself as something of a specialist in this concerto. His performance of it last night was one of winning tone and technical brilliance, very much alive and brimful of enthusiasm.

In One Movement.

The concerto is one movement, its several contrasting sections being played without pause. In the instrumentation the composer has expanded the usual percussion to include snare drum, oriental drum, wood block, gong, glockenspiel, bells and—for a dulcet close—a vibraphone. But the effect of the scoring is not that of thickness or ponderosity. All is neat and transparent, with momentary suggestion here and there of contemporary popular music in the use of the pulsatile instruments as well as in fleeting rhythmic suggestions of ragtime—one would hardly go so far as to term it jazz or swing. There is in the thematic substance more that is breezy than profound.

There are sweetish sections, particularly for the solo instrument, that might almost be Viennese, but it is Richard rather than Johann Strauss who is sometimes reflected in the orchestral mirror. The concerto is resourcefully written. But its one-movement form and its lightweight material considered, it is too long. There are stretches that do not readily hold attention. Others make a very agreeable impression. The modernity of the work is not disturbing. In the matter of dissonance, as in its other details, this is the concerto of a gentleman. Whether it will appeal widely to virtuosi is not so certain.

Schumann and Strauss.

The evening had its other attractions in superb performances of Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." In the symphony the quality of tone was rather brighter and sharper than our friends, the Germans, might have liked and some of the tempi were debatable. But in clarity, precision, balance and sheer zest of playing the achievement was a remarkable one. "Zarathustra" remains the most curious—and perhaps the most typical—of those compounds of witchery, mastery and banality that leave one shaking an accusing finger at Strauss the while one prostrates oneself in sheer admiration at his feet. The dramatic episodes of this tone poem are magnificent; the cantilena sections sentimental in the extreme. Yet even the cheap is not commonplace, so colossal and so fascinating is the orchestral and harmonic dress, so glowing the sonorities, so amazing the modulations. Barring some off-key playing by the concert master in an ascending solo passage near the polytonal close, this was a performance as immaculate as it was fiery and breathtaking in its sweep.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 1 0 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky Introduces Violin Concerto Of John Alden Carpenter With Balokovic As Soloist at Carnegie Hall Concert

With a couple of American scores for first performances here and two violinists to re-introduce, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to town for their fourth visit. In Carnegie Hall last night John Alden Carpenter's new (1936) Concerto for violin and orchestra was presented with Zlatko Balokovic as soloist. The remainder of the program contained Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor, and Strauss' Tone Poem "Also sprach Zarathustra."

Just 25 years ago, John Alden Carpenter broke into recognition with his orchestral suite, "Adventure in a Perambulator" and very amusing and delightful it was. There followed a number of interesting works some of which have been widely played. His new concerto, written in one movement, may not receive such extensive recognition though it must be admitted that there is "hardly a dull moment" in the playing of the score. This is chameleonic music for its mood and style are constantly changing. At the start, the influence of jazz rhythms and instrumentation are evident, later on there is some French impressionism, a touch of Russian folk-song, a sentimental melody—in short, a little of everything expertly mixed up to be much ado about entertaining an audience and no doubt the performers.

Mr. Balokovic first appeared in America in 1925-26. Last night he proved himself a capable violinist with good tone, sound rhythmic sense and musical intelligence. There were some moments of impure intonation and a rather anti-climactic ending on the prolonged high E which punctuates the work. But the work sounded more satisfactory for the orchestra than the solo instrument so that much of his playing was as though he were a part of the orchestra—a somewhat ungrateful position for a soloist.

The concert opened with a romantic performance of a romantic symphony, played without pause to give a unifying effect of a single musical mood. Under Koussevitzky's baton and in the hands of the Bostonians it was notably played. Strauss' mighty work after Nietzsche is a part of the standard Koussevitzky repertoire and as much rings true in any performance.

The orchestra plays at Academy of Music tonight.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

MAR 1 0 1939

Concert and Opera

Bostonians Perform Carpenter Opus; Balokovic Soloist

By GRENA BENNETT.

At last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky carried on in his pioneering for American music and introduced Carpenter's violin concerto. The number featured Zlatko Balokovic as the solo violinist.

The concerto impressed one as an effort more ambitious than epoch-making as a medium for charming the ear. The score is a curious admixture of brief melodic figures glimpsed through long intervals of lusty, inharmonious pages; the warp and woof of a tonal fabric woven in great, explosive almost irrelevant splashes of sound. At times one heard a suggestion of Spanish rhythms but these were soon obliterated. At others a hint of Strauss promised a benign episode or two, but, this also was dissipated by loud accents from the full orchestra. The message and meaning of the music was so involved, the idiom based on so many changes of ideas that one hearing is insufficient for judging its merits or significance.

Mr. Balokovic performed his part on the famous Stradivarius known as "The Swan," loaned by the Wurlitzer collection. It is doubtful if "The Swan" ever sang so curious a song as last evening's. The composer appeared on the stage and shared in the applause.

The concert began with Schumann's D minor symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky directed it with deep sincerity and a feeling for style and effect. He brought out the potentialties without exaggeration of accent or expression, communicating the obvious and the inner voices with smoothness, and arriving at the climaxes with gradations well guarded, and artfully increased. This was a performance of inspired music magnificently interpreted.

* * *

At the Metropolitan Opera House last evening a capacity audience attended the final subscription performance of "Lohengrin." The leading characters were portrayed by Mmes. Flagstad and Branzell and Messrs. Melchior, Huehn, Alsen and Cehanovsky. Mr. Leinsdorf conducted.

The same opera will be given at a special performance under the auspices of the Metropolitan Opera Guild. Mmes. Jessner and Manski and Messrs. Maison, Huehn, Alsen and Cehanovsky will be heard in the principal parts, Mr. Leinsdorf again directing the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 1 0 1939

Concerto for Violin Is Heard

Feature of Concert Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first local performance of a concerto for violin and orchestra by John Alden Carpenter, with Zlatko Balokovic as soloist, was the novel feature of last evening's concert in Carnegie Hall of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The other pieces were the Schumann symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120, and the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra."

The concerto, in three movements played without pause, is modernistic—to employ a much abused term—dissonant, though not self-consciously so, and quite in the vein of early jazz on occasion. In fact, part of its first section, particularly, is something on the order of a symphonic cakewalk.

There are in it several expressive passages, but mostly the solo-violinistic line roams all over the place. A kind of ironic laughter filters out of it at some spots. And certain measures are treated in an interesting manner harmonically. Besides. the work in general seems to hold pretty well together.

Mr. Balokovic did his part only fairishly, but it must be reported that the concerto is by no means a soft touch for any violinist. The composer came out for bows.

Mr. Koussevitzky had his musicians well under control in the concerto, as well as in the Schumann and the Strauss items, the last-named, particularly, obtaining a brilliant performance.

A large, enthusiastic audience attended.

R. C. B.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 1 0 1939

88

New York Hears Carpenter Work

NEW YORK, March 10 (AP)—The first of two new major musical compositions by Americans to be played this week in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a pleasant reception last night in Carnegie Hall. This was John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, new to this city.

The composer, one of the few Americans to have combined successful careers in music and business, came on from Chicago for the performance and shared the recalls with the soloist, Zlatko Balokovic, the Croatian violinist.

Probably because it was the first time New York has heard the music, the audience seemed a little puzzled by parts of the work. It is nervous music, seldom in repose, and many found it suggestive of citylife rather than of the two small towns in which it was composed: Eze Village, in the South of France, and Beverly, Mass.

The second American work new to New York will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony tomorrow afternoon. Roy Harris is the composer, and the work is his third symphony. The music was composed last Fall, and first heard two weeks ago in Boston.

Harris is a faculty member of the Westminster Choir School in Princeton, N. J., and lecturer at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. He is an Oklahoman, a native of the Cimmaron country, and one of the most frequently performed of American composers.

HUB SYMPHONY PLAYS IN N. Y.

New Composition Heard —Second Scheduled for Tomorrow

B. Trav.

By JOHN SELBY
(Associated Press Arts Editor)

NEW YORK, March 10—The first of two new major musical compositions by Americans to be played this week in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a pleasant reception last night in Carnegie Hall. This was John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, new to this city.

The composer, one of the few Americans to have combined successful careers in music and business, came on from Chicago for the performance and shared the recalls with the soloist. He was Zlatko Balokovic, the Croatain violinist.

Probably because it was the first time New York has heard the music, the audience seemed a little puzzled by parts of the work. It is nervous music, seldom in repose, and many found it suggestive of city life rather than of the two small towns in which it was composed: Eze Village, in the south of France, and Beverly, Mass.

The second American work new to New York will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony tomorrow afternoon. Roy Harris is the composer, and the work is his third symphony. The music was composed last fall, and first heard two weeks ago in Boston.

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD - TRIBUNE

MAR 1 1 1939

Koussevitzky Directs Music By Carpenter

Balakovic Soloist as Boston Orchestra Introduces Violin Concerto Here

By Jerome D. Bohm

Serge Koussevitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall Thursday night for its fourth concert in its evening series. The uncommonly interesting program held Schumann's fourth Symphony in D minor, the Violin Concerto of John Alden Carpenter, hitherto unheard here, and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." The soloist in the Carpenter work was the Yugoslavian violinist Zlatko Balakovic. Penned in 1936, this concerto was first performed by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on November 18, 1937, and it has also been played by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and the Cleveland Orchestra. The soloist on all three occasions was Mr. Balakovic.

The concerto, which is unfolded without pause between its three clearly defined sections, begins promisingly with an arresting, buoyant theme which is tersely developed. Unfortunately, the composer's invention soon flags and the ensuing slow episode is built of more conventional material and the discursiveness which begins to make itself apparent in this portion of the work becomes still greater in the ensuing rapid movement. This diffuseness is all the more detrimental to the work's viability because of the inherent weakness of the thematic substance utilized. The formalistic weaknesses of the work are further accentuated by the hybrid style of the score as a whole. Bits in unmistakable Spanish idiom, in the manner of Debussy's "Iberia," rub shoulders with antipodal measures which recall the recognition scene from Strauss's "Elektra." These in turn are juxtaposed with sentimental tunes of a balladlike nature. Such an admixture of harmonic and melodic approaches is most disturbing. The most engaging part of the composition is its instrumentation, which is expert, if not strikingly original. The performance itself was wholly admirable. Mr. Balakovic made light of the intricacies which abound in the concerto, his tone was consistently vibrant, his intonation secure, and there was no want of ardor in his disclosure. The accompaniment was all that could be desired in all respects.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Schumann Symphony was appropriately exuberant in the quick movements, poetic and tender in the Romanze. His pacing was just and his observance of the composer's desires in questions of nuance and dynamics was meticulous. Tonally regarded, the performance was superb.

Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" is not heard so often in our concert halls as it deserves to be, for with all of its flaws, this tone-poem based on Nietzsche's famous philosophical poem, is one of the greatest products of his genius. The wonderful opening pages, depicting Zarathustra's greeting to the sun, have lost none of their splendor; the surging passion which pervades the "Freuden und Leidenschaften" episode, and the mysterious murmurings of the "Nachtwanderlied" are indubitably strokes of genius. And the brilliancy of the orchestration remains undimmed, despite the later scores of Ravel, Stravinsky or of any other modern master. Nor does Strauss depend exclusively on the mere piling up of orchestral masses for his effects. There is nothing more telling in the whole of "Zarathustra" than the bassoon solo on the score's penultimate page, softly penetrating the whispered song of the strings over a single sustained bass-clarinet tone. There is no denying the Munich "Bierstube" quality of the "Tanzlied" as it is first heard, but what a Dionysian climax Strauss has

---

Today's Hand

Both Sides Vulnerable

19

American Work Is Introduced

With Balokovic as Soloist, Koussevitzky Presents Carpenter Violin Concerto.

N. Y. Sun Mar. 10/39

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

If the ordinarily persistent and experienced concertgoer were asked to name on one hand the violin concertos by American composers that he had heard at symphony concerts he would be conscious at once of a rather surprising superfluity of fingers. Last night in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its Thursday subscribers opportunity to turn one digit down—or up, as the manner of tabulation might require.

First from a box, then from the platform, John Alden Carpenter bowed an acknowledgment of the applause bestowed upon him as the composer of the concerto of the evening. Sharing in the plaudits were the violinist who performed the solo part, Zlatko Balokovic, and the deferential Dr. Koussevitzky. All had reason to pass a liberal part of the approbation along to the virtuoso orchestra.

This was a first New York performance of a composition completed in September, 1936, and since that time played at orchestral concerts in Chicago, Los Angeles, Cleveland and Boston, each time with Mr. Balokovic as soloist. The Yugoslav violinist presumably has taken counsel with the composer in working out the details of his interpretation, thus qualifying himself as something of a specialist in this concerto. His performance of it last night was one of winning tone and technical brilliance, very much alive and brimful of enthusiasm.

In One Movement.

The concerto is one movement, its several contrasting sections being played without pause. In the instrumentation the composer has expanded the usual percussion to include snare drum, oriental drum, wood block, gong, glockenspiel, bells and—for a dulcet close—a vibraphone. But the effect of the scoring is not that of thickness or ponderosity. All is neat and transparent, with momentary suggestion here and there of contemporary popular music in the use of the pulsatile instruments as well as in fleeting rhythmic suggestions of ragtime—one would hardly go so far as to term it jazz or swing. There is in the thematic substance more that is breezy than profound.

There are sweetish sections, particularly for the solo instrument, that might almost be Viennese, but it is Richard rather than Johann Strauss who is sometimes reflected in the orchestral mirror. The concerto is resourcefully written. But its one-movement form and its lightweight material considered, it is too long. There are stretches that do not readily hold attention. Others make a very agreeable impression. The modernity of the work is not disturbing. In the matter of dissonance, as in its other details, this is the concerto of a gentleman. Whether it will appeal widely to virtuosi is not so certain.

Schumann and Strauss.

The evening had its other attractions in superb performances of Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." In the symphony the quality of tone was rather brighter and sharper than our friends, the Germans, might have liked and some of the tempi were debatable. But in clarity, precision, balance and sheer zest of playing the achievement was a remarkable one. "Zarathustra" remains the most curious—and perhaps the most typical—of those compounds of witchery, mastery and banality that leave one shaking an accusing finger at Strauss the while one prostrates oneself in sheer admiration at his feet. The dramatic episodes of this tone poem are magnificent; the cantilena sections sentimental in the extreme. Yet even the cheap is not commonplace, so colossal and so fascinating is the orchestral and harmonic dress, so glowing the sonorities, so amazing the modulations. Barring some off-key playing by the concert master in an ascending solo passage near the polytonal close, this was a performance as immaculate as it was fiery and breath-taking in its sweep.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 11 1939

NOVELTY OFFERED HERE BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

"Peter and the Wolf," Fairy Tale for Children, Is Given

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, presented a program last night at the Academy of Music that tended to the extremes, to the familiar and the little known, to musical value and to entertainment value. It was in all an extraordinary success, a program that should have left a deep impression on the large audience that heard it. The combination of its offerings made a very well balanced program, and in addition the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were both imbued with the fullness of their talent. To make the evening even better, the audience was a most attentive and responsive one.

The highlight of the evening, not in musical greatness but in novelty, was the first presentation in Brooklyn—only the second in the city and the fourth in this country—of "Peter and the Wolf," Serge Prokofieff's "Fairy Tale for Children." The work was presented by the orchestra, various instruments of which played the roles in the fairy tale, and with the assistance of Richard Hale as narrator. As Mr. Hale read the story, the flute played the part of a bird, the oboe of a duck, the clarinet (in low register) of a cat, the bassoon of Peter's grandfather, three horns of the wolf, the string quartet of Peter and two kettle drums and the bass drum of the shooting of the hunters. It was little Peter himself, not the hunters, who captured the wolf, after the latter had eaten the duck. "Peter and the Wolf" was given by popular request. It was vastly enjoyed by a highly amused audience.

The program opened with the most musical and pleasant concerto in D minor by Antonio Vivaldi, the composer-priest of Venice of the period around 1700. Last night's presentation was Siloti's transcription from the long forgotten work. The work, originally written as strng chamber music for eight instruments, was given by the full string division and pairs of the woodwinds. It is most engaging music that should be very popular for its fitness for concert programs.

The program concluded with musical greatness, Beethoven's Seventh in A major. The continual growth of the five-note pattern that is taken up by one part of the orchestra after another, each part adding its voice as it enters, in the second movement, is splendidly effected by Dr. Koussevitzky. No less creditable is the third movement and then the finals, with its growth into sonority.

The Boston Symphony's fourth of its five visits for the season—the fifth will be on March 31—was enthusiastically received by an audience that applauded particularly for "Peter and the Wolf" and for the Seventh—or for extremes.

MUSIC

Concert Programs

B. Trans. — March 10/39

More of Ernest Bloch's Music Announced For His Forthcoming Visit; Other Items

The complete programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts that will be conducted by Ernest Bloch are now available. The program for the concerts of Thursday evening of next week in Sanders Theater, and on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall contain, as previously hazarded here, two interludes from the opera "Macbeth," "Three Jewish Poems" and "America." The program to be presented on the following Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon will begin with the "Macbeth" interludes, followed by the "Poems." Thereafter will come "Schelomo," the Rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, and "Helvetia," which, like the "Macbeth" music, will be new to Boston. Jean Bedetti will play the solo part of the Rhapsody, as he did recently in New York with the Orchestra.

Voices Raised Solo

Richard Tauber, the German tenor making his first Boston appearance at the last of the season's Boston Morning Musicales in the Hotel Statler on Wednesday morning, March 22, will sing "Fruehlingsglaube," "Trok'ne Blumen" and "Wohin" by Schubert; "Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen" and "Im Herbst" by Franz; "Ueber Nacht" and "Verborgenheit" by Wolf; "Letzter Fruehling," "Am schoensten Sommerabend" and "Eros" by Grieg; "Du bist mein Traum" and "Dort rauscht und plauscht der Wienerwald" by Strauss (both arranged by Korngold); and "Farewell, My Love, Farewell" and "You Are My Heart's Delight," by Lehar. Percy Kahn will be the accompanist.

Isabel French, the studious and discerning Bostonian soprano, will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday evening, April 3. The program is not yet available.

Pianists

Paderewski's program, to be given at the Boston Opera House on Wednesday evening, May 10, if he keeps to the remainder of his announced itinerary, will include Bach's Fantasy and Fugue in G minor, as arranged by Liszt, Haydn's Variations in F minor, Mozart's Rondo in A minor, Beethoven's "Appassionata" Sonata, Liszt's transcription of the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and, by Chopin, the Ballade in F minor, Nocturne in B major (Opus 62), Mazurka in F-sharp minor (Opus 59) and Polonaise in A-flat major.

Persis Cox, Bostonian pianist heard on previous occasions, will give a program "for young people of all ages" in the Hotel Vendome next Sunday afternoon, when the program will consist of three little preludes, the Sixth French Suite and Prelude and Fugue in C-minor—all by Bach; Hopekirk's "Sundown," Repper's "Cotton Blossoms," Whithorne's "Chimes of St. Patrick's," an intermezzo by Brahms, and "Seguidilla" by Albeniz, and, by Chopin, the Fantasy-Impromptu, a study and a waltz.

Lydia Hoffman Behrendt will give a piano recital at the Longy School of Music this evening, with the assistance of David Kimball, flutist. The program will be devoted entirely to music of Hindemith, with whom the pianist has been associated. The recital begins at 8.30 and admission is free.

Sounding Orchestras

The Longy School Orchestra, led by Yves Chardon, will give a concert in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, next Friday evening. The program will consist of the Second Symphony and "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. Edward M. Goldman will be the solo pianist in the Concerto.

The Boston University Orchestra, led by Arthur Fiedler, will play in Alumni Hall, Boston University, on Tuesday evening, March 28. The program will consist of William Boyce's Eighth Symphony, Haydn's "Military" Symphony, Liszt's Piano Concerto in E-flat and Glazounov's "Ouverture solenelle." Emanuel Zambelli will be the solo pianist in the Concerto. Admission to the concert, which will begin at 8.15, will be free as usual.

Voices Raised Together

The combined glee clubs of Middlebury College will give the first concert of their annual spring tour in an unidentified auditorium in Boston next Friday evening. The program will include music by Bach, Gibbons, Morley, Delius, Manney, Clokey, Erickson, Sibelius, Arcadelt and Steedman, as well as three Negro spirituals and a Yiddish song.

The first of two concerts by the joined forces of the Orphean Club of Lasell Junior College and M. I. T. Glee Club will be given tonight at the Walker Memorial Auditorium, M. I. T. The program will contain music by Handel, Palestrina, Bach, Bortniansky, Saar, Cain, Clokey, Brahms, Sibelius, Palmgren, Foster, Soderstron, Hughes, Kountz-Baldwin and Handel.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE, FRIDAY, MARCH 10, 1939

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

OPPORTUNITY — CHALLENGE — DUTY

A Musical Editorial

At a time when Jews are being persecuted in so many parts of the world, when Jewish effort is derided and Jewish culture extirpated, we in Boston are to have the privilege of hearing a great Jewish composer conduct his own works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is more than just another concert. It is a symbol of free America, a symbol of freedom of conscience, a symbol of equality and brotherhood.

The composer is Ernest Bloch—the Bloch of the "Sacred Service," the Bloch of "Israel," the Bloch of "Baal-Shem," the Bloch of "Three Jewish Poems." And also the Bloch of "America," the Bloch of "Macbeth."

The orchestra responsible for the invitation is one of the greatest in the world under its renowned conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Bloch will be heard in five concerts. These concerts offer themselves as a great opportunity for us to show that we appreciate and understand the underlying significance of this whole happy project.

These concerts are a challenge to Jewish lovers of music to prove that a prophet can be honored among his own people.

It is our duty to support these concerts in every way available. There should not be one empty seat at any performance. We must show Boston that we are alive to our privileges, that we are among the first to encourage art and truth and beauty.

Will this opportunity be taken? Will this challenge be met? Will we see our duty?

Much more than is on the surface depends on our reaction.

The place, Symphony Hall. The dates, Friday afternoon, March 17, Saturday night, March 18, Monday evening, March 20, Tuesday evening, March 21.

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD - TRIBUNE

MAR 12 1939

Koussevitzky Directs Harris 3d Symphony

Work Played Here 1st Time by Boston Orchestra; Ruth Posselt Is Soloist

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, which had introduced John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto here in last Thursday's concert, gave the first New York performance, of another new American composition in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, when Roy Harris's third symphony opened the program. Ruth Posselt was the soloist in Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, and Richard Hale was the narrator in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," which had been previously heard here in the Bostonians' Pension Fund benefit last month and in Brooklyn last Friday evening. The concert, and this orchestra's fourth New York visit of the season closed with Ravel's "La Valse."

Although Mr. Harris has been regarded for some years as one of the most consequential and individual of contemporary American composers, his music has not been played here particularly often by major symphonic organizations. An andante, part of an uncompleted symphony, was performed in a Stadium concert in 1926; the Philharmonic-Symphony played a chorale for strings in November, 1934, and his first complete symphony, "1933," was introduced to us by Dr. Koussevitzky on Feb. 2, 1934. His "When Johnny Comes Marching Home" has also figured in Philharmonic programs. The second symphony, played in Boston in 1936, has not yet been heard here. The third was composed last fall, and first played in Boston on Feb. 24. It consists of one movement, taking twenty minutes to play, but, according to the composer's outline, is divided into five sections, differing in prevailing mood and instrumental color.

At a first hearing, it impresses as a work of exceptional value, marking the further development of a definite and unmistakable creative individuality which has become increasingly apparent in the course of Mr. Harris's widespread activity as a composer. This individuality was evident in his harmonic medium and melodic outlines which, without being wedded primarily either to diatonic ways or to polytonality, availed itself of both so as to provide a wide range of color and emotional content, and the mingling and the contrast of the various instrumental choirs was skillfully wrought, with richness of orchestral hue and sonority. The musical ideas were in the main distinguished, especially the long breathed opening theme in the strings, which made several reappearances during the work, and proved to be fertile material for treatment and expansion.

One or two drawbacks are noticeable, such as an overextended treatment of the fourth section, in which the short principal figure in the fugue (which recalled the overture to Menotti's "Amelia Goes to the Ball") closes too abruptly to give a sense of complete continuity, while in the pastoral third section one could be occasionally reminded of the pastoral episode of Liszt's "Les Preludes." But these were minor exceptions to a general impression that the style and form of the work are prevailingly Harrisian. There was warm applause, and the composer took his bows with Dr. Koussevitzky after an admirable performance.

Miss Posselt, who is from the neghborhood of Boston, has been heard here orchestrally as a Schubert Memorial Award winner (in 1929) and in recital at various times since her debut as a nine-year-old prodigy in 1922. She is now a very well equipped young mature artist, who has progressed since her last New York appearance two years ago. The Tchaikovsky concerto was played with laudable technical skill, clarity of detail and warmth, evenness and fluency of tone. There were times, however, when the interpretation needed slightly more momentum. In the whimsical and ingratiating Prokofieff work Mr. Hale deserves unqualified praise for his flawless enunciation and the artistry and effectiveness with which he announced the story.

178

Guest of Boston

ERNEST BLOCH

Ernest Bloch To Conduct Symphony

Jewish Advocate

Famous Jewish Composer in Boston This Week-End

March 10/39

By JULES WOLFFERS

One of the outstanding musical events of the past few seasons is in store for Boston next week. Ernest Bloch, recognized as one of the greatest living composers and the greatest exponent of modern Hebrew music, has been invited as guest-conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five performances. The announced program, identical for all performances, will be devoted to Bloch's own works and will include two interludes from his opera, "Macbeth," Three Jewish Poems and the epic rhapsody, "America."

Mr. Bloch will conduct the concerts Thursday evening, March 16, at Sanders Theater, Cambridge; Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 17 and 18, at Symphony Hall, and also at Symphony Hall Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, March 20 and 21. According to Symphony Hall, the Cambridge concert is already sold out but although the Symphony Hall concerts are part of regular subscription series, tickets have been made available for the general public.

(Continued on Page 14)

His First Visit

Great interest has already been shown in Mr. Bloch's visit here. Receptions are being given in his honor with leading Boston personalities expected to be present. All this is in marked contrast to his first appearance in Boston in the year 1917 when the composer was invited to conduct his Three Jewish Poems with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At that time the piece was new and Bloch but little known. Now his music fills an important place in every orchestra's repertoire while his chamber music and solo pieces have made him famous the world over.

The story of Bloch's career illustrates perfectly the fable of Bruce and the spider—repeated failure, continued disappointments together with a determined perseverance which never failed. Few great composers have had so much against them. Of these few some solved the problem in one way or another, some, mentally and physically ill, worn out by neglect and work, simply died. Bloch refused to give up nor chose to die. Like Washington he lost nearly all his battles but won the war.

Orthodox Background

Ernest Bloch was born in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1880. His father was a Russian Jew engaged in the dry goods business. His family was orthodox, strictly adhering to the traditional faith and its observances. As a child he heard the synagogual chants and Jewish folksongs which were so profoundly to affect his art in later life. From this childhood store of musical memories were later to blossom such masterpieces as the Israel Symphony, the Schelomo Rhapsody and the Synagogue services for chorus and orchestra. At a very early age the lad's musical gifts began to manifest themselves much to the apprehension of his sober and practical-minded father. But despite parental objections the boy refused to take his music less seriously and already at the age of eleven was determined to become a composer. With childish yet touching ceremony he wrote on a piece of paper a vow to become a composer, buried it under a mound of stones and built a bonfire over it.

Bloch was fortunate in his choice of first teacher. The great Jacques Dalcroze also lived in Geneva and it was with this outstanding pedagogue that the boy first began his musical studies. At the age of sixteen he left his native town to further his musical education. He received excellent training under great masters, including Ysaye who taught him to play the violin. A great future was predicted for him. After eight years of study he returned to Geneva, encouraged with the knowledge that his masters had predicted a great future for him. Settling down to composition he was so far successful that he was forced to gain his living by engaging in business. Nothing daunted, Bloch continued his composition at night after business hours, hoping for the day when he could once more devote himself completely to his music.

The War Intervenes

At last Bloch secured a hearing. His opera, "Macbeth," was accepted and produced by the Paris Opera Comique. The premiere was a success and for a time Bloch could feel that his efforts were to be rewarded by some measure of recognition. He was able to abandon his business activities to engage completely in a musical life. Meanwhile the great war broke out and Bloch determined to go to America. He received the opportunity in 1916 when he was engaged as conductor of a symphony orchestra which was to tour the country with a famous dancer. But the whole project was a failure and Bloch was stranded in New York.

Almost unknown in America Bloch was forced to build up his reputation once more. Some degree of success attended his efforts at first, but after the first flurry the musical world went about its way quite indifferent to the doings of Ernest Bloch. Still he presevered, would never cry quits, until slowly through the years his powers were recognized. Now his name is one of the best known in contemporary music.

Jewish Feeling

In his music Bloch has consciously adopted Jewish and Hebrew idiom and feeling. This is not to say that Bloch is a composer for Jews. In the same way that the German Beethoven belongs to the whole world, that the Russian Tschaikovsky enriches all musical literatures so does the Hebrew Bloch reach all races and creeds through his racially tinted music. His "Sacred Service," although set to a Hebrew text, is not meant solely for the synagogue. This music is for all who are able to comprehend its beauty and meaning. Bloch has composed in various styles and idioms. His "America" is truly American, an expression of love and devotion for his adopted country.

The most eminent critics and musicians have united to praise Bloch's work. Olin Downes was one of the first Americans to recognize his genius. Lawrence Gilman said: "We pay tribute to a musical temperament so deeply sincere, so distinguished, so richly articulate, that all who love music as a living and mobile art must hold their heads a little higher because of him." David Ewen hails Bloch as "the foremost living exponent of modern Hebrew music."

When Bloch arrives in Boston he will find a great orchestra ready for him. Under Doctor Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become one of the greatest orchestras of all time. With this marvelous medium at his disposal Bloch will find a great instrument ready for his great music. The result should be memerable in Boston's musical life. To the persons responsible for bringing Ernest Bloch here Boston owes a great debt of gratitude which must manifest itself in concrete manner.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 1 1 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Entertains at Academy With Novelty Called "Peter and the Wolf" And Excells in Vivaldi Concerto

Progressive education scored a point at the Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music last night when Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale "for children" to his Brooklyn audience. Only a month ago it had delighted the Manhattan audience made up of children from 10 to 70, which attended the orchestra's "Concert Extraordinnaire"; last night its success was repeated. In the enjoyment of it, one learned not only something about the orchestra but the A B C of program music.

This musical nursery tale is an ingenious work filled with chuckling humor and endowed with a catchy theme for Peter, the hero, which is quite disarming. The theme is given to the violins while the bird is represented by a flute, the duck by an oboe, the cat by a clarinet "in a low register," grandpapa by the bassoon, the wolf by three horns, the shooting of the hunters by the kettledrums and bass drum. The composition is clever and entertaining as Peter and the bird capture the wolf and with the hunters take it to the zoo. Richard Hale narrated the story with just the right inflection while the orchestra supplied the sound effects in spirited fashion, smiling as it played. The audience was amused, as it should have been.

Preceding this music in the lighter vein was the finest performance of the evening, that of Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor. This is the work of which the great J. S. Bach thought enough of to make an organ transcription. As its beauty was disclosed last night in some matchless playing, the reason was not hard to find, for the texture of the three movements is of the purest music. Hauntingly exquisite was the Largo movement with its suggestion of the music of Gluck to come almost a half century later and played with a tone of velvet by the famous Boston strings. Of similar worth were the Maestoso and Allegro movements.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony completed the program. Naturally it was well played, but there was occasion to differ with the conductor's interpretation on more than one count. Where was the lilting quality of the Vivace, the continuous motion of the Allegretto, the fire of the robust and boisterous finale? Koussevitzky felt the rhythmic impulse of this symphony, for he beat out its rhythms with his foot in the more rapid movements, but there was a restraint that held in check the peculiar vitality of this music. In the first two movements it was a matter of tempo with the first losing some intensity because it was a shade too slow; the second, emphasizing too much the Andante and not the Allegretto aspect of the score. After all, historically, this is the Beethoven symphony labeled as not having a slow movement. Last night it not only had one but a program note that almost, but not quite justified this particular tempo. The brilliance of the finale came through speed rather than quality, bringing one to the conclusion that this symphony does not mark the conductor at his best.

Clifford Curzon

After his outstanding success achieved in a recent debut recital, the brilliant young English pianist, Clifford Curzon, may be credited with fresh triumphs as a result of his concert last night at Carnegie Hall in which he played three concerti with Alexander Smallens conducting 65 members of the Philharmonic. Of his playing little can be said, except to confirm the previous record of superlatives applied to his sensitive musical artistry and technical mastery.

Most noteworthy item on Mr. Curzon's program was John Ireland's Concerto in E flat, heard here for the first time. Mr. Ireland, a contemporary compatriot of Mr. Curzon, is best known for his popular setting to Masefield's "Sea Fever." His Concerto is constructed in traditional form with three movements. The opening movement, marked moderato, gave the impression of having been inspired by pastoral scenes or seascapes, perhaps the rocky coast of Cornwall. The musical idiom is personal and original, being conservatively modern in treatment. Some music of serene lyric beauty in the lento espessivo is an engaging and sincere utterance, if hardly profound. The allegretto giocoso is introduced without pause by a tympani and snare drum passage. A somewhat tongue-in-cheek military fanfare, punctuated by a tattoo on the Chinese block, ushers in a whimsical, carnivalesque development section of the finale, while an echo of the opening theme is heard in the coda. The orchestration is capable, though not always as effective as it might have been, while the work as a whole is compact, imaginative and worthy of further acquaintance. Needless to say, Mr. Curzon's assignment in this and in Mozart's A major and Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerti was admirably performed.

R. O. W.

Ernest Bloch to Appear On Program Sunday

A special program broadcast over Station WEEI will be aired this Sunday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock as a tribute to Ernest Bloch, world renowned Jewish composer. Mr. Bloch will appear on the program and will be introduced by Moses Smith, music critic of the Boston Transcript.

The musical portion of the program will be rendered by the members of the Cecelia Singing Society. Robert H. Segal, cantor and musical director of Temple Ohabei Shalom, will be the soloist. Arthur Fiedler will conduct the entire program. Accompanist for the program will be Ernest Harrison, organist, and Evelyn Borofsky, pianist.

Selections from Mr. Bloch's compositions will be included in the program, and the composer is expected to deliver a significant message on his appearance here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 2 1939

The recent costume concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to have set a precedent for symphonic high jinks in at least one town. The Rochester Civic Orchestra lately conducted what it called a "night of fun," during which, one hopes, the Muses and the great shades were fast asleep.

The program featured the composition known as "The Worried Drummer," which, belying its title, makes drummers happy as nothing else can do. The audience also heard the Haydn "Farewell" symphony, with complete histrionic accompaniment; "The Irish Washerwoman," "Turkey in the Straw," "Harmonica Player" and the "Carnival of Animals." It was all under the direction of Paul White.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

MAR 1 3 1939

New Woolsey Hall Series Finest Eve

With the recent announcement o the Woolsey Hall Concert Series lis for the 1939-1940 season, the greates interest in the long history of thes fine musical events is being show by music lovers from this vicinity The percentage of subscription re newals by the regular list of patron is already far in advance of an other season, while the host of nev orders coming in from all over thi section of the state, indicates tha next season's subscription list wil again be of capacity proportions.

No doubt can exist as to the popu larity of the group of seven con certs when the brilliant list is per used even most casually. Frit Kreisler, world's greatest violinis will start the season on October 31 and in order will be seen during th fall and winter season the Bosto Symphony Orchestra; Helen Jepsor soprano; the Philadelphia Orchestra Josef Hofmann, pianist; Lawrenc Tibbett, baritone; and again the Boston Symphony as the climax of th notable schedule.

Generally the announcement o the new season's plans has beer made in the fall of the year. However, the time has been so short between the time that the series was first made public, and the first concert, that great difficulty has been experienced in enrolling former patrons and the taking of new orders. For this reason the early announcement was decided upon, thus bringing the ticket procedure in line with nearly every other concert series in the country, in which cases the system has been found to the best advantage for both old and new patrons alike.

Although the local schedule is of such all around merit as to leave little to choose in the way of selecting this or that offering as the leading one, the coming of the Philadelphia Orchestra to New Haven for the first time is the outstanding feature in the minds of many. Helen Jepson, glamorous soprano of the Metropolitan, is also making her first New Haven appearance on the forthcoming series. Soloists Kreisler, Tibbett and Hofmann, all old favorites, have not appeared here in several seasons, and the return will be welcome. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will as usual play its regular season of two local concerts, a local musical feature without which no New Haven musical season would be complete.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

March 12/39

Group to Study Haydn's Music

At Meeting of Allentown Musical Club in Muhlenberg Library Monday

"Haydn—The Early Orchestra and the Woodwind Choir of the Orchestra" will be the theme at the regular study hour of the orchestral study group of the Allentown Musical club. The affair, under the direction of Nan M. Roth, will be held Monday at 10 a. m. in the Muhlenberg college Library building. Miss Roth is being assisted by Mrs. Samuel R. Thomas.

In addition to illustration of the various woodwinds by means of the excellent recordings available at the Muhlenberg Library, Albertus Meyers, director of the Allentown band, will present several of his band members in numbers illustrative of the program.

Miss Roth's recordings are to include: Flute, Haydn's "With Verdure Clad," from "Creation," sung by Margaret Balfour, with orchestra conducted by Clarence Raybould; Bishop's "Lo! Here the Gentle Lark," sung by Dame Nellie Melba, and Mozart's "The Magic Flute," played by the New York Philharmonic, conducted by William Mengelberg.

In illustration of the piccolo, the chairman has chosen Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9 D Minor, first movement, played by the New York Philharmonic, conducted by Toscanini; oboe, Bach's "Jesus, Joy of Man's Desiring," sung by the Temple church choir, London, conducted by Thalben-Ball, with oboe obligato by Leon Goosens.

The English horn will be illustrated by means of Dvorak's "New World Symphony-Largo," played by the Philadelphia orchestra, L. Stokowski, conductor, Robert Bloom, English horn soloist; Wagner's "Prelude" to 3rd Act," of "Tristan and Isolde," unaccompanied solos for the English horn by Hans Beer; and Cesar Franck's "Symphony," 2nd movement, Philadelphia orchestra, L. Stokowski, conductor.

Clarinet work will be brought to the gathering's attention through Sibelius' "Finlandia," played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, L. Stokowski, conductor; and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," played by the Berlin State Opera orchestra.

The bassoon will be illustrated through Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite," "Beauty and the Beast," by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; and the saxophone through Bizet's "Prelude" to the "L'Arlesienne Suite," by the London Philharmonic orchestra, Sir Thomas Beecham, conductor.

178

Guest of Boston

ERNEST BLOCH

Ernest Bloch To Conduct Symphony

Jewish Advocate

Famous Jewish Composer in Boston This Week-End

March 10/39

By JULES WOLFFERS

One of the outstanding musical events of the past few seasons is in store for Boston next week. Ernest Bloch, recognized as one of the greatest living composers and the greatest exponent of modern Hebrew music, has been invited as guest-conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five performances. The announced program, identical for all performances, will be devoted to Bloch's own works and will include two interludes from his opera, "Macbeth," Three Jewish Poems and the epic rhapsody, "America."

Mr. Bloch will conduct the concerts Thursday evening, March 16, at Sanders Theater, Cambridge; Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 17 and 18, at Symphony Hall, and also at Symphony Hall Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, March 20 and 21. According to Symphony Hall, the Cambridge concert is already sold out but although the Symphony Hall concerts are part of regular subscription series, tickets have been made available for the general public.

(Continued on Page 14)

His First Visit

Great interest has already been shown in Mr. Bloch's visit here. Receptions are being given in his honor with leading Boston personalities expected to be present. All this is in marked contrast to his first appearance in Boston in the year 1917 when the composer was invited to conduct his Three Jewish Poems with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At that time the piece was new and Bloch but little known. Now his music fills an important place in every orchestra's repertoire while his chamber music and solo pieces have made him famous the world over.

The story of Bloch's career illustrates perfectly the fable of Bruce and the spider—repeated failure, continued disappointments together with a determined perseverance which never failed. Few great composers have had so much against them. Of these few some solved the problem in one way or another, some, mentally and physically ill, worn out by neglect and work, simply died. Bloch refused to give up nor chose to die. Like Washington he lost nearly all his battles but won the war.

Orthodox Background

Ernest Bloch was born in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1880. His father was a Russian Jew engaged in the dry goods business. His family was orthodox, strictly adhering to the traditional faith and its observances. As a child he heard the synagogual chants and Jewish folksongs which were so profoundly to affect his art in later life. From this childhood store of musical memories were later to blossom such masterpieces as the Israel Symphony, the Schelomo Rhapsody and the Synagogue services for chorus and orchestra. At a very early age the lad's musical gifts began to manifest themselves much to the apprehension of his sober and practical-minded father. But despite parental objections the boy refused to take his music less seriously and already at the age of eleven was determined to become a composer. With childish yet touching ceremony he wrote on a piece of paper a vow to become a composer, buried it under a mound of stones and built a bonfire over it.

Bloch was fortunate in his choice of first teacher. The great Jacques Dalcroze also lived in Geneva and it was with this outstanding pedagogue that the boy first began his musical studies. At the age of sixteen he left his native town to further his musical education. He received excellent training under great masters, including Ysaye who taught him to play the violin. A great future was predicted for him. After eight years of study he returned to Geneva, encouraged with the knowledge that his masters had predicted a great future for him. Settling down to composition he was so far successful that he was forced to gain his living by engaging in business. Nothing daunted, Bloch continued his composition at night after business hours, hoping for the day when he could once more devote himself completely to his music.

The War Intervenes

At last Bloch secured a hearing. His opera, "Macbeth," was accepted and produced by the Paris Opera Comique. The premiere was a success and for a time Bloch could feel that his efforts were to be rewarded by some measure of recognition. He was able to abandon his business activities to engage completely in a musical life. Meanwhile the great war broke out and Bloch determined to go to America. He received the opportunity in 1916 when he was engaged as conductor of a symphony orchestra which was to tour the country with a famous dancer. But the whole project was a failure and Bloch was stranded in New York.

Almost unknown in America Bloch was forced to build up his reputation once more. Some degree of success attended his efforts at first, but after the first flurry the musical world went about its way quite indifferent to the doings of Ernest Bloch. Still he presevered, would never cry quits, until slowly through the years his powers were recognized. Now his name is one of the best known in contemporary music.

Jewish Feeling

In his music Bloch has consciously adopted Jewish and Hebrew idiom and feeling. This is not to say that Bloch is a composer for Jews. In the same way that the German Beethoven belongs to the whole world, that the Russian Tschaikovsky enriches all musical literatures so does the Hebrew Bloch reach all races and creeds through his racially tinted music. His "Sacred Service," although set to a Hebrew text, is not meant solely for the synagogue. This music is for all who are able to comprehend its beauty and meaning. Bloch has composed in various styles and idioms. His "America" is truly American, an expression of love and devotion for his adopted country.

The most eminent critics and musicians have united to praise Bloch's work. Olin Downes was one of the first Americans to recognize his genius. Lawrence Gilman said: "We pay tribute to a musical temperament so deeply sincere, so distinguished, so richly articulate, that all who love music as a living and mobile art must hold their heads a little higher because of him." David Ewen hails Bloch as "the foremost living exponent of modern Hebrew music."

When Bloch arrives in Boston he will find a great orchestra ready for him. Under Doctor Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become one of the greatest orchestras of all time. With this marvelous medium at his disposal Bloch will find a great instrument ready for his great music. The result should be memorable in Boston's musical life. To the persons responsible for bringing Ernest Bloch here Boston owes a great debt of gratitude which must manifest itself in concrete manner.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 1 1 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Entertains at Academy With Novelty Called "Peter and the Wolf" And Excells in Vivaldi Concerto

Progressive education scored a point at the Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music last night when Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale "for children" to his Brooklyn audience. Only a month ago it had delighted the Manhattan audience made up of children from 10 to 70, which attended the orchestra's "Concert Extraordinnaire"; last night its success was repeated. In the enjoyment of it, one learned not only something about the orchestra but the A B C of program music.

This musical nursery tale is an ingenious work filled with chuckling humor and endowed with a catchy theme for Peter, the hero, which is quite disarming. The theme is given to the violins while the bird is represented by a flute, the duck by an oboe, the cat by a clarinet "in a low register," grandpapa by the bassoon, the wolf by three horns, the shooting of the hunters by the kettledrums and bass drum. The composition is clever and entertaining as Peter and the bird capture the wolf and with the hunters take it to the zoo. Richard Hale narrated the story with just the right inflection while the orchestra supplied the sound effects in spirited fashion, smiling as it played. The audience was amused, as it should have been.

Preceding this music in the lighter vein was the finest performance of the evening, that of Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor. This is the work of which the great J. S. Bach thought enough of to make an organ transcription. As its beauty was disclosed last night in some matchless playing, the reason was not hard to find, for the texture of the three movements is of the purest music. Hauntingly exquisite was the Largo movement with its suggestion of the music of Gluck to come almost a half century later and played with a tone of velvet by the famous Boston strings. Of similar worth were the Maestoso and Allegro movements.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony completed the program. Naturally it was well played, but there was occasion to differ with the conductor's interpretation on more than one count. Where was the lilting quality of the Vivace, the continuous motion of the Allegretto, the fire of the robust and boisterous finale? Koussevitzky felt the rhythmic impulse of this symphony, for he beat out its rhythms with his foot in the more rapid movements, but there was a restraint

Clifford Curzon

After his outstanding success achieved in a recent debut recital, the brilliant young English pianist, Clifford Curzon, may be credited with fresh triumphs as a result of his concert last night at Carnegie Hall in which he played three concerti with Alexander Smallens conducting 65 members of the Philharmonic. Of his playing little can be said, except to confirm the previous record of superlatives applied to his sensitive musical artistry and technical mastery.

Most noteworthy item on Mr. Curzon's program was John Ireland's Concerto in E flat, heard here for the first time. Mr. Ireland, a contemporary compatriot of Mr. Curzon, is best known for his popular setting to Masefield's "Sea Fever." His Concerto is constructed in traditional form with three movements. The opening movement, marked moderato, gave the impression of having been inspired by pastoral scenes or seascapes, perhaps the rocky coast of Cornwall. The musical idiom is personal and original, being conservatively modern in treatment. Some music of serene lyric beauty in the lento espessivo is an engaging and sincere utterance, if hardly profound. The allegretto giocoso is introduced without pause by a tympani and snare drum passage. A somewhat tongue-in-cheek military fanfare, punctuated by a tattoo on the Chinese block, ushers in a whimsical, carnivalesque development section of the finale, while an echo of the opening theme is heard in the coda. The orchestration is capable, though not always as effective as it might have been, while the work as a whole is compact, imaginative and worthy of further acquaintance. Needless to say, Mr. Curzon's assignment in this and in Mozart's A major and Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerti was admirably performed.

R. O. W.

Broadcast To Honor Composer

Ernest Bloch to Appear On Program Sunday

A special program broadcast over Station WEEI will be aired this Sunday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock as a tribute to Ernest Bloch, world renowned Jewish composer. Mr. Bloch will appear on the program and will be introduced by Moses Smith, music critic of the Boston Transcript.

The musical portion of the program will be rendered by the members of the Cecelia Singing Society. Robert H. Segal, cantor and musical director of Temple Ohabei Shalom, will be the soloist. Arthur Fiedler will conduct the entire program. Accompanist for the program will be Ernest Harrison, organist, and Evelyn Borofsky, pianist.

Selections from Mr. Bloch's compositions will be included in the program, and the composer is expected to deliver a significant message on his appearance here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 2 1939

The recent costume concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to have set a precedent for symphonic high jinks in at least one town. The Rochester Civic Orchestra lately conducted what it called a "night of fun," during which, one hopes, the Muses and the great shades were fast asleep.

The program featured the composition known as "The Worried Drummer," which, belying its title, makes drummers happy as nothing else can do. The audience also heard the Haydn "Farewell" symphony, with complete histrionic accompaniment; "The Irish Washerwoman," "Turkey in the Straw," "Harmonica Player" and the "Carnival of Animals." It was all under the direction of Paul White.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

MAR 1 3 1939

New Woolsey Hall Series Finest Eve

With the recent announcement o the Woolsey Hall Concert Series lis for the 1939-1940 season, the greates interest in the long history of thes fine musical events is being show by music lovers from this vicinity The percentage of subscription renewals by the regular list of patron is already far in advance of an other season, while the host of nev orders coming in from all over thi section of the state, indicates tha next season's subscription list wil again be of capacity proportions.

No doubt can exist as to the popularity of the group of seven concerts when the brilliant list is perused even most casually. Frit Kreisler, world's greatest violinis will start the season on October 31 and in order will be seen during th fall and winter season the Bosto Symphony Orchestra; Helen Jepson soprano; the Philadelphia Orchestra Josef Hofmann, pianist; Lawrenc Tibbett, baritone; and again the Boston Symphony as the climax of th notable schedule.

Generally the announcement o the new season's plans has bee made in the fall of the year. However, the time has been so short between the time that the series was first made public, and the first concert, that great difficulty has been experienced in enrolling former patrons and the taking of new orders. For this reason the early announcement was decided upon, thus bringing the ticket procedure in line with nearly every other concert series in the country, in which cases the system has been found to the best advantage for both old and new patrons alike.

Although the local schedule is of such all around merit as to leave little to choose in the way of selecting this or that offering as the leading one, the coming of the Philadelphia Orchestra to New Haven for the first time is the outstanding feature in the minds of many. Helen Jepson, glamorous soprano of the Metropolitan, is also making her first New Haven appearance on the forthcoming series. Soloists Kreisler, Tibbett and Hofmann, all old favorites, have not appeared here in several seasons, and the return will be welcome. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will as usual play its regular season of two local concerts, a local musical feature without which no New Haven musical season would be complete.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

March 12/39

Group to Study Haydn's Music

At Meeting of Allentown Musical Club in Muhlenberg Library Monday

"Haydn—The Early Orchestra and the Woodwind Choir of the Orchestra" will be the theme at the regular study hour of the orchestral study group of the Allentown Musical club. The affair, under the direction of Nan M. Roth, will be held Monday at 10 a. m. in the Muhlenberg college Library building. Miss Roth is being assisted by Mrs. Samuel R. Thomas.

In addition to illustration of the various woodwinds by means of the excellent recordings available at the Muhlenberg Library, Albertus Meyers, director of the Allentown band, will present several of his band members in numbers illustrative of the program.

Miss Roth's recordings are to include: Flute, Haydn's "With Verdure Clad," from "Creation," sung by Margaret Balfour, with orchestra conducted by Clarence Raybould; Bishop's "Lo! Here the Gentle Lark," sung by Dame Nellie Melba, and Mozart's "The Magic Flute," played by the New York Philharmonic, conducted by William Mengelberg.

In illustration of the piccolo, the chairman has chosen Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9 D Minor, first movement, played by the New York Philharmonic, conducted by Toscannini; oboe, Bach's "Jesus, Joy of Man's Desiring," sung by the Temple church choir, London, conducted by Thalben-Ball, with oboe obligato by Leon Goosens.

The English horn will be illustrated by means of Dvorak's "New World Symphony-Largo," played by the Philadelphia orchestra, L. Stokowski, conductor, Robert Bloom, English horn soloist; Wagner's "Prelude to 3rd Act," of "Tristan and Isolde," unaccompanied solos for the English horn by Hans Beer; and Cesar Franck's "Symphony," 2nd movement, Philadelphia orchestra, L. Stokowski, conductor.

Clarinet work will be brought to the gathering's attention through Sibelius' "Finlandia," played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, L. Stokowski, conductor; and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," played by the Berlin State Opera orchestra.

The bassoon will be illustrated through Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite," "Beauty and the Beast," by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor; and the saxophone through Bizet's "Prelude," to the "L'Arlesienne Suite," by the London Philharmonic orchestra, Sir Thomas Beecham, conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 2 1939

NEW WORK GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Harris's Third Symphony in Local Premiere

RUTH POSSELT IS SOLOIST

Boston Violinist Appears in Concerto by Tchaikovsky at Carnegie Hall

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky paid particular tribute to American musicians in the program that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave under his direction yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. He placed upon the list the first New York performance of Roy Harris's Third Symphony, and he presented as soloist in the performance of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto Miss Ruth Posselt, a Bostonian, a pupil in earlier years of Emmanuel Ondricek of that city and in more recent seasons a recitalist and soloist with various orchestras of America and Europe.

These performances made the first half of the program—a fact which, for one reviewer, or else for Mr. Harris, as posterity will decide the matter, was unfortunate, or the reverse. For look you: this critic was late. Now, if it is a bad symphony, that accident of tardiness saves Mr. Harris, at least so far as this column is concerned. It's true that the critic was only five minutes late. Five minutes doesn't sound like much, but it's a great deal if you are catching a train or the opening of a new symphony. Particularly is this the case when the symphony is only twenty minutes long and in one continuous movement.

Consequences of Lateness

With that five minutes of unheard music, the reviewer's lips, or pen, were they disposed to condemnation, are silenced. People would read the adverse remarks. They would say: "He never heard it. I saw him. He was late," a possible contingency which affords Mr. Harris asylum.

On the other hand, if the symphony is a great new masterpiece, the critic is unlucky. He cannot celebrate that fact. Thus, in the degree in which he cannot, fails properly to serve the great newspaper which employs him, and the expectant readers of the music columns.

Suppose that, on hearing but a part of the symphony, he praises it? Then they'll say, "Aha! We've got him now. He don't mean a word of that. I've watched him and I've read him and I'm convinced. He's crawling."

And there you are. Very few, we will be bound, appreciate the mental, moral and psychological dilemmas of music critics. As it stands, the reader must accept at his own value the following statements: (1) That the last three-quarters of Harris's Third symphony are written more clearly, simply, with a greater unity of thought and style than any other early work of Mr. Harris that we have heard. It is no longer either congested or obviously experimental writing. The same thing holds true of the instrumentation. And the symphony, where the position and the treatment of the ideas are concerned, is better spaced. That is to say, the central ideas, or transformations of them, are placed far enough apart and sufficiently developed to avoid the sense of overcrowding and of excessive detail that otherwise might obtain.

In Five Divisions

Aside from journalistic duty, one would like to hear this symphony again. This would be particularly necessary in order to judge its thematic value, the significance of th themes, the originality or lack of it shown in their treatment. The composer designates the one-movement symphony as being in five divisions, described successively as "Tragic," "Lyric," "Pastoral," "Fugue," "'Dramatic-tragic," and there is a sort of a geometrical table added, like the small-type paragraphs in a legal paper or budget, which give some technical details of the symphony's layout. Such particulars, we venture to observe, are for composers or for professional musicians rather than public audiences.

What concerns us is the quality of the music, the strength or weakness of its two elements of esthetic beauty and emotional expression. Curiously enough, there are pages that remind of Stravinsky and others which remind more strongly—of Sibelius. With the recounting of these preliminary impressions of the Harris symphony the present review must rest.

Brilliant in Concerto

Miss Posselt's performance of Tchaikovsky's concerto was a brilliant one. It is true that the brilliancy, in the opening movement, was of a rather tense and nervous kind. Her tone was big when she pressed the strings to the limit, and it is probable that a score which demanded less sheer tonal opulence and impact would find her more completely equipped for it. She has much feeling and virtuoso impulse, and a real sense of color. The performance became always better as it progressed. The audience applauded Miss Posselt long and heartily.

The second half of this concert consisted of the delicious and inimitable "orchestral fairy tale for children" of Prokofieff, with Richard Hale for the capital narrator, and Ravel's "La Valse."

Prokofieff's witty and masterful jeu d'esprit was heard here last Feb. 8 at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It was then received with so much pleasure that a repetition at one of the regular New York concerts of the Boston Symphony series was suggested. Some wondered if such a "light" piece was appropriate in a symphonic program of serious symphonic music. The answer from the public was found in the greeting that the amusing work of genius received. It is more than worthy a position on such an occasion. Its wonderful humor and characterization, its virtuoso employment of orchestral instruments and its adroit polyphony constitute learning worn with a lightness that captivates the mind and the fancy.

The story of the bird, the duck, the cat, portrayed by "the clarinet, staccato, in a low register; of the insouciant Peter; the wicked wolf—three snarling horns; the grandfather—the bassoon—and the shots of the hunters—percussion—was told inimitably by Mr. Hale, and an audience of grown-ups exulted in the occasion.

The final performance was of the grim and fantastic "La Valse" of Ravel, performed with electrifying precision and flash of color and deadly malice. It is the music which satirizes Viennese waltz rhythms, but the Straussian tunes are distorted; they writhe and grimace; the furious, banal climax, better and sardonic, is, in the excellent words of Lawrence Gilman, "as perturbing as a mobilization order."

Dr. Koussevitzky conducts this piece with reckless mastery; the superb orchestra he has developed follows him in like style. It would have been hard to contrive a more interesting orchestral afternoon.

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD - TRIBUNE

MAR 1 2 1939

THE ORCHESTRAS

ARTUR SCHNABEL will reappear with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under John Barbirolli's direction this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" piano concerto. The other numbers, which have figured in other series earlier this season, are Weber's overture to "Oberon," Debussy's Sarabande and Elgar's "Enigma" variations.

The orchestra will leave for Boston tomorrow for a concert that evening in Symphony Hall, which will mark Mr. Barbirolli's Boston debut. Mr. Schnabel will play the "Emperor" concerto in a program also including Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's octet and Brahms's second symphony. The concert is sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Tuesday night Mr. Barbirolli and the orchestra will give their annual concert in Hartford, playing a Handel concerto grosso, Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

In the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts of next Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Artur Rubinstein will play Mozart's piano concerto in A major and the piano solo in de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." Mr. Barbirolli's program begins with Handel's sixth concerto grosso, in G minor, and closes with the overture to Johann Strauss's "Der Zigeunerbaron."

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Violinist Plays Carpenter's Concerto, Heard Here for the First Time

March 11/39

By OLIN DOWNES

The customary distinguished audience packed Carnegie Hall for the concert given there last night by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program was admirably arranged. It began with the most personal of all the Schumann symphonies, the one numbered "fourth," and ended with the collossal and fantastical tone poem of Richard Strauss "Also sprach Zarathustra." Between these two works came John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, heard for the first time here and played by Zlato Balakovic.

Little information about the character of this concerto or the specific creative purpose of the composer in writing it—if there was any—has been made known. The Boston Symphony program book contents itself with a technical analysis by the eminent Felix Borowski, as it had been printed in the program book of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, when the concerto was given its first public performance in the Windy City Nov. 18, 1937. The analysis is informative, as Mr. Borowski's words are certain to be, as to the structure of the score and allied matters. There it stops. The composer, present last night to acknowledge long applause with Dr. Koussevitzky, has evidently been reticent where any personal explanation of the music was concerned.

Concerto in One Movement

It is a concerto in one movement, with changes of theme, tempo, mood. Its character is sometimes buoyant, exuberant, and sometimes a little sentimental. There is a decidedly American idiom, one that does not imitate jazz but derives some rhythmical ideas and melodic piquancy from that source, translating this material into a form distinguished by fine craftsmanship. The rhythmic treatment of the ideas is unusual. The difficult violin part is stuff to make all but the confident virtuoso tremble.

Its problems, especially the rhythmic ones, demand clear musical thinking and a player capable of holding to his own through no matter what conflicting rhythms or counter-effects. The instrumentation is dexterous and effective. What the work seems to suffer from is a length out of proportion to the potency of the ideas. They are distinguished by grace, humor, fancy, rather than by melodic entities which can become the cornerstones of imposing symphonic creations.

The ending has poetical atmosphere, the violin sustaining a high E, while the mellow and reverberant tones of the vibraphone sound underneath. The net impression of the work is the creation of a composer who was saying something especially personal when he put the music on paper, but desires that the score should be judged, without special explanations, as music, and intends to make no other appeal to the interest and imagination of his audiences. Repeated hearings of the music might well reveal much more than the first impression of matter that is significant.

Mr. Balakovic's interpretation of the piece was a feat of unusual virtuosity and musical acumen. To the technical and rhythmical problems he brought confidence and authority, and an ample technique and sensibility. The audience received both player and conductor well.

Schumann's symphony is inimitable and not always easy to capture where mood is concerned, and always at a certain psychological disadvantage when played in a big hall. Dr. Koussevitzky has his own conception of the passionate and introspective music, which he placed in certain unexpected lights, without weakening or distorting its essential nature. The technical quality of the orchestra was made particularly manifest.

An Impressive Conclusion

This music, and the score of Carpenter, made Strauss's "Zarathustra" more than ever an impressive conclusion. Especially did Dr. Koussevitzky capture the grand mood and the tremendous line of the opening. That was tonal sculpture, carved as from rock. Again the phrase of Philip Hale came to mind—the vast beginning that was to him "as the portals of eternity, swinging slowly asunder."

There are small and petty themes in this music, side by side with other gigantic fragments. The work, notwithstanding inequalities, contains pages of the freest, greatest, most wildly imaginative music Strauss ever penned. The freedom of his form makes this possible. Busoni said that many of the most original creations of music occur between the boundaries of the main divisions of classic forms of composition. He cited as an example the free introduction, with the horn theme, of the last movement of Brahms's C minor symphony. There are these freedoms, these sudden free flights, glimpses into the infinite, in "Zarathustra."

Strauss's music of the backworld dwellers is not so amazing as the mystical dialogue of solo instruments which precedes the appearance of the chorale. The fugue to science is extraordinary; more remarkable is the mad laughter that breaks out through the orchestra as the vast and complicated fugue comes to its peroration. The passage, "the convalescent," preceding the celebrated waltz theme, a page of almost inhuman exultation and sardonic glee, remains always in the memory. The climax of the tone poem came out superbly, with the whole orchestra chanting, hymning the night-wanderer's song, the trumpets screaming across infinite space, the strings with their wide leaps, their Dionysiac frenzy.

We have seldom heard a performance of such technical virtuosity, or the pages to which we have referred given more meaning than last night. "Zaroltustro" is the Strauss tone-poem which has been longest in coming into its own. The reception it received may be acknowledged as due, particularly, to the insight and interpreture resource of Dr. Koussevitzky.

19

STRAUSS FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

B. Post — ? /39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE complete programme which John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will present at Symphony Hall on Monday evening, March 13, came to hand too late for inclusion in this column last Sunday, although mention was made of the fact that Artur Schnabel would play the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. The other numbers on Mr. Barbirolli's list, it now appears, are Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, the orchestral version of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet and the Second Symphony of Brahms. With no novel music to distract us we should be able to concentrate the better upon the qualities of conductor and orchestra.

* * * *

Save for the inevitable and ubiquitous Lieder there has been no music by Richard Strauss in Boston this season. This omission will be doubly rectified at the concerts of this week. At Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Dr. Koussevitzky and his men will perform the "Symphonia Domestica," a once abused and even ridiculed work which is now coming into its own. And on Wednesday evening at Jordan Hall Bernard Zighera's Chamber Orchestra, will play the Suite from the Munich composer's incidental music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" or, as it is called in Von Hoffmannstahl's German adaptation, "Der Buerger als Edelmann."

* * * *

We are reminded by two impending concerts that musical talent, although not often transmitted from father or mother to son or daughter, is often common to children of the same parents. At the Zighera concert aforementioned the soloist will be Amparo Iturbi, sister of the more famous Jose, who will be heard in the D major Pianoforte Concerto of Haydn. Like her brother, Amparo, in private life Senora Novaro, is virtually self-taught as pianist. We are told that both use the same unorthodox hand-position, "knuckles bent downward, instead of arched, fingers sharply curved." And the other instance here referred to is that of the Boulanger sisters, Lili and Nadia. Every year the latter conducts a concert in memory of the former, a gifted composer and winner of the first Grand Prix de Rome, who died in 1918, in her 25th year. Heretofore this concert has always taken place in Paris, but on Monday evening of next week it will be given in Symphony Hall, with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society participating. Music by Bach, Beethoven, Malipiero and Lili Boulanger will make the programme.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 1 2 1939

(Right) KOUSSEVITZKY STRESSES A POINT—Roy Harris, Oklahoma-born composer, and Mrs. Harris listen attentively as the conductor of the Boston Symphony stresses a point after first performance of Mr. Harris's Third Symphony, which had its premiere at Boston, Feb. 24.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 2 1939

NEW WORK GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Harris's Third Symphony in Local Premiere

RUTH POSSELT IS SOLOIST

Boston Violinist Appears in Concerto by Tchaikovsky at Carnegie Hall

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky paid particular tribute to American musicians in the program that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave under his direction yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. He placed upon the list the first New York performance of Roy Harris's Third Symphony, and he presented as soloist in the performance of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto Miss Ruth Posselt, a Bostonian, a pupil in earlier years of Emmanuel Ondricek of that city and in more recent seasons a recitalist and soloist with various orchestras of America and Europe.

These performances made the first half of the program—a fact which, for one reviewer, or else for Mr. Harris, as posterity will decide the matter, was unfortunate, or the reverse. For look you: this critic was late. Now, if it is a bad symphony, that accident of tardiness saves Mr. Harris, at least so far as this column is concerned. It's true that the critic was only five minutes late. Five minutes doesn't sound like much, but it's a great deal if you are catching a train or the opening of a new symphony. Particularly is this the case when the symphony is only twenty minutes long and in one continuous movement.

Consequences of Lateness

With that five minutes of unheard music, the reviewer's lips, or pen, were they disposed to condemnation, are silenced. People would read the adverse remarks. They would say: "He never heard it. I saw him. He was late," a possible contingency which affords Mr. Harris asylum.

On the other hand, if the symphony is a great new masterpiece, the critic is unlucky. He cannot celebrate that fact. Thus, in the degree in which he cannot, fails properly to serve the great newspaper which employs him, and the expectant readers of the music columns.

Suppose that, on hearing but a part of the symphony, he praises it? Then they'll say, "Aha! We've got him now. He don't mean a word of that. I've watched him and I've read him and I'm convinced. He's crawling."

And there you are. Very few, we will be bound, appreciate the mental, moral and psychological dilemmas of music critics. As it stands, the reader must accept at his own value the following statements: (1) That the last three-quarters of Harris's Third symphony are written more clearly, simply, with a greater unity of thought and style than any other early work of Mr. Harris that we have heard. It is no longer either congested or obviously experimental writing. The same thing holds true of the instrumentation. And the symphony, where the position and the treatment of the ideas are concerned, is better spaced. That is to say, the central ideas, or transformations of them, are placed far enough apart and sufficiently developed to avoid the sense of overcrowding and of excessive detail that otherwise might obtain.

In Five Divisions

Aside from journalistic duty, one would like to hear this symphony again. This would be particularly necessary in order to judge its thematic value, the significance of the themes, the originality or lack of it shown in their treatment. The composer designates the one-movement symphony as being in five divisions, described successively as "Tragic," "Lyric," "Pastoral," "Fugue," "'Dramatic-tragic," and there is a sort of a geometrical table added, like the small-type paragraphs in a legal paper or budget, which give some technical details of the symphony's layout. Such particulars, we venture to observe, are for composers or for professional musicians rather than public audiences.

What concerns us is the quality of the music, the strength or weakness of its two elements of esthetic beauty and emotional expression. Curiously enough, there are pages that remind of Stravinsky and others which remind more strongly—of Sibelius. With the recounting of these preliminary impressions of the Harris symphony the present review must rest.

Brilliant in Concerto

Miss Posselt's performance of Tchaikovsky's concerto was a brilliant one. It is true that the brilliancy, in the opening movement, was of a rather tense and nervous kind. Her tone was big when she pressed the strings to the limit, and it is probable that a score which demanded less sheer tonal opulence and impact would find her more completely equipped for it. She has much feeling and virtuoso impulse, and a real sense of color. The performance became always better as it progressed. The audience applauded Miss Posselt long and heartily.

The second half of this concert consisted of the delicious and inimitable "orchestral fairy tale for children" of Prokofieff, with Richard Hale for the capital narrator, and Ravel's "La Valse."

Prokofieff's witty and masterful jeu d'esprit was heard here last Feb. 8 at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It was then received with so much pleasure that a repetition at one of the regular New York concerts of the Boston Symphony series was suggested. Some wondered if such a "light" piece was appropriate in a symphonic program of serious symphonic music. The answer from the public was found in the greeting that the amusing work of genius received. It is more than worthy a position on such an occasion. Its wonderful humor and characterization, its virtuoso employment of orchestral instruments and its adroit polyphony constitute learning worn with a lightness that captivates the mind and the fancy.

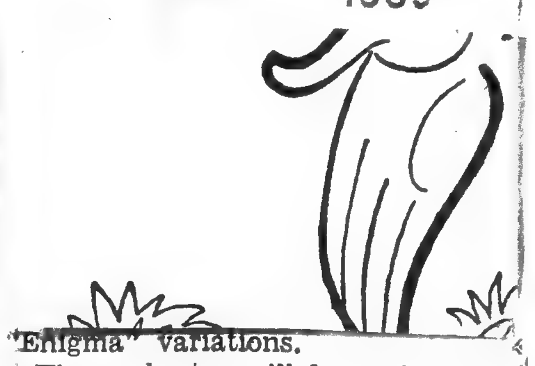
The story of the bird, the duck, the cat, portrayed by "the clarinet, staccato, in a low register; of the insouciant Peter; the wicked wolf—three snarling horns; the grandfather—the bassoon—and the shots of the hunters—percussion—was told inimitably by Mr. Hale, and an audience of grown-ups exulted in the occasion.

The final performance was of the grim and fantastic "La Valse" of Ravel, performed with electrifying precision and flash of color and deadly malice. It is the music which satirizes Viennese waltz rhythms, but the Straussian tunes are distorted; they writhe and grimace; the furious, banal climax, better and sardonic, is, in the excellent words of Lawrence Gilman, "as perturbing as a mobilization order."

Dr. Koussevitzky conducts this piece with reckless mastery; the superb orchestra he has developed follows him in like style. It would have been hard to contrive a more interesting orchestral afternoon.

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD - TRIBUNE

MAR 1 2 1939



"Enigma" variations.

The orchestra will leave for Boston tomorrow for a concert that evening in Symphony Hall, which will mark Mr. Barbirolli's Boston debut. Mr. Schnabel will play the "Emperor" concerto in a program also including Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's octet and Brahms's second symphony. The concert is sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Tuesday night Mr. Barbirolli and the orchestra will give their annual concert in Hartford, playing a Handel concerto grosso, Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

In the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts of next Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Artur Rubinstein will play Mozart's piano concerto in A major and the piano solo in de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." Mr. Barbirolli's program begins with Handel's sixth concerto grosso, in G minor, and closes with the overture to Johann Strauss's "Der Zigeunerbaron."

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Conducts 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' and Work by Schumann

ZLATO BALAKOVIC SOLOIST

N. Y. Times

Violinist Plays Carpenter's Concerto, Heard Here for the First Time

March 11/39

By OLIN DOWNES

The customary distinguished audience packed Carnegie Hall for the concert given there last night by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program was admirably arranged. It began with the most personal of all the Schumann symphonies, the one numbered "fourth," and ended with the collossal and fantastical tone poem of Richard Strauss "Also sprach Zarathustra." Between these two works came John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, heard for the first time here and played by Zlato Balakovic.

Little information about the character of this concerto or the specific creative purpose of the composer in writing it—if there was any—has been made known. The Boston Symphony program book contents itself with a technical analysis by the eminent Felix Borowski, as it had been printed in the program book of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, when the concerto was given its first public performance in the Windy City Nov. 18, 1937. The analysis is informative, as Mr. Borowski's words are certain to be, as to the structure of the score and allied matters. There it stops. The composer, present last night to acknowledge long applause with Dr. Koussevitzky, has evidently been reticent where any personal explanation of the music was concerned.

Concerto in One Movement

It is a concerto in one movement, with changes of theme, tempo, mood. Its character is sometimes buoyant, exuberant, and sometimes a little sentimental. There is a decidedly American idiom, one that does not imitate jazz but derives some rhythmical ideas and melodic piquancy from that source, translating this material into a form distinguished by fine craftsmanship. The rhythmic treatment of the ideas is unusual. The difficult violin part is stuff to make all but the confident virtuoso tremble.

Its problems, especially the rhythmic ones, demand clear musical thinking and a player capable of holding to his own through no matter what conflicting rhythms or counter-effects. The instrumentation is dexterous and effective. What the work seems to suffer from is a length out of proportion to the potency of the ideas. They are distinguished by grace, humor, fancy, rather than by melodic entities which can become the cornerstones of imposing symphonic creations.

The ending has poetical atmosphere, the violin sustaining a high E, while the mellow and reverberant tones of the vibraphone sound underneath. The net impression of the work is the creation of a composer who was saying something especially personal when he put the music on paper, but desires that the score should be judged, without special explanations, as music, and intends to make no other appeal to the interest and imagination of his audiences. Repeated hearings of the music might well reveal much more than the first impression of matter that is significant.

Mr. Balakovic's interpretation of the piece was a feat of unusual virtuosity and musical acumen. To the technical and rhythmical problems he brought confidence and authority, and an ample technique and sensibility. The audience received both player and conductor well.

Schumann's symphony is inimitable and not always easy to capture where mood is concerned, and always at a certain psychological disadvantage when played in a big hall. Dr. Koussevitzky has his own conception of the passionate and introspective music, which he placed in certain unexpected lights, without weakening or distorting its essential nature. The technical quality of the orchestra was made particularly manifest.

An Impressive Conclusion

This music, and the score of Carpenter, made Strauss's "Zarathustra" more than ever an impressive conclusion. Especially did Dr. Koussevitzky capture the grand mood and the tremendous line of the opening. That was tonal sculpture, carved as from rock. Again the phrase of Philip Hale came to mind—the vast beginning that was to him "as the portals of eternity, swinging slowly asunder."

There are small and petty themes in this music, side by side with other gigantic fragments. The work, notwithstanding inequalities, contains pages of the freest, greatest, most wildly imaginative music Strauss ever penned. The freedom of his form makes this possible. Busoni said that many of the most original creations of music occur between the boundaries of the main divisions of classic forms of composition. He cited as an example the free introduction, with the horn theme, of the last movement of Brahms's C minor symphony. There are these freedoms, these sudden free flights, glimpses into the infinite, in "Zarathustra."

Strauss's music of the backworld dwellers is not so amazing as the mystical dialogue of solo instruments which precedes the appearance of the chorale. The fugue to science is extraordinary; more remarkable is the mad laughter that breaks out through the orchestra as the vast and complicated fugue comes to its peroration. The passage, "the convalescent," preceding the celebrated waltz theme, a page of almost inhuman exultation and sardonic glee, remains always in the memory. The climax of the tone poem came out superbly, with the whole orchestra chanting, hymning the night-wanderer's song, the trumpets screaming across infinite space, the strings with their wide leaps, their Dionysiac frenzy.

We have seldom heard a performance of such technical virtuosity, or the pages to which we have referred given more meaning than last night. "Zaroltustro" is the Strauss tone-poem which has been longest in coming into its own. The reception it received may be acknowledged as due, particularly, to the insight and interpreture resource of Dr. Koussevitzky.

F

STRAUSS FOR SYMPHONY B. CONCERT

Post ? /39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE complete programme which John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will present at Symphony Hall on Monday evening, March 13, came to hand too late for inclusion in this column last Sunday, although mention was made of the fact that Artur Schnabel would play the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. The other numbers on Mr. Barbirolli's list, it now appears, are Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, the orchestral version of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet and the Second Symphony of Brahms. With no novel music to distract us we should be able to concentrate the better upon the qualities of conductor and orchestra.

* * * *

Save for the inevitable and ubiquitous Lieder there has been no music by Richard Strauss in Boston this season. This omission will be doubly rectified at the concerts of this week. At Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Dr. Koussevitzky and his men will perform the "Symphonia Domestica," a once abused and even ridiculed work which is now coming into its own. And on Wednesday evening at Jordan Hall Bernard Zighera's Chamber Orchestra, will play the Suite from the Munich composer's incidental music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" or, as it is called in Von Hoffmannstahl's German adaptation, "Der Buerger als Edelmann."

* * * *

We are reminded by two impending concerts that musical talent, although not often transmitted from father or mother to son or daughter, is often common to children of the same parents. At the Zighera concert aforementioned the soloist will be Amparo Iturbi, sister of the more famous Jose, who will be heard in the D major Pianoforte Concerto of Haydn. Like her brother, Amparo, in private life Senora Novaro, is virtually self-taught as pianist. We are told that both use the same unorthodox hand-position, "knuckles bent downward, instead of arched, fingers sharply curved." And the other instance here referred to is that of the Boulanger sisters, Lili and Nadia. Every year the latter conducts a concert in memory of the former, a gifted composer and winner of the first Grand Prix de Rome, who died in 1918, in her 25th year. Heretofore this concert has always taken place in Paris, but on Monday evening of next week it will be given in Symphony Hall, with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society participating. Music by Bach, Beethoven, Malipiero and Lili Boulanger will make the programme.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 1 2 1939

(Right) KOUSSEVITZKY STRESSES A POINT—Roy Harris, Oklahoma-born composer, and Mrs. Harris listen attentively as the conductor of the Boston Symphony stresses a point after first performance of Mr. Harris's Third Symphony, which had its premiere at Boston, Feb. 24. AP.

700

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAR 1 2 1939

RNEST BLOCH SYMPHONY UEST THIS WEEK

Ernest Bloch will be the distinuished visiting composer and guest conductor at the next concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The programme for the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, and for Thursday evening in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, will comprise three of his works: Two Inerludes from his opera "Macbeth," he "Three Jewish Poems," and he epic rhapsody, "America," Bloch's "Macbeth" was an opera of is youth which, after lying unerformed for many years after its rst production, in 1910, was reived in Naples last spring. The wo Interludes, which are from the rst and third acts, are here to ave their first concert performnces. The "Three Jewish Poems", miliar by several performances the concerts of this orchestra, d their first public performance 1917 when Bloch, a newcomer to is country, was invited by Dr. uck to conduct the orchestra. merica" was performed here in 28 and 1929. "America" was composed, according to an inscription on the score: "In love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration." The Rhapsody, which is largely built upon popular melodies of America's past, is in three parts. The first depicts the early days of the Indians, and Pilgrim settlers. The second part, "Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow", shows the country torn by Civil war. The third is entitled: "The Present—The Future."

Mr. Bloch will conduct the next pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series, to be given on March 20-21. The programme for this pair of concerts will open with the Two Interludes from "Macbeth," and also include the "Three Jewish Poems." The Rhapsody "Schelomo" and 'cello and orchestra, will be included—Jean Bedetti taking the solo part. The programme will end with Bloch's "Helvetia," then having its first performances in Boston. "Helvetia" is a musical characterization of Switzerland—"The Land of Moutains and Its People," which was the country of Bloch's birth. The composer worked upon the score for many years, completing it in 1929.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

MAR 1 3 1939

• • •

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky gave the third and last of its local concerts last week at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. A feature of the program was the first performance here of the Third Symphony of Roy Harris. Ruth Posselt was soloist in the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D major. A repetition of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," which was heard here at previous concerts by the Boston Orchestra, and a playing of Ravel's "La Valse" closed the program.

Although Mr. Harris's Second Symphony has not yet been heard here, it may be safe to say that his Third is the most invividual and striking item of his output to date. The work is in a single movement, but in five contrasting sections. A distinct personality is evident behind the workable themes and the skilful construction and instrumentation of the symphony. Occasionally brevity is sacrificed for prolixity but, if form is no item, it is music well worth listening to.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION ✓

MAR 1 2 1939

Sibelius Symphonies Performed at Boston

Boston.—Thanks to Serge Koussevitzky, who admires the music of Sibelius and plays it frequently at concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Boston public has in the past several years been able to gain familiarity with four of the Finnish master's seven symphonies, states Musical Courier. The third, fourth and six symphonies have not, however, been heard here so often.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 1 3 1939

Symphony Plays New Harris Work

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon were introduced to a new work of Roy Harris', unpretentiously labeled, "Symphony No. 3." Needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting and the orchestra playing gave of their very best in expounding its bid for favor.

The work falls into what one might call five emotional divisions—(1) Tragic, (2) Lyric, (3) Pastoral, (4) Fugue-Dramatic, (5) Dramatic-Tragic. No printed clew to a programatic stimulus, if any, was given though the heaving, sullen, ebullient music suggested something stormy and exciting in the background. Structurally, it is clearer, better knit and developed, and more digestible than much of Mr. Harris' previous work.

Recognizable themes course through it, the shifting of orchestral colors is well handled, and the style is sparely compelling in places. The idiom is strongly personal, except that Sibelius often seems to be the mother-speech from which it derives. There are passages that smack out loud of the great Finn's music. But maybe that's a step forward, all things considered.

The afternoon's violin soloist was the young Bostonian, Ruth Posselt. She gave a fluent and largely smooth account of Tschaikowsky's concerto, falling short on the expressive side, if not the purely technical. Mr. Koussevitsky backed her up with a splendid accompaniment. Later the orchestra repeated Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" (with Richard Hale as narrator) and brought down the house with Ravel's sardonically satiric "La Valse."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 1 3 1939

Music of the Da

By MILES KASTEN

Boston Symphony

Stamping music as essentially American is not an easy matter, yet that is what Roy Harris has succeeded in doing in his new Symphony No. 3, which had its first New York performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. It is an important contribution to the rapidly increasing number of worth-while scores by young American composers.

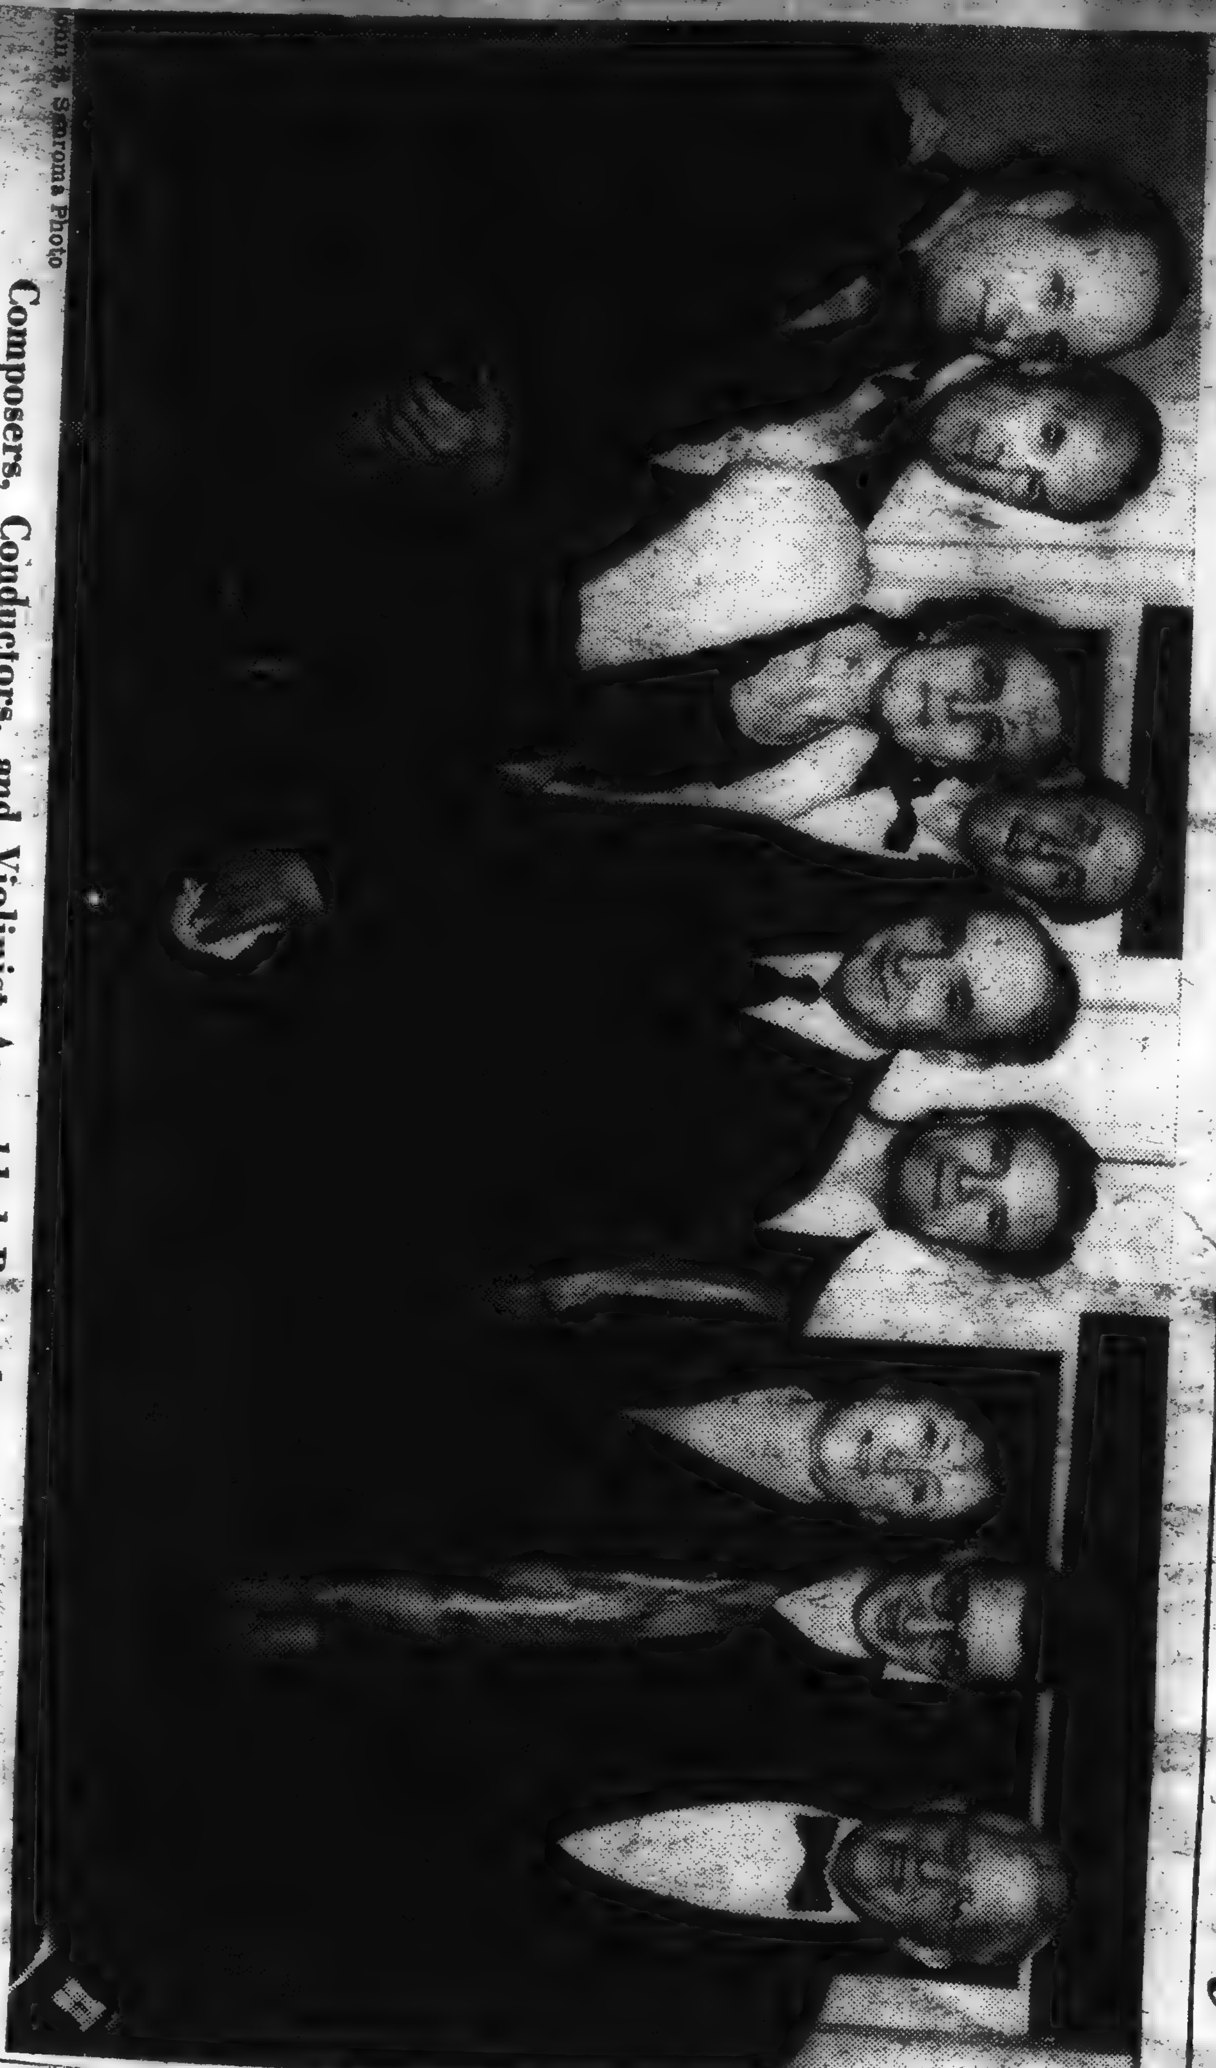
Less than 20 minutes in length and written in a single movement of five sections, the composition passes through a series of moods delineated by definite musical ideas and labeled as tragic, lyric, pastoral, fugal and dramatic. With a gift for melody, the composer opens with a striking one in the low string sonorities at once capturing the attention of the listener. It is only when he ventures into some pastoral musing and later some canonic writing that the thread is momentarily lost for all except the wary listener. The final section built up on a tympani organ point is stunning. A first hearing of the work cries out for still another, for Mr. Harris definitely has something to say.

Ruth Posselt was soloist in Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto. One of the winners of the Schubert Memorial Award several years ago, she proved her worth as a technician with feeling for rhythmic interest, tonal strength and clear-cut playing. Her performance was mostly on the surface of the music and inclined to inflexibility and lack of momentum. The orchestra gave her admirable support.

The concert concluded with Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" and Ravel's "La Valse," the former having completely captured the fancy of New York audiences.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1939

Amusements—Movies, Art, Plays



Sanroma Photo

Composers, Conductors, and Violinist Assembled Recently at Symphony Hall

Left to right: Walter Piston, chairman of the faculty of music at Harvard; John Alden Carpenter of Chicago, whose violin concerto was recently played at the Symphony concerts; Nadia Boulanger, teacher of Mr. Piston and of Roy Harris, who is the next at the right, and whose Third Symphony was recently presented by the Symphony Orchestra; Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Zlato Baloković, soloist in Mr. Carpenter's concerto; Mabel Daniels, Boston composer; Jean Françaix, French composer and pianist, another pupil of Miss Boulanger; and Edward Burlingame Hill, Harvard composer.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI - WEEKLY TIMES

MAR 1 4 1939

Boston Orchestra Presents Symphony by Roy Harris

Roy Harris, well known American composer now residing in Montclair, was honored Saturday afternoon by a first performance in New York of his Symphony no. 3 (in one movement), by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor ,at Carnegie Hall. The work had been given its first performance anywhere at Boston on Feb. 24. It was composed in Montclair last Fall and the proof-reading was finished in January.

Copious program notes by John N. Burk, taking up three and a half pages of the program booklet sent out to subscribers of the orchestra, give a critical analysis of the music, the composer's antecedents, his writings on the subject, and his methods of composition. Quoting from these notes:

"The symphony is a continuous work in one movement, of about wenty minutes duration. The comoser has provided, instead of a long rose analysis, the following strucural outline of his score: section I, ragic; section II, lyric; section III, astoral; section IV, fugue—draatic, and section V, dramatic—agic."

Mr. Burk continues: "When the 'Symphony: 1933' was performed here, the present writer remarked in this place: 'a certain independence, and earnest, arresting quality in the music of Roy Harris has made him one of the most performed of American composers in the last few years, and one of the most described.'"

The music shows a decidedly modern trend in its melodic and harmonic progressions and the expert manipulation of the instrumentation, yet it is sane, coherent, and artistically proportioned throughout, something that cannot truthfully be said of much of the modernistic "music," so-called, and it is saturated with an atmosphere of moving intensity that grips the listener from beginning to end.

It is quite evident that Mr. Harris "knows what he wishes to say and knows how to say it." His own strongly individual modes of expression and his known desire to help in establishing a strictly American school of composition that shall be strong enough to speak for itself without regard to what has gone before are strikingly set forth in this symphony.

Mr. Harris was extremely fortunate in having the Boston Orchestra present his work. The technical virtuosity and interpretation spirit of this body of players under Dr. Koussevitzky revealed every fine detail in the score and the changing moods and colors intended by the composer. Altogether it was a performance of compelling breadth and finish.

At the close, after taking his bows in acknowledgment of the applause, Dr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Harris from the wings to bow repeatedly, retire and return again in answer to the insistent demands of the audience. It was a triumph of which he and his friends may well be proud.

Unity Concert Course will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Montclair in January of next year. If it could be managed and it fits in with Dr. Koussevitzky's plans in program-making, a repetition of this symphony here would be appropriate and graceful tribute to one of Montclair's outstanding musicians and a source of musical enjoyment to many who have yet to become acquainted with Mr. Harris and his music.

WALTER S. YOUNG.

201

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 14 1939

Five Conductors Who Will Give Six Bushnell Concerts

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Who will appear twice with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CONCERT BY PHILHARMONIC

Orchestra Is Greeted by Cordial Audience

B. Post March 14/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

John Barbirolli, now completing his third year as conductor of the Philharmonic Symphony Society of New York, made his first appearance in Boston at Symphony Hall last evening, leading the New York Orchestra through a programme consisting of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet for Strings, as orchestrated by the composer, and the Second Symphony of Brahms. The pianist in the Concerto was Artur Schnabel.

In view of the hostile weather and the ultra conservative nature of Mr. Barbirolli's programme, the audience last evening was larger than might have been expected, although there were still a few empty seats. Of course, Mr. Schnabel, as the ranking Beethoven player of the world, was a drawing card, and it is quite possible that Mr. Barbirolli's list proved actually attractive to some concert-goers.

Setting aside the programme, the liking or disliking of which is a purely personal matter, the Philharmonic Symphony is to be congratulated in Mr. Barbirolli. As the successor to the sensationally popular Toscanini, his role was a difficult one and he has filled it with modesty and efficiency. He has proved that a great orchestra can still be a great orchestra, even when led by a conductor who does not exactly fit in the prima donna class. It may be heresy to suggest this, but it is possible to prefer the sound of the Philharmonic Orchestra today to that which it had under Mr. Toscanini's ministrations. In listening to the Philharmonic Symphony one now experiences a sense of security, stability, steadfastness and general satisfaction. The tone of the orchestra is excellent in each of the choirs, and the ensemble is beyond criticism. Mr. Barbirolli is a fine musician and apparently there is complete sympathy and accord between him and his men.

TUSCON, ARIZ.
CITIZEN
MAR 14 1939

"Farewell Symphony"

The presentation of Jan Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" at Boston's Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, dressed in the costumes of Haydn's period, recalls the Austrian musician's motive for its composition.

It was while Haydn was conductor of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra that he composed this beautiful orchestral work. A short time before its preparation Haydn asked for an extended vacation; but the Prince, expecting some important visitors, urged the conductor to cancel his plans temporarily. Haydn, undiscouraged, ingeniously repeated his request in musical form by so arranging the instrumentation of the last movement of the symphony that one by one the musicians in the orchestra would stop, pick up their instruments, blow out the candles on their stands, and walk out of the room, leaving but two musicians to play the last bar of the movement.

Needless to say, the "Farewell Symphony" gained the desired leave of absence for Jan Haydn.—Christian Science Monitor.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
MAR 17 1939

Entire Bloch Programs to Be Conducted by Composer

Ernest Bloch, guest conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts ~~today~~ and Saturday in Symphony Hall, will also conduct in the supplementary concerts of next week, Monday evening and Tuesday commuters' matinee. The programs are made up entirely of Bloch's own works and are almost identical.

The pair of concerts next week will hear two Interludes from his opera "Macbeth" (revived successfully last Spring in Naples after nearly 30 years); "Three Jewish Poems" which marked his debut with the orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck 22 years ago; his Rhapsody "Solomon" for cello (Jean Bedetti) and orchestra and "Helvetia," its first performance in Boston. "Helvetia" characterizes Switzerland, the country of Bloch's birth and sings of Swiss mountains and people.

A. C. R.

Bostonians End Evening Series

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikowsky.

N.Y. Tribune March /39

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

The fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony's evening series, given in Carnegie Hall last night, was productive of much brilliant playing, distinguished by the highest technical polish. There was commensurate enthusiasm on the part of an audience eager to make known its approval of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's vital and stimulating performances.

A hearty demonstration at the end of the program served as the season's farewell for the evening subscribers. On Saturday will come the orchestra's parting with the afternoon patrons. These are not occasions for deep melancholy. Dr. Koussevitzky has been bowing his adieus in Carnegie Hall for fifteen years. He and his famous ensemble will return next season.

Two symphonies supplied the sinews of last night's program—the seventh of Beethoven and the fourth of Tchaikowsky. Both have been warhorses for Koussevitzky, as they have been for many another conductor. Their juxtaposition on this occasion was cause for the recrudescence of some old arguments among those who may be a little too ready to pigeon-hole interpreters, according them their special gifts in this or that direction and denying them an equal pre-eminence in others. Needless to say, the cataloguers do not always agree.

A Question of Ensemble Tone.

For this reviewer the Tchaikowsky was the more personal and distinctive of last night's two virtuoso performances. Different ears report differently on the same sonorities. What may seem overlush to one listener is even a little granitic to another. Consequently, to note that there was something excessively brittle about the sharp fortissimo passages of the Beethoven work, as played, is to invite contradiction from those who may have heard quite otherwise. About the clarity, the animation, the unity, the balance and the expertness of the ensemble there could have been little ground for quibbling. If it remained possible to prefer Mr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikowsky to his Beethoven, this was largely a matter of orchestral tone.

The Boston conductor seemingly summoned their utmost from his players in his tremendously energized performance of the Russian symphony. His brass choir was stirringly responsive, and strings, woodwinds and percussion were similarly alive. Under the same conductor, to be sure, the Bostonians had played here the same symphony in the same way on other occasions. But even the Stravinsky "Sacre" (on Saturday's program) becomes a routine experience in time, and if it is Tchaikowsky that is relied on to quicken a sluggish pulse, this is the way to have it played.

Tomorrow's Pro

News of Mu

Next Week's Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its twentieth pair of concerts of the season, in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 24 and 25. Serge Koussevitzky announces a program of Russian music, including Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." The program will open the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovanstchina." Moussorgsky was born March 21, 1839.

♪ ♪ ♪

Bloch in Monday-Tuesday Series

Ernest Bloch, distinguished composer and guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct the fifth pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series, next week. He will then give the first performance in New England of his "Helvetia," and likewise be heard for the first time in his own interpretation of his Rhapsody "Schélomo," in which Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, will take the solo part. The program will open with two interludes from the early opera, "Macbeth," and will also include the "Three Jewish Poems," entitled Dance, Rite, and Cortège. "Helvetia" is subtitled "A Symphonic Fresco" on "The Land of Mountains and Its People." It was completed in 1929.

Mr. Bloch, a native of Switzerland, was moved in writing this music by the natural beauties of his native country and by the spirit of independence of the little republic. "The background of my work," he has written, "is not in the present, but in the past, of a small people in the process of formation, fighting for their liberties, their independence, composed of different races willingly united—as in America."

MUSIC

B. Globe March 14/39

SYMPHONY HALL

New York Philharmonic

John Barbirolli, conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, made his Boston debut last night at the Symphony Hall concert by that orchestra. The high points of the program were Beethoven's "Emperor" Piano Concerto, with the distinguished Artur Schnabel as soloist, and the Second Symphony of Brahms. The list otherwise contained Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture and Mendelssohn's orchestrations of the G minor scherzo from his Octet for Strings.

Not for three years, or since the final season of Arturo Toscanini's regime, had the New York Philharmonic-Symphony visited Boston. In the meantime this eminent organization has undergone the alterations in tone and style that inevitably accompany a change of conductors.

Though it be heresy to say so, let this reviewer go on record as claiming that the Philharmonic tone is more robust under Mr. Barbirolli than it seemed with his predecessor. The strings, though still lighter in body than those, say, of the Boston Symphony, are sensitive, responsive and precise. The woodwinds and brass are prevailingly mellow and homogeneous save when, in the heat of rapid passages, they become a trifle shrill.

Mr. Barbirolli, a conductor of expansive gestures, made a highly favorable impression. His readings were clear and stylistically faithful, devoid of mannerisms—save one exception of too slow tempo in the middle of Berlioz' Overture. He performed Beethoven and Brahms, if not with Olympian serenity and grandeur that evidently come only at middle age, with genuine feeling for the substance and the vitality of each masterpiece. There was, especially in Brahms, an accmumlating intensity that brought to the finale something of a triumph quality. And this was accomplished without expanding the essential character of the score.

The "Roman Carnival" Overture, on the other hand, was precise and admirably played but it was not half so exciting as other conductors have made it. Since it was the first number of the evening, however, Mr. Barbirolli may, as the phrase goes, have been "feeling his way" in an auditorium to whose acoustics he was not accustomed.

Mr. Schnabel, at his prodigious best, gave a marvelous account of the solo part in the "Emperor" Concerto. Here were magnificence and tender lyricism, perfect style and extraordinarily beautiful tone. Beethoven is always "effective." Yet when such an artist as Mr. Schnabel, with reason famed as a high priest of Beethoven's music, is at the top of his form, Beethoven is a new, enthralling experience.

The storm no doubt accounted for some of the empty seats last night. This was no deterrent, however, to a public reception of conductor, orchestra and soloist that included stamping and cheers. Now that Mr. Barbirolli's talents have been made known to us, it would be rewarding if, in the future, he were to visit us as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

C. W. D.

C. S. 207

Monitor – March 16/39

What Music Means to Ernest Bloch

By Alfred H. Meyer

One of Ernest Bloch's first acts after arriving in Boston last Saturday was to grant to a favored few of the musical press an interview which first of all revealed the extraordinary personality which is Ernest Bloch (to the increased understanding of his music) and which ranged through a multitude of subjects, from his views on dictators and his opinions of contemporary music, through discussions of most of his own music, to such subjects as his stay in Santa Fé in 1924.

Obviously only a fraction of that interview can be recorded in these brief paragraphs. But the experience of listening for two hours and a quarter to this ardent enthusiast pouring out his heart on a list of subjects so inclusive as to put to shame the questions of the most seasoned interviewer was one to be long remembered. For this interview was not a matter of question and answer. The questions which might have been asked were all anticipated by Mr. Bloch as he led the way adroitly and without interruption from subject to subject. And the point of it all was the intensity and conviction with which Mr. Bloch spoke—the best possible clue to that intensity which above all else characterizes his music.

* * *

Speaking of his own music, Mr. Bloch holds firmly to the tenet that music is something that must be felt by its composer so deeply that he cannot do otherwise than to give it expression. Repeatedly the composer expressed deep humility in the discussion of one of his works, after this fashion: "I can speak thus enthusiastically about this piece, because I feel as if I were not really its creator, as if it were something that had merely passed through me, as if I were only an instrument in the process of its creation, not really personally responsible for it." Listening to Mr. Bloch, one is easily convinced that this is his controlling idea in his composing.

"I have no system," he cries, other than to say what is in me. I cannot engage in synthetic music making. If I had wanted to engage in mathematics I would have become a mathematician, and if I had wanted to theorize about music I would have become a philosopher. I would rather sweep the streets than write synthetic music." And the names of Schönberg and Stravinsky were by no means absent from the discussion.

An interviewer remembered the unfavorable press with which his "Macbeth" had been received, and managed to get in the question how the recent performance in Naples (the first since that Parisian première) fared in comparison. The Naples performance was, of course, a triumph sufficient to make possible the inclusion of this neglected work in the current operatic repertoire.

* * *

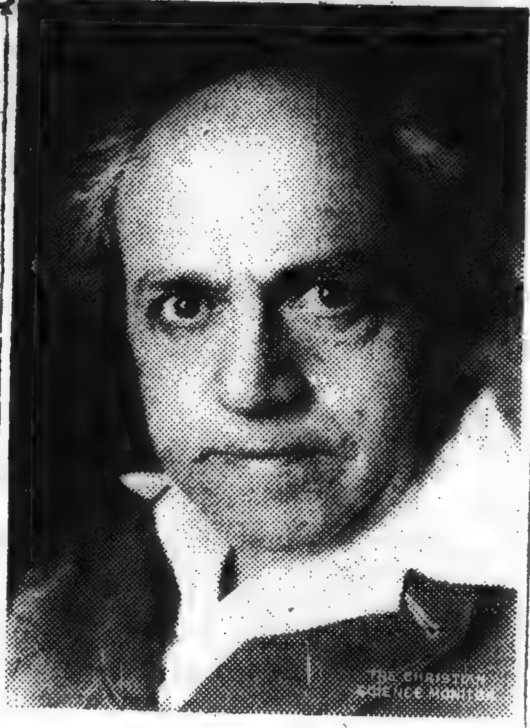
Mr. Bloch, in answer, spoke at length about his early opera. He mentioned numerous technical devices in which it anticipated later modernistic developments. He gave instances tending to show that the Paris performance was not in accord with his intentions and how the Naples performance presented his music as he felt it. He attributes its recent success in part to this difference.

"I shall hear the two interludes which are to be played in Boston for the very first time in their concert form. They are music this is simple and clear and easy to understand. They form an extension of the mood of the scenes they follow and prepare fully for the succeeding scenes. I could not write unrelated music that merely fills up the time between the scenes." The interludes occur between the first two scenes of Act I, and before the final scene of Act II.

"I have wanted to include the 'Three Jewish Poems' in these programs for a sentimental reason. They are the things I conducted in Boston in 1917 at the invitation of Dr. Muck. It was the first time in my life that I heard orchestral work of my own really well performed. I always remember these poems in connection with Boston.'

* * *

"'Helvetia' (to be played Monday and Tuesday) represents my feeling toward Switzerland, the country of my birth and much of my youth, just as 'America' represents my view of my adopted country, and my Jewish pieces represent my feeling toward my race." Mr. Bloch read from a letter from an admiring and understanding friend [illegible] suggesting this same vi



Ernest Bloch

He will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own music at the week-end concerts.

works. "I do not believe," Mr. Bloch continued, "that these works have Hebraic flavor because I am a Jew; I do not believe that they are an example of racial expression. They are simply what I feel when I contemplate a Jewish subject, and in the same way in which 'Helvetia' and 'America' are what I feel when I contemplate my native Switzerland or when I think of the ideals and the history of the country of my adoption."

Mr. Bloch spoke with enthusiasm of the ideals of America and of his continuing feeling for the country. "He who sees the past best has the most faith in the future." He spoke of the quotations from Walt Whitman the feeling of which he had endeavored to incorporate in his 'America'—the panorama of American history in three parts.

One incident in his life, hitherto unrecorded, has a bearing on Mr. Bloch's composition of "America." During his seven-weeks stay in Santa Fé he heard much Indian music. "But did I immediately sit down and write an Indian opera? I did not. In fact, my most 'absolute' work, my Concerto Grosso, dates from these weeks. However, when I came to write 'America,' much of the Indian background of the first section is what I remembered from this same visit."

ERNEST BLOCH DAZES BY BREADTH OF MIND

B. —— Globe

Here to Conduct Concerts by Boston Symphony

March —— 13/39

A chat with composer Ernest Bloch leaves one in dazed admiration for the breadth of his mind and the torrential vigor of his speech. Some musicians hesitate to talk about themselves, their music or any other subjects. Not so Mr. Bloch, who is a model of amiability and whose well-stocked mind affords meaty observations upon a variety of topics.

Ernest Bloch has come to Boston to be guest conductor of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which he will present five of his own compositions. Among contemporary musicians he is one of the more prominent, and although several sides of his creative personality are reflected in his music he is perhaps best known for the somber strength and Hebraic spirit in some of his works.

Just 22 years ago this month he visited Boston for the first time and upon invitation of Dr. Karl Muck conducted his "Three Jewish Poems" at Boston Symphony concerts. As fitting remembrance of that occasion, when he and his music were yet not well known in this country, Mr. Bloch has set the "Three Jewish Poems" upon his coming programs.

ERNEST BLOCH

Eminent Musical Figure

Since 1917, Ernest Bloch has become an eminent musical figure in the United States. He lived and taught in New York for four years, for five in Cleveland, and for three in San Francisco. He returned to his native Switzerland in 1930, where he has lived most of the time, up to now, in a tiny mountain village not far from the Italian border.

Short but stocky, with large, muscular hands and a most imposing head, Ernest Bloch speaks intensely, his arms waving in frequent gestures, his voice rising in crescendo from a normally rather deep voice to a high, crackling pitch that emphasizes the point of his conversation. Now and then, with the simplicity characteristic of extraordinary men, he draws a homely analogy. Once seen, Ernest Bloch's head cannot be forgotten. It is most striking, with its longish gray hair fringing a bald pate, resolute jaw, somewhat aquiline nose and a pair of sparkling eyes.

He told with especial warmth of the two orchestral interludes from his opera "Macbeth," which he will play here.

"'Macbeth' was a work of my youth, and these interludes have kept the freshness of youth," he said. "This opera was written 30 years ago, produced at Paris in 1910, and then became utterly obliterated during the 28 years that followed, until it was revived in Naples last Spring.

"At Naples the regular conductor was not feeling well, and he asked me to conduct the rehearsals. I had not even opened that score since 1910, and I was reluctant to conduct, because I feared that I would make mistakes. Once the rehearsals began, the music came back to me, and happily it turned out that I didn't make a single error. As a matter of fact these two interludes, which—though I did write them, I believe to be very beautiful music—will have their first concert performances in Boston."

Effect of Surroundings

He was asked if his surroundings stimulated him to compose.

"Sometimes yes, sometimes no. For example, in 1924, I took a seven weeks' vacation from my teaching in Cleveland, and went to Santa Fe. There people treated me very kindly, let me use a piano at a museum. Now I heard a good deal of Indian music in Santa Fe. But did I compose an Indian composition? No. I worked at my Concerto Grosso, which has no connection with the sun, warmth, the people and surroundings of Santa Fe.

"A few years later, nevertheless, when I came to write 'America,' I used a number of Indian themes I had heard in Santa Fe for the first part of that music. 'America,' by the way, was an expression of my reverence for the past of this country and my faith in its future. I put all of myself into that music. 'America' and my 'Helvetia' have some points in common. 'Helvetia' characterizes Switzerland, where I was born, it sings of Swiss mountains and people."

Both these works will be heard in Boston in the next eight days, "Helvetia" for the first time here.

Mr. Bloch may continue to live in the United States, though he has not decided.

"I should like to spend about seven or eight months in the country every year, working quietly, and the rest of the time giving concerts, lecturing, and renewing associations with mankind. I need to be close to the active life of this world at times. It is necessary to my music. To me composing is not a matter of putting sounds together. Music must reflect life and humanity."

Mr. Bloch is interested in painting and photography. He is fond, too, of smoking—cigars or a pipe filled in the English style, with the tobacco wrapped in pa.

C. W. D.

B. Trans. MUSIC March 16/39

Bloch as Guest

Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra Through Five Concerts in Six Days

By MOSES SMITH

Almost 22 years ago Ernest Bloch paid his first visit to Boston. His "Three Jewish Poems," which will be played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, tonight and again in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, had been brought to the attention of Karl Muck, then the Orchestra's conductor. Dr. Muck thereupon invited the composer to conduct the first performances of the music in Symphony Hall.

On its face the incident was a tribute to the discernment and fairness of Muck. Although Bloch's opera, "Macbeth," two interludes from which will open the program of tonight, Friday and Saturday, had been produced in Paris in 1910 (it had been written as early as 1903), the composer had derived therefrom little honor or profit. And he was still little known in Europe when, in 1916, he decided to emigrate to America. The composer presented to Muck was, however, not merely obscure. He was a citizen of Switzerland, French in his native tongue and living among a people whose sympathy was predominantly with the Allies in the existing Great War. Muck, a German, might well have have been discourteous as well as inhospitable to the composer—and so many an unsavory story runs. Bloch says, on the contrary, that he remembers his relations with Muck only pleasantly.

In America

When he came to America Bloch was a mature composer, master of his craft. But it was while living in America, for the next 14 years, that he became world-famous and composed much of his music. He had been militantly Jewish in his music, as the titles of his early works testify: "Jewish Poems," "Psalms," "Schelmo," "Israel" Symphony. The period of American residence, which was occupied principally in teaching and administrative work at music schools—in New York, Cleveland and San Francisco—was marked by the growth of a cosmopolitan spirit, with an American bias in particular.

The most striking indication of this spirit was the composition of the orchestral Rhapsody, "America," which will complete the current program. Entered in the Musical America prize competition, it won the prize and was accorded the exceptional distinction of almost simultaneous first performances by five leading American orchestras in 1928. The expressed intentions of the composer, as well as, to a lesser degree, the music itself, caused a storm of critical controversy. After eleven years it is perhaps as well to go back to the sources again, and to consult Bloch's own words as contained in a letter to Boaz Piller, here published, so far as I am aware, for the first time:

"Whatever may be the result, I know that this work is a great monument erected to America, or, rather, to the Ideal American, in spite of what goes on at present, of 'graft,' of the threat to every liberty in that country. I have brought out a great idea—into it I have put all my heart and all my knowledge. It no longer belongs to me, but to the world, if the world will have it, and will understand its lesson. . . ."

Later Years

Bloch had not been entirely happy in America, since no primarily creative person can be happy when he is not free to devote his principal energies to the process of creation. And so when, in 1930, he was offered the prospect of leisure to compose, assured of financial independence, he inevitably accepted it. Retiring to Switzerland, with occasional visits to Italy, where his music was much admired until, a few months ago, an arbitrary edict made him and his music unacceptable there, he spent the better part of two years on the composition of the "Sacred Service." The work was intended for use on Saturday mornings in the Reformed Jewish Synagogue. It was first performed in Italy. It was a Jewish music, of course. It is significant, however, that both in Italy and elsewhere its success was great when it was produced—as it frequently has been—under entirely non-Jewish auspices.

Thus Bloch seems to have arrived at as complete a synthesis as was possible among his apparently conflicting tendencies—racial (Jewish), national (American and Swiss) and cosmopolitan. Which is the most important of these tendencies and the relative weight to be severally assigned to them cannot be discussed within the compass of a brief newspaper article. It does, however, seem to me significant that the composer found so many types of expression necessary parts of his growth.

As "America" attempted to express the composer's feelings for the land of his adoption, "Helvetia," a "symphonic fresco," expressed them for the land of his birth. It was written in 1925, and is to receive its first Boston performances at the Symphony Orchestra's concerts next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon. At each of the five occasions, it is hardly necessary to remind the reader, the conductor will be the composer himself, making his second appearance in Boston under conditions much different from those attending his first.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 25 1939

IT'S a long way from the days when the performance of an American symphony was a novelty of a seismic character. The Boston Symphony, on its most recent visit to Carnegie Hall, introduced the third symphony of Roy Harris, and the subscribers accepted the music for what it was: the work of a skilled and independent composer. The symphony, in one movement, has more "audience feeling" than some of Mr. Harris's earlier contributions, and it received an unusually uproarious ovation. So did Mr. Harris. So did Mr. Koussevitzky, who conducted it. They all deserved it.

3 Monitor - March 16/39

What Music Means to Ernest Bloch

By Alfred H. Meyer

One of Ernest Bloch's first acts after arriving in Boston last Saturday was to grant to a favored few of the musical press an interview which first of all revealed the extraordinary personality which is Ernest Bloch (to the increased understanding of his music) and which ranged through a multitude of subjects, from his views on dictators and his opinions of contemporary music, through discussions of most of his own music, to such subjects as his stay in Santa Fé in 1924.

Obviously only a fraction of that interview can be recorded in these brief paragraphs. But the experience of listening for two hours and a quarter to this ardent enthusiast pouring out his heart on a list of subjects so inclusive as to put to shame the questions of the most seasoned interviewer was one to be long remembered. For this interview was not a matter of question and answer. The questions which might have been asked were all anticipated by Mr. Bloch as he led the way adroitly and without interruption from subject to subject. And the point of it all was the intensity and conviction with which Mr. Bloch spoke—the best possible clue to that intensity which above all else characterizes his music.

* * *

Speaking of his own music, Mr. Bloch holds firmly to the tenet that music is something that must be felt by its composer so deeply that he cannot do otherwise than to give it expression. Repeatedly the composer expressed deep humility in the discussion of one of his works, after this fashion: "I can speak thus enthusiastically about this piece, because I feel as if I were not really its creator, as if it were something that had merely passed through me, as if I were only an instrument in the process of its creation, not really personally responsible for it." Listening to Mr. Bloch, one is easily convinced that this is his controlling idea in his composing.

"I have no system," he cries, other than to say what is in me. I cannot engage in synthetic music making. If I had wanted to engage in mathematics I would have become a mathematician, and if I had wanted to theorize about music I would have become a philosopher. I would rather sweep the streets than write synthetic music." And the names of Schönberg and Stravinsky were by no means absent from the discussion.

An interviewer remembered the unfavorable press with which his "Macbeth" had been received, and managed to get in the question how the recent performance in Naples (the first since that Parisian première) fared in comparison. The Naples performance was, of course, a triumph sufficient to make possible the inclusion of this neglected work in the current operatic repertoire.

Ernest Bloch

He will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own music at the week-end concerts.

* * *

Mr. Bloch, in answer, spoke at length about his early opera. He mentioned numerous technical devices in which it anticipated later modernistic developments. He gave instances tending to show that the Paris performance was not in accord with his intentions and how the Naples performance presented his music as he felt it. He attributes its recent success in part to this difference.

"I shall hear the two interludes which are to be played in Boston for the very first time in their concert form. They are music this is simple and clear and easy to understand. They form an extension of the mood of the scenes they follow and prepare fully for the succeeding scenes. I could not write unrelated music that merely fills up the time between the scenes." The interludes occur between the first two scenes of Act I, and before the final scene of Act II.

"I have wanted to include the 'Three Jewish Poems' in these programs for a sentimental reason. They are the things I conducted in Boston in 1917 at the invitation of Dr. Muck. It was the first time in my life that I heard orchestral work of my own really well performed. I always remember these poems in connection with Boston.'

* * *

"'Helvetia' (to be played Monday and Tuesday) represents my feeling toward Switzerland, the country of my birth and much of my youth, just as 'America' represents my view of my adopted country, and my Jewish pieces represent my feeling toward my race." Mr. Bloch read from a letter from an admiring and understanding friend [illegible] suggesting this same w works. "I do not believe," Mr. Bloch continued, "that these works have Hebraic flavor because I am a Jew; I do not believe that they are an example of racial expression. They are simply what I feel when I contemplate a Jewish subject, and in the same way in which 'Helvetia' and 'America' are what I feel when I contemplate my native Switzerland or when I think of the ideals and the history of the country of my adoption."

Mr. Bloch spoke with enthusiasm of the ideals of America and of his continuing feeling for the country. "He who sees the past best has the most faith in the future." He spoke of the quotations from Walt Whitman the feeling of which he had endeavored to incorporate in his 'America'—the panorama of American history in three parts.

One incident in his life, hitherto unrecorded, has a bearing on Mr. Bloch's composition of "America." During his seven-weeks stay in Santa Fé he heard much Indian music. "But did I immediately sit down and write an Indian opera? I did not. In fact, my most 'absolute' work, my Concerto Grosso, dates from these weeks. However, when I came to write 'America,' much of the Indian background of the first section is what I remembered from this same visit."

ERNEST BLOCH DAZES BY BREADTH OF MIND

B. Globe

Here to Conduct Concerts by Boston Symphony

March 13/39

A chat with composer Ernest Bloch leaves one in dazed admiration for the breadth of his mind and the torrential vigor of his speech. Some musicians hesitate to talk about themselves, their music or any other subjects. Not so Mr. Bloch, who is a model of amiability and whose well-stocked mind affords meaty observations upon a variety of topics.

Ernest Bloch has come to Boston to be guest conductor of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which he will present five of his own compositions. Among contemporary musicians he is one of the more prominent, and although several sides of his creative personality are reflected in his music he is perhaps best known for the somber strength and Hebraic spirit in some of his works.

Just 22 years ago this month he visited Boston for the first time and upon invitation of Dr. Karl Muck conducted his "Three Jewish Poems" at Boston Symphony concerts. As fitting remembrance of that occasion, when he and his music were yet not well known in this country, Mr. Bloch has set the "Three Jewish Poems" upon his coming programs.

ERNEST BLOCH

Eminent Musical Figure

Since 1917, Ernest Bloch has become an eminent musical figure in the United States. He lived and taught in New York for four years, for five in Cleveland, and for three in San Francisco. He returned to his native Switzerland in 1930, where he has lived most of the time, up to now, in a tiny mountain village not far from the Italian border.

Short but stocky, with large, muscular hands and a most imposing head, Ernest Bloch speaks intensely, his arms waving in frequent gestures, his voice rising in crescendo from a normally rather deep voice to a high, crackling pitch that emphasizes the point of his conversation. Now and then, with the simplicity characteristic of extraordinary men, he draws a homely analogy. Once seen, Ernest Bloch's head cannot be forgotten. It is most striking, with its longish gray hair fringing a bald pate, resolute jaw, somewhat aquiline nose and a pair of sparkling eyes.

He told with especial warmth of the two orchestral interludes from his opera "Macbeth," which he will play here.

"'Macbeth' was a work of my youth, and these interludes have kept the freshness of youth," he said. "This opera was written 30 years ago, produced at Paris in 1910, and then became utterly obliterated during the 28 years that followed, until it was revived in Naples last Spring.

"At Naples the regular conductor was not feeling well, and he asked me to conduct the rehearsals. I had not even opened that score since 1910, and I was reluctant to conduct, because I feared that I would make mistakes. Once the rehearsals began, the music came back to me, and happily it turned out that I didn't make a single error. As a matter of fact these two interludes, which—though I did write them, I believe to be very beautiful music—will have their first concert performances in Boston."

Effect of Surroundings

He was asked if his surroundings stimulated him to compose.

"Sometimes yes, sometimes no. For example, in 1924, I took a seven weeks' vacation from my teaching in Cleveland, and went to Santa Fe. There people treated me very kindly, let me use a piano at a museum. Now I heard a good deal of Indian music in Santa Fe. But did I compose an Indian composition? No. I worked at my Concerto Grosso, which has no connection with the sun, warmth, the people and surroundings of Santa Fe.

"A few years later, nevertheless, when I came to write 'America,' I used a number of Indian themes I had heard in Santa Fe for the first part of that music. 'America,' by the way, was an expression of my reverence for the past of this country and my faith in its future. I put all of myself into that music. 'America' and my 'Helvetia' have some points in common. 'Helvetia' characterizes Switzerland, where I was born, it sings of Swiss mountains and people."

Both these works will be heard in Boston in the next eight days, "Helvetia" for the first time here.

Mr. Bloch may continue to live in the United States, though he has not decided.

"I should like to spend about seven or eight months in the country every year, working quietly, and the rest of the time giving concerts, lecturing, and renewing associations with mankind. I need to be close to the active life of this world at times. It is necessary to my music. To me composing is not a matter of putting sounds together. Music must reflect life and humanity."

Mr. Bloch is interested in painting and photography. He is fond, too, of smoking—cigars or a pipe filled in the English style, with the tobacco wrapped in pa.

C. W. D.

B. Trans. MUSIC March 16/39

Bloch as Guest

Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra Through Five Concerts in Six Days

By MOSES SMITH

Almost 22 years ago Ernest Bloch paid his first visit to Boston. His "Three Jewish Poems," which will be played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, tonight and again in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, had been brought to the attention of Karl Muck, then the Orchestra's conductor. Dr. Muck thereupon invited the composer to conduct the first performances of the music in Symphony Hall.

On its face the incident was a tribute to the discernment and fairness of Muck. Although Bloch's opera, "Macbeth," two interludes from which will open the program of tonight, Friday and Saturday, had been produced in Paris in 1910 (it had been written as early as 1903), the composer had derived therefrom little honor or profit. And he was still little known in Europe when, in 1916, he decided to emigrate to America. The composer presented to Muck was, however, not merely obscure. He was a citizen of Switzerland, French in his native tongue and living among a people whose sympathy was predominantly with the Allies in the existing Great War. Muck, a German, might well have have been discourteous as well as inhospitable to the composer—and so many an unsavory story runs. Bloch says, on the contrary, that he remembers his relations with Muck only pleasantly.

In America

When he came to America Bloch was a mature composer, master of his craft. But it was while living in America, for the next 14 years, that he became world-famous and composed much of his music. He had been militantly Jewish in his music, as the titles of his early works testify: "Jewish Poems," "Psalms," "Schelmo," "Israel" Symphony. The period of American residence, which was occupied principally in teaching and administrative work at music schools—in New York, Cleveland and San Francisco—was marked by the growth of a cosmopolitan spirit, with an American bias in particular.

The most striking indication of this spirit was the composition of the orchestral Rhapsody, "America," which will complete the current program. Entered in the Musical America prize competition, it won the prize and was accorded the exceptional distinction of almost simultaneous first performances by five leading American orchestras in 1928. The expressed intentions of the composer, as well as, to a lesser degree, the music itself, caused a storm of critical controversy. After eleven years it is perhaps as well to go back to the sources again, and to consult Bloch's own words as contained in a letter to Boaz Piller, here published, so far as I am aware, for the first time:

"Whatever may be the result, I know that this work is a great monument erected to America, or, rather, to the Ideal American, in spite of what goes on at present, of 'graft,' of the threat to every liberty in that country. I have brought out a great idea—into it I have put all my heart and all my knowledge. It no longer belongs to me, but to the world, if the world will have it, and will understand its lesson."

Later Years

Bloch had not been entirely happy in America, since no primarily creative person can be happy when he is not free to devote his principal energies to the process of creation. And so when, in 1930, he was offered the prospect of leisure to compose, assured of financial independence, he inevitably accepted it. Retiring to Switzerland, with occasional visits to Italy, where his music was much admired until, a few months ago, an arbitrary edict made him and his music unacceptable there, he spent the better part of two years on the composition of the "Sacred Service." The work was intended for use on Saturday mornings in the Reformed Jewish Synagogue. It was first performed in Italy. It was a Jewish music, of course. It is significant, however, that both in Italy and elsewhere its success was great when it was produced—as it frequently has been—under entirely non-Jewish auspices.

Thus Bloch seems to have arrived at as complete a synthesis as was possible among his apparently conflicting tendencies—racial (Jewish), national (American and Swiss) and cosmopolitan. Which is the most important of these tendencies and the relative weight to be severally assigned to them cannot be discussed within the compass of a brief newspaper article. It does, however, seem to me significant that the composer found so many types of expression necessary parts of his growth.

As "America" attempted to express the composer's feelings for the land of his adoption, "Helvetia," a "symphonic fresco," expressed them for the land of his birth. It was written in 1925, and is to receive its first Boston performances at the Symphony Orchestra's concerts next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon. At each of the five occasions, it is hardly necessary to remind the reader, the conductor will be the composer himself, making his second appearance in Boston under conditions much different from those attending his first.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 25 1939

IT'S a long way from the days when the performance of an American symphony was a novelty of a seismic character. The Boston Symphony, on its most recent visit to Carnegie Hall, introduced the third symphony of Roy Harris, and the subscribers accepted the music for what it was: the work of a skilled and independent composer. The symphony, in one movement, has more "audience feeling" than some of Mr. Harris's earlier contributions, and it received an unusually uproarious ovation. So did Mr. Harris. So did Mr. Koussevitzky, who conducted it. They all deserved it.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ernest Bloch and His Compositions Capture Matinee Audience's Fancy

B. Trans.

By MOSES SMITH

March 16/39

Composer-conductors usually turn out to be only composers who try to conduct. The complicated business of making a twentieth century orchestra sound is nowadays a career in itself, normally demanding more time in preparation than a creative musician is able or wishes to give it. Igor Stravinsky ,who, until private misfortune overtook him, was scheduled to conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through this week and next, is an exception, as he indicated here several years ago. Ernest Bloch, who came here in his stead for concerts from last Thursday night through next Tuesday afternoon, soon made it plain at yesterday's matinee concert that he, too, is an exception.

An audience which had begun by apparently regarding the eminent newcomer sceptically ended by applauding enthusiastically, and stamping feet to add emphasis to expression of pleasure and excitement. No doubt much of the enthusiasm was generated by the appeal of the music itself, entirely of Bloch's own composition. But it was also easy to observe that, although no virtuoso conductor, Bloch is a skilful executant and (it is a little presumptuous to say so when his own music is in question) interpreter. Throughout the concert the orchestra seemed to play with its familiar precision and virtuosity and with characteristic beauty and variety of tone. The composer assigned the credit to the players. They, in turn, obviously regarded him with admiration as well as respect.

The Program

The program was a repetition of that given in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. Arranged in chronological order, it traversed two symphonic interludes from the opera "Macbeth," "Three Jewish Poems" and "America." The operatic interludes are now receiving first concert performances, although the opera itself was unsuccessfully produced in Paris in 1910 and with success in Italy recently. The astonishing thing about them is their modernity. Thirty years after their composition they still sound for the most part fresh—and thirty years of aging can often be a severer test than three hundred.

In these interludes Bloch, whether consciously or not, calls on the French and Italian cultures of the land of his birth—Switzerland—but hardly on the German at all. There are also, as was pointed out here by the reviewer of Thursday's concert, prophetic indications of the composer's later engrossment with Jewish culture. This fact (if it is a fact) is the more remarkable because "Macbeth" would scarcely seem to be subject-matter to stimulate such expression.

The "Three Jewish Poems" have been heard at the Boston Orchestra's concerts on several occasions since the composer first presented them here in 1917. It is pointless to do more than to re-iterate the praise that has been heaped on an uncommonly original, picturesque and stimulating music. If a passage here and there does not ring true any more, as in "Rite," for example, there is more than enough compensation in certain powerful pages, again taking the "Rite" as an example. Furthermore, the three "Poems" — "Dance" and "Funeral Procession" are the other two—are not repetitious. They might easily have become so in the hands of someone less than a master.

"America": Doubts

There remains "America," performed on these occasions unfortunately without a chorus for the concluding Anthem. I say "unfortunately" because the Anthem, whether you like it or not, is the logical, inevitable climax of the composition, growing out of material heard as early as the second measure. And an anthem is something not primarily to be played but to be sung, with the words sounding out—as the composer intended in this instance. It is a pity that audiences at symphony concerts are too self-conscious to act on the composer's expressed request, that they join in singing the Anthem during the orchestral performance. As it is, the tune and the words have begun to make their way among the young in the schools. Perhaps the audiences of the future will raise their voices in song and praise as the instrumentalists sound out the music.

That assumes that Bloch's "America" has a future, something which has been doubted ever since its first performances in 1928. At that time the work was greeted not only with praise but with a vociferous disapproval. The work was called sentimental and banal. It was a hotch-potch. The idea of the Anthem was scoffed at. Bloch's naive faith in America or (if that is putting it too bluntly) his naive faith in his ability to make American history and ideals sound in his music was regarded as an obvious recession from the high standards set in his earlier works.

Most of the disapproval, I seem to recall, came from the reviewers or others to whom the act of listening is a duty rather than a matter of free choice. Most of it continues, I believe, to come from the same quarters. I have spoken about "America" with many professional musicians, most of whom admire and like it. Audiences of laymen like it, as yesterday's proceedings made manifest. But to date "America" has had relatively few performances and the critics seem to have the upper hand in the discussion.

The trouble with the critic, as well as his advantage, lies in the very professionalism of his attitude in the character of listener. A tune almost as simple as "America the Beautiful" (which it closely resembles, incidentally) offers no problem to the professional and is likely, therefore, to be regarded prima facie as trite or sentimental. Besides, there are in fact sentimental pages through the three movements of "America." Here and there are obvious, banal pages. But you can set against them pages which only a master could have written, pages of powerful contrapuntal writing, of the deftest tonal coloring, of sheer power.

But I am willing to rest the case for "America" on the Anthem. Not in the tune taken by itself. But in the way it emerges inevitably out of the music, so that by the time the full orchestra plays it at the end, nervous currents begin to go up and down your spine. Perhaps it's sentimental; but we are a sentimental people! Perhaps it's obvious, banal, even trite, for the sake of argument; but we as a people are inclined to be obvious, banal and trite. I do not contend, of course, that merely to repeat what anybody else has on his lips makes you an artist. But to repeat its essence with the addition of your own integrity and force and invention may make you an artist. That is what Bloch has done.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

B. March 17/39 Trans

Ernest Bloch Begins Guest-Conductorship Presenting His Music at Sanders Theater

Ernest Bloch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of five concerts of his music last evening in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. It would be difficult to ask for a more representative selection from the composer's work, from the point of view both of chronology and style, than went to make up the program—two symphonic interludes from his opera "Macbeth," completed in 1909; the "Three Jewish Poems," his first recorded symphonic work, of 1913, and the Epic Rhapsody "America," written in 1928.

While none of this material has received anything like frequent performance hereabouts, it followed that the interludes from "Macbeth," played last evening for the first time anywhere in concert form, would be the greatest rarity. It is one of the blots on the scutcheon of modern musical history that "Macbeth" was allowed to remain unplayed from its unfortunate premiere in Paris, in 1910, until its revival last year in Naples. Since on that occasion der Fuehrer's visit to Italy prevented Bloch's opera from being broadcast to the United States, the music must have been new to most of last night's audience. The interludes are closely bound up with the action of the opera, and serve to link adjoining scenes, and are therefore accompanied by a detailed program. But the music would stand on its own merits without this guide. Necessarily dramatic and episodic in form, it is clarified by well-marked mottoes; most of all, it calls up and maintains a convincing Macbethian atmosphere, unimpaired by certain themes of what appeared to be a Hebraic stamp.

The "Three Jewish Poems," too, were provided last evening with an imaginative program, evidently written by the composer some time after the music. Here again words proved no material adjunct to music of which the originality, color, and sincere emotional content have long been fully acknowledged. The Poems were played with particular brilliance by the orchestra under Mr. Bloch's dexterous and sensitive direction.

In "America," not heard in Boston since 1929, the composer has undertaken a work of truly epic proportions where, in contrast to the two previous productions, the musician's program and copious annotations to the score are indispensable to an appreciation of the half-mystical, half-historical, grandiose conception of the piece. To indicate as broadly as possible the origins, the past, and the hoped-for future of his foster-country, the artist has chosen a multiplicity of themes ranging from folk-songs of the Indians to Negro jazz tunes of today, and including almost every genre of our native music in between. What Mr. Bloch has done with this material would require exhaustive analysis and description far beyond the limits of one hearing and one brief review. If he does not "build a harmonious whole," in the conventional sense, it is because that is not his intention; what he does build is an edifice of tremendous scope, which almost inspires awe by its sincerity.

J. E.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its last visit to New York for the present season, occupied Carnegie Hall on the evening of March 30 and the afternoon of April 1, attracting capacity houses on both occasions. For the former concert Dr. Koussevitzky selected a program consisting of two symphonies, Beethoven's Seventh and Tchaikovsky's Fourth. It would be easy to dismiss as quite unexciting this program of two works which are always with us were it not that the setting forth was exciting in the extreme. The utter virtuosity of the Boston orchestra and the marvels of tone that it commands took two great, if very hard-worked, symphonies and imparted to each a novelty as of revelation.

For the matinée Dr. Koussevitzky treated his patrons to the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovanstchina," Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," and the First Symphony of Brahms. It may be hard to believe today that 15 years ago people walked out of the same hall in high dudgeon while the "Sacre" was being played for the first time in New York. And perhaps harder to believe is the change the years have wrought in the effect produced by this once astounding score. The audience applauded it as though it had taken every measure to its heart, and some few, who had learned to admire it a good many years ago, proceeded to a further reaction. They not only found the score as clear as Haydn, if more intricate, but even felt that, removed from the stage and the dancing, some pages have become a bit of a bore. An exquisitely controlled and polished execution of the Moussorgsky prelude and a performance of the Brahms symphony that deservedly set the house to cheering made the rest of the story.

Half a Column Late

Apologies and Explanations of a Gentleman Of the Press Who Was Downes but Not Out

In New York, when a music critic is late, that's news. Such is there the standard of conscientiousness, the habit of promptness that when Olin Downes of the New York Times arrived at Carnegie Hall recently, five minutes after the Boston Symphony Orchestra had begun a performance of the new Third Symphony by Roy Harris, Mr. Downes required almost half a column to expatiate on his tardiness. Here, after his introductory paragraph describing the program, are the gory details:

These performances made the first half of the program—a fact which, for one reviewer, or else for Mr. Harris, as posterity will decide the matter, was unfortunate, or the reverse. For look you: this critic was late. Now, if it is a bad symphony, that accident of tardiness saves Mr. Harris, at least so far as this column is concerned. It's true that the critic was only five minutes late. Five minutes doesn't sound like much, but it's a great deal if you are catching a train or the opening of a new symphony. Particularly is this the case when the symphony is only 20 minutes long and in one continuous movement.

With that five minutes of unheard music, the reviewer's lips, or pen, were they disposed to condemnation, are silenced. People would read the adverse remarks. They would say: "He never heard it. I saw him. He was late," a possible contingency which affords Mr. Harris asylum.

On the other hand, if the symphony is a great new masterpiece, the critic is unlucky. He cannot celebrate that fact. Thus, in the degree in which he cannot, fails properly to serve the great newspaper which employs him, and the expectant readers of the music columns.

Suppose that, on hearing but a part of the symphony, he praises it? Then they'll say, "Aha! We've got him now. He don't mean a word of that. I've watched him and I've read him and I'm convinced. He's crawling."

And there you are. Very few, we will be bound, appreciate the mental, moral and psychological dilemmas of music critics. As it stands, the reader must accept at his own value the following statements: (1) That the last three-quarters of Harris's Third Symphony are written more clearly, simply, with a greater unity of thought and style than any other early work of Mr. Harris that we have heard. . . .

BLOCH AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Plays Own Works—Conducted Before in 1917

B. Post March 18/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The music of Ernest Bloch, according to Ernest Bloch, made the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. In other words, the distinguished composer then and there conducted, and most eloquently, performances of two Interludes from the opera "Macbeth," the "Three Jewish Poems" and the epic rhapsody, "America."

THE "MACBETH" MUSIC

This was not, as a matter of fact, Mr. Bloch's first appearance here as conductor. In 1917, at the request of Dr. Muck, he directed the first Symphony Hall performances of the Jewish Poems. Since that time, they have been played at four pairs of concerts—or will have been, by this evening.

As the Rhapsody "America" is but little less familiar than the Poems, interest yesterday centred largely in the excerpts from "Macbeth," which proved, indeed, the high point of the concert. Music of strength and beauty, of dramatic force and also of clear theatric quality, these Interludes made easily credible the enthusiasm of the Italian critics when "Macbeth" was revived at Naples last March.

Until that time the music had not been heard since 1910, the year of the opera's Paris premiere. Yesterday the Interludes were played for the first time in concert. In this form they constitute a valuable addition to the symphonic repertory. It is rare experience nowadays to come upon new music of such quality.

Poems Lack Variety

Yesterday, as in the past, the Jewish Poems seemed to prolong unduly a certain type of musical utterance. They lack even the variety that their titles, Dance, Rite and Funeral cortege suggest.

The Dance has an elegiac twist to it, and it also hints of ceremonial. Finest of the three is the second Poem, music not merely of ritual but of true devotion in which we encounter nobility of thought and expression.

Beyond question, audiences are stirred by "America," or at least by its closing pages. During the long first and second sections they are bound to grow restive. Like most of Bloch's music, this "America" tends to be slow of pace.

Like Fourth of July Music

In view of the composer's evident sincerity, his ardent zeal for the country of his adoption, his burning interest in its past and its future, it seems unkind, even ungrateful, to take issue with this Rhapsody. But each successive hearing renews the original impression that what the composer intended and what he accomplished are not always the same thing. No doubt, to his ears the borrowed musical material, Indian tunes, plantation songs, Civil war songs, "Pop Goes the Weasel" and all the rest had the appeal of the exotic. To us, who have grown up with them, they merely sound trite, at least as they are used here. Probably, too, Mr. Bloch would not be disturbed, as many of us are, by the outward resemblance which his piece bears to the "Grand Descriptive Fantasies" of Fourth of July band concerts.

Yesterday, and happily, there was no chorus to sing the decidedly banal words of the final "Anthem." And even more fortunately the audience forebore to stand. Banal, too, is Mr. Bloch's tune at which he keeps hinting in rather irritating fashion all through the work. But it has a certain obvious appeal and he builds up its entrance with the skill of a master craftsman. The resulting cheers and stamping can be taken for granted.

—New England News— X

C. S. Monitor

Bloch Symphony Guest

March 18/39

The Arts in Boston

Ernest Bloch, distinguished American composer, is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this week-end. Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall he directed the first concert of the season's nineteenth pair. The program, made up of his own compositions, listed two Symphonic Interludes from his opera, "Macbeth," "Three Jewish Poems," and the Epic Rhapsody, "America."

"Macbeth" was composed in 1904-1909, when Mr. Bloch was in his twenties. It was first performed in Paris in 1910, when it had a considerable success. But then it remained unplayed until last spring, when the San Carlo at Naples revived it, again with success. These interludes were drawn from the score recently, and had their first concert performance yesterday.

If they are typical of the score, as no doubt they are, it looks as if the Paris public of 30 years ago and the Naples public of last year had been fortunate and had appreciated their good fortune. The music made an immediate and a strong impression. It is typical of the composer in its lyricism, its color, and its emotional depth. But it has also a dramatic quality that has not indeed been absent from Bloch's music, but has been less developed, or perhaps less observed, because the artist has not devoted himself to composition for the lyric theater. After marking the characterizing quality of his material in these excerpts, their atmosphere of tragedy, of melancholy or of peace, we want very much to hear the opera.

The "Three Jewish Poems" have been frequently heard and admired here. They renewed their good impression yesterday.

"America," as everybody will remember, is the composer's song in praise of his adoptive land, which won him the Musical America prize in 1928. It was performed in Boston and other American cities in December of that year, and was repeated in the following January in Boston. It remains an affecting tribute, to which one can hardly listen unmoved. The jazz passages perhaps date, and some pages are not free of a suspicion of theatricality. Yet other pages have a tender loveliness that is in the composer's best vein, and it is impossible not to respect the sincere emotion that shines throughout this score.

The final anthem was originally intended to be sung by the audience. At the early performances here it was sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses. Yesterday it was merely played by the orchestra. This anthem has generally been regarded as the weak point of the score. The present reviewer was one of a handful who considered it a suitable climax to the work. Certainly it was effective yesterday in the instrumental version, and the audience remained to cheer its composer.

L. A. S.

B. Herald

MUSIC

March 1939

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 19th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Bloch conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Bloch
Two Symphonic Interludes from "Macbeth"
Bloch .... Three Jewish Poems
Bloch . . "America," an Epic Rhapsody

It could be reasonably argued that we had rather too much of Mr. Bloch's music, even though his presence as guest conductor was clearly meant to do him honor as a composer. Had the music been all of the quality of the first part of the program, this unfriendly criticism could be very largely mitigated if not nullified.

Nothing can save "America," we fear, from the charge that it is a sadly dated and bombastic work, one that could once win a patriotic prize but that in the long run does the composer's reputation no good. Philip Hale was reminded of "Mr. Babbitt addressing a meeting of Rotarians." It is perhaps even more like one of those Gallic flights of oratory that are in essence as sentimental but are expressed a good deal less crudely. We well remember a famous French orator, a minister of marine, deliver a July 4th address in which he likened the Atlantic ocean to a "petit ruisseau" which was all that in spirit separated France from America. And the peroration from there on was glorious and was received with a round of applause equal to yesterday's enthusiasm at the sonorous end of the Rhapsody.

There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of Mr. Bloch in writing this music or the obvious pleasure with which he conducted it yesterday. It is only that to some ears it does not have the natural ring of his Jewish or other music. All the familiar tunes, or rather so many of them, serve to distract our attention and lead us to try to sort them out. Their effect in the Rhapsody is too studied.

Even the first part of the Rhapsody, which Mr. Hale found superior to the rest, is now seen to have a thinness that is not particularly impressive or necessarily appropriate. The perpetual reliance on the pedal point, against which the various motives are heard, becomes annoying. In spite of views to the contrary, "America" is dependent on its full program to hold our interest. No, Mr. Bloch has done himself no service by reviving this work.

The Interludes from "Macbeth" create an immediate desire to hear the opera, though with the present tendency in opera production in this country there is small likelihood of our ever getting the chance. These two interludes are not long enough to give us more than a fleeting glimpse of what the opera itself may be like. Reports of its revival in Naples last year encourage the belief, which the interludes support, that a fine work is lying needlessly on the shelf.

Bloch's Three Jewish Poems are better known here perhaps, than anything of his save "Schelomo." They are suggestively and searchingly impressionistic chiefly in a mood of melancholy. Mr. Bloch was cordially received by the audience.

He will again conduct this concert tonight and will lead the orchestra in a somewhat different program at the concerts Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon next week. The 20th regular concerts will be given on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct an all-Russian program consisting of Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 6.

B. Globe

MUSIC

March 1939

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchest

Continuing his appearances guest conductor of his own mu at the Boston Symphony conce Ernest Bloch last night offered other opportunity for further quaintance with the man and works. The distinguished Sw American composer, of Jewish cestry, gave further evidence of vitality as conductor and his sign cance as writer of music in a p gram that included works both w and without a racial character background.

Two pieces on the program w heard in last week's concerts. T are the two "Macbeth" interlu and the "Three Jewish Poems." addition were performed "Sch omo," Hebrew Rhapsody for viol cello and orchestra with Jean detti of the Boston Symphony soloist, and—for the first time Boston—"Helvetia."

"Helvetia" represents someth of Block's native land as his "Am ica" does of this land. In it personal, or at least the personali element is absent, giving way to attempt to represent in pictorial programistic music "the land mountains and its people." This accomplishes in a style that, as composer himself says, is "clea diatonic and tonal," with free of folk-song material, martial hymn-like melodies. There is c siderable vigor and undoubted po er in "Helvetia." From the point view and as the object for wh it was written, it is unquestiona successful.

Mr. Bedetti, who twice in seasons has played the solo part "Schelomo," presented a marvel violoncello mastery. Agile execut of leaps and passages, mellow, si ing, or dramatic tone, were his c spicuous accomplishments.

The same program, with Block conducting, will be repea night.

Symphony

B. Trav. March 18/39

Second Program Of Bloch's Music

The specimens of the works of Ernest Bloch which have made up the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the past week-end, under the direction of the composer, were supplemented at the concert of the Monday series last evening by two more of his orchestral compositions. These were "Schelomo" ("Solomon"), a Hebrew Rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra, with Jean Bedetti as soloist, and the Symphonic Fresco, "Helvetia," the latter heard for the first time in Boston. The two symphonic interludes from the composer's opera, "Macbeth" and the "Three Jewish Poems," heard at the regular concerts last week, made up the rest of the program.

The Rhapsody "Schelomo" impressed one as occupying a high position in the roster of Bloch's music as heard during his recent visit. Much more obviously Jewish in feeling than the "Poems," it is lush, imaginative, spontaneous music. There is little suggestion of ponderousness or of laboring a point, qualities which often obtrude themselves on the listener to Bloch's music. While its almost frenzied, lavish Orientalism may not be congenial to every ear, still the piece has both consistency and variety within that vein. As soloist, Mr. Bedetti seemed to be well in sympathy with the musical mood in hand, to a point of emotionalism which led him at times into errors of intonation, excessive portamento, and an occasionally unpleasant tone.

"Helvetia, the Land of Mountains and Its People" presents, as would be evident from the title, an entirely different facet of Mr. Bloch's talents. Although the composer terms it a "symphonic fresco," it is less a series of tonal pictures than a musical evolution of a half-poetic, half narrative set of ideas. Mr. Bloch has followed his frequent practice of providing his music with an elaborate program, which, once read, sticks in the head of the listener and makes it hard to ascertain how the piece would have sounded without a literary aid. With folk tunes as chief thematic material, chosen with a more discriminating hand than in "America," the piece is developed in a robust, traditional style, building up to a truly effective climax in the third section.

With respect to the remainder of the program, it is a pleasure to report that the "Macbeth" interludes made an increasingly favorable impression after several hearings. Their directness, originality, and atmospheric conviction recommend them as a valuable addition to any orchestral repertory.

J. E.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

MAR 18 1939

Symphony Hall Art Causes Study

Boston — (AP) — A young investigator began research yesterday to determine if 14 figures in Greek mythology, including Apollo Belvedere, had been crashing the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 39 years—or really were earning their five-dollar seats.

William Judd, Harvard graduate, son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said the placing of the plaster status may have been part of a plan of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, designer of Symphony Hall, in achieving its famous acustical perfection.

Although preliminary inquiry had failed to reveal that this was Sabine's specific idea, Judd said, "my strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings."

'Helvetia' for First Hearing

B. Trans. March 18/39

Continuing as guest conductor, Ernest Bloch led the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night through a program of his own works, and as assisting artist, Jean Bedetti stepped from his desk as first cellist to play Mr. Bloch's Hebrew rhapsody, "Schelomo," for violoncello and orchestra. The instrumental numbers chosen by Mr. Bloch comprised "Macbeth," Two Symphonic Interludes, the Three Jewish Poems entitled "Dance," "Rite," and "Cortege," and a first performance in Boston of "Helvetia," which the composer has sub-titled "A Symphonic Fresco" on "The Land of Mountains and Its People." A program note gives the date of the work as 1929, although the first sketches for it were made almost 30 years before.

* * *

Since the "Macbeth" Symphonic Interludes and the Three Jewish Poems were placed upon the programs of the Friday-Saturday series of concerts the past week, and subsequently reviewed in this column, it seems unnecessary to make extended comment at this time upon them as compositions. In performance, it seemed to this writer that Mr. Bloch achieved more telling effects last night than at the previous Friday concert. The "Macbeth" in particular, gained new power and stirred a further desire to hear the lyric drama in its entirety. There is powerful emotion also, in the "Cortege" or Funeral Procession, but for clear delineation in tone, the picture presented by the "Dance" was the most satisfying last night.

The rhapsody for cello is not new to Bostonians. Mr. Piatigorsky played it with this orchestra as recently as Jan. 27 and Mr. Bedetti has performed it several times with his colleagues. The fact that the composer himself conducted the work set it apart on this occasion, and as Mr. Bloch is a conductor possessing considerable technique with the baton, the performance was doubtless as authentic as we are likely to hear. It was strongly rhythmic, powerfully climaxed, and upon occasion, it offered a deep emotional pull. Mr. Bedetti was in top form and the orchestral background was well considered.

* * *

It may be well to allow Mr. Bloch to speak in part for hmiself regarding the new work which was heard here for the first time last night. Having waited more than 25 years to amalgamate the material for "Helvetia," he says: " . . . I at last decided to realize my long-delayed plan. The difficulty was to establish a unity among the diverse motives . . . (the actual work contains more than 30 motives) . . . At last I adopted a plan which allowed me to give form to my idea; a large fresco, or rather, five frescos, each representing a portion of the general theme . . . I dreamed of the old Switzerland . . . a small people in the process of formation, fighting for their liberties . . . composed of different races willingly united, as in America."

With this idea in the thoughts of the listener, it becomes apparent that Mr. Bloch's sincerity and straight thinking are at once reflected in his music. It is not so epic, perhaps, as "America," and before the work is ended, one inclines to the belief that Mr. Bloch may have had difficulty in bringing his tale to an end, but none may deny that he has drawn a compelling portrait of his compatriots. It is possible that he will revise the work. A judicious amount of pruning would considerably strengthen his points. But the fact remains that he has composed an interesting work.

Mr. Bloch's presence on the conductor's stand has served to emphasize his several talents. His forthright musical speech, his freedom from affectation has commended him to the discerning listener. His reception at previous concerts has been cordial; at the concert last night that cordiality was repeated, and both he and Mr. Bedetti shared the enthusiastic applause of an audience obviously well pleased.

G. M. S.

ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

83

MAR 17 1939

ASKS IF STATUES ARE DEADHEADS

Famed Figures in Boston's Symphony Hall Are Under Scrutiny

BOSTON, March 17.—(AP)—Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past 39 years—or is he really earning his five-dollar "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether fourteen plaster-of-paris statues, placed in niches about Symphony hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, Brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxiteles, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, "I have found nothing in presently available papers of Sabine mentioning the specific role of the statutes themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as 'safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings. He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statutes—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make interesting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 17 1939

Mythology

Statues Crash Concerts

BOSTON—(AP)—A young investigator began research today to determine if 14 figures in Greek mythology, including Apollo Belvedere, had been crashing the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra for the past 39 years—or really were earning their five-dollar seats.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said the placing of the plaster statues may have been part of a plan of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, designer of Symphony Hall, in achieving its famous acoustical perfection.

Although preliminary inquiry had failed to reveal that this was Sabine's specific idea, Judd said, "my strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings."

205

Symphony Hall Statues Win Acoustical Laurels

Euripides—His draperies help the acoustics at Symphony Hall. His tragic mask, too.

Decibeling Mr. Judd Thinks They Assist Niches Bust Echoes

By Mary Elizabeth Prim

Don't let William Judd's ruler fool you. He is not preparing a graph of spring skirt lengths but is taking decibel readings of the effect of the Symphony Hall statues on the acoustics there.

William is the son of George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and admits that the acoustics are just about perfect. During his years at Harvard, William became interested in the work of the university's great physicist, William E. Sabine, who worked with Mead, McKim and White, architects of Symphony Hall, in planning the acoustics, the first instance of such a partnership in this country.

Mr. Judd finds that the niches in which the larger-than-life plaster statues rest were designed in Sabine's plan as "safety valves" for the absorption of undesirable sound.

Though he has studied Sabine's papers carefully, he can find no mention of the specific role of the statues themselves. He believes, however, that the statues are not merely for decoration but serve to catch echoes before they happen, so to speak. It's a matter of bulk, he says.

The lack of draperies on some of the statues has nothing to do with the total echo-resisting bulk, either. There is compensation for Apollo, "noble and nude and antique," for he has

Continued on Page 8—Column 7

William Judd, acoustic researcher of Symphony Hall, joins Diana's stag line to aid science.

Symphony Statues Help Kill Echoes

Continued from Page One

a robe flung over one arm and that serves to catch as many stray echoes as the voluminous draperies worn and the tragic mask carried by Euripides.

Deer Helps Diana

Diana's brief skirt—the length that Paris decrees for spring, by the way!—is compensated for by the deer that shares the niche with her.

Sabine, first authority on predicted acoustics, had no way of knowing that the sound in Symphony Hall would be clarified as the voluminous costumes worn by turn of the century audiences gave way to the modern lighter costume. Such has, however, been the case, Mr. Judd points out. Even bobbed hair helps. If a program given in 1907, say, were to be repeated today, it would sound much better. Particularly as those new short skirt lengths are coming in.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

MAR 17 1939

Studies Effect Of Statues On Acoustics

William Judd Will Try to Find Out If Apollo, Diana, Etc. Are Worth Salt

BOSTON, March 17-AP-Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra for the past 39 years—or is he really earning his five-dollar "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether 14 plaster-of-paris statues, placed in niches about Symphony Hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Praxiteles, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, "I have found nothing in presently available papers of Sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as 'safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies, in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings. He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statues—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make interesting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts a statue of "The Standing Anacreon," described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups."

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAR 17 1939

~~Boston's~~ Symphony Hall Statues Must Earn Right To Keep Their Positions

Boston, March 17 —(AP)— Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra for the past 39 years—or is he really earning his $5 "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether 14 plaster-of-paris statues, placed in niches about symphony hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxiteles, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, "I have found nothing in presently available papers of Sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as 'safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings. He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statues—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make interesting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts a statue of "the standing Anacreon," described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

MAR 18 1939

Around and About

By QUIPPE QUI

Roy Harris, whose symphony was recently played by the Boston Symphony at Smith College, was ~~asked by~~ the students how they could make money in music. He said this: "There is a lack of good music for choruses. The choral societies are giving the same things over and over because they cannot find much new. Chorus singing has come up greatly the past few years. There is an opportunity for you to compose some first-rate chorus music. Another thing. The English, in producing their motion pictures, have suitable incidental music. Not so in Hollywood. The incidental music which goes with the American pictures is thrown together and has little to do with the picture. I believe American producers are beginning to see how they lack musically. If you can compose incidental music for motion pictures I think you'll have a real market for your talent."

NEW CASTLE, IND.
COURIER - TIMES

MAR 20 1939

The sixth annual Berkshire symphonic festival will be held between Aug. 3 and 13 at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in programs drawn from the ~~second and~~ third Beethoven symphonies, the first and third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Tshaikovsky's fourth, the Sibelius second and fifth, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherezade," Debussy's "Apres-midi d'un Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra," and others to be announced later.

BLOCH LEADS AT SYMPHONY

Hub Orchestra Plays His Works Exclusively

B Post — March /39

It is seldom that an audience in Symphony Hall will show genuine interest in a programme of music by only one composer. However, such a phenomenon took place for the third time last night when Ernest Bloch appeared as guest-conductor with the Boston Symphony, playing an entire programme of his own compositions.

With the exception of "Helvetia," all the selections had been performed in Boston at previous symphonic concerts. "Macbeth" was played as recently as Saturday evening; "Three Jewish Poems" also at the same time; "Schelomo" back in January, when Gregor Piatigorsky was the 'cellist. Last night Jean Bedetti stepped out of the first 'cello desk and performed the solo part in his usual commendable manner which was to the satisfaction of both the audience and the composer.

The piece "Helvetia" scored a decided success which can safely be said to have been due to the music and not the composer's presence. It represents Bloch's feelings about his native land, Switzerland, and finely and skillfully are they expressed. There is no sentimental nostalgia or poignancy prevalent, nor is there too much reliance on patriotic utterances. The music is captivating and refreshing and deserves subsequent performances.

DENVER, COLO.
POST

MAR 17 1939

Greek Gods Suspected Of Aiding Sound Effect

Boston, March 17.—(A. P.)—A young investigator began research Friday to determine if fourteen figures in Greek mythology, including Apollo Belvedere, had been crashing the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the ~~last thirty-nine~~ years—or really were earning their $5 seats.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said the placing of the plaster statues may have been part of a plan of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, designer of Symphony hall, in achieving its famous acoustical perfection.

Altho preliminary inquiry had failed to reveal that this was Sabine's specific idea, Judd said, "my strongest clew toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings."

B. Her. March 25/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 20th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Khovanstchina"..Moussorgsky
"Le Sacre du Printemps"......Stravinsky
Symphony No. 6 in B minor,
"Pathetique," Op. 74.......Tchaikovsky

The orchestral playing in yesterday's concert was astonishing, even though we may be accustomed to this recurrent phenomenon. Whether our ears, in charitable inclination towards the opera house pit this past week, were merely amazed by contrast and anew by the qualities of the Boston Symphony does not much matter. We have never heard a more brilliant or a clearer performance of "Le Sacre du Printemps"; nor could anyone fail to marvel at the miraculous smoothness and pianissimo of the Moussorgsky Prelude or the sonority of the Tchaikovsky 6th Symphony. Once again there was all the reason in the world to rejoice in this orchestra and in its conductor.

Rather than boost further the merits of an organization which, let us hope, we are not in the habit of taking for granted, let us consider the "Sacre." The vigor and stridency of its dissonance still, evidently, arouse strong dislike in a good many minds. Anyone who hears it for the first time is in for a shock, not as incredible, unprecedented a shock as he would have received in 1913, but notwithstanding all he may have been told or have read Stravinsky's score will not cause him to doze off in a daydream.

Still taking for protagonist a newcomer to the "Sacre," such a one will, if he be of open mind, realize that his pleasure in listening derives almost entirely from the rhythmical side. And from that side he ought to be tremendously excited and his interest held by the variety and ingenuity of the composer. The wild clashes and strange shrieks and growls will be seen to be not willful eccentricity, but inevitable part of an impressive scheme and product of a bold imagination.

The question that is always discussed at any revival of the "Sacre" is: "Does it date?" No; within its limits as music primarily designed for choreographic action on a stage it is still a remarkable score, one that holds the attention in the concert hall as more or less absolute music. It is, as everyone knows, an excessively difficult score; and for that reason the superb performance of it yesterday was all the more a triumph for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Moussorgsky's music for "Khovanstchina" counts as one of the finest monuments in Russian music. Rimsky-Korsakov, as a labor of love, assembled and orchestrated it. How much he altered it, as he did with "Boris Godunov," we cannot tell. As it stands the opera, for all its astounding plot, is a work of genius. Not the least stroke of imagination is this lovely prelude.

For conclusion to this all-Russian, but none the less varied, program we had the greatest of Tchaikovsky's symphonies. Sir Donald Tovey's analysis, which Mr. Burk quoted, quite succinctly indicated why it is the greatest. Yesterday's brilliant performance, moreover, was a splendid realization.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The following week concerts will be given Thursday (not Friday), April 6, and Saturday, April 8. Artur Rubinstein will play Brahms's 2d Piano Concerto. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms will also be heard.

B. Globe Mar. 25/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" must be getting to be "old hat." For not a soul, so far as this chronicler could see, walked out on its performance by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. This violent score, that incited a riot at its Paris premiere in 1913, has long been admired by musicians and a few of the more daring concertgoers. But from Boston performances in recent years some have angrily departed, noses high with indignation.

"The Rite of Spring" comes midway in this week's Symphony program, which begins with the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantschina" in remembrance of the composer's 100th birthday. Moussorgsky was born March 21, 1839. As concluding piece, the "Pathetic" Symphony by Tchaikovsky completes the Russian flavor of the list.

No doubt "The Rite of Spring" is decadent art and its effect depends upon that most primary element of music: rhythm. All the same it is a masterpiece of its kind and in its fashion is atmospheric and depictive. There should be periodic performances of the score if only to convince those listeners who insist that modern music is too hard on their ears, that almost anything becomes understandable and frequently likeable if only it is heard enough. Stravinsky's dissonance, once the subject of bitter exchanges of opinion, now seems virtually tame.

Despite the eminence of the composers represented on the list, the heroes of yesterday's concert were conductor and players. Once more the Boston Symphony proved that it is probably the best orchestra existing today. For example, take the performance of Moussorgsky's prelude. This is unpretentious music but it requires, especially in those soft closing measures, absolute technical control if the notes are to sound as precisely, clearly and softly as the composer wished. Yesterday they sounded just that way, and furthermore, due to the interpretive genius of Dr. Koussevitzky, they sustained with incredible delicacy the composer's intended mood.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony is not exactly a tonic on the first real Spring day of the year. Nevertheless it provided the right contrast to the hard brilliance of Stravinsky. Technically, the Symphony was performed as well as Moussorgsky's prelude had been.

Dr. Koussevitzky, as he has done so many times, again exalted the distinctive and deeply emotional but not supremely great music of Tchaikovsky into high tragedy. All the Tchaikovskian melodic lamentation and dark despair are present in any performance of Tchaikovsky by any conductor. There is an added quality in Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, something that might be called a "noble illumination," whereby Tchaikovsky's proverbial self-pity is transformed into pathos and his grief takes on epic proportions.

A large number of photographs, autograph letters and the like from the musical collection of Boaz Piller is on exhibition in the second-floor foyer of Symphony Hall. The collection is very interesting and may be seen through the concert tomorrow night.

C. W. D.

RUSSIAN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Stravinsky "Rite of Spring" Played Again

B. Post March 25/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although Symphony Hall did not receive its promised visit from Igor Stravinsky, there is no dearth of his music there just now. The other day it was the "Firebird" Suite; yesterday afternoon it was the "Rite of Spring," and at the next pair of concerts, those of Thursday afternoon, April 6, and Saturday evening, April 8, there will come the "Symphony of Psalms."

"LE SACRE" A MASTERPIECE

After the emotional debauch of a week of opera and with more opera to follow, it was good to hear yesterday the unsentimental, but by no means unimaginative music, of Stravinsky's ballet of Pagan Russia. Stravinsky's dissonances (always a relative term) have lost their fearsomeness but not their potency. Now they are tonic and refreshing; that is, in the cases where any bite remains.

It was easy to suspect that when "Le Sacre" ceased to be horrendous it would cease to be anything at all. Fortunately no such dire fate has overtaken it. Even with all the strangeness gone from it, the score remains a masterpiece. Yesterday it also enjoyed a masterly performance.

A Landmark in Music

One of the landmarks of music, "Le Sacre du Printemps," like Wagner's "Tristan," has inspired a swarm of imitators and has survived them all. The would-be Stravinskys copied the frightfulness and the dislocated, distorted rhythms. They could hardly copy Stravinsky's ideas, and they had none of their own to match his. Possibly he has not always maintained that position, but in "Le Sacre" Stravinsky was one of the few composers who really mattered. Music would have been different if he had never lived.

As tribute to Moussorgsky, who was born 100 years ago last Tuesday, Dr. Koussevitzky began yesterday's concert with the Preslude to "Khovanstchina." Not one who knew Moussorgsky only by his pleasantly pictorial music could suspect his true stature as dramatic composer. For that knowledge one must seek the opera house.

Tchaikovsky's Sixth

It is a pity, in view of this centenary, that the Metropolitan could not have let us hear its revival of "Boris" during the current performances at the Opera House.

An all-Russian programme yesterday concluded with that trusty warhorse of Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1939 = B. Trans

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Serge Koussevitzky Returns to the Stand And Presents an All-Russian Program

Returning to the conductor's stand for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, after an absence of two weeks, Serge Koussevitzky presented a program consisting entirely of music by Russian composers. The first number, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina," was occasioned by the occurrence, earlier in the week, of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the composer. The second, Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," seemed to be occasioned by the concurrence of the equinox on the same day; or, in less involved language, the coming of spring. There was the additional consideration, no doubt, that the work had been promised under the direction of the composer, who had to cancel his American tour. Completing the program, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, not exactly a novelty, had no other discoverable relation to the first two than that it was written by a Russian composer.

While it is hazardous to make generalizations upon the basis of single examples, the temptation is strong to compare the composers as they were represented on yesterday's program, to be repeated tonight in due course. Tchaikovsky was the least original, in the conventional sense, following the patterns set up by his predecessors more or less without question. Moussorgsky had the striking originality of an inspired dilettante, so that even his mistakes sound well. Stravinsky, the most professional craftsman of the three, produced in "Le sacre" a work that ended an era in musical history and began another.

The haunting beauty of the Moussorgsky Prelude remains. The "Pathetic," for all the excesses of the composer and for all the excesses of performers, retains its power. But after the performance of "Le sacre" yesterday, at least one listener began to ask himself whether its importance—and indeed the importance of the composer—has not now become academic, a matter of historical interest. There are, of course, some powerful passages in the work, still moving the listener. But yesterday, in spite of a performance of electrical energy and consummate orchestral virtuosity, much of the music sounded tame.

The orchestral playing throughout the afternoon, in fact, was extraordinary. One heard the Prelude played as evidently only the Boston Orchestra can play it at top form, with the wonderful pianissimo tone of Mr. Valkenier at the end again enchanting the listener. The performance of the Symphony, one of the war horses of both conductor and orchestra, was remarkable in precision, beauty and variety of tone, and emotional drive. It had all the mannerisms of the conductor's interpretation which have become so familiar and which now almost seem to belong to the music.

M. S.

March 25/39 BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MUSIC

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN
Piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 6 and 8.

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

MAR 17 1939

Studies Part Statues Play in Hub Symphony Hall Accoustics

BOSTON, March 17 (AP)—Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past 39 years—or is he really earning his $5 "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether 14 plaster-of-paris statues, placed in niches about Symphony hall, really contributed to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said he believed the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, Brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxiteles, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, "I have found nothing in presently available papers of Sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as 'safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings. He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check on the statues—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make interesting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts a statue of "the Standing Anacreon," described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups."

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

MAR 17 1939

Young Harvard Graduate Probing Statues' Need At Symphony Concerts

BOSTON, March 17 (AP)—Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 39 years—or is he really earning his five-dollar 'seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether 14 plaster-of-Paris statues, placed in niches about Symphony Hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, Brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxiteles, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, "I have found nothing in presently available papers of Sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as 'safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings. He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statues—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make interesting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts a statue of "The Standing Anacreon," described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups."

INDEPENDENT
Skowhegan Me

MAR 16 1939

The Library Corner

Library hours: Every week day from 2 to 5:30 and from 7 to 8:30
Open until 9 on Saturdays
Closed Friday evenings

Are you going to the New York World's Fair?

You will find interesting information in regard to this event at the Public Library. The New York Times published a special supplement as part of its regular edition of Sunday, March 5. It is one of the most fascinating and informative publications issued in connection with this great attraction for this year. "The World of Tomorrow" is the theme of the Fair. Headed by H. G. Wells, the noted British author, who writes the lead article about the world of tomorrow, many outstanding men and women have contributed articles. Among them are Henry Fordon, "Machines as Ministers to Men"; Frances Perkins, "Labor"; Henry A. Wallace, "Agriculture"; James Truslow Adams, "America's Beginnings"; Gelett Burgess, "Amusements"; Brooks Atkinson, "New Horizons in the Theatre"; Oscar Tschirky, "Eating One's Way Around the World"; Dr. Henry E. Fosdick, "Religion and the New Age"; Dr. Thomas Parran, "Toward a Healthier Race"; Robert Hutchins, "Education for Life"; Dorothy Canfield Fisher, "Making an Art of Living"; Sergei Koussevitzky, "Symphony of a New Age"; Dr. Arthur Compson, "The Promise of Science".

If you read these articles you will have a splendid idea of "The World of Tomorrow as the Experts View It."

This magazine may be borrowed from your library and there are also other interesting pamphlets on the Fair. The World's Fair Supplement may be purchased from the New York Times for fifteen cents, if you want to own a copy.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

MAR 18 1939

HAS APOLLO BELVEDERE BEEN A GATE CRASHER

Perhaps Statues at Symphony Hall In Boston Really Help Acoustics.

BOSTON, March 18—(AP)—Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past years—or is he really earning his five-dollar "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether fourteen plaster-of-paris statues, placed in nicehs about Symphony Hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orcehstra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxitells, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed phycist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, " I have found nothing in presently available papers of sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which the y rest were designedly made as "safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statues—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history is order to make intersting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts, a statue of "The Standing Anacreon" described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups."

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAR 18 1939

Prokofieff Opus Named To Succeed Snow White

"Peter and the Wolf" Just Right, Suggests Dr. Koussevitzky, for Children and Adults

(John D. Beaufort, Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor)

If Walt Disney is looking for some new nursery characters with which to charm the grown-ups, then Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and himself a Disney fan, suggests Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

"You see, I attend all the principal Disney films," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "Now that 'Ferdinand the Bull' has had his day, I nominate 'Peter and the Wolf' as the successor, a story for children that adults will take to their hearts."

If one were seeking so solemn a thing, as a trend, he might well contemplate Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion. "Ferdinand the Bull," written and drawn for children, suffered the same fate as little Marmaduke's electric train. It was taken up whole-heartedly by the grown-ups of the family. Radio Pictures must have made at least part of the $8,000,000 gross it claims for "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" on parents making repeat visits—"just so Willie can see it again"—to the Disney fantasy.

To return to the most immediate instance of the trend, the Russian composer's amusing musical fantasy has been enjoying a phenomenal success lately. It was revived for the Pension Fund concerts in Boston and New York after being introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony on March 25, 1938, with the composer conducting.

Not only was it a great success at the Pension Fund "Concert Extraordinaire" in Boston but the sometime skeptical New York took Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, Peter's grandfather and even the wolf to its collective heart. Critics accounted "Peter and the Wolf" one of the high points in the orchestra's two pension fund concerts there.

Quite an exciting life for such a small boy as Peter, but Symphony officials assure us that he thrives on it.

The story behind the story of Peter's American success is almost as amusing as the tale itself. It seems that Mr. Prokofieff introduced "Peter" to Boston in a bit of a huff. Bostonians, he complained, had not taken to his Fourth Symphony. So when he came to Boston to conduct, last year, Mr. Prokofieff announced that he was bringing with him something that children—and Bostonians—could comprehend.

Boston turned the barb deftly. It enjoyed "Peter and the Wolf." It said: "No, Mr. Prokofieff, this is not child's stuff at all. We enjoyed it hugely therefore it must have adult appeal even if you did write it for children."

For those who have not yet heard "Peter and the Wolf," one should perhaps explain that it is about a small boy who, with the help of his friend the bird, captures a fierce wolf. The wolf swallowed the duck, but, "if one would listen very carefully, he could hear the duck quacking in the wolf's belly, because the wolf in his hurry had swallowed her alive."

Well, Mr. Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony, Mr. Hale, Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, the grandfather and the wolf have all done their part.

The next move is up to Mr. Disney.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

MAR 19 1939

Berkshire Festival Calls Koussevitzky, Symphony

The sixth annual Berkshire symphonic festival will be held between Aug. 3 and 13 at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston symphony in programs drawn from the second and third Beethoven symphonies, the first and third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Tschaikovsky's fourth, the Sibelius second and fifth, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Apres-midi d'un Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra."

Others will be announced later.

'Information, Please' and 'Magic Key' Broadcasts Are Pleasing, Reporter Asserts

Advocate - La. Feb. 21 '39

Moe Berg to Join Fadiman's Battery Tonight in Regular Weekly Program Available Here.

By Harris Jackson
(Staff Correspondent)

Gieseking Superior.

Gieseking, renowned as the greatest interpreter of Debussy's piano music, played the third piano concert of Rachmaninoff with the Philharmonic in a manner which Olin Downes of the Times considered superior to the interpretation given by the composer himself and in a manner which the packed house enjoyed to the full. His superb technique and his magnificent concept of the work enables him, with the expert assistance of Conductor John Barbirolli, to bring out all of the vitality, tunefulness and thoughtful beauty of the score.

But it remained for the Boston Symphony, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to give the New York musical public one of the most enjoyable evenings of the season. The curtains parted at Carnegie one recent Saturday night and displayed a seventeenth century drawing room, lit by candlelight, and with the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky dressed in costumes and wigs of the period.

Then, from a spinet, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Haydn "Farewell" symphony, a performance in which the costume, the candlelight and the gradual disappearance from the stage of all the musicians took nothing from the assured brilliance of the reading of the music.

After this, the curtains parted again on a small group of the musicians, clad as night club players. With Colin O'More as tenor soloist and Richard Burgin conducting, they triumphed completely over the tiresome and unmusical setting which Louis Gruenberg has given Vachel Lindsay's poem, "The Daniel Jazz."

"Peter and the Wolf."

The success of the evening, however, was the performance of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," narrated by Richard Hale and accompanied superbly by the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky (without costume and wigs this time). This work, "a fairy tale for children," was fully enjoyed for its humor as well as its quite satire on program music.

And to bring the evening to a melodious close, the orchestra was heard in four waltzes, the "Wiener Blut" and "Voices of Spring" of Johnann Strauss, the Sibelisu "Valse Triste" (and what a beautiful reading the Bostonians gave that overworked number), and Ravel's "La Valse." Everyone had a good time.

ADVOCATE
Arlington Mass

MAR 23 1939

Will Give Unique Candlelight Program For Heights Organ Fund

A unique Candlelight Musical Program has been planned for Friday, March 31, by the Arlington Heights Baptist church, when Miss Norma Olson, noted 'cello soloist, will be featured in a service of inspiration and devotion for the organ fund.

The morning choir of the church, under the direction of Mrs. Ruth Woodworth, with Mrs. Willa A. Moody at the organ, will be heard in a series of solos, duets, trios and anthems, centered in the theme, "The Cross of Christ." The pastor of the church, the Rev. Walter E. Bridge, will conduct the devotional service.

Miss Norma Olson has studied under the famous Alfred Zighera of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and her appearance in the Heights Baptist church is eagerly awaited. The love offering at the close of the service will be for the New Organ Fund. All seats are free for this Candlelight service, and the public is cordially invited to attend. The service is scheduled for 8:00 p. m.

BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

MAR 24 1939

PRIVATE concerts at a Boston physician's home led to the organization of the Boston Doctors' Symphony orchestra, whose first rehearsal was held recently at the Hampton Court hotel in Brookline, Mass.

More than 50 music-minded medicos temporarily abandoned their stethoscopes and scalpels to give themselves over to the baton-waving of Conductor Nicholas Slonimsky, music authority and composer who came to America from Russia about 15 years ago as secretary to Serge Koussevitcky, Boston Symphony orchestra conductor.

For several months a group of physicians met at the home of Dr. Julius Loman to relax with wood winds, brasses and strings, which several had not touched since student days. Loman and his colleagues hit upon the idea of organizing a symphony orchestra as an avocation.

Notices for recruits, posted at most of the intown hospitals, brought prompt response.

They hope to make their professional debut at Sanders theater in Cambridge, but the date is indefinite.

NEW BLOCH

N.Y. Times

By F. BONAVIA

LONDON.

ALTHOUGH modern composers have contributed their full quota to the existing concertos for the violin, the really successful works of this class can still be counted on the fingers of one hand. The fact accounts in part for the exceptionally friendly reception of Ernest Bloch's violin concerto at its introduction to this country by Joseph Szigeti and the Philharmonic Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham at the last concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society.

There is no questioning Bloch's very substantial merit. Compared with most concertos of recent times his work shines like a moon among the lesser stars. While so many fumble uneasily without knowing exactly in what direction their search is taking them, Bloch presents us with a style that is mature and his own; he knows not only what he wants to do but how and where to get it. The orchestra he employs is large, yet at no time is one aware of any disproportion between its might and the thin, small voice of the solo violin.

The technical achievement is brilliant in the extreme and other valuable qualities add to its merit: vitality, wisdom in the disposition of climaxes, a rare flair for effects of color and, above all, the sincere feeling for dramatic expression which the concerto shares with all th

kn

deficiencies and no tricks meant to distract attention from poverty of ideas. In all these respects the concerto is masterly and has actually been hailed as a masterpiece.

I would rather define it the work of a master craftsman. A masterpiece, while sharing its geniality, earnestness, picturesqueness, should also command a wider range of emotional expression. The field surveyed is attractive, but somewhat narrow like the so-called "quartal" harmony Bloch uses to a much wider extent than Vaughan Williams and his followers. Most interesting is the first movement, where sincerity gives warmth and intensity to a cunning plan; but the composer seems to adapt himself less graciously to the requirements of the third and second movements. And it is precisely in the second movement that a Beethoven or a Brahms probes the greatest depths.

It is rather significant that some critics in appraising the concerto should have found the general effect disappointing in spite of Szigeti's most admirable performance. That disappointment may have its root in the fact that the violin is rarely allowed to display its genius for lyrical expression. It is common today to look upon lyricism as undesirable and old-fashioned, but I know of no work which survived its age solely on account of rich color and ingenious design. It will be interesting to see how Bloch's clever concerto will stand the test of time.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

MAR 17 1939

Young Harvard Graduate Probing Statues' Need At Symphony Concerts

BOSTON, March 17 (AP)—Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 39 years—or is he really earning his five-dollar "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether 14 plaster-of-Paris statues, placed in niches about Symphony Hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, Brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxiteles, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, "I have found nothing in presently available papers of Sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as 'safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings. He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statues—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make interesting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts a statue of "The Standing Anacreon," described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups."

INDEPENDENT
Skowhegan, Me

MAR 16 1939

The Library Corner

Library hours: Every week day from 2 to 5:30 and from 7 to 8:30
Open until 9 on Saturdays
Closed Friday evenings

Are you going to the New York World's Fair?

You will find interesting information in regard to this event at the Public Library. The New York Times published a special supplement as part of its regular edition of Sunday, March 5. It is one of the most fascinating and informative publications issued in connection with this great attraction for this year. "The World of Tomorrow" is the theme of the Fair. Headed by H. G. Wells, the noted British author, who writes the lead article about the world of tomorrow, many oustanding men and women have contributed articles. Among them are Henry Fordon, "Machines as Ministers to Men"; Frances Perkins, "Labor"; Henry A. Wallace, "Agriculture"; James Truslow Adams, "America's Beginnings"; Gelett Burgess, "Amusements"; Brooks Atkinson, "New Horizons in the Theatre"; Oscar Tschirky, "Eating One's Way Around the World"; Dr. Henry E. Fosdick, "Religion and the New Age"; Dr. Thomas Parran, "Toward a Healthier Race"; Robert Hutchins, "Education for Life"; Dorothy Canfield Fisher, "Making an Art of Living"; Sergei Kousevitzky, "Symphony of a New Age"; Dr. Arthur Compson, "The Promise of Science".

If you read these articles you will have a splendid idea of "The World of Tomorrow as the Experts View It."

This magazine may be borrowed from your library and there are also other interesting pamphlets on the Fair. The World's Fair Supplement may be purchased from the New York Times for fifteen cents, if you want to own a copy.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

MAR 18 1939

HAS APOLLO BELVEDERE BEEN A GATE CRASHER

Perhaps Statues at Symphony Hall In Boston Really Help Acoustics.

BOSTON, March 18—(AP)—Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past years—or is he really earning his five-dollar "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether fourteen plaster-of-paris statues, placed in nicehs about Symphony Hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orcehstra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxitells, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed phycist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, "I have found nothing in presently available papers of sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as "safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings. He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statues—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make intersting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts, a statue of "The Standing Anacreon" described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups."

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAR 18 1939

Prokofieff Opus Named To Succeed Snow White

"Peter and the Wolf" Just Right, Suggests Dr. Koussevitzky, for Children and Adults

(John D. Beaufort, Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor)

If Walt Disney is looking for some new nursery characters with which to charm the grown-ups, then Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and himself a Disney fan, suggests Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

"You see, I attend all the principal Disney films," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "Now that 'Ferdinand the Bull' has had his day, I nominate 'Peter and the Wolf' as the successor, a story for children that adults will take to their hearts."

If one were seeking so solemn a thing, as a trend, he might well contemplate Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion. "Ferdinand the Bull," written and drawn for children, suffered the same fate as little Marmaduke's electric train. It was taken up whole-heartedly by the grown-ups of the family. Radio Pictures must have made at least part of the $8,000,000 gross it claims for "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" on parents making repeat visits—"just so Willie can see it again"—to the Disney fantasy.

To return to the most immediate instance of the trend, the Russian composer's amusing musical fantasy has been enjoying a phenomenal success lately. It was revived for the Pension Fund concerts in Boston and New York after being introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony on March 25, 1938, with the composer conducting.

Not only was it a great success at the Pension Fund "Concert Extraordinaire" in Boston but the sometime skeptical New York took Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, Peter's grandfather and even the wolf to its collective heart. Critics accounted "Peter and the Wolf" one of the high points in the orchestra's two pension fund concerts there.

Quite an exciting life for such a small boy as Peter, but Symphony officials assure us that he thrives on it.

The story behind the story of Peter's American success is almost as amusing as the tale itself. It seems that Mr. Prokofieff introduced "Peter" to Boston in a bit of a huff. Bostonians, he complained, had not taken to his Fourth Symphony. So when he came to Boston to conduct, last year, Mr. Prokofieff announced that he was bringing with him something that children—and Bostonians—could comprehend.

Boston turned the barb deftly. It enjoyed "Peter and the Wolf." It said: "No, Mr. Prokofieff, this is not child's stuff at all. We enjoyed it hugely therefore it must have adult appeal even if you did write it for children."

For those who have not yet heard "Peter and the Wolf," one should perhaps explain that it is about a small boy who, with the help of his friend the bird, captures a fierce wolf. The wolf swallowed the duck, but, "if one would listen very carefully, he could hear the duck quacking in the wolf's belly, because the wolf in his hurry had swallowed her alive."

Well, Mr. Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony, Mr. Hale, Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, the grandfather and the wolf have all done their part.

The next move is up to Mr. Disney.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

MAR 19 1939

Berkshire Festival Calls Koussevitzky, Symphony

The sixth annual Berkshire symphonic festival will be held between Aug. 3 and 13 at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston symphony in programs drawn from the second and third Beethoven symphonies, the first and third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Tschaikovsky's fourth, the Sibelius second and fifth, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Apres-midi d'un Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra."

Others will be announced later.

'Information, Please' and 'Magic Key' Broadcasts Are Pleasing, Reporter Asserts

Advocate La. [illegible]

Moe Berg to Join Fadiman's Battery Tonight in Regular Weekly Program Available Here.

By Harris Jackson
(Staff Correspondent)

Gieseking Superior.

Gieseking, renowned as the greatest interpreter of Debussy's piano music, played the third piano concert of Rachmaninoff with the Philharmonic in a manner which Olin Downes of the Times considered superior to the interpretation given by the composer himself and in a manner which the packed house enjoyed to the full. His superb technique and his magnificent concept of the work enables him, with the expert assistance of Conductor John Barbirolli, to bring out all of the vitality, tunefulness and thoughtful beauty of the score.

But it remained for the Boston Symphony, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to give the New York musical public one of the most enjoyable evenings of the season. The curtains parted at Carnegie one recent Saturday night and displayed a seventeenth century drawing room, lit by candlelight, and with the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky dressed in costumes and wigs of the period.

Then, from a spinet, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Haydn "Farewell" symphony, a performance in which the costume, the candlelight and the gradual disappearance from the stage of all the musicians took nothing from the assured brilliance of the reading of the music.

After this, the curtains parted again on a small group of the musicians, clad as night club players. With Colin O'More as tenor soloist and Richard Burgin conducting, they triumphed completely over the tiresome and unmusical setting which Louis Gruenberg has given Vachel Lindsay's poem, "The Daniel Jazz."'

"Peter and the Wolf."

The success of the evening, however, was the performance of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," narrated by Richard Hale and accompanied superbly by the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky (without costume and wigs this time). This work, "a fairy tale for children," was fully enjoyed for its humor as well as its quite satire on program music.

And to bring the evening to a melodious close, the orchestra was heard in four waltzes, the "Wiener Blut" and "Voices of Spring" of Johnann Strauss, the Sibelisu "Valse Triste" (and what a beautiful reading the Bostonians gave that overworked number), and Ravel's "La Valse." Everyone had a good time.

ADVOCATE
Arlington Mass

MAR 23 1939

Will Give Unique Candlelight Program For Heights Organ Fund

A unique Candlelight Musical Program has been planned for Friday, March 31, by the Arlington Heights Baptist church, when Miss Norma Olson, noted 'cello soloist, will be featured in a service of inspiration and devotion for the organ fund.

The morning choir of the church, under the direction of Mrs. Ruth Woodworth, with Mrs. Willa A. Moody at the organ, will be heard in a series of solos, duets, trios and anthems, centered in the theme, "The Cross of Christ." The pastor of the church, the Rev. Walter E. Bridge, will conduct the devotional service.

Miss Norma Olson has studied under the famous Alfred Zighera of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and her appearance in the Heights Baptist church is eagerly awaited. The love offering at the close of the service will be for the New Organ Fund. All seats are free for this Candlelight service, and the public is cordially invited to attend. The service is scheduled for 8:00 p. m.

BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

MAR 24 1939

PRIVATE concerts at a Boston physician's home led to the organization of the Boston Doctors' Symphony orchestra, whose first rehearsal was held recently at the Hampton Court hotel in Brookline, Mass.

More than 50 music-minded medicos temporarily abandoned their stethoscopes and scalpels to give themselves over to the baton-waving of Conductor Nicholas Slonimsky, music authority and composer who came to America from Russia about 15 years ago as secretary to Serge Koussevitcky, Boston Symphony orchestra conductor.

For several months a group of physicians met at the home of Dr. Julius Loman to relax with woodwinds, brasses and strings, which several had not touched since student days. Loman and his colleagues hit upon the idea of organizing a symphony orchestra as an avocation.

Notices for recruits, posted at most of the intown hospitals, brought prompt response.

They hope to make their professional debut at Sanders theater in Cambridge, but the date is indefinite.

NEW BLOCH

N.Y. Times

By F. BONAVIA

LONDON.

ALTHOUGH modern composers have contributed their full quota to the existing concertos for the violin, the really successful works of this class can still be counted on the fingers of one hand. The fact accounts in part for the exceptionally friendly reception of Ernest Bloch's violin concerto at its introduction to this country by Joseph Szigeti and the Philharmonic Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham at the last concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society.

There is no questioning Bloch's very substantial merit. Compared with most concertos of recent times his work shines like a moon among the lesser stars. While so many fumble uneasily without knowing exactly in what direction their search is taking them, Bloch presents us with a style that is mature and his own; he knows not only what he wants to do but how and where to get it. The orchestra he employs is large, yet at no time is one aware of any disproportion between its might and the thin, small voice of the solo violin.

The technical achievement is brilliant in the extreme and other valuable qualities add to its merit: vitality, wisdom in the disposition of climaxes, a rare flair for effects of color and, above all, the sincere feeling for dramatic expression which the concerto shares with all deficiencies and no tricks meant to distract attention from poverty of ideas. In all these respects the concerto is masterly and has actually been hailed as a masterpiece.

I would rather define it the work of a master craftsman. A masterpiece, while sharing its geniality, earnestness, picturesqueness, should also command a wider range of emotional expression. The field surveyed is attractive, but somewhat narrow like the so-called "quartal" harmony Bloch uses to a much wider extent than Vaughan Williams and his followers. Most interesting is the first movement, where sincerity gives warmth and intensity to a cunning plan; but the composer seems to adapt himself less graciously to the requirements of the third and second movements. And it is precisely in the second movement that a Beethoven or a Brahms probes the greatest depths.

It is rather significant that some critics in appraising the concerto should have found the general effect disappointing in spite of Szigeti's most admirable performance. That disappointment may have its root in the fact that the violin is rarely allowed to display its genius for lyrical expression. It is common today to look upon lyricism as undesirable and old-fashioned, but I know of no work which survived its age solely on account of rich color and ingenious design. It will be interesting to see how Bloch's clever concerto will stand the test of time.

207

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

MAR 17 1939

Young Harvard Graduate Probing Statues' Need At Symphony Concerts

BOSTON, March 17 (AP)—Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 39 years—or is he really earning his five-dollar "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether 14 plaster-of-Paris statues, placed in niches about Symphony Hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orchestra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, Brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxiteles, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed physicist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, "I have found nothing in presently available papers of Sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as 'safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings. He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statues—with and without drapes—just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make interesting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts a statue of "The Standing Anacreon," described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups."

INDEPENDENT
Skowhegan Me

MAR 16 1939

The Library Corner

Library hours: Every week day from 2 to 5:30 and from 7 to 8:30
Open until 9 on Saturdays
Closed Friday evenings

Are you going to the New York World's Fair?

You will find interesting information in regard to this event at the Public Library. The New York Times published a special supplement as part of its regular edition of Sunday, March 5. It is one of the most fascinating and informative publications issued in connection with this great attraction for this year. "The World of Tomorrow" is the theme of the Fair. Headed by H. G. Wells, the noted British author, who writes the lead article about the world of tomorrow, many oustanding men and women have contributed articles. Among them are Henry Fordon, "Machines as Ministers to Men"; Frances Perkins, "Labor"; Henry A. Wallace, "Agriculture"; James Truslow Adams, "America's Beginnings"; Gelett Burgess, "Amusements"; Brooks Atkinson, "New Horizons in the Theatre"; Oscar Tschirky, "Eating One's Way Around the World"; Dr. Henry E. Fosdick, "Religion and the New Age"; Dr. Thomas Parran, "Toward a Healthier Race"; Robert Hutchins, "Education for Life"; Dorothy Canfield Fisher, "Making an Art of Living"; Sergei Koussevitzky, "Symphony of a New Age"; Dr. Arthur Compson, "The Promise of Science".

If you read these articles you will have a splendid idea of "The World of Tomorrow as the Experts View It."

This magazine may be borrowed from your library and there are also other interesting pamphlets on the Fair. The World's Fair Supplement may be purchased from the New York Times for fifteen cents, if you want to own a copy.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

MAR 18 1939

HAS APOLLO BELVEDERE BEEN A GATE CRASHER

Perhaps Statues at Symphony Hall In Boston Really Help Acoustics.

BOSTON, March 18—(AP)—Has Apollo Belvedere been a gate crasher at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past years—or is he really earning his five-dollar "seat"?

That was the question a young investigator posed for himself today as he began research on whether fourteen plaster-of-paris statues, placed in nicehs about Symphony Hall, really contribute to the acoustical excellence of the often-described "Stradivarius" of the world's concert halls.

William Judd, Harvard graduate son of George Judd, manager of the orcehstra, said he believes the placing of statues of Apollo, Diana of Versailles, brooding Sophocles, the Faun of Proxitells, and others, may have been part of the design of Harvard's famed phycist, Wallace Element Sabine, who designed the hall acoustically and made it a model of perfection.

And yet—

"So far," Judd said, " I have found nothing in presently available papers of sabine mentioning the specific role of the statues themselves. We do know, however, that the niches in which they rest were designedly made as "safety valves' for the absorption of undesirable sound in Sabine's plan.

"My strongest clue toward their possible value acoustically lies in the fact that Sabine, in his experiments, brought into account the absorption effect of paintings on canvas, the presence of decorative plants, and even the acoustical phenomena traceable to the attire of human beings He was perhaps the first scientist to recognize that clothes can be 'loud' without being gaudy."

Young Judd began his scientific check-up on the statues—with and without drapes--just by accident. Originally, he started probing their artistic history in order to make interesting program notes to amuse symphony-goers between numbers of a concert.

He found, for example, that this center of Boston culture boasts, a statue of "The Standing Anacreon" described as "suggesting a man singing in his cups"

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAR 18 1939

Prokofieff Opus Named To Succeed Snow White

"Peter and the Wolf" Just Right, Suggests Dr. Koussevitzky, for Children and Adults

(John D. Beaufort, Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor)

If Walt Disney is looking for some new nursery characters with which to charm the grown-ups, then Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and himself a Disney fan, suggests Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

"You see, I attend all the principal Disney films," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "Now that 'Ferdinand the Bull' has had his day, I nominate 'Peter and the Wolf' as the successor, a story for children that adults will take to their hearts."

If one were seeking so solemn a thing, as a trend, he might well contemplate Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion. "Ferdinand the Bull," written and drawn for children, suffered the same fate as little Marmaduke's electric train. It was taken up whole-heartedly by the grown-ups of the family. Radio Pictures must have made at least part of the $8,000,000. gross it claims for "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" on parents making repeat visits—"just so Willie can see it again"—to the Disney fantasy.

To return to the most immediate instance of the trend, the Russian composer's amusing musical fantasy has been enjoying a phenomenal success lately. It was revived for the Pension Fund concerts in Boston and New York after being introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony on March 25, 1938, with the composer conducting.

Not only was it a great success at the Pension Fund "Concert Extraordinaire" in Boston but the sometime skeptical New York took Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, Peter's grandfather and even the wolf to its collective heart. Critics accounted "Peter and the Wolf" one of the high points in the orchestra's two pension fund concerts there.

Quite an exciting life for such a small boy as Peter, but Symphony officials assure us that he thrives on it.

The story behind the story of Peter's American success is almost as amusing as the tale itself. It seems that Mr. Prokofieff introduced "Peter" to Boston in a bit of a huff. Bostonians, he complained, had not taken to his Fourth Symphony. So when he came to Boston to conduct, last year, Mr. Prokofieff announced that he was bringing with him something that children—and Bostonians—could comprehend.

Boston turned the barb deftly. It enjoyed "Peter and the Wolf." It said: "No, Mr. Prokofieff, this is not child's stuff at all. We enjoyed it hugely therefore it must have adult appeal even if you did write it for children."

For those who have not yet heard "Peter and the Wolf," one should perhaps explain that it is about a small boy who, with the help of his friend the bird, captures a fierce wolf. The wolf swallowed the duck, but, "if one would listen very carefully, he could hear the duck quacking in the wolf's belly, because the wolf in his hurry had swallowed her alive."

Well, Mr. Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony, Mr. Hale, Peter, the cat, the bird, the duck, the grandfather and the wolf have all done their part.

The next move is up to Mr. Disney.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

MAR 19 1939

Berkshire Festival Calls Koussevitzky, Symphony

The sixth annual Berkshire symphonic festival will be held between Aug. 3 and 13 at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston symphony in programs drawn from the second and third Beethoven symphonies, the first and third of Brahms, symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, Tschaikovsky's fourth, the Sibelius second and fifth, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," Debussy's "Apres-midi d'un Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," Wagnerian excerpts, Walter Piston's "Concerto for Orchestra."

Others will be announced later.

'Information, Please' and 'Magic Key' Broadcasts Are Pleasing, Reporter Asserts

Advocate - La. Feb. 24/39

Moe Berg to Join Fadiman's Battery Tonight in Regular Weekly Program Available Here.

By Harris Jackson
(Staff Correspondent)

Gieseking Superior.

Gieseking, renowned as the greatest interpreter of Debussy's piano music, played the third piano concert of Rachmaninoff with the Philharmonic in a manner which Olin Downes of the Times considered superior to the interpretation given by the composer himself and in a manner which the packed house enjoyed to the full. His superb technique and his magnificent concept of the work enables him, with the expert assistance of Conductor John Barbirolli, to bring out all of the vitality, tunefulness and thoughtful beauty of the score.

But it remained for the Boston Symphony, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to give the New York musical public one of the most enjoyable evenings of the season. The curtains parted at Carnegie one recent Saturday night and displayed a seventeenth century drawing room, lit by candlelight, and with the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky dressed in costumes and wigs of the period.

Then, from a spinet, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Haydn "Farewell" symphony, a performance in which the costume, the candlelight and the gradual disappearance from the stage of all the musicians took nothing from the assured brilliance of the reading of the music.

After this, the curtains parted again on a small group of the musicians, clad as night club players. With Colin O'More as tenor soloist and Richard Burgin conducting, they triumphed completely over the tiresome and unmusical setting which Louis Gruenberg has given Vachel Lindsay's poem, "The Daniel Jazz."

"Peter and the Wolf."

The success of the evening, however, was the performance of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," narrated by Richard Hale and accompanied superbly by the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky (without costume and wigs this time). This work, "a fairy tale for children," was fully enjoyed for its humor as well as its quite satire on program music.

And to bring the evening to a melodious close, the orchestra was heard in four waltzes, the "Wiener Blut" and "Voices of Spring" of Johann Strauss, the Sibelisu "Valse Triste" (and what a beautiful reading the Bostonians gave that overworked number), and Ravel's "La Valse." Everyone had a good time.

ADVOCATE
Arlington Mass

MAR 23 1939

Will Give Unique Candlelight Program For Heights Organ Fund

A unique Candlelight Musical Program has been planned for Friday, March 31, by the Arlington Heights Baptist church, when Miss Norma Olson, noted 'cello soloist, will be featured in a service of inspiration and devotion for the organ fund.

The morning choir of the church, under the direction of Mrs. Ruth Woodworth, with Mrs. Willa A. Moody at the organ, will be heard in a series of solos, duets, trios and anthems, centered in the theme, "The Cross of Christ." The pastor of the church, the Rev. Walter E. Bridge, will conduct the devotional service.

Miss Norma Olson has studied under the famous Alfred Zighera of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and her appearance in the Heights Baptist church is eagerly awaited. The love offering at the close of the service will be for the New Organ Fund. All seats are free for this Candlelight service, and the public is cordially invited to attend. The service is scheduled for 8:00 p. m.

BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

MAR 24 1939

PRIVATE concerts at a Boston physician's home led to the organization of the Boston Doctors' Symphony orchestra, whose first rehearsal was held recently at the Hampton Court hotel in Brookline, Mass.

More than 50 music-minded medicos temporarily abandoned their stethoscopes and scalpels to give themselves over to the baton-waving of Conductor Nicholas Slonimsky, music authority and composer who came to America from Russia about 15 years ago as secretary to Serge Koussevitcky, Boston Symphony

HEES
FULL CREAM

NEW BLOCH CONCERTO

N.Y. Times - March 26/39

By F. BONAVIA

LONDON.

ALTHOUGH modern composers have contributed their full quota to the existing concertos for the violin, the really successful works of this class can still be counted on the fingers of one hand. The fact accounts in part for the exceptionally friendly reception of Ernest Bloch's violin concerto at its introduction to this country by Joseph Szigeti and the Philharmonic Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham at the last concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society.

There is no questioning Bloch's very substantial merit. Compared with most concertos of recent times his work shines like a moon among the lesser stars. While so many fumble uneasily without knowing exactly in what direction their search is taking them, Bloch presents us with a style that is mature and his own; he knows not only what he wants to do but how and where to get it. The orchestra he employs is large, yet at no time is one aware of any disproportion between its might and the thin, small voice of the solo violin.

The technical achievement is brilliant in the extreme and other valuable qualities add to its merit: vitality, wisdom in the disposition of climaxes, a rare flair for effects of color and, above all, the sincere feeling for dramatic expression which the concerto shares with all the other compositions of Bloch known to us. There are no obvious deficiencies and no tricks meant to distract attention from poverty of ideas. In all these respects the concerto is masterly and has actually been hailed as a masterpiece.

I would rather define it the work of a master craftsman. A masterpiece, while sharing its geniality, earnestness, picturesqueness, should also command a wider range of emotional expression. The field surveyed is attractive, but somewhat narrow like the so-called "quartal" harmony Bloch uses to a much wider extent than Vaughan Williams and his followers. Most interesting is the first movement, where sincerity gives warmth and intensity to a cunning plan; but the composer seems to adapt himself less graciously to the requirements of the third and second movements. And it is precisely in the second movement that a Beethoven or a Brahms probes the greatest depths.

It is rather significant that some critics in appraising the concerto should have found the general effect disappointing in spite of Szigeti's most admirable performance. That disappointment may have its root in the fact that the violin is rarely allowed to display its genius for lyrical expression. It is common today to look upon lyricism as undesirable and old-fashioned, but I know of no work which survived its age solely on account of rich color and ingenious design. It will be interesting to see how Bloch's clever concerto will stand the test of time.

208

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

MAR 25 1939

Records: News and Reviews

Gieseking Records the "Waldstein" Sonata —Haydn by the "New Friends"

Aaron Copland's colorful "El Salon Mexico," which has been played here by the NBC Symphony and the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, is presented by the latter orchestra and conductor in a two-record Victor album. The piece takes Mexico City's Salon Mexico as a subject, and, with the aid of Mexican folk tunes, the Copland imagination and instrumental precocity, makes musically merry with it. It is gay, not always refined, music, well played. If you don't like it, it's short; if you do, it's inexpensive.

The final side offers the Stravinsky arrangement for wind orchestra of the "Song of the Volga Boatman," which, rumor has it, had its origin nearer Mr. Copland's birthplace than Stravinsky's.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 25 1939

The Tchaikovsky symphony No. 4, in F minor, will end the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here a week [illegible] Tuesday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

The program:

Vaughan Williams . . . Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for Double String Orchestra.

Debussy
"Prelude a l'Apree-midi d'un Faune
(Eglogue de S. Mallarme)
Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun
(Eclogue by S. Mallarme)

Ravel
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem

Tchaikowsky
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op 36
I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato con anima in movimento di Valse
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

• • •

The Verdandi Male Chorus, conducted by Oscar Ekeberg, will give its spring concert tomorrow afternoon in Plantations auditorium. Elsbeth B. Ball, contralto, will be soloist.

TRANSCRIPT
Chestertown Md

MAR 25 1939

FAREWELL SYMPHONY

The presentation of Jan Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" at Boston's Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, dressed in the costumes of Haydn's period, recalls the Austrian musician's motive for its composition.

It was while Haydn was conductor of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra that he composed this beautiful orchestral work. A short time before its preparation Haydn asked for an extended vacation; but the Prince, expecting some important visitors, urged the conductor to cancel his plans temporarily. Haydn, undiscouraged, ingeniously repeated his request in musical form by so arranging the instrumentation of the last movement of the symphony that one by one the musicians in the orchestra would stop, pick up their instruments, blow out the candles on their stands, and walk out of play the last bar of the movement.

Needless to say, the "Farewell Cymphony" ganed the desired leave of absence for Jan Haydn.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAR 26 1939

Concerts at Boston Given in Profusion

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Works by John Alden Carpenter and Roy Harris With Success—Busch-Serkin Recital Pleases — Zighera Group in Final Program — Other Musical Events

BOSTON—Zlatko Balokovic, gifted Yugoslavian violinist, was soloist for the first time with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concerts of March 3 and 4, in the violin concerto by John Alden Carpenter (Boston premiere), reports Musical Courier. As it happened, these were also Mr Balokovic's first appearances here since his initial tour of the United States in 1925-'26.

The poise and finish of Mr Balokovic's playing stamped him an artist of feeling and intellectual power. His tone is rich, luminous and pure, and his technical equipment in general is that of a virtuoso. Mr Balokovic was received with utmost cordiality.

The Carpenter concerto is well written for the solo instrument; it is pleasant music, running its course of numerous climaxes in one long movement. A large orchestra, with added percussion, is required. There is abundant melody, and some jazzy touches of rhythm. Mr Carpenter was present and shared applause with Mr Balokovic and Dr Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted. The program otherwise included Schumann's fourth symphony, and Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," both magnificently performed.

The symphony concerts of the preceding week featured the world premiere of the third symphony by the American composer, Roy Harris. Written last fall, the symphony stands in one long movement that takes about 20 minutes to play. In a program note, Mr Harris disclosed that the work consists of five sections. If no great masterpiece, the third symphony does show indubitable originality, and represents an increasing mastery of orchestration. Mr Harris attended the performances. Under Dr Koussevitzky's devoted care, the symphony appeared to receive impeccable readings. Dr Koussevitzky also achieved, at these concerts, superlative recreations of the seventh symphony (Beethoven) and Stravinsky's suite, "The Fire-Bird."

Myra Hess, who had been soloist in the Beethoven C-minor piano concerto at the symphony concerts February 17 and 18, played with her accustomed finesse and poetry the Schumann concerto at the supplementary concerts February 20 and 21.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 25 1939

SEASON'S LAST CONCERT BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Koussevitzky to Direct Fifth of Symphony Series at Academy Friday Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fifth and last Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday evening, at 8:30 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Included on its program will be Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120; Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune," (Eclogue by S. Mallarme); Ravel's "La Valse," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (Pianoforte Pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.)

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn Committee.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
Brooklyn

MAR 26 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HEARD FRIDAY

Dr. Koussevitzky to Conduct Final Concert of Series at the Academy

ADELPHI PLANS OPERETTA

Students to Present 'Patience' Friday—Choral Club of St. John's to Appear

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directing, will give a concert Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It will be the final concert of the Brooklyn series of five this season, under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

The program will include Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120; Debussy's Prélude à l'Aprés-Midi d'un Faune; Ravel's La Valse and Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt and Mrs. Benjamin Prince will be hostesses in the boxes. Box holders will include Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward, the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy, the Brooklyn Women's Club, Miss Frances C. Hays, Mrs. James Maclay and Miss Mary Eleanore Mills.

The committee chairmen this season included Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William G. James Jr. and Mrs. Thomas F. Casey.

Operetta at Adelphi

The Glee Club of Adelphi Academy, 282 Lafayette Avenue, Brooklyn, will present the Gilbert and Sullivan operetta, "Patience," Friday night at the school, it was announced yesterday by Miss Winifred Marshall, director of the dramatics department.

Principals will be Roy Kimmel, Dudley Du Cret, Fred Klinck, Robert Schirmer, Robert McQueen, Elaine Alt, Betty Dean, Minette Heusel, Ruth Theis, Norma Johnson, Barbara Peck, Marion Adams, Lois Lieder, Phyllis Gierie and Jean Davis.

Other participants will be Warren Alt, Hope Arundel, Philip Atiyeh, John Avery, Jean Barnes, Evelyn Benson, Gladys Bracewell, Elizabeth Callaghan, Roseanna Freeman.

Also Victorine Foster, Mary Foster, Dorothy Fuhrer, Henry George, Phyllis Gierie, Stuart Gordon, Alfred Guidet, Norma Johnson, Janet Kennedy, Roy Kimmel, Frederick Klinck, Ann Kramer, Robert Kremer.

Also Herbert Kutscher, Jane Lockitt, Mary Pat O'Connor, Marjorie O'Shaughnessy, Marion Putnam, Virginia Riley, Camille Sileo, Carol Siff, Marion Strohman, Russell Tilley, John Watt, Nan Wilkinson, Inslee Wray, Nancy Johnson William Roeder and Robert Makla.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 27 1939

Boston Symphony To Close Season

Final Concert Will Take Place on Friday; Box Holders Are Announced

The final concert of the current season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be held Friday evening at the Academy of Music. Entertaining in the boxes at this fifth concert of the 53d season will be Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward, wife of Rear Admiral Woodward, Commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard; Mrs. Edward C. Blum, who has served as chairman of boxes during the season; Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt and Mrs. Benjamin Prince, all members of the Brooklyn Committee. Other boxholders will be the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Miss Frances C. Hays, Mrs. James Maclay and Miss Mary Eleanor Mills.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will present the following program: Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120; De Bussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (Eclogue by S. Mallarme); Ravel's "La Valse" and Moussorgsky's Picture at an Exhibition (Pianoforte Pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel).

The annual series of five philharmonic concerts is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Science, James G. McDonald president; Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Huntington Woodman president, and the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman. Assisting Mrs. Davenport as committee chairmen have been Mrs. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of membership committee; Mrs. William G. James Jr., Junior League Committee chairman, and Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Regional Committee chairman.

OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
JOURNAL

MAR 27 1939

FAMOUS FRENCH WOMAN MUSICIAN TO VISIT NORTH

North Country music lovers await with interest the weekend of May 13 when Nadia Boulanger, world-renowned French musician, will visit Potsdam as lecturer and conductor.

Mlle. Boulanger will lecture on the topic "What is Freedom in Art?" on Saturday evening and on Sunday afternoon, May 14th, will direct the Crane Chorus and orchestra in a performance of Brahms German Requiem.

For the past several months Mlle. Boulanger has been lecturing and conducting in many sections of the east and midwest. She has been guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Philadelphia and Boston Symphonies and the National Symphony in Washington, D. C. She has also lectured in leading universities.

A representative group of North Country residents are acting as sponsors of the "Boulanger Weekend." All seats for both events will be reserved.

MISSOULA, MONT.
MISSOULIAN

MAR 26 1939

Philadelphia adds to its Thursday events an Italo-American Philharmonic concert and a performance in English of Puccini's tryptich of "The Cloak," "Sister Angelica," and "Gianni Schicchi." The Boston Symphony is in New York, Cellist Charles Krane in Hartford, Conn., Nino Martini in Toronto, Robert Casadesus in Butte, and the Mozart Boys' Choir in Honolulu. The Chicago Symphony has E. Power Briggs as soloist and the Racine, Wis., Symphony has Douglas Beattle. Soprano Meliza Korjus is with Meredith Willson's orchestra, and Pianist Rudolph Ganz with Bing Crosby's. Horowitz plays in Paris, France, before going on a Scandinavian tour.

BLOOMINGTON, IND.
EVENING WORLD

MAR 29 1939

Piano Recital To Be Given By Two Musicians

A two-piano recital will be given Monday evening (April 3) by Mlle. Nadia Boualnger, one of the most distinguished musicians of the present time, and M. Jean Francaix, one of Mlle. Boulanger's most gifted French pupils. The concert, which will be followed by an informal lecture about the music, will be at 8:30 in Recital Hall of the Music Building.

Mlle. Boulanger's activities have included the duties of teacher, conductor, organist, pianist and composer. She is the only woman to have conducted the London Philharmonic Symphony, the Boston Symphony, and the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestras. In 1938, the Board of Overseers of Harvard University passed a special ruling permitting Harvard students to enroll at Radcliffe College for the purpose of taking her courses.

For almost 20 years, Mlle. Boulwanger taught at the Fontainebleau School of Music. She has had many composers of various nationalities as her pupils. She made her first appearance in New York in the season of 1924-25 at a concert of the Symphony Society, in the old Aeolian Hall, under the direction of Walter Damrosch.

M. Francaix is in America this year for the first time, having made his debut at a special concert of the New York Philharmonic Society last month. He is both a composer and pianist. He is 27 years of age and became a pupil of Nadia Boulanger when he was ten, and his subsequent development as a creative and interpretative artist has proceeded under her care and sponsorship.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

MAR 25 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS LOCAL SERIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its last visit of the season to New York next week, playing at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon and at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening.

Thursday evening's concert will consist of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Fourth. Saturday afternoon, the program will open with the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina," commemorating the hundreth anniversary of the composer's birth, which fell on March 21 of this year, Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and the First Symphony of Brahms complete the program.

For the Brooklyn concert next Friday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged the following program: Schumann, Symhpony in D minor; Debusey, "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune"; Ravel, "La Valse," and Moussorgsky-Ravel; "Pictures at an Exhibition."

ANNAPOLIS, MD.
CAPITAL

MAR 28 1939

LECTURE ON LOGIC AT ST. JOHN'S

A new program lecture on Logic will be given by Herbert Schwartz in the Great Hall of St. John's College at 8 P. M. Wednesday.

The following recorded programs will be given next week in the Great Hall:

Monday: Tschaikowsky — Symphony No. 4 in F Minor. Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR 28 1939

Edmans Resign Offices With Festival

Will Remain as Trustees—Drainage Plan Approved

The resignations of George W. Edman as publicity director and Mrs. Edman as executive vice-president and chairman of the advisory committee were submitted at a special meeting of trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at the office in Stockbridge yesterday afternoon. The resignations were referred to the executive committee. Both Mr. and Mrs. Edman have been closely associated with the Festival from its beginning, and asked to be relieved. They will remain as trustees.

Miss Alice Riggs, in charge of arrangements for the Layman's Music Course in several Berkshire public schools, reported that children have received the course with great enthusiasm. Adults are being admitted in a number of schools where the seating capacity permits. Additional schools have requested the course. Miss Harriet Johnson of New York conducts the course.

The president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, reported a steady flow of inquiries for the concerts to be given at Tanglewood this summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Joseph Franz, Festival trustee-engineer, presented plans for draining the large parking area at Tanglewood and the board appropriated funds so that work might commence as soon as possible this spring. Some painting and minor repair work will also be done to the shed.

The trustees voted unanimously to take a page in The Eagle's forthcoming anniversary edition.

MORRISTOWN, N. J.
DAILY RECORD

MAR 29 1939

PERSONALITIES IN MUSIC

By Daniel I. McNamara

WHEN Vladimir Dukelsky, Russian-American composer of symphonies, ballets and other types of music in the larger forms, develops an appetite for caviar, he consults Vernon Duke, popular songwriter, confident of a friendly hearing. For Dukelsky and Duke are the same person! One writes for Carnegie Hall and glory; the other writes for Tin Pan Alley and cash.

Duke's compositions, under his American name and his Russian designation, constitute important lists in the records of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, for Duke's becoming an American citizen made him eligible to its membership. Here he rubs elbows with creators of all kinds of successful music, from symphony to swing, who, like Duke, use the Society's machinery to protect their performing rights from unlicensed public performance for profit.

Performances of symphonic works usually are costly, not profitable, to the composer. Duke meets such situations with income from his popular music. Vladimir Dukelsky's expenses in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performances of his widely acclaimed "Dedicaces" in Boston and New York during the recent holiday season were met by Vernon Duke's profit from such songs as, "April in Paris," "This Is Romance," "I Can't Get Started," "What Is There To Say?", "I Like The Likes of You," and many others.

Duke was born Vladimir Dukelsky at Pskoff, Russia, October 10, 1903. A child prodigy in music, he was educated at Kiev Conservatory. His family left Russia in 1920, and he ranged through Europe earning a haphazard living as a pianist. His first American visit in 1922, brought a variety of employment, including piano playing in a burlesque theatre and writing music for a magician's act. Back in Europe in 1924, he wrote successful ballets for Diaglieff, famous impresario of the Russian ballet, and then began writing popular music for the London stage. He returned to America in 1929, worked in a motion picture studio in Long Island, and began writing for the New York stage. The last Garrick Gaieties show, 1930, included four of his songs. Then he wrote for "Three's a Crowd," "Americana," "Thumbs Up," and "The Show Is On."

Meanwhile Vladimir Dukelsky, subsidized by his alter ego, was giving expression to his artistic aspirations in two symphonies, a piano concerto; the oratorio, "The End of St. Petersburg"; ballets, suites for piano, quartets and other works quite apart from the music of Vernon Duke.

Slender, tall, dark haired, of distinguished mien, Duke speaks Russian, French, German and English. He rails at Wagnerians, takes Beethoven in homeopathic doses. His favorites are, among the modernists, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Hindemith, and among the classicists, Bach, Mozart and Debussy. Often he works well into the night in his studio, near his midtown apartment in New York City. A water enthusiast, he is fond of outdoor recreations, and usually spends long weekends in the country. Here he gets inspiration for his dual musical personality.

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN

MAR 31 1939

Many Neighboring Communities Subscribe To Concert Fund

Everyone at headquarters of the Cooperative Concerts Association was in optimistic mood this morning. The first official count of subscriptions was made yesterday afternoon—and the result was far ahead of last year at the same time. And this cheering response in spite of the fact that many workers were not able to be present and turn in their subscriptions.

Particularly gratifying are the returns from Wakefield and Narragansett; Hope Valley is yet to be heard from; Stonington and Mystic are doing well and North Stonington went over the top in a big way.

Dr. John E. Ruisi won the prize for bringing in the most subscriptions—a year's subscription to Musical America.

The bonus of one subscription for every 15 subscriptions brought in is stirring up enthusiasm among the workers.

The response of business men is quick and liberal this year, many of them having accepted the Cooperative Concert Course as a good business proposition for the town.

The Lions Club, the Quota Club and the Music Club are, as usual, buying students' tickets for quite a number of young people who could not otherwise attend.

Mrs. Thomas Perry, Mrs. Arthur M. Cottrell, Jr., Mrs. Charles H. Cowan and Ralph Lycett, New York representative of the Cooperative Concerts, will be in charge at Headquarters at the Westerly Furniture Company today and tomorrow and are anticipating busy days for the final rush.

Mrs. Raymond Dowd has been added to the team of Mrs. Leo C. Gaffney.

The final recount will take place on Saturday night at 9 o'clock. And again referring to the "Grand Prize" for the greatest number of tickets sold throughout the campaign—two tickets to the Nelson Eddy concert to be given at Symphony Hall, Boston, on April 10th . . . the number of those tickets are W-5 and W-6 . . . about half way back—and they sound as though they were right off the center aisle.

The committee who will select the artists is headed by Dr. John E. Ruisi. The meeting will be held at the home of Mrs. Thomas Perry on Sunday afternoon at 2:30. The prospects are that Westerly will have an even finer course than this year—and that is saying a great deal.

The three artists appearing this season were not only great musicians—but among the most popular artists of today.

James Melton drew the largest concert audience ever to assemble in Toronto when he sang there with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. As leading tenor with the Cincinnati Summer Opera last summer, his performances drew the most crowded houses. He is re-engaged for this summer.

One of the most popular and delightful foreign films in New York this winter was the Mozart Boys' Choir in Vienna. The original run was extended week after week. These were the same choir boys Westerly heard in person—and film audiences heard the boys in practically the same program Westerly heard—woven into a film story.

Gregor Piatigorsky is the greatest cellist of the age, according to all reviews—and Westerly music lovers will now gladly confirm that. Closing his season in Brockton last night, Mr. Piatigorsky will now make records with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has just bought a beautiful estate on the Hudson and will soon be not only an American citizen—but an American resident.

Join today! Help the Cooperative Concerts go over the top. Subscribe with any of the captains of team workers—call at headquarters at the Westerly Furniture Company — or just telephone 2525.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

MAR 30 1939

Two Symphonies on Boston Symphony List

Special to The News.

NEW YORK, March 29.—Two symphonies will make up the program to be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky for the Carnegie Hall concert Thursday night. Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A, Opus 92, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Opus. 36, and the works to be played.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 31 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Final Concert Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fifth and last Brooklyn concert of the season this evening at 8:30 o'clock in the the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Included on its program will be Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120; Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," (Eclogue by S. Mallarme); Ravel's "La Valse" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition' (Pianoforte Pieces arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel.)

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arats and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn Committee,

---

N.Y. Tribune - March 26/39

THE ORCHESTRAS

In the tenth and last concert of this series, Wednesday night, April 26, Nicolai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale, for string quartet and orchestra, will be played for the first time here with the Coolidge Quartet, of which Mr. Berezowsky is second violinist, as the solo group. It was first played in Boston last October under Serge Koussevitzky, and will be played in Philadelphia April 21, 22 and 25.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give a conservative program for its last Thursday night concert of the season at Carnegie Hall March 30 consisting of Beethoven's seventh and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphonies.

In the final program of the series next Saturday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky will observe the 100th anniversary of Moussourgsky's birth with a performance of the prelude to his "Khovantchina." Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Brahm's first symphony will follow. The Bostonians' closing program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music also includes a Moussorgsky work, "Pictures at an Exhibition" in Ravel's transcription, with Schumann's fourth symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "La Valse."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Ridgewood Advocate

MAR 31 1939

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will give its fifth and last Brooklyn concert of the season tonight, at 8:30 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Included on its program will be Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120; Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune." (Eclogue by S. Mallarme); Ravel's La Valse," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (Pianoforte Pieces arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel).

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 31 1939

Made Patrons Of Finnish Concert

Mayor Bennett and Rev. Viljo Heiman, pastor of Finnish Lutheran Church, and Mrs. Heiman are among the honorary patrons of the American tour of the Finlandia Male Chorus, which will include a concert in Worcester Auditorium on May 3, and appearances at the New York World's Fair May 4-6.

The chorus will be directed by Prof. Heikki Klemetti, dean of Finland choral conductors and leader from 1898 to 1923 of the Helsinki University chorus during its tour last year, which included a Worcester concert.

The Finlandia Male chorus, which includes seventy singers, was organized in 1936 especially for the purpose of making an American tour, and to participate in the World's Fair. Singers were drawn from several choruses.

Many were picked from the Suomen Laulu, which Professor Klemetti helped organize in 1899. Others came from the Laulu-Miehet, organized in 1914 by former members of the Helsinki University chorus, and conducted in its early years by Professor Klemetti. The Muntra Musikanter, founded in 1878, whose director, Bengt Carlson is an associate conductor of Finlandia Chorus, also contributed a number of singers.

Among patrons of the tour in Finland is Jean Sibelius, the country's leading composer. Other honorary patrons in this country include Hjalmar J. Procope, minister of Finland in Washington, and other representatives of the Finnish government, Governor Saltonstall, Mayor Tobin of Boston and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra.

First concert of the tour will be in Carnegie Hall, New York City, April 21. The second will be in Symphony Hall, Boston, April 23. The schedule includes concerts in Montreal and Toronto, Canada; Detroit, Cleveland, Chicago, Chester, Pa., and Washington.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 31 1939

Bushnell Series Options Expiring

Subscribers to the Bushnell Concert Series have been reminded by the management of the Bushnell Memorial that their options to renew for the coming season their subscriptions for the seats which they now hold, or to apply for new seats, will expire tomorrow.

All subscribers who wish to remain on the series list, and have not already renewed, are urged to do so without fail before tomorrow night, because, beginning Monday, all seats not renewed for, will be made available to new applicants in the order in which such new applications were received.

To date, according to the Bushnell management, all but a few of the subscriptions for the course have been renewed, and it is expected that, again, only a limited number of tickets will become available for new subscribers.

The course for the coming year includes six symphony concerts, to be performed by the same five major orchestras which were so enthusiastically received this season. These are the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, Boston Symphony (twice), Cleveland Orchestra and National Symphony.

210

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

MAR 3 1 1939

Boston Symphony Heard in Program at Carnegie Hall

Koussevitzky Offers the Beethoven Seventh and Tchaikovsky Fourth

By EDWARD O'GORMAN

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were heard by a capacity audience in this season's fifth and last evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night. With an intermission between, the concert was concerned with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth, in F minor. The same conductor and orchestra will play their last local afternoon concert of the season at Carnegie Hall Saturday.

Last night's large audience may have been attracted to the hall by the fact that it was the last evening it could spend with the illustrious Boston Symphony this season, or by the list of popular symphonies, but hardly by the brilliance of the playing; for this brilliance was not of the every day order, and of a quality that could not have been anticipated, even considering the habit and reputation of the Boston orchestra along that line.

To achieve the utmost emotional and personal expression from an orchestra of a hundred men, a conductor has invariably to cease his antics with the baton and give the orchestra its head. With a well-practiced orchestra like the Boston the results are generally happy, with others, catastrophic. However, last night's playing fell from technical grace on several obscure occasions: The opening of the Beethoven Symphony, for instance, had a tendency to hurry ahead of the baton, and its Scherzo to fall behind.

With a scant fifteen minutes' rest, the orchestra was again prepared to take the audience, as it had already done for thirty-five minutes, by storm.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky is always something to write home about, whether you like it or not, and last night's Fourth Symphony was as good Tchaikovsky, as good Koussevitzky, as good Boston Symphony, and as good material for an ovation as could have been prepared in a season of rehearsals. Music that had been written from the heart was conducted from the heart, and those among the audience who cared to admit that they had hearts that could be wooed by sentimental music or stirred by dramatic, gave the conductor and orchestra a hand that threatened to last till they came back for their Saturday concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

2 Symphonies Given by Boston Orchestra

March 31/39

By PITTS SANBORN.

A huge audience listened in Carnegie Hall last evening to the season's final Thursday concert of its annual New York series, listened and applauded to the echo.

For this partial valedictory Serge Koussevitzky chose a program made up of two symphonies, Beethoven's Seventh and Tschaikowsky's Fourth, both eminently familiar, but not obviously related one to the other.

The orchestra seemed, if possible, more of a virtuoso instrument than ever, and its performance of the Beethoven symphony was truly exciting.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth—the most Russian, some believe, of his chief symphonic works—enjoyed a searching reading by Mr. Koussevitzky. All of its Slavic melancholy, all of its barbaric splendor were divulged.

If at times the orchestra was spurred to the danger point, what of it! There are circumstances in which peril ceases to exist. You can afford to play Mazeppa when the steed you bestride is the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

At the orchestra's matinee in Carnegie Hall tomorrow Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and the First Symphony of Brahms.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

APR 1 - 1939

RECORDED MUSIC

By DISCOPHILE

CAFE MUSIC

A lively modern work in Victor's newest release is Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" played by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Koussevitzky (M-546).

Here the composer builds up an exciting sophisticated suite out of Mexico cafe tunes and rhythms. It is bright, colorful, sensuous and the Boston ensemble gives it the usual expert treatment which has made this orchestra famous for modern music. On the odd side is that most curious of all "Volga Boatman" arrangements, by Stravinsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 31 1939

Bostonians End Evening Series

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikowsky.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

The fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony's evening series, given in Carnegie Hall last night, was productive of much brilliant playing, distinguished by the highest technical polish. There was commensurate enthusiasm on the part of an audience eager to make known its approval of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's vital and stimulating performances.

A hearty demonstration at the end of the program served as the season's farewell for the evening subscribers. On Saturday will come the orchestra's parting with the afternoon patrons. These are not occasions for deep melancholy. Dr. Koussevitzky has been bowing his adieus in Carnegie Hall for fifteen years. He and his famous ensemble will return next season.

Two symphonies supplied the sinews of last night's program—the seventh of Beethoven and the fourth of Tchaikowsky. Both have been warhorses for Koussevitzky, as they have been for many another conductor. Their juxtaposition on this occasion was cause for the recrudescence of some old arguments among those who may be a little too ready to pigeon-hole interpreters, according them their special gifts in this or that direction and denying them an equal pre-eminence in others. Needless to say, the cataloguers do not always agree.

A Question of Ensemble Tone.

For this reviewer the Tchaikowsky was the more personal and distinctive of last night's two virtuoso performances. Different ears report differently on the same sonorities. What may seem overlush to one listener is even a little granitic to another. Consequently, to note that there was something excessively brittle about the sharp fortissimo passages of the Beethoven work, as played, is to invite contradiction from those who may have heard quite otherwise. About the clarity, the animation, the unity, the balance and the expertness of the ensemble there could have been little ground for quibbling. If it remained possible to prefer Mr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikowsky to his Beethoven, this was largely a matter of orchestral tone.

The Boston conductor seemingly summoned their utmost from his players in his tremendously energized performance of the Russian symphony. His brass choir was stirringly responsive, and strings, woodwinds and percussion were similarly alive. Under the same conductor, to be sure, the Bostonians had played here the same symphony in the same way on other occasions. But even the Stravinsky "Sacre" (on Saturday's program) becomes a routine experience in time, and if it is Tchaikowsky that is relied on to quicken a sluggish pulse, this is the way to have it played.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 3 1 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky Programs Two Symphonies As Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Final Thursday Evening Concert of Season

Conservatism took hold of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it presented a two-symphony program in Carnegie Hall last night. Both Beethoven's Seventh and Tchaikowsky's Fourth had been heard during the season in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's conception of the Beethoven Seventh is such that the interpretation last night closely resembled the one heard here three weeks ago. It was a finely spun, finely textured performance, done with a precision and a finesse that bespoke all the admirable qualities of this orchestra. The double basses, by the way, were stunning. But the same reservations crept into the mind of the listener in matters of tempo and the ultimate feeling to be experienced in hearing this music. The allegretto in its measured pace lacked the true flavor of the music; the throbbing music of the finale for all its stirring effect did not quite convey the exultation of the score.

Quite different was the Tchaikowsky. When he gave it here two concerts ago the impression was one of restraint. Last night it suffered from no restrictions. There was a flair and an abandon in this performance that swept it on to a magnificent finale. This music, in the blood of the conductor, had a momentum last night that restored its freshness and brought back the old appeal that made Tchaikowsky so widely favored not so many years ago. Its intensity was strengthened by the famous Boston brasses with the result that the audience cheered at the end from sheer excitement.

The concert at the Academy of Music tonight marks the last for this season in Brooklyn.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

MAR 3 1 1939

Bostonians Play Two Favorites

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its re-appearance in the metropolis last evening and devoted its concert in Carnegie Hall to two symphonies that have long stood the test of popularity. The program, a fair contrast in matter and style, consisted of Beethoven's Seventh and Tschaikovsky's Fourth. The first was introduced a matter of a century and a quarter ago. The second had its premiere in 1878. Evidently Conductor Serge Koussevitzky considered his public had had enough new music for the time and judging from the audience's absorbed interest in the performance and the generous applause that followed each number, his guess was correct.

The orchestra from Massachusetts may rightly acknowledge few competitors and no superior. The interpretation of the Beethoven work was a model of prime musicianship from every section of the band. From the first tremendous chord proclaimed with so faultless an attack that it sounded like a single glorified instrument, to the Finale with its lively suggestion of an Irish tune, the reading was one of extraordinary beauty, the warp and woof of its texture woven with a true sense of melodic design and balanced harmonization.

The Tschaikovsky Symphony with its generous borrowings from Russian folk tunes, utilized in pages expressing the composer's dolorous, despairing mental attitude, with occasional relief in capricious episodes, was revealed with sympathy, virility and impressiveness.

The Bostonians' current concert series will terminate with tomorrow afternoon's program when Mousorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Brahms' First Symphony will be presented.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

MAR 31 1939

2 Symphonies Conducted by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Program Here Contains Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works

Serge Koussevitzky, whose programs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Carnegie Hall visits may nearly always be depended upon to include some work by a contemporary composer, either one wholly new or at least one seldom heard, joined the arch-conservatives last night. At the fifth and final concert of the organization's evening series, it chose to perform two of the most familiar symphonies — the Seventh of Beethoven, and the Fourth of Tchaikovsky. That this procedure pleased the patrons of the orchestra was obvious. Every available seat was occupied, and the audience, which included standees, was unstinting with its expressions of approval.

The interpretations accorded these two symphonies furthered convictions long held that while Mr. Koussevitzky admires the genius of Beethoven, he brings profound affection, as well as deep understanding, to his conveyances of the Russian master's creations.

For, despite the implacably rhythmic and technically authoritative disclosure of the first, third and fourth movements of the Beethoven A major symphony, the Dionysiac spirit of the music was not imparted and the melancholy allegretto movetoo objectively set forth.
ment was too objective set forth.
Tchaikovsky F minor Symphony. The impassioned, intensely dramatic first movement, the nostalgically tinged andantino, the fleet scherzo and the flamboyantly theatrical finale all appeal strongly to Mr. Koussevitzky and he conducted throughout with fiery intensity, eliciting striking tonal effects from his musicians. J. D. B.

WAYNESBORO, VA.
NEWS VIRGINIAN

MAR 3 1 1939

STUDENTS HISS CONDUCTOR AND HE MERELY GRINS

BOSTON.—The "unheard of" has happened. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra conductor, has been hissed—by students. But it was all in fun.

Apparently disturbed by the presence of spectators at a rehearsal of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in which Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs were participating, the maestro let it be known during intermission that friends of the singers would be barred from future rehearsals.

A wave of hisses greeted the announcement. But Koussevitzky grinned and the rehearsal was resumed.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

APR 2 - 1939

Sergei Prokofieff, the Russian composer, has supplied the music of the current film at the Sonotone theater, "Alexander Nevsky." The picture is a directorial effort of another famous Russian, Eisenstein, and has little dialog, using sound effects and an elaborate symphonic score to accompany the action. Music from Prokofieff's other effort in this field, "Le Lieutenant Kijé," has been arranged in suite form for concert performance, and is recorded by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky.

REPORTER

Foxboro Mass

APR 1 - 1939

—I—I—I—

Youth Symphony Concert

Last Wednesday afternoon a group of forty-seven school children and parents drove in to Symphony Hall, Boston, for the second of a series of three Youth Concerts. Seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Wheeler Beckett conducting, rendered a program of unusual depth and brilliance that captivated a capacity audience, including Conductor Serge Koussevitsky, who was sitting in the first balcony.

Acknowledgements of support which made attendance and interest in these concerts a success, included the name of Mr Frederic W. Kempf, Supervisor of Music in the Foxboro schools. Mr Kempf was assisted locally by a committee consisting of Mrs Catharine C. Richardson, Mrs Elva L. Martin, and Mrs Louise P. Inman. Mrs Helen B. Fuller deserves thanks for opening her home to this group last Sunday afternoon, when a "prevue" of this entire program was given by Mr Kempf.

The final concert of this series will be held on Wednesday afternoon, April 12, and the same group will attend. If further tickets can be secured, still more music lovers will be able to attend.

210

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 31 1939

Boston Symphony Heard in Program at Carnegie Hall

Koussevitzky Offers the Beethoven Seventh and Tchaikovsky Fourth

By EDWARD O'GORMAN

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were heard by a capacity audience in this season's fifth and last evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night. With an intermission between, the concert was concerned with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth, in F minor. The same conductor and orchestra will play their last local afternoon concert of the season at Carnegie Hall Saturday.

Last night's large audience may have been attracted to the hall by the fact that it was the last evening it could spend with the illustrious Boston Symphony this season, or by the list of popular symphonies, but hardly by the brilliance of the playing; for this brilliance was not of the every day order, and of a quality that could not have been anticipated, even considering the habit and reputation of the Boston orchestra along that line.

To achieve the utmost emotional and personal expression from an orchestra of a hundred men, a conductor has invariably to cease his antics with the baton and give the orchestra its head. With a well-practiced orchestra like the Boston the results are generally happy, with others, catastrophic. However, last night's playing fell from technical grace on several obscure occasions: The opening of the Beethoven Symphony, for instance, had a tendency to hurry ahead of the baton, and its Scherzo to fall behind.

With a scant fifteen minutes' rest, the orchestra was again prepared to take the audience, as it had already done for thirty-five minutes, by storm.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky is always something to write home about, whether you like it or not, and last night's Fourth Symphony was as good Tchaikovsky, as good Koussevitzky, as good Boston Symphony, and as good material for an ovation as could have been prepared in a season of rehearsals. Music that had been written from the heart was conducted from the heart, and those among the audience who cared to admit that they had hearts that could be wooed by sentimental music or stirred by dramatic, gave the conductor and orchestra a hand that threatened to last till they came back for their Saturday concert.

WAYNESBORO, VA.
NEWS VIRGINIAN
MAR 31 1939

STUDENTS HISS CONDUCTOR AND HE MERELY GRINS

BOSTON.—The "unheard of" has happened. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra conductor, has been hissed—by students. But it was all in fun.

Apparently disturbed by the presence of spectators at a rehearsal of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in which Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs were participating, the maestro let it be known during intermission that friends of the singers would be barred from future rehearsals.

A wave of hisses greeted the announcement. But Koussevitzky grinned and the rehearsal was resumed.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
APR 2 - 1939

Sergei Prokofieff, the Russian composer, has supplied the music of the current film at the Sonotone theater, "Alexander Nevsky." The picture is a directorial effort of another famous Russian, Eisenstein, and has little dialog, using sound effects and an elaborate symphonic score to accompany the action. Music from Prokofieff's other effort in this field, "Lieutenant Kijé," has been arranged in suite form for concert performance, and is recorded by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

2 Symphonies Given by Boston Orchestra

March 31/39

By PITTS SANBORN.

A huge audience listened in Carnegie Hall last evening to the season's final Thursday concert of its annual New York series, listened and applauded to the echo.

For this partial valedictory Serge Koussevitzky chose a program made up of two symphonies, Beethoven's Seventh and Tschaikowsky's Fourth, both eminently familiar, but not obviously related one to the other.

The orchestra seemed, if possible, more of a virtuoso instrument than ever, and its performance of the Beethoven symphony was truly exciting.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth—the most Russian, some believe, of his chief symphonic works—enjoyed a searching reading by Mr. Koussevitzky. All of its Slavic melancholy, all of its barbaric splendor were divulged.

If at times the orchestra was spurred to the danger point, what of it! There are circumstances in which peril ceases to exist. You can afford to play Mazeppa when the steed you bestride is the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

At the orchestra's matinee in Carnegie Hall tomorrow Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and the First Symphony of Brahms.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 31 1939

Bostonians End Evening Series

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikowsky.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

The fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony's evening series, given in Carnegie Hall last night, was productive of much brilliant playing, distinguished by the highest technical polish. There was commensurate enthusiasm on the part of an audience eager to make known its approval of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's vital and stimulating performances.

A hearty demonstration at the end of the program served as the season's farewell for the evening subscribers. On Saturday will come the orchestra's parting with the afternoon patrons. These are not occasions for deep melancholy. Dr. Koussevitzky has been bowing his adieus in Carnegie Hall for fifteen years. He and his famous ensemble will return next season.

Two symphonies supplied the sinews of last night's program—the seventh of Beethoven and the fourth of Tchaikowsky. Both have been warhorses for Koussevitzky, as they have been for many another conductor. Their juxtaposition on this occasion was cause for the recrudescence of some old arguments among those who may be a little too ready to pigeon-hole interpreters, according them their special gifts in this or that direction and denying them an equal pre-eminence in others. Needless to say, the cataloguers do not always agree.

A Question of Ensemble Tone.

For this reviewer the Tchaikowsky was the more personal and distinctive of last night's two virtuoso performances. Different ears report differently on the same sonorities. What may seem overlush to one listener is even a little granitic to another. Consequently, to note that there was something excessively brittle about the sharp fortissimo passages of the Beethoven work, as played, is to invite contradiction from those who may have heard quite otherwise. About the clarity, the animation, the unity, the balance and the expertness of the ensemble there could have been little ground for quibbling. If it remained possible to prefer Mr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikowsky to his Beethoven, this was largely a matter of orchestral tone.

The Boston conductor seemingly summoned their utmost from his players in his tremendously energized performance of the Russian symphony. His brass choir was stirringly responsive, and strings, woodwinds and percussion were similarly alive. Under the same conductor, to be sure, the Bostonians had played here the same symphony in the same way on other occasions. But even the Stravinsky "Sacre" (on Saturday's program) becomes a routine experience in time, and if it is Tchaikowsky that is relied on to quicken a sluggish pulse, this is the way to have it played.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
MAR 31 1939

Bostonians Play Two Favorites

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its re-appearance in the metropolis last evening and devoted its concert in Carnegie Hall to two symphonies that have long stood the test of popularity. The program, a fair contrast in matter and style, consisted of Beethoven's Seventh and Tschaikovsky's Fourth. The first was introduced a matter of a century and a quarter ago. The second had its premiere in 1878. Evidently Conductor Serge Koussevitzky considered his public had had enough new music for the time and judging from the audience's absorbed interest in the performance and the generous applause that followed each number, his guess was correct.

The orchestra from Massachusetts may rightly acknowledge few competitors and no superior. The interpretation of the Beethoven work was a model of prime musicianship from every section of the band. From the first tremendous chord proclaimed with so faultless an attack that it sounded like a single glorified instrument, to the Finale with its lively suggestion of an Irish tune, the reading was one of extraordinary beauty, the warp and woof of its texture woven with a true sense of melodic design and balanced harmonization.

The Tschaikovsky Symphony with its generous borrowings from Russian folk tunes, utilized in pages expressing the composer's dolorous, despairing mental attitude, with occasional relief in capricious episodes, was revealed with sympathy, virility and impressiveness.

The Bostonians' current concert series will terminate with tomorrow afternoon's program when Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Brahms' First Symphony will be presented.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
APR 1 - 1939

RECORDED MUSIC

By DISCOPHILE

CAFE MUSIC

A lively modern work in Victor's newest release is Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" played by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Koussevitzky (M-546).

Here the composer builds up an exciting sophisticated suite out of Mexico cafe tunes and rhythms. It is bright, colorful, sensuous and the Boston ensemble gives it the usual expert treatment which has made this orchestra famous for modern music. On the odd side is that most curious of all "Volga Boatman" arrangements, by Stravinsky.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 31 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky Programs Two Symphonies As Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Final Thursday Evening Concert of Season

Conservatism took hold of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it presented a two-symphony program in Carnegie Hall last night. Both Beethoven's Seventh and Tchaikowsky's Fourth had been heard during the season in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's conception of the Beethoven Seventh is such that the interpretation last night closely resembled the one heard here three weeks ago. It was a finely spun, finely textured performance, done with a precision and a finesse that bespoke all the admirable qualities of this orchestra. The double basses, by the way, were stunning. But the same reservations crept into the mind of the listener in matters of tempo and the ultimate feeling to be experienced in hearing this music. The allegretto in its measured pace lacked the true flavor of the music; the throbbing music of the finale for all its stirring effect did not quite convey the exultation of the score.

Quite different was the Tchaikowsky. When he gave it here two concerts ago the impression was one of restraint. Last night it suffered from no restrictions. There was a flair and an abandon in this performance that swept it on to a magnificent finale. This music, in the blood of the conductor, had a momentum last night that restored its freshness and brought back the old appeal that made Tchaikowsky so widely favored not so many years ago. Its intensity was strengthened by the famous Boston brasses with the result that the audience cheered at the end from sheer excitement.

The concert at the Academy of Music tonight marks the last for this season in Brooklyn.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 31 1939

2 Symphonies Conducted by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Program Here Contains Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works

Serge Koussevitzky, whose programs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Carnegie Hall visits may nearly always be depended upon to include some work by a contemporary composer, either one wholly new or at least one seldom heard, joined the arch-conservatives last night. At the fifth and final concert of the organization's evening series, it chose to perform two of the most familiar symphonies — the Seventh of Beethoven, and the Fourth of Tchaikovsky. That this procedure pleased the patrons of the orchestra was obvious. Every available seat was occupied, and the audience, which included standees, was unstinting with its expressions of approval.

The interpretations accorded these two symphonies furthered convictions long held that while Mr. Koussevitzky admires the genius of Beethoven, he brings profound affection, as well as deep understanding, to his conveyances of the Russian master's creations.

For, despite the implacably rhythmic and technically authoritative disclosure of the first, third and fourth movements of the Beethoven A major symphony, the Dionysiac spirit of the music was not imparted and the melancholy allegretto movetoo objectively set forth.
ment was too objective set forth.
Tchaikovsky F minor Symphony. The impassioned, intensely dramatic first movement, the nostalgically tinged andantino, the fleet scherzo and the flamboyantly theatrical finale all appeal strongly to Mr. Koussevitzky and he conducted throughout with fiery intensity, eliciting striking tonal effects from his musicians. J. D. B.

REPORTER
Foxboro Mass
APR 1 - 1939

Youth Symphony Concert

Last Wednesday afternoon a group of forty-seven school children and parents drove in to Symphony Hall, Boston, for the second of a series of three Youth Concerts. Seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Wheeler Beckett conducting, rendered a program of unusual depth and brilliance that captivated a capacity audience, including Conductor Serge Koussevitsky, who was sitting in the first balcony.

Acknowledgements of support which made attendance and interest in these concerts a success, included the name of Mr Frederic W. Kempf, Supervisor of Music in the Foxboro schools. Mr Kempf was assisted locally by a committee consisting of Mrs Catharine C. Richardson, Mrs Elva L. Martin, and Mrs Louise P. Inman. Mrs Helen B. Fuller deserves thanks for opening her home to this group last Sunday afternoon, when a "prevue" of this entire program was given by Mr Kempf.

The final concert of this series will be held on Wednesday afternoon, April 12, and the same group will attend. If further tickets can be secured, still more music lovers will be able to attend.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 3 1 1939

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Orchestra Interprets Fourth by Tchaikovsky and the Seventh of Beethoven

LED BY DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Two Compositions That Make Up Program Are Familiar to Audiences Here

By OLIN DOWNES

There have been some significant orchestral performances by resident and visiting orchestras this week in this city and yet the performance of two symphonies, no more or less, and very familiar symphonies, at that, make the concert given by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall memorable.

The symphonies were Beethoven's Seventh and Tchaikovsky's Fourth, scores known to everybody, scores of which the notes could probably be struck off by the players in their sleep. But there is a great difference when music produced by truly creative power passes through the crucible of the thought and feeling of a great interpreter. Then, if at no other time, the importance of the interpreter in music is realized. It is clearly seen that the music must be reborn every time that it is sounded; else it is merely "ersatz." It is not sufficient to follow the signs of the music paper, to play now loud and now soft, now fast and now slow, and designate the result as an interpretation. A performance it is; an interpretation it is not and lacking living and masterful interpretation, the product hardly comes under the category of living music.

Invoked With Mastery

Last night music was invoked with sovereign mastery. Every necessity for the consummation was present—great music to re-create from the printed page; music which appeared to have made a particularly vivid impression upon the leader, so that he communicated, with extraordinary clarity and conviction, its essence to his listeners; and finally, the wonderful orchestra. For it is no mere compliment to say that the tone, the suppleness and sensitiveness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra could lend glamour even to a mediocre composition. And of mediocrity last night there was none, neither in Beethoven, nor Tchaikovsky.

Beethoven we take for granted as a great, a noble spirit. Tchaikovsky is placed in another category. For this reason, particularly, the playing of Tchaikovsky's composition was astonishing, because of the distinction as well as the passion of the interpretation.

Laden With Suspense

As the baton was lifted and the players in the orchestra poised themselves for the opening measures, there was the logical impulse on the part of a reasonable hard-boiled listener to settle back with a sigh and murmur, "Oh well, the Fourth Symphony." That thought was dispelled immediately the attention was arrested. The introduction was once more laden with oppressiveness and suspense, as in years before we knew our Tschaikovsky so well, and then, like the marshaling and the filing by of serried hosts, the orchestra launched into the main body of the movement.

Then one realized anew, and with a keen sense of tragedy, the immense potency of Tchaikovsky as a symphonist, in this, one of his earlier and imperfect symphonies. It is clear that it was not until his Sixth, the "Pathetique" symphony, that Tchaikovsky came near self-realization in the form based on classic models. But here, in the opening movement of the Fourth, is the sure significance of the symphonist that the man would have become had it not been for his premature ending, and this realization, at least for one person present, was consequent upon Kousevitzky's reading.

The effect of a ground line and unbreakable continuity of thought was surprising, after a thousand hearings of the familiar piece. The unity and exceptional coherency of the music was not attained by classic procedure of beat and phrase, but instead by an elasticity of pace and a dramatic eloquence which was quite the reverse of anything that would have been appropriate in the symphony of Beethoven.

Thematic Lines Merged

It was a "romantic" and a Russian who spoke, moodily, introspectively, with reckless self-betrayal. Yet many of the most effective passages were almost sotto voce; often there was intentional dimming of outlines, and the merging, in a manner almost impressionistic, of thematic lines, in just the way that persistent scraps of melody, some of them incongruous and unrelated, would persist in the mind of the fatigued and disheartened man. Yes! Side by side with passionate outbursts there were places that had the effect of nightmare, hallucination, of objects seen now indistinct and now in an unnatural glare of reality. But it was all rich, continuous music.

This held true of lesser movements of the symphony. Perhaps the tempo of the second movement was slightly dragged and sentimental. The famous "Pizzicato" movement was unique in its abandonment of everything aimed merely at orchestral effect and the impression it communicated of half lights and sleep-chasings. The finale was properly without restraint, with abrupt transitions of theme and fitful, accumulating energy. To accomplish this with Tschaikowsky was tribute equally to composer and conductor.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 1 - 1939

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON HERE

Will Return in 1939-40, James G. McDonald Announces

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, last night concluded its fifty-eighth annual Brooklyn series of five-concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert was a well-balanced combination of romanticism and melody with impressionism and harmony. It found conductor and orchestra at their best. It was presented to one of the most responsive audiences that has attended a symphony concert here in a long time. It evoked loud and continued applause that brought Mr. Koussevitzky out time and time again. The applause seemed to be about equally in response to the fine concert that was presented and in tribute to the orchestra at the conclusion of its local season.

Assurance was given, however, that there wil be a 1939-1940 season of the Boston orchestra in Brooklyn. In the intermission James G. McDonald, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, announced that arrangements have been completed for the next season, the series to start on Nov. 24, betwen the orchestra and the Brooklyn Institute, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Boston Symphony committee.

The program opened with the very romantic Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120 by Schumann, which is a beautiful interweaving of themes and song-like interludes, written with no pauses between movements. The second offering was Debussy's "Predude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune," which is a poetic and melodious sound picture, or possibly tapestry of natural beauty.

The late Maurice Ravel then became the central figure. First there was his "La Valse," entitled a "Choreographic Poem," but inevitably a confusing if engrossing work, as, despite the waltz rhythm it seems difficult to associate that dance form with impressionistic, rhythm-stressing music that approaches the neurotic. The program closed with the Ravel orchestration of Moussorgsky's Pianoforte Piences, "Pictures at an Exhibition." The first to play the most interesting Ravel orchestration in this country, Mr. Koussevitsky is able to give perhaps the best interpretation of the work which varies in mood and color from a light fairy-tale tempo to a solemn and sonorous conclusion.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 - 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Final Boston Symphony Concert Memorable for Performances Of Schumann and Moussorgsky

One thing is certain: Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have completely conquered the affection of their Brooklyn audience. The warm-hearted and prolonged applause accorded them at their final concert at the Academy of Music last night testified to that. Nor was such acclaim more justly deserved. In top form and playing a very satisfying program both in interest and in musical content, they gave a memorable concert.

The finest music of the evening and that which found the greatest response in the audience was Schumann's Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, but in reality his second. It represents Schumann at his best, expressing in music as a true romanticist the well of feeling that surged in him during those first years of happiness with his wife, Clara. The music has a strongly personal appeal and because it does give utterance to a single mood pursues its course in one movement rather than in the customary four, though the divisions are there. Over-riding regular symphonic form because the mood transcended the limitations set by it, the composer has given us a poetic work of matchless beauty. With such an instrument as the Boston Symphony to play this music, Dr. Koussevitzky fashioned a performance that was notable for the rich quality of tone color produced. It would be a difficult thing to single out any particular section so coordinated and so balanced was the conception and the execution of the work.

Debussy's famous "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" came as an exquisite contrast in a performance enhanced by the flute solo of Mr. Laurent. Havel's "La Valse," the "poeme choreographique," which means designed for the dance or ballet, brought the first half of the concert to a modern close.

While there were doubtless some who did not take too kindly to the brilliantly written Ravel work, though it well merits their cultivation, probably all were captivated by Ravel's admirable orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition." The musical world may be eternally grateful for this transmutation, especially when a virtuoso orchestra performs it. This remains one of the Boston Symphony's master performances and last night was no exception.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 1 - 1939

2 Symphonies Conducted by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Program Here Contains Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works

Serge Koussevitzky, whose programs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Carnegie Hall visits may nearly always be depended upon to include some work by a contemporary composer, either one wholly new or at least one seldom heard, joined the arch-conservatives Thursday night. At the fifth and final concert of the organization's evening series, it chose to perform two of the most familiar symphonies — the Seventh of Beethoven, and the Fourth of Tchaikovsky. That this procedure pleased the patrons of the orchestra was obvious. Every available seat was occupied, and the audience, which included standees, was unstinting with its expressions of approval.

The interpretations accorded these two symphonies furthered convictions long held that while Mr. Koussevitzky admires the genius of Beethoven, he brings profound affection, as well as deep understanding, to his conveyances of the Russian master's creations.

For, despite the implacably rhythmic and technically authoritative disclosure of the first, third and fourth movements of the Beethoven A major symphony, the Dionysiac spirit of the music was not imparted and the melancholy allegretto movement was too objectively set forth.

Quite another matter was the Tchaikovsky F minor Symphony. The impassioned, intensely dramatic first movement, the nostalgically tinged andantino, the fleet scherzo and the flamboyantly theatrical finale all appeal strongly to Mr. Koussevitzky and he conducted throughout with fier. intensity, eliciting striking tonal effects from his musicians. J. D. B.

CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

MAR 3 1 1939

Music in Review

BY HERMAN DEVRIES.

Leo Sowerby and Edwin S. Stringham, both American composers of international repute, were represented by their newest contributions on last night's regular subscription concert by the Chicago Symphony in Orchestra Hall. Mr. Sowerby's Concerto for organ and orchestra C major, was the vehicle serving to introduce here as organ-soloist E. Power Biggs, the first interpreter of this consequential work, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the time of its premiere, nearly a year ago.

The concerto recommends itself by the force of an original orchestral background that permits the organist-soloist perhaps less ostentatious display than many of the more showy pieces for this king of instruments for though abounding in bravura passages, the marriage of organ and orchestra merges so completely that, for the most part, the solo-instrument is too closely allied with the tonal sonority of the orchestra to afford, in a great measure, for the soloist to shine in his own light.

Nevertheless, in the movement marked "slowly and wistfully," Mr. Biggs' manipulation of stops and his remarkable use of hands and feet did give us ample occasion to admire his complete equipment at the console and the angelic tones, that he was able to evoke to make the noble work stand out with great eloquence.

The concerto possesses many virtues of novel instrumentation and flows in torrential streams of potential fire and refined melodic line, hidden cleverly under cascades of luminous efflorescences—all magnificently combined into a whole of rich sonority. The composer and Mr. Biggs were recalled to the stage many times in acknowledgement of the audience's pleasure.

The Stringham Nocturne No. 2 moves along smoothly, melodiously, and even tranquilly, for the most part, save when there is a flash of heavier orchestration, indicative of the mood of the night. The novelty, dedicated to Hans Lange, received meritorious approbation and figured as a preface to the Bacchanele and Finale from Wagner's Overture to "Tannhaueser," as Sowerby's name had appeared on the program directly after that of Mozart, represented by his Symphony in C major (Jupiter) to constitute with the Handel Overture, D major, the entire list of selections.

SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL

APR 1 - 1939

Miss Louise Ferris, Bayview ave., and Stuart Leland, New Canaan, are attending the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie hall, New York, this afternoon.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR 1 - 1939

Subscribers To Symphony Series Must Act Today

Options to Renew For Bushnell Concerts Expire This Evening

Today is the final date on which old subscribers to the Bushnell Concert Series have the privilege of renewing for the coming season their subscriptions for the seats which they held this year, or for making prior application for seats in new locations.

The management of the Memorial has reminded all who have not yet renewed that their options expire today, and it is expected that only a very limited number of seats will not be renewed for. After this date all tickets released will be made available to new applicants in the order in which these applications reach the box office.

Subscription prices for the series are the same as those of the current year: Orchestra, ten, twelve and fourteen dollars; first balcony, ten, twelve and fourteen dollars; second balcony, five, six and eight dollars. These rates apply to the season of six concerts.

As in former years, these concerts will be presented on week-day evenings. The orchestras are the same five major symphonic groups which were so enthusiastically acclaimed here this season. These include the Boston Symphony (twice), the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Cleveland Orchestra and National Symphony. The concerts are scheduled from October through February.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 1 - 1939

Boston Orchestra Concludes 53rd Brooklyn Season; Many Entertain Guests at Concert

With a capacity audience in attendance, the fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, came to a close last night with the presentation of the fifth in a season's series of concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Members of the Brooklyn committee for the concerts entertained in boxes. Other boxes were occupied by the Brooklyn Women's Club, and the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy. Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward, wife of Rear Admiral Woodward, Commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, was hostess in the Navy box.

Mrs. Woodward's guests included Mrs. Charles W. Bunker, Mr. and Mrs. Ebenezer Hill, Captain and Mrs. Chester Mays and Captain and Mrs. Chester George.

Mrs. Oliver G. Carter and Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, hostesses in the Brooklyn Woman's Club box, entertained Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ivers, Mrs. Frederic M. Davidson, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock and Mrs. Theodore Vosseler.

Guests in the Adelphi box included Miss Jessie Ogg, Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart, Miss Emily H. Bow and Mrs. William B. Parker.

With Mrs. Lewis W. Francis were Mr. and Mrs. Otis Cook Stanton, Mr. Francis, Miss Mary Carruthers, Miss Elizabeth Carroll and John C. Stanton.

Mrs. John J. Schoonhoven's box guests included Mr. and Mrs. Frederick J. Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Neely, Miss Edith A. Hannam, Miss Eleanore Gertrue Hannam, Miss Gertrude Espencheid and John B. Clark. Miss Marion Rous was the guest of Robert Alfred Shaw.

Miss Anna R. Alexander, of Manhattan, occupied the box of Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt. In the party of Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Rear-Admiral and Mrs. James C. Pryor, Mr. and Mrs. Meredith Langstaff, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff and Walter Golde.

The concerts were presented here nder the auspices of the Brooklyn nstitute of Arts and Sciences, ames McDonald, president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. untington Woodman, president, nd the Brooklyn committee, Adrian an Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. enry J. Davenport, acting chairnan.

A complete account of the conert, conducted by Dr. Serge Kousevitzky, will be found in another ection of this edition of "The Brooklyn Citizen."

MUSIC

2R

Houston Orchestra

Remarkable Progress Under Ernst Hoffmann, a Singularly Able Leader and Interpreter

B. Trans. By MOSES SMITH April 1/39

HOUSTON, Tex. (By Mail)—The several talents and capabilities necessary for an accomplished conductor were clearly illustrated in a comparison between, on the one hand, the two final subscription concerts of the season of the Houston Symphony Orchestra under Ernst Hoffmann on Monday and Tuesday nights of this week, and, on the other, the concert by the same performers at the beginning of last season, almost a year and a half ago, when the present writer was also in attendance. The inferences could be drawn much more sharply than in the case of even repeated attendance at the concerts by more proficient and celebrated conductors of the North and East.

Listening to a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall or by the NBC Symphony Orchestra on the air, we direct our principal attention, if not to the intrinsic musical matter (where it belongs), at least to the so-called interpretation of the conductor. We take it for granted that the instrument on which the conductor "plays," an instrument composed of perhaps 100 musicians, is a competent and complete means for realizing the conductor's wishes. It is true that the technic of playing on that complex instrument sometimes obtrudes itself on our attention. The demands of a Koussevitzky, his ear extraordinarily attuned to fine gradations of orchestral sonority, or of a Toscanini, ever more insistent on clarity and suppleness of line, are in themselves objects of our admiration. But our principal comment, if we have any to make after a performance, is reserved for the general lines along which the conductor recreates the music.

Conductor as Drill-Master

What we forget is the function of the conductor as drill-master. To a considerable extent this function persists through the daily grind of preliminary rehearsal even when, with a virtuoso orchestra, a virtuoso conductor poetizes at the concert. But it is in the case of a young and growing orchestra like the one in Houston, consisting for the most part not of expert virtuosi but of run-of-the-mill musicians, that one becomes spectacularly aware of the drill-master aspect of the leader.

Especially when the conductor has been so successful as Mr. Hoffmann here in Houston. One who had watched the remarkable change he had effected in the WPA orchestra in Boston before he came to Houston knew that he was even more than a drill-master; he was also a musical adviser and teacher of the musicians. The duties associated with such a mentor were still occupying Mr. Hoffmann principally when this writer heard the Houston orchestra a year and a half ago. The playing was correct but cautious, because the conductor wanted it so. He held firmly to the axiom that before one may fly one must grow wings.

Fortunate Result

Apparently the conductor has continued to follow his own counsel since then. And the extraordinary rewarding results of his efforts became apparent at the concerts on Monday and Tuesday nights, when the program consisted of Horace Johnson's "Imagery," an inconsequential, unpretentious but not unpleasant Suite based on oriental flavors; Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude.

On the earlier occasion, as the writer recalls it, the quality of the orchestra here roughly approximated that with which Mr. Hoffmann presented a season of opera under WPA auspices in the Boston Opera House. Within the past year and a half, on the evidence of this week's concerts, the orchestra, with relatively few changes of personnel, and still undermanned in the string sections, may be compared favorably in many respects with the second flight of American orchestras — those immediately below the "Big Three" of Boston, New York and Philadelphia.

The Strings

Its principal deficiency, in comparison with those orchestras, lies in the insufficient resonance and virtuosity of the string section. The defects are due partly to the smaller numbers in the several string sections here. They are also due frequently to lesser technical fluency, man for man. Both these things—and they are now the principal artistic obstacles to be overcome here — are essentially financial in origin. More money will solve the problem.

Money will solve it because the Houston Orchestra fortunately has the services of a remarkably able and expert conductor. Even with the pitiful financial means at his disposal he has made of this string section something which most of the more celebrated American orchestras may well envy in several respects. The playing is careful and correct, sensitive (within the technical limitations of the musicians) and musically intelligent. Broad, sloppy, careless strokes for the sake of big "effects" are not discernible, because that is not the way of the conductor. Instead, one noted in the "Pastoral" Symphony a devotion to the rhythmic and dynamic demands of the composer which was refreshing because, alas! it is now so rare. The inevitable cautiousness of the string players was necessarily accompanied by little less than ideal flexibility on the part of Mr. Hoffmann. But in all other respects, including the admirable and surprising playing of the wind sections, the presentation seemed to me on something like a par with the performance I had heard a few nights earlier from the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos.

The Wind Sections

In the second half of the program, where the music was not quite so exposed in character and where the wind instruments bore a far heavier burden, the performances were correspondingly more compelling. Adopting for several of the movements of the "Nutcracker" Suite brisker tempos than are customary, the conductor brought them off because of the virtuosity of his players, particularly the woodwind. The brass had its principal inning in the Wagner Prelude. Here, as throughout the concert, it proved to be an exceptionally able choir, playing for the most part cleanly and with good intonation and with a quality of tone rare in America. There are already among these wind players many who are "ready" for positions in the big American orchestras. They will probably remain here in Houston because of their devotion to their conductor.

The Conductor

And they will be right. For in addition to his remarkable executive and, so to say, pedagogical talents, he proved, as the music-making became freer through these two concerts, to be an interpreter very much under-rated, at least by me. Even though I could not on first acquaintance subscribe to some of the tempos in the "Nutcracker" performance, the conductor made his exposition so logically, musically and tastefully as to provide one of the finest performances of the Suite I have heard anywhere. Without the suggestion of dynamic or rhythmic distortion, but only with a proper appreciation for color and contrast, Mr. Hoffman breathed new life into a delicious score.

In the performance of the Wagner Prelude Mr. Hoffmann was a masterful interpreter (quickly recalling his long experience in opera). It may be objected that there is nothing "new" to be discovered in the Prelude. But a performance of it by a far better known orchestra and conductor on the air the night before showed plainly that a considerable accretion of sloppiness is to be disposed of. There was nothing sloppy about the performance here. It was straightforward, following clearly the Wagnerian indications which a competent, literate, sensitive and imaginative conductor knows how to interpret. Mr. Hoffmann was all these things. At the moment I can think of only three conductors in America who could have provided so exciting a performance.

The Opportunity

The Houston Orchestra has sprouted wings and in so doing has released the spirit and imagination of its gifted conductor. Whether the two together will be permitted to extend a promising present into a rich future remains to be seen. Given a conductor like Mr. Hoffmann, who has practical executive talents in addition to musical ones, the problem is reducible entirely to terms of money. As it is, the Houstonians, with an incredibly low budget for operations, are getting the most remarkable musical bargain I have ever observed. Not to make the most of it would indeed be an artistic crime. Merely to acknowledge the bargain will produce in a very few years, I believe, one of the leading orchestras and one of the principal conductors on this continent.

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

APR 1 - 1939

"The Damnation Of Faust" to Be Given April 16

The Handel and Haydn society of Boston, under the direction of Dr. Thompson Stone, is presenting "The Damnation of Faust" by Hector Berlioz, on Sunday afternoon, April 16, at 3:30 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. The society has been working all year on its part of the production, giving to it the time and energy which it usually spends on three or four annual concerts.

As soloists for the occasion it has secured Gertrude Ehrhart, Boston sorano who has been heard with pleasure in Attleboro, to sing the part of "Marguerite." "Faust" will be sung by Paul Althouse, tenor of the Metropolitan opera. From the Chicago City Opera company comes Mark Love, baritone, making his Boston debut, who will sing "Brander," and the colorful part of Mephistopheles will be portrayed by Gean Greenwell, who has sung with the Handel and Haydn society before. In addition, 74 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will assist, the whole production to be under the direction of Dr. Stone.

Realizing that many people will be interested in this remarkable production, the Handel and Haydn society has set aside a block of tickets in choice locations to be sold through the Massachusetts Federation of Music clubs and their affiliated organizations and friends. For the convenience of persons not wishing to go to Boston to secure their seats, Mrs Lawrence E. Baer, 218 County st., has a certain number of seats in various locations which may be secured; not tickets to be exchanged but the actual seats themselves, or she will be glad to make any reservations desired.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony Season Closed With 5th Concert

A capacity audience attended the final concert of the 53d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music. It was the fifth concert of the season's series presened under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, James McDonald president; Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Huntington Woodman, president, and the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Prominent members of the Brooklyn Committee entertained in box parties and other boxes were occupied by the Brooklyn Woman's Club and the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy. The Navy Box was occupied by a party with Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward, wife of Rear Admiral Woodward, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, as the hostess.

Mrs. Woodward's guests included Mrs. Charles W. Bunker, Mr. and Mrs. Ebenezer Hill, Captain and Mrs. Chester Mays and Captain and Mrs. Chester George. Mrs. Oliver G. Carter and Mrs. Frederik W. Burbank, hostesses in the Brooklyn Woman's Club box, entertained Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Frederick M. Davidson, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock and Mrs. Theodore Vosseler. Guests in the Adelphi box included Miss Jessie Ogg, Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart, Miss Emily H. Bow and Mrs. William B. Parker.

With Mrs. Lewis W. Francis were Mr. and Mrs. Otis Cook Stanton, Mr. Francis, Miss Mary Carruthers, Miss Elizabeth Carroll and John C. Stanton. Mrs. John J. S. Schoonhoven's box guests included Mr. and Mrs. Frederick J. Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Neely, Miss Edith A. Hannam, Miss Eleanore Gertrude Hannam, Miss Gertrude Espencheid and John B. Clark. Miss Marion Rous was the guest of Robert Alfred Shaw. Miss Anna R. Alexander of Manhattan occupied the box of Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt.

In the party of Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Rear Admiral and Mrs. James C. Pryor, Mr. and Mrs. Meredith Langstaff, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff and Walter Golde.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented a program which included Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120; Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (Eclogue by S. Mallarme); Ravel's "La Valse," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (Pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel).

Members of the Brooklyn Committee serving as chairmen assisting Mrs. Davenport during the 1938-39 season were Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the Membership Committee; Mrs. William G. James Jr., Junior League Committee chairman, and Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Regional Committee chairman.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

APR 2 - 1939

Boston to Send Its Symphony for N. U. Series

By Edward Barry.

Of late years Chicagoans have been developing an almost mystical attitude toward the women's board of the Passavant hospital. Why should we spend time and money trotting east to hear Toscanini, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky? If we just relax and have faith, the ladies will bring them to us sooner or later.

And sure enough they have. Stokowski and the Philadelphia orchestra came here in the spring of 1936 for a hospital benefit. Toscanini and the NBC outfit visited Chicago this last winter to give a concert under similar auspices. Now a bombshell has fallen in the shape of an announcement that Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra are coming—but not under Passavant sponsorship!

University college of Northwestern university has scooped the women's board and has booked the world famous conductor and orchestra into the Auditorium theater for a Dec. 13 concert. This will be their first Chicago appearance in six years and will rank as the outstanding event of Northwestern's fifth history and enjoyment of music series.

Koussevitzky is a Russian string bass virtuoso who has risen to a commanding position among orchestra directors. There are not half a dozen men, here or abroad, who can be mentioned in the same breath with him.

● ● ●

Coincident with the announcement of Koussevitzky's coming, Northwestern revealed its entire '39-'40 schedule. The season will open on Oct. 31 with a concert by the Philadelphia orchestra under Eugene Ormandy's direction. The Catherine Littlefield ballet, whose reëngagement by the Chicago City Opera company has just been announced, gives a performance on Nov. 19 for Northwestern. Jascha Heifetz, the grown-up violin prodigy who succeeded in keeping the world's attention by his artistry when his youth would no longer suffice, will offer a recital on Dec. 3.

Sergei Rachmanioff, Russian pianist and composer, comes the second Sunday of the new year, to be followed two weeks later by Marian Anderson, contralto, who has the unique honor of having appeared on every series since these history and enjoyment of music concerts started.

The General Platoff Don Cossack choir is due Feb. 4. Helen Jepson, hugely successful operatic soprano, promises one of her rare Chicago recitals on Feb. 18. Thus, on a big crescendo, the series will close.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 2 - 1939

On the Concert Calendar

Today—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program by John Archer; Providence Public Library, 4 p. m. Oratorio, "The Seven Last Words," Dubois, Beneficent Congregational Church, 5 p. m. Passion music, St. Stephen's Church, 5 p. m. Cantata, "The Darkest Hour," Moore, All Saints' Memorial Church, 7 p. m. Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Providence Oratorio Society, William W. DeRoin, director; Plainfield Street Baptist Church, 7:30 p. m. Providence Federal Orchestra, Edouard Caffier, conductor; Alexandre Peloquin, pianist; soloist; Hope high school, 8:30 p. m.

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

April 12—Holy Cross College Musical Clubs, [illegible] Auditorium, evening.

April 13—Brown University Orchestra, Prof. Arlan [illegible] Coolidge, director; Faunce House, evening.

April 17—Annual concert, Chamin-

31

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

APR 2 - 1939

Reviews of New Records

Concert Recordings

By CHARLES LAMMOND

A novelty, however, is among the outstanding albums of the month. Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico," (M-546), a slam-bang affair which depicts the more exotic side of Mexican night life, with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Much of it is written [illegible] what might be termed a Latin jazz idiom, interspersed with themes from several folk songs. There is in this set, incidentaly, some terrific tympani work and the recording is amazing in its incisive brilliance. On the odd side of the set Stravinsky's arrangement of the "Song of the Volga Boatmen" removes it from the sphere of certain of its trite investitures and puts in what sounds like a chorale rendition.

MUSIC

212

Houston Orchestra

Remarkable Progress Under Ernst Hoffmann, a Singularly Able Leader and Interpreter

B. Trans. By MOSES SMITH April 1/39

HOUSTON, Tex. (By Mail)—The several talents and capabilities necessary for an accomplished conductor were clearly illustrated in a comparison between, on the one hand, the two final subscription concerts of the season of the Houston Symphony Orchestra under Ernst Hoffmann on Monday and Tuesday nights of this week, and, on the other, the concert by the same performers at the beginning of last season, almost a year and a half ago, when the present writer was also in attendance. The inferences could be drawn much more sharply than in the case of even repeated attendance at the concerts by more proficient and celebrated conductors of the North and East.

Listening to a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall or by the NBC Symphony Orchestra on the air, we direct our principal attention, if not to the intrinsic musical matter (where it belongs), at least to the so-called interpretation of the conductor. We take it for granted that the instrument on which the conductor "plays," an instrument composed of perhaps 100 musicians, is a competent and complete means for realizing the conductor's wishes. It is true that the technic of playing on that complex instrument sometimes obtrudes itself on our attention. The demands of a Koussevitzky, his ear extraordinarily attuned to fine gradations of orchestral sonority, or of a Toscanini, ever more insistent on clarity and suppleness of line, are in themselves objects of our admiration. But our principal comment, if we have any to make after a performance, is reserved for the general lines along which the conductor recreates the music.

Conductor as Drill-Master

What we forget is the function of the conductor as drill-master. To a considerable extent this function persists through the daily grind of preliminary rehearsal even when, with a virtuoso orchestra, a virtuoso conductor poetizes at the concert. But it is in the case of a young and growing orchestra like the one in Houston, consisting for the most part not of expert virtuosi but of run-of-the-mill musicians, that one becomes spectacularly aware of the drill-master aspect of the leader.

Especially when the conductor has been so successful as Mr. Hoffmann here in Houston. One who had watched the remarkable change he had effected in the WPA orchestra in Boston before he came to Houston knew that he was even more than a drill-master; he was also a musical adviser and teacher of the musicians. The duties associated with such a mentor were still occupying Mr. Hoffmann principally when this writer heard the Houston orchestra a year and a half ago. The playing was correct but cautious, because the conductor wanted it so. He held firmly to the axiom that before one may fly one must grow wings.

Fortunate Result

Apparently the conductor has continued to follow his own counsel since then. And the extraordinary rewarding results of his efforts became apparent at the concerts on Monday and Tuesday nights, when the program consisted of Horace Johnson's "Imagery," an inconsequential, unpretentious but not unpleasant Suite based on oriental flavors; Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude.

On the earlier occasion, as the writer recalls it, the quality of the orchestra here roughly approximated that with which Mr. Hoffmann presented a season of opera under WPA auspices in the Boston Opera House. Within the past year and a half, on the evidence of this week's concerts, the orchestra, with relatively few changes of personnel, and still undermanned in the string sections, may be compared favorably in many respects with the second flight of American orchestras — those immediately below the "Big Three" of Boston, New York and Philadelphia.

The Strings

Its principal deficiency, in comparison with those orchestras, lies in the insufficient resonance and virtuosity of the string section. The defects are due partly to the smaller numbers in the several string sections here. They are also due frequently to lesser technical fluency, man for man. Both these things—and they are now the principal artistic obstacles to be overcome here — are essentially financial in origin. More money will solve the problem.

Money will solve it because the Houston Orchestra fortunately has the services of a remarkably able and expert conductor. Even with the pitiful financial means at his disposal he has made of this string section something which most of the more celebrated American orchestras may well envy in several respects. The playing is careful and correct, sensitive (within the technical limitations of the musicians) and musically intelligent. Broad, sloppy, careless strokes for the sake of big "effects" are not discernible, because that is not the way of the conductor. Instead, one noted in the "Pastoral" Symphony a devotion to the rhythmic and dynamic demands of the composer which was refreshing because, alas! it is now so rare. The inevitable cautiousness of the string players was necessarily accompanied by little less than ideal flexibility on the part of Mr. Hoffmann. But in all other respects, including the admirable and surprising playing of the wind sections, the presentation seemed to me on something like a par with the performance I had heard a few nights earlier from the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos.

The Wind Sections

In the second half of the program, where the music was not quite so exposed in character and where the wind instruments bore a far heavier burden, the performances were correspondingly more compelling. Adopting for several of the movements of the "Nutcracker" Suite brisker tempos than are customary, the conductor brought them off because of the virtuosity of his players, particularly the woodwind. The brass had its principal inning in the Wagner Prelude. Here, as throughout the concert, it proved to be an exceptionally able choir, playing for the most part cleanly and with good intonation and with a quality of tone rare in America. There are already among these wind players many who are "ready" for positions in the big American orchestras. They will probably remain here in Houston because of their devotion to their conductor.

The Conductor

And they will be right. For in addition to his remarkable executive and, so to say, pedagogical talents, he proved, as the music-making became freer through these two concerts, to be an interpreter very much under-rated, at least by me. Even though I could not on first acquaintance subscribe to some of the tempos in the "Nutcracker" performance, the conductor made his exposition so logically, musically and tastefully as to provide one of the finest performances of the Suite I have heard anywhere. Without the suggestion of dynamic or rhythmic distortion, but only with a proper appreciation for color and contrast, Mr. Hoffman breathed new life into a delicious score.

In the performance of the Wagner Prelude Mr. Hoffmann was a masterful interpreter (quickly recalling his long experience in opera). It may be objected that there is nothing "new" to be discovered in the Prelude. But a performance of it by a far better known orchestra and conductor on the air the night before showed plainly that a considerable accretion of sloppiness is to be disposed of. There was nothing sloppy about the performance here. It was straightforward, following clearly the Wagnerian indications which a competent, literate, sensitive and imaginative conductor knows how to interpret. Mr. Hoffmann was all these things. At the moment I can think of only three conductors in America who could have provided so exciting a performance.

The Opportunity

The Houston Orchestra has sprouted wings and in so doing has released the spirit and imagination of its gifted conductor. Whether the two together will be permitted to extend a promising present into a rich future remains to be seen. Given a conductor like Mr. Hoffmann, who has practical executive talents in addition to musical ones, the problem is reducible entirely to terms of money. As it is, the Houstonians, with an incredibly low budget for operations, are getting the most remarkable musical bargain I have ever observed. Not to make the most of it would indeed be an artistic crime. Merely to acknowledge the bargain will produce in a very few years, I believe, one of the leading orchestras and one of the principal conductors on this continent.

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

APR 1 - 1939

"The Damnation Of Faust" to Be Given April 16

The Handel and Haydn society of Boston, under the direction of Dr. Thompson Stone, is presenting "The Damnation of Faust" by Hector Berlioz, on Sunday afternoon, April 16, at 3:30 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. The society has been working all year on its part of the production, giving to it the time and energy which it usually spends on three or four annual concerts.

As soloists for the occasion it has secured Gertrude Ehrhart, Boston sorano who has been heard with pleasure in Attleboro, to sing the part of "Marguerite." "Faust" will be sung by Paul Althouse, tenor of the Metropolitan opera. From the Chicago City Opera company comes Mark Love, baritone, making his Boston debut, who will sing "Brander," and the colorful part of Mephistopheles will be portrayed by Gean Greenwell, who has sung with the Handel and Haydn society before. In addition, 74 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will assist, the whole production to be under the direction of Dr. Stone.

Realizing that many people will be interested in this remarkable production, the Handel and Haydn society has set aside a block of tickets in choice locations to be sold through the Massachusetts Federation of Music clubs and their affiliated organizations and friends. For the convenience of persons not wishing to go to Boston to secure their seats, Mrs Lawrence E. Baer, 218 County st., has a certain number of seats in various locations which may be secured, not tickets to be exchanged but the actual seats themselves, or she will be glad to make any reservations desired.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 - 1939

Boston Symphony Season Closed With 5th Concert

A capacity audience attended the final concert of the 53d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music. It was the fifth concert of the season's series presened under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, James McDonald president; Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Huntington Woodman, president, and the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Prominent members of the Brooklyn Committee entertained in box parties and other boxes were occupied by the Brooklyn Woman's Club and the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy. The Navy Box was occupied by a party with Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward, wife of Rear Admiral Woodward, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, as the hostess.

Mrs. Woodward's guests included Mrs. Charles W. Bunker, Mr. and Mrs. Ebenezer Hill, Captain and Mrs. Chester Mays and Captain and Mrs. Chester George. Mrs. Oliver G. Carter and Mrs. Frederik W. Burbank, hostesses in the Brooklyn Woman's Club box, entertained Mrs. Arthur S. Tuttle, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Frederick M. Davidson, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock and Mrs. Theodore Vosseler. Guests in the Adelphi box included Miss Jessie Ogg, Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart, Miss Emily H. Bow and Mrs. William B. Parker.

With Mrs. Lewis W. Francis were Mr. and Mrs. Otis Cook Stanton, Mr. Francis, Miss Mary Carruthers, Miss Elizabeth Carroll and John C. Stanton. Mrs. John J. S. Schoonhoven's box guests included Mr. and Mrs. Frederick J. Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Neely, Miss Edith A. Hannam, Miss Eleanore Gertrude Hannam, Miss Gertrude Espencheid and John B. Clark. Miss Marion Rous was the guest of Robert Alfred Shaw. Miss Anna R. Alexander of Manhattan occupied the box of Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt.

In the party of Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Rear Admiral and Mrs. James C. Pryor, Mr. and Mrs. Meredith Langstaff, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff and Walter Golde.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented a program which included Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120; Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (Eclogue by S. Mallarme); Ravel's "La Valse," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (Pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel).

Members of the Brooklyn Committee serving as chairmen assisting Mrs. Davenport during the 1938-39 season were Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the Membership Committee; Mrs. William G. James Jr., Junior League Committee chairman, and Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Regional Committee chairman.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

APR 2 - 1939

Boston to Send Its Symphony for N. U. Series

By Edward Barry.

Of late years Chicagoans have been developing an almost mystical attitude toward the women's board of the Passavant hospital. Why should we spend time and money trotting east to hear Toscanini, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky? If we just relax and have faith, the ladies will bring them to us sooner or later.

And sure enough they have. Stokowski and the Philadelphia orchestra came here in the spring of 1936 for a hospital benefit. Toscanini and the NBC outfit visited Chicago this last winter to give a concert under similar auspices. Now a bombshell has fallen in the shape of an announcement that Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra are coming—but not under Passavant sponsorship!

University college of Northwestern university has scooped the women's board and has booked the world famous conductor and orchestra into the Auditorium theater for a Dec. 13 concert. This will be their first Chicago appearance in six years and will rank as the outstanding event of Northwestern's fifth history and enjoyment of music series.

Koussevitzky is a Russian string bass virtuoso who has risen to a commanding position among orchestra directors. There are not half a dozen men, here or abroad, who can be mentioned in the same breath with him.

● ● ●

Coincident with the announcement of Koussevitzky's coming, Northwestern revealed its entire '39-'40 schedule. The season will open on Oct. 31 with a concert by the Philadelphia orchestra under Eugene Ormandy's direction. The Catherine Littlefield ballet, whose reëngagement by the Chicago City Opera company has just been announced, gives a performance on Nov. 19 for Northwestern. Jascha Heifetz, the grown-up violin prodigy who succeeded in keeping the world's attention by his artistry when his youth would no longer suffice, will offer a recital on Dec. 3.

Sergei Rachmanioff, Russian pianist and composer, comes the second Sunday of the new year, to be followed two weeks later by Marian Anderson, contralto, who has the unique honor of having appeared on every series since these history and enjoyment of music concerts started.

The General Platoff Don Cossack choir is due Feb. 4. Helen Jepson, hugely successful operatic soprano, promises one of her rare Chicago recitals on Feb. 18. Thus, on a big crescendo, the series will close.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 2 - 1939

Application Oct. 5, 1938; 233,450; 14 claims. rge H. Goldsmith, Paw- process for smelling, puri-

Today—Fr [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra program by John Archer; Providence Public Library, 4 p. m. Oratorio, "The Seven Last Words," Dubois, Beneficent Congregational Church, 5 p. m. Passion music, St. Stephen's Church, 5 p. m. Cantata, "The Darkest Hour," Moore, All Saints' Memorial Church, 7 p. m. Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Providence Oratorio Society, William W. DeRoin, director; Plainfield Street Baptist Church, 7:30 p. m. Providence Federal Orchestra, Edouard Caffier, conductor; Alexandre Peloquin, pianist; soloist; Hope high school, 8:30 p. m.

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

April 12—Holy Cross College Musical Clubs, Plantations Auditorium, evening.

April 13—Brown University Orchestra, Prof. Arlan R. Coolidge, director; Faunce House, evening.

April 17—Annual concert, Chamin-

31

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

APR 2 - 1939

Reviews of New Records

Concert Recordings

By CHARLES LAMMOND

A novelty, however, is among the outstanding albums of the month. Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico," (M-546), a slam-bang affair which depicts the more exotic side of Mexican night life, with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Much of it is written in what might be termed a Latin jazz idiom, interspersed with themes from several folk songs. There is in this set, incidentaly, some terrific tympani work and the recording is amazing in its incisive brilliance. On the odd side of the set Stravinsky's arrangement of the "Song of the Volga Boatmen" removes it from the sphere of certain of its trite investitures and puts in what sounds like a chorale rendition.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Bids Au Revoir to City for Season

Prov. Journal April 5/39

By G. Y. Loveridge

A lush au revoir was delivered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to their Providence admirers in Metropolitan Theatre last night. It was a performance splendid with color, prodigious in virtuosity.

The program was hardly an adventurous one. In fact, Dr. Koussevitzky shows a disinclination to take any risks in this city. All season long there has been nothing by an American composer, and the only wanderings from the broad highway have been a violin concerto and an inoffensive fairy tale both by Prokofieff, and both good.

Why not chance offending us once in a while with something we probably or certainly won't like? Let's know what's going on in the world today, as well as what went on a century ago. Surely we have as much right as any audience to hiss down some new thing that will be a classic and a marvel 50 years from now, or to acclaim some other new thing that will be properly forgotten next season.

Last night Tchaikovsky, Debussy, Ravel and Vaughan Williams were sent into the game, Mr. Williams being the only person fairly new to the varsity line-up, and not carrying the ball to any extent. What we heard of him, though, was excellent, a fantasia on a theme by the Elizabethan composer Thomas Tallis, performed by a double string orchestra. The Boston Symphony strings could make "Jeepers Creepers" seem profound; the manner in which they gave out the fantasia was magnificent in suavity and vigor of tone, in richness of shading, in precision of accent. The mingling of melodies and the answering of choir to choir were fascinating, elegantly expressive.

These rather chaste proceedings were followed by the decadent graces of "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune," by Debussy. This never fails to hypnotize under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership. The enchanting tones of flute and oboe weaving among the soft colors of the strings kept the attention as effectively as the Ancient Mariner's glittering eye, and far more pleasantly.

A vigorous and sometimes noisy elucidation of "La Valse," another siren-song that no audience can resist, was then presented, with an air of grandeur and an eclat that lured the listeners into oral applause as well as hand-clapping.

All this led to the Fourth Symphony, in F minor, by Tchaikovsky, an old dependable that winds up a season with such brassy brilliance and exotic hues as few other works can provide. From the opening proclamation in the horns to the final tremendous, and purely musical, crash of the orchestra this was a superb, memorable utterance. The orchestral tone was as transparent as air, the beautiful melodies, in whatever voice they appeared, were ever clear and fresh.

Who has heard a more thrilling reading of the scherzo, strings more unanimous, trombones more agile and obedient?

When Dr. Koussevitzky dug down for the last fortissimo, the audience exploded with enthusiasm. He was demanded from the wings several times.

During the evening he gave special recognition to Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz, LeFranc, Bedetti, Laurent and Gillet for solo work, and more than once motioned the whole orchestra to its feet.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American

APR 2 - 1939

By GRENA BENNETT.

The final matinee concert this season of the Boston Symphony took place yes[redacted]in Carnegie Hall. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky's interest in Russian music was expressed in his devoting most of the program to compositions by Moussorgsky and Stravinsky.

The first-mentioned was represented by his prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" inspired by a succession of Slavic folksongs ranging from tunes of singular beauty and tenderness to others of definite passion and fury.

The pastel coloring of Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps," originally planned as a novelty for the celebrated Diaghileff Ballet, and since then performed occasionally by symphonic organizations, was a poetic contrast to the preceding number.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 2 - 1939

Overtones

Composer in the Limelight as New Friends . . . Of Music Conclude 'Revival' Series and Smith College Announces Hadyn Festival

By MILES KASTENDIECK

That the composer of the hour should be a man born 207 years ago last Friday is an interesting commentary on our times. Yet Franz Josef Haydn has caught the spotlight this season in a number of ways and his "revival" appears to be in full swing. Chiefly responsible for this accent on Haydn have been the New Friends of Music concerts, of which the sixth and last will be given in Carnegie Hall this afternoon. A comparatively unknown sypmhony (No. 91 in E flat, not previously performed in this country) and one heard perhaps once in a decade (No. 82 in C, known as "L'Ours," the bear) make up the characteristic program. Scholarly research has born significant fruit, and as these "lost" symphonies are resuscitated, a re-estimation of Haydn's development as a self-made composer is in order.

Probably it was by coincidence that Koussevitsky chose to act out the story of the "Farewell" symphony at the "Concert Extraordinaire" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in February, but it was quite in keeping with the quickening interest in Haydn's music. Now comes the announcement that as the climax of the season's activities of the Smith College music department there will be a Haydn Festival presented at Northampton the last weekend of this month. Among the works to be given are symphonies No. 49, "La Passione," and No. 102, and the "Creation," while Prof. Leland Hall is to lecture on the composer. There remains now for some enterprising conductor to give an all-Haydn program in New York to complete the story. The orchestra of the New Friends of Music has come close to it, but the very rare phenomenon has yet to be announced.

●

It is one of the interesting facts in current musical activity that we really know very little about Haydn as a composer of symphonies. He composed in all 104 works in this form, yet hardly more than a dozen grace the repetoires of leading orchestras. Less than half of them have of course been available to either student or conductor in even the best of libraries and many have been gathering dust in the British Museum these many years. Those that we have heard are works performed during the composer's lifetime and all of them to product of his latest years. It is only the result of a fervent antiquarian interest that a number of the unknown works are now available. As they come to performance, they not only throw interesting light on the composer but appear to capture the interest of audiences to such an extent that last week the New Friends of Music were requested to repeat the performance of No. 80. (This work is now recorded, as Mr. Williams points out in his column today.)

Through the efforts of Dr. Alfred Einstein and his friend, Fritz Stiedry, conductor of the orchestra of the New Friends of Music, we now have a desirable and welcome addition for our orchestral repertoires. Where before we knew chiefly the Haydn released from his duties at the court of Prince Esterhazy, now we are learning of the Haydn who served 30 years in that musical circle and composed to his heart's delight. His only obligation was to please his employer, and that appears to have been comparatively easy, and to bring him something different and even surprising in each new composition. In fulfilling that duty, Haydn had to rely more on invention than later in London when he had only to please while resting on his laurels. The difference reveals the composer in the mood of an archexperimentalist. ist.

●

Haydn might well appeal to modern composers whose love of the experimental is akin to his and whose increasing efforts to state their musical ideas in simple terms finds echo in his simplicity. There is a wealth of originality and invention in the symphonies of this "middle" period not alone confined to the woodwinds with which Haydn seems to have been intrigued. It is during this time, however, that he experimented sufficiently to reveal how the orchestra that Beethoven used actually developed. He combined various instruments for the novel tonal effects that they might produce. He went further and delved into the possibilities of musical structure, rounding out what is called sonata form to a point that Beethoven could study it as authoritative.

Thus it happens that the new emphasis on Haydn's music offers a restudy of his music and of him as a composer. It would be most fitting that Dr. Alfred Einstein, who is so eminently fitted for the task, should soon be able to write a book of which the title might be "The Development of Haydn as a Composer." The symphonist as he is now known to the world would be the better understood and Haydn's contribution to the orchestra and the symphony would assume a far more important place than it has. In the meantime, music lovers would discover some music comparable with the accepted Haydn symphonies.

●

The world at large has dubbed him "Papa Haydn" chiefly because of the characteristics of his music. The cheerful, pleasant, genial composer has been somewhat maligned with this appellation, for it was taken for granted that there was nothing very profound about this delightful music. A closer study of Haydn reveals more profundity than is commonly supposed he had. He may remain "Papa Haydn" from an historical point of view when he is recognized as an innovator par excellence. Perhaps Haydn, 200 years after, is just beginning to come into his own.

Manhattan Music

Carnegie Hall

Today — Philharmonic - Symphony Society at 3; New Friends of Music at 5:30.

Tuesday — Artur Rubinstein, pianist, at 8:30.

Wednesday — Philharmonic-Symphony Society at 2:30.

Thursday—Philharmonic-Symphony Society at 8:45.

Town Hall

Today — Arthur de Filippi, tenor, at 3; Ray Lev, pianist, at 8:30.

Tomorrow—Helen Thomas, pianist, at 8:30.

Wednesday—Lyell Barbour, pianist, at 8:30.

Saturday—Adolf Busch, violinist; Rudolf Serkin, pianist; final recital at 8:30.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 2 - 1939

The Washington Choral Society, directed by Louis A. Potter, has begun weekly rehearsals of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," which will be sung here next season. As far as is known by the choral society, the "Missa Solemnis" has never been heard here, and is rarely presented because of the extreme difficulty of its adequate presentation. Its most recent performances have been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rehearsals are

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 2 - 1939

CONCERT AND OPERA ASIDES

Gleanings From the Orchestral Front—Ensemble of the New Friends to Continue Next Season—Prize Winners

THE orchestral pot is simmering. News and rumors from cities in the East and West have been drifting in about various orchestras. Here are some of these items:

Isidor Gusikoff is leaving his post as first 'cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Difficulties with the conductor, Mr. Ormandy. He is joining the N. B. C. Orchestra. The 'cellist of the Kolisch Quartet and the first 'cellist of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra are others involved in the shift that seems to have affected the 'cello section.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's plan to go abroad this Spring, with visits and performances in England, France, Belgium and Holland on the agenda, has evidently not worked out, and the trip may be called off for the time being.

The chamber orchestra of the New Friends of Music is going to continue. Concerts are being booked for next season, in town and afield. And compositions are being commissioned, which is to the good.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 2 - 1939

Boston Players Offer Season's Final Concert

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Work by Stravinsky; Boys' Choir at Town Hall

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, made its last New York appearance of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall while, at Town Hall, the Apollo Boys' Choir from Birmingham, Ala., was giving its first New York concert under Coleman Cooper's direction. Dr. Koussevitzky devoted his program to the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," Stravinsky's "La Sacre du Printemps" and Brahm's first symphony, and the twenty-four boys from the South sang religious music by Franck, Adams, Mozart, Nascus, Eber and Schmidt and secular songs by Mozart, Forsyth, Schubert, Weber, Kjerulf and Krull.

"Le Sacre du Printemps" is already in its second quarter-century, and fifteen years have passed since it was introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then under Pierre Monteux. Yesterday afternoon's performance was the twenty-fourth in this borough and the first since Mr. Stravinsky conducted the work with the Philharmonic-Symphony two years ago, and had opportunity to reflect upon the difference between the cheers he received on that occasion and the demonstration of a very different sort which accompanied the Paris premiere of the "Sacre" in 1913.

This work can now be regarded as one of the regular members of our standard repertoire and as music whose durable merits have remained apparent after the disappearance of the sensation and controversy of its first years. The exciting effect of the impact of its weighty, emphatic, constantly changing rhythms wanes after repeated hearings, but these are still impressive; the music, if not made throughout of equally precious metals, remains something of exceptional stature and mass, elemental and intensely imaginative. The performance, as on other occasions when the work has been played by this orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky, was admirable both for its force and momentum, its clarity of outline and detail and its expressiveness both in the subtle, remotely poetic measures of the score and in those of massed sonority and percussiveness. There was ardent applause. Praise was also due to the conductor and his admirable orchestra for the sensitive and imaginative interpretation of the haunting Moussorgsky prelude.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 3 - 1939

Fine Music Marks End of Season

Boston Symphony Gives Brilliant Final Program.

By PITTS SANBORN.

As vernal valedictory the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its local season on Saturday with a Carnegie Hall matinee that in brilliance has perhaps never been surpassed anywhere. The program offered by Serge Koussevitzky comprised three numbers—Moussorgsky's prelude to his opera "Khovanstchina," Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," and the First Symphony of Brahms.

If brilliance had no place in the prelude, this picture of dawn on the Moskva River had the balance, finish, euphony that it required. And it prefaced beautifully the sheer orchestral splendors that were to follow. The "Sacre" may no longer administer the fillip that it once did as a concert piece—it loses much away from the stage and the dancing—but in any case Saturday's performance as an example of instrumental virtuosity was unsurpassable.

So was the performance of the symphony. One might object here and there to Mr. Koussevitzky's tempi, but, on the other hand, his treatment of certain details was perhaps unprecedentedly happy. And be all that as it may, the cumulative effect was overwhelming. The great audience applauded the "Sacre" enthusiastically and after the incontestable greatness of Brahms some

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 5 - 1939

Last Concert in Providence

Society Hears Closing Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Special to the Herald Tribune

PROVIDENCE, April 4.—Among those attending the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here tonight were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Shaw Safe, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Maurice Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh F. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis and Mr. and Mrs. Byron S. Watson.

WALLA WALLA, WASH. ✓
UNION - BULLETIN

APR 2 - 1939

Symphony Orchestra for Doctors Only

A group of about 50 Boston medical doctors have organized a symphony orchestra of their own. Nicholas Slonimsky, formerly affiliated with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, will conduct.

214

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

APR 3 - 1939

Week-End Music Events

Walter Conducts NBC Symphony in Berlioz Program—"New Friends" Season Ends

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky gave their last local concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon. The program was devoted to Stravinsky's "La Sacre du Printemps," Brahms' First Symphony, and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina."

In the evening in the same hall, the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under John Barbirolli, was heard in a Students' Concert. The Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Delius was played for the first time at the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts; the soloist was the orchestra's own John Corigliano. The program opened with Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and closed with the First Symphony of Sibelius.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

APR 10 1939

SYMPHONIC, ETC.

Aaron Copland: El Salón Mexico (Boston Symphony, Sergei Koussevitzky conducting; Victor: 3 sides). At his best as a deft impressionist, U. S. Composer Copland here records sultry musical impressions of Mexico. Koussevitzky's Bostonians play them like summer lightning.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 3 - 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Exceptional Performance of Stravinsky In Boston Finale; NBC Plays All-Berlioz; Iturbi and Corigliano Soloists

Musically speaking, the Rite of Spring was officially celebrated at the Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall on Saturday with Serge Koussevitzky acting as high priest for the performance of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Those who were present will perhaps never forget the occasion, for the performance was one of the most remarkable on record. It is almost inconceivable to think that it could be done better.

A quarter of a century, however, has not rid us of strongly divided opinion about Stravinsky's work. Gone is the out-and-out irritation at the music; it was received not only tolerantly but with a decided show of applause. There was even cause for cheers, but these probably came more for the superb playing of the orchestra than for the music. Many in the audience would emphatically claim that it wasn't music, but their numbers are diminishing with the years. It still is and will remain a striking composition. The sooner we realize that Stravinsky achieved what he set out to do, we shall admire his work the more. He has depicted pagan Russia in this music: primitive, violent and intensely expressive. No wonder there are frenzied, excruciating moments, savage to the core, but how vivid and meaningful they are. After this performance there was more cause for exultation than anything else: Dr. Koussevitzky had made it music in the accepted sense and in a manner little short of amazing.

After so stupendous an experience as the Stravinsky, it was something for both conductor and orchestra to turn to Brahms First Symphony and give another memorable performance. The power and the sweep of his broad and majestic conception of this familiar music was a recreation of exceptional skill. The concert opened with Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," a gem of its kind, and treated as such.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 3 - 1939

Music of the Week

Bonner's 'White Nights'—Cori
Iturbi Are Soloists—'Le Sacre

Bostonians End Season.

The remarkable feature of the season's last matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday was not the splendid playing by the musicians, or the constant interest of Serge Koussevitzky's conducting. These, after all, are in the realm of the expectable. But the enthusiasm that greeted the performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" was a startling evidence of the progress local audiences have made in listening capacity in a decade.

Now that the over-wash of sensationalism has begun to recede, it becomes apparent that if the work is not the earth-shaking masterpiece that its proponents proclaim it to be, it has musical values beyond those acknowledged by its detractors. As Mr. Koussevitzky's fluid and propulsive performance demonstrated, it has merits, in purely conventional musical terms, not usually conceded to it. Among these the consistency of the musical idiom and the superb suitability of the orchestral language to the emotional thought are outstanding. It was Mr. Koussevitzky's accomplishment to make plain the constructional plan of the work without sacrificing any of its legendary force and impact.

The afternoon was otherwise devoted to less inciting material, beginning with the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" and concluding with the Brahms first symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky was particularly fortunate in his evocation of mood in the prelude, in the delicacy and firmness with which he administered the orchestral colors of Moussorgsky's tonal painting. The large audience lingered to applaud the players at length after the symphony, which was surpassingly well-played.

I. K.

THE STAGE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 1 - 1939

True to his reputation as the most modern-minded of conductors, Serge Koussevitzky listed three locally new works in his Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall. John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, played by Zlatko Balokovic, is facile, melodious, overlong, and unimportant. Roy Harris' third symphony seems to me to be the music of a man who has something to say that ought to be said in some other medium than music; though I confess I'm not sure whether this is because of the character of Harris' thought, or because of the uncertainty of his musical craftsmanship. Thought and craftsmanship were perfectly wedded in Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf, "a fairy tale for children."

Gifted Boston Musician Paves Way for Layman

Trans. By John N. Bur 8/39

WHAT TO LISTEN FOR IN MUSIC. By Aaron Copland. New York: Whittlesey House. $2.50.

No musician or writer comes to mind to whom one might better turn for a book of this sort. In the first place, Aaron Copland happens to be that rare combination, a distinguished creative musician, and a lucid and engaging writer. He takes the public into his composer's sanctum, and there tells him about the listening points of his art and its component parts. Mr. Copland addresses himself to those who, knowing a little or more than a little about music, are willing to have the whole subject sketched in outline, each department, such as melody or harmony, being followed in brief from the earliest germ to the latest modernistic experiments. The necessary covering of fundamentals does not become tedious, for one reason, because it helps the full perspective; for another, because the writer is too adroit to become bogged in academic detail.

Although the chapters are derived from a series of lectures, the style is conversational and has no air of classroom didacticism, in spite of the considerable amount of definition and analysis which must be traversed. Mr. Copland speaks as an enthusiast of music, elucidating its mysteries to others similarly minded but less well equipped, yet desirous of sharpening their perceptions. Emerging from the experience of a sensitive and searching artist, his information is vital and illuminating from its very directness.

Rhythm and Counterpoint

The book traverses the elements of music, giving a chapter each to rhythm, melody, harmony, tone color, contrapuntal texture, the fundamentals of structure, and the principal musical forms. There is a prefatory chapter in which he gives valuable suggestions on improving one's listening, and another in which he divulges how music occurs to him and finds fruition. There is conjecture, too, upon how other composers, otherwise constituted, have probably gone about the business of creation. There is an interesting chapter on the opera, with a discussion of past and present tendencies, and finally, a chapter on the interpreters, the gentlemen without whom the composers would remain solitary and unsung.

The personal touch is of course more evident in these controversial chapters, where, while certain hazier corners of our knowledge are being cleared up, we somehow become ever more closely acquainted with Aaron Copland himself. We even detect a humanizing bias on certain topics, as, for example, jazz. The more nearly expository chapters have the finger prints of the writer, although he is too much the clear visioned analyst to allow the necessary objectivity to be obscured.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL

MAR 31 1939

New Recordings Cater to Varied Musical Tastes

By Bob Locke

Classical

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston musical group through a new composition, entitled "El Salon Mexico." The result is stirring symphonic jazz, for the composer has arranged the rhythm tunes of old Mexico in modern dress. This is Victor Album, M-546. Strawinsky's "Song of the Volga Boatmen," also included in the album, needs no introduction to music lovers.

MUSIC

Northwest of Chicago

Dimitri Mitropoulos, Twice a Boston Guest, Now Conducting the Minneapolis Orchestra

B. Trans By MOSES SMITH April 5/39

MINNEAPOLIS, Minnesota (By Mail)—The name of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra through the past season and a half, is not unknown in Boston. It was as guest conductor of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that he made his first American appearances. The acclaim with which he was then greeted was repeated under similar circumstances in the following season. Invited to conduct as guest in Minneapolis as well, during the season after Eugene Ormandy had departed from his post here and when those in charge of the local orchestra were frankly looking for a successor, Mitropoulos made so favorable an impression as to insure his engagement as soon as he was free to accept it the following season.

By all accounts and by evidence of the behavior of the audience last Friday evening in the vast Northrop Memorial Auditorium of the University of Minnesota, Mitropoulos has been almost fantastically successful in gaining the affections of the local public. His job was, so to say, cut out for him in succession to the spectacularly successful Ormandy, as the latter's was in his succession to Stokowski in Philadelphia. Those who recall Mitropoulos' appearances in Boston would scarcely expect that his success here should be based on anything but purely musical practices. And so, to the extent that one could tell at a single session, it turned out on Friday night.

Program and Performance

Conducting, as is his custom, entirely from memory, Mitropoulos with his orchestra traversed a program consisting of Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture, the Symphony that Hindemith made out of sections of "Matthis der Mahler," the Liszt Piano Concerto in E-flat and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. Dalies Frantz, young American pianist, was the remarkable soloist for this longish program, which was made a little longer by the addition of two solo piano pieces at the insistence of the huge audience, filling most of the 4800 seats of the auditorium. The program in actual performance was a little shorter than it appears on paper because of the brisk tempos set and maintained by Mitropoulos for the two symphonies.

The pace for the first theme of the first movement, "Angelic Concert," of Hindemith's Symphony was, indeed, startlingly brisk, in comparison with what one had heard in Bostonian performances. But Mitropoulos' tempo seemed justified by the results; and it had the advantage of making Hindemith's music seem even more contemporary than had previously been the case. To maintain that tempo required a good orchestra, which Mitropoulos now has at his service, whether by inheritance or by dint of his own efforts the visitor, of course, cannot say.

The manifold virtues of that orchestra and of the conductor were repeatedly to be observed through the course of the concert. The conductor's paramount concern with clarity of line was constantly exemplified in the Beethoven Symphony without neglect of the lyrical element with which the work is so rich. The necessary and often difficult changes of pace were beautifully manipulated by the conductor and expertly executed by a pliable, precise orchestra. The listener discerned no ragged edges either in the performance of the Beethoven Symphony, the naked simplicity of which exposes every fault, or in the presentation of the complicated music of Hindemith, wherein the brass section achieved an impressive, rugged sonority.

Conductor and Audience

On the whole, though, sonority is not a principal virtue of the Minneapolis orchestra as heard on Friday night. In part this fact is probably due to the size and nature of the auditorium, newer and larger than the headquarters of the three principal Eastern orchestras or than the intimate auditorium that houses the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. But much can also be explained by the attitude of the conductor, as first noted in the Boston concerts of several years ago. Like Toscanini, for example, he will go to the greatest lengths to insure clarity of line and fine balance among the several choirs, so that every detail may be heard as clearly as possible. Here and there, as it seems, he does not eschew sonority for its own sake. But he is very far—and fortunately so, from the viewpoint of the present writer—from making a god out of it, as is the more or less prevalent custom among most conductors and orchestras on the American scene. Again, Mr. Mitropoulos is not quite so finicky as Toscanini about little changes of pace here and there, to point up a detail, emphasize a harmonic change. But he attempts nothing like the distortions with which younger conductors in America apparently try to emphasize their "individuality" and thus make their way.

His obsessing passion seems rather to make music in the best way he knows how. If he notices the audience it is by virtue of their participation in the proceedings, not because he is putting on a show for them. The heartening thing is that such an audience, fairly remote from the center of musical culture in America, should respond to such ministrations with the greatest of enthusiasm. It is a truism that the larger the audience and the larger the auditorium the more difficult to establish a rapport between performers and listeners. Yet on Friday night this audience, assembled presumably from both of the Twin Cities and from miles around, listened to the proceedings with a close attention and engrossment that astonished the visitor from the East. One might almost have confused the condition with soporific inattention but for the storm of applause which the end of a number invariably released.

NELSON EDDY WILL SING

B. Post April 9/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The symphony of David Stanley Smith will add another to the sizeable list of Boston and world-premieres of American compositions that have taken place at Symphony Hall this season. Relying only upon memory, which may be imperfect, this list to date includes the violin concertos of Edward Burlingame Hill and John Alden Carpenter, the symphonies by Roy Harris and William Schuman and a suite by Gardner Read, not to mention these works by Americans who are not native born: Berezowsky's concerto for string quartet and orchestra, Dukelsky,s "Dedications," Langendoen's "Improvisations" and a whole programme of the music of Ernest Bloch.

* * * *

The other numbers on this week's Symphony programme, which will be conducted by Richard Burgin, are Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride" and three Wagnerian selections: The Prelude to "Parsifal," the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung."

Tuesday evening in John Hancock Hall there will be a concert by the Northland College Choir of Ashland, Wis., under the direction of Professor Sigvart Steen.

On Wednesday evening there will come the sixth and last of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, given by Wheeler Beckett and 70 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Thursday evening at the Women's Republican Club a programme of French music will be given by Artiss de Volt, harpist, and Marion Boit, diseuse.

214

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

APR 3 1939

Week-End Music Events

Walter Conducts NBC Symphony in Berlioz Program—"New Friends" Season Ends

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky gave their last local concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon. The program was devoted to Stravinsky's "La Sacre du Printemps," Brahms' First Symphony, and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina."

In the evening in the same hall, the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under John Barbirolli, was heard in a Students' Concert. The Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Delius was played for the first time at the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts; the soloist was the orchestra's own John Corigliano. The program opened with Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and closed with the First Symphony of Sibelius.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

APR 10 1939

SYMPHONIC, ETC.

Aaron Copland: El Salón Mexico (Boston Symphony, Sergei Koussevitzky conducting; Victor: 3 sides). At his best as a deft impressionist, U. S. Composer Copland here records sultry musical impressions of Mexico. Koussevitzky's Bostonians play them like summer lightning.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 3 - 1939

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Exceptional Performance of Stravinsky In Boston Finale; NBC Plays All-Berlioz; Iturbi and Corigliano Soloists

Musically speaking, the Rite of Spring was officially celebrated at the Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall on Saturday with Serge Koussevitzky acting as high priest for the performance of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Those who were present will perhaps never forget the occasion, for the performance was one of the most remarkable on record. It is almost inconceivable to think that it could be done better.

A quarter of a century, however, has not rid us of strongly divided opinion about Stravinsky's work. Gone is the out-and-out irritation at the music; it was received not only tolerantly but with a decided show of applause. There was even cause for cheers, but these probably came more for the superb playing of the orchestra than for the music. Many in the audience would emphatically claim that it wasn't music, but their numbers are diminishing with the years. It still is and will remain a striking composition. The sooner we realize that Stravinsky achieved what he set out to do, we shall admire his work the more. He has depicted pagan Russia in this music: primitive, violent and intensely expressive. No wonder there are frenzied, excruciating moments, savage to the core, but how vivid and meaningful they are. After this performance there was more cause for exultation than anything else: Dr. Koussevitzky had made it music in the accepted sense and in a manner little short of amazing.

After so stupendous an experience as the Stravinsky, it was something for both conductor and orchestra to turn to Brahms First Symphony and give another memorable performance. The power and the sweep of his broad and majestic conception of this familiar music was a recreation of exceptional skill. The concert opened with Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," a gem of its kind, and treated as such.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 3 - 1939

Music of the Week

Bonner's 'White Nights'—Cori
Iturbi Are Soloists—'Le Sacre

Bostonians End Season.

The remarkable feature of the season's last matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday was not the splendid playing by the musicians, or the constant interest of Serge Koussevitzky's conducting. These, after all, are in the realm of the expectable. But the enthusiasm that greeted the performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" was a startling evidence of the progress local audiences have made in listening capacity in a decade.

Now that the over-wash of sensationalism has begun to recede, it becomes apparent that if the work is not the earth-shaking masterpiece that its proponents proclaim it to be, it has musical values beyond those acknowledged by its detractors. As Mr. Koussevitzky's fluid and propulsive performance demonstrated, it has merits, in purely conventional musical terms, not usually conceded to it. Among these the consistency of the musical idiom and the superb suitability of the orchestral language to the emotional thought are outstanding. It was Mr. Koussevitzky's accomplishment to make plain the constructional plan of the work without sacrificing any of its legendary force and impact.

The afternoon was otherwise devoted to less inciting material, beginning with the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" and concluding with the Brahms first symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky was particularly fortunate in his evocation of mood in the prelude, in the delicacy and firmness with which he administered the orchestral colors of Moussorgsky's tonal painting. The large audience lingered to applaud the players at length after the symphony, which was surpassingly well-played. I. K.

THE STAGE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 1 - 1939

True to his reputation as the most modern-minded of conductors, Serge Koussevitzky listed three locally new works in his Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall. John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto, played by Zlatko Balokovic, is facile, melodious, overlong, and unimportant. Roy Harris' third symphony seems to me to be the music of a man who has something to say that ought to be said in some other medium than music; though I confess I'm not sure whether this is because of the character of Harris' thought, or because of the uncertainty of his musical craftsmanship. Thought and craftsmanship were perfectly wedded in Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf, "a fairy tale for children."

Gifted Boston Musician Paves Way for Layman

Trans By John N. Burk

WHAT TO LISTEN FOR IN MUSIC. By Aaron Copland. New York: Whittlesey House. $2.50.

No musician or writer comes to mind to whom one might better turn for a book of this sort. In the first place, Aaron Copland happens to be that rare combination, a distinguished creative musician, and a lucid and engaging writer. He takes the public into his composer's sanctum, and there tells him about the listening points of his art and its component parts. Mr. Copland addresses himself to those who, knowing a little or more than a little about music, are willing to have the whole subject sketched in outline, each department, such as melody or harmony, being followed in brief from the earliest germ to the latest modernistic experiments. The necessary covering of fundamentals does not become tedious, for one reason, because it helps the full perspective; for another, because the writer is too adroit to become bogged in academic detail.

Although the chapters are derived from a series of lectures, the style is conversational and has no air of classroom didacticism, in spite of the considerable amount of definition and analysis which must be traversed. Mr. Copland speaks as an enthusiast of music, elucidating its mysteries to others similarly minded but less well equipped, yet desirous of sharpening their perceptions. Emerging from the experience of a sensitive and searching artist, his information is vital and illuminating from its very directness.

Rhythm and Counterpoint

The book traverses the elements of music, giving a chapter each to rhythm, melody, harmony, tone color, contrapuntal texture, the fundamentals of structure, and the principal musical forms. There is a prefatory chapter in which he gives valuable suggestions on improving one's listening, and another in which he divulges how music occurs to him and finds fruition. There is conjecture, too, upon how other composers, otherwise constituted, have probably gone about the business of creation. There is an interesting chapter on the opera, with a discussion of past and present tendencies, and finally, a chapter on the interpreters, the gentlemen without whom the composers would remain solitary and unsung.

The personal touch is of course more evident in these controversial chapters, where, while certain hazier corners of our knowledge are being cleared up, we somehow become ever more closely acquainted with Aaron Copland himself. We even detect a humanizing bias on certain topics, as, for example, jazz. The more nearly expository chapters have the finger prints of the writer, although he is too much the clear visioned analyst to allow the necessary objectivity to be obscured.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL

MAR 31 1939

New Recordings Cater to Varied Musical Tastes

By Bob Locke

Classical

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston musical group through a new composition, entitled "El Salon Mexico." The result is stirring symphonic jazz, for the composer has arranged the rhythm tunes of old Mexico in modern dress. This is Victor Album, M-546. Strawinsky's "Song of the Volga Boatmen," also included in the album, needs no introduction to music lovers.

MUSIC

Northwest of Chicago

Dimitri Mitropoulos, Twice a Boston Guest, Now Conducting the Minneapolis Orchestra

B. Trans By MOSES SMITH April 5/39

MINNEAPOLIS, Minnesota (By Mail)—The name of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra through the past season and a half, is not unknown in Boston. It was as guest conductor of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that he made his first American appearances. The acclaim with which he was then greeted was repeated under similar circumstances in the following season. Invited to conduct as guest in Minneapolis as well, during the season after Eugene Ormandy had departed from his post here and when those in charge of the local orchestra were frankly looking for a successor, Mitropoulos made so favorable an impression as to insure his engagement as soon as he was free to accept it the following season.

By all accounts and by evidence of the behavior of the audience last Friday evening in the vast Northrop Memorial Auditorium of the University of Minnesota, Mitropoulos has been almost fantastically successful in gaining the affections of the local public. His job was, so to say, cut out for him in succession to the spectacularly successful Ormandy, as the latter's was in his succession to Stokowski in Philadelphia. Those who recall Mitropoulos' appearances in Boston would scarcely expect that his success here should be based on anything but purely musical practices. And so, to the extent that one could tell at a single session, it turned out on Friday night.

Program and Performance

Conducting, as is his custom, entirely from memory, Mitropoulos with his orchestra traversed a program consisting of Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture, the Symphony that Hindemith made out of sections of "Matthis der Mahler," the Liszt Piano Concerto in E-flat and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. Dalies Frantz, young American pianist, was the remarkable soloist for this longish program, which was made a little longer by the addition of two solo piano pieces at the insistence of the huge audience, filling most of the 4800 seats of the auditorium. The program in actual performance was a little shorter than it appears on paper because of the brisk tempos set and maintained by Mitropoulos for the two symphonies.

The pace for the first themes of the first movement, "Angelic Concert," of Hindemith's Symphony was, indeed, startlingly brisk, in comparison with what one had heard in Bostonian performances. But Mitropoulos' tempo seemed justified by the results; and it had the advantage of making Hindemith's music seem even more contemporary than had previously been the case. To maintain that tempo required a good orchestra, which Mitropoulos now has at his service, whether by inheritance or by dint of his own efforts the visitor, of course, cannot say.

The manifold virtues of that orchestra and of the conductor were repeatedly to be observed through the course of the concert. The conductor's paramount concern with clarity of line was constantly exemplified in the Beethoven Symphony without neglect of the lyrical element with which the work is so rich. The necessary and often difficult changes of pace were beautifully manipulated by the conductor and expertly executed by a pliable, precise orchestra. The listener discerned no ragged edges either in the performance of the Beethoven Symphony, the naked simplicity of which exposes every fault, or in the presentation of the complicated music of Hindemith, wherein the brass section achieved an impressive, rugged sonority.

Conductor and Audience

On the whole, though, sonority is not a principal virtue of the Minneapolis orchestra as heard on Friday night. In part this fact is probably due to the size and nature of the auditorium, newer and larger than the headquarters of the three principal Eastern orchestras or than the intimate auditorium that houses the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. But much can also be explained by the attitude of the conductor, as first noted in the Boston concerts of several years ago. Like Toscanini, for example, he will go to the greatest lengths to insure clarity of line and fine balance among the several choirs, so that every detail may be heard as clearly as possible. Here and there, as it seems, he does not eschew sonority for its own sake. But he is very far—and fortunately so, from the viewpoint of the present writer—from making a god out of it, as is the more or less prevalent custom among most conductors and orchestras on the American scene. Again, Mr. Mitropoulos is not quite so finicky as Toscanini about little changes of pace here and there, to point up a detail, emphasize a harmonic change. But he attempts nothing like the distortions with which younger conductors in America apparently try to emphasize their "individuality" and thus make their way.

His obsessing passion seems rather to make music in the best way he knows how. If he notices the audience it is by virtue of their participation in the proceedings, not because he is putting on a show for them. The heartening thing is that such an audience, fairly remote from the center of musical culture in America, should respond to such ministrations with the greatest of enthusiasm. It is a truism that the larger the audience and the larger the auditorium the more difficult to establish a rapport between performers and listeners. Yet on Friday night this audience, assembled presumably from both of the Twin Cities and from miles around, listened to the proceedings with a close attention and engrossment that astonished the visitor from the East. One might almost have confused the condition with soporific inattention but for the storm of applause which the end of a number invariably released.

NELSON EDDY WILL SING

B. Post April 9/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The symphony of David Stanley Smith will add another to the sizeable list of Boston and world-premieres of American compositions that have taken place at Symphony Hall this season. Relying only upon memory, which may be imperfect, this list to date includes the violin concertos of Edward Burlingame Hill and John Alden Carpenter, the symphonies by Roy Harris and William Schuman and a suite by Gardner Read, not to mention these works by Americans who are not native born: Berezowsky's concerto for string quartet and orchestra, Dukelsky's "Dedications," Langendoen's "Improvisations" and a whole programme of the music of Ernest Bloch.

* * *

The other numbers on this week's Symphony programme, which will be conducted by Richard Burgin, are Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride", and three Wagnerian selections: The Prelude to "Parsifal," the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung."

Tuesday evening in John Hancock Hall there will be a concert by the Northland College Choir of Ashland, Wis., under the direction of Professor Sigvart Steen.

On Wednesday evening there will come the sixth and last of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, given by Wheeler Beckett and 70 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Thursday evening at the Women's Republican Club a programme of French music will be given by Artiss de Volt, harpist, and Marion [illegible], diseuse.

HOLY WEEK MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

'Symphony of Psalms' of Stravinsky, With Cecilia Chorus

B. Post — April 7/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

So seldom of late has Dr. Koussevitzky made any seasonable observances in the concerts falling near Christmas or in Holy Week that the quasi-religious character of the first part of yesterday's programme becomes a matter for comment. This division included Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for Double String Orchestra and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms." The rest, wholly secular, fell to Brahms' Second Pianoforte Concerto, with Artur Rubinstein as soloist.

WILLIAMS' FANTASIA

No longer are Symphony concerts given on Good Friday. Yet once inside the hall yesterday, it was difficult to persuade one's self that Friday was still a day away. Perhaps there were more empty seats than sometimes, but the audience was its usual self, applauding politely after the Fantasia, more warmly after the music of Stravinsky, and most enthusiastically when Brahms' long (and not always interesting) concerto had run its course.

A little monotonous in mood—and mood and tonal color are about all it has to offer—the "Tallis Fantasia" was, nevertheless, good to hear yesterday. It is not easy to think of another piece for strings alone that better displays the manifold tints of which that choir is capable. And when the strings are those of the present Boston Symphony, the result is a veritable feast for the ear. While upon the subject of Vaughan Williams, it might be remarked that either the "London" Symphony or the "Pastoral," which have gone unheard here for some time, would inject a fresh note in a side of the repertory that badly needs freshening.

"Symphony of Psalms"

As in previous performances of the "Symphony of Psalms," the chorus yesterday was that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler. Possibly some have liked the music from the beginning, while others, no doubt, have never warmed to it. For this reviewer, who does not mind confessing to an initial unreceptiveness, the work becomes increasingly impressive on each repetition—save for the mawkish closing pages with their upsetting resemblance to the Te Deum in "Tosca."

Until this lapse into triteness and conventionality is reached, Stravinsky contrives to write music of devotional fervor and of gripping sincerity in an idiom so independent of precedent that the unwary might easily dismiss it as merely queer.

Since the "Symphony of Psalms" is inordinately difficult to sing, the Cecilia chorus must once more be congratulated on having done so well with it. In places, more volume of tone would have been in order, but the lack here was chiefly numerical. The curiously composed orchestral portion, with its absence of violins, violas and clarinets, sounded again with superb effectiveness, granting Stravinsky's conception of effect.

Brahm's Concerto

In the first movement of Brahms' Concerto, Mr. Rubinstein seemed to be endeavoring to make of it something which it is not. Instead of letting Brahms go his mellow way, the pianist tried to infuse into the music some of his own dynamic energy, and Dr. Koussevitzky, as though taking his cue from the soloist, made a similar effort with the orchestral part, which is logy, even for Brahms. The result was a little like an attempt to push a steamroller uphill.

The so-called Scherzo is hard sledding under any circumstances, but the sentimental Andante and the almost perky Finale went very well. The pleasure of the audience has already been noted.

MUSIC

Globe April 7/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Since today is Good Friday, the afternoon concert this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was shifted to Thursday. The evening concert will be given, as usual, on Saturday at 8:15. Dr. Koussevitzky's program begins with Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia On a Theme By Thomas Tallis," continues with the "Symphony of Psalms" by Stravinsky (in which the assisting chorus is that of the Cecilia Society) and ends with Brahm' B-flat Piano Concerto. The soloist of the week is Artur Rubinstein, the Polish musician of considerable eminence who last appeared with the Boston Sympohny in 1921.

The fantasia which Vaughan Williams evolved out of a modal hymn tune by the 16th century Tallis, is one of the unique compositions of the early 20th century. Its very lack of pretense may induce some to believe it a pleasant trifle and no more. Some have even pronounced it "cloying." Always an independent creative mind, the contemporary English composer actually wrote a treasurable miniature, superb in color and atmosphere, contrasting the string sections of the orchestra and delving into modal harmony with complete naturalness.

The utter absence of constraint or artificiality is remarkable when you consider the flavor of antiquity which permeates the score. Nor is the fantasia too luscious. Beneath the silken smoothness of the melody there is real harmonic "bite." The performance was one to show off beautifully the extraordinary caliber of the Boston strings.

Future generations who write the further history of music may term Stravinsky to have been "The Great Experimenter." Certainly as an experiment in tone colors, rhythm and unconventional writing for vocal chorus, the "Symphony of Psalms" does boast striking moments. The fact that Stravinsky used no clarinets, violins or violas, content instead to emphasize brass, retaining woodwind and the mellower sounds of the lower strings, resulted of course in an unusual texture.

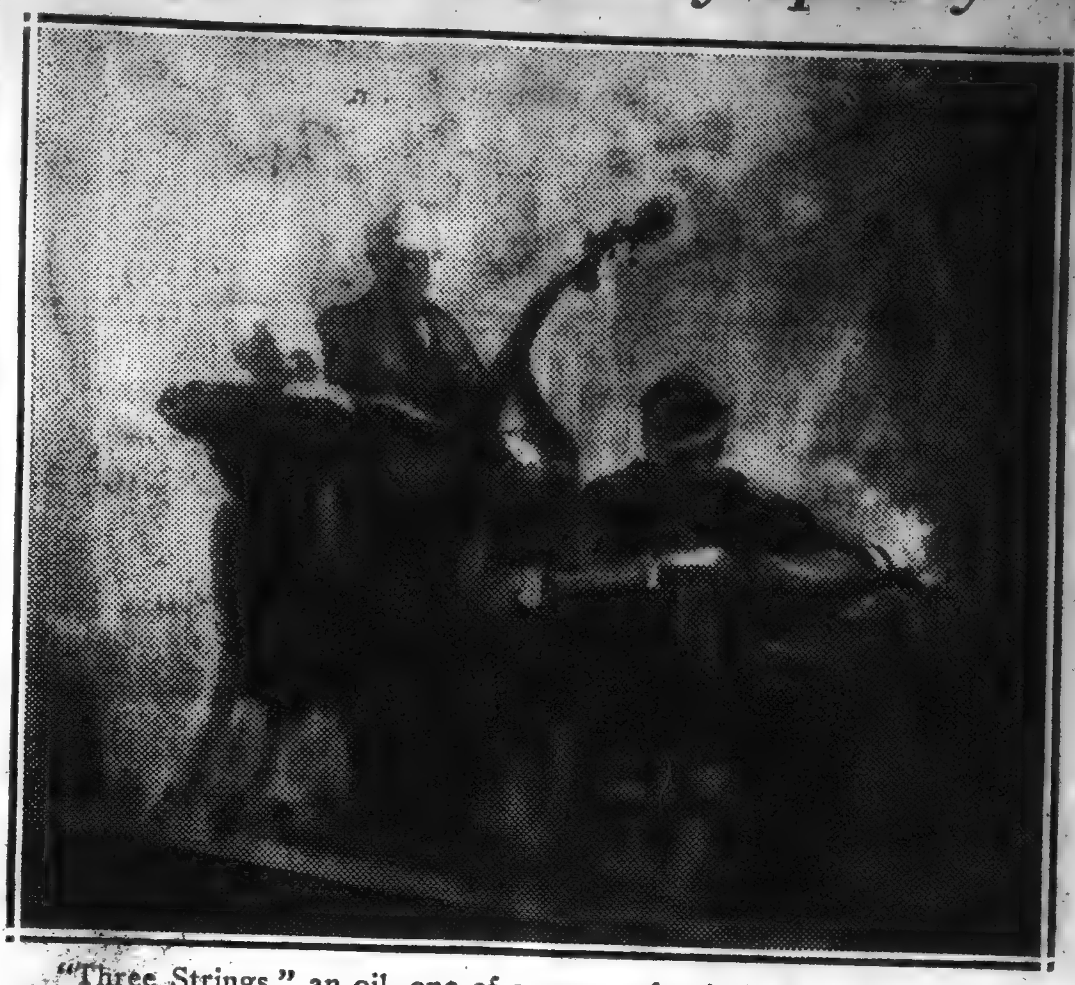
But apart from such matters of the composer's laboratory, how much living music does the "Symphony of Psalms" contain? To this reviewer each successive hearing brings out increasingly the dullness, dryness and prevailing desolation of this music. Surely in the second and third of the Psalms, Stravinsky did not sing joyfully unto the Lord.

Mr. Rubinstein is an exceptional technician of the piano, and his playing is invariably spirited. In fact, there was a little too much drive and tension in his otherwise musicianly performance. This tension seemed to bring an attendant hardness of tone in the fast movements. On the other hand, the andante, with that justly celebrated solo melody for cello, was captivatingly done both by soloist and the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading on the whole was more dramatic than is his custom with the B-flat Concerto, more intense than is suggested by the innate character of the music, in spite of its vast architectural spread. Nor was the orchestra, except in the slow movement, quite at best.

Mr. Rubinstein, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players were all most cordially received. Next week Prof. David Stanley Smith of Yale will conduct the first performance of his own Fourth Symphony. The remainder of the program, Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," and excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal," "Tannhauser" and "The Dusk of the Gods," will be conducted by Richard Burgin.

C. W. D.

Paintings of the Symphony



"Three Strings," an oil, one of a group of paintings and drawings by Donald C. Greason of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at rehearsal, now on exhibition at Symphony Hall, lent by Goodman-Walker, Inc., by whose courtesy they are reproduced. (Photo by George H. Davis Studio.)

B. Post — April 9/39

Paintings and drawings of Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra in rehearsal, by Donald C. Greason, one of New England's younger artists, are on exhibition in the Symphony Hall gallery through April, lent by Goodman-Walker, Inc. Mr. Greason has been working on this interesting series since last October. There is among them one oil, the largest, of a "Performance from the Right Orchestra," the generally low tonality accented vividly by the gold of harps and horn, and the white of an occasional score. Mr. Koussevitsky is absorbed in his conducting as are the players in their parts. A few deft brush strokes suggest a crowded house.

Various other oils show small groups of players as, for instance, "Three Strings," the two violins in action while the bass viol looks on apparently lost in thought. Another, two players with the pair of great gold harps in the background is in somewhat lighter key, the rose and gold of the harps vividly colorful. One or two of the smaller canvases have a faint suggestion of Daumier.

Sketches predominate, some of them in pen and ink and wash, others in charcoal. They are swift impressions; often the features are omitted or most casually indicated, but in spite of that the characterizations are surprisingly vivid. Mr. Koussevitsky appears often, of course, in familiar pose and gesture, occasionally coatless, always immediately recognizable. Being made during rehearsals these are all informal.

Mr. Greason strives for the whole as such rather than for detail in parts, yet in several papers he gives us a series of thumbnail sketches, as it were, centred about a larger figure. He is definitely of the modern school of technique and color.

MUSIC

B. Herald April 7/39

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 21st concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, was the soloist. The Cecilia Society Chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted. The program was as follows:

Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double string orchestra .... Vaughan Williams
Symphony of Psalms for orchestra and chorus .... Stravinsky
Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major Op. 83 .... Brahms

The customary orchestral observance of Good Friday and Easter was yesterday solved by Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms and possibly by Vaughan Williams's extensive use of ecclesiastical modes in the Fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis. The latter work does not awaken in us the enthusiastic praise that it receives from his admirers. The composer clearly got so interested in his contrasts of string sonority that he did not do much else musically except to wander and drift from one modal chord to another. This has long been a weakness with Vaughan Williams, though there are many of his works that reveal it as a perfectly legitimate characteristic. The pure sound of these string sonorities, particularly with as fine a body as in the Boston Symphony, can be very pleasant to listen to; but it also can end by being a bit of a bore.

Some may have felt that Stravinsky's extremely expressive and imaginative setting of three psalms in Latin to have been an unusual musical celebration of Good Friday. But why any more so than what has been called the "voluptuous religiosity" of "Parsifal"? As a matter of fact it is a singularly interesting musical and vocal experiment, very possibly the finest of the composer's recent work. Stravinsky does not do the expected in the Symphony of Psalms, but neither does his setting seem to try too eagerly and deliberately to avoid the obvious.

The praising of the Lord with cymbals and so forth does not call forth from him a huge battery of percussion; nor is he concerned with precise musical underlining of all the instruments named in the 150th Psalm. No less subtle and unusual, though less immediately striking, are the first two movements, if that is the proper term. The peculiar orchestra, with all the high strings and clarinets left out, becomes perfectly justified by the results that the composer obtains. Yesterday's performance was a moving one. The chorus, it is true, was not always even. At times an individual voice would stand out to the detriment of the general effect. On the other hand it may be allowed that the performance was thoroughly competent, for Mr. Fiedler and the Cecilia Society are very familiar with the score.

Mr. Rubinstein, who has not been heard with the Boston Symphony since 1921, gave an uneven performance of the Brahms Second Concerto. The first movement was throughout tense and excitable. Runs were smeared and chords pounded out for, apparently, dramatic reasons. There were also other distortions, rubato, over-emphasis and the like. As far as Brahms was concerned the result was hardly satisfactory. During the other three movements, especially in the finale, there was more to praise. One began to think of Brahms instead of Mr. Rubinstein. The slow movement, described as andante, seemed exceptionally dragged out to the point where the danger of sentimentality raises its head. Still, that may have been a suspicious reaction from the first movement. If only Mr. Rubinstein had not tossed technique and other things so to the winds at first, how differently might not one have described his performance?

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 1 - 1939

ORCHESTRAS AND CHORUSES

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting: Carnegie Hall, Thurs. Eve., March 30, at 8:45; Sat. Aft., April 1, at 2:30. Brooklyn Academy of Music (ST 3-6700), Fri. Eve., March 31, at 8:30.

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY—Barbirolli conducting: Carnegie Hall, Fri. Aft., March 31, at 2:30; Sat. Eve., April 1, at 8:45; Sun. Aft., April 2, at 3. (Soloists: Busch, March 31; Corigliano, April 1;

QUINCY, ILL.
HERALD - WHIG

APR 1 - 1939

POPULAR BOOKS OF GREAT MUSIC

The Garden City Publishing company has issued a new edition of "Great Concert Music" (Philip Hale's Symphony Programme Notes) as edited by John N. Burk. Originally published at $3.50, the Garden City edition is available to music lovers at $1.49. The book combines historical and descriptive notes with pertinent critical paragraphs. Of the author, Serge Koussovitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has said:

"Philip Hale, the great musicologist of America, left behind an incomparable gift—his annotations for the Boston Symphony programme books. These annotations, edited with care and distinction by John N. Burk, combined with Philip Hale's remarkable critical judgment, provide a book of historical value which should serve as a guide book to the student of music and to young critics. Indeed, the publication of this volume is an invaluable contribution [illegible] musical lit[illegible]."

---

24 Musical America March 25/39

ORCHESTRAS

Koussevitzky Conducts New Harris Symphony

Boston Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Ruth Posselt, violinist, assisting artist. Carnegie Hall, March 11, afternoon:

Symphony No. 3 .... Roy Harris
Concerto for Violin in D Major, Op 35 .... Tchaikovsky
'Peter and the Wolf' .... Prokofieff
'La Valse' .... Ravel

With a first New York performance of Roy Harris's Third Symphony as an opener, and Prokofieff's playful suite sandwiched between the old-fashioned virtuosity of Tchaikovsky and the very modern virtuosity of Ravel, Mr. Koussevitzky's program on this afternoon offered something for every type of listener. All of this music was played with the musicianship and superb elan peculiar to the Boston Symphony, leaving one with the feeling that it could scarcely have been heard under more favorable circumstances.

Mr. Harris's Symphony is a well-kn score, and from its broad opening theme, proclaimed in unison, to its poignantly conceived close, it progresses with a forceful stride indicative of unity. Throughout the work, there are suggestions here and there in the rhythms and in the thematic material of American folk music, neither quotations nor direct adaptations, but remote echoes of the rough and ready tunes and dances of the vanishing America. The work is austerely written, without much immediate melodic or harmonic appeal, but it has both strength and purpose in it. Two passages are especially notable for deft orchestration, one in which the wood-winds and brass disport themselves against a murmurous accompaniment of strings, and the close, in which a drum throbs monotonously through really eloquent harmonies which fortunately do not suggest a similarly devised passage in Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. Mr. Harris came to the stage to acknowledge the hearty reception of his work.

Miss Posselt played the Tchaikovsky work with youthful dash and bravura, technical assurance and with a full-bodied tone. There are other concertos, however, in which she would have been heard to even better advantage, for the Tchaikovsky work calls for a boldness and virility of style which this young artist, brilliant as her playing was, did not consistently reveal. The accompaniment was a model of finish and perfect adaptation to the soloist. Richard Hale was the narrator in Prokofieff's delightful fairy tale and a resplendent performance of 'La Valse' brought the afternoon to a close.

S.

ROSINDALE, MASS.
Weekly Parkway Transcript

MAR 3 1939

J. P. Branch Library Notes of Interest

The opera is now in season and there are many persons interested iin reading librettos, playing the musical scores and glancing through the various opera guides. The Jamaica Plain Branch library has been able to give these various books to the public. And there is too, the subject of symphonies and symphonic music written for the average public who loves this type of music.

Much symphonic music is being played and conducted over various radio stations. And we, the public, have become acquainted with such names as Arthur Rodzinski, Bruno Walter, Sergei Koussevitsky, and Arturo Tos[illegible]ous names in the world of conducting. Then also we are able to hear the great pianists and violinists by the mere tuning in on the various stations over the radio network. Great symphonic music is being transmitted over the many stations and it is the natural thing to spend an hour or two weekly, listening, enjoying, and perhaps discussing these works of art. To supplement our knowledge of the symphony there have been many books written by authorities on symphonic music.

We note just a few books on this subject that should appeal to the reader who loves music of the symphony and wishes to enlarge his knowledge of this particular type of music. Olin Downes has written a book called Symphonic broadcasts which is a collection of radio talks given by the author in connection with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York. He is also the author of the Dial Press, containing symphonic masterpieces. L. Gilman has written a book — Toscanini and great music-parts dealing with symphonies. Charles O'Connell's book on The Victor book of the symphony has a list of modern victor recordings or symphonic music—with a foreword by Leopold Stokowski.—Evelyn G. Green.

HOLY WEEK MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

'Symphony of Psalms' of Stravinsky, With Cecilia Chorus

B. Post — April 7/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

So seldom of late has Dr. Koussevitzky made any seasonable observances in the concerts falling near Christmas or in Holy Week that the quasi-religious character of the first part of yesterday's programme becomes a matter for comment. This division included Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for Double String Orchestra and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms." The rest, wholly secular, fell to Brahms' Second Pianoforte Concerto, with Artur Rubinstein as soloist.

WILLIAMS' FANTASIA

No longer are Symphony concerts given on Good Friday. Yet once inside the hall yesterday, it was difficult to persuade one's self that Friday was still a day away. Perhaps there were more empty seats than sometimes, but the audience was its usual self, applauding politely after the Fantasia, more warmly after the music of Stravinsky, and most enthusiastically when Brahms' long (and not always interesting) concerto had run its course.

A little monotonous in mood and [illegible] and tonal color [illegible] has to offer—the "Tallis [illegible]" was, nevertheless, good to hear [illegible]. It is not easy to think of another piece for strings alone that better displays the manifold tints of which that choir is capable. And when the strings are those of the present Boston Symphony, the result is a veritable feast for the ear. While upon the subject of Vaughan Williams, it might be remarked that either the "London" Symphony or the "Pastoral," which have gone unheard here for some time, would inject a fresh note in a side of the repertory that badly needs freshening.

"Symphony of Psalms"

As in previous performances of the "Symphony of Psalms," the chorus yesterday was that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler. Possibly some have liked the music from the beginning, while others, no doubt, have never warmed to it. For this reviewer, who does not mind confessing to an initial unreceptiveness, the work becomes increasingly impressive on each repetition—save for the mawkish closing pages with their upsetting resemblance to the Te Deum in "Tosca."

Until this lapse into triteness and conventionality is reached, Stravinsky contrives to write music of devotional fervor and of gripping sincerity in an idiom so independent of precedent that the unwary might easily dismiss it as merely queer.

Since the "Symphony of Psalms" is inordinately difficult to sing, the Cecilia chorus must once more be congratulated on having done so well with it. In places, more volume of tone would have been in order, but the lack here was chiefly numerical. The curiously composed orchestral portion, with its absence of violins, violas and clarinets, sounded again with superb effectiveness, granting Stravinsky's conception of effect.

Brahm's Concerto

In the first movement of Brahms' Concerto, Mr. Rubinstein seemed to be endeavoring to make of it something which it is not. Instead of letting Brahms go his mellow way, the pianist tried to infuse into the music some of his own dynamic energy, and Dr. Koussevitzky, as though taking his cue from the soloist, made a similar effort with the orchestral part, which is logy, even for Brahms. The result was a little like an attempt to push a steamroller uphill.

The so-called Scherzo is hard sledding under any circumstances, but the sentimental Andante and the almost perky Finale went very well. The pleasure of the audience has already been noted.

Globe

MUSIC

April 7/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Since today is Good Friday, the afternoon concert this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was shifted to Thursday. The evening concert will be given, as usual, on Saturday at 8:15. Dr. Koussevitzky's program begins with Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia On a Theme By Thomas Tallis," continues with the "Symphony of Psalms" by Stravinsky (in which the assisting chorus is that of the Cecilia Society) and ends with Brahm' B-flat Piano Concerto. The soloist of the week is Artur Rubinstein, the Polish musician of considerable eminence who last appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1921.

The fantasia which Vaughan Williams evolved out of a modal hymn tune by the 16th century Tallis, is one of the unique compositions of the early 20th century. Its very lack of pretense may induce some to believe it a pleasant trifle and no more. Some have even pronounced it "cloying." Always an independent creative mind, the contemporary English composer actually wrote a treasurable miniature, superb in color and atmosphere, contrasting the string sections of the orchestra and delving into modal harmony with complete naturalness.

The utter absence of constraint or artificiality is remarkable when you consider the flavor of antiquity which permeates the score. Nor is the fantasia too luscious. Beneath the silken smoothness of the melody there is real harmonic "bite." The performance was one to show off beautifully the extraordinary caliber of the Boston strings.

Future generations who write the further history of music may term Stravinsky to have been "The Great Experimenter." Certainly as an experiment in tone colors, rhythm and unconventional writing for vocal chorus, the "Symphony of Psalms" does boast striking moments. The fact that Stravinsky used no clarinets, violins or violas, content instead to emphasize brass, remaining woodwind and the mellower sounds of the lower strings, resulted of course in an unusual texture.

But apart from such matters of the composer's laboratory, how much living music does the "Symphony of Psalms" contain? To this reviewer each successive hearing brings out increasingly the dullness, dryness and prevailing desolation of this music. Surely in the second and third of the Psalms, Stravinsky did not sing joyfully unto the Lord.

Mr. Rubinstein is an exceptional technician of the piano, and his playing is invariably spirited. In fact, there was a little too much drive and tension in his otherwise musicianly performance. This tension seemed to bring an attendant hardness of tone in the fast movements. On the other hand, the andante, with that justly celebrated solo melody for cello, was captivatingly done both by soloist and the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading on the whole was more dramatic than is his custom with the B-flat Concerto, more intense than is suggested by the innate character of the music, in spite of its vast architectural spread. Nor was the orchestra, except in the slow movement, quite at best.

Mr. Rubinstein, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players were all most cordially received. Next week Prof. David Stanley Smith of Yale will conduct the first performance of his own Fourth Symphony. The remainder of the program, Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," and excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal," "Tannhauser" and "The Dusk of the Gods," will be conducted by Richard Burgin.

C. W. D.

B. Herald

MUSIC

April 7/39

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 21st concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, was the soloist. The Cecilia Society Chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted. The program was as follows:

Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double string orchestra .... Vaughan Williams
Symphony of Psalms for orchestra and chorus .... Stravinsky
Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major Op. 83 .... Brahms

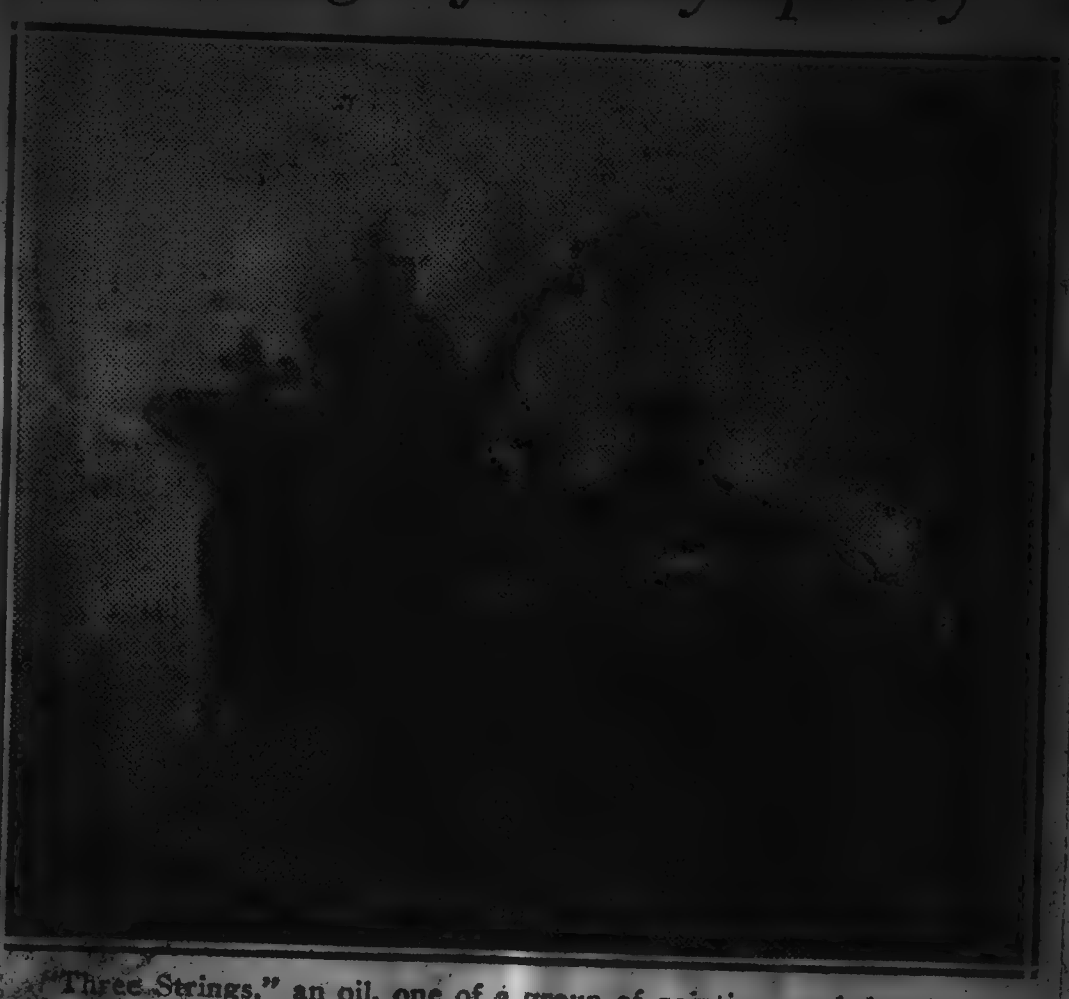
The customary orchestral observance of Good Friday and Easter was yesterday solved by Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms and possibly by Vaughan Williams's extensive use of ecclesiastical modes in the Fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis. The latter work does not awaken in us the enthusiastic praise that it receives from his admirers. The composer clearly got so interested in his contrasts of string sonority that he did not do much else musically except to wander and drift from one modal chord to another. This has long been a weakness with Vaughan Williams, though there are many of his works that reveal it as a perfectly legitimate characteristic. The pure sound of these string sonorities, particularly with as fine a body as in the Boston Symphony, can be very pleasant to listen to; but it also can end by being a bit of a bore.

Some may have felt that Stravinsky's extremely expressive and imaginative setting of three psalms in Latin to have been an unusual musical celebration of Good Friday. But why any more so than what has been called the "voluptuous religiosity" of "Parsifal"? As a matter of fact it is a singularly interesting musical and vocal experiment, very possibly the finest of the composer's recent work. Stravinsky does not do the expected in the Symphony of Psalms, but neither does his setting seem to try too eagerly and deliberately to avoid the obvious.

The praising of the Lord with cymbals and so forth does not call forth from him a huge battery of percussion; nor is he concerned with precise musical underlining of all the instruments named in the 150th Psalm. No less subtle and unusual, though less immediately striking, are the first two movements, if that is the proper term. The peculiar orchestra, with all the high strings and clarinets left out, becomes perfectly justified by the results that the composer obtains. Yesterday's performance was a moving one. The chorus, it is true, was not always even. At times an individual voice would stand out to the detriment of the general effect. On the other hand it may be allowed that the performance was thoroughly competent, for Mr. Fiedler and the Cecilia Society are very familiar with the score.

Mr. Rubinstein, who has not been heard with the Boston Symphony since 1921, gave an uneven performance of the Brahms Second Concerto. The first movement was throughout tense and excitable. Runs were smeared and chords pounded out for, apparently, dramatic reasons. There were also other distortions, rubato, over-emphasis and the like. As far as Brahms was concerned the result was hardly satisfactory. During the other three movements, especially in the finale, there was more to praise. One began to think of Brahms instead of Mr. Rubinstein. The slow movement, described as andante, seemed exceptionally dragged out to the point where the danger of sentimentality raises its head. Still, that may have been a suspicious reaction from the first movement. If only Mr. Rubinstein had not tossed technique and other things so to the winds at first, how differently might not one have described his performance?

Paintings of the Symphony



"Three Strings," an oil, one of a group of paintings and drawings by Donald C. Greason of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at rehearsal, now on exhibition at Symphony Hall, lent by Goodman-Walker, Inc., by whose courtesy they are reproduced. (Photo by George H. Davis Studio.)

B. Post — April 9/39

Paintings and drawings of Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra in rehearsal, by Donald C. Greason, one of New England's younger artists, are on exhibition in the Symphony Hall gallery through April, lent by Goodman-Walker, Inc. Mr. Greason has been working on this interesting series since last October. There is among them one oil, the largest, of a "Performance from the Right Orchestra," the generally low tonality accented vividly by the gold of harps and horn, and the whites of an occasional score. Mr. Koussevitsky is absorbed in his conducting as are the players in their parts. A few deft brush strokes suggest a crowded house.

Various other oils show small groups of players as, for instance, "Three Strings," the two violins in action while the bass viol looks on apparently lost in thought. Another, two players with the pair of great gold harps in the background is in somewhat lighter key, the rose and gold of the harps vividly colorful. One or two of the smaller canvases have a faint suggestion of Daumier.

Sketches predominate, some of them in pen and ink and wash, others in charcoal. They are swift impressions; often the features are omitted or most casually indicated, but in spite of that the characterizations are surprisingly vivid. Mr. Koussevitsky appears often, of course, in familiar pose and gesture, occasionally coatless, always immediately recognizable. Being made during rehearsals these are all informal.

Mr. Greason strives for the whole as such rather than for detail in parts, yet in several papers he gives us a series of thumbnail sketches, as it were, centred about a larger figure. He is definitely of the modern school of technique and color.

---

24 Musical America March 25/39

ORCHESTRAS

Koussevitzky Conducts New Harris Symphony

Boston Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Ruth Posselt, violinist, assisting artist. Carnegie Hall, March 11, afternoon:

Symphony No. 3 .... Roy Harris
Concerto for Violin in D Major, Op 35 .... Tchaikovsky
'Peter and the Wolf' .... Prokofieff
'La Valse' .... Ravel

With a first New York performance of Roy Harris's Third Symphony as an opener, and Prokofieff's playful suite sandwiched between the old-fashioned virtuosity of Tchaikovsky and the very modern virtuosity of Ravel, Mr. Koussevitzky's program on this afternoon offered something for every type of listener. All of this music was played with the musicianship and superb elan peculiar to the Boston Symphony, leaving one with the feeling that it could scarcely have been heard under more favorable circumstances.

Mr. Harris's Symphony is a well-kn score, and from its broad opening theme, proclaimed in unison, to its poignantly conceived close, it progresses with a forceful stride indicative of unity. Throughout the work, there are suggestions here and there in the rhythms and in the thematic material of American folk music, neither quotations nor direct adaptations, but remote echoes of the rough and ready tunes and dances of the vanishing America. The work is austerely written, without much immediate melodic or harmonic appeal, but it has both strength and purpose in it. Two passages are especially notable for deft orchestration, one in which the wood-winds and brass disport themselves against a murmurous accompaniment of strings, and the close, in which a drum throbs monotonously through really eloquent harmonies which fortunately do not suggest a similarly devised passage in Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. Mr. Harris came to the stage to acknowledge the hearty reception of his work.

Miss Posselt played the Tchaikovsky work with youthful dash and bravura, technical assurance and with a full-bodied tone. There are other concertos, however, in which she would have been heard to even better advantage, for the Tchaikovsky work calls for a boldness and virility of style which this young artist, brilliant as her playing was, did not consistently reveal. The accompaniment was a model of finish and perfect adaptation to the soloist. Richard Hale was the narrator in Prokofieff's delightful fairy tale and a resplendent performance of 'La Valse' brought the afternoon to a close.

S.

ROSINDALE, MASS.
Weekly Parkway ✓
Transcript

MAR 30 1939

J. P. Branch Library Notes of Interest

The opera is now in season and there are many persons interested iin reading librettos, playing the musical scores and glancing through the various opera guides. The Jamaica Plain Branch library has been able to give these various books to the public. And there is too, the subject of symphonies and symphonic music written for the average public who loves this type of music.

Much symphonic music is being played and conducted over various radio stations. And we, the public, have become acquainted with such names as Arthur Rodzinski, Bruno Walter, Sergei Koussevitsky, and Arturo Tos[illegible]ous names in the world of conducting. Then also we are able to hear the great pianists and violinists by the mere tuning in on the various stations over the radio network. Great symphonic music is being transmitted over the many stations and it is the natural thing to spend an hour or two weekly, listening, enjoying, and perhaps discussing these works of art. To supplement our knowledge of the symphony there have been many books written by authorities on symphonic music.

We note just a few books on this subject that should appeal to the reader who loves music of the symphony and wishes to enlarge his knowledge of this particular type of music. Olin Downes has written a book called Symphonic broadcasts which is a collection of radio talks given by the author in connection with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York. He is also the author of the Dial Press, containing symphonic masterpieces. L. Gilman has written a book — Toscanini and great music-parts, dealing with symphonies. Charles O'Connell's book on The Victor book of the symphony has a list of modern victor recordings or symphonic music—with a foreword by Leopold Stokowski.—Evelyn G. Green.

QUINCY, ILL. ✓
HERALD - WHIG

APR 1 - 1939

POPULAR BOOKS OF GREAT MUSIC

The Garden City Publishing company has issued a new edition of "Great Concert Music" (Philip Hale's Symphony Programme Notes) as edited by John N. Burk. Originally published at $3.50, the Garden City edition is available to music lovers at $1.49. The book combines historical and descriptive notes with pertinent critical paragraphs. Of the author, Serge Koussovitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has said:

"Philip Hale, the great musicologist of America, left behind an incomparable gift—his annotations for the Boston Symphony programme books. These annotations, edited with care and distinction by John N. Burk, combined with Philip Hale's remarkable critical judgment, provide a book of historical value which should serve as a guide book to the student of music and to young critics. Indeed, the publication of this volume is an in[illegible] contribution [illegible]."

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 1 - 1939

ORCHESTRAS AND CHORUSES

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting: Carnegie Hall, Thurs. Eve., March 30, at 8:45; Sat. Aft., April 1, at 2:30. Brooklyn Academy of Music (ST 3-6700), Fri. Eve., March 31, at 8:30.
PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY—Barbirolli conducting: Carnegie Hall, Fri. Aft., March 31, at 2:30; Sat. Eve., April 1, at 8:45; Sun. Aft., April 2, at 3. (Soloists: Busch, March 31; Corigliano, April 1;

TRIBUNE
Cambridge Mass

MAR 24 1939

Coming Events

Handel and Haydn Society Presents Berlioz Faust April 16

Hector Berlioz' dramatic legend "The Damnation of Faust" is to be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society for the Annual Spring Concert to be given on Sunday afternoon, April 16th in Symphony Hall.

Soloists for the occasion will be: Paul Althouse of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing the role of Faust; Gertrude Ehrhart, Boston soprano, who will sing the role of Marguerite; Gean Greenwell, who appeared with the Handel and Haydn Society in its performance of "Messiah" in 1937 and who will sing Mephistopheles; Mark Love, who will be heard as Brander, is a member of the Chicago City Opera Company, and makes his Boston debut in this concert. Seventy four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist. The entire production will be under the conductorship of Dr. Thompson Stone.

The presentation of "The Damnation of Faust" will mark the first performance of this work by the Handel and Haydn Society.

At the request of patrons of music and many musical organizations throughout New England, the time of the concert has been changed to Sunday afternoon. In the past, concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society have been held in the evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

APR 2 - 1939

* * *

Serge Koussevitzky, a champion of modern music, leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a virile and brilliant performance of Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and it is something of a sensation.

Copland is one of America's younger composers. He has not, however, been prolific. "El Salon Mexico" is his impression of one of Mexico City's famous dance halls. Several Mexican folk tunes provide themes for the work. It occupies three sides, the fourth being given over to "The Song of the Volga Boatmen," arranged by Stravinsky.

Victor's April list also carries another exciting piece of modern music. It is Paul Hindemith Sonata for Viola and Piano, Opus, 11, No. 4. The artists are William Primrose and Jesus Maria Sanroma, both extremely capable. Although the idiom is unfamiliar and its form not as graceful as orthodox listeners would prefer, it is nevertheless superb music. There are two 12-inch records in the album.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NEWS

MAR 28 1939

Ways of The World

'MANFRED' REACHES SAN FRANCISCO: A Glorious Work That Brings Together Two Supreme Artists, A World Famous Poet and a World Famous Musician.

BY JOHN D. BARRY

THE performance of "Manfred," with Schumann's music inspired by Lord Byron's dramatic poem of the same name, has a special interest for me. Many years ago, in what now seems like another life, I had the good fortune to be present when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the work with Nikisch as conductor and with a magnificent chorus, expert soloists and a narrator who brought out the full beauty of Byron's lines. An experience always to be remembered.

During my first years in San Francisco I made the acquaintance of the exceedingly clever and promising young man who was then directing our orchestra, Henry Hadley. He had already started to build his reputation both as conductor and composer. "Hadley has a great many ideas," Rudolph Ganz remarked in my presence one day. His premature death some years ago meant a great loss to the music world.

It occurred to me that any one so ambitious as Hadley would be glad to consider enabling San Franciscans to hear the glorious work by Schumann. So I talked the idea over with him and found him enthusiastic. Soon afterward, however, he left San Francisco and his place was taken by the man now regarded as a San Francisco institution, Alfred Hertz.

With pleasure I recall a talk I had with Dr. Hertz about giving "Manfred" here. His eyes brightened, his whole face glowed. Here was an enterprise that would put him on his mettle.

At that period the finances of the orchestra weren't in good shape. And, as Dr. Hertz reminded me, the cost of so elaborate a production would be heavy. Regretfully he had to postpone the idea. Maybe later it would be feasible.

One day last season I had a chat with the orchestra's present conductor, Pierre Monteux. When I spoke of his giving a performance of "Manfred" he, too, glowed. His familiarity with the work and its history made him see that for San Francisco it would have the element of novelty. With his fondness for getting away from routine programs and his gift for making quick decisions, he showed that he'd put the idea into execution as soon as he could.

Meanwhile, Dr. Hertz had become head of our Federal Music Project. As such he found himself with new resources, a multitude of gifted cooperators. He and his associate, Homer Henley, considered "Manfred," a superb opportunity. I had several talks with Homer Henley in regard to the matter and it looked as if Byron and Schumann might be the means of enabling our Music Project to make an effective display.

Then came the news that the Art Commission intended to sponsor our San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in a performance of "Manfred" that should utilize our Municipal Chorus under Hans Leschke, a group of soloists and interpreters of Byron's lines that should include as narrator the distinguished actor of the stage and screen, Basil Rathbone.

Generously Dr. Hertz gave way. He didn't want to interfere and he felt that two productions of the work would be a mistake.

* * *

WHEN such a composition brings together two supreme artists, a world famous poet and a world famous musician, the event is of extraordinary importance. So I'm hoping the courage and the initiative of the Art Commission will be rewarded by a crowded house at the Civic Auditorium tomorrow night.

In Germany and Austria they used to know the work well. For many years it was repeatedly given at the musical festival in Salzberg and elsewhere, with the great singer and interpreter of songs and of poetry, Wullner, as the narrator.

Byron's dramatic poem has often been compared with Goethe's "Faust." Goethe once said: "This singular intellectual poet has taken my Faustus to himself and extracted from it the strongest nourishment for his hypochondriac humor. He has made use of the impelling principles in his own way, for his own purposes, so that no one of them remains the same; and it is particularly on this account that I cannot enough admire his genius."

Here's a comment on Goethe from Byron: "His 'Faust' I never read, for I don't know German; but Matthew Monk Lewis, in 1816, at Coligny, translated most of it to me aloud, and I was naturally much struck with it." He added that in the writing other works of Goethe's had influenced him much more than Faust.

No matter what the inspiration may have been, Byron achieved a work of rare vitality and, quite unwittingly inspired Schumann to a notable achievement.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

MAR 30 1939

MUSIC

By BRUNO DAVID USSHER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the Russian conductor of the Boston symphony, recently spoke before the American Academy of Arts and Sciences on "The Necessity for Reality in Musical Interpretation." I should like to quote from this address by way of answering the letter of a public school music teacher whose high school students attended a recent Philharmonic orchestra Friday afternoon concert and broke into prolonged discussion when returning to class the following Monday.

Generally speaking, I would say of interpretation, as of singing, there are two varieties—effective and good. Effectiveness of delivery need not be vocally good, nor stylistically or interpretatively appropriate. A man may sing quite effectively, yet by no means with good or beautiful tone. A player may perform effectively, yet not by any means with interpretative authority. One thing, of course, is of paramount necessity for the "reality of interpretation." That prerequisite is good technique, be it a choir, an orchestra, a single voice, the two hands and the pedaling of a pianist.

* * *

OF course, great music permits of more than one conception. Tempo is a debatable thing. Dynamics, especially in 18th century music, where markings by the composer are often missing, likewise are subject to discussion.

Tempi often differ because of racial differences among German, French, Russian, Italian conductors. Their native (national) temperaments differ and they often treat music of another nation with the instinctive preconceptions which are theirs from birth. Music is a universal language, but the hearts and ears of men react differently, according to their early environments.

* * *

"WE have a great deal of evidence that musical performers have a right to interpret compositions freely," the Boston maestro remarked in part. "Take Bach, for instance. In his music we find no nuances. Does that imply monotony? Certainly not. The classic composers often left the matter of providing cadenzas to the player.

"In Wagner's scores after 'Lohengrin' we find no exact indication of tempi. Wagner omitted it intentionally. He says in his book on the art of conducting that it is unnecessary to mark the exact tempo, because a talented conductor will find the right tempo anyway. The untalented conductor will never grasp the tempo even if it is printed in the score."

* * *

ILLUMINATING indeed is an experience of Koussevitsky's which he had when studying the four symphonies by Sibelius.

"I found that the tempo for the last 98 bars of the scherzo was marked twice as slow as the preceding tempo—and that I could neither feel nor understand. I wrote to Sibelius asking for information. Thinking that it might be a misprint, and stating that I could not feel the tempo that way, I begged the Finnish master for information.

"And Sibelius replied: 'The right tempo is the one that the artist feels.' "

To which one would add that the deduction from Sibelius' reply might be dangerous in the case of a conductor less searching for musical truth and less profound and ripe musically and emotionally than Koussevitzky.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY continues: "Personally, I believe that a composer, when creating a work, transfuses it not only with his musical power, but also with the entire meaning of his life—the essence of his being. That is why we must find a 'central line' in the creation of every composer. What is the 'central line' of a composer? It is the meaning of his life and ideals, which he brings to us through the medium of his music."

Bach's central line is religion. As Koussevitzky put it, "Bach came to glorify God. Haydn's line is joyfulness and humor which he wishes to share with others . . . we feel it in every symphony, in every menuetto and allegro."

I wish the distinguished conductor would have said what he feels in the opening allegros and the slow movements of Haydn. This Austrian was not a Pollyanna, and Koussevitsky hardly means that by innuendo. His recent recording of Haydn's B flat major symphony No. 102 proves that the conductor, at least in his lecture, spoke only half his thought.

Mozart essentially represents pure harmony and pure form. It is music for the sake of sound ral line' is

He reflects
in music.
ves or re-
r rejoices
with the world. His is music of true universality."

* * *

IN closing, Koussevitzky points out that there are two types of perfect interpretation. One is mechanically perfect. Every detail is externally executed with complete accuracy and balance. The other is based on true understanding of the 'central line.' Here Koussevitzky adds an apt simile: "The performer-interpreter is like a prism through which shines the light of the composer." One can hope only that the prism is cut and polished perfectly.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

APR 2 - 1939

On the Records

By MICHAEL SHAW, JR.

MEXICO SEEMS just what the doctor ordered for Aaron Copland. In "El Salon Mexico" he dishes up some strong meat, but it is quite nutritive—a combination none too true in this American contemporary's past output. This time he mines the music of the Twentieth Century that can not be laughed away.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony give a spirited performance, with technicians supplying remarkable reproduction, especially of brasses and percussion (Victor Set M-546; three sides.)

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

APR 2 - 1939

Vienna Boys Sing Album of Easter Music

'Stabat Mater' by Pergolesi in Varied Spring Record Crop

By Jay Walz

The Stabat Mater is Victor's Easter offering, and is in the week that brings another Lenten season to a climax an item of definite interest. Yet it is just one of the interesting selections in the extensive and varied spring crop of recordings.

When we say varied, we speak of the appearance side by side on the Victor list of the religious Stabat Mater and the very secular "El Salon Mexico," which might be subtitled "An American in a Mexico City Hot Spot." Imagine the Boston Symphony Orchestra, still under Koussevitzky, setting up shop in such an establishment, and you have a pretty good idea of the treats in Aaron Copland's jazz score.

Copland's report on Mexico is similar to many that the French Debussy made on Spain. Not at all comprehensive, it's flighty, imaginative, atmospherical. But, bear in mind, the atmosphere is earthy, not ethereal. About all the Mexican songs you ever heard, pop up in "El Salon Mexico." You hear them as you would in a night club going full swing. Hilarity and confusion abounds, which I suppose is the way Americans take their Mexican hot spots.

The Boston Symphony didn't, as we intimated, go to Mexico City. But Mr. Copland did bring his score to the Boston Symphony. And that orchestra, directed by Koussevitzky, gives the music its undivided and enthusiastic attention in Victor Album M-546 (two large discs).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 9 - 1939

Wheeler Becket will lead seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last of the season's Youth Symphony Concerts this Wednesday afternoon in Boston, Mass. The program will comprise the Franck symphony and works by Langendoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 1 - 1939

Music

Good-Sized House Cordially Approves Vivian Carlson Fanning in Her Debut Recital as Pianist; Program Well-Contrived and Well-Presented

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will visit this city on Tuesday night for the last time this season. The concert is in Metropolitan Theatre. The program comprises "Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis," by Vaughan Williams, for double string orchestra; the "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun,' " by Debussy; the choreographic poem "La Valse," by Ravel, and the Fourth Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

The Vaughan Williams composition has not been played here since 1922. Williams is a living English composer. He has used a modal tune of Elizabethan days.

* * *

Alec Templeton, blind English pianist, will give a recital in Symphony Hall, Boston, the night of April 21. It will be his contribution to the work of the National Bureau for Blind Artists, which, through its program of employment and presentation, "has undertaken to assist those gifted blind musicians who have been denied the opportunity of being heard and who have, therefore, been compelled to become public charges or to remain idle."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, writes that Mr. Templeton played for him several seasons ago in the Koussevitzky home in Paris and "the impression he made was unusually deep."

"His superb musicianship and inimitable wit have won the hearts of all of us," Dr. Koussevitzky says. "He symbolizes what gifted, but less fortunate, blind musicians are striving to attain, and we are now offered the privilege of assisting this courageous effort."

* * *

The Pawtucket Civic Music Association announces that new members will be permitted to attend the last concert of this season, as well as those of next. Ezio Pinza, bass, of the Metropolitan Opera, will give the last concert this season on May 9. The association's membership campaign closes tonight.

TRIBUNE
Cambridge Mass

W

MAR 2 4 1939

Coming Events

Handel and Haydn Society Presents Berlioz Faust April 16

Hector Berlioz' dramatic legend "The Damnation of Faust" is to be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society for the Annual Spring Concert to be given on Sunday afternoon, April 16th in Symphony Hall.

Soloists for the occasion will be: Paul Althouse of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing the role of Faust; Gertrude Ehrhart, Boston soprano, who will sing the role of Marguerite; Gean Greenwell, who appeared with the Handel and Haydn Society in its performance of "Messiah" in 1937 and who will sing Mephistopheles; Mark Love, who will be heard as Brander, is a member of the Chicago City Opera Company, and makes his Boston debut in this concert. Seventy four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist. The entire production will be under the conductorship of Dr. Thompson Stone.

The presentation of "The Damnation of Faust" will mark the first performance of this work by the Handel and Haydn Society.

At the request of patrons of music and many musical organizations throughout New England, the time of the concert has been changed to Sunday afternoon. In the past, concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society have been held in the evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

APR 2 - 1939

* * *

Serge Koussevitzky, a champion of modern music, leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a virile and brilliant performance of Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and it is something of a sensation.

Copland is one of America's younger composers. He has not, however, been prolific. "El Salon Mexico" is his impression of one of Mexico City's famous dance halls. Several Mexican folk tunes provide themes for the work. It occupies three sides, the fourth being given over to "The Song of the Volga Boatmen," arranged by Stravinsky.

Victor's April list also carries another exciting piece of modern music. It is Paul Hindemith Sonata for Viola and Piano, Opus, 11, No. 4. The artists are William Primrose and Jesus Maria Sanroma, both extremely capable. Although the idiom is unfamiliar and its form not as graceful as orthodox listeners would prefer, it is nevertheless superb music. There are two 12-inch records in the album.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NEWS

MAR 28 1939

Ways of The World

'MANFRED' REACHES SAN FRANCISCO: A Glorious Work That Brings Together Two Supreme Artists, A World Famous Poet and a World Famous Musician.

BY JOHN D. BARRY

THE performance of "Manfred," with Schumann's music inspired by Lord Byron's dramatic poem of the same name, has a special interest for me. Many years ago, in what now seems like another life, I had the good fortune to be present when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the work with Nikisch as conductor and with a magnificent chorus, expert soloists and a narrator who brought out the full beauty of Byron's lines. An experience always to be remembered.

During my first years in San Francisco I made the acquaintance of the exceedingly clever and promising young man who was then directing our orchestra, Henry Hadley. He had already started to build his reputation both as conductor and composer. "Hadley has a great many ideas," Rudolph Ganz remarked in my presence one day. His premature death some years ago meant a great loss to the music world.

It occurred to me that any one so ambitious as Hadley would be glad to consider enabling San Franciscans to hear the glorious work by Schumann. So I talked the idea over with him and found him enthusiastic. Soon afterward, however, he left San Francisco and his place was taken by the man now regarded as a San Francisco institution, Alfred Hertz.

With pleasure I recall a talk I had with Dr. Hertz about giving "Manfred" here. His eyes brightened, his whole face glowed. Here was an enterprise that would put him on his mettle.

At that period the finances of the orchestra weren't in good shape. And, as Dr. Hertz reminded me, the cost of so elaborate a production would be heavy. Regretfully he had to postpone the idea. Maybe later it would be feasible.

One day last season I had a chat with the orchestra's present conductor, Pierre Monteux. When I spoke of his giving a performance of "Manfred" he, too, glowed. His familiarity with the work and its history made him see that for San Francisco it would have the element of novelty. With his fondness for getting away from routine programs and his gift for making quick decisions, he showed that he'd put the idea into execution as soon as he could.

Meanwhile, Dr. Hertz had become head of our Federal Music Project. As such he found himself with new resources, a multitude of gifted cooperators. He and his associate, Homer Henley, considered "Manfred," a superb opportunity. I had several talks with Homer Henley in regard to the matter and it looked as if Byron and Schumann might be the means of enabling our Music Project to make an effective display.

Then came the news that the Art Commission intended to sponsor our San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in a performance of "Manfred" that should utilize our Municipal Chorus under Hans Leschke, a group of soloists and interpreters of Byron's lines that should include as narrator the distinguished actor of the stage and screen, Basil Rathbone.

Generously Dr. Hertz gave way. He didn't want to interfere and he felt that two productions of the work would be a mistake.

* * *

WHEN such a composition brings together two supreme artists, a world famous poet and a world famous musician, the event is of extraordinary importance. So I'm hoping the courage and the initiative of the Art Commission will be rewarded by a crowded house at the Civic Auditorium tomorrow night.

In Germany and Austria they used to know the work well. For many years it was repeatedly given at the musical festival in Salzberg and elsewhere, with the great singer and interpreter of songs and of poetry, Wullner, as the narrator.

Byron's dramatic poem has often been compared with Goethe's "Faust." Goethe once said: "This singular intellectual poet has taken my Faustus to himself and extracted from it the strongest nourishment for his hypochondriac humor. He has made use of the impelling principles in his own way, for his own purposes, so that no one of them remains the same; and it is particularly on this account that I cannot enough admire his genius."

Here's a comment on Goethe from Byron: "His 'Faust' I never read, for I don't know German; but Matthew Monk Lewis, in 1816, at Coligny, translated most of it to me aloud, and I was naturally much struck with it." He added that in the writing other works of Goethe's had influenced him much more than Faust.

No matter what the inspiration may have been, Byron achieved a work of rare vitality and, quite unwittingly inspired Schumann to a notable achievement.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

MAR 30 1939

MUSIC

By BRUNO DAVID USSHER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the Russian conductor of the Boston symphony, recently spoke before the American Academy of Arts and Sciences on "The Necessity for Reality in Musical Interpretation." I should like to quote from this address by way of answering the letter of a public school music teacher whose high school students attended a recent Philharmonic orchestra Friday afternoon concert and broke into prolonged discussion when returning to class the following Monday.

Generally speaking, I would say of interpretation, as of singing, there are two varieties—effective and good. Effectiveness of delivery need not be vocally good, nor stylistically or interpretatively appropriate. A man may sing quite effectively, yet by no means with good or beautiful tone. A player may perform effectively, yet not by any means with interpretative authority. One thing, of course, is of paramount necessity for the "reality of interpretation." That prerequisite is good technique, be it a choir, an orchestra, a single voice, the two hands and the pedaling of a pianist.

* * *

OF course, great music permits of more than one conception. Tempo is a debatable thing. Dynamics, especially in 18th century music, where markings by the composer are often missing, likewise are subject to discussion.

Tempi often differ because of racial differences among German, French, Russian, Italian conductors. Their native (national) temperaments differ and they often treat music of another nation with the instinctive preconceptions which are theirs from birth. Music is a universal language, but the hearts and ears of men react differently, according to their early environments.

* * *

"WE have a great deal of evidence that musical performers have a right to interpret compositions freely," the Boston maestro remarked in part. "Take Bach, for instance. In his music we find no nuances. Does that imply monotony? Certainly not. The classic composers often left the matter of providing cadenzas to the player.

"In Wagner's scores after 'Lohengrin' we find no exact indication of tempi. Wagner omitted it intentionally. He says in his book on the art of conducting that it is unnecessary to mark the exact tempo, because a talented conductor will find the right tempo anyway. The untalented conductor will never grasp the tempo even if it is printed in the score."

* * *

ILLUMINATING indeed is an experience of Koussevitsky's which he had when studying the four symphonies by Sibelius.

"I found that the tempo for the last 98 bars of the scherzo was marked twice as slow as the preceding tempo—and that I could neither feel nor understand. I wrote to Sibelius asking for information. Thinking that it might be a misprint, and stating that I could not feel the tempo that way, I begged the Finnish master for information.

"And Sibelius replied: 'The right tempo is the one that the artist feels.'"

To which one would add that the deduction from Sibelius' reply might be dangerous in the case of a conductor less searching for musical truth and less profound and ripe musically and emotionally than Koussevitzky.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY continues: "Personally, I believe that a composer, when creating a work, transfuses it not only with his musical power, but also with the entire meaning of his life—the essence of his being. That is why we must find a 'central line' in the creation of every composer. What is the 'central line' of a composer? It is the meaning of his life and ideals, which he brings to us through the medium of his music."

Bach's central line is religion. As Koussevitzky put it, "Bach came to glorify God. Haydn's line is joyfulness and humor which he wishes to share with others . . . we feel it in every symphony, in every menuetto and allegro."

I wish the distinguished conductor would have said what he feels in the opening allegros and the slow movements of Haydn. This Austrian was not a Pollyanna, and Koussevitsky hardly means that by innuendo. His recent recording of Haydn's B flat major symphony No. 102 proves that the conductor, at least in his lecture, spoke only half his thought.

Mozart essentially represents pure harmony and pure form. It is music for the sake of sound and beauty.

"Beethoven's 'central line' is transcendentiality. He reflects universal emotion in music. When Beethoven grieves or rejoices, he grieves or rejoices with the world. His is music of true universality."

* * *

IN closing, Koussevitzky points out that there are two types of perfect interpretation. One is mechanically perfect. Every detail is externally executed with complete accuracy and balance. The other is based on true understanding of the 'central line.' Here Koussevitzky adds an apt simile: "The performer-interpreter is like a prism through which shines the light of the composer." One can hope only that the prism is cut and polished perfectly.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

APR 2 - 1939

...gement there. Bob ...centric comedian, and ... Joyce, "Pittsburgh's ... are also headliners ...pots." Ferguson is sup-

MEXICO SEEMS just what the doctor ordered for Aaron Copland. In "El Salon Mexico" he dishes up some strong meat, but it is quite nutritive—a combination none too true in this American contemporary's past output. This time he mines the music of the Twentieth Century that can not be laughed away.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony give a spirited performance, with technicians supplying remarkable reproduction, especially of brasses and percussion (Victor Set M-546; three sides.)

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

APR 2 - 1939

Vienna Boys Sing Album of Easter Music

'Stabat Mater' by Pergolesi in Varied Spring Record Crop

By Jay Walz

The Stabat Mater is Victor's Easter offering, and is in the week that brings another Lenten season to a climax an item of definite interest. Yet it is just one of the interesting selections in the extensive and varied spring crop of recordings.

When we say varied, we speak of the appearance side by side on the Victor list of the religious Stabat Mater and the very secular "El Salon Mexico," which might be subtitled "An American in a Mexico City Hot Spot." Imagine the Boston Symphony Orchestra, still under Koussevitzky, setting up shop in such an establishment, and you have a pretty good idea of the treats in Aaron Copland's jazz score.

Copland's report on Mexico is similar to many that the French Debussy made on Spain. Not at all comprehensive, it's flighty, imaginative, atmospherical. But, bear in mind, the atmosphere is earthy, not ethereal. About all the Mexican songs you ever heard, pop up in "El Salon Mexico." You hear them as you would in a night club going full swing. Hilarity and confusion abounds, which I suppose is the way Americans take their Mexican hot spots.

The Boston Symphony didn't, as we intimated, go to Mexico City. But Mr. Copland did bring his score to the Boston Symphony. And that orchestra, directed by Koussevitzky, gives the music its undivided and enthusiastic attention in Victor Album M-546 (two large discs).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 9 - 1939

Wheeler Becket will lead seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last of the season's Youth Symphony Concerts this Wednesday afternoon in Boston, Mass. The program will comprise the Franck symphony and works by Langendoon and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 1 - 1939

Music

Good-Sized House Cordially Approves Vivian Carlson Fanning in Her Debut Recital as Pianist; Program Well-Contrived and Well-Presented

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will visit this city on Tuesday night for the last time this season. The concert is in Metropolitan Theatre. The program comprises "Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis," by Vaughan Williams, for double string orchestra; the "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun,'" by Debussy; the choreographic poem "La Valse," by Ravel, and the Fourth Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

The Vaughan Williams composition has not been played here since 1922. Williams is a living English composer. He has used a modal tune of Elizabethan days.

* * *

Alec Templeton, blind English pianist, will give a recital in Symphony Hall, Boston, the night of April 21. It will be his contribution to the work of the National Bureau for Blind Artists, which, through its program of employment and presentation, "has undertaken to assist those gifted blind musicians who have been denied the opportunity of being heard and who have, therefore, been compelled to become public charges or to remain idle."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, writes that Mr. Templeton played for him several seasons ago in the Koussevitzky home in Paris and "the impression he made was unusually deep."

"His superb musicianship and inimitable wit have won the hearts of all of us," Dr. Koussevitzky says. "He symbolizes what gifted, but less fortunate, blind musicians are striving to attain, and we are now offered the privilege of assisting this courageous effort."

* * *

The Pawtucket Civic Music Association announces that new members will be permitted to attend the last concert of this season, as well as those of next. Ezio Pinza, bass, of the Metropolitan Opera, will give the last concert this season on May 9. The association's membership campaign closes tonight.

Musical America - March 25/39

Observing 24 Years of Musical Activity

John B. Sanroma

Noted Musicians and Composers in a Memorable Meeting at Symphony Hall, Boston, Following a Concert By the Boston Symphony: Left to Right, Walter Piston, John Alden Carpenter, Nadia Boulanger, Roy Harris, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Zlatko Balokovic, Mabel W. Daniels, Jean Francaix and Edward Burlingame Hill

BOSTON, March 20.—On March 4, following the performance of John Alden's Carpenter's Violin Concerto by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky and with Zlatko Balakovic, as soloist, five native American composers and the teacher of two of them, were photographed in the green room of Symphony Hall. Mr. Carpenter has the distinction of having been the first (1915) and last (1939) of these American composers to be represented upon programs by the Boston Symphony. Chronologically arranged, the composers pictured have had works performed by the orchestra as follows:

Mr. Carpenter, 'Adventures in a Perambulator', 1915; Violin Concerto, 1939; Edward B. Hill, 'Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere', 1916; Walter H. Piston, Symphonic Piece, 1928; Mabel Daniels, 'Exultate Deo', 1932; Roy Harris, First Symphony, 1933, Third Symphony, 1939. Of the group, Mr. Piston and Mr. Harris are American pupils of Mme. Boulanger, and Jean Françaix is a French pupil of hers.

G. M. S.

Institutional
N.Y.C

MAR 17 1939

Jews Figure Prominently Among The World's Greatest Conductors

Bodansky, Damrosch, Koussevitsky and Ormandy Hold Important U. S. Orchestral Positions

The conductor of an orchestra is a highly-trained, highly-sensitive, performer. His instrument is doubly hard to play because it is more than mechanical. For the conductor plays through his men, and through human emotions and human feelings.

The conductor's post is one which is reached through long effort, through long training, and through the ability to feel and interpret the least wish of the composer and the composer's score.

Large Jewish Roster

In the light of this information it is something of which to be proud to read the roster of Jewish orchestral conductors. Numerically it is staggering. Qualitatively it is breath-taking.

In New York alone, a Hungarian Jew, Erno Rappee, conducts the Radio City Music Hall Symphony, Artur Bodansky is the foremost interpreter of the music of Richard Wagner, and an Austrian Jew, Dr. Fritz Stiedry, is conducting the New Friends of Music Chamber Orchestra.

Leinsdorf A New Find

Eric Leinsdorf, twenty-eight year old conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company Orchestra, who is considered outstanding in the field of the German opera, is a Viennese Jew whose talents have been recognized only this year.

George Pollaco, an Italian Jew, for many years was the regular conductor of the Chicago Opera Company Orchestra.

The Director of the W.P.A. Music Project, that vast network of musical units serving every part of the nation is Nicolai Sokoloff, a Jew, formerly conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra.

Toscannini's Colleagues

What is considered the finest symphony orchestra ever gathered is the National Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra which was organized by Arturo Toscannini, generally considered the world's greatest conductor. Mr. Toscannini's associates in leading the N.B.C. group were Pierre Monteux, Arthur Rodzinsky, Hans Steinberg, and Carlos Chavez. Of these four, all but Mr. Chavez are of Jewish birth. The concertmeister of the orchestra is Mischa Mischakoff, a Russian-born Jew. The distinguished musical commentator for these much-publicized Saturday evening broadcasts is Samuel Chotzinoff, a Jew, and at the present time music editor of the New York Post.

The Grand Old Man

The grand old man of music appreciation is Walter Damrosch. His radio broadcasts are loved and enjoyed by thousands of school-children.

The most famous band in the U. S. is conducted by Edwin Franko Goldman. Dr. Goldman is a Jew.

Two of the best known orchestras in the world are the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. Eugene Ormandy and Serge Koussevitzky, regular conductors of each, are both Jewish.

Other names to round out the list include the most prominent of orchestral conductors. Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer, the late Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Alexander Smallens, Vladimir Golschmann,—all have contributed to making the Jew recognized as the conveyor of intellectually-sincere musical interpretation.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE, FRIDAY, MARCH 31, 1939

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Ernest Bloch

The Man and His Music

No person who has heard the music of Ernest Bloch can possibly doubt that he is one of the most significant composers of our day. Some, indeed, consider Bloch the greatest among contemporary masters, ranking him the Bach of his day. Without going into such claims—always a waste of time—it can certainly be said that Bloch is one of the three outstanding composers of the first part of the 20th century still alive, the other two being Stravinsky and Sibelius. These three offer an interesting study in contrast.

It may seem paradoxical to say that Stravinsky, erstwhile enfant teribile of music, lives in the past, but no other conclusion seems possible. The truth is, Stravinsky was born 50 years too late—he is out of joint with the times. Who will say that his music has any relationship to the hopes and aspirations of the modern mind? Beautiful and overwhelming as his compositions are, they nevertheless have connections only with nonconstructive ideas. Mentally he is unreconstructed — he lives in a world as outmoded as a czarist officer's faded tunic. This accounts for that lack of sustained musical direction one would have expected from his remarkable early works. Still he is a tremendous musical figure, undoubtedly a genius, by far the most outstanding of what might be called the ivory-tower school. His influence in a musical sense has been extensive and on the whole beneficial to the younger school of composers.

Sibelius, supreme symphonist of our time, is the preeminent poet of nationalism. Finnish through and through, his music breathes love for his native country, for its lakes and forests, its people, its legends. Characteristically, he almost never travels, choosing to stay at home in his beloved Finland. One must imagine him, feet firmly rooted, observing his surroundings, then looking upward into cosmic eternity. He is one with nature, one with his people, one with his land—and one with the stars.

Bloch is the musical apostle of brotherhood and peace. He embraces the whole world, he sets his face firmly forward. He is national, yes, but also super-national and international. He is the enemy of intolerance and hatred, the friend of truth and justice. He surveys the contemporary scene and is anguished, but then looks forward, upward, and is joyous with clear optimism and vibrant hope. He is the musical prophet of our times. His music is rhapsodic, filled with fervor and intensity. He is one with his race. One with his country. He is one with the world and all its peoples. He lives in the present and for the future.

Perhaps all this is too philosophical and abstruse. Is it possible, some may ask, to draw such distinctions, to make such comparisons? Can one prove it, black on white? The answer is, of course, that one either feels these things or does not. One also admits that these conclusions would hardly hold up in court under the rules of evidence. But we are dealing here with the intangibles of feeling and emotion. These are the impressions I am left with. You are quite at liberty to have any or no impressions of your own.

I recently had the privilege of an interview with Bloch. In person the composer is short, nervous, quick, with a characteristically forward-flung head which dominates his body and is in turn dominated by his burning eyes. He speaks quickly in amazingly good English with a very occasional slight pause while he thinks of a word or phrase. His arguments and expositions are logical to the nth degree reminding one very often of the logic to be found in the Talmud. He wonders far afield, digresses here, there, everywhere, but always with a point and always without losing the thread of his argument to which he returns at long last, triumphant and unweary, immediately ready to start on another oral excursion. He likes to talk and does it very well bringing to his discourse, a keen analytical mind together with an encyclopedic knowledge.

For an hour and a half I listened to an outpouring of ideas and ideas delivered with intensity and conviction. He told me how he came to write the Sacred Service, how he studied Hebrew to do full justice to the exact shade of meaning of every word. He spoke of his love for America, of his faith in its future. He expressed his conviction in the oneness of all mankind, of his faith in the ultimate triumph of justice. Without bitterness he related some of his earlier hardships and of his still-continuing struggle against prejudices of all kinds. He expressed his gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky and to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing him the opportunity of conducting his own works, an opportunity the more welcome for being so rare. Never, he went on, was he so moved with any rendition of his Service as with the few fragments he heard while present at the Friday evening service at Temple Ohabei Shalom to which he was an invited guest. He felt that his music was in its proper setting, entirely at home. He was interested and pleased when I told him that the Temple Israel choir had been singing sections of his Service for over two years under the direction of Henry Gideon whom he remembered very well from his first visit to Boston in 1917.

I ventured the opinion that some sections of his Service, notably the Shema Yisroyel (affirmation of the Unity) should be delivered in a style free of the "traditional" cantorial wailing delivery. This opinion, vigorously concurred in by Mr. Bloch, was sufficient to cause him to demonstrate correct vocal style for about 10 minutes, one section succeeding another. To hear him sing was strangely thrilling in spite of the usual composers' voice.

Some of the most interesting things Bloch told me are unfortunately off the record. He does not wish to indulge in personalities or to bring any possible harm to friends in totalitarian countries. A discussion of some of his latest works, including his piano sonata and violin concerto brought the interview to a close.

That night I had the unforgettable experience of hearing Bloch conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in one of the five performances of his own works he gave in Boston. Listed were two symphonic interludes from his opera, "Macbeth," in a first Boston performance; Three Jewish Poems; and the epic rhapsody, "America." Thus the program marked three stages in Bloch's career, for Macbeth was composed in 1904, his Jewish Poems, written in 1913, were the first of his consciously Jewish works, and America, completed in 1926, is the expression both of the composer's full musical maturity and of his love for his adopted country.

On first hearing, the Symphonic Interludes impress one strongly with their warmth and color. These excerpts from the opera which was produced in Paris in 1910 are a remarkable achievement for a young man of 24, Bloch's age when he composed the opera. One might criticize them somewhat for excessive length but it is entirely possible that if heard with the opera as a whole, the Interludes, with its various musical allusions, no doubt heard before in the body of the opera, would fall neatly and not too lengthily into place.

The Jewish Poems are intensely moving, both without the program or with it. Each poem bears a title — Dance, Rite, Funeral Cortege, and these titles are quite sufficient to give the mood and feeling for proper appreciation of the music. In the Poems, Bloch shows his extended mastery of the orchestra and the elaboration of his technical powers since his youth.

But the high point of the evening was inevitably that masterpiece, "America." This is by far the best piece of American music one has heard written by any composer. And it is American—American through and through, completely American in spite of the fact that its composer is a naturalized Swiss Jew. The Rhapsody is dedicated to Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman. Bloch wrote it as he says "in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith to its future." The highest praise that one can give, and does give, to this work is that it is worthy of the men to whom it is dedicated, and that it perfectly realizes the aims and aspirations of its composers. How well Bloch has absorbed the musical folklore of this country! Its Indian chants, the hymns of the English Pilgrims, its Negro folk-music, its southern ballads, its sprightly reels and dances, and, yes, its ragtime and jazz. All these and more are welded together with consummate mastery and skill, and dominated by the musical motto, "America! America!" It is a stirring history of the United States in one glorious hour of sublime music. Space does not allow us an extended description. That pleasure we must leave for the future.

That the audience appreciated the inspiration of this tremendous music was made very evident. Equally did the audience admire the composer's remarkable conductorial gifts, gifts which it is shameful to say have not been more fully occupied in this capacity. As for the orchestra, its performance was literally breath-taking. It was a Stradivarius among orchestras on which the composer-conductor performed as if he were playing on a personal instrument. Dr. Kousse-

---

Catholic Union & Times
Buffalo - N.Y.

MAR 9 - 1939

MAURICE MARECHAL TO GIVE CONCERT TUESDAY

One of the great 'cellists of the present time, Maurice Marechal, returns to America after an abscence of five years and will be presented as soloist with the Buffalo Orchestra on March 14, under the auspices of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra Society, Inc.

Marechal made his American debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stowkawski in 1926. He was immediately engaged by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and subsequently re-engaged seven times by this organization. Appearances followed with the St. Louis, Minneapolis, Cincinnati and Boston Symphony orchestras.

In the recital field, Marechal has been equally successful.

His appearance with the Buffalo Orchestra will be one of the highlights of the current concert season. Tickets may be secured at Denton Cottier & Daniels on March 13 and 14, or at the Consistory box-office on the night of the concert.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

APR 2 - 1939

Finnish Chorus To Be in Boston

Famous Male Singers Will Appear April 23

The Finlandia Male Chorus of 70 men, under the direction of Professor Heikki Klemetti, will come 4,000 miles from Finland to sing at Boston Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 23. Professor Klemetti and his singers have achieved success in concerts throughout Europe and have won highest of praise from leading European critics.

The Finlandia Male Chorus will come as a cultural group to promote interest in better singing and as a messenger of good will to promote understanding and fellowship between Finland and America. It will be Finland's outstanding contribution to the World's Fair at New York. The chorus sings in Swedish and English as well as in Finnish.

The Chorus will be welcomed to Boston by Governor Leverett Saltonstall, Mayor Maurice J. Tobin, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and John B. Mattson, vice consul of Finland, who are serving as honorary sponsors of the concert.

Miss Ellen Ruska and Miss Florence Kaski have been appointed representatives on the reception committee and have charge of distribution of tickets in the Cape Cod and Carver-Wareham Districts respectively.

Symphony Soloist

Arthur Rubinstein, the Polish pianist, will be the soloist at the 21st pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall in the coming week. The afternoon concert will take place on Thursday, April 6, instead of Friday, while the evening concert will be on Saturday as usual. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with the Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, by Vaughan Williams. The "Symphony of Psalms", by Igor Stravinsky, which bears the dedication to this orchestra, will also be played. The chorus of the Cecilia Society, prepared by Arthur Fiedler, will join the orchestra in this performance. Rubinstein will appear in the Second Concerto of Brahms in B flat major.

Musical America - March 25/39

Observing 24 Years of Musical Activity

John B. Sanroma

Noted Musicians and Composers in a Memorable Meeting at Symphony Hall, Boston, Following a Concert By the Boston Symphony: Left to Right, Walter Piston, John Alden Carpenter, Nadia Boulanger, Roy Harris, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Zlatko Balokovic, Mabel W. Daniels, Jean Francaix and Edward Burlingame Hill

BOSTON, March 20.—On March 4, following the performance of John Alden's Carpenter's Violin Concerto by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky and with Zlatko Balakovic, as soloist, five native American composers and the teacher of two of them, were photographed in the green room of Symphony Hall. Mr. Carpenter has the distinction of having been the first (1915) and last (1939) of these American composers to be represented upon programs by the Boston Symphony. Chronologically arranged, the composers pictured have had works performed by the orchestra as follows:

Mr. Carpenter, 'Adventures in a Perambulator', 1915; Violin Concerto, 1939; Edward B. Hill, 'Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere', 1916; Walter H. Piston, Symphonic Piece, 1928; Mabel Daniels, 'Exultate Deo', 1932; Roy Harris, First Symphony, 1933, Third Symphony, 1939. Of the group, Mr. Piston and Mr. Harris are American pupils of Mme. Boulanger, and Jean Françaix is a French pupil of hers. G. M. S.

Institutional
N.Y.C

MAR 17 1939

Jews Figure Prominently Among The World's Greatest Conductors

Bodansky, Damrosch, Koussevitsky and Ormandy Hold Important U. S. Orchestral Positions

The conductor of an orchestra is a highly-trained, highly-sensitive, performer. His instrument is doubly hard to play because it is more than mechanical. For the conductor plays through his men, and through human emotions and human feelings.

The conductor's post is one which is reached through long effort, through long training, and through the ability to feel and interpret the least wish of the composer and the composer's score.

Large Jewish Roster

In the light of this information it is something of which to be proud to read the roster of Jewish orchestral conductors. Numerically it is staggering. Qualitatively it is breath-taking.

In New York alone, a Hungarian Jew, Erno Rappee, conducts the Radio City Music Hall Symphony, Artur Bodansky is the foremost interpreter of the music of Richard Wagner, and an Austrian Jew, Dr. Fritz Stiedry, is conducting the New Friends of Music Chamber Orchestra.

Leinsdorf A New Find

Eric Leinsdorf, twenty-eight year old conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company Orchestra, who is considered outstanding in the field of the German opera, is a Viennese Jew whose talents have been recognized only this year.

George Pollaco, an Italian Jew, for many years was the regular conductor of the Chicago Opera Company Orchestra.

The Director of the W.P.A. Music Project, that vast network of musical units serving every part of the nation is Nicolai Sokoloff, a Jew, formerly conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra.

Toscannini's Colleagues

What is considered the finest symphony orchestra ever gathered is the National Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra which was organized by Arturo Toscannini, generally considered the world's greatest conductor. Mr. Toscannini's associates in leading the N.B.C. group were Pierre Monteux, Arthur Rodzinsky, Hans Steinberg, and Carlos Chavez. Of these four, all but Mr. Chavez are of Jewish birth. The concertmeister of the orchestra is Mischa Mischakoff, a Russian-born Jew. The distinguished musical commentator for these much-publicized Saturday evening broadcasts is Samuel Chotzinoff, a Jew, and at the present time music editor of the New York Post.

The Grand Old Man

The grand old man of music appreciation is Walter Damrosch. His radio broadcasts are loved and enjoyed by thousands of school-children.

The most famous band in the U. S. is conducted by Edwin Franko Goldman. Dr. Goldman is a Jew.

Two of the best known orchestras in the world are the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. Eugene Ormandy and Serge Koussevitsky, regular conductors of each, are both Jewish.

Other names to round out the list include the most prominent of orchestral conductors, Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer, the late Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Alexander Smallens, Vladimir Golschmann,—all have contributed to making the Jew recognized as the conveyor of intellectually-sincere musical interpretation.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE, FRIDAY, MARCH 31,

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Ernest Bloch

The Man and His Music

No person who has heard the music of Ernest Bloch can possibly doubt that he is one of the most significant composers of our day. Some, indeed, consider Bloch the greatest among contemporary masters, ranking him the Bach of his day. Without going into such claims—always a waste of time—it can certainly be said that Bloch is one of the three outstanding composers of the first part of the 20th century still alive, the other two being Stravinsky and Sibelius. These three offer an interesting study in contrast.

It may seem paradoxical to say that Stravinsky, erstwhile enfant terible of music, lives in the past, but no other conclusion seems possible. The truth is, Stravinsky was born 50 years too late—he is out of joint with the times. Who will say that his music has any relationship to the hopes and aspirations of the modern mind? Beautiful and overwhelming as his compositions are, they nevertheless have connections only with nonconstructive ideas. Mentally he is unreconstructed — he lives in a world as outmoded as a czarist officer's faded tunic. This accounts for that lack of sustained musical direction one would have expected from his remarkable early works. Still he is a tremendous musical figure, undoubtedly a genius, by far the most outstanding of what might be called the ivory-tower school. His influence in a musical sense has been extensive and on the whole beneficial to the younger school of composers.

Sibelius, supreme symphonist of our time, is the preeminent poet of nationalism. Finnish through and through, his music breathes love for his native country, for its lakes and forests, its people, its legends. Characteristically, he almost never travels, choosing to stay at home in his beloved Finland. One must imagine him, feet firmly rooted, observing his surroundings, then looking upward into cosmic eternity. He is one with nature, one with his people, one with his land—and one with the stars.

Bloch is the musical apostle of brotherhood and peace. He embraces the whole world, he sets his face firmly forward. He is national, yes, but also super-national and international. He is the enemy of intolerance and hatred, the friend of truth and justice. He surveys the contemporary scene and is anguished, but then looks forward, upward, and is joyous with clear optimism and vibrant hope. He is the musical prophet of our times. His music is rhapsodic, filled with fervor and intensity. He is one with his race. One with his country. He is one with the world and all its peoples. He lives in the present and for the future.

Perhaps all this is too philosophical and abstruse. Is it possible, some may ask, to draw such distinctions, to make such comparisons? Can one prove it, black on white? The answer is, of course, that one either feels these things or does not. One also admits that these conclusions would hardly hold up in court under the rules of evidence. But we are dealing here with the intangibles of feeling and emotion. These are the impressions I am left with. You are quite at liberty to have any or no impressions of your own.

I recently had the privilege of an interview with Bloch. In person the composer is short, nervous, quick, with a characteristically forward-flung head which dominates his body and is in turn dominated by his burning eyes. He speaks quickly in amazingly good English with a very occasional slight pause while he thinks of a word or phrase. His arguments and expositions are logical to the nth degree reminding one very often of the logic to be found in the Talmud. He wonders far afield, digresses here, there, everywhere, but always with a point and always without losing the thread of his argument to which he returns at long last, triumphant and unweary, immediately ready to start on another oral excursion. He likes to talk and does it very well bringing to his discourse, a keen analytical mind together with an encyclopedic knowledge.

For an hour and a half I listened to an outpouring of ideas and ideas delivered with intensity and conviction. He told me how he came to write the Sacred Service, how he studied Hebrew to do full justice to the exact shade of meaning of every word. He spoke of his love for America, of his faith in its future. He expressed his con-ice for over two years under the direction of Henry Gideon whom he remembered very well from his first visit to Boston in 1917.

I ventured the opinion that some sections of his Service, notably the Shema Yisroyel (affirmation of the Unity) should be delivered in a style free of the "traditional" cantorial wailing delivery. This opinion, vigorously concurred in by Mr. Bloch, was sufficient to cause him to demonstrate correct vocal style for about 10 minutes, one section succeeding another. To hear him sing was strangely thrilling in spite of the usual composers' voice.

Some of the most interesting things Bloch told me are unfortunately off the record. He does not wish to indulge in personalities or to bring any possible harm to friends in totalitarian countries. A discussion of some of his later works, including his piano sonata and violin concerto brought the interview to a close.

That night I had the unforgettable experience of hearing Bloch conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in one of the five performances of his own works he gave in Boston. Listed were two symphonic interludes from his opera, "Macbeth," in a first Boston performance; Three Jewish Poems; and the epic rhapsody, "America." Thus the program marked three stages in Bloch's career, for Macbeth was composed in 1904, his Jewish Poems, written in 1913, were the first of his consciously Jewish works, and America, completed in 1926, is the expression both of the composer's full musical maturity and of his love for his adopted country.

On first hearing, the Symphonic Interludes impress one strongly with their warmth and color. These excerpts from the opera which was produced in Paris in 1910 are a remarkable achievement for a young man of 24, Bloch's age when he composed the opera. One might criticize them somewhat for excessive length but it is entirely possible that if heard with the opera as a whole, the Interludes, with its various musical allusions, no doubt heard before in the body of the opera, would fall neatly and not too lengthily into place.

The Jewish Poems are intensely moving, both without the program or with it. Each poem bears a title—Dance, Rite, Funeral Cortege, and these titles are quite sufficient to give the mood and feeling for proper appreciation of the music. In the Poems, Bloch shows his extended mastery of the orchestra and the elaboration of his technical powers since his youth.

But the high point of the evening was inevitably that masterpiece, "America." This is by far the best piece of American music one has heard written by any composer. And it is American—American through and through, completely American in spite of the fact that its composer is a naturalized Swiss Jew. The Rhapsody is dedicated to Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman. Bloch wrote it as he says "in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith to its future." The highest praise that one can give, and does give, to this work is that it is worthy of the men to whom it is dedicated, and that it perfectly realizes the aims and aspirations of its composers. How well Bloch has absorbed the musical folklore of this country! Its Indian chants, the hymns of the English Pilgrims, its Negro folk-music, its southern ballads, its sprightly reels and dances, and, yes, its ragtime and jazz. All these and more are welded together with consummate mastery and skill, and dominated by the musical motto, "America! America!" It is a stirring history of the United States in one glorious hour of sublime music. Space does not allow us an extended description. That pleasure we must leave for the future.

That the audience appreciated the inspiration of this tremendous music was made very evident. Equally did the audience admire the composer's remarkable conductorial gifts, gifts which it is shameful to say have not been more fully occupied in this capacity. As for the orchestra, its performance was literally breath-taking. It was a Stradivarius among orchestras on which the composer-conductor performed as if he were playing on a personal instrument. Dr. Kousse-

---

Catholic Union & Times
Buffalo - N.Y.

MAR 9 - 1939

MAURICE MARECHAL TO GIVE CONCERT TUESDAY

One of the great 'cellists of the present time, Maurice Marechal, returns to America after an abscence of five years and will be presented as soloist with the Buffalo Orchestra on March 14, under the auspices of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra Society, Inc.

Marechal made his American debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stowkawski in 1926. He was immediately engaged by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and subsequently re-engaged seven times by this organization. Appearances followed with the St. Louis, Minneapolis, Cincinnati and Boston Symphony orchestras.

In the recital field, Marechal has been equally successful.

His appearance with the Buffalo Orchestra will be one of the highlights of the current concert season. Tickets may be secured at Denton Cottier & Daniels on March 13 and 14, or at the Consistory box-office on the night of the concert.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

APR 2 - 1939

Finnish Chorus To Be in Boston

Famous Male Singers Will Appear April 23

The Finlandia Male Chorus of 70 men, under the direction of Professor Heikki Klemetti, will come 4,000 miles from Finland to sing at Boston Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 23. Professor Klemetti and his singers have achieved success in concerts throughout Europe and have won highest of praise from leading European critics.

The Finlandia Male Chorus will come as a cultural group to promote interest in better singing and as a messenger of good will to promote understanding and fellowship between Finland and America. It will be Finland's outstanding contribution to the World's Fair at New York. The chorus sings in Swedish and English as well as in Finnish.

The Chorus will be welcomed to Boston by Governor Leverett Saltonstall, Mayor Maurice J. Tobin, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and John B. Mattson, vice consul of Finland, who are serving as honorary sponsors of the concert.

Miss Ellen Ruska and Miss Florence Kaski have been appointed representatives on the reception committee and have charge of distribution of tickets in the Cape Cod and Carver-Wareham Districts respectively.

Symphony Soloist

Arthur Rubinstein, the Polish pianist, will be the soloist at the 21st pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall in the coming week. The afternoon concert will take place on Thursday, April 6, instead of Friday, while the evening concert will be on Saturday as usual. Serge Koussevitsky will open the program with the Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, by Vaughan Williams. The "Symphony of Psalms", by Igor Stravinsky, which bears the dedication to this orchestra, will also be played. The chorus of the Cecilia Society, prepared by Arthur Fiedler, will join the orchestra in this performance. Rubinstein will appear in the Second Concerto of Brahms in B flat major.

MUSIC 218

SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Work by David Stanley Smith; Richard Burgin Conducts the Rest

B. Trans By MOSES SMITH April 15/39

The program for the current pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is no more ingratiating or judiciously assembled a list than others assembled in the past by Richard Burgin, concert-master and assistant conductor of the Orchestra, who was once more in charge of the proceedings at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. For one reason or another Mr. Burgin's programs have borne more than passing resemblance to a crazy-quilt made up of odds and ends too valuable to be thrown away or of items that could not be ignored, whether momentarily or over a period.

And so, to a large extent, it was yesterday, when the principal number was a new Fourth Symphony by David Stanley Smith, who conducted the first performance, and when the surrounding matter was the Overture to "The Bartered Bride" and three Wagnerian excerpts—the Prelude to "Parsifal," Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and, from "Goetterdaemmerung," the music for the break of day and for Siegfried's journey down the Rhine.

But—again as in the past—it was what Mr. Burgin and his colleagues under his direction did with the program that mattered. The performance of the new Symphony was a special case, and discussion of it may be for the moment postponed. In the rest of the program under Mr. Burgin's direction there was some magnificent playing by the Boston Orchestra, playing of a quality all the more welcome to an itinerant reporter returned home. The performances had moments of cloudiness, it is true, but not sufficient to obscure the wonderful collection and assortment of technical virtues that have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra famous at home and abroad.

Orchestra and Conductor

The playing of the Smetana Overture at the beginning was almost a miracle of fleetness, lightness, precision and grace. Withal it was admirably expressive—and it was difficult to see how that result could be accomplished at such a speed. The performance was about as exhilarating as the intrinsic music, which, in my opinion, constitutes one of the masterpieces in the overture form.

There were moments of hesitancy in the presentation of the "Parsifal" Prelude. There were small areas of opacity in the music from "Goetterdaemmerung" as it emerged from the instruments, as if the conductor had not yet found the exact balance necessary at every stage to put the main voice (or voices) in relief against a sonorous, glowing mantle of tone. And for at least one listener the almost instantaneous succession of the erotic frenzies from "Tannhaeuser" after the religious ecstasies of "Parsifal" was a little unfortunate, so that the better part of the Venusberg music had passed before one had got himself into the mood.

Opposed to these things, though, were the tonal splendor, the rarely spirited and accurate playing of the orchestra, the warm expressiveness of the phrasing under the ministrations of Mr. Burgin, his unusually felicitous choice of tempo and his instinct for the measured climax. The scale of dynamics, aside from the exception already noted, was admirable. In the case of the music from "Tannhaeuser" it was well-nigh perfect.

A sensitive, well-schooled musician, which Mr. Burgin is, might have accomplished almost as much. But not quite. For the actual intensities and subtleties achieved there was required also an artist and interpreter, both of which Mr. Burgin proved to be yesterday, for the benefit of any who happened to have been insensitive to that fact previously.

Mr. Smith and His Symphony

The performance and, on first acquaintance, the musical content of Mr. Smith's Symphony were somewhat puzzling. As to the first, the Symphony Orchestra seemed to be playing with a little less than customary precision, though it was hard to identify anything as quite wrong. It was as if the players (like at least one listener) had not sufficient confidence in the conductor to make an attack with the requisite boldness, to lay on, at moments of stress, with unfettered strength. The anomaly (if there was one) was greater in that Mr. Smith, as conductor in New Haven, is an experienced leader.

Perhaps, though, we were hearing the music quite as the composer intended that it should sound. In that event, the score is a particularly perplexing work. What seemed—always with reservation as to first acquaintance—like episodic form was the more irritating because of the almost wilful changes of tempo and unprepared changes in dynamics. If there were more skilful transitions, they evaded the listener.

Nor was the subject-matter of the four movements, into which the Symphony is divided in not quite orthodox fashion, all of a piece. That condition is not necessarily an item for disparagement. In the present instance, however, the listener discerned no inner necessity that demanded that a passage harmonized in the fashion of the end of the last century be succeeded without warning with another that was in effect polytonal, whether or not that was the intention of the composer. There was some harshly dissonant writing in the Symphony. And that again would not be held against the composer if the aesthetic effect was logical. It did not seem to be to these two ears.

By these signs the new Symphony is either an unsuccessful experiment or a nut too tough for the hearer to crack at a single session. It is more charitable—and perhaps wiser—to take the latter view.

Rakoczy

How a Folk-March Got Into "Faust"

When the Handel and Haydn Society, under the conductorship of Thompson Stone, presents its annual spring concert tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, it will offer what is considered to be one of the most unusual works ever written for chorus and orchestra—Hector Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust."

Circumstances as unusual as the work, surrounded and led up to Berlioz' composing of his score. In 1845, the composer left his wife in tears and in bitterness to undertake an orchestral tour in Hungary which would give him funds to keep his invalid wife from privation. It was at this time, under the most distracting conditions, that he composed his "Faust." In trains, in steamboats, on the backs of bills in restaurants, in a shop lighted by a single candle on a night in Budapest, in a hundred other like situations, he wrote this music.

The most famous number in "The Damnation of Faust" is "Rakoczy" March. It was at Budapest while on a tour that it was proposed that Berlioz write a march on a Hungarian tune. He chose from an old album of national airs. He was apprehensive, and so were his friends, about its performance because this was an air very dear to the Hungarians, and if the composer's treatment of it did not suit them the audience would be quite capable of making trouble.

When the day of the performance came, Berlioz had all he could do to conceal his nervousness when he ascended the conductor's stand. The march commenced with utter silence in the audience. The Hungarians were probably surprised, for their custom was to begin a march with a bang and a blare, whereas Berlioz's version commenced softly and gradually swelled to a cataclysm of fury. There was no sign of approval until a dramatic passage in which the orchestra, suddenly hushed, begins a long "crescendo," while under the tremelo of the violins, the beating of the bass drums is heard, like the booming of distant cannon. The audience went mad. "A strange, restless movement was perceptible among them," says Berlioz in his memoirs, and "when the orchestra let loose its fury, they could no longer contain themselves. Their overcharged souls burst with a trendous explosion of feeling that raised my hair with terror."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 2 - 1939

Symphony Will Give Final Concert Here

Boston Orchestra Will Close Season With Program Tuesday.—Federal Group Plans Last of Concert Series.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its Providence season to a close Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre. At this fifth and last concert of the series, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct works by Tschaikowski, Debussy, Ravel and Vaughan Williams.

A free lecture on the program will be given by John Archer in the Providence Public Library at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Edith Gyllenberg Waxberg will illustrate on the piano. The lecture is sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

The Providence Federal Orchestra will play the last of its series of concerts, until after Easter, in Hope high school this evening at 8:30 o'clock. Conductor Edouard Caffier will offer for his feature number the first public performance of "Sinfonia Concertante," by Rev. Leo Rowlands. Alexandre Peloquin, Woonsocket pianist, will appear in the solo part. The orchestra's Sunday evening concerts will be resumed on April 23.

Boston Symphony's Final

With the exception of Vaughan Williams's "Fantasia," which has not been played here since 1922, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer a program of familiar masterpieces Tuesday night. In his Fantasia the British composer used a modal tune of the Elizabethan days, setting it for a large and small string orchestra and a solo string quartet. The program, to be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, follows:

Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double string orchestra, Vaughan Williams
"Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"
(Eclogue by S. Mallarme ......Debussy
Choreographic Poem, "La Valse"....Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in F-minor, opus 36
.... Tschaikowski
I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato con anima in movimento di Valse.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

SULLIVAN, IND.
TIMES

APR 3 - 1939

IN BLOOMINGTON CONCERT TONIGHT

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, great French pianist, will give a concert at Indiana University this evening (Monday, April 3). With one of her French pupils, Jean Francaix, she will present a two-piano concert. Francaix is in America for the first time, having made his debut at a special concert of the New York Philharmonic Symphony society last month.

Mlle. Boulanger is the only woman to have conducted the London Philharmonic Symphony, the Boston Symphony, and the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestras.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

APR 4 - 1939

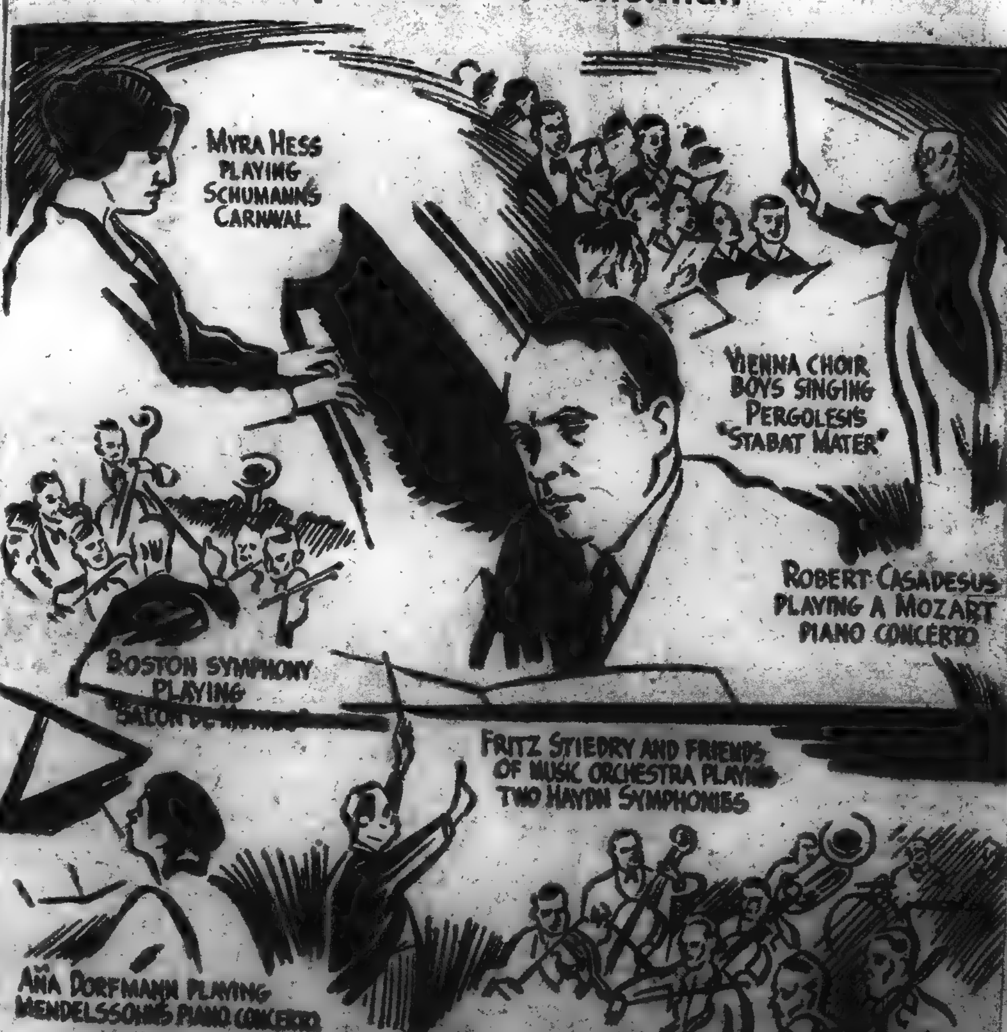
Mrs. Herbert L. Tinkham, 417 West Elm street, has received a letter from Serge Koussevitsky inviting her to be a sponsor for the recital of Alek Templeton, blind pianist, in Symphony Hall, Friday evening, April 21. Mrs. George E. Keith of Samuel avenue will accompany Mrs. Tinkham as a sponsor. Mr. Templeton has played at the Koussevitsky home in Paris. This recital is Mr. Templeton's contribution to the work of the National Bureau for Blind Artists.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

APR 2 - 1939

OFF THE RECORDS

By Thomas B. Sherman



MYRA HESS PLAYING SCHUMANN'S CARNAVAL
VIENNA CHOIR BOYS SINGING PERGOLESI'S "STABAT MATER"
ROBERT CASADESUS PLAYING A MOZART PIANO CONCERTO
BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYING SALON DE MUSIC
FRITZ STIEDRY AND FRIENDS OF MUSIC ORCHESTRA PLAYING TWO HAYDN SYMPHONIES AÑA DORFMANN PLAYING MENDELSSOHN'S PIANO CONCERTO AMOFF

DAYTON, O.
NEWS

APR 2 - 1939

Passion Music Program Will Be Presented

DR. HUGH IVAN EVANS will present a recorded performance of the "Passion of Our Lord, According to St. Matthew" by Bach, Good Friday from 1:00 to 3:00 p. m. at Westminster church.

The recordings were made by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Radcliffe Choral society and the Yale Glee club as well as some soloists, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The program in itself is an innovation, since Dr. Evans has set the hour of the music to coincide with most of the churches and the short service, planned at noon on Friday.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 9 - 1939

Symphony Next Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Providence next season for its usual series of five Tuesday evening concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre, the dates of which are Oct. 24, Nov. 28, Jan. 23, Feb. 20 and April 16.

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW

APR 2 - 1939

Spring Days and Music Give N. Y. Crowds Joy

Display of Modern Homes and Their Fittings Proves Marvel of Beauty—Metropolitan Audiences Cheer "Stagecoach" Film.

By ELEANOR SHAW.

Orchestras Share Interest.

The New York Philharmonic orchestra, conducted by John Barbirolli, will play at least three programs a week, and the visiting orchestras include the Boston symphony with Koussevitzki as conductor and the Philadelphia orchestra under the baton of Leopold Stokowski who makes his first New York appearance in over a year. There will be 75 musical events including 33 orchestral concerts, and the return of the Metropolitan opera from its tour, during April.

NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER

APR 3 - 1939

"Damnation Of Faust" To Be Sung In Hub

The Handel and Haydn society of Boston, under the direction of Dr. Thompson Stone, is presenting "The Damnation of Faust" by Hector Berlioz, on Sunday afternoon April 16, at 3:30 o'clock, in Symphony Hall, Boston. The society has been working all year on its part of the production, giving to it the time and energy which it usually spends on three or four annual concerts.

As soloists for the occasion it has secured Gertrude Ehrhart, Boston soprano who has been heard with pleasure in Attleboro, to sing the part of "Marguerite". "Faust" will be sung by Paul Althouse, tenor of the Metropolitan opera. From the Chicago City Opera Co. comes Mark Love, baritone, making his Boston debut, who will sing "Brander", and the colorful part of Mephistopheles will be portrayed by Gean Greenwell who has sung with the Handel and Haydn society before. In addition, 74 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will assist. the whole production will be under the direction of Dr. Stone.

Continued from Page 1

Realizing that many Norwood people will be interested in this remarkable production, the Handel and Haydn society has set aside a block of tickets in choice locations to be sold through the Massachusetts Federation of Music clubs and their affiliated organizations and friends. For the convenience of persons not wishing to go to Boston to secure their seats, Mrs. Lawrence E. Baer, 218 County st., Attleboro, has a certain number of seats in various locations which may be secured; not tickets to be exchanged but the actual seats themselves, or she will be glad to make any reservations desired.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES

APR 6 - 1939

ORLEANIAN TO BE GUEST ARTIST

Sidney Foster to Play With Houston Symphony Concert Here Monday

The 70-piece Houston Symphony Orchestra, called one of the South's most important musical organizations, will present a New Orleans concert at 8:30 p. m. Monday at the Municipal Auditorium with Sidney Foster, young New Orleans pianist, as guest artist, John J. Wood announced today. The orchestra will be under the baton of Ernst Hoffman.

With a record of attracting the largest musical audiences in Texas, the symphony's concert will be the first in New Orleans. In the past few seasons the organization has extended its field to include a number of major Texas cities.

A conductor for 12 years in Breslau, Mr. Hoffman is a native of Boston and was a member of the Boston Symphony for several years. Achieving a reputation for his ability, he was extended invitations to act as guest conductor of orchestras in Munich, Vienna and Berlin.

Mr. Foster has been hailed as a discovery in the realm of music and has been enthusiastically received at concerts throughout the nation. In New Orleans he studied with Walter Goldstein of Newcomb college and subsequently attended the Curtis Institute of Music at Philadelphia, Pa., where he was graduated, winning the coveted MacDowell Club medal entitling him to appear at a recital in Town Hall, New York city.

When the pianist recently appeared in Dallas, Tex., with that city's symphony, critics accorded his artistry warm praises. He will come here for the Monday night concert from Waco, Tex.

The program was announced by Mr. Wood as including Wagner's overture to "Thannhauser," Liszt's concerto in E flat for piano and orchestra, Sibelius' "Finlandia" and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4. Mr. Foster's appearance as guest artist will be in the rendition of the Liszt number. Tickets are available at Wood's Radio-Phonograph Shop, 613 Common street.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

APR 9 - 1939

THE WAX LIBRARY:

Spalding in Fine Form Plays Captivating Spohr Concerto

GESANGSCENE.—Concerto No. 8 in A Minor, Opus 47, by Ludwig Spohr. Played by Albert Spalding, violinist, with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Eugene Ormandy. (Album of four disks—12-inch—three sides.) Victor.

Exciting American.

EL SALON MEXICO.—An orchestral work by Aaron Copland. Played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. (Album of two disks—three sides—12-inch.) Victor.

This Aaron Copland score further establishes the 39-year-old Brooklyn boy as one of the most exciting of contemporary composers. El Salon Mexico was inspired by a Mexico City hot spot, full of noise, rowdy tourists, slap-happy natives—in short, a raucous urban scene built on folk music. There is a curious mixture of Harlem swing and bona fide Latin themes.

The stimulating work is played by that renowned swing band, the Boston Symphony, with its personality leader, Old Koussevitzky. When Norman Steppe of the Music Corporation of America hears this album he will want to promote Koussevitzky's trumpet and clarinet to real jobs, possibly with Xavier Cugat Band.

The odd side left in the album is taken by Russia's Old Man River, otherwise The Song of the Volga Boatman as orchestrated by Stravinsky. It isn't one of Stravinsky's more significant compositions.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

APR 9 - 1939

On The Records

By Michael Shaw, Jr.

IN ADDITION to being a tireless seeker after tonal nuances, Charles Martin Loeffler probably was the most distinguished musical mind to function creatively in America. The phonograph in particular and concert goers in general have outgrown their fears of American works, but this former member of the Boston Symphony still has to come into his own.

The fault is not the public's; rare is the opportunity to hear his compositions. It is a chasm this none-too-humble department has urged being bridged for some years back. Now his third, and by far most important work to be waxed so far, is presented by the Coolidge Quartet (Victor Set M-543; six sides).

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

APR 9 - 1939

IT USED TO BE

. . . that music lovers in the midwest were not privileged to hear the eastern orchestras, etc. However, all this has been changed. A few years ago the Philadelphia orchestra came west and has been heard every season since in Chicago. This year the NBC Symphony came as far west as Chicago to give a concert. Announcement has already been made of the concert by the New York Philharmonic Symphony on Nov. 26 in Chicago and now the Boston Symphony has announced its ~~plans to~~ play a concert in Chicago on Sunday, Dec. 13. Thus is Chicago surely becoming the music center of the country.

DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

APR 9 - 1939

Boston Orchestra in Fine Performance

Lucille Manners Headed Toward Heights in Concert Field

By PIERRE KEY

NEW YORK, April 9.

If patience is the virtue we are told it is, then much virtue should prevail in the ranks of some two hundred artists-attractions and their own guild, and their managers. For behold, after months of negotiating, an agreement has been reached between the American Guild of Musical Artists and the two big management corporations, Columbia Concerts corporation and NBC Artists Service (together with their two respective subsidiaries, Community Concerts corporation and Civic Concerts Service).

The agreement has to do with commissions hereinafter to be paid by artist-attractions to these managements for engagements secured; and also covers other points touching what is regarded as the best interests of all concerned.

Provisions provide for 18 per cent commission for artists receiving $750 or less, instead of the prevailing 20 per cent, for single concert engagements; 15 per cent for appearances before either a Community Concerts or Civic Concerts audience; 10 per cent for radio series bookings and opera contracts, and 15 per cent for single radio broadcasts.

Certain other provisions have been made designed to make the relations between an artist-attraction and its management closer. So there should be general rejoicing that the delays and attendant difficulties leading up to the "get together" agreement have been surmounted.

Symphonic Adieus

It has always seemed rather a desirable job—conducting one of the major symphony orchestras. And on the surface it is. But the boss of one of these organizations has much to do besides waving a stick over his musicians during a concert — as most musically inclined folk know. All the same, compared with what business men do to earn equal sums paid to these orchestra leaders the business men work several times as hard, longer hours and more months a year, and carry far greater responsibilities.

The Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia orchestras gave their closing New York programs during the past week, and they were marvelous from any point of view. Koussevitsky and his men are just about tops in their line, with the Philadelphia so close to them that some might declare these bands to run dead heats. But Stokowski conducted the last Philadelphia orchestra concert, and whether you disapprove of certain things he does you must admit he gets more from those players than any other conductor.

There has been trouble over in the Quaker City and as a consequence Manager Reginald Allen has quit . . . along with the orchestra's former first cellist and another playing member. So, it would appear, there can be lack of harmony in a realm where music harmony means so much.

American Singer Wins

It was about four years ago that a bright-faced girl was heard for the first time over the network of one of the big broadcasting companies. The occasion was a sustaining program, and no one beyond a keen-eyed and discriminating member of that company's program department was especially impressed. Yet that young soprano has justified the belief that was placed in her future by coming through in what is known as a big way.

The singer is Lucille Manners; she receives a handsome weekly fee as the star of one of the big sponsored broadcasts, and she is growing steadily in populartiy.

Miss Manners gave her first New York recital in Town Hall a few evenings ago, and with a success that stamps her as a future concert potentiality on the big-time circuit. Which proves once again that opportunities are not lacking for some Americans who have exceptional qualifications.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

APR 9 - 1939

Manhattan Musical Events

Final Concerts Of Boston Symphony And Met's Post - Seasonal Week. Juilliard Opera Class, Recitalists, Heard

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

THIS week was marked by the final two concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony, and the Metropolitan's post-seasonal week. There was an interesting performance by the Juilliard opera class and a couple of recitals.

Mr. Koussevitzky, at the first of his last pair of concerts, offered the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and the Fourth of Tchaikovsky . . . and nothing more. The Boston conductor has never seemed to me to be as apt in the conducting of Beethoven as the music of his own Russian compatriots. Hence, the balance of interest was in favor of the Tchaikovsky. The Beethoven had a lush quality that was hardly germane to the score. Of course, the present-day tendency is toward an original reading at no matter what cost. This, however, was scarcely Mr. Koussevitzy's intention. He probably hears his Beethoven just that way.

Stravinsky Played In Final Concert

At the very final concert, he had occasion to let loose in Stravinsky's noisy (and nothing more) "Sacre du Printemps," which created such a furore a decade ago. It doesn't wear especially well, and without its "program" to give a few hints as to what all the shouting is about, it would not register much, at least to my way of thinking. Just how the man who wrote some of the beautiful passages in "The Firebird" could have perpetrated this misch-masch, is hard to understand.

The Brahms First Symphony had a painstaking performance. The other work was the prelude to "Khovantchina," which is one of the high lights in that somewhat confused opera. Needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky was completely at home in this.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 9 - 1939

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its 22nd pair of concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 14 and 15. David Stanley Smith will appear as guest, conducting his new Symphony No. 4, which is then to have its first performances. Mr. Smith, who is head of the Music Department at Yale university, has been represented at these concerts by other of his works on several occasions in past years. Richard Burgin will conduct the other numbers on this programme, which will open with the Overture to "The Bartered Bride," by Smetana, the Czech composer. The second portion of the programme will consist of three excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner, none of which have been heard in the regular Symphony concerts for several seasons. They will be the Prelude to "Parsifal," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser", and two instrumental portions from the prologue to "Gotterdammerung"; "Daybreak," and "The Rhine Journey of Siegfried."

LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS

APR 9 - 1939

CONSERVATORY FUND CONCERT

Prominent Musicians Appear Friday

The third annual scholarship fund concert of the Conservatory club of Greater Lynn will be held at the parish house of the Unitarian church, Friday evening at 8:15 p. m.

Officers of the Conservatory club are Miss Frances Visalli, president; Martin F. Sprenger, vice president; Miss Dorothy Sargent, secretary; and Richard H. Honnors, treasurer.

A distinguished group of musicians will appear on the program of the fund concert. They are Miss Esther Asher, noted concert pianist of Boston; Edward Bleau, prominent baritone; the Edward Bleau singers, a talented double quartet; and Cyril Saunders, well-known concert violinist. Edward Bleau and the Bleau singers will be accompanied by Madeline Guay Bleau, and Cyril Saunders will be accompanied by Miss Marion Bacon.

Mr. Saunders is the soloist and concert master of the Symphonic ensemble of Boston, and has for many seasons been the leader of the Boston City club ensemble, and of the prominent Felman String quartet of Boston. He was born in Birmingham, England, but came to this country at an early age, pursuing his studies of the violin with such prominent teachers as Mariotti, Adamowski, Elcus and Fourel, of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. ~~Saunders has~~ done considerable concert work, and has toured the principal cities of the East under the management of the National Music league, which is located in New York city.

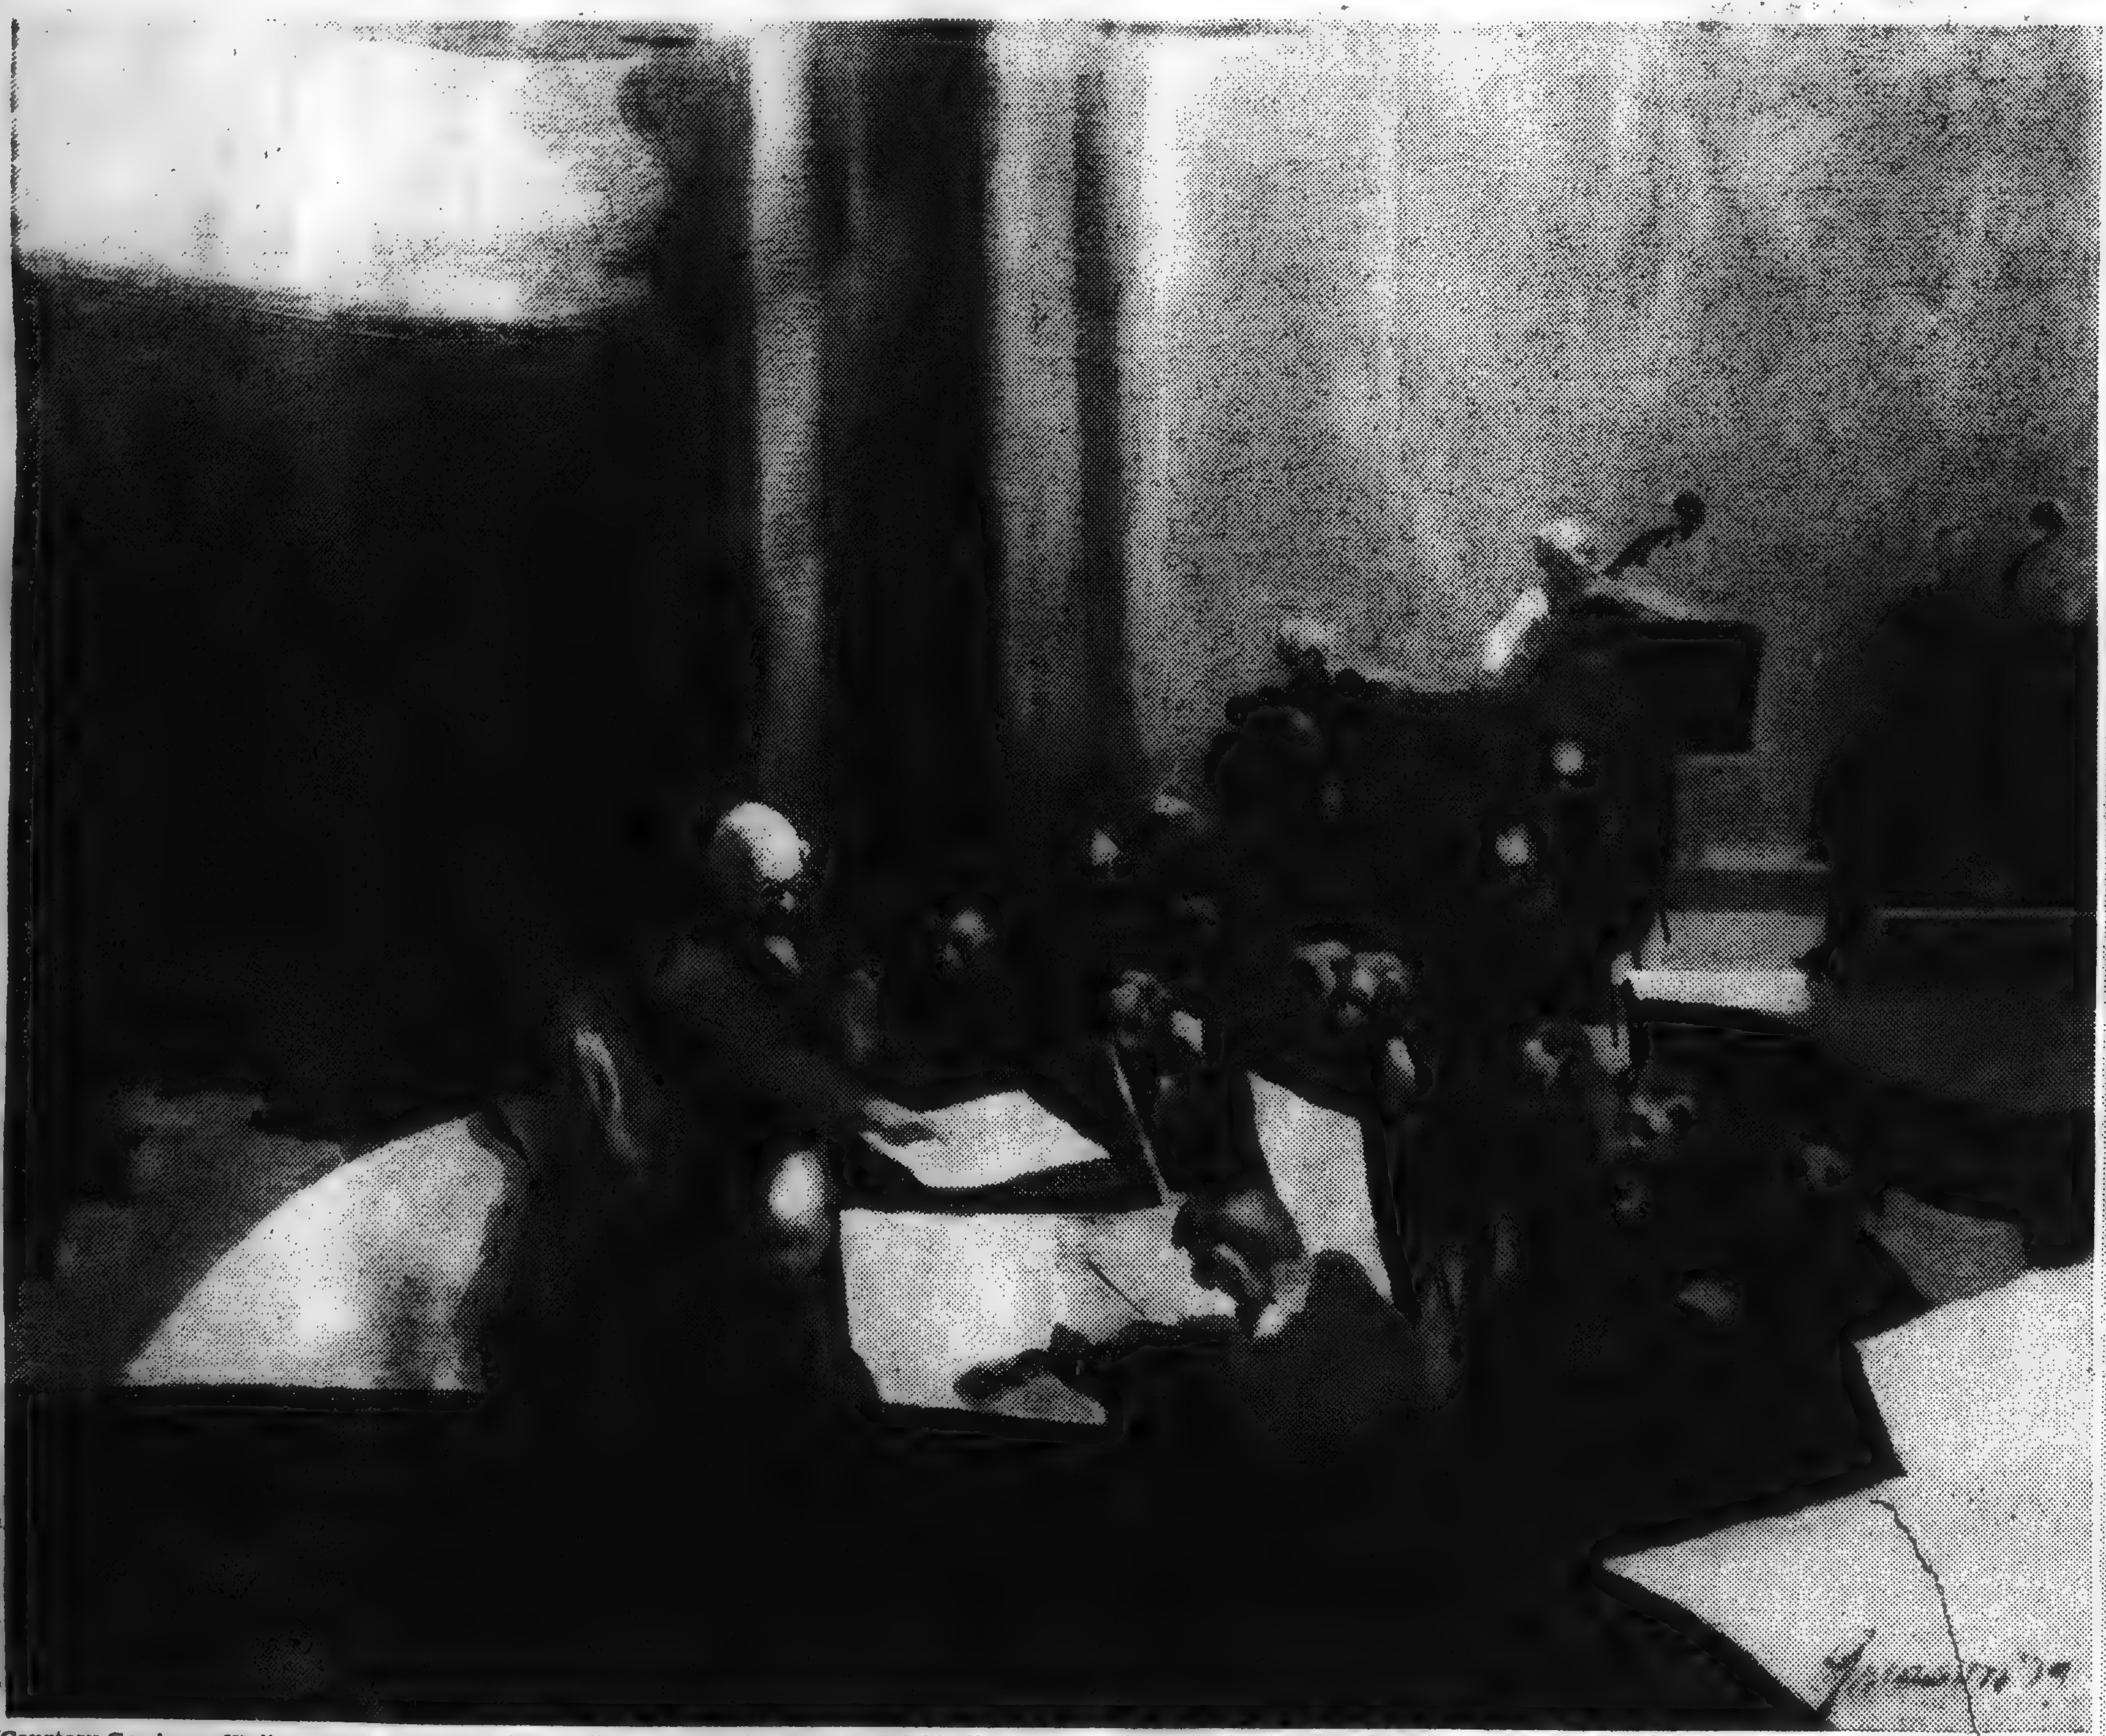
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 9 - 1939

BRAHMS' REQUIEM FOR PENSION FUND

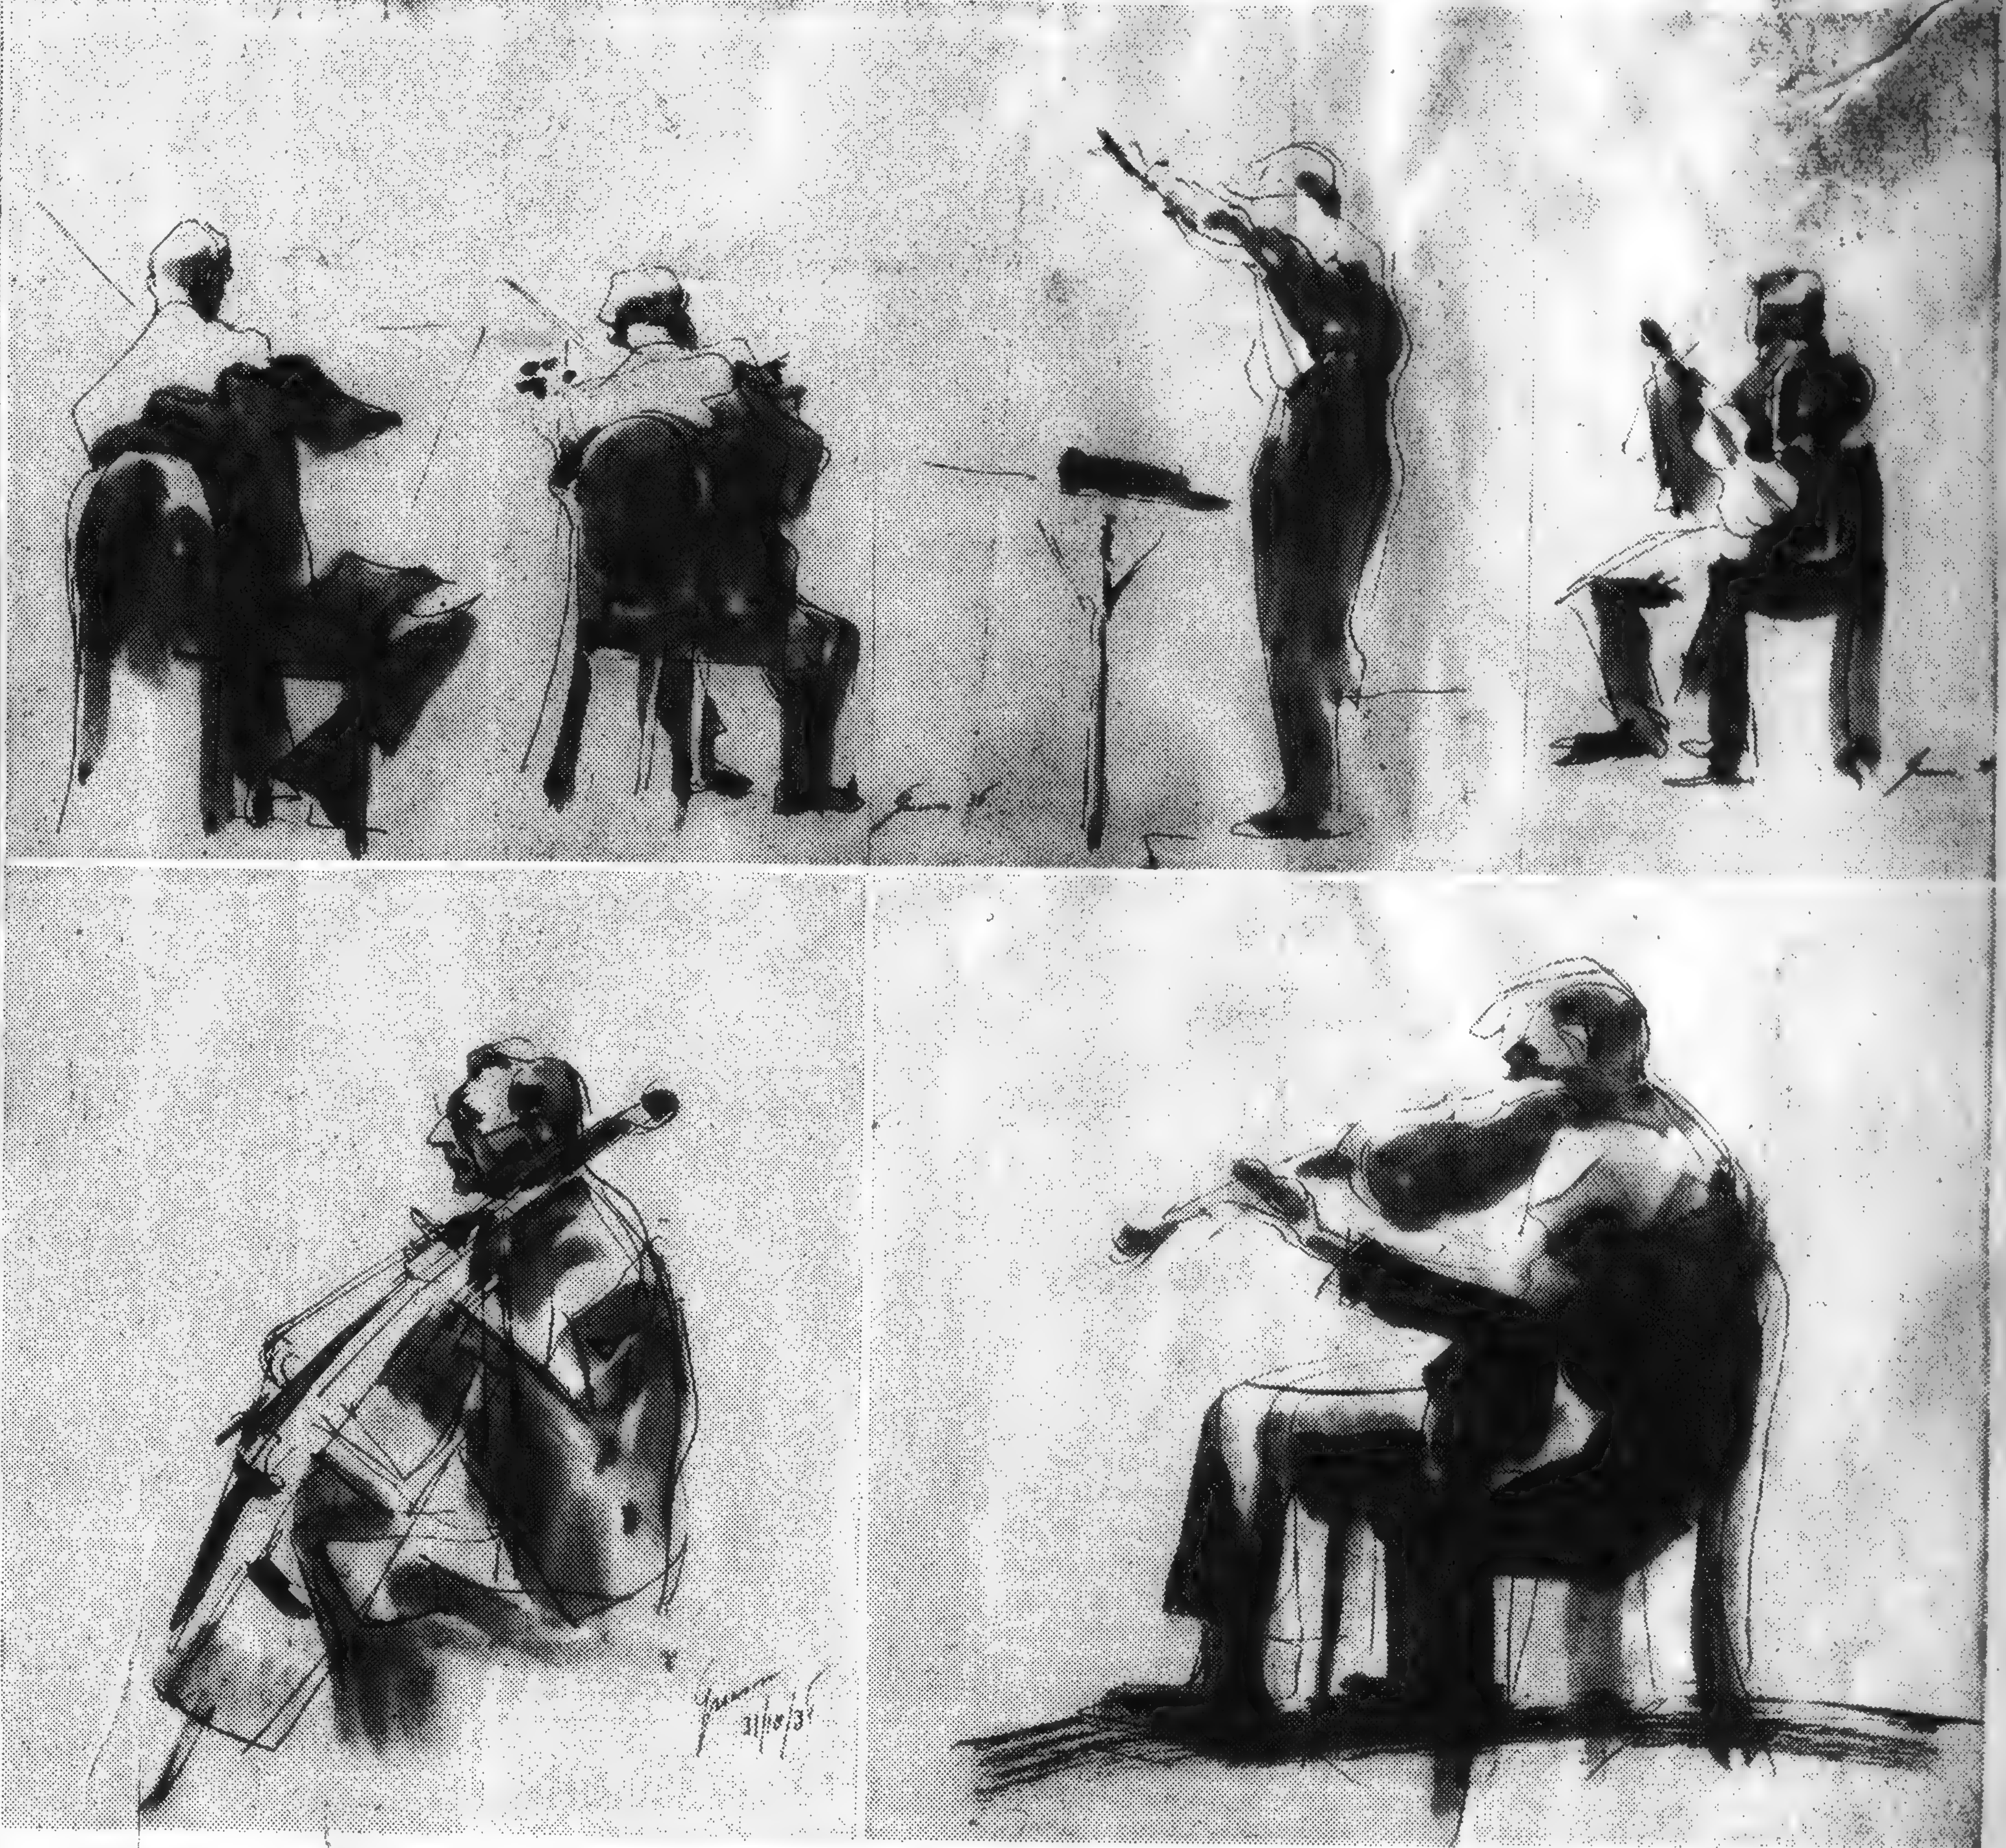
The annual spring Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the occasion of a performance of the "German Requiem" of Johannes Brahms. The concert will be given on Tuesday evening, April 25. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the combined forces of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Harvard Glee club, and the Radcliffe Choral society. Two soloists of high distinction have been engaged for the occasion: Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera company, and Keith Falkner, the English baritone, highly remembered from his performances here.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra Sits for Its Portrait



Courtesy Goodman-Walker Galleries

Painting by Donald Greason of a Rehearsal at Symphony Hall



Sketches by Mr. Greason of Dr. Koussevitzky and His Men, Now on Exhibition at Symphony Hall

Leader and Players Shown In Sketches and Paintings

By Dorothy Adlow

For some years, we have had an opportunity to follow the talents of Donald Greason. He is an artist of a peculiar sensitiveness which cannot be compared with any one trend in painting today. Mr. Greason cuts his own path, through thought and observation. While his landscapes and views of Rockport interested us a season ago for a delicate atmospheric quality, we find that he has come into full stride in an exhibition which is being shown at Symphony Hall. It consists of pen and wash drawings and oil paintings made during many months of first-hand observation of rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Greason has made hundreds of sketches of the conductor, of separate players, groups of players, and of soloists. He has observed the orchestra at many angles, in many lights, during many moods. He has let himself be asorbed by the tension and concentration which prevail among orchestra performers. He has been amused by the facial expressions, by the sitting postures, by the positions of feet and knees and shoulders and heads during performance. He has been enthralled by the decorative contours of instruments which in their functional shape are appealing ornamentally.

* * *

He has made sketches in which the very lines and lights express the music which is being performed at the moment. It is fascinating to move from sketch to sketch, from study to study, and follow the evolution of the oil paintings which are ostensibly the final product of this patient and intricate effort. No other painter of this vicinity has produced as telling and evocative a portrait of the orchestra as a whole in a moment of performance. Here the spectator has an opportunity to examine the great store of preparatory material which culminates in such a portrait.

The drawings are done in free, sketchy manner, with summary indications of gray shadow. We are familiar with great draftsmen of the past who have spoken through the same medium. There is a difference, of course, between the quality of a line drawing and that of a painting. Mr. Greason tries to make the line serve in a painterly way, as Rembrandt did, so that we are aware of the changing and tremulous and arbitrary outline. In color he goes further still in the direction of vibrant and illusionistic effect. While his colors serve in giving construction to figures and depths to space, they also express a mood.

* * *

Mr. Greason has made many a portrayal of Dr. Koussevitzky, whose every conductorial gesture has been captured in line and wash. There are portrayals also of Eugene Goossens and Ernest Bloch and Georges Enesco. They are generally seen from the rear view, and their expressive backs characterize them.

This exhibition will give pleasure to people who are interested for one reason or another in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its members. It shows the fruit of an entire season of activity of one of the most distinguished artists in New England. Inasmuch as the pictures may now be seen only by ticketholders during concert hours, we hope they will be shown elsewhere in this community, so that they will be accessible to more people.

Final Youth Concert

The program for the final concert in the second series of Youth Symphony Concerts, which takes place at 3:30 Wednesday, April 12, in Symphony Hall with Wheeler Beckett conducting 70 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is:

Symphony in D Minor	César Franck
Pastoral and Procession	Langendoen
Russian Easter	Rimsky-Korsakoff

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

APR 6 - 1939

AWARD FINALISTS METRO OPERA ROLE

NEW YORK, April 6.—(AP)—Contracts with the Metropolitan Opera finalists in the Metropolitan's fourth annual series of national radio auditions.

Picked as the winners Sunday night among 659 entrants were brown-haired Annamary Dickey, 25, daughter of a Decatur, Ill., dentist, and Mack Harrell, 29, son of a Greenville, Tex., banker.

One-year contracts and a prize of $1,000 each went to Miss Dickey, a lyric soprano, and Harrell, a baritone.

Miss Dickey, who twice before had reached the semi-finals, has sung at Chautauqua and with the Cincinnati Opera Company and the St. Louis municipal opera. Harrell, a former violin teacher, has appeared with the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic orchestra.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL

APR 7 - 1939

Library Plans Concert

An Easter concert of recorded music will be given Saturday from 3 to 6 p. m. in the music room at Central library. The program will be devoted to Bach's "Passion of Our Lord According to St. Matthew," a recording made by the Boston Symphony orchestra assisted by the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. The concert is free.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

221

THE FINE ARTS

YMPHONY IN PEN

onald Greason Caps a Talent with Prodigious Study of Orchestra Work

By WILLIAM GERMAIN DOOLEY

The best one-man show of the season is not ordinarily open hose who wish to see it. Donald Carlisle Greason has spent t of the last year closely observing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in practice and performance and has caught with distin- shed touch and disciplined stroke the splendid musical unit in whole and in the sum of its parts. More than one hundred and y pen and wash drawings and a score of fine oils have been g in the long gallery, the mezzanine foyer at Symphony Hall, result of Greason's human and ruggedly individual style. re have been other exhibitions at this hall, most of them vincially bad. There have other attempts to portray orchestra, notably soggy and l characterizations that ed sparkle and artistic in- st. It is too bad that the ent show, fine as it is, can y now be seen by ticket holders to the Symphony concerts. or Donald Greason has given Boston orchestra a sympa- tic study and interpreted it h an artistic skill that is rthy of a Koussevitzky or a ck. His is the style of color traint, of nervous line that nmunicates significant im- ssions with the economy that y comes from careful and ed survey of the visual prob- . In the hands of an husiastic but incompetent ftsman this has more than ce resulted in a nice but very ll album of photographic udies and school exercises. It ems that in this case we can claim the coming to full pow- s of a great American artist. or Donald Greason is a aughtsman on a plane unrealed by previous workers of his aft in this country.

rawings Outstanding

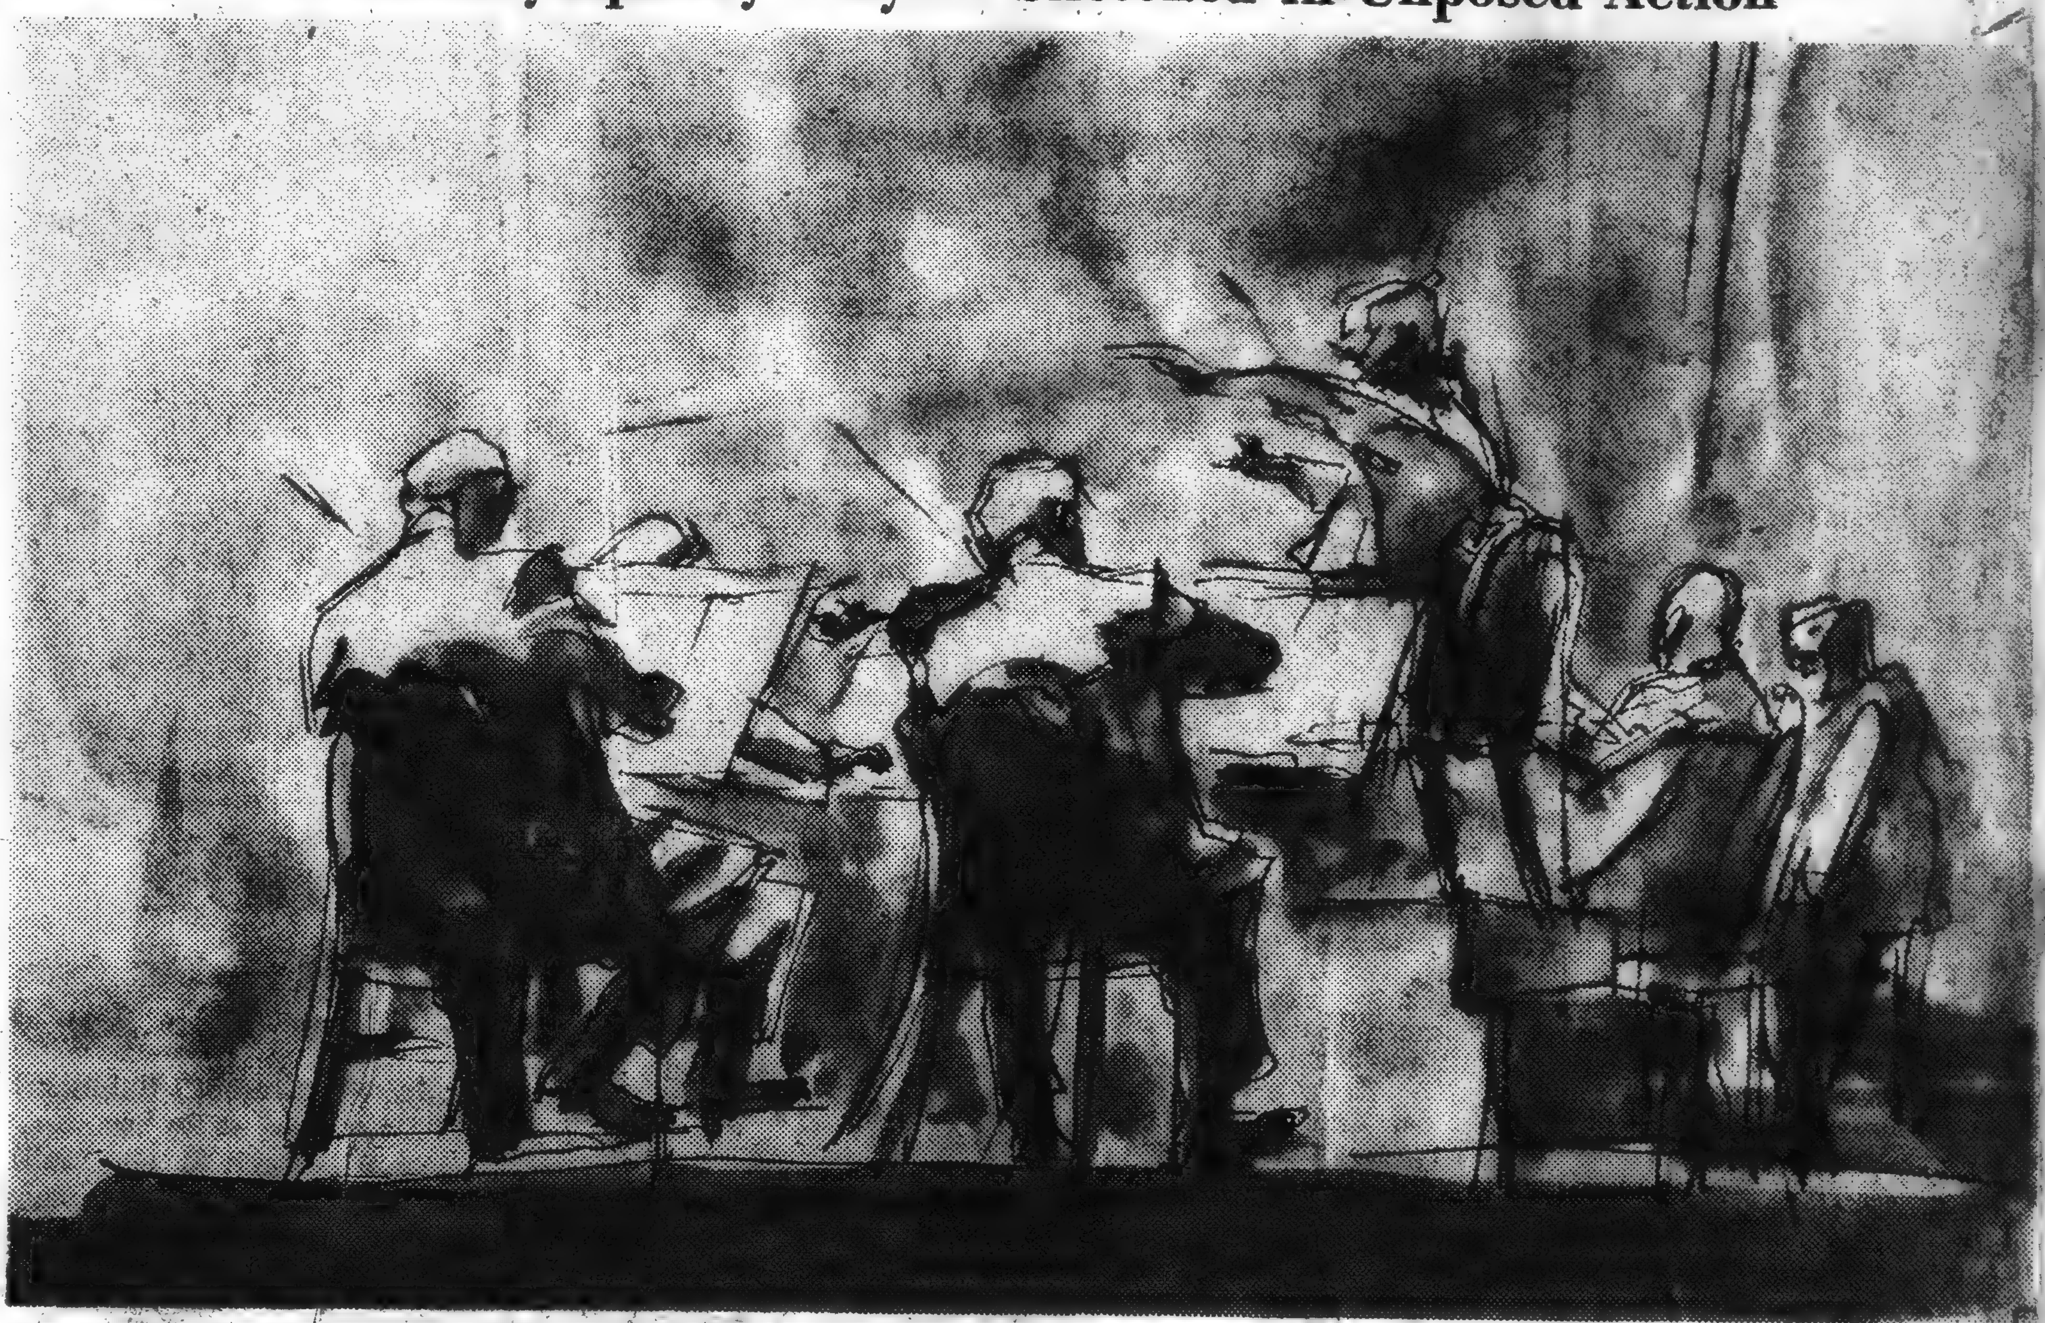
This is no snap judgment. This rtist has been showing here for t least five years. He has corned the usual commercial lugs that accompany a regular gallery career. Even so he had won, years ago, the acclaim of the few journalistic critics of professional standards. It is notable that here he has surpassed previous work by devoting himself to a prodigious subject and immolating the personal portrait to a mass conception of Boston's only claim to contemporary merit in the arts. Certainly Dr. Koussevitzky has led the music loving public into fields that Dr. Edgell and others have yet failed to achieve in painting and sculpture appreciation.

Greason has produced here a major show from any standpoint, and yet in retrospect the variety and scope of the drawings are most amazing. He has overcome a tendency of a nervous scratchy line to make it more eloquent by precise position and sweeping emphasis, by bolstering its thinness with a wash that throws color form and power into the matter. Here is Dr. Koussevitzky to the life, a back-to portrait, yet filled by gesture and mass with characteristic gesture. Here also is Bloch, Goossens, Enesco, and the members of the orchestra. An energetic and highly individual talent, he has made this the feature single performance of the season here in a display that might well be taken up by some museum or gallery for continued, more available showing.

Other Shows of Week

Other exhibitions of the week include an exhibition of oil drawings of American birds by Athos Menaboni at Doll & Richards. These are fine and careful studies, clear cut and nicely patterned, that denote a craftsman in the arts and an ornithological study of easy pleasant approach. Vose Galleries are having a revival and annual show of recent paintings by Frank Vining Smith including the ships he loves to show in their romantic setting and a group of landscapes. And at the Guild on Monday Ruth Anderson will show a startlingly new, high-keyed series of Mexican landscapes, her first in years. They are hung in dramatic silvered native frames that add to the exotic and color aspect of the scene that she has chosen to depict. Though some seem a little fussy and illustrational in handling they are cleanly and capably painted throughout.

Boston Symphony Players Sketched in Unposed Action



GROUP OF PLAYERS, BY DONALD C. GREASON

From his one-man show of paintings and drawings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra now on view at Symphony Hall

---

MUSIC

Philadelphians Afield

Eugene Ormandy and Paul Hindemith Share a Program of the Orchestra in Manhattan

B. Trans. By MOSES SMITH April 12/39

NEW YORK, April 12—The splendors of the Philadelphia Orchestra stood revealed anew last night to the visitor who chanced on its concert in Carnegie Hall here last night. The program, last but one of the ten Tuesday evening affairs the orchestra now presents annually in the Metropolis, ended with Rimsky-Korsakov's resplendent "Russian Easter" Overture, in the course of which the orchestra, under the insistent leadership of Eugene Ormandy, played with a many-hued opulence of tone and a technical virtuosity that would have suffocated the listener if they had not been so stimulating. There seemed little doubt, after the persistent applause and incipient cheers with which the performance was greeted by the large audience, that New Yorkers take the Philadelphia Orchestra to their hearts, as they also do the other principal visiting aggregation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program began with Buxtehude's Organ Passacaglia in D minor, as orchestrated in the slickest and most brilliant fashion of Lucien Cailliet, who may now be called the official arranger of the Philadelphia Orchestra. For the visitor if not for the audience as a whole, this arrangement was indeed suffocating. All its expertness seemed to be directed toward a display of the orchestra's tonal virtuosity, not toward new illumination upon a remarkable score. The Bostonian visitor recalled with pleasure rather the original document as heard in performance at the organ for which it was composed. For the rest, it was possible to ruminate with interest and profit upon the similarity between, on the one hand, the ground theme of Buxtehude's Passacaglia and many devices of development he employed, and, on the other, those exhibited in the Passacaglia in C minor which Bach wrote some years later.

Mozart According to Ormandy

Mr. Ormandy's principal choice fell on the familiar Mozart Symphony in G minor. In the performance the conductor, with a marvelous but (as it happened in this instance) not always impeccable orchestra to do his bidding, was now a masterful interpreter and sensitive musician, now an apparently wilful tinkerer with a masterpiece.

Dealing with a symphony that is so well known that you are as likely as not to hear the proverbial man on the street whistling its tunes, he actually succeeded in creating an atmosphere of freshness, something almost new, for certain pages, as in the phrasing of the main theme of the first movement by the violins, or the skillful and subtle manipulation of the measures just before the reprise. But much of the first and last movements and some of the minuet suffered from distortion of tempo, undue accentuation and, in general, a prevailing uneasiness. More than aything else, perhaps, this listener regretted that the hard brilliance of the Philadelphia string tone was often harder than it was brilliant—a condition that was aggravated by the employment of the entire string section. At the end one was willing to concede the enormous talent and imagination of the Philadelphia conductor, but was equally concerned whether this talent and imagination are to be most gainfully employed in their proper service.

Hindemith's Vision

The concert took on a new tone with the only other number, "Nobilissima visione," the concert suite which Paul Hindemith made out of his ballet, "Saint Francis." To lead in its presentation the orchestra had the services of the composer himself, who soon disclosed that he was no virtuoso conductor at all, but rather an awkward leader fortunately conversant with his own score and apparently sufficiently alert on the executant side to evoke from the musicians what sounded like an excellent performance. There were even times here when the orchestra seemed to be playing with greater precision and clarity than in some of the portions of the program led by the orchestra's regular conductor. Hindemith's directions and prevailing attitude seemed to be in line with a straightforward, unsentimental, twentieth-century realism. In spite of this fact (or because of it, perhaps) there were moments of quiet, affecting beauty, in addition to the periods of excitement which one would expect from Hindemith.

The music, like the music-making, was for the most part in great and welcome contrast to the prevailing cast of the rest of the program, which was either composed or performed in the manner of the late-nineteenth, early-twentieth century, that has made an idol out of the orchestra and a prophet out of the conductor. An exception might be made in the case of the Introduction to the Suite, which has more than occasional overtones of "Parsifal." But the rest of the three movements are straight Hindemith, with all his familiar mastery of counterpoint and with a less familiar poetic vision. It is astounding in how many of these pages you can reduce the harmony to the simple and accepted procedure authorized by the most respected textbooks, and yet how contemporary the music sounds at almost every turn. It is astonishing, too, how Hindemith could examine a subject apparently as distant, in both time and feeling, as St. Francis, and produce a masterpiece of this day and year.

The greater, therefore, was the satisfaction of the listener in noting the genuine enthusiasm with which the audience applauded at the end.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAR 31 1939

MODERN AUTHOR'S BRIEF ESTIMATE OF BACH

The music of Bach, like that of Brahms, is adult music, extremely intellectual and entirely lacking in sensuous emotionality, but withal music of surpassing beauty. . . . Is it not obvious, then, that a complete understanding of the fundamentals of music and much active listening experience are vital to the complete enjoyment of the music of this colossus? He is an outstanding example of a composer to whom one must give before one can receive.

—Harry Allen Feldman.

COURIER
Rockland Me
APR 4 - 1939

From my good friend, Nell Tolman of Auburn, Mass., comes programs and reviews of the Eastern Music Educators Conference held in Boston March 14-17. From Miss Tolman's school, the Putnam School (Auburn) a group of singers garbed in charming Southern costumes presented in the program on Friday, March 17, devoted to "The First Massachusetts Music Festival of Schools in Small Communities"—Songs of the South: Frog in the Well, (traditional American), Down in the Valley (Kentucky Mountains), Go Down, Moses, (Negro Spiritual), The Serenade (Creole Folk Song); Jeanie With the Light Brown Hair (Stephen Foster) Shortenin' Bread (Jacques Wolfe). The Boston Herald carried a picture of a quintet of these youthful singers, and these five girls are certainly lovely in their gowns of dainty print and ruffled bonnets.

I wish space permitted a lengthier review of the Conference for it was a notably fine undertaking, and the features introduced would find much interest with our own music supervisors. During the four days' conference, visitation in many schools of Boston and vicinity was provided, so that actual work, from kindergarten rooms to colleges, could be studied first hand. One evening there was a concert by the New England Conservatory of Music, with Wallace Goodrich directing the orchestra and Francis Findlay, conducting the chorus. There were master classes in band and vocal music, demonstrations by glee clubs, discussions and talk by well known music educators, program of Catholic School Music demonstrations by school orchestras and bands and choruses and so on. A complimentary rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given for members of the Conference—and All-Bloch program with Ernest Bloch himself directing and of course there were dinners and banquets and luncheons, each having delightful and interesting features in the way of speakers and music.

Globe MUSIC April 15/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prof. David Stanley Smith, dean of the Yale University School of Music, conducted the first performance of his Fourth Symphony at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Richard Burgin, concert-master and assistant conductor of the orchestra, directed the remainder of the program, which consisted of the Overture to the opera "The Bartered Bride," by Smetana, and three Wagner excerpts—the Prelude to "Parsifal," the Bacchanale which Wagner wrote for the 1861 Paris performance of "Tannhaeuser," and "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from the last music-drama in the "Nibelungen Ring," "The Dusk of the Gods."

Prof. Smith, who last conducted his own music at these concerts in 1935, wrote his Fourth Symphony in the space of little more than a month at his Summer home in Connecticut in 1937. The work is in the stated key of D minor and runs in the usual four movements. Academically correct but otherwise undistinguished, this Fourth Symphony has a highly electric style in which influences of composers from Wagner to Stravinsky may easily be found. There is not a great deal of sharp dissonance, and so far as sheer sound is concerned, the music is pleasant. Yet on the strength of a first hearing, the Symphony has little striking or vital to say.

Mr. Burgin began the afternoon with an excellent account of the spirited Overture by Smetana, an overture that reflects the delightful comic spirit which pervades the opera as a whole. Here the orchestra was at its fabulous best, precise, sensitive, brilliant, and exhibiting that richness of tone for which Boston's musical glory is famed.

Admirable readings of many representative scores in the orchestral repertory long ago proved Mr. Burgin's talent as conductor. Yet both performance and interpretation of the Wagner excerpts yesterday left something to be desired. These were good readings, in which the power and splendor of Wagner were again apparent.

But truly exceptional performances of Wagner, especially in the case of the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale, require more fine shadings of color and emphasis than were present. And Mr. Burgin's tempi were, in general, a little too slow to make the music flow so freely as it should.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite; "The Tragedy of Salome" by Florent Schmitt, and Schubert's "big" C major Symphony.

C. W. D.

NEW SYMPHONY BY DAVID SMITH

Yale Music Head Conducts at Friday Concert

B. Post April 15/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There were two conductors at yesterday's Symphony Concert, neither of them Dr. Koussevitzky. To inaugurate the afternoon's proceedings Richard Burgin led the orchestra through Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride." After that David Stanley Smith conducted the first public performance of his Fourth Symphony, and Mr. Burgin brought up the rear with three excerpts from Wagner, the Prelude to "Parsifal," the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung," with the usual introductory pages.

"An extension of the classic symphonic idea into the present century" is Mr. Smith's summing up of his fourth essay in the largest instrumental form. However, there is not much that is typical of our musical day and age in this scholarly, cautious score. An occasional dissonance, as though the composer were saying, "See what a bold fellow I have become," an unconventional choice of key for the second subject of the first movement: an Andantino appended to the Scherzo. And that is all. Save for a few salient measures in the slow movement—the best of the four—and touches of vigor in the finale, the symphony is sapless and spineless.

Other works by the eminent head of Yale's music department have exhibited far more vitality and individuality than this. Nor is Mr. Smith a particularly dynamic figure as conductor. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky, had he taken the trouble, could have infused a little more life into this music. But that is something we are not likely to find out.

The name of Smetana appears rarely on our Symphony programmes nowadays. As it happened, his sparkling overture was the high point of the afternoon. Here, as often in the past, Mr. Burgin proved himself an able and effective conductor, but the performances of the three Wagnerian selections were strangely tepid. It was difficult to believe that Wagner's music, familiar as it has become, could sound so tamely. At that, the audience seemed to like it. There was much applause after both the Bacchanale and the pages from "Goetterdaemmerung." There was also, at the conclusion of Mr. Smith's Symphony, the cordial reception due a distinguished guest.

B. Herald MUSIC April 15/39

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 22d concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin and David Stanley Smith conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "The Bartered Bride" Smetana
Symphony No. 4 Op. 78 ...... D. S. Smith
Prelude to "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" . . Wagner
Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from Act 1 of "Goetterdaemmerung" Wagner

For some of us the hero at yesterday's concert was Smetana, whose cheerful Overture received a fine performance by the orchestra under Mr. Burgin's guidance. It is a brilliant piece of music whose object is to get the audience into as merry a mood as possible for the comedy that is to follow. That it so induced a genial feeling in yesterday's audience may be taken for granted, as there can obviously be no aesthetic disputes over this music. That the mood was maintained or changed for something as good or better was, however, extremely doubtful.

The English have a phrase to describe music like Dean Smith's new Symphony, which received its first performance under the composer's direction yesterday. They call it "Mus. Doc." music, that is to say dull and academic and respectable, music that, if it were painting, would make a modest niche in the Royal Academy's annual show. It is, of course, always a temptation to call a professor's music by these names. Unfortunately in Mr. Smith's case it is only too just.

Mr. Smith, in his brief analysis to the Symphony, is clear about his intentions. Unhappily they have not been realized, except perhaps on paper. It would not occur to us, save on Mr. Smith's say-so, to find fantasy in the scherzo and brilliance in the finale. The poly-rhythmical capers in the first movement turn out to be not very interesting, nor is the pyramidal crescendo in the adagio impressive.

Thus do we grasp at straws in an honest attempt to appreciate and thus are we staved off by a pall of dullness, by good intentions that have sadly fizzled. You have but to notice the ineptness of the conclusions to each movement to realize how the composer has failed. It seems ungrateful to condemn a score by an American composer, which has been deemed worthy to be played by a great orchestra; but then insincere opinions are worse than prejudice.

Wagner remained after the intermission to solace the faithful. Forty minutes of Wagner excerpts, at the same time, are not this writer's idea of bliss in the concert hall. Still, it is generally agreed that all tastes should be served in an orchestral season, so that Wagner in one form or another must have his turn.

Though the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale is too long for a concert, it is preferable well played by a first-rate orchestra than accompanied by the clumsy and repugnant spectacle that most opera companies offer. We at least get an idea of how the music should ideally sound, and thence we can vaguely conceive how effective a good ballet to it might be. There is not much logic to the union of these two excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung," even if we recognize the practical excuse that they make a sonorous conclusion.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, offers Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" Suite, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," and Schubert's 7th Symphony in C major.

B Globe MUSIC April 18/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A stirring program that combined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and the soloist of the evening, Frank Glazer, last night brought the Monday evening concerts at Symphony Hall to a close. The audience was genuinely enthusiastic, and unstinted in its applause for all those taking part.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra began with a tribute to Moussorgsky, the 100th anniversary of whose birth fell last month. The choice was the Prelude to Act 1 of "Khovantschina," the opera upon which Moussorgsky was still engaged at the time of his death, and which was fully orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Scored for orchestra without brass, except horns, the Prelude is a most effective bit of atmospheric tone painting. The performance itself was a model of clarity, with a marvel of pianissimo playing at the end.

Mr. Glazer, who has previously appeared in solo recitals in Boston, played the ever-popular and effective Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, which was heard at the regular symphony concerts no longer ago than April 6. Mr. Glazer (who is still in his early 20's) is well equipped technically; as an interpreter he gives a convincing effect of vitality, energy and strength. Such a style of performance is well suited to the playing of Brahms, as the pleasure of the audience testified when they recalled Mr. Glazer again and again. There were moments, however, when one felt the need of a more mellow, cantabile tone—an additional element of execution which Mr. Glazer will doubtless soon add to his already large endowment of pianistic and musical accomplishments. The orchestral part was flexible to the need, at times rugged and dramatic, and, in the andante, songful.

In conclusion Dr. Koussevitzky conducted Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor. Despite countless repetitions this Symphony retains much that is inherently powerful and while it cannot be assigned a program, vividly and graphically portrays conflict and struggle. And it does not lose its wide popular appeal. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made of it a genuinely moving and at times really exciting work that brought a spontaneous expression of pleasure and approval at the end.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 8 - 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie—Final sojourn of the season. Beethoven, Tchaikowsky, Brahms and a superbly savage reading of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps". Brahms does not become Koussevitzky—or vice versa.

NBC Symphony—Mr. Walter communes with Berlioz upon the "Corsair" overture, the suite from "The Damnation of Faust" and the Symphonie Fantastique. Curiously trite, despite the "Rakocszy" march.

B Herald MUSIC April 18/39

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The sixth and last concert this season in the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted; Frank Glazer, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

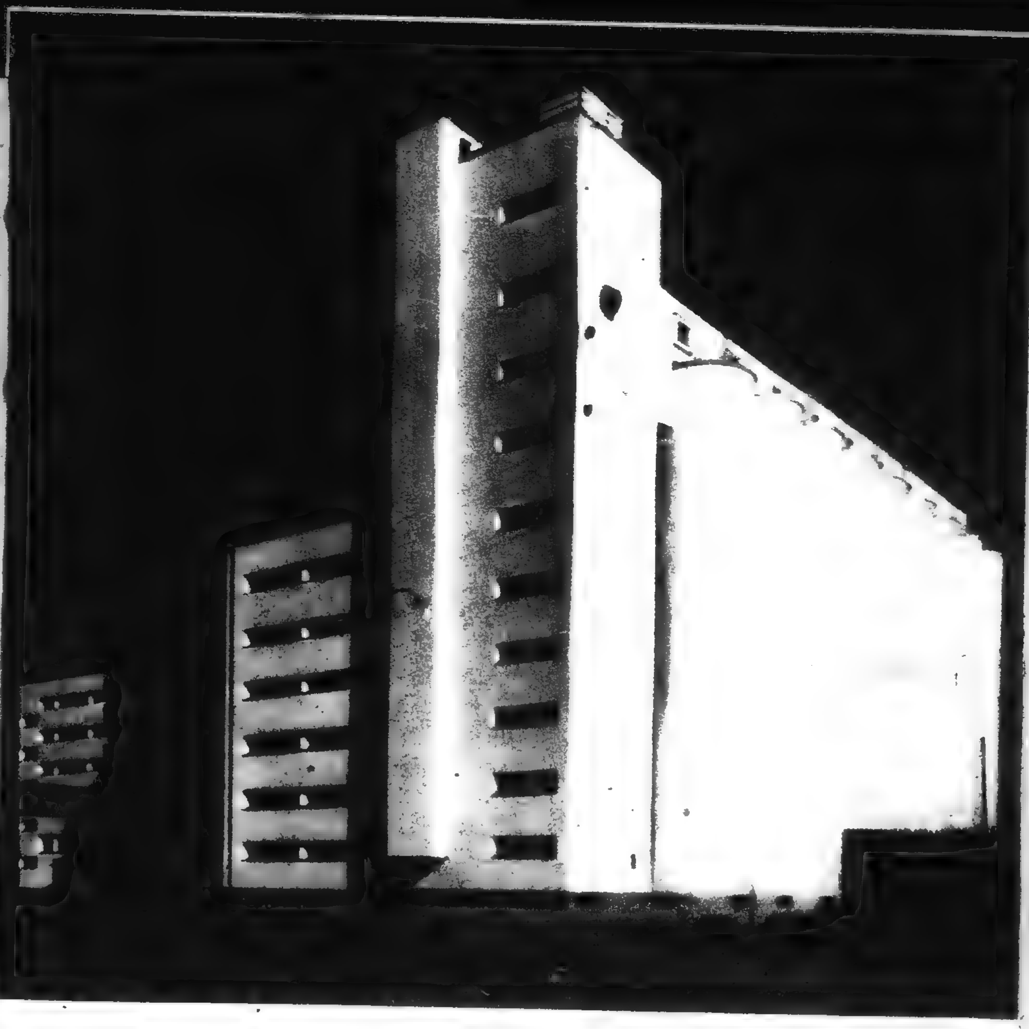
Moussorgsky . . Prelude to "Khovanstchina"
Bhams
Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, Op 83
Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36

A brilliant concert of familiar music brings the Monday-Tuesday series of the Boston Symphony to a close last night and this afternoon. It is hardly necessary to discuss either the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony or the Brahms Second Piano Concerto. Both have been played here this season, and neither is an uncommon feature of any season. Moussorgsky's hauntingly lovely prelude to "Khovanstchina" is perhaps less well known, but it presents no difficulties for the listener. One has but to listen and he shall hear. With so fine an interpretation as Dr. Koussevitzky gives and so delicate a pianissimo as the orchestra achieves, the experience is by that much the greater.

Either of the Brahms concertos provides one of the severest tests to which a pianist can submit himself. That Mr. Glazer succeeded so well is tribute to his remarkable intellectual and musical progress in the past two years. His concert debut here in December, 1936, had technical brilliance to carry it off, but was not particularly auspicious from the purely musical point of view. Now all that has changed. His admirable playing in the Brahms last night has clearly vindicated his admirers who predicted a future for him.

Presumably most people have their own idea of the ideal performance of this concerto. If a fault could be named last night it was, oddly enough, that Mr. Glazer once or twice came near to submerging the piano part too much. He may well have done this deliberately, as if to say: "They shall not have me on the carpet this time for pounding!" It was, as a matter of fact, a very just and faithful interpretation, in which the participation of the orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, was naturally of material importance. Mr. Glazer is to be warmly congratulated and was most cordially applauded last night. A stirring reading of the Tchaikovsky brought the concert to a close.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. Attention should be drawn to the interesting exhibition of paintings and drawings of the orchestra at work by Donald Greason.



The keen modern spirit is evident in the industrial architecture. A flour mill.

(Publicity for Finlandia chorus)

Industrial activities in Finland have advanced greatly in recent times. Among others the mining industry has given considerable results. The Outokumpu copper mine.

The rapids do not only serve the industry. They are imposing attractions for nature-lovers as well.

SYMPHONY IN FINAL MONDAY

B. Post April 18/39

Frank Glazer Soloist in Brahms' Second Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Dr. Koussevitzky again on the job the Symphony Orchestra gave last evening its final Monday concert of the season. The programme, to be repeated this afternoon, consisted entirely of compositions already heard in the concerts of the longer series. These pieces were Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," the Second Pianoforte Concerto of Brahms and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. But whereas at a recent pair of regular concerts the pianist in the Concerto had been Artur Rubinstein, the soloist last evening was Frank Glazer.

Any comparisons between Mr. Rubinstein's performance of this longest of all concertos and that of Mr. Glazer must be a matter for private rumination, rather than for public comment. Suffice it say that Mr. Glazer, who is still, according to the programme book, this side of 25, played this greatly exacting work with a maturity of conception and execution that might have characterized a much older head and pair of hands.

Brahms presents many problems, musical and technical, in this Concerto which, as a whole, seems today one of his more calculated, less genial and spontaneous creations. The trick is to make the piece hang together, to give it continuity and the sense of inevitableness. Mr. Glazer, with Dr. Koussevitzky to aid him, succeeded very well, while his playing, as such, commanded admiration. When vigor was required he had it to give, yet never was his tone forced or hard and the more expressive portions were played in the true Brahmsian spirit, with a warmth and mellowness that kept well clear of sentimentality. Best of all, the piano part was consistently free of the suggestion of thickness and heaviness that is not too easily avoided. Comments on the superb performances of the remainder of the programme are hardly necessary.

CHRONICLE

MAR 30 1939

Handel And Haydn Society To Present Berlioz Legend

Hector Berlioz' dramatic legend entitled "The Damnation of Faust" is to be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 16, as its annual spring concert. The soloists for the occasion will be Paul Althouse of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing the role of Faust; Gertrude Ehrhart, Boston soprano, who will sing the role of Marguerite; Gean Greenwell, who appeared with the Handel and Haydn Society in its performance of "Messiah" in 1937, and who will sing Mephistopheles, and Mark Love, a member of the Chicago City Opera Company, who will be heard as Brander, in his Boston debut. Seventy-four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist. The entire production will be under the conductorship of Dr. Thompson Stone. It will be the first performance of this work by the society. The concert has been arranged for Sunday afternoon at the request of patrons of music and many musical organizations throughout New England. In the past concerts of the society have been held in the evening.

MUSIC

April 15/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prof. David Stanley Smith, dean of the Yale University School of Music, conducted the first performance of his Fourth Symphony at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Richard Burgin, concert-master and assistant conductor of the orchestra, directed the remainder of the program, which consisted of the Overture to the opera "The Bartered Bride," by Smetana, and three Wagner excerpts—the Prelude to "Parsifal," the Bacchanale which Wagner wrote for the 1861 Paris performance of "Tannhaeuser," and "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from the last music-drama in the "Nibelungen Ring," "The Dusk of the Gods."

Prof. Smith, who last conducted his own music at these concerts in 1935, wrote his Fourth Symphony in the space of little more than a month at his Summer home in Connecticut in 1937. The work is in the stated key of D minor and runs in the usual four movements. Academically correct but otherwise undistinguished, this Fourth Symphony has a highly electric style in which influences of composers from Wagner to Stravinsky may easily be found. There is not a great deal of sharp dissonance, and so far as sheer sound is concerned, the music is pleasant. Yet on the strength of a first hearing, the Symphony has little striking or vital to say.

Mr. Burgin began the afternoon with an excellent account of the spirited Overture by Smetana, an overture that reflects the delightful comic spirit which pervades the opera as a whole. Here the orchestra was at its fabulous best, precise, sensitive, brilliant, and exhibiting that richness of tone for which Boston's musical glory is famed.

Admirable readings of many representative scores in the orchestral repertory long ago proved Mr. Burgin's talent as conductor. Yet both performance and interpretation of the Wagner excerpts yesterday left something to be desired. These were good readings, in which the power and splendor of Wagner were again apparent.

But truly exceptional performances of Wagner, especially in the case of the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale, require more fine shadings of color and emphasis than were present. And Mr. Burgin's tempi were, in general, a little too slow to make the music flow so freely as it should.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite; "The Tragedy of Salome" by Florent Schmitt, and Schubert's "big" C major Symphony.

C. W. D.

NEW SYMPHONY BY DAVID SMITH

Yale Music Head Conducts at Friday Concert

B. Post April 15/39

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There were two conductors at yesterday's Symphony Concert, neither of them Dr. Koussevitzky. To inaugurate the afternoon's proceedings Richard Burgin led the orchestra through Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride." After that David Stanley Smith conducted the first public performance of his Fourth Symphony, and Mr. Burgin brought up the rear with three excerpts from Wagner, the Prelude to "Parsifal," the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung," with the usual introductory pages.

"An extension of the classic symphonic idea into the present century" is Mr. Smith's summing up of his fourth essay in the largest instrumental form. However, there is not much that is typical of our musical day and age in this scholarly, cautious score. An occasional dissonance, as though the composer were saying, "See what a bold fellow I have become," an unconventional choice of key for the second subject of the first movement; an Andantino appended to the Scherzo. And that is all. Save for a few salient measures in the slow movement—the best of the four—and touches of vigor in the finale, the symphony is sapless and spineless.

Other works by the eminent head of Yale's music department have exhibited far more vitality and individuality than this. Nor is Mr. Smith a particularly dynamic figure as conductor. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky, had he taken the trouble, could have infused a little more life into this music. But that is something we are not likely to find out.

The name of Smetana appears rarely on our Symphony programmes nowadays. As it happened, his sparkling overture was the high point of the afternoon. Here, as often in the past, Mr. Burgin proved himself an able and effective conductor, but the performances of the three Wagnerian selections were strangely tepid. It was difficult to believe that Wagner's music, familiar as it has become, could sound so [illegible]. At that, the audience seemed to like it. There was much applause for both the Bacchanale and the [illegible] from "Goetterdaemmerung." There was also, at the conclusion of Mr. Smith's Symphony, the cordial reception due a distinguished guest.

MUSIC

B. Herald April 15/39

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 22d concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin and David Stanley Smith conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "The Bartered Bride"	Smetana
Symphony No. 4 Op. 78	D. S. Smith
Prelude to "Parsifal"	Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from Act 1 of "Goetterdaemmerung"	Wagner

For some of us the hero at yesterday's concert was Smetana, whose cheerful Overture received a fine performance by the orchestra under Mr. Burgin's guidance. It is a brilliant piece of music whose object is to get the audience into as merry a mood as possible for the comedy that is to follow. That it so induced a genial feeling in yesterday's audience may be taken for granted, as there can obviously be no aesthetic disputes over this music. That the mood was maintained or changed for something as good or better was, however, extremely doubtful.

The English have a phrase to describe music like Dean Smith's new Symphony, which received its first performance under the composer's direction yesterday. They call it "Mus. Doc." music, that is to say dull and academic and respectable, music that, if it were painting, would make a modest niche in the Royal Academy's annual show. It is, of course, always a temptation to call a professor's music by these names. Unfortunately in Mr. Smith's case it is only too just.

Mr. Smith, in his brief analysis to the Symphony, is clear about his intentions. Unhappily they have not been realized, except perhaps on paper. It would not occur to us, save on Mr. Smith's say-so, to find fantasy in the scherzo and brilliance in the finale. The poly-rhythmical capers in the first movement turn out to be not very interesting, nor is the pyramidal crescendo in the adagio impressive.

Thus do we grasp at straws in an honest attempt to appreciate and thus are we staved off by a pall of dullness, by good intentions that have sadly fizzled. You have but to notice the ineptness of the conclusions to each movement to realise how the composer has failed. It seems ungrateful to condemn a score by an American composer, which has been deemed worthy to be played by a great orchestra; but then insincere opinions are worse than prejudice.

Wagner remained after the intermission to solace the faithful. Forty minutes of Wagner excerpts, at the same time, are not this writer's idea of bliss in the concert hall. Still, it is generally agreed that all tastes should be served in an orchestral season, so that Wagner in one form or another must have his turn.

Though the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale is too long for a concert, it is preferable well played by a first-rate orchestra than accompanied by the clumsy and repugnant spectacle that most opera companies offer. We at least get an idea of how the music should ideally sound, and thence we can vaguely conceive how effective a good ballet to it might be. There is not much logic to the union of these two excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung," even if we recognize the practical excuse that they make a sonorous conclusion.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, offers Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" Suite, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," and Schubert's 7th Symphony in C major.

MUSIC

B. Globe April 18/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A stirring program that combined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and the soloist of the evening, Frank Glazer, last night brought the Monday evening concerts at Symphony Hall to a close. The audience was genuinely enthusiastic, and unstinted in its applause for all those taking part.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra began with a tribute to Moussorgsky, the 100th anniversary of whose birth fell last month. The choice was the Prelude to Act 1 of "Khovantschina," the opera upon which Moussorgsky was still engaged at the time of his death, and which was fully orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Scored for orchestra without brass, except horns, the Prelude is a most effective bit of atmospheric tone painting. The performance itself was a model of clarity, with a marvel of pianissimo playing at the end.

Mr. Glazer, who has previously appeared in solo recitals in Boston, played the ever-popular and effective Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, which was heard at the regular symphony concerts no longer ago than April 6. Mr. Glazer (who is still in his early 20's) is well equipped technically; as an interpreter he gives a convincing effect of vitality, energy and strength. Such a style of performance is well suited to the playing of Brahms, as the pleasure of the audience testified when they recalled Mr. Glazer again and again. There were moments, however, when one felt the need of a more mellow, cantabile tone—an additional element of execution which Mr. Glazer will doubtless soon add to his already large endowment of pianistic and musical accomplishments. The orchestral part was flexible to the need, at times rugged and dramatic, and, in the andante, songful.

In conclusion Dr. Koussevitzky conducted Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor. Despite countless repetitions this Symphony retains much that is inherently powerful and while it cannot be assigned a program, vividly and graphically portrays conflict and struggle. And it does not lose its wide popular appeal. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made of it a genuinely moving and at times really exciting work that brought a spontaneous expression of pleasure and approval at the end.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 8 - 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie—Final sojourn of the season. Beethoven, Tchaikowsky, Brahms and a superbly savage reading of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps". Brahms does not become Koussevitsky—or vice versa.

NBC Symphony—Mr. Walter communes with Berlioz upon the "Corsair" overture, the suite from "The Damnation of Faust" and the Symphonie Fantastique. Curiously trite, despite the "Rakoczy" march.

MUSIC

B. Herald April 18/39

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The sixth and last concert this season in the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted; Frank Glazer, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

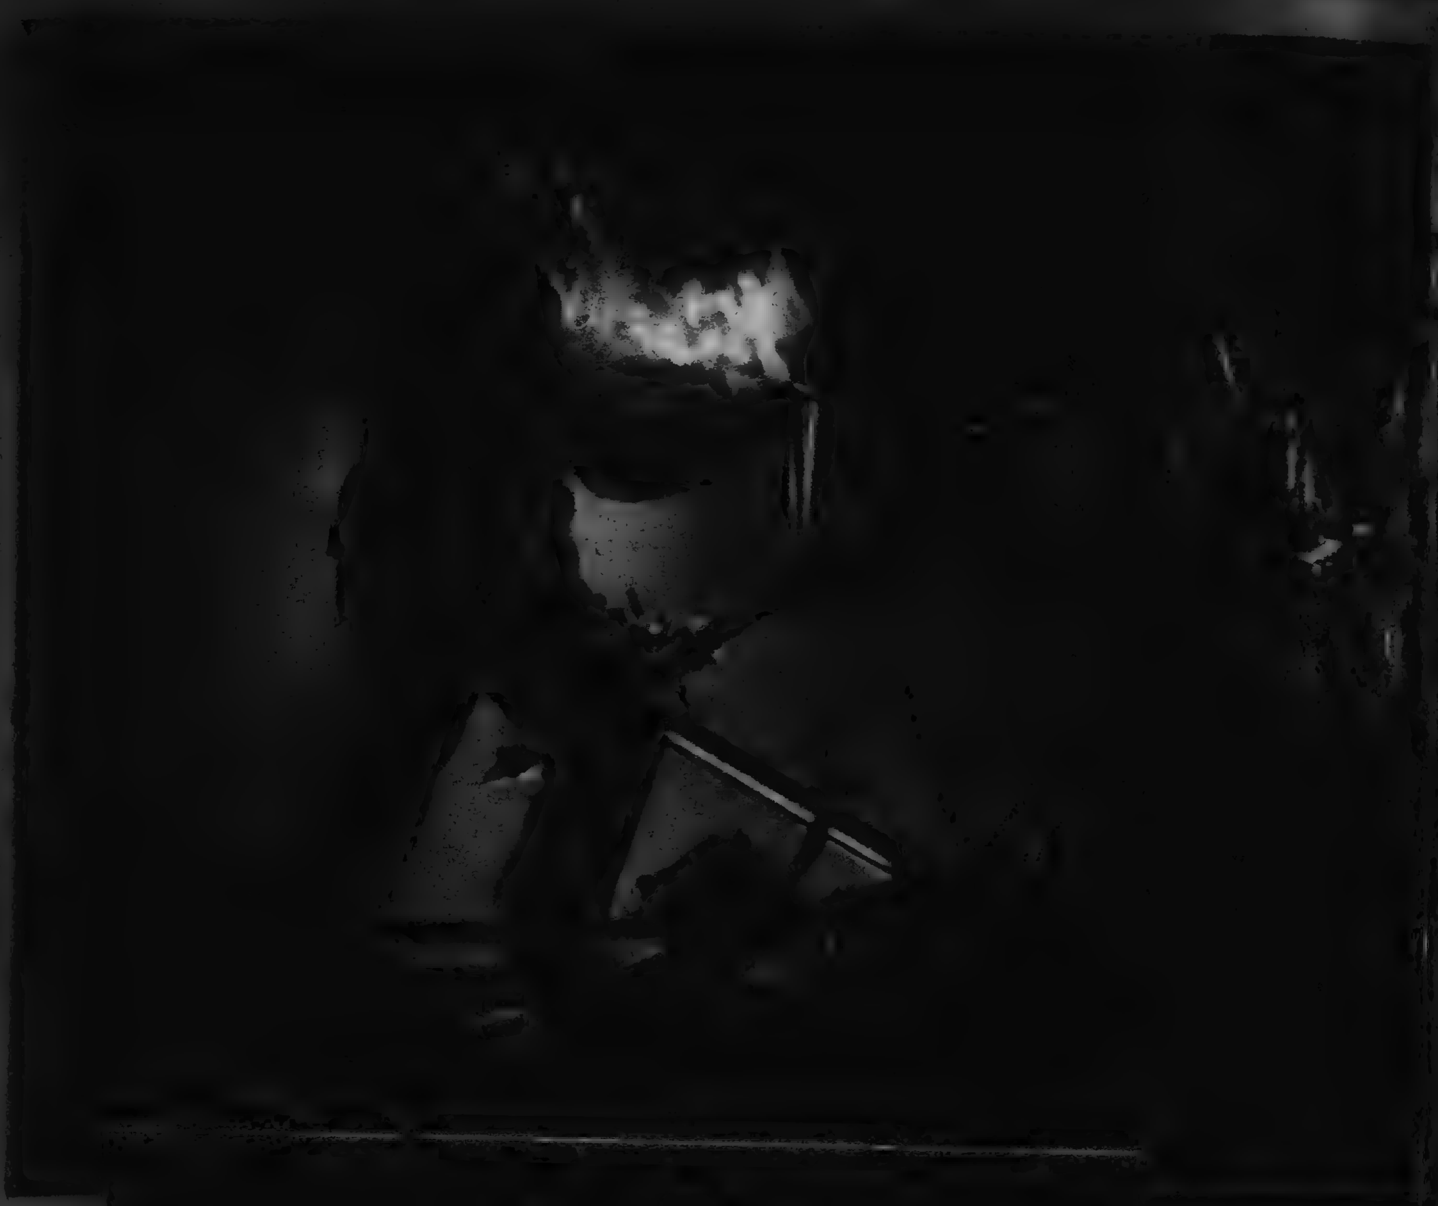
Moussorgsky . Prelude to "Khovanstchina"
Bhams
Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, Op 83
Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36

A brilliant concert of familiar music brings the Monday-Tuesday series of the Boston Symphony to a close last night and this afternoon. It is hardly necessary to discuss either the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony or the Brahms Second Piano Concerto. Both have been played here this season, and neither is an uncommon feature of any season. Moussorgsky's hauntingly lovely prelude to "Khovanstchina" is perhaps less well known, but it presents no difficulties for the listener. One has but to listen and he shall hear. With so fine an interpretation as Dr. Koussevitzky gives and so delicate a pianissimo as the orchestra achieves, the experience is by that much the greater.

Either of the Brahms concertos provides one of the severest tests to which a pianist can submit himself. That Mr. Glazer succeeded so well is tribute to his remarkable intellectual and musical progress in the past two years. His concert debut here in December, 1936, had technical brilliance to carry it off, but was not particularly auspicious from the purely musical point of view. Now all that has changed. His admirable playing in the Brahms last night has clearly vindicated his admirers who predicted a future for him.

Presumably most people have their own idea of the ideal performance of this concerto. If a fault could be named last night it was, oddly enough, that Mr. Glazer once or twice came near to submerging the piano part too much. He may well have done this deliberately, as if to say: "They shall not have me on the carpet this time for pounding!" It was, as a matter of fact, a very just and faithful interpretation, in which the participation of the orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, was naturally of material importance. Mr. Glazer is to be warmly congratulated and was most cordially applauded last night. A stirring reading of the Tchaikovsky brought the concert to a close.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. Attention should be drawn to the interesting exhibition of paintings and drawings of the orchestra at work by Donald Greason.



The keen modern spirit is evident in the industrial architecture. A flour mill.

(Publicity for Finlandia Show)

Industrial activities in Finland have advanced greatly in recent times. Among others the mining industry has given considerable results. The Outokumpu copper mine.

The rapids do not only serve the industry. They are imposing attractions for nature-lovers as well.

SYMPHONY IN FINAL MONDAY

B. Post April 18/39

Frank Glazer Soloist in Brahms' Second Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Dr. Koussevitzky again on the job the Symphony Orchestra gave last evening its final Monday concert of the season. The programme, to be repeated this afternoon, consisted entirely of compositions already heard in the concerts of the longer series. These pieces were Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina," the Second Pianoforte Concerto of Brahms and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. But whereas at a recent pair of regular concerts the pianist in the Concerto had been Artur Rubinstein, the soloist last evening was Frank Glazer.

Any comparisons between Mr. Rubinstein's performance of this longest of all concertos and that of Mr. Glazer must be a matter for private rumination, rather than for public comment. Suffice it say that Mr. Glazer, who is still, according to the programme book, this side of 25, played this greatly exacting work with a maturity of conception and execution that might have characterized a much older head and pair of hands.

Brahms presents many problems, musical and technical, in this Concerto which, as a whole, seems today one of his more calculated, less genial and spontaneous creations. The trick is to make the piece hang together, to give it continuity and the sense of inevitableness. Mr. Glazer, with Dr. Koussevitzky to aid him, succeeded very well, while his playing, as such, commanded admiration. When vigor was required he had it to give, yet never was his tone forced or hard and the more expressive portions were played in the true Brahmsian spirit, with a warmth and mellowness that kept well clear of sentimentality. Best of all, the piano part was consistently free of the suggestion of thickness and heaviness that is not too easily avoided. Comments on the superb performances of the remainder of the programme are hardly necessary.

CHRONICLE

Brookline Mass

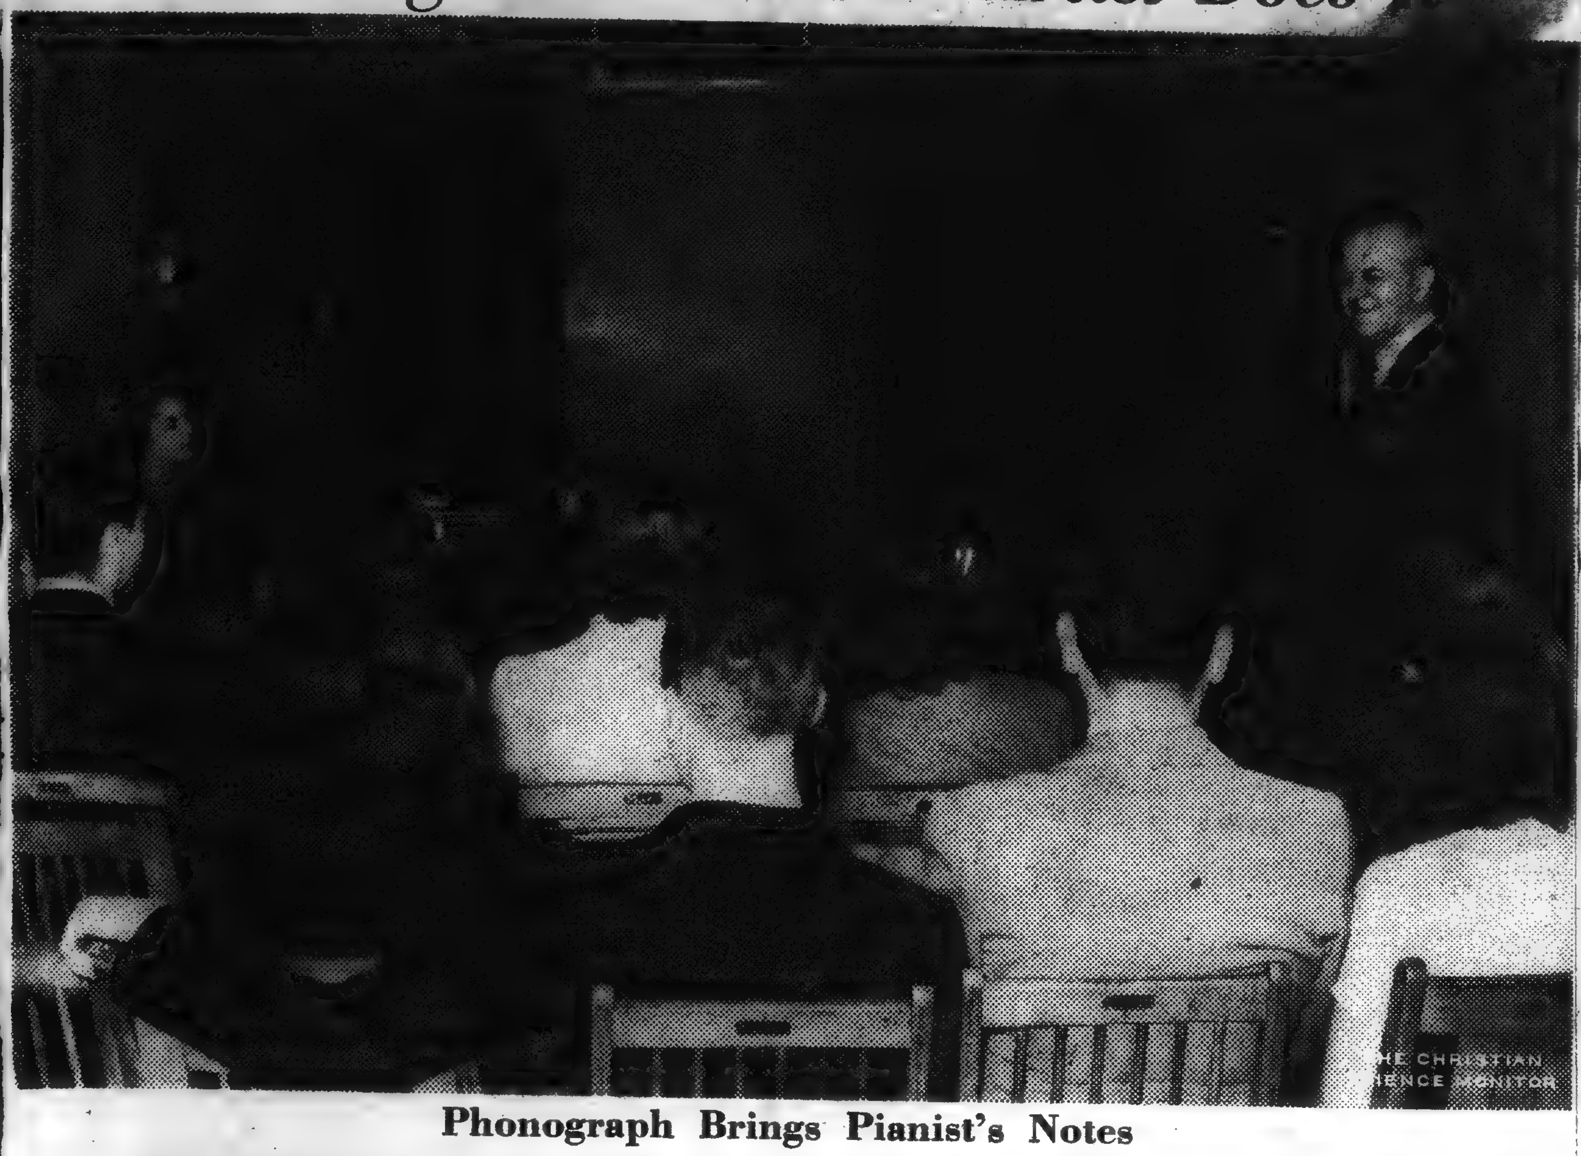
MAR 30 1939

Handel And Haydn Society To Present Berlioz Legend

Hector Berlioz' dramatic legend entitled "The Damnation of Faust" is to be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 16, as its annual spring concert. The soloists for the occasion will be Paul Althouse of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing the role of Faust; Gertrude Ehrhart, Boston soprano, who will sing the role of Marguerite; Gean Greenwell, who appeared with the Handel and Haydn Society in its performance of "Messiah" in 1937, and who will sing Mephistopheles, and Mark Love, a member of the Chicago City Opera Company, who will be heard as Brander, in his Boston debut. Seventy-four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist. The entire production will be under the conductorship of Dr. Thompson Stone. It will be the first performance of this work by the society. The concert has been arranged for Sunday afternoon at the request of patrons of music and many musical organizations throughout New England. In the past concerts of the society have been held in the evening.

Y, APRIL 13, 1939 = C. S. Monitor

Showing Class How an Artist Does It



Phonograph Brings Pianist's Notes

Dr. John P. Marshall, Dean of the Boston University College of Music, discussing themes used by Alec Templeton, blind English concert pianist, in improvisations at a Carnegie Hall concert, which were heard in the form of phonograph transcriptions today at 25 Blagden Street, by students of the College and visitors.

Pianist Makes Boston Debut 'In Absentia'

Alec Templeton, blind English pianist and musical humorist, made his bow to a Boston audience today and was greeted tumultuously. This enthusiastic reception was quite impersonal and unbiased, because it was based entirely upon Mr. Templeton's technique. He himself was not present.

The "in absentia" recital and Boston debut took place between noon and 1 p. m. at a special assembly of students of the Boston University College of Music at 25 Blagden Street. Dr. John P. Marshall, Dean of the College, flanked by a phonograph, piano, and blackboard, explained that Mr. Templeton would be represented by his work as preserved in phonograph records, which were transcripts of a concert the pianist gave last February in Carnegie Hall, New York. They illustrated, he said, improvisation and the expression of humor and satire in music.

Bach Incident

This form of composition is quite legitimate, Dr. Marshall indicated, recalling that John Sebastian Bach was "fired" one time because he improvised too long at a service.

Dr. Marshall put on a record, "Bach Goes to Town," an orchestration from one piano piece in Mr. Templeton's "Topsy Turvy Suite." This turned out to be a lively Grade A piece of swing as well as, according to the Dean, catching the spirit of the Bach idiom.

Dr. Marshall then delegated to Laning Humphrey of Cambridge and Symphony Hall, purveyor of news of the musically great, the task of explaining the "concert."

The ensuing interlude illustrated Mr. Templeton's ability in inventivness, as well as being an expression of humor in music.

From the phonograph came the artist's invitation to give him five musical notes on which to build a theme. Voices could be heard calling back from the audience. Then the pianist started from scratch with A, F sharp, B flat, G sharp and D.

Rippling Composition

Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston pianist, took a hand at this point by regulating the speed of the instrument to correct the pitch. His technical assistance resulted in a liquid rippling composition which at the end drew a mechanical spattering of applause.

Using the same five notes, Mr. Templeton then gave his audience a number in the style of Bach and then one in the manner of Mozart.

One could hear snickers from the audience as the five notes served for a "Strauss" waltz, and laughter increased when Sullivan's "Lost Chord" was done in the Gilbert and Sullivan manner.

Climax to the recital came in what the artist designed as "the shortest opera ever written." This was a mock Wagnerian score opening with a prelude typical of Wagnerian composition. From this point on the pianist sang all parts, male and female, continuing his own accompaniment. There was continued applause for his soprano role, in which that singer evidently was trying to escape being drowned out by the soaring notes of a tenor presumably lifting himself by his boot straps.

Later in the recital, a number of the themes improvised by Mr. Templeton were played on the piano from notations placed on the blackboard by Prof. Raymond C. Robinson of the College.

Templeton improvisations in one sense struck listeners as reversing the method of Sigmund Spaeth, "the tune detective." Mr. Spaeth takes a new theme and traces its antecedents, while Mr. Templeton takes an original and readapts it to his satiric purpose.

In addition to the students and Mr. Sanroma a number of faculty members and Richard Hale of the Metropolitan Opera were present.

The phonographic performance was a "curtain raiser" to the concert to be given by Mr. Templeton in person in Symphony Hall, Friday, April 21,.

E. B. T.

PORTLAND, MAINE
PRESS HERALD
APR 7 - 1939

Cycle Of Five Beethoven Sonatas Is First Of Four Concerts At Bowdoin Institute Of Music

Special Despatch to The Press Herald

Brunswick, April 6—Different from anything that has been offered here in the past, will be the first four concerts in connection with Bowdoin's Institute of Music, April 10-22. This is the presentation by Yves Chardon, cellist, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Prof. Frederic Tillotson of Bowdin College, of a cycle of five Beethoven sonatas, on April 12. Because of the length of the program it will be given in two sections.

This type of concert is known as the festival plan. At 4.30 in the afternoon, they will play two of the sonatas for violincello and piano, and, after an intermission for dinner, will present the other three beginning at 8.15. Chardon and Tillotson have given similar concert programs of works by both Beethoven and Bach, at Harvard University, but nothing like it has ever been done locally.

Since both artists are well known to those who have followed the Bowdoin concert series in recent years, there is little need for long descriptions here.

Mr. Chardon is a native of France and began the study of cello at the age of six. Entering the Paris Conservatory of Music he won the first prize when only 15 years old. There followed a brilliant career as soloist throughout France and Italy, after which he was named professor at the Athens Conservatory. Here he met and played under the famous conductor, Mitropoulos.

Mr. Chardon is himself an able conductor and has made many appearances in that capacity, including a notable one in the production of Honegger's King David at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, Mass. His quartet was played last year by the Chardon Quartet which he founded. He is now cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, head of the chamber music department and graduate school of the Longy School of Music, and is teacher of violincello at Wellesley College.

Prof. Tillotson, who joined the Bowdoin College faculty two years ago, is also a noted concert pianist. A native of St. Louis, Mo., he too

---

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 8 - 1939

THE spectacle of elderly subscribers to the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall concerts cheering a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" was entertaining to those of us who recall when this work was considered by conservatives as something to regard dubiously, or even with a sturdy "pfui." The reasons for the recent favorable uproar over the piece seemed to be, first, the vigor and clarity of Serge Koussevitzky's presentation (a few slipups weren't material); and, secondly, the fact that audiences no longer are frightened by things which used to be called "cacophonous." "The Rite of Spring" is on its way to becoming an old familiar.

They'll be whistling tunes from it in a few years—maybe.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD - EXAMINER
APR 9 - 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Modern Works

VICTOR RECORD releases for last month include the latest work of Aaron Copland, one of America's most prominent contributors to so-called "modern" music. (M-546.)

This symphonic composition, entitled "El Salon Mexico." is recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It describes, in vivid musical terms, the life and color of Mexico and its capital city. Copland uses various lively folk and dance tunes fo rthematic material and translates them for American ears in a style unmistakably his own. The harmonic and rhythmic structure of the work is a far cry from Mozartian standards, but the "popular" spirit of the piece is infectious and highly entertaining.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 15 1939

TWENTIETH-CENTURY: Charles Martin Loeffler's eloquent "Music for Four String Instruments," beautifully played by the Coolidge Quartet (Victor album M-543). . . . "El Salón México," Aaron Copland's inventive and stimulating treatment of Mexican airs, conducted with a successful blending of dash and Schmalz by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony responding with great virtuosity (Victor album M-546). —R. A. S.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION ✓
APR 9 - 1939

Chopin and Schumann In Two Victor Albums

B-Minor Sonata and Carnaval' Played in Recent Recordings—The Classical Period and Its Growth Toward Romanticism — Composers Show Kinship—Spohr's Eighth Concerto—Aaron Copland

By BENJAMIN BUXTON

CHOPIN and Schumann are two of the most familiar and understandable figures of 19th century music, and in two recent Victor albums their works, placed side by side, show not only a kinship in their methods but the earmarks of the period itself. Schumann's "Carnaval" suite for piano, played by Myra Hess, and Chopin's Sonata No 3 in B-minor, played by Alexander Brailowsky, are totally dissimilar in form, yet quite similar in feeling.

The classical period is not thought of as an experimental time, yet the sonata form, which found its most perfect expression in the works of Haydn, Beethoven and Mozart, was constantly changing. The set custom of writing three or four movements to a piece called "sonata" or "symphony" was not as set as might be thought. The symphonies of any of these three composers cannot be regarded as having been written in a permanent mold, for the casual observer can note differences in method, both from the technical and emotional standpoints.

The classical period was as changing as experimental as the romantic and modern periods, and therefore do not need to be classified as a permanent ideal of perfection, but an era in the history of music when a certain form was adhered to more or less strictly.

In his last quartets, Beethoven went far afield from "classicism" and was still living when the romanticists were beginning to write program music, letting their fancies carry them on clouds far away from the solid realities of the sonata's clipped outline. Romanticism led from classicism naturally and logically, continuing a tradition that might have become outworn and stale had it not taken a new turn. This turn need not necessarily have been for the better in all points, but it nevertheless instilled a new vitality, a feverish one, into an art that would die quickly without the stretching forth toward new horizons.

A Restless Age

Chopin and Schumann are two of the natural products of a restless age of creative activity. They, too, were experimental, and being experimental, their works have to be judged by those standards. Of the two, Schumann undoubtedly has greater significance, not only because of the wider range of his compositions, but because of his sincere, although not always discriminating sponsorship of the musicians of his day. His editorial work, in which he championed both the great and the mediocre, was an important phase of his life. He was in the thick of the fight, and despite his extravagant imagination, which to present-day readers, retains vestiges of Victorian fringe, he stands as a beacon of the 19th century carrying a torch that brought light to all corners, great or small.

Chopin, on the other hand, was a musician for pianists, and the considerable number of works for his instruments are among the greatest in all piano literature. In one sense, he was creative; in another, interpretive of the time in which he lived. His music is for nimble fingers and a romantic soul. In its form it appeals little enough to the intellect, and some of it more than hints of the salon; at its best, as in the scherzi and ballades, it takes on a heroic quality, and in the preludes it becomes fleet and exquisite. While it may be unfair to refer to Chopin as exquisite, he seems to have been most successful in the smaller forms, and when he essayed so extended a work as the sonata or concerto, he still re[illegible]ed episodic and loose in his conception. This is not to say that a work, such as the B-minor sonata, is prolix, but only to indicate that in it is found the best qualities of his shorter works. It contains the lovely melodies of the preludes and the bardic qualities of the ballades.

The "Carnaval" suite is written in Schumann's most congenial idiom—brief pieces in triple rhythms, all of them miniature waltzes ingeniously arranged as to contrast and mood. Only a great artist is able to use a limited medium and create from it a treasure-chest of gems, each one of which shines brilliantly.

In comparing these two masterpieces, it is at once evident that both composers, each in his own way, was expressing the best aspirations of a new era. Each was a miniaturist, painting on ivory, although at times the solors ran over the edges from lack of space.

Miss Hess's performance of the Schumann concerto is well remembered in a recent Victor release. She can present Schumann effectively, and the quickly shifting moods of the "Carnaval" are well projected. The Brailowsky playing of the Chopin is recommended.

Concerto by Spohr

A curious and not often played work by an almost forgotten composer is the concerto for violin No 8 in A-minor, Op 4, by Ludwig Spohr, played by Albert Spalding and the Philadelphia orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy. In speaking of minor composers it is no condescension to say that some of them can be done without. They had their own importance, and to a large extent, enjoyed more popularity than those who today are considered to be among the great. Spohr (1784-1859) was a successful violinist and composer. He was enthusiastically received throughout Europe, and his life, although uneventful, was that of an able musician. He played to the gallery and knew how to both write and play in a manner to attract the public.

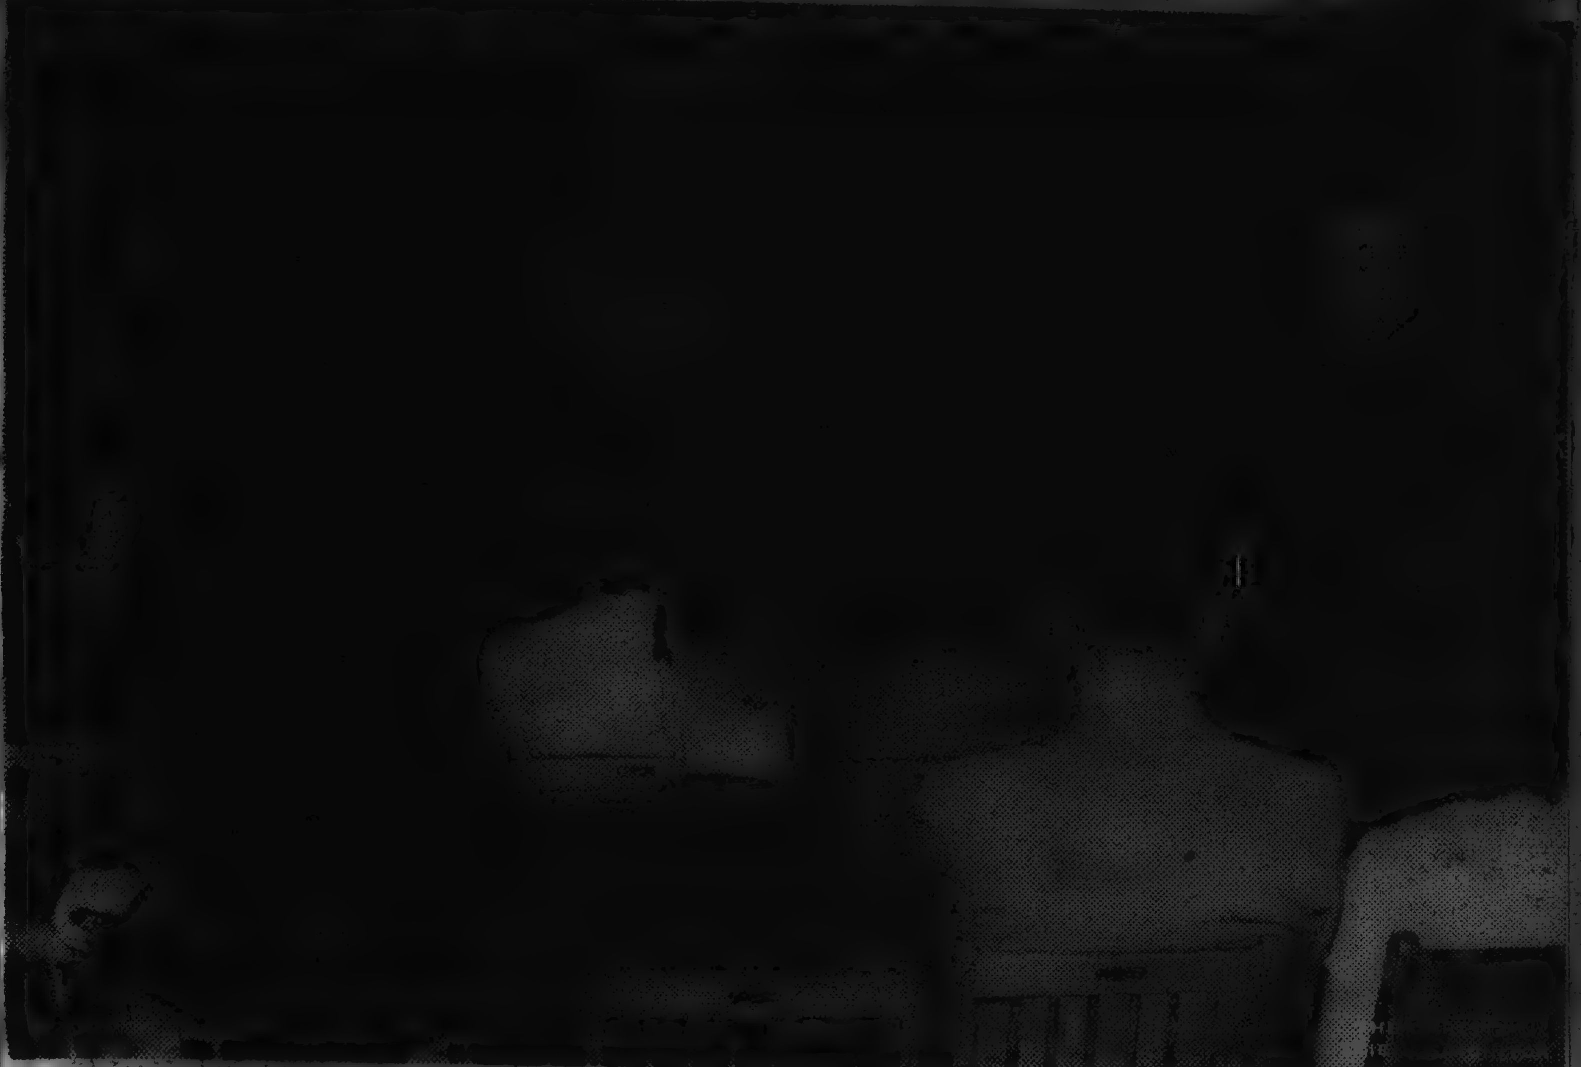
His concerto No 8 is melodious, pleasant and violinistic. It has some of the characteristics of Mozart in its fluidity and is like Bruch in its sensational double-stoppings, octaves and arpeggios. Like music that is not great, however, it has no cumulative effect and when it is finished, both player and composer seem to have arrived at no particular destination. It is nevertheless a document to give the listener a basis for comparison with other works of that time. Spalding gives a well-studied reading and the accompaniment by the orchestra is carefully synchronized with the soloist. The recording is excellent.

"El Salon Mexico"

Aaron Copland, American composer, has been in Mexico and from there brought back the inspiration for a short work entitled "El Salon Mexico," the name of a cafe he visited while in Mexico City. This is played in a Victor album by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky with accent of bra[illegible] of modern tone poem, "El Salon Mexico" may be successful. Its strident colors undoubtedly portray the noisy vulgarity of a cafe. As a picture of contemporary life in America, which the explanatory pamphlet indicates, it may also be successful. Perhaps it is true that the arts reflect present-day life, but if it is as noisy and vulgar as this piece shows, it is worth while to reserve a bit of time for Haydn, whose life moved at a slower tempo. At best, "El Salon Mexico" appe[illegible] to be the highly colored lith[illegible]aph of a very hectic time.

APRIL 13, 1939 – C. S. Monitor

Showing Class How an Artist Does I



Phonograph Brings Pianist's Notes

Dr. John P. Marshall, Dean of the Boston University College of Music, discussing themes used by Alec Templeton, blind English concert pianist, in improvisations at a Carnegie Hall concert, which were heard in the form of phonograph transcriptions today at 25 Blagden Street, by students of the College and visitors.

Pianist Makes Boston Debut 'In Absentia'

Alec Templeton, blind English pianist and musical humorist, made his bow to a Boston audience today and was greeted tumultuously. This enthusiastic reception was quite impersonal and unbiased, because it was based entirely upon Mr. Templeton's technique. He himself was not present.

The "in absentia" recital and Boston debut took place between noon and 1 p. m. at a special assembly of students of the Boston University College of Music at 25 Blagden Street. Dr. John P. Marshall, Dean of the College, flanked by a phonograph, piano, and blackboard, explained that Mr. Templeton would be represented by his work as preserved in phonograph records, which were transcripts of a concert the pianist gave last February in Carnegie Hall, New York. They illustrated, he said, improvisation and the expression of humor and satire in music.

Bach Incident

This form of composition is quite legitimate, Dr. Marshall indicated, recalling that John Sebastian Bach was "fired" one time because he improvised too long at a service.

Dr. Marshall put on a record, "Bach Goes to Town," an orchestration from one piano piece in Mr. Templeton's "Topsy Turvy Suite." This turned out to be a lively Grade A piece of swing as well as, according to the Dean, catching the spirit of the Bach idiom.

Dr. Marshall then delegated to Laning Humphrey of Cambridge and Symphony Hall, purveyor of news of the musically great, the task of explaining the "concert."

The ensuing interlude illustrated Mr. Templeton's ability in inventivness, as well as being an expression of humor in music.

From the phonograph came the artist's invitation to give him five musical notes on which to build a theme. Voices could be heard calling back from the audience. Then the pianist started from scratch with A, F sharp, B flat, G sharp and D.

Rippling Composition

Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston pianist, took a hand at this point by regulating the speed of the instrument to correct the pitch. His technical assistance resulted in a liquid rippling composition which at the end drew a mechanical spattering of applause.

Using the same five notes, Mr. Templeton then gave his audience a number in the style of Bach and then one in the manner of Mozart.

One could hear snickers from the audience as the five notes served for a "Strauss" waltz, and laughter increased when Sullivan's "Lost Chord" was done in the Gilbert and Sullivan manner.

Climax to the recital came in what the artist designed as "the shortest opera ever written." This was a mock Wagnerian score opening with a prelude typical of Wagnerian composition. From this point on the pianist sang all parts, male and female, continuing his own accompaniment. There was continued applause for his soprano role, in which that singer evidently was trying to escape being drowned out by the soaring notes of a tenor presumably lifting himself by his boot straps.

Later in the recital, a number of the themes improvised by Mr. Templeton were played on the piano from notations placed on the blackboard by Prof. Raymond C. Robinson of the College.

Templeton improvisations in one sense struck listeners as reversing the method of Sigmund Spaeth, "the tune detective." Mr. Spaeth takes a new theme and traces its antecedents, while Mr. Templeton takes an original and readapts it to his satiric purpose.

In addition to the students and Mr. Sanroma a number of faculty members and Richard Hale of the Metropolitan Opera were present.

The phonographic performance was a "curtain raiser" to the concert to be given by Mr. Templeton in person in Symphony Hall, Friday, April 21.

E. B. T.

PORTLAND, MAINE
PRESS HERALD
APR 7 - 1939

Cycle Of Five Beethoven Sonatas Is First Of Four Concerts At Bowdoin Institute Of Music

Special Despatch to The Press Herald

Brunswick, April 6—Different from anything that has been offered here in the past, will be the first four concerts in connection with Bowdoin's Institute of Music, April 10-22. This is the presentation by Yves Chardon, cellist, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Prof. Frederic Tillotson of Bowdin College, of a cycle of five Beethoven sonatas, on April 12. Because of the length of the program it will be given in two sections.

This type of concert is known as the festival plan. At 4.30 in the afternoon, they will play two of the sonatas for violincello and piano, and, after an intermission for dinner, will present the other three beginning at 8.15. Chardon and Tillotson have given similar concert programs of works by both Beethoven and Bach, at Harvard University, but nothing like it has ever been done locally.

Since both artists are well known to those who have followed the Bowdoin concert series in recent years, there is little need for long descriptions here.

Mr. Chardon is a native of France, and began the study of cello at the age of six. Entering the Paris Conservatory of Music he won the first prize when only 15 years old. There followed a brilliant career as soloist throughout France and Italy, after which he was named professor at the Athens Conservatory. Here he met and played under the famous conductor, Mitropoulos.

Mr. Chardon is himself an able conductor and has made many appearances in that capacity, including a notable one in the production of Honegger's King David at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, Mass. His quartet was played last year by the Chardon Quartet which he founded. He is now cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, head of the chamber music department and graduate school of the Longy School of Music, and is teacher of violincello at Wellesley College.

Prof. Tillotson, who joined the Bowdoin College faculty two years ago, is also a noted concert pianist. A native of St. Louis, Mo., he too

---

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 8 - 1939

THE spectacle of elderly subscribers to the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall concerts cheering a performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" was entertaining to those of us who recall when this work was considered by conservatives as something to regard dubiously, or even with a sturdy "pfui." The reasons for the recent favorable uproar over the piece seemed to be, first, the vigor and clarity of Serge Koussevitzky's presentation (a few slipups weren't material); and, secondly, the fact that audiences no longer are frightened by things which used to be called "cacophonous." "The Rite of Spring" is on its way to becoming an old familiar.

They'll be whistling tunes from it in a few years—maybe.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD - EXAMINER
APR 9 - 1939

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Modern Works

VICTOR RECORD releases for last month include the latest work of Aaron Copland, one of America's most prominent contributors to so-called "modern" music. (M-546.)

This symphonic composition, entitled "El Salon Mexico," is recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It describes, in vivid musical terms, the life and color of Mexico and its capital city. Copland uses various lively folk and dance tunes fo rthematic material and translates them for American ears in a style unmistakably his own. The harmonic and rhythmic structure of the work is a far cry from Mozartian standards, but the "popular" spirit of the piece is infectious and highly entertaining.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 15 1939

TWENTIETH-CENTURY: Charles Martin Loeffler's eloquent "Music for Four String Instruments," beautifully played by the Coolidge Quartet (Victor album M-543).... "El Salón México," Aaron Copland's inventive and stimulating treatment of Mexican airs, conducted with a successful blending of dash and Schmalz by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony responding with great virtuosity (Victor album M-546). —R. A. S.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION ✓
APR 9 - 1939

Chopin and Schumann In Two Victor Albums

B-Minor Sonata and Carnaval' Played in Recent Recordings—The Classical Period and Its Growth Toward Romanticism — Composers Show Kinship—Spohr's Eighth Concerto—Aaron Copland

By BENJAMIN BUXTON

CHOPIN and Schumann are two of the most familiar and understandable figures of 19th century music, and in two recent Victor albums their works, placed side by side, show not only a kinship in their methods but the earmarks of the period itself. Schumann's "Carnaval" suite for piano, played by Myra Hess, and Chopin's Sonata No 3 in B-minor, played by Alexander Brailowsky, are totally dissimilar in form, yet quite similar in feeling.

The classical period is not thought of as an experimental time, yet the sonata form, which found its most perfect expression in the works of Haydn, Beethoven and Mozart, was constantly changing. The set custom of writing three or four movements to a piece called "sonata" or "symphony" was not as set as might be thought. The symphonies of any of these three composers cannot be regarded as having been written in a permanent mold, for the casual observer can note differences in method, both from the technical and emotional standpoints.

The classical period was as changing as experimental as the romantic and modern periods, and therefore do not need to be classified as a permanent ideal of perfection, but an era in the history of music when a certain form was adhered to more or less strictly.

In his last quartets, Beethoven went far afield from "classicism" and was still living when the romanticists were beginning to write program music, letting their fancies carry them on clouds far away from the solid realities of the sonata's clipped outline. Romanticism led from classicism naturally and logically, continuing a tradition that might have become outworn and stale had it not taken a new turn. This turn need not necessarily have been for the better in all points, but it nevertheless instilled a new vitality, a feverish one, into an art that would die quickly without the stretching forth toward new horizons.

A Restless Age

Chopin and Schumann are two of the natural products of a restless age of creative activity. They, too, were experimental, and being experimental, their works have to be judged by those standards. Of the two, Schumann undoubtedly has greater significance, not only because of the wider range of his compositions, but because of his sincere, although not always discriminating sponsorship of the musicians of his day. His editorial work, in which he championed both the great and the mediocre, was an important phase of his life. He was in the thick of the fight, and despite his extravagant imagination, which to present-day readers, retains vestiges of Victorian fringe, he stands as a beacon of the 19th century carrying a torch that brought light to all corners, great or small.

Chopin, on the other hand, was a musician for pianists, and the considerable number of works for his instruments are among the greatest in all piano literature. In one sense, he was creative; in another, interpretive of the time in which he lived. His music is for nimble fingers and a romantic soul. In its form it appeals little enough to the intellect, and some of it more than hints of the salon; at its best, as in the scherzi and ballades, it takes on a heroic quality, and in the preludes it becomes fleet and exquisite. While it may be unfair to refer to Chopin as exquisite, he seems to have been most successful in the smaller forms, and when he [illegible] so extended a work [illegible] the [illegible] concerto, he still re[illegible] and loose in his conception. This is not to say that a work, such as the B-minor sonata, is prolix, but only to indicate that in it is found the best qualities of his shorter works. It contains the lovely melodies of the preludes and the bardic qualities of the ballades.

The "Carnaval" suite is written in Schumann's most congenial idiom—brief pieces in triple rhythms, all of them miniature waltzes ingeniously arranged as to contrast and mood. Only a great artist is able to use a limited medium and create from it a treasure-chest of gems, each one of which shines brilliantly.

In comparing these two masterpieces, it is at once evident that both composers, each in his own way, was expressing the best aspirations of a new era. Each was a miniaturist, painting on ivory, although at times the solors ran over the edges from lack of space.

Miss Hess's performance of the Schumann concerto is well remembered in a recent Victor release. She can present Schumann effectively, and the quickly shifting moods of the "Carnaval" are well projected. The Brailowsky playing of the Chopin is recommended.

Concerto by Spohr

A curious and not often played work by an almost forgotten composer is the concerto for violin No 8 in A-minor, Op 4, by Ludwig Spohr, played by Albert Spalding and the Philadelphia orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy. In speaking of minor composers it is no condescension to say that some of them can be done without. They had their own importance, and to a large extent, enjoyed more popularity than those who today are considered to be among the great. Spohr (1784-1859) was a successful violinist and composer. He was enthusiastically received throughout Europe, and his life, although uneventful, was that of an able musician. He played to the gallery and knew how to both write and play in a manner to attract the public.

His concerto No 8 is melodious, pleasant and violinistic. It has some of the characteristics of Mozart in its fluidity and is like Bruch in its sensational double-stoppings, octaves and arpeggios. Like music that is not great, however, it has no cumulative effect and when it is finished, both player and composer seem to have arrived at no particular destination. It is nevertheless a document to give the listener a basis for comparison with other works of that time. Spalding gives a well-studied reading and the accompaniment by the orchestra is carefully synchronized with the soloist. The recording is excellent.

"El Salon Mexico"

Aaron Copland, American composer, has been in Mexico and from there brought back the inspiration for a short work entitled "El Salon Mexico," the name of a cafe he visited while in Mexico City. This is played in a Victor album by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky with accent of bra[illegible] of modern tone poem, "El Salon Mexico" may be successful. Its strident colors undoubtedly portray the noisy vulgarity of a cafe. As a picture of contemporary life in America, which the explanatory pamphlet indicates, it may also be successful. Perhaps it is true that the arts reflect present-day life, but if it is as noisy and vulgar as this piece shows, it is worth while to reserve a bit of time for Haydn, whose life moved at a slower tempo. At best, "El Salon Mexico" [illegible] to be the highly colored litho[illegible] of a very hectic time.

224

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 16 1939

ORCHESTRAL NEWS

THE number of orchestras being formed in the smaller communities of this country is increasing rapidly. One of the recently formed among them is the Huntington Little Symphony of Huntington, W. Va., which will give the last of the five concerts of its initial season early in May.

The orchestra was built around the nucleus of the Huntington Symphonette, a Federal Music Project unit, formed several years ago. The popularity of this ensemble and the keen interest shown by the Huntington public in concerts given in the city last year by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., led to the organization of the new group.

Early last Fall a group of business men and others interested in the formation of an orchestra met to find ways and means for a series of concerts. It was on the premise that the orchestra would have to be created around the Project's Symphonette that the plans reached completion. Under such an arrangement no admission could be charged for any of the concerts, so that a fund large enough to cover incidental expenses had to be raised.

A drive directed by Omar T. Frick, manager of one of the city's larger plants, was successful in establishing such a fund, which ensured at least five concerts. Rehearsals started immediately and the first program was presented in November. More than 1,000 persons attended the opening concert. The audiences have been well over 800 at the others since. The concerts are given in an auditorium seating more than 1,800, the use of which has been the city government's contribution to the undertaking.

The Huntington Little Symphony is conducted by W. R. Wiant, who gained prominence in the city through his work with musicians in the Federal Music Project. For his programs with the Little Symphony, Mr. Wiant has chosen music of the "Pop" concert type chiefly. But on each list a more serious work, such as Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony or the "New World" symphony by Dvorak has been featured.

The final concert of the season's series will be given as a part of the city's music festival, which is patterned after Cincinnati's May Music Festival. It is also the intention of the orchestra, if funds are forthcoming, to give concerts throughout the Summer in an open-air amphitheatre in the city's largest park. No difficulty is anticipated in obtaining the necessary financial support for next year's orchestral series.

The Dallas Symphony Orchestra, which has completed its first regular season under the conductorship of Jacques Singer, is planning radical changes for next season. The concerts will be moved from McFarlin Auditorium, which holds 2,600, to the well-known Fair Park Auditorium, which holds 4,350. Now this is a venturesome step, and adjustments in price were made to insure good houses. As large houses and small prices are in the direction of wider dissemination of music, civic-minded citizens in Dallas are hoping that the new system will be favorably received.

They have set what they believe are the cheapest admission rates for a symphonic organization comparable to the Dallas Symphony. For six Friday night concerts, subscription prices range from $8 for the lower floor to $4 for the second balcony. For six Sunday afternoon concerts, the rates are $6 and $2, respectively.

The bargain is made still bigger by the engagement of Josef Hofman and Jascha Heifetz as soloists, among others, and the planned presentation of either Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" or the Beethoven Ninth.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Eugene Ormandy, at the final concert of its twenty-first New York season, April 26, in Carnegie Hall, will feature the Coolidge String Quartet in Nicolai Berezowsky's "Toccata, Variations and Finale," Op. 23, for string quartet and orchestra. This work, dedicated to Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge for whom the ensemble is named, was first performed last October in Boston at a Boston Symphony concert, under Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Berezowsky is the second violinist of the Coolidge Quartet, the other members of which are William Kroll, first violinist; Nicholas Moldovan, 'cello, and Victor Gottlieb, 'cello. Besides Mr. Berezowsky's contribution the program will contain Haydn's symphony in C major, No. 7; Sibelius's "Tapiola" and Jacques Ibert's "Escales."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

16 1939

Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" will be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society, under Dr. Thompson Stone, this afternoon in Boston, Mass. Seventy-four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist. The soloists include Gertrude Ehrhart, Paul Althouse, Mark Love and Gean Greenwell.

NEW YORK CITY ✓
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 12 1939

Exhibit Shows Paintings By Alexandre Iacovleff

Memorial Exhibition Opens at Grand Central Galleries

A memorial exhibition of the work of the Russian-born French artist Alexandre Iacovleff, who died in Paris last year, was opened with a reception yesterday afternoon at the Grand Central Galleries, 15 Vanderbilt Avenue. Included in the display are paintings and drawings of Asiatic peoples and landscapes, portraits of the Russian ballet and decorative panels including still life subjects.

Iacovleff, who was well known in the United States, being director from 1934 to 1936 of the Boston Museum School of Fine Arts, was official artist for the Citroen-Haardt Trans-Asiatic Expedition. Famous for his paintings of the Orient, his subjects included portrayals of African and Far Eastern types, many of which are included in the exhibition here. There are also among other portraits drawings of Serge Koussevitzky, Anna Pavlova, Leonide Massine, Tamara Toumanova and other featured performers of the Russian ballet.

More than 200 paintings and drawings altogether have been hung in the display, which occupies four large rooms at the Grand Central Galleries. Six of the paintings and four drawings, including a study of nudes, a still life, a woman with fruit and studies of two heads, are loans to the exhibition from the French government, which is sponsoring a Iacovleff memorial show next winter at the Luxembourg Museum. Prominent among the paintings exhibited is a large canvas of Afghan tribesmen wearing the native robes and turbans, and another of a camel train on the Gobi Desert.

The exhibition, sponsored by the French and the Chinese Ambassadors, Count de Saint-Quentin and Dr. Hu Shih, will open to the public today, continuing to April 29. It has been arranged by an American committee of friends of the artist, headed by Miss Anne Morgan, Miss Malvina Hoffman, Miss Henrietta Ely, Erwin S. Barrie, John J. Cunningham and William James. Many of the paintings and drawings were sent here from Boston, where a similar but smaller display was held last January at the Robert Vose Gallery. The show, for which there is a special illustrated catalogue with a foreword by Miss Hoffman, is free to the public.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

APR 12 1939

Anna Kaskas, the glamorous young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera association, and favorite singer of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who brings the first season of the Weymouth-Braintree Cooperative Concert association to a close Monday evening, April 24, at the Weymouth High school, in song recital, is known as the "golden girl" of the Metropolitan.

Blonde, blue-eyed, distractingly lovely to look at, slender and invariably beautifully gowned, Anna Kaskas has in the short span of three years assumed her place as America's own prima donna contralto. Not only are most of the best contralto roles at the opera house in her repertoire, but she has to her credit three coast-to-coast concert tours, and innumerable appearances with the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic-Symphony, Cincinnati Symphony, Toronto Symphony, and the other major orchestras of the country.

A favorite singer of the great Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor says of her: "She has a marvelous voice and great human intelligence. She sings with warmth and with authority. Miss Kaskas knows how to produce tones with her throat but has music in her head, too." T. H. Parker, critic of the "Hartford Courant," after a concert appearance there in January, wrote "Her tones are full of flame and smoke, of superb vibrancy and color, and with an almost mysterious haunting power."

Four years ago, Miss Kaskas went to Enrico Rosati, teacher of Gigli, Lauri-Volpi, and other famous opera stars, for concentrated study. Her range now is from F sharp low to A sharp top—a range of two and a third octaves.

Miss Kaskas was born in Bridgeport, Conn., in 1910, and shortly afterwards her family moved to Hartford, where, at the age of 15, she started the study of music in the conservatory there. Her ability caught the interest of a prominent music-lover who financed a trip to Lithuania—the birth-place of her parents. There she remained in Kovno for a year, after which the Lithuanian government sent her to Milan for two years' study. Then the young contralto returned to the United States, and her professional career began.

Said Glen Dillard Gunn in the "Chicago Herald and Examiner": "Her's is a phenomenal voice. Its lower octave has an almost baritone richness and sonority. Its upper octave is startlingly brilliant. She is also an outstanding exception to the rule that all contraltos must be at least five and a half or six feet tall and brunettes to boot. For she is petite, slender, and a lovely blonde, who possesses a magnificent voice of rich contralto timbre. She sings with purity of diction and a smoothness of legato line that enriches and distinguishes her vocal artistry."

Following Miss Kaskas' recital, the membership campaign for the second season of cooperative concerts begins, ending on Saturday night, April 29, and its success is practically already a foregone conclusion.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

APR 10 1939

THERE'S a story going the rounds about Serge Koussevitsky . . . batoneer of the Boston Symphony. . . . who has stepped more and more into the limelight. . . . and doesn't seem averse to basking in its rays. . . . Lately, it seems. . . . he's turning to Finland, the country of Sibelius . . . having included many of the great composer's works on his programs. . . . Recently, he met four visiting Finnish newspapermen. . . . "Come and see the discipline of our orchestra," he boasted . . . to that end, inviting them to attend a rehearsal. . . . It seems that one of the numbers was a fiery Mexican thing. . . . full of sound, fury and rhythm. . . . which dropped off suddenly to a very soft piano passage. . . . The oboe player, during the forte (or loud) passages, was gustily tapping out the time with his foot, "One, two, three, four" . . . Unfortunately, the music stopped suddenly. . . . the soft passage began . . . and he was caught short. . . . Koussevitsky crimsoned . . . grabbed the score . . . and flung it at the hapless oboe player. . . . Then he burst into tears! . . . The newspapermen tiptoed softly out. . . .

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 13 1939

Countess Tolstoy Warns Democracies on Russia

Advises Them Not to Rely on Soviet Help in War

Democracies should not count on Soviet Russia to help them in war, Countess Alexandra Tolstoy, daughter of Leo Tolstoy, Russia writer, said last night in a lecture dedicated to the memory of her father. She spoke at the Finch Junior College, 52 East Seventy-eighth Street, for the benefit of the newly formed Tolstoy Foundation for Russian Welfare and Culture.

Recalling her father's assertion that "nothing good comes out of evil," she expressed doubt that a war against the dictatorships could save democracy and Europe. She recalled that Russia was a country of atheism, where the majority of children had never heard of Christ. "Only twenty churches remain in Moscow out of the 400 that existed before," she said. "There were 25,000,000 peasant families in Russia before the collectivization of peasants. There are only 21,000,000 now. Where have the 4,000,000 gone? According to Soviet statistics there are 7,000,000 people in concentration camps and how many have been executed or have perished from starvation or disease?"

Countess Tolstoy showed a film taken of her father in 1909 and related some incidents of his life. The foundation for which she spoke was formed to help Russian refugees in various countries. Other sponsors of it are Serge Rachmaninoff, composer; Dr. Ethan T. Colton, former worker with American Relief Administration in Russia; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Boris A. Bakhmeteff, former Russian Ambassador, and Professor Michael Rostovzeff, of Yale University.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 9 - 1939

CLOSING MONDAY-TUESDAY CONCERTS

The sixth and last pair of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given April 17 and 18, in Symphony hall. The soloist for this programme will be Frank Glazer, the pianist who will be heard in the Second Concerto of Brahms in B flat major. The programme will open with the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina." The closing number will be the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

REPORTER

Foxboro mass

4/1/39

Youth Symphony Concert

Last Wednesday afternoon a group of forty-seven school children and parents drove in to Symphony Hall, Boston, for the second of a series of three Youth Concerts. Seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with [illegible] Beckett conducting, rendered a program of unusual depth and brilliance that captivated a capacity audience, including Conductor Serge Koussevitsky, who was sitting in the first balcony.

Acknowledgements of support which made attendance and interest in these concerts a success, included the name of Mr Frederic W. Kempf, Supervisor of Music in the Foxboro schools. Mr Kempf was assisted locally by a committee consisting of Mrs Catharine C. Richardson, Mrs Elva L. Martin, and Mrs Louise P. Inman. Mrs Helen B. Fuller deserves thanks for opening her home to this group last Sunday afternoon, when a "prevue" of this entire program was given by Mr Kempf.

The final concert of this series will be held on Wednesday afternoon, April 12, and the same group will attend. If further tickets can be secured, still more music lovers will be able to attend.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 2 - 1939

Noted New Haven Musician Invited by Koussevitsky to Conduct His Fourth Symphony On April 15, 16 — No Public Concerts This Week In Deference to Easter

By H. EARLE JOHNSON

WITH CONSIDERABLE pride, New Haven residents will learn that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has invited Dean David Stanley Smith to conduct his Fourth Symphony at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 15 and 16. This is not the first time Dean Smith has appeared in Symphony Hall at the head of the great orchestra, for he conducted an overture there about five years ago and, if memory does not fail, was represented on its programs by his "Fetes Galante" early in the nineteen-twenties.

The Fourth Symphony by Dean Smith is listed in several of the newer encyclopedias of music, but no further news of it has been forthcoming until now. It was written during the summer of 1937—August, to be exact—in the lovely setting of Yelping Hill, Conn. Full-sized, that is, in four movements of traditional design, this work is reported to be straightforward and readily understandable, although embodying certain complexities in the working out which are inevitable in 20th century music. About 35 minutes are required for performance.

Further compliment is implied by the discernment which Dr. Koussevitsky has shown this season in bringing forth contemporary works from the several schools of musical thought. Lest any suppose contemporary music is sulking in a corner unnoted, survey if you will, the activities of the Boston department of orchestral performance during the past few weeks. Roy Harris conducted his Third Symphony for the first time in that city and in New York, and Dr. Koussevitsky led his men through a remarkable performance of Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite; John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto had an initial hearing and a symphony by the young William Schumann gained respect for a talented young American.

Earlied in the season a new work by Hindemith and one by Harvard's own Walter Piston was heard; recently Ernest Bloch conducted four concerts entirely devoted to his own music. Add to these the Prokofieff tale played in the several cities of a tour, and several others not noted in this brief survey. Here are sufficient evidences of the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in encouraging the contemporary artist.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

APR 12 1939

At the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week Richard Burgin, the concert master, will conduct. He will be assisted by David Stanley Smith, who will conduct his own composition, his Symphony No. 4. Also on the program will be the overture to "The Bartered Bride" by Smetana; the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal;" the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdammerung."

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the last concerts in the supplementary series next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon. Frank Glazer will be assisting pianist The program includes the Prelude to "Khovantschina" by Moussorgsky; Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and the Brahms B-flat Piano Concerto.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

APR 13 1939

Harpsichord And Flute Concert At Bowdoin Tonight

BRUNSWICK, April 13 (Special)—A concert of flute and harpsichord music from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries will be played tonight at the Bowdoin College Institute of Music. The artists are Georges Laurent, flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Put[illegible]ich, outstanding American harpsichord pupil of Wanda Landowska.

224

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 16 1939

ORCHESTRAL NEWS

THE number of orchestras being formed in the smaller communities of this country is increasing rapidly. One of the recently formed among them is the Huntington Little Symphony of Huntington, W. Va., which will give the last of the five concerts of its initial season early in May.

The orchestra was built around the nucleus of the Huntington Symphonette, a Federal Music Project unit, formed several years ago. The popularity of this ensemble and the keen interest shown by the Huntington public in concerts given in the city last year by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., led to the organization of the new group.

Early last Fall a group of business men and others interested in the formation of an orchestra met to find ways and means for a series of concerts. It was on the premise that the orchestra would have to be created around the Project's Symphonette that the plans reached completion. Under such an arrangement no admission could be charged for any of the concerts, so that a fund large enough to cover incidental expenses had to be raised.

A drive directed by Omar T. Frick, manager of one of the city's larger plants, was successful in establishing such a fund, which ensured at least five concerts. Rehearsals started immediately and the first program was presented in November. More than 1,000 persons attended the opening concert. The audiences have been well over 800 at the others since. The concerts are given in an auditorium seating more than 1,800, the use of which has been the city government's contribution to the undertaking.

The Huntington Little Symphony is conducted by W. R. Wiant, who gained prominence in the city through his work with musicians in the Federal Music Project. For his programs with the Little Symphony, Mr. Wiant has chosen music of the "Pop" concert type chiefly. But on each list a more serious work, such as Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony or the "New World" symphony by Dvorak has been featured.

The final concert of the season's series will be given as a part of the city's music festival, which is patterned after Cincinnati's May Music Festival. It is also the intention of the orchestra, if funds are forthcoming, to give concerts throughout the Summer in an open-air amphitheatre in the city's largest park. No difficulty is anticipated in obtaining the necessary financial support for next year's orchestral series.

The Dallas Symphony Orchestra, which has completed its first regular season under the conductorship of Jacques Singer, is planning radical changes for next season. The concerts will be moved from McFarlin Auditorium, which holds 2,600, to the well-known Fair Park Auditorium, which holds 4,350. Now this is a venturesome step, and adjustments in price were made to insure good houses. As large houses and small prices are in the direction of wider dissemination of music, civic-minded citizens in Dallas are hoping that the new system will be favorably received.

They have set what they believe are the cheapest admission rates for a symphonic organization comparable to the Dallas Symphony. For six Friday night concerts, subscription prices range from $8 for the lower floor to $4 for the second balcony. For six Sunday afternoon concerts, the rates are $6 and $2, respectively.

The bargain is made still bigger by the engagement of Josef Hofman and Jascha Heifetz as soloists, among others, and the planned presentation of either Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" or the Beethoven Ninth.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Eugene Ormandy, at the final concert of its twenty-first New York season, April 26, in Carnegie Hall, will feature the Coolidge String Quartet in Nicolai Berezowsky's "Toccata, Variations and Finale," Op. 23, for string quartet and orchestra. This work, dedicated to Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge for whom the ensemble is named, was first performed last October in Boston at a Boston Symphony concert, under Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Berezowsky is the second violinist of the Coolidge Quartet, the other members of which are William Kroll, first violinist; Nicholas Moldovan, 'cello, and Victor Gottlieb, 'cello. Besides Mr. Berezowsky's contribution the program will contain Haydn's symphony in C major, No. 7; Sibelius's "Tapiola" and Jacques Ibert's "Escales."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 16 1939

Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" will be presented by the Handel and Haydn Society, under Dr. Thompson Stone, this afternoon in Boston, Mass. Seventy-four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist. The soloists include Gertrude Ehrhart, Paul Althouse, Mark Love and Sean Greenwell.

NEW YORK CITY ✓
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 12 1939

Exhibit Shows Paintings By Alexandre Iacovleff

Memorial Exhibition Opens at Grand Central Galleries

A memorial exhibition of the work of the Russian-born French artist Alexandre Iacovleff, who died in Paris last year, was opened with a reception yesterday afternoon at the Grand Central Galleries, 15 Vanderbilt Avenue. Included in the display are paintings and drawings of Asiatic peoples and landscapes, portraits of the Russian ballet and decorative panels including still life subjects.

Iacovleff, who was well known in the United States, being director from 1934 to 1936 of the Boston Museum School of Fine Arts, was official artist for the Citroen-Haardt Trans-Asiatic Expedition. Famous for his paintings of the Orient, his subjects included portrayals of African and Far Eastern types, many of which are included in the exhibition here. There are also among other portraits drawings of [illegible]zky, Anna Pavlova, [illegible], Tamara Toumanova and other featured performers of the Russian ballet.

More than 200 paintings and drawings altogether have been hung in the display, which occupies four large rooms at the Grand Central Galleries. Six of the paintings and four drawings, including a study of nudes, a still life, a woman with fruit and studies of two heads, are loans to the exhibition from the French government, which is sponsoring a Iacovleff memorial show next winter at the Luxembourg Museum. Prominent among the paintings exhibited is a large canvas of Afghan tribesmen wearing the native robes and turbans, and another of a camel train on the Gobi Desert.

The exhibition, sponsored by the French and the Chinese Ambassadors, Count de Saint-Quentin and Dr. Hu Shih, will open to the public today, continuing to April 29. It has been arranged by an American committee of friends of the artist, headed by Miss Anne Morgan, Miss Malvina Hoffman, Miss Henrietta Ely, Erwin S. Barrie, John J. Cunningham and William James. Many of the paintings and drawings were sent here from Boston, where a similar but smaller display was held last January at the Robert Vose Gallery. The show, for which there is a special illustrated catalogue with a foreword by Miss Hoffman, is free to the public.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
APR 12 1939

Anna Kaskas, the glamorous young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera association, and favorite singer of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who brings the first season of the Weymouth-Braintree Cooperative Concert association to a close Monday evening, April 24, at the Weymouth High school, in song recital, is known as the "golden girl" of the Metropolitan.

Blonde, blue-eyed, distractingly lovely to look at, slender and invariably beautifully gowned, Anna Kaskas has in the short span of three years assumed her place as America's own prima donna contralto. Not only are most of the best contralto roles at the opera house in her repertoire, but she has to her credit three coast-to-coast concert tours, and innumerable appearances with the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic-Symphony, Cincinnati Symphony, Toronto Symphony, and the other major orchestras of the country.

A favorite singer of the great Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor says of her: "She has a marvelous voice and great human intelligence. She sings with warmth and with authority. Miss Kaskas knows how to produce tones with her throat but has music in her head, too." T. H. Parker, critic of the "Hartford Courant," after a concert appearance there in January, wrote "Her tones are full of flame and smoke, of superb vibrancy and color, and with an almost mysterious haunting power."

Four years ago, Miss Kaskas went to Enrico Rosati, teacher of Gigli, Lauri-Volpi, and other famous opera stars, for concentrated study. Her range now is from F sharp low to A sharp top—a range of two and a third octaves.

Miss Kaskas was born in Bridgeport, Conn., in 1910, and shortly afterwards her family moved to Hartford, where, at the age of 15, she started the study of music in the conservatory there. Her ability caught the interest of a prominent music-lover who financed a trip to Lithuania—the birth-place of her parents. There she remained in Kovno for a year, after which the Lithuanian government sent her to Milan for two years' study. Then the young contralto returned to the United States, and her professional career began.

Said Glen Dillard Gunn in the "Chicago Herald and Examiner": "Her's is a phenomenal voice. Its lower octave has an almost baritone richness and sonority. Its upper octave is startlingly brilliant. She is also an outstanding exception to the rule that all contraltos must be at least five and a half or six feet tall and brunettes to boot. For she is petite, slender, and a lovely blonde, who possesses a magnificent voice of rich contralto timbre. She sings with purity of diction and a smoothness of legato line that enriches and distinguishes her vocal artistry."

Following Miss Kaskas' recital, the membership campaign for the second season of cooperative concerts begins, ending on Saturday night, April 29, and its success is practically already a foregone conclusion.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
APR 10 1939

THERE'S a story going the rounds about Serge Koussevitzky . . . batoneer of the Boston Symphony. . . . who has stepped more and more into the limelight. . . . and doesn't seem averse to basking in its rays. . . . Lately, it seems. . . . he's turning to Finland, the country of Sibelius . . . having included many of the great composer's works on his programs. . . . Recently, he met four visiting Finnish newspapermen. . . . "Come and see the discipline of our orchestra," he boasted . . . to that end, inviting them to attend a rehearsal. . . . It seems that one of the numbers was a fiery Mexican thing. . . . full of sound, fury and rhythm. . . . which dropped off suddenly to a very soft piano passage. . . . The oboe player, during the forte (or loud) passages, was gustily tapping out the time with his foot, "One, two, three, four" . . . Unfortunately, the music stopped suddenly. . . . the soft passage began . . . . and he was caught short. . . . Koussevitsky crimsoned . . . grabbed the score . . . and flung it at the hapless oboe player. . . . Then he burst into tears! . . . The newspapermen tiptoed softly out. . . .

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 13 1939

Countess Tolstoy Warns Democracies on Russia

Advises Them Not to Rely on Soviet Help in War

Democracies should not count on Soviet Russia to help them in war, Countess Alexandra Tolstoy, daughter of Leo Tolstoy, Russia writer, said last night in a lecture dedicated to the memory of her father. She spoke at the Finch Junior College, 52 East Seventy-eighth Street, for the benefit of the newly formed Tolstoy Foundation for Russian Welfare and Culture.

Recalling her father's assertion that "nothing good comes out of evil," she expressed doubt that a war against the dictatorships could save democracy and Europe. She recalled that Russia was a country of atheism, where the majority of children had never heard of Christ. "Only twenty churches remain in Moscow out of the 400 that existed before," she said. "There were 25,000,000 peasant families in Russia before the collectivization of peasants. There are only 21,000,000 now. Where have the 4,000,000 gone? According to Soviet statistics there are 7,000,000 people in concentration camps and how many have been executed or have perished from starvation or disease?"

Countess Tolstoy showed a film taken of her father in 1909 and related some incidents of his life. The foundation for which she spoke was formed to help Russian refugees in various countries. Other sponsors of it are Serge Rachmaninoff, composer; Dr. Ethan T. Colton, former worker with American Relief Administration in Russia; ~~Serge Kousse~~vitsky, conductor; Boris A. Bakhmeteff, former Russian Ambassador, and Professor Michael Rostovzeff, of Yale University.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
APR 9 - 1939

CLOSING MONDAY-TUESDAY CONCERTS

The sixth and last pair of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, ~~Serge Kousse~~vitsky, conductor, will be given April 17 and 18, in Symphony hall. The soloist for this programme will be Frank Glazer, the pianist who will be heard in the Second Concerto of Brahms in B flat major. The programme will open with the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina." The closing number will be the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

REPORTER
Foxboro mass
4/1/39

Youth Symphony Concert

Last Wednesday afternoon a group of forty-seven school children and parents drove in to Symphony Hall, Boston, for the second of a series of three Youth Concerts. Seventy members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with [redacted] Beckett conducting, rendered a program of unusual depth and brilliance that captivated a capacity audience, including Conductor Serge Koussevitsky, who was sitting in the first balcony.

Acknowledgements of support which made attendance and interest in these concerts a success, included the name of Mr Frederic W. Kempf, Supervisor of Music in the Foxboro schools. Mr Kempf was assisted locally by a committee consisting of Mrs Catharine C. Richardson, Mrs Elva L. Martin, and Mrs Louise P. Inman. Mrs Helen B. Fuller deserves thanks for opening her home to this group last Sunday afternoon, when a "prevue" of this entire program was given by Mr Kempf.

The final concert of this series will be held on Wednesday afternoon, April 12, and the same group will attend. If further tickets can be secured, still more music lovers will be able to attend.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 2 - 1939

Noted New Haven Musician Invited by Koussevitsky to Conduct His Fourth Symphony On April 15, 16 — No Public Concerts This Week In Deference to Easter

By H. EARLE JOHNSON

WITH CONSIDERABLE pride, New Haven residents will learn that Dr. Sergé Koussevitsky has invited Dean David Stanley Smith to conduct his Fourth Symphony at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 15 and 16. This is not the first time Dean Smith has appeared in Symphony Hall at the head of the great orchestra, for he conducted an overture there about five years ago and, if memory does not fail, was represented on its programs by his "Fetes Galante" early in the nineteen-twenties. •

The Fourth Symphony by Dean Smith is listed in several of the newer encyclopedias of music, but no further news of it has been forthcoming until now. It was written during the summer of 1937—August, to be exact—in the lovely setting of Yelping Hill, Conn. Full-sized, that is, in four movements of traditional design, this work is reported to be straightforward and readily understandable, although embodying certain complexities in the working out which are inevitable in 20th century music. About 35 minutes are required for performance.

Further compliment is implied by the discernment which Dr. Koussevitsky has shown this season in bringing forth contemporary works from the several schools of musical thought. Lest any suppose contemporary music is sulking in a corner unnoted, survey if you will, the activities of the Boston department of orchestral performance during the past few weeks. Roy Harris conducted his Third Symphony for the first time in that city and in New York, and Dr. Koussevitsky led his men through a remarkable performance of Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite; John Alden Carpenter's violin concerto had an initial hearing and a symphony by the young William Schumann gained respect for a talented young American.

Earlied in the season a new work by Hindemith and one by Harvard's own Walter Piston was heard; recently Ernest Bloch conducted four concerts entirely devoted to his own music. Add to these the Prokofieff tale played in the several cities of a tour, and several others not noted in this brief survey. Here are sufficient evidences of the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in encouraging the contemporary artist.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN
APR 12 1939

At the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week Richard Burgin, the concert master, will conduct. He will be assisted by David Stanley Smith, who will conduct his own composition, his Symphony No. 4. Also on the program will be the overture to "The Bartered Bride" by Smetana; the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdammerung."

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the last concerts in the supplementary series next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon. Frank Glazer will be assisting pianist. The program includes the Prelude to "Khovantschina" by Moussorgsky; Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and the Brahms B-flat Piano Concerto.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
APR 13 1939

Harpsichord And Flute Concert At Bowdoin Tonight

BRUNSWICK, April 13 (Special)—A concert of flute and harpsichord music from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries will be played tonight at the Bowdoin College Institute of Music. The artists are Georges Laurent, flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Put[redacted]ich, outstanding American harpsichord pupil of Wanda Landowska.

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 16 1939

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR'S April releases include three works by modern composers—Loeffler's "Music for Four Stringed Instruments," played by the Coolidge Quartet; Hindemith's Sonata for Viola and Piano, Op. 11, No. 4, performed by William Primrose and Jesus Maria Sanroma, and Copland's "El Salon Mexico," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction.

Hearing Mr. Copland's "El Salon Mexico" in recorded form confirms the impression gained on hearing it in the concert hall that this is a superficial, externally effective potpourri of Mexican tunes. Mr. Copland according to the pamphlet which accompanies this set has said, "Other tourists will pull out their snapshots to show you what a country looks like, but a composer wants you to know what a country sounds like." I have never visited Mexico, but I prefer to believe that if I ever go there I shall "hear" things which will reveal a less crass aspect of Mexican life than Mr. Copland has sought to reflect in "El Salon Mexico." The "Song of the Volga Boatman" in Stravinsky's version occupies the reverse side of the second disk in this set. The recording is a brilliant one.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

APR 15 1939

Last Paired Extra Symphony Concerts

The final concert in the Monday series will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitsky conducting, in Symphony Hall at 8:15 p. m., April 17. Frank Glazer, pianist, will be the soloist in Brahms' Second Concerto in B flat major. Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" will open and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony will close the program.

On Tuesday afternoon, April 18, at 3 o'clock, this program will be repeated for the audience known as the commuters' matinee patronage.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL BULLETIN

APR 17 1939

Off the Records

By MARIE HICKS DAVIDSON

As Debussy and Chabrier helped themselves to the melodic riches of Spain (in Espana and Iberia) so Aaron Copeland took musical themes from the abundant folk music of Mexico and has fabricated a work which Victor phonograph has recorded. It is titled "El Salon Mexico," and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky.

Aaron Copeland has woven into a colorful and enchanting web the songs and dance music of Mexico. Most of them he heard in a place called El Salon Mexico, and that is why he gave his composition that name.

Heightening the popular Mexican melodies without falsifying their natural simplicity was the feat which Copeland set for himself.

The orchestration was finished in 1936 and the first performance given in Mexico a year later. Copeland said that when a critic wrote of the composition that it was "as Mexican as the music of Revueltas" he knew that he had accomplished what he had set out to do. For the expression was like saying "As American as the music of Gershwin."

The brilliant Boston Symphony performance of the work under Dr. Koussevitzky, and the excellent quality of the recording are quite up to Victor standard. El Salon Mexico is not an easy work to perform. It present rhythmic problems of the most intricate kind to both conductor and orchestra. No trace of these difficulties are found in the recording. It is an example of orchestra playing such as is rarely applied to the work of a living composer. Side four of the set contains Igor Stravinsky's orchestral arrangement of "The Song of the Volga Boatman."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 18 1939

Boston Orchestra Friends Listed

The current list of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to be printed in the Symphony's program books for the concerts on Apr. 21 and 22. It is understood that enrollments within the next day or two can yet be included.

The Friends of the Orchestra, of which there have for years been a number in Hartford and vicinity, make contributions in any amount large or small and the fund is relied upon to balance the orchestra's budget, making up the difference between endowments and the heavy cost which the active season of a modern symphony orchestra entails.

Enrollments are received by E. B. Dane, 6 Beacon St., Boston. Edward A. Taft is chairman of the Friends.

Hollywood Reporter
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.

APR 18 1939

This Week's Waxes

EL SALON MEXICO by Aaron Copland is about the most stimulating album to come along this year. It puts this 39-year-old American-born composer into the real threat class, and makes you definitely aware of the vitality of the North American continent. It is very much a modern work . . . with strains of Mexican folk songs to flavor it throughout. Copland named it after a dancehall in Mexico City . . . a place where all classes and kinds of people go to dance and have a good time. There is a sign on the wall, he reports, that reads, "Please don't throw lighted butts on the floor so the ladies don't burn their feet."

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give it the works. . . . It's a three-side job, with Strawinsky's arrangement of the SONG OF THE VOLGA BOATMEN on the fourth face. Even Strawinsky can't rejuvenate it, however. But you'll get all you want out of the first three sides. (Victor album 546. $4.50.)

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 16 1939

LAST MONDAY-TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, April 17 and 18, in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will present the final concerts of the series of six by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme will consist of the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovanstchina," Second Pianoforte Concerto of Brahms in B flat major, with Frank Glazer as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in F minor. Frank Glazer, a native of Wisconsin, has studied in the West, and in Europe where he was a pupil of Artur Schnabel. Since his debut in New York, in 1936, he has given concerts in a number of American cities.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

APR 20 1939

With Frank Glazer, Brahms 2nd Concerto Rejuvenated

The last Tuesday "commuters matinee" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season concluded the Monday-Tuesday series in a spirit of high accomplishment. The exceptional realization, even glorification of the entire program was shared by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose shaping indications we were well located to appreciate, by the soloist, Frank Glazer, whose performance in the Brahms concerto for pianoforte No. 2 in B-flat major, Op. 83 so transcended that of Arthur Rubinstein in the same concerto on April 6 that it became a fresh and radiant thing; and by the orchestra which was in complete accord with the rhythmic brilliance the poetic concepts and the exquisitely moulded phrasing of the pianist.

We confess to complete ignorance before the concert of the fine position Frank Glazer has attained as a pianist at the age of 24. No wonder Mr. Koussevitzky applauded him as he entered, patted him on the back as he went off the stage to return for many recalls. This conductor always gives especially cordial greeting to the youth of the music world. The soloist entered briskly, like a clerk making the office, but within five minutes he had made our grateful hearts for the thrill of his complete grasp of every aspect of the concerto. If splendor of trills was demanded as at the close of the first movement, he maintained them in brilliant cooperation with the orchestra. Accent he observed, a subtly swelling passage growing and blooming on the ear, color, the sonorities of masterly pedalling. The orchestra paid the tribute of perfect companionship in mood to the intuitive genius of Mr. Glazer. Besides their sympathetic mass support, there were woodwind sections and 'cello solos of warm melody and suppleness. One was held entranced for the sheer rightness of the performance of not one, but all of the four movements. No challence to rare expression was neglected.

Another repetition from the April 6-8 concerts was the "Khovanstchina" Act 1 prelude of Moussorgsky. Its folk themes supporting glints of instrumental accent are as the masses picking out through a misty morning. In its gentle character and evanescent landscape picturing there is a freshness and simplicity that commend it to frequent performance.

Tchaikowsky sends out a mighty wail, splendid in its passionate protest, from his Fourth Symphony. Antonina with her following ways may be the abhorrence he so abjures. His predilections may similarly be imagined. Scant impetus for so consummate a work! A superb performance was projected.

A. C. R.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

APR 20 1939

Words Without Music

By LOUIS REID.

NEW YORK.—One of the few successful composers who write two different kinds of music under two different names is the Russian-born Vladimir Dukelsky, better known to the public at large as Vernon Duke.

Under his Russian name he indites ambitious symphonic compositions. His symphony, "Dedicaces," for piano, orchestra and woman's voice obligato, was recently featured by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky.

Under his anglicized name of Vernon Duke, he writes—and has written—numerous popular songs. He says he does so because Vladimir Dukelsky likes caviar. Symphony won't buy caviar. Catchy popular tunes will.

Duke is a native of Pskoff or Pskov, if you prefer. It was the late George Gershwin who proved the turning point in his career, turned his eyes and footsteps to America and opportunity. He was visiting in Constantinople in 1920, happened to hear in a cafe a Gershwin number. It was his introduction to jazz. The experience so moved him that he decided to emigrate to America, find out at first hand what jazz was all about.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 21 1939

Season Is Planned for Boston Symphony Concerts

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport 40-A Monroe Place was hostess to members of the Brooklyn Committee sponsoring concerts by the Boston Symphony Concerts in Brooklyn, at the Spring meeting and tea of the committee yesterday in her home. Mrs. Davenport, as acting chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, which Adrian Van Sinderen heads, reported on next season's concerts of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concerts will be given Nov. 24, Jan. 12, Feb. 15, March 15 and April 5.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. Walter Truslow are co-chairman of the box committee. A new feature being considered by the committee to center interest on the concerts and to add to their general interest was the proposal to hold a series of lectures explaining the musical features which the Boston Symphony will present in their Brooklyn concerts. The lectures, according to the plan now under consideration, would be given in the Academy of Music just prior to the concerts, each lecture tying up with the concert to be given subsequently.

Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, as membership chairman, presented Mrs. Donald Havens and Mrs. Irving J. Sands as new members of the committee. James G. McDonald is president of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The Institute sponsors the concert series jointly with the Brooklyn Committee and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Symphony Society, of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president.

Mrs. William G. James is chairman of the Junior League subcommittee of the Brooklyn committee. Robert Alfred Shaw, chairman of the governing committee of the Brooklyn Institute's educational department, attended the meeting and made a report.

Committee members and guests present at the meeting and tea were Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Oliver G. Cater, Mrs. Gordon W. Colton, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. Havens, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. James, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. William H. Lohman, Mrs. Roland Rasch, Mrs. Sands, Mrs. F. R. Shepmoes, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. George M. Whittlesey,, Mrs. William H. Whitton, Mrs. Maud B. Wood, Mrs. Blum, Mrs. Walter Watton, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Donald Ross, Edward Zeiner, Miss Marion Terry, Carl Tollefsen, Mrs. Russell Cruikshank, Mrs. Elwood Colahan, Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff, Miss Elizabeth Wright, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. McDonald, Miss Jessie Ogg, Mrs. George Gartlan, Mrs. Ernest Ash and Mrs. J. Morton Halstead.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 23 1939

CLOSING SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will close its 58th season with a pair of concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 28 and 29, and with a concert in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on the Thursday evening previous. For the 24th pair of concerts, Serge Koussevitzky announces "La Procession Nocturne," by Henri Rabaud, a symphonic poem based upon Lenau's "Faust"; d'Indy's "Istar" Variations; and the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" The season will close with the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

The programme for Cambridge will consist of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis; the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanatchina"; Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite; and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No 4.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 30 1939

IN RADCLIFFE CONCERT

Miss Theodora Dubois, 1940, of 496 Whitney Avenue was one of the 150 Radcliffe College students who, as members of the Radcliffe Choral Society, joined the Harvard Glee Club in singing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in a performance of Brahms' "Requiem" given in Symphony Hall in Boston on Tuesday evening. For 14 years the Harvard and Radcliffe choral groups have sung annually with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tuesday's concert, like a number of earlier ones, was given for the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIMES

APR 21 1939

Orchestra Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Unity Will Offer Boston Concert

Orchestra Scheduled Here Next Jan. 10 as Extra Event in Course.

As part of the twentieth anniversary celebration for the season of 1939-1940, Unity Concert Course will bring again to the Montclair High School next Jan. 10, after an absence of a year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the extra event. This orchestra came to Montclair each season in the early days of the course, but with the success of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, its schedule became so full that many cities had to be omitted from its itinerary.

Only now, because of the great interest in its appearance and because of the importance of Montclair as a cultural and intellectual center, has the Unity management been successful in securing it for its anniversary season.

Grew Out of Failure

The history of the development of the orchestra is a story of hard work, sacrifice and devotion to an ideal. Its inception came as the result of the dream and disappointment of a young man. Henry Lee Higginson of Boston in 1857 went to Vienna to study violin, piano and composition in the hope of becoming a professional musician. Overwork and unskilled surgery incapacitated him as an artist.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

APR 25 1939

Three Local Girls at Radcliffe Sing Tonight With Hub Symphony

Miss Cynthia Metzger, class of 1942, of 3 Grand View terrace, Wollaston, Miss Florence Kramer, also of the same class and a resident of Quincy, and Miss Mary Syme of this city will be three of the 150 Radcliffe college students who, as members of the Radcliffe Choral society, will join the Harvard Glee club in singing with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky in a performance of Brahms' "Re-

---

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

APR 29 1939

Miss Theodora Dubois of 496 Whitney avenue, was one of the 150 Radcliffe college students, who, as members of the Radcliffe Choral society, joined the Harvard Glee club in singing with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky in a performance of Brahms' "Requiem" in Symphony Hall, Boston, Wednesday night.

NEW YORK CITY
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 16 1939

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR'S April releases include three works by modern composers —Loeffler's "Music for Four Stringed Instruments," played by the Coolidge Quartet; Hindemith's Sonata for Viola and Piano, Op. 11, No. 4, performed by William Primrose and Jesus Maria Sanroma, and Copland's "El Salon Mexico," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction.

Hearing Mr. Copland's "El Salon Mexico" in recorded form confirms the impression gained on hearing it in the concert hall that this is a superficial, externally effective potpourri of Mexican tunes. Mr. Copland according to the pamphlet which accompanies this set has said, "Other tourists will pull out their snapshots to show you what a country looks like, but a composer wants you to know what a country sounds like." I have never visited Mexico, but I prefer to believe that if I ever go there I shall "hear" things which will reveal a less crass aspect of Mexican life than Mr. Copland has sought to reflect in "El Salon Mexico." The "Song of the Volga Boatman" in Stravinsky's version occupies the reverse side of the second disk in this set. The recording is a brilliant one.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

APR 15 1939

Last Paired Extra Symphony Concerts

The final concert in the Monday series will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, in Symphony Hall at 8:15 p. m., April 17. Frank Glazer, pianist, will be the soloist in Brahms' Second Concerto in B flat major. Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" will open and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony will close the program.

On Tuesday afternoon, April 18, at 3 o'clock, this program will be repeated for the audience known as the commuters' matinee patronage.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL BULLETIN

APR 17 1939

Off the Records

By MARIE HICKS DAVIDSON

As Debussy and Chabrier helped themselves to the melodic riches of Spain (in Espana and Iberia) so Aaron Copeland took musical themes from the abundant folk music of Mexico and has fabricated a work which Victor phonograph has recorded. It is titled "El Salon Mexico," and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky.

Aaron Copeland has woven into a colorful and enchanting web the songs and dance music of Mexico. Most of them he heard in a place called El Salon Mexico, and that is why he gave his composition that name.

Heightening the popular Mexican melodies without falsifying their natural simplicity was the feat which Copeland set for himself.

The orchestration was finished in 1936 and the first performance given in Mexico a year later. Copeland said that when a critic wrote of the composition that it was "as Mexican as the music of Revueltas" he knew that he had accomplished what he had set out to do. For the expression was like saying "As American as the music of Gershwin."

The brilliant Boston Symphony performance of the work under Dr. Koussevitzky, and the excellent quality of the recording are quite up to Victor standard. El Salon Mexico is not an easy work to perform. It present rhythmic problems of the most intricate kind to both conductor and orchestra. No trace of these difficulties [illegible] in the [illegible]. It [illegible] [illegible] playing such as is rarely [illegible] to the work of a living composer. Side four of the set contains Igor Stravinsky's orchestral arrangement of "The Song of the Volga Boatman."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 18 1939

Boston Orchestra Friends Listed

The current list of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to be printed in the Symphony's program books for the concerts on Apr. 21 and 22. It is understood that enrollments within the next day or two can yet be included.

The Friends of the Orchestra, of which there have for years been a number in Hartford and vicinity, make contributions in any amount large or small and the fund is relied upon to balance the orchestra's budget, making up the difference between endowments and the heavy cost which the active season of a modern symphony orchestra entails.

Enrollments are received by E. B. Dane, 6 Beacon St., Boston. Edward A. Taft is chairman of the Friends.

Hollywood Reporter
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.

APR 18 1939

This Week's Waxes

EL SALON MEXICO by Aaron Copland is about the most stimulating album to come along this year. It puts this 39-year-old American-born composer into the real threat class, and makes you definitely aware of the vitality of the North American continent. It is very much a modern work . . . with strains of Mexican folk songs to flavor it throughout. Copland named it after a dancehall in Mexico City . . . a place where all classes and kinds of people go to dance and have a good time. There is a sign on the wall, he reports, that reads, "Please don't throw lighted butts on the floor so the ladies don't burn their feet."

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give it the works. . . . It's a three-side job, with Strawinsky's arrangement of the SONG OF THE VOLGA BOATMEN on the fourth face. Even Strawinsky can't rejuvenate it, however. But you'll get all you want out of the first three sides. (Victor album 546. $4.50.)

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 16 1939

LAST MONDAY-TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, April 17 and 18, in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will present the final concerts of the series of six by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme will consist of the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovanstchina," Second Pianoforte Concerto of Brahms in B flat major, with Frank Glazer as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in F minor. Frank Glazer, a native of Wisconsin, has studied in the West, and in Europe where he was a pupil of Artur Schnabel. Since his debut in New York, in 1936, he has given concerts in a number of American cities.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

APR 20 1939

With Frank Glazer, Brahms 2nd Concerto Rejuvenated

The last Tuesday "commuters matinee" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season concluded the Monday-Tuesday series in a spirit of high accomplishment. The exceptional realization, even glorification of the entire program was shared by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose shaping indications we were well located to appreciate, by the soloist, Frank Glazer, whose performance in the Brahms concerto for pianoforte No. 2 in B-flat major, Op. 83 so transcended that of Arthur Rubinstein in the same concerto on April 6 that it became a fresh and radiant thing; and by the orchestra which was in complete accord with the rhythmic brilliance the poetic concepts and the exquisitely moulded phrasing of the pianist.

We confess to complete ignorance before the concert of the fine position Frank Glazer has attained as a pianist at the age of 24. No wonder Mr. Koussevitzky applauded him as he entered, patted him on the back as he went off the stage to return for many recalls. This conductor always gives especially cordial greeting to the youth of the music world. The soloist entered briskly, like a clerk making the office, but within five minutes he had made our grateful hearts for the thrill of his complete grasp of every aspect of the concerto. If splendor of trills was demanded as at the close of the first movement, he maintained them in brilliant cooperation with the orchestra. Accent he observed, a subtly swelling passage growing and blooming on the ear, color, the sonorities of masterly pedalling. The orchestra paid the tribute of perfect companionship in mood to the intuitive genius of Mr. Glazer. Besides their sympathetic mass support, there were woodwind sections and 'cello solos of warm melody and suppleness. One was held entranced for the sheer rightness of the performance of not one, but all of the four movements. No challence to rare expression was neglected.

Another repetition from the April 6-8 concerts was the "Khovanstchina" Act 1 prelude of Moussorgsky. Its folk themes supporting glints of instrumental accent are as the masses picking out through a misty morning. In its gentle character and evanescent landscape picturing there is a freshness and simplicity that commend it to frequent performance.

Tchaikowsky sends out a mighty wail, splendid in its passionate protest, from his Fourth Symphony. Antonina with her following ways may be the abhorrence he so abjures. His predilections may similarly be imagined. Scant impetus for so consummate a work! A superb performance was projected.

A. C. R.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

APR 20 1939

Words Without Music

By LOUIS REID.

NEW YORK.—One of the few successful composers who write two different kinds of music under two different names is the Russian-born Vladimir Dukelsky, better known to the public at large as Vernon Duke.

Under his Russian name he indites ambitious symphonic compositions. His symphony, "Dedicaces," for piano, orchestra and woman's voice obligato, was recently featured by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky.

Under his anglicized name of Vernon Duke, he writes—and has written—numerous popular songs. He says he does so because Vladimir Dukelsky likes caviar. Symphony won't buy caviar. Catchy popular tunes will.

Duke is a native of Pskoff or Pskov, if you prefer. It was the late George Gershwin who proved the turning point in his career, turned his eyes and footsteps to America and opportunity. He was visiting in Constantinople in 1920, happened to hear in a cafe a Gershwin number. It was his introduction to jazz. The experience so moved him that he decided to emigrate to America, find out at first hand what jazz was all about.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 21 1939

Season Is Planned for Boston Symphony Concerts

[illegible] Henry J. Davenport 40-A Monroe Place was hostess to members of the Brooklyn Committee sponsoring concerts by the Boston Symphony Concerts in Brooklyn, at the Spring meeting and tea of the committee yesterday in her home. Mrs. Davenport, as acting chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, which Adrian Van Sinderen heads, reported on next season's concerts of the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concerts will be given Nov. 26, Jan. 12, Feb. 15, March 15 and April 5.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. Walter Truslow are co-chairman of the box committee. A new feature being considered by the committee to center interest on the concerts and to add to their general interest was the proposal to hold a series of lectures explaining the musical features which the Boston Symphony will present in their Brooklyn concerts. The lectures, according to the plan now under consideration, would be given in the Academy of Music just prior to the concerts, each lecture tying up with the concert to be given subsequently.

Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, as membership chairman, presented Mrs. Donald Havens and Mrs. Irving J. Sands as new members of the committee. James G. McDonald is president of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The Institute sponsors the concert series jointly with the Brooklyn Committee and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Symphony Society, of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president.

Mrs. William G. James is chairman of the Junior League subcommittee of the Brooklyn committee. Robert Alfred Shaw, chairman of the governing committee of the Brooklyn Institute's educational department, attended the meeting and made a report.

Committee members and guests present at the meeting and tea were Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Oliver G. Cater, Mrs. Gordon W. Colton, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. Havens, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. James, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. William H. Lohman, Mrs. Roland Rasch, Mrs. Sands, Mrs. F. R. Shepmoes, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. George M. Whittlesey, Mrs. William H. Whitton, Mrs. Maud B. Wood, Mrs. Blum, Mrs. Walter Watton, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Donald Ross, Edward Zeiner, Miss Marion Terry, Carl Tollefsen, Mrs. Russell Cruikshank, Mrs. Elwood Colahan, Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff, Miss Elizabeth Wright, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. McDonald, Miss Jessie Ogg, Mrs. George Gartlan, Mrs. Ernest Ash and Mrs. J. Morton Halstead.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 23 1939

CLOSING SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will close its 58th season with a pair of concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 28 and 29, and with a concert in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on the Thursday evening previous. For the 24th pair of concerts, Serge Koussevitzky announces "La Procession Nocturne," by Henri Rabaud, a symphonic poem based upon Lenau's "Faust"; d'Indy's "Istar" Variations; and the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis et Chloe." The season will close with the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

The programme for Cambridge will consist of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis; the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina"; Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite; and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 30 1939

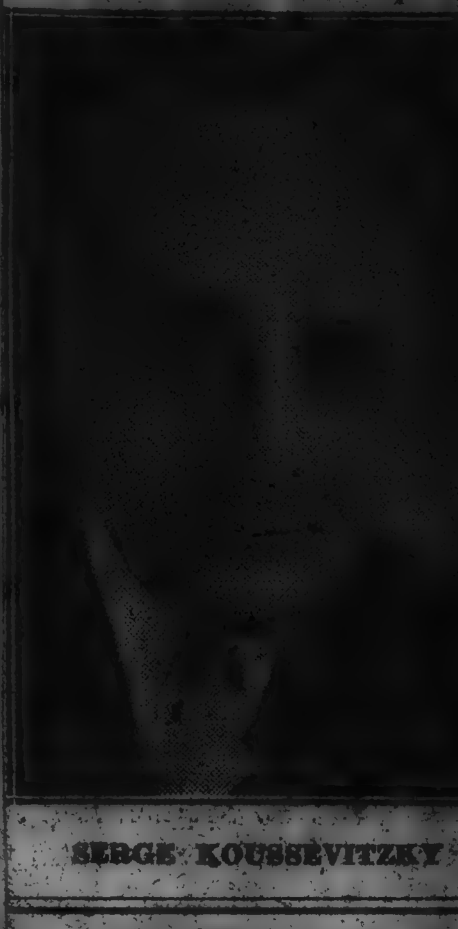
IN RADCLIFFE CONCERT

Miss Theodora Dubois, 1940, of 496 Whitney Avenue was one of the 150 Radcliffe College students who, as members of the Radcliffe Choral Society, joined the Harvard Glee Club in singing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in a performance of Brahms' "Requiem" given in Symphony Hall in Boston on Tuesday evening. For 14 years the Harvard and Radcliffe choral groups have sung annually with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tuesday's concert, like a number of earlier ones, was given for the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
SEMI-WEEKLY TIMES

APR 21 1939

Orchestra Conductor



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Unity Will Offer Boston Concert

Orchestra Scheduled Here Next Jan. 10 as Extra Event in Course.

As part of the twentieth anniversary celebration for the season of 1939-1940, Unity Concert Course will bring again to the Montclair High School next Jan. 10, after an absence of a year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the extra event. This orchestra came to Montclair each season in the early days of the course, but with the success of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, its schedule became so full that many cities had to be omitted from its itinerary.

Only now, because of the great interest in its appearance and because of the importance of Montclair as a cultural and intellectual center, has the Unity management been successful in securing it for its anniversary season.

Grew Out of Failure

The history of the development of the orchestra is a story of hard work, sacrifice and devotion to an ideal. Its inception came as the result of the dream and disappointment of a young man. Henry Lee Higginson of Boston in 1857 went to Vienna to study violin, piano and composition in the hope of becoming a professional musician. Overwork and unskilled surgery incapacitated him as an artist.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

APR 25 1939

Three Local Girls at Radcliffe Sing Tonight With Hub Symphony

Miss Cynthia Metzger, class of 1942, of 3 Grand View terrace, Wollaston, Miss Florence Kramer, also of the same class and a resident of Quincy, and Miss Mary Syme of this city will be three of the 150 Radcliffe college students who, as members of the Radcliffe Choral society, will join the Harvard Glee club in singing with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky in a performance of Brahms' "Re-

---

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

APR 29 1939

Miss Theodora Dubois of 496 Whitney avenue, was one of the 150 Radcliffe college students, who, as members of the Radcliffe Choral society, joined the Harvard Glee club in singing with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky in a performance of Brahms' "Requiem" in Symphony Hall, Boston, Wednesday night.

B. Her - April 22/39

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 23d concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Faure

Suite from "Pelleas et Melisande" Op. 80

Schmitt..."The Tragedy of Salome" Op. 50

Schubert.......Symphony No. 7 in C major

A contrast in French art could serve as description of the first part of yesterday's concert. On the one hand you have the refined and imperturbable craftsman in Faure, whose eloquence has something of the subtlety and distinction of Racine's verse. On the other you have in Florent Schmitt a tumultuous and impassioned poet, one who seizes upon anything that will fill his design and seemingly rejects nothing. In him is something of the spirit that came into painting with Delacroix.

These rough analogies may seem specious; they attempt merely to indicate two strong currents in French art. Faure, whose talents can perhaps best be appreciated through his songs, wrote singularly lovely music for Maeterlinck's play. One would not willingly go to see "Pelleas et Melisande," unless in the form of Debussy's opera, for the taste today is fantastically out of sympathy with the once fashionable Maeterlinck and we find it next to impossible to take him seriously at all or imagine that others at one time could. Nevertheless Faure's music, like Debussy's, is made of sturdier materials than the literature that inspired them. In this suite we have the advantage of not having to bother our heads with the play at all. Sixteen years is rather too long a time to leave it on the shelf.

Schmitt's "Salome," though still a dramatic and an exciting score, cannot avoid a touch of decay. It is peculiarly dense music, to some extent unmelodic and making its effects by the old method of piling Pelion upon Ossa. It can not be dismissed as mere voluptuousness, however, for it is better than that.

Incidentally, while on the subject of Schmitt, is it not time that Dr. Koussevitzky undertook to revive the extraordinary Symphonie Concertante for orchestra and piano which was first played here when the composer visited the United States some seven or eight years ago? It proved to be an exceptionally difficult score to play; but it aroused a good deal of interest at the time, and it was at least a work of such complication that it cried out for a further hearing.

Schubert's 7th Symphony is a masterpiece that must not be heard too frequently, for then its length and its repetitiousness tend to make it underrated. Since it has not been played at one of these concerts for four years, Dr. Koussevitzky was more than justified in bringing it out. Its spontaneous melodiousness and its lovely, sudden modulations cause it to be enormously popular in spite of its length. Performances yesterday, except at the opening of the Schubert, proved to be fully up to the orchestra's amazing standard.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will offer as the last program of the 58th season Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne;" Debussy's Gigue (not d'Indy's work as announced); Ravel's 2d "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite; and Brahms' First Symphony.

MELODIC LIST BY SYMPHONY

B. Post - April 22/39

Faure's, Schmitt's, Schubert's Works Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There was general rejoicing at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. And with reason. Dr. Koussevitzky was once more in command and the three pieces that made the programme (two of them far from hackneyed) were the work of composers who had something to say, knew how to say it and spoke in an idiom that, today at least, is perfectly intelligible.

Not that these three compositions are flawless works of art, although the last of them, Schubert's Symphony in C major, comes pretty close to that rating. We have only to reproach Schubert for a somewhat unsymphonic attitude and for lengths that do not seem as "heavenly" to us as they did to the rhapsodizing Schumann of a century ago.

The first number on the programme was the Suite taken from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," which had not been played here since 1923. Hearing it one had better not give too much thought to the play; and the opera of Debussy must be put resolutely and completely out of mind. Heard simply as music these fragments make no small appeal. In them is charm of melody, orchestral euphony, and touch of distinction which Faure imparted to everything that he wrote and, in the final section, a touching and pathetic expression that would have seemed well enough suited to the scene it accompanies, had the aforesaid opera of Debussy never been written.

As for the other item on the list, Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome," we are confronted in it with the spectacle of a composer who succeeded triumphantly with the difficult task of creating music of bodeful suggestion (as in the opening of each of the two parts of the work) and then achieved hardly more than routine effectiveness when a more obvious opportunity was offered him. Of a lesser order of invention than these pages of evocation are the "dance of the pearls," with its touches of conventional Orientalism, and the music for Salome's Dance and for the final catastrophe.

The performances of the pieces by Faure and Schmitt were everything that the most captious might require. Much of the Symphony, too was admirably presented. There was reason to applaud the brisk pace of the second movement, which is full long at any tempo. At times, however, the conductor was guilty of over-playing and over-interpreting music that needs only the chance to speak for itself. We may still look back upon the performance under Sir Adrian Boult a few seasons ago as the ideal of how this Symphony should be made to sound.

B. Glb April 22/39

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Two French scores and an old Viennese masterpiece make up the program for the Boston Symphony concerts this week, the last pair but one of the orchestra's 58th season. Incidentally, this is one of the most interesting lists which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has assembled this year. It begins with the Suite which Gabriel Faure took from his incidental music to Maeterlinck's play, "Pelleas and Melisande"; continues with "The Tragedy of Salome," by Florent Schmitt, and is ended with the great C major Symphony, of proverbial "Heavenly length," by Schubert.

"Pelleas and Melisande" aroused the imagination of three so diverse composers as Debussy, Faure and Sibelius, and each treated the subject in his own way. Debussy's opera has, of course, almost totally obscured the Suites of the other two, and no doubt most people take Debussy's treatment as a criterion.

Debussy possessed an imagination and a creative talent especially suited to so "other-worldly," so fanciful a play. His opera is a perfect counterpart of the stage atmosphere and the dramatic action in "Pelleas and Melisande." Faure, less a tonal colorist, went at the matter in different fashion, and while his "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite is delicate, melodious, refined and daintily scored, it does not, for this writer, come anywhere near matching Debussy's evocative power. Faure's prelude to the death scene is, by comparison, commonplace. Still, the Suite is pleasant and enjoyable to hear. It had last been played by the Boston Symphony in 1923.

Like Maeterlinck's play, the exotic and erotic tragedy of Salome appealed to such artists as Florent Schmitt and Richard Strauss, and in this case, again, it is the opera of Strauss that is by far the better known. Both Strauss and Schmitt recounted the tale with a large orchestra and luxuriant instrumentation. Strauss did the trick in a style wholly his own, whereas the music of Schmitt is based to some extent upon certain typical devices that used to be common currency of the impressionistic school of composers. For example, there are suggestions of Debussy.

"The Tragedy of Salome" is quite as depictive and almost as intense as the opera by Strauss, though it may sound a bit old-fashioned. There is certainly as much passion, and as much sultriness of atmosphere. Yesterday's performance seemed to present the piece at its best.

To pick flaws in Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Schubert's C major Symphony is no doubt to fly rashly in the face of the warm popular reception it had from yesterday's audience. This writer is, according to his own lights, in duty bound to do that. Dr. Koussevitzky performs it excitingly and with much tonal splendor, but in his zeal paints over with sophistication the utter simplicity that ought to characterize Schubert. A texture that should have been clear was prevailingly turgid, and the speed at which the Symphony moved was too fast. That is, of course, with the exception of the finale, which is supposed to go very rapidly.

The last program of the season, next week, will consist of Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne"; Debussy's "Gigues"; the second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite by Ravel, and Brahms' First Symphony. C. W. D.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 30 1939

SYMPHONY LEADER HONORED

Boston, April 29.—(AP)—A richly-designed silver samovar was presented to Serge Koussevitzky tonight at the close of a concert which marked the end of his fifteenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's trustees, made the presentation on behalf of the trustees, and voiced appreciation for Koussevitzky's "15 years of unsurpassed achievement."

B. Trans MUSIC April 26/39

Brahms Requiem

Review of Pension Fund Concert And Modest Plea in Letter-Form

Mr. Olin Downes,
Director of Music,
World's Fair,
New York City.

Dear Mr. Downes:

After tonight's performance of the Brahms Requiem at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it occurred to me that the presentation (as such things are called in show-business) ought to be lifted intact and deposited in the World's Fair Music Hall some time next August, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will have fullfilled their engagement at the annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival, and while most of the Harvard and Radcliffe students are still enjoying their summer vacation.

I cannot speak with any authority, of course, but I think I am safe in saying that conductor and orchestra will be available at that time if you will only give them the word immediately. It may be a little harder to insure the presence of all the members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, who contributed so nobly to tonight's performance. But what with reduced railroad fares and the presence, in or near New York, of a good many alumni who must have sung in previous performances of the Requiem here, I feel almost equally sure that the choral parts will be managed very well.

That leaves only the two soloists, Elisabeth Rethberg and Keith Falkner, to be accounted for. It would be a pity, of course, if previous engagements should make it impossible for them to appear, especially Mr. Falkner, who sang the second baritone solo tonight so wonderfully that even a jaded New York music critic like you would have been deeply moved, I think. But you can always get other soloists; and the successful performance of the Requiem does not rest mainly on the soloists, as you know.

Commanding Conductor

It rests mainly on the conductor, of course. And Dr. Koussevitzky was quite extraordinary tonight—even for him. He had apparently made up his mind to present the Requiem in the most serious mien possible, and to this end he set it forth along lines that were, to put the thing mildly, spacious. No one, not even a carping Boston critic, could accuse the conductor of undue haste at any time. On the contrary, the performance was probably the slowest on record. The tempos were so leisurely, in fact, that the singers had their hands—or rather their lungs—full in trying to manage the phrases properly. That was why, I suppose, Mme. Rethberg was not at her best in her single solo, or Mr. Falkner in the first of his two solos. And I suppose it explained, too, the frequent deviations from pure intonation on the part of both solo singers and chorus.

But these things, somehow, did not matter beside the wonderful spirit that Dr. Koussevitzky was enabled to engender by his treatment of last evening. At the hands of a lesser musician, I suppose, the music at such tempos would have disintegrated and gone to pieces. But by the miracle of his planning and imperious control over the performance, the music tonight affected me even more powerfully than it had the first time I heard it—and that is saying a good deal.

Basis for a Plea

Since you are obviously a very busy man during these weeks I shall not burden you further with a description of tonight's performance. You will, however, forgive my yielding to the temptation to tell you some of the reasons, however obvious to you, why I think this performance of the Requiem at the Fair would be a feather in your cap and a fine thing for the Fair.

It enlists the services of two famous organizations that ought to be present at the Fair. (In spite of our telephone conversation of a few weeks ago, I have yet to read a definitive announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to appear during the summer at Flushing Meadows.) You might have to be careful about billing the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the finest in the world, since you are going to have a number of other great orchestras there. But you could call it the second best orchestra, and no one would be offended. We Bostonians would understand. As to the Glee Club and Choral Society, which G. Wallace Woodworth has been conducting along the fine lines instituted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, I think that not even the citizens of New Haven would begrudge them top billing.

The performance (or performances, for I assume there would be more than one) would be a popular "attraction." The attendance tonight, it is true, hardly taxed Symphony Hall to its capacity, though the enthusiasm of those who did come was something remarkable to observe. But Bostonians are a law unto themselves. And as you are probably aware, the success of the Boston Orchestra and conductor in Manhattan has frequently surpassed that in Boston.

If it is union troubles that are delaying arrangements to bring the Boston Orchestra to the Fair, you could in this case easily get around them by offering the performance of the Requiem as part of the German exhibit. The Nazis would like that, I am sure. And so, too, would the anti-Nazis, who know that for all Brahms' reverence for tradition and authority he was fundamentally too much of an individualist to get along in such a milieu, artistic and political, as the Nazis have created. His Requiem is a noble statement of some of the finest qualities of the German spirit, qualities which you and I are sure will survive the ephemeral violence of the present.

Hopeful of an opportunity to review a concert by Bostonians in New York, I remain

Yours devotedly,
Moses Smith

Boston, April 25.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

APR 30 1939

SAMOVAR IS GIVEN TO KOUSSEVITSKY

BOSTON, April 29 (AP)—A richly-designed silver samovar (tea urn) was presented to Serge Koussevitzky tonight at the close of a concert which marked the end of his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's trustees, made the presentation on behalf of the trustees, and voiced appreciation for Koussevitzky's "15 years of unsurpassed achievement." Carl Faberge, famous artisan who was silver and gold smith to the late Czar of Russia, made the samovar. Art patrons consider it an unusual work because most samovars are made of copper or brass.

TRANSCRIPT
Dedham Mass

APR 28 1939

Mrs. B. C. Longley of East street was among those who attended the Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday evening. Assisting the orchestra to present the Brahms Requiem were the Radcliffe Choral Society, of which Mrs. Longley's granddaughter, Miss Sue Irving, is a member, and the Harvard Glee Club.

Brahms' 'German Requiem'

C. S. Monitor - April 26/39

For the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund and of an audience that failed by a good deal to fill Symphony Hall, Brahms' "Deutches Requiem" was performed last night. The combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society stood, solidly packed, behind the orchestra. The soloists were Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano, and Keith Falkner, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky was in command.

Richard Wagner, one of whose aversions was the conductor who played slow movements habitually too fast (he was thinking specifically of Mendelssohn), could not have picked this quarrel with Dr. Koussevitzky, whose tendency is in the opposite direction. The interpretation of composers' tempo indications, and even (strangely enough) of metronome markings, is a deeply subjective matter; a musician of Dr. Koussevitzky's sustained intensity of nature can feel the continuity of music through widely spaced points in time far more successfully than can the majority of his hearers, or, for that matter, of his players and singers. Certain sections of the Requiem last night were played at what seemed unnecessarily drawn-out tempi. That, nevertheless, the performance held the attention enchained from beginning to end is a subtle tribute to its many excellences in other respects—to its magnificently sustained moods, its beautiful tonal balance, its exciting dramatic contrasts, and, in general, to the persuasive eloquence with which the essence of this highly personal Requiem—the progress from sorrow to confident hope—was conveyed.

But for a certain pardonable hesitancy in quiet attacks and occasional, but no less pardonable, stridencies in the tenor section, the large chorus contributed admirably to the beauty of the synthesis, whether in the softly sustained "Blest are they," in the brilliantly vigorous outburst, "And the ransomed of the Lord"; in the curious fugue over a pedal point, "But the righteous souls," or in the apotheosis of the final chorus.

Mme. Rethberg, whose notable performances with the Metropolitan Opera are fresh in the memory of her hearers, contributed an appropriately pure and gleaming vocal quality to her single exquisite air, but marred it by faulty intonation. Mr. Falkner's splendidly resonant and nobly eloquent voice was used with intelligence and dramatic point in his two solos, "Lord, make me to know," and "Therefore I show unto you a mystery."

To all, the audience gave hearty and unstinted applause. S. S.

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

B. Post - April 26/39

Symphony With Voices Gives Brahm's Requiem

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and with Elizabeth Rethberg and Keith Falkner to sing the solo parts for soprano and baritone, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented Brahms' "A German Requiem" at Symphony Hall last evening. The concert was the second of the season in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

In view of the high esteem in which the "German Requiem" has long been held, and with the excellence of the performance assured, it was both surprising and disappointing that there was not a better attendance last evening. One had every reason to expect a house filled to capacity, and there were many more empty seats than there should have been. Verily, the public is fickle, and those who would court its favor have their troubles. Yet it might almost seem that loyalty to the orchestra would guarantee the success of a pension fund concert, regardless of the programme.

The last previous performance of the "German Requiem" by the Symphony Orchestra was at the Brahms' Festival of 1933, which marked the centenary of the composer's birth. It could hardly be urged that last evening's performance followed too soon. But it is possible that, in spite of the reputation of piece and composer, the Requiem is losing some of its hold upon the public.

Frankly regarded, the work is uneven, if not in quality, at least in what is generally called inspiration. At its best, it is rarely beautiful, moving and impressive. But there are tiresome stretches and wearisome repetitions, particularly in the second and third divisions. Certainly, all that could be done to make the work consistently engrossing was done last evening. On the score of tonal beauty, whether vocal or orchestral, of expressiveness, of devotion to the composer, nothing more might have been asked.

At least those who did make last evening's audience were fully sensible of the excellence of what they were hearing and when suitable opportunity was offered, they heaped applause upon all concerned. And in the assigning of credit for a deed so notably accomplished one should not overlook the contribution of G. Wallace Woodworth, who as conductor of the two choirs, had given the singers their preliminary training. To Dr. Koussevitzky he had handed a singularly responsive instrument.

Final Week of Symphony

An Important Choral Event; Brahms Requiem Tuesday

B. Herald April 23/39

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

There should be no need to emphasize the interest in the forthcoming performance Tuesday night of Brahms' German Requiem; but we may be allowed to recapitulate one or two facts about it, since program notes are not customarily supplied with extra concerts, such as for the pension fund. The work has not been heard since 1933, when the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses also assisted. It is so generally accepted as a masterpiece, that a performance every six years does not seem excessive.

Still, we are not an especially chorally minded city in these days, nor is our experience of choral music at all broad. Of Handel we know nothing, outside of the Messiah. If our acquaintance with Bach is somewhat better, that with Haydn is worse. We know nothing of Beethoven beyond the Missa Solemnis, nothing of Mendelssohn beyond Elijah, nothing of Berlioz beyond the Damnation of Faust. Even familiar choral works we attend but irregularly.

When the Handel and Haydn Society put on the Damnation of Faust or Verdi's Requiem or some other infrequently heard work at a concert or when the federal music project put on an ambitious series of this music a few years ago, the public interest was hardly ever more than lukewarm. This is a discouraging situation, and there does not seem to be much one can do about it until by degrees the public wakes up to the rich field of music that it is ignoring. With Brahms, however, this rule ought not to hold. No composer today calls forth more enthusiasm; no other composer so often causes the audience to cheer and stamp as well as applaud. No other composer in the last 15 years has come near his record for being the choice to have the last word in a symphony season. Shall this, the second of his absolutely mature works go unheeded?

The first work that found Brahms on a large scale plane at his highest was the Piano Concerto in D minor, the second was the Requiem. Both of these works, of course, were before the First Symphony, though not to be underrated on any spacious grounds of immaturity. The text is taken from Holy Scripture, Brahms' own selection, and is consequently not intended for a church service. As Mr. Edwin Evans observes: "The term Requiem as applied to this work must be taken in the generic sense of a composition in honor of the dead and not in the liturgical sense of a mass commencing with the introit, 'Requiem acternam dona eis, Domine.'"

For what dead was the German Requiem composed? Sir Donald Tovey, in what is otherwise the best and most penetrating analytical study of the score, makes the curious error of saying that it was composed "in memory of the fallen in the war of 1870." That it owed a good deal of its popularity to the fact of its being sung after that war is true, but otherwise it was written at least nine years earlier. The work of Brahms directly inspired by the Franco-Prussian war was the Triumphlied celebrating the victory, music, whatever its artistic value, that might prove difficult to swallow just now.

The 5th movement, with soprano solo, is generally supposed to be inspired by grief for the death of his mother and was written later than the other six movements. It is unlikely that the Requiem as a whole could have been similarly motivated. It is frequently said, and that is perhaps the most plausible theory of all, that the Requiem is a tribute to Schumann's memory. The tragic debt of the older composer, the artistic debt of the younger, the friendship with Clara, all these make a noble motive for a noble end.

In listening to it Tuesday we must bear in mind that the text Brahms used was the German Lutheran translation, and that the English adaptation makes for stresses on words and repetitions that are unnatural to our ears. We paid a similar price in this relation of words and music last Sunday with Damnation of Faust. Musically a chance to hear the Requiem again should prove of interest for those who like to follow Brahms' style, particularly in the orchestra. It will be worth the effort even for those who claim that they have not use for anything save the orchestra of and by itself.

Fine Performanc

B. Herald MUSIC April 26/39

PENSION FUND CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Brahms' "A German Requiem" was performed last night in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, for the benefit of the pension fund. Assisting were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano, and Keith Falkner, baritone. The audience, though not of capacity size, was enthusiastic.

Much has been written about Brahms' Requiem, partly because it was his greatest choral work and in part because it was relatively early among his great creations. It has been wisely pointed out that it is a personal document, not one designed for a church service and least of all in the Catholic idea of a mass for the dead. It emphasizes, not the day of reckoning and the last judgment, but the consolation in Christ's teaching and especially in the Beatitudes.

Nowadays—and this may explain the comparatively poor attendance for so important a production—it may take an out-and-out Brahmsian to appreciate all of the Requiem without moments of boredom. The fugal chorus of the 6th movement, for example, falls off in the second part and never has that exciting, thunderous quality of a good Handel chorus. Nor can other parts altogether escape a charge of sentimentality. Yet the famous 5th movement, inspired directly by the death of Brahm's mother, has no touch of this fault. Moreover it was beautifully sung by Mme. Rethberg last night.

The performance as a whole had that finish and intensity that one had a right to expect. An exception might be taken to the deliberate pace of the 2d and other movements. Dr. Koussevitzky may have wished on no account to neglect the solemnity of the Requiem, but at the same time this worthy motive makes for monotony. The chorus, a result of Mr. Woodworth's solicitous training, sang with enthusiasm and to good effect. The size of it is portentious, yet it is capable of singing a delicate piano as well as robust forte. Mr. Falkner once again proved himself a reliable and eloquent singer in the two solos which Brahms composed. Indeed we were very generously treated as regards soloists when one considers how small a role they play in the work as a whole. Dr. Koussevitzky's direction brought out an unusually dignified interpretation.

B. Globe MUSIC April 26/39

SYMPHONY HALL

"A German Requiem"

Brahms' great choral masterpiece, "A German Requiem," was performed at Symphony Hall last night at the Spring concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The choruses were the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, Elisabeth Rethberg, the Metropolitan Opera soprano, and Keith Falkner, English baritone, took the vocal solos.

Since "A German Requiem" is not only a masterpiece, but a comparative rarity, this presentation was therefore doubly desirable. The Boston Symphony last gave it in the Brahms Festival of 1933. Neither a conventional score in the "oratorio manner," nor a setting of a church office for the dead, Brahms' Requiem occupies a rather solitary position among the big choral works.

In this music there is no ominous suggestion of the day of judgment. Rather does it express one man's feelings toward life and death, toward the living and the dead, as he was able to communicate what was in his heart by means of texts which Brahms himself selected from the German Bible. The governing sentiments of "A German Requiem" are faith in the life everlasting; that though all flesh withereth as the grass and all that is mortal must perish, yet eternal peace abides beyond the grave.

Such exaltation of spirit Brahms put into music as noble, fundamental and imperishable as the thoughts it was intended to convey. Similarly, it is original, rich in melody, and bears that rugged strength characteristic of the finest Teutonic musical minds. The majesty of the march-like second movement inspires nothing less than awe.

Dr. Koussevitzky's conduction of "A German Requiem" is one of his finest achievements. The performance was in general of high standard if not perfect. The Harvard and Radcliffe singers gave a good account of themselvcs and of Mr. Woodsworth's training, even if some of the rhythmic outlines were not so prominent as they ought to have been, and though their tone might have been richer and bigger.

Mme. Rethberg sang her solo extremely well. Mr. Falkner, a fine musician whose singing at other Boston Symphony concerts in the past is highlighted in memory, was not in his best voice when he began, but he soon regained the superlative qualities for which he is noted.

The size of the audience, which left numerous empty seats, was regrettable. The Boston Symphony pension fund is a most worthy cause. To this reviewer it is not understandable how the Boston public can so discreditably maintain its apparent indifference toward pension fund concerts. Symphony Hall ought to be filled for every one of them. C. W. D.

The Boston Symphony Season

C. S. Monitor April 26/39

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is concluding its fifty-eighth season this week with a program divided between French composers and the Brahms of the Symphony in C minor. The French works chosen were Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Debussy's "Gigues," and the second orchestral suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé."

The season has again been notably successful, and the high standard of performance and interest has been maintained by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Novelties have not been very numerous, nor on the whole very important, though several of them have been rewarding. It is interesting to note that all five of the "first performances" of the year were by American composers, native or adoptive.

Undoubtedly the most important of these was Roy Harris' Third Symphony, which revealed him as having freed himself of the influences which had been too apparent in his work, and won through to an individual musical expression. Edward Burlingame Hill, a composer who has enriched the American symphonic repertory with several impressive works, contributed his first Violin Concerto. The slow movement charmed by its lyricism, its piquant harmonies, and its instrumental colors, but otherwise the work was disappointing.

Nicolai Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale had the interest of having been written for string quartet and orchestra, and of having the composer, as second violinist of the Coolidge Quartet, take part in the performance. The unusual combination was not so successful in a symphonic work as it might have been in a chamber composition. The two other novelties, Dukelsky's "Dédicaces," for piano and orchestra, with soprano obbligato, and D. S. Smith's Symphony No. 4, I did not hear.

A dozen works were played for the first time in Boston. Of those that I heard, I was impressed particularly by the symphonic interludes from Ernest Bloch's opera, "Macbeth"; Křenek's Second Pianoforte Concerto, and Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony. Bloch's interludes, characteristic of the composer in lyricism, color, and emotional depth, possess also a dramatic quality which rouses a desire to hear the opera from which they are taken. This opera, written 30 years ago in Paris, performed once then, and revived only last year in Naples, was warmly received at its only hearings.

The Křenek concerto is scholarly and well integrated. It marks an advance upon the composer's "Jonny Spielt Auf" and his "Little Symphony." If his musical ideas were as interesting as his technical ability, the new symphony would be an even more important production. Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony is a mixture of good and bad music which leaves the impression that political considerations have interfered with creative expression.

Of the masters, Beethoven led with six performances, Brahms followed with five, and Ernest Bloch as guest conductor led four of his own compositions. Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky and Wagner were represented by three works each.

The orchestra will give its sixth Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, Mass., Aug. 3, 5, 6, 10, 12, and 13. The programs will be made up of works from the repertory.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1939 – B. Herald

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HONORED

Serge Koussevitzky (left) presented with silver samovar by Ernest B. Dane, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he finished his 15th season as conductor.

SAMOVAR PRESENTED TO DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor Honored at Conclusion of 15th Season in Boston

Serge Koussevitzky was presented with a richly designed silver samovar last night at the conclusion of his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the longest term of any leader in its history. The presentation was made by Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's trustees, after the final concert.

The samovar was made by Carl Faberge, silver and goldsmith to the late Czar and Czarina of Russia, and one of the most noted modern artisans.

Speaking briefly on behalf of the donors, who comprised the trustees and a group of friends, Dane voiced their appreciation of "15 years of unsurpassed achievement."

Symphony Season Ends

By RUTH MARSTERS
Music Editor

THE 58th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fifteenth of Serge Koussevitzky's regime as conductor, ended with a program composed of "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, conductor of the orchestra during the season 1918-1919; "Gigues," the first of Debussy's "Images" for Orchestra; the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" music finally Brahms' First Symphony.

The 24th pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts were, in short, fairly typical of those that had preceded them during the year, being interestingly devised as to program, brilliant as to performance, and accompanied withal by the approval of capacity audiences.

A summary of the Boston Symphony season just past that would do justice to the subject would necessarily extend itself in space. We confine ourselves then to reiterating the salient, if obvious, truth that the caliber of performance Koussevitzky has built up over a period of years continues to make the orchestra one of the most important musical organizations of the world, one, incidentally, in which the musical world finds an ever increasing interest.

The next engagement of the orchestra will undoubtedly be at the World's Fair in New

B. Trans. MUSIC April 30/39

Symphony Concert

Dr. Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Traverse Final Program of Season

By MOSES SMITH

With tonight's concert in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will complete its 58th season and Serge Koussevitzky his 15th season in the post of its conductor. The program-book for the final pair of concerts, summarizing the achievements of the season, inevitably tempts one to muse about the past. The Orchestra in relatively few years has had a long history; it has had its ups and downs. Dr. Koussevitzky in a little more than one-quarter of the span has also had an eventful history; for the most part he has had only ups. By virtue of the length of his tenure he may be called the first permanent conductor of the Orchestra. By the same token he has fashioned an orchestra that it is almost impossible to dissociate from his personality and talents.

The qualities of the orchestra, which are the qualities of the conductor, were clearly and fairly revealed in yesterday's matinee performance of this last program. As the performance of the first part of last week's program had attested, the orchestra is at its best in French music of the turn of the century and the following decade or two—in music of impressionism. Here the orchestra has best opportunity to display its wonderful variety of color and its sensitivity to the subtlest changes of timbre.

French Atmosphere

The opportunity yesterday came trebly—in "La procession nocturne" by Henri Rabaud, formerly conductor of the orchestra for a brief period, in Debussy's neglected "Gigues" and in the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." The almost gaseous lightness and limpidity and fluidity to which Debussy reduced his recollections of England were marvelously reproduced in yesterday's performance. The sombre tints with which "La procession nocturne" begins and the brighter hues of the procession itself were beautifully recaptured. And the rustling, murmuring beginning of the Ravel Suite sounded in performance like the creation of life.

By the time the Suite has run its course it has required not only the fullest palette of colors but also the utmost technical virtuosity from the players. In both respects the orchestra again accomplished here that miracle which their previous performances of this music has suggested. The performance yesterday, indeed, seemed even better than in the past. In it a twentieth-century virtuoso conductor, directing a twentieth-century virtuoso orchestra in the virtuoso music of a twentieth-century composer came to finest flower. So wonderfully was the performance integrated that in result it seemed almost rhapsodic, like what the swing boys call "going to town."

German Substance

The music of Brahms has intrinsically far less of instrumental color, and not a great deal of harmonic color. It consists principally of melodic line against chord blocks, or on occasion of simultaneous melodic lines (which is to say polyphony). The drama is expressed in almost purely musical language, such as harmonic changes and so forth. Dr. Koussevitzky's strength or weakness, according to the point of view, lies in his insistence on finding drama and color of another kind in such music. The result of his efforts is called by some "humanizing" Brahms, by others distorting the composer's intentions.

The results are achieved by subtle or obvious departures from the strict letter of the composer's indications. Fast sections become faster, slow slower; loud louder and soft, softer. Here and there a pace is slackened or accelerated to add excitement; or the balance of a chord is changed.

In the past I have had occasion to express regret at such treatment of Brahms's music by Dr. Koussevitzky. There was some occasion yesterday, too. But on the whole it was a vastly better-proportioned performance of the First Symphony than any he has previously given us. The exaggerations were slighter, and the playing gained, from my point of view, in expressiveness. It is needless to say that the performance was technically brilliant.

And so the Symphony emerged as the rugged, uneven masterpiece that it is. It stimulated the listener even though it has been frightfully overplayed in recent years both here and elsewhere. Since the performance was as good as it was yesterday perhaps the conductor will call a moratorium on the Symphony for a few years.

The program-book contained, as already hinted, a summary of the past season's repertory. It also contained a meaty note about the Friends of the Orchestra. Both subjects are fruitful to consider. But for fuller discussion they may be reserved for another time.

Symphonic Band in Cambridge

A concert by L'Harmonie Francaise de Cambridge, led by Georges Moleux, will be given at Rindge Technical School, Cambridge, tomorrow evening. The organization, a symphonic band, will play Lalo's Overture to "Le roi d'Ys," excerpts from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," Messager's "Les deux pigeons,' excerpts from "Il Trovatore," Massenet's "Les Erinnyes" and the Overture, "Monte Carlo," by the conductor.

SYMPHONY ENDS 57TH MUSIC YEAR

Audience Fails to Rise as Conductor Enters Stage

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Tradition was respected and also flouted at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. This final matinee of the season ended, and stirringly, with the First Symphony of Brahms; but the audience for some reason did not rise in company with the orchestra when Dr. Koussevitzky first came upon the stage, although for 14 years it has so greeted him. Certainly there was no lack of responsiveness later. After every piece save one, Debussy's "Gigues," there was conspicuous enthusiasm.

APPLAUD RABAUD, RAVEL

So far as the volume of applause was concerned Dr. Koussevitzky might have brought the orchestra again to its feet after the first and third numbers on the programme, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." This gesture, however, was reserved for the end of the concert, and the tumult of applause, already long continued, was then redoubled.

Granted that Debussy's "Gigues," the first of the three "Images" that were his last work for orchestra, is pretty tenuous stuff, there is still enough of charm and distinction in it to justify a performance after 14 years, and one must admit that it made a better foil to Rabaud's tone poem than the much superior and originally announced "Istar" of D'Indy would have made. "Istar" will keep until another season.

"La Procession Nocturne"

It was also in 1925 that "La Procession Nocturne" was last heard at these concerts, and its revival was long overdue. A singularly moving and beautiful work, it reflects in common with other French compositions of the late 19th century the influence of Franck and Wagner, yet it would be grossly unjust to stigmatize this finely wrought score as derivative. From the middle section onward yesterday the performance was worthy of the music and no more could have been asked. In the first part the almost inaudible pianissimos lent the music a touch of preciosity and robbed it of some of its emotional force, its descriptive character.

Practice makes perfect. The Ravel excerpts from the Symphony of Brahms are now played at Symphony Hall as well as they can be played. Nevertheless, both might be shelved for at least a season, even though there is no denying the suitability of the Symphony for the place to which Dr. Koussevitzky has so long assigned it.

Grand and Weak in Brahms'

The ringing, triumphant close, with its confident affirmation that all's right with the world, undoubtedly heartens many at a time when everything is so obviously wrong. But when we hear this work as often as we do at Symphony Hall and elsewhere we are likely to discover that between its puissant opening and its noble close come pages which, though wholly agreeable, are hardly worthy of such exalted company.

To say that Dr. Koussevitzky's programmes during this 58th season were or were not as interesting, generally considered, as those of other years is merely to express a personal opinion. This reviewer did not find them so, and yet the figures are eloquent of the variety of musical fare which the subscribers to the concerts received.

20 New Works

In the 18 pairs of concerts conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, the three led by Mr. Burgin and the three variously conducted by Messrs. Goossens, Enesco and Bloch 78 pieces were heard, representing 48 composers, and 20 works were played by the orchestra for the first time.

The regular repertory might still be freshened, and more will be said on this subject in these columns tomorrow. The standard of performance, when Dr. Koussevitzky conducted, was as high, if not higher than ever.

B. Herald MUSIC April 30/39

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 24th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows:

Rabaud
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem
Debussy
"Gigues" from "Images" for orchestra No. 1
Ravel......"Daphnis et Chloe," 2d Suite
Brahms..Symphony No. 1 in C minor Op. 68

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave us a splendid concert for the end of the season. The Brahms No. 1 has become the traditional concluding work under Dr. Koussevitzky's regime. So superbly was it read and so powerful was its effect yesterday that the audience remained to stamp and cheer their approval as well as give the customary applause. Dr. Koussevitzky must look back over his 15 years of leadership here with pride, when he considers the perfection of the orchestra's playing, the wide variety of the music that he has brought forward and the enthusiasm of the public for his efforts.

The first part of the program was French, and an interesting selection into the bargain. Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne" is an excellent example of a tone poem; it conveys a distinct impression, paints a romantic picture and yet is musically independent of any too definite program. Some may consider it a trifle long for the material involved; but at the least it is a poetic piece of writing. It is actually a much more familiar work of the symphonic repertoire than its long absence from the Boston Symphony programs would indicate.

Debussy's "Gigues" is a fascinating work, and here it is reasonable to ask why it has been so rarely performed. There is not a great deal of orchestra music of Debussy available, so that it is hard to understand why such enchanting and fantastic music has been neglected. As in the case of Ravel it requires adroit and artistic wood-wind playing, and this the Boston Symphony can certainly provide. The result was a distinct pleasure of a kind we don't often hear at concerts.

It is a pity that the critic is denied the use of terms in the world of sport, for what, beyond the tame epithets of praise, can be said of such a performance of "Daphnis et Chloe" and what can describe the effect on the audience? Those of us who heard the singularly flat and drab performance of it that the N. B. C. Orchestra and Toscanini gave here this winter have a ready yard-stick to measure how incomparably better was yesterday's interpretation. It is something with which we can annoy a younger generation in years to come by remarking: "Ah, but you didn't hear Koussevitzky's and the Boston Symphony's rendering."

We have summarized the season at some length in an article to appear Sunday. Here a few remarks only need be said. The season as a whole has been active in the production of new scores, particularly American. It has not, in the main, produced anything very remarkable, except Hindemith's Symphonic Dances; and it brought out a good deal that was pretty bad. Of the other new scores, besides Hindemith, Roy Harris' 2d Symphony, Berezowsky's Toccata, Variations and Finale and Dukelsky's "Dedicaces" were the most interesting. The most attractive of the less serious compositions were Copland's "El Salon Mexico" and Lipatti's "Chef cu lautari."

For the worst of the unfamiliar music we would find some difficulty in choosing between the vapid symphony of David Stanley Smith and the atrocious-sounding jig-saw puzzle that was Krenek's Piano Concerto. The most interesting revivals of music by living composers were Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms and his "Sacre"; the most disappointing in the same category was Bloch's "America." Of older and more or less neglected works the best revival was Bruckner's 8th Symphony and the least worth while Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony. With this we can now wish the 58th season farewell and ask for blessings to be showered on the Pops and the Berkshire festival.

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents Final Symphony Program

B. Globe MUSIC April 30/39

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With the concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight the 58th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to an end. At least the Fall and Winter part of it does. Actually the orchestra now functions pretty near the year around, what with Pops in the Spring, and the Esplanade concerts and the Berkshire Festivals during the Summer.

For his leavetaking to the Friday and Saturday subscribers, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky divided the program between French and German music—Henri Rabaud's "The Nocturnal Procession," "Gigues" (or "Jigs") by Debussy, the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite by Ravel, and Brahms' First Symphony.

The French numbers are really virtuoso music, calling upon a large ensemble of individually talented and collectively well-drilled players—in other words a virtuoso orchestra. As such, this music showed off the technical lory of the Boston Symphony, and, no less important, its altogether magnificent tone. The "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite has for some years brought out to exceptional degree the interpretive powers of Dr. Koussevitzky. As he and the orchestra play it, the piece is not only fascinating and exciting but as nearly an example of perfection as is likely to be heard.

These particular works of Rabud and Debussy had gone unheard at Symphony concerts since 1925. Rabaud's imaginative symphonic poem is well worth revival, but Debussy's pretty little piece is another matter. "The Nocturnal Procession" was intended to depict the lonely Faust watching, from concealment at the side of a forest pathway, a religious procession bearing torches and singing on St. John's Eve. In music curiously German, almost Wagnerian, yet with proverbial Gallic refinement, Rabaud graphically suggested the forest by night, the loneliness of Faust, and, with a good deal of subtlety, the approach and departure of the procession.

"Jigs," to use a plain English spelling good enough for anybody, was the first of three pieces that Debussy chose to call "Images." Originally he termed it "Sad Jigs." It is about as sad as a fox trot in blues style, but less interesting. Before the war (the last one, that is) "Jigs" might have been thought to be full of esthetic overtones; today it is frankly dull, dated and from time to time echoes that marvelous tone poem, "The Sea," which Debussy had composed a few years earlier.

For the last four seasons, and intermittently before that, Brahms' First Symphony has figured as the final number upon concluding Symphony programs. Its hearty romanticism, emotional fire and towering climaxes, especially that still breathtaking chorals for brass in the last movement recommended it for the purpose. But to repeat it year after year in this wise is a mannerism. The performance yesterday was marvelous, intense and moving, nevertheless free from distortions of any kind. It moved at just the right speed, and had just the right emphases of phrasing, volume and of the word.

Opening and closing Boston Symphony concerts are invariably a rite to some extent. The orchestra always rises for the conductor's first entrance, and so does the audience. Yesterday afternoon the audience broke tradition by not getting to its feet when Dr. Koussevitzky walked upon the stage. He was rapturously applauded, with cheers and stamping, when the afternoon was over.—C. W. D.

W

Dr. Koussevitzky Wins Ovation At Final Afternoon of Symphony

B Herald - April 30/39

From now on until the fall season arrives, Boston hostesses may feel free to plan social affairs for Friday afternoons as yesterday marked the end of the Friday afternoon Symphony concerts, which are always faithfully attended by members of society, who let nothing interfere with their being in their regular seats each week during the winter. The program was full of variety and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky received tumultuous applause. The first half of the afternoon was devoted to Debussy, Ravel and Rabaud, and the program ended with the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Sitting in her usual seat down near the front was Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, in black with sables. Mrs. Roger Wolcott, wearing a hat of shiny rough brown straw with her brown tailleur, was one of the early arrivals. Her daughter, Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., was very smart in navy blue with which she wore silver foxes and a tiny hat of toast straw.

With Mrs. William Dexter, in brown, was her young son, who appeared to be enjoying himself thoroughly, and with Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears was her daughter, Anne. With her black skirt Miss Eleanor Williams wore a checked jacket and tiny black hat, and Mrs. Morgan Harris topped her navy skirt with a navy and yellow checked jacket.

With her black suit Mrs. Francis P. Sears wore a white straw hat and a frilly white blouse. Also in black and white was Mrs. Robert Treat Paine. Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson and Mrs. Arthur Bell were sitting together and with Mrs. Howard Turner, gardenias adorning her black ensemble, was her daughter, Miss Constance Turner, wrapped in a mink coat.

Chatting during the intermission with Miss Faith Kidder, who wore a black reefer and had a black bow in her hair, was Miss Katharine Putnam. Miss Gail Neilson who has several fetching hairdo's, wore her locks swept high yesterday, and with her checked topcoat she wore a tiny veiled sailor of toast straw. Miss Katharine Ladd and Miss Mary West both wore springlike navy blue with accents of white. Also in navy and white was Miss Louise Harding.

Smart spring hats were worn with winter furs as there was a cool wind in spite of the sunshine. Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr., wore a mink-trimmed black coat with her black straw hat that had a brim of pale pink flowers and a bow of pink tulle. With her were her mother, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, and her niece, Miss Josephine Murray, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Murray. With her gray tailleur and tiny sailor Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre wore a sable scarf.

Mrs. Allan Forbes was extremely chic in brown and white checked tweeds with which she wore a sealskin cape, and was accompanied by her daughter, Miss Phyllis Forbes. Miss Eleanor Claflin who has been hobbling about on crutches due to a skiing accident, managed to attend with a cane yesterday.

Among the many others present were Mrs. J. Harleston Parker, Mrs. George Saltonstall West, Mrs. Horatio Lamb and her daughter, Miss Aimee Lamb, Miss Katharine Lane, Mrs. Paul Clark, Mrs. James J. Minot, Jr., Mrs. Otis Russell, Miss Jane Megrew, Miss Louise Coburn, Mrs. T. Barnet Plimpton, Mrs. Louis Curtis, Mrs. John Yerxa, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Mrs. Roger B. Merriman, Miss Rosalind Rogers, Miss Barbara Brewer, Mrs. J. A. Lowell Blake, Mrs. John Bishop, Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French, Mrs. Basil Gavin, Mrs. Frank H. Stewart and her daughter, Mrs. C. Stewart Black, and Mrs. Robert Belknap.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 30 1939

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED

Boston, April 29.—(AP)—A richly-designed silver samovar was presented to Serge Koussevitzky tonight at the close of a concert which marked the end of his 15th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's trustees, made the presentation on behalf of the trustees and voiced appreciation for Koussevitzky's "fifteen years of unsurpassed achievement."

Honor Koussevitzky, 15 Years Symphony Orchestra Conductor

B. Globe - April 30/39

GIFT TO DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

At the conclusion of his 15th consecutive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—longest of any conductor in its history—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was presented a richly designed silver samovar by Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's trustees, at the end of the concert before a capacity audience in Symphony Hall last night.

Voicing their appreciation of "15 years of unsurpassed musical achievement," Mr. Dane spoke briefly on behalf of the donors—the trustees and a group of friends. The rare samovar was made by Carl Faberge, who was silver and goldsmith to the late Czar and Czarina of Russia.

Rare Silver Given To Koussevitzky

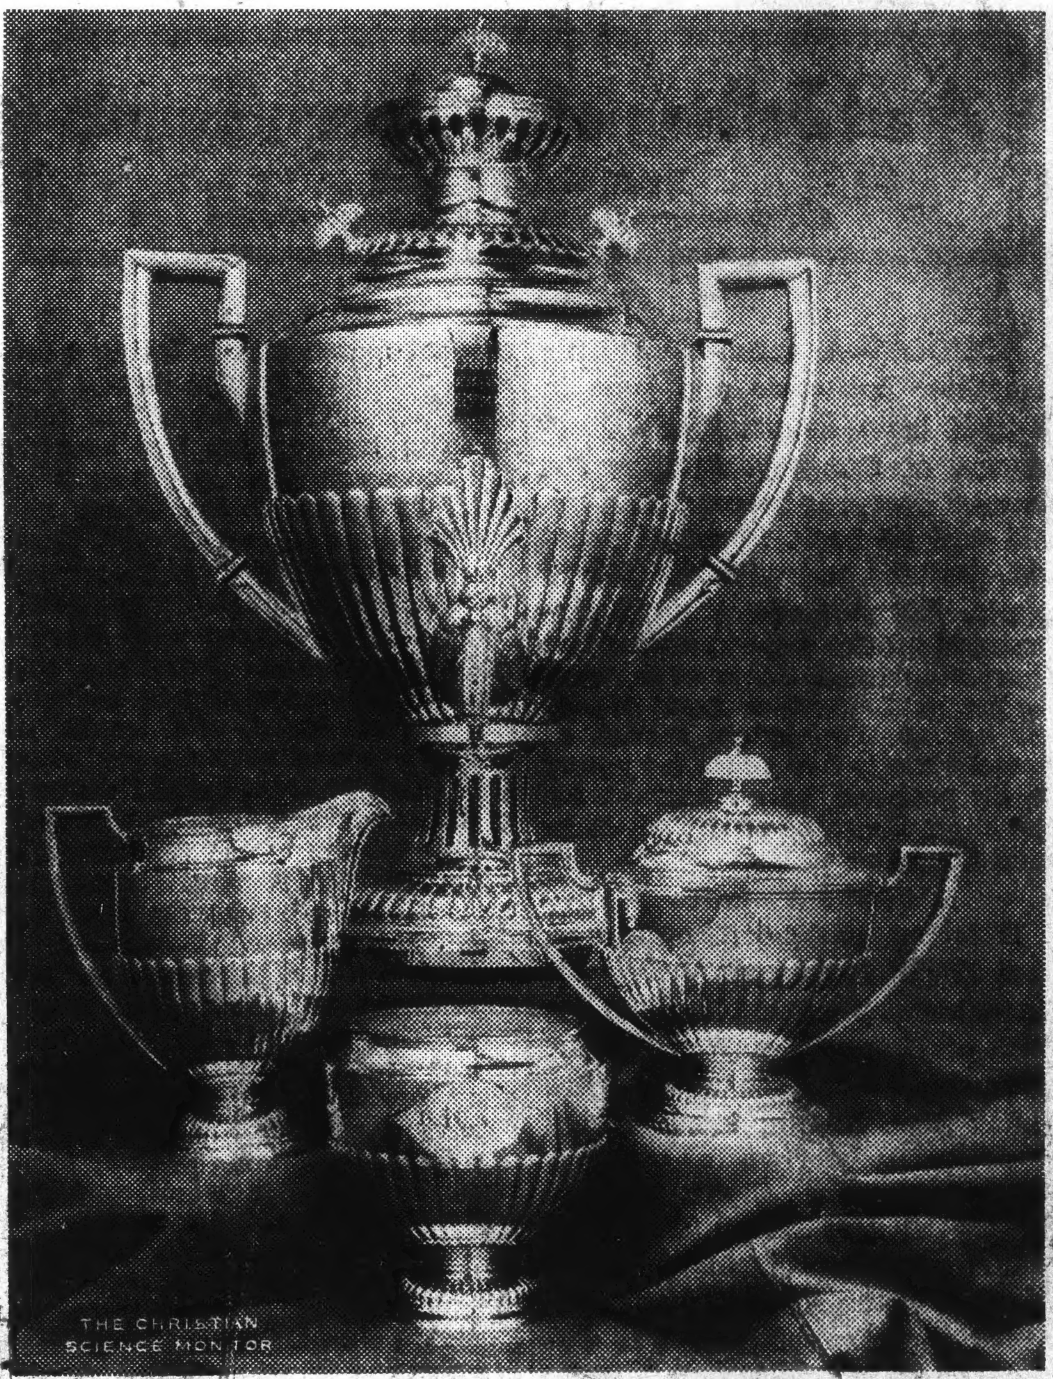
C.S. Monitor — May 9/39

Marking the conclusion of the fifteenth consecutive season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—longest term of any leader in its history—a richly designed silver samovar was presented to him at the end of the concert on Saturday evening, April 29. The performance was also the final one of the 58th regular season.

Amid the applause of a capacity audience, the presentation was made by Ernest B. Dane, president of the Orchestra's Trustees. Mr. Dane spoke briefly on behalf of the donors, who comprised the Trustees and a group of friends. He voiced their appreciation for "fifteen years of unsurpassed musical achievement."

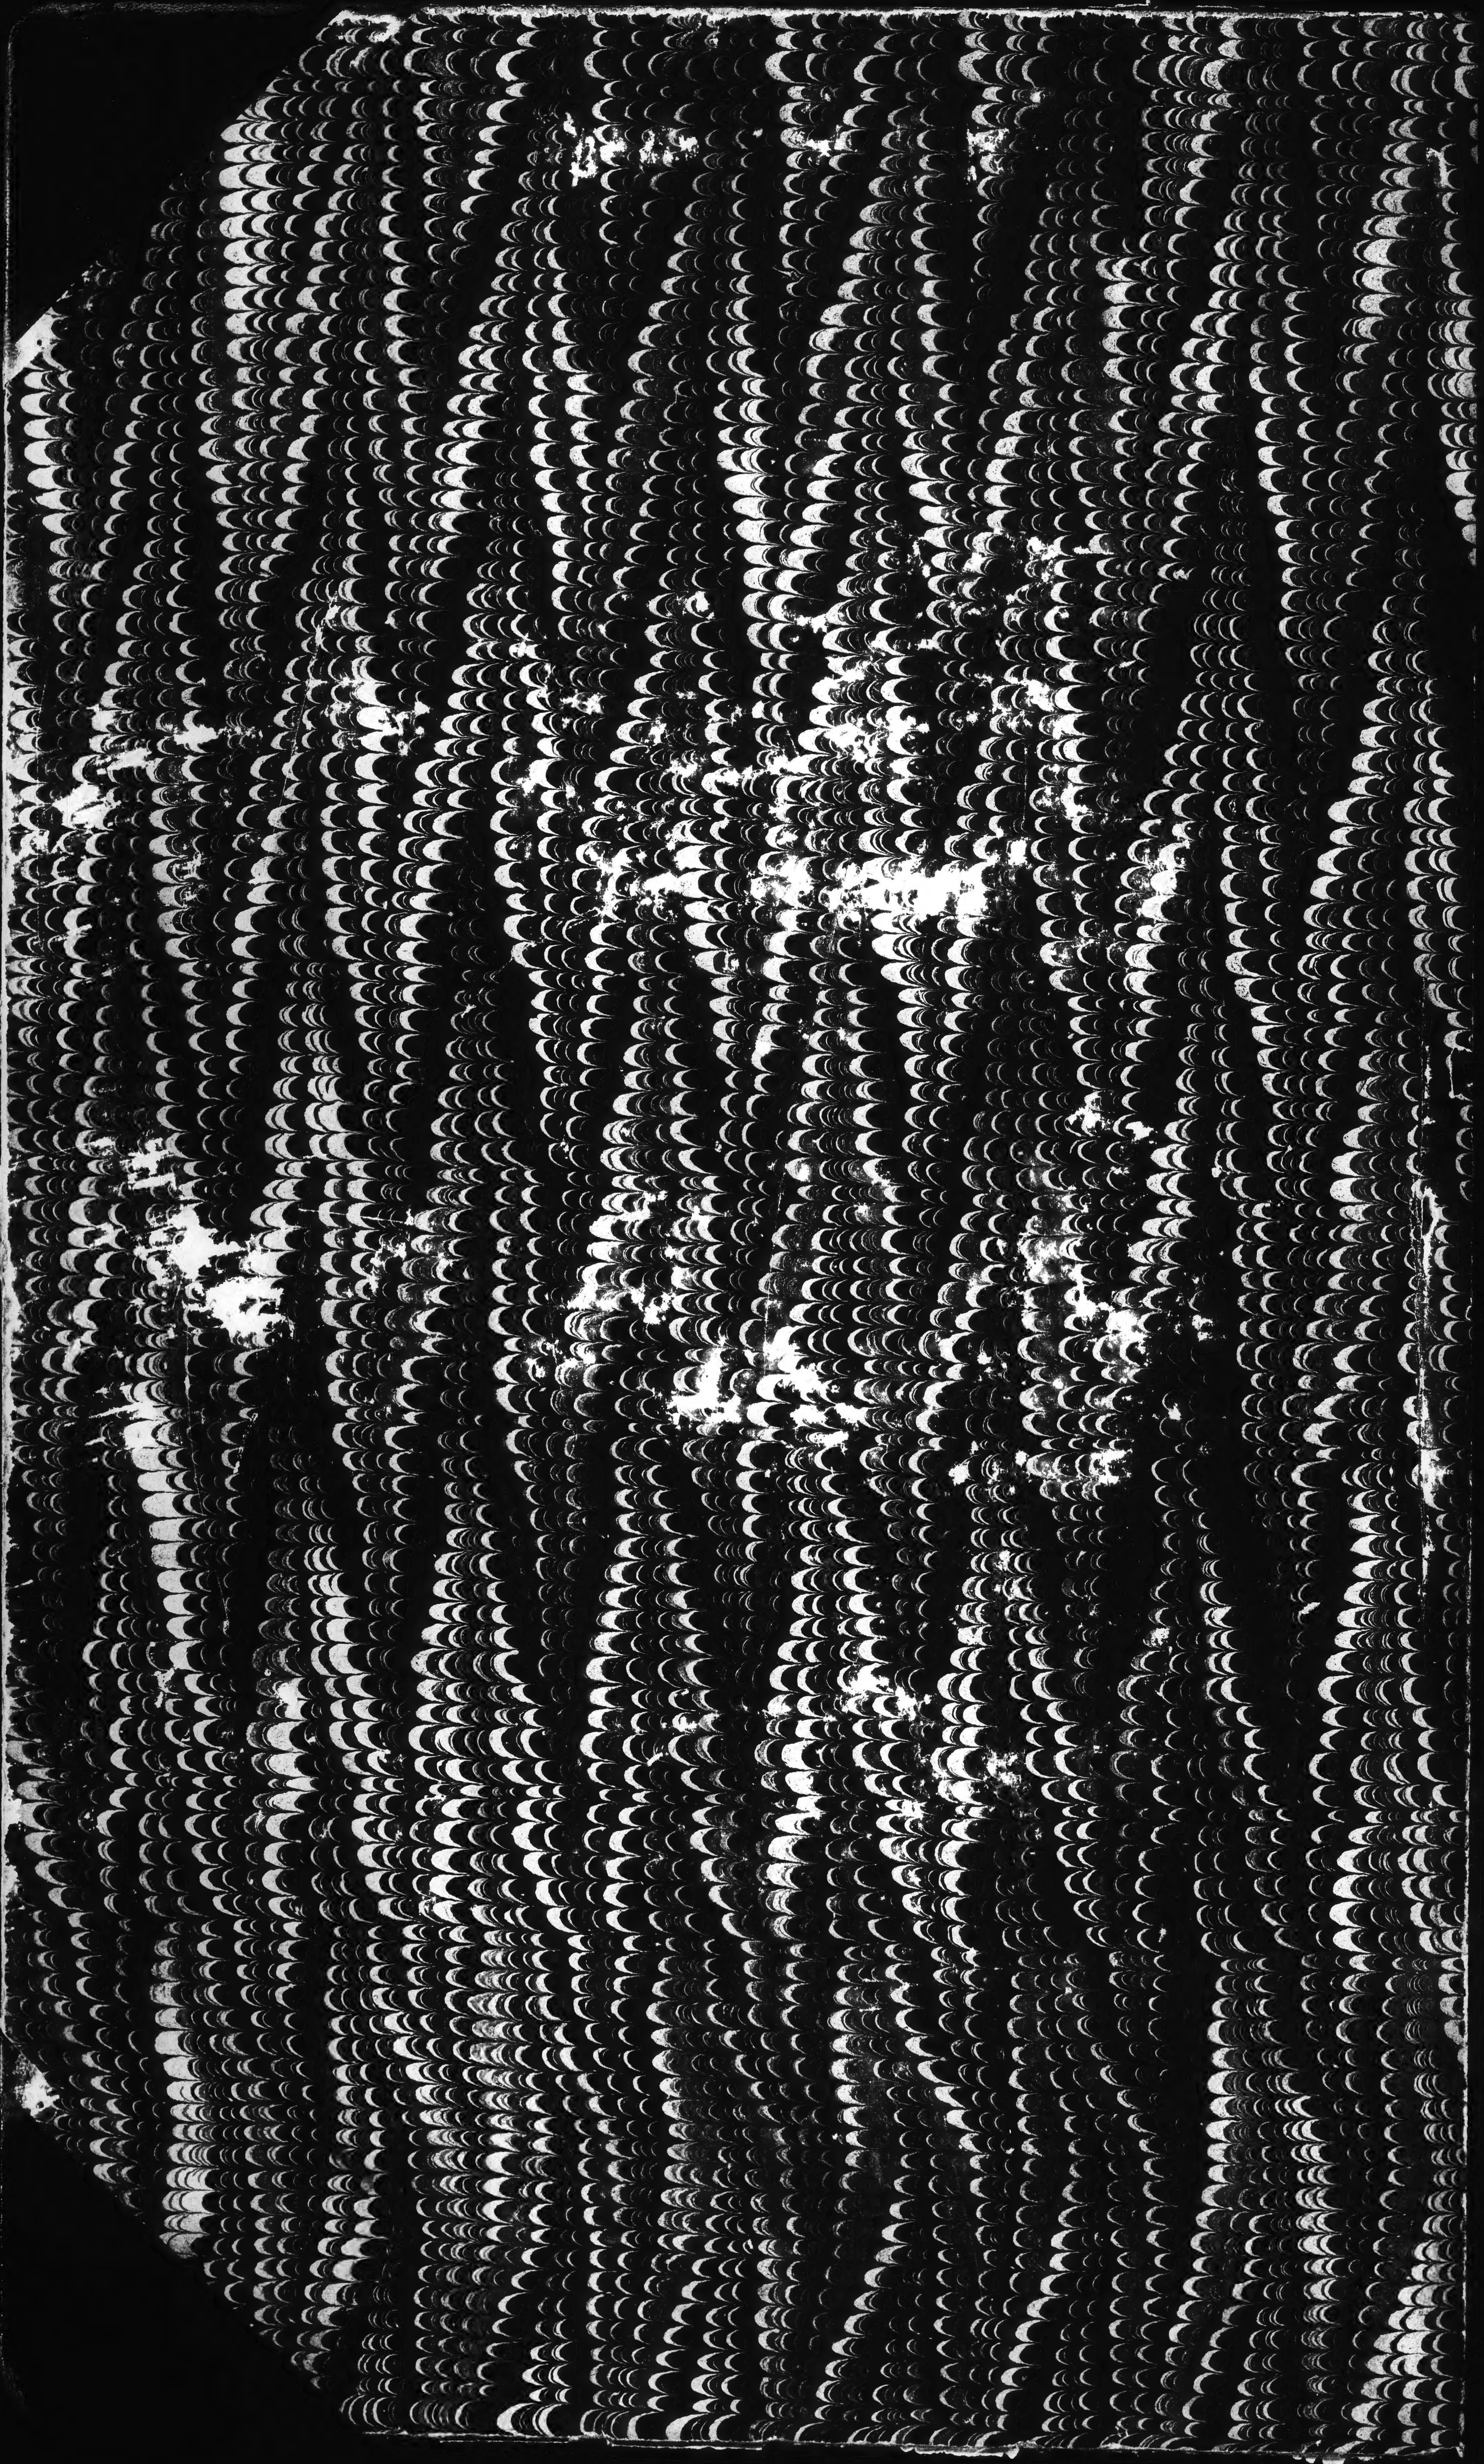
The samovar was made by Carl Faberge, who was goldsmith to the late Czar and Czarina of Russia. This makes the gift doubly acceptable to the recipient, who was a loyal follower of the royal regime which ended six years before he became leader of this orchestra.

The finding of this particularly appropriate gift resulted from the efforts of the Boston silversmith and collector, George C. Gebelein, who produced the three companion smaller pieces designed in the same manner as the samovar.



Silver samovar by Carl Faberge, and matching pieces by George Gebelein, presented to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the end of fifteen years of leadership.

Ward's STATIONERS 57-61 FRANKLIN ST. BOSTON
Scrap Book
ORDER NUMBER
911
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND